See all the land the last sad horrors feel
Of cruel creeds, and visionary zeal.
Mad bigotry her every son inspires,
Breathes all her plagues, and blows up all her fires,
Points the keen falchion, waves th' avenging rod,
And murders virtue in the name of God.

May He, who first the light of heav'n dis-
play'd,

The dear Redeemer of a world in shade,
He who to man the bliss of angels gave,
Who bled to triumph, and who died to save,
Beam all his gospel, sacred and divine,
On ev'ry bosom, and on ev'ry shrine;
Relieve th' expiring eye, and gasping breath,
And rescue nature from the arm of death.

And now resign'd, my bosom lighter grows,
And hope soft-beaming brightens all my woes,
Hark! or delusion charms, a seraph sings,
And choirs to waft us spread their silver wings:
Th' immortals call, heav'n opens at the sound,
And glories blaze, and mercy streams around.
Away—ere nature wake her pangs anew,
Friend, father, lover, husband, saint, adieu!
Yet when thy spirit, taught from earth to fly,
Spreads her full plume, and gains upon the sky,
One moment pause till these dead orbs resign
Their last faint beam, and speed my soul to thine:
Then, while the priest, in hallow'd robes ar-
ray'd,

Pays the last honours to each parting shade;
While o'er our ashes weeps th' attending train,
And the sad requiem flows along the fane;
Our kindred souls shall wing th' ethereal way,
From earth and anguish to the source of day—
To all the bliss of all the skies aspire,
And add new raptures to th' angelic choir.

And, O! if aught we knew, or left behind,
Can wake one image in the fainted mind;
If yet a friend, a parent, child, can move
Departed spirits to a sense of love;
Still shall our souls a kind connection feel
With England's senate, and with England's weal;
And drive from all its shores, with watchful care,
The flame of discord, and the rage of war.

Perhaps, when these sad scenes of blood are o'er,

And Rome's proud tyrant awes the soul no more;
When anguish throws off all the veils of art,
Bares all her wounds, and opens all her heart;
Our hapless loves shall grace th' historic page,
And charm the nations of a future age:
Perhaps some bard, whose tears have learnt to flow
For injur'd nature, and to feel for woe,
Shall tell the tender melancholy tale,
To the soft zephyrs of the western vale;
Fair truth shall bless him, virtue guard his cause,
And every widow'd matron weep applause.

OF TASTE.

AN ESSAY.

WELL—though our passions riot, fret, and rave,
Wild and capricious as the wind and wave,

One common folly, say whate'er we can,
Has fix'd at last the mercury of man;
And rules, as sacred as his father's creed,
O'er every native of the Thames and Tweed.

Ask ye what pow'r it is that dares to claim
So vast an empire, and so wide a fame?
What God unshrin'd in all the ages past?
I'll tell you, friend! in one short word—'tis Taste;
Taste that, without or head, or ear, or heart,
One gift of nature, or one grace of art,
Ennobles riches, sanctifies expence,
And takes the place of spirit, worth, and sense.
In elder time, ere yet our fathers knew
Rome's idle arts, or panted for Virtù,
Or sat whole nights Italian songs to hear,
Without a genius, and without an ear;
Exalted sense, to warmer climes unknown,
And manly wit, was nature's and our own.
But when our virtues, warp'd by wealth and peace,
Began to slumber in the lap of ease—
When Charles return'd to his paternal reign,
With more than fifty tailors in his train,
We felt for Taste—for then obliging France
Taught the rough Briton how to dress and dance;
Politely told him all were brutes and fools,
But the gay cockcombs of her happier schools;
That all perfection in her language lay,
And the best author was her own Rabelais.
Hence, by some strange malignity of fate,
We take our fashions from the land we hate:
Still slaves to her, howe'er her taste inclines,
We wear her ribbands, and we drink her wines;
Eat as she eats, no matter which or what,
A roasted lobster, or a roasted cat;
And fill our houses with an hungry train
Of more than half the scoundrels of the Seine.

Time was, a wealthy Englishman would join
A rich plumb-pudding to a fat sirloin;
Or bake a pasty, whose enormous wall
Took up almost the area of his hall:
But now, as art improves, and life refines,
The demon Taste attends him when he dines;
Serves on his board an elegant regale,
Where three stew'd mushrooms flank a larded
quail;

Where infant turkeys, half a month resign'd
To the soft breathings of a southern wind,
And smother'd in a rich ragout of snails,
Outstink a lenten supper at Versailles.
Is there a saint that would not laugh to see
The good man piddling with his fricassée;
Forc'd by the luxury of taste to drain
A flask of poison, which he calls champagne!
While he, poor idiot! though he dare not speak,
Pines all the while for porter and ox-cheek.

Sure 'tis enough to starve for pomp and show,
To drink, and curse the clarets of Bourdeaux;
Yet such our humour, such our skill to hit
Excess of folly through excess of wit,
We plant the garden, and we build the seat,
Just as absurdly as we drink and eat.
For is there aught that nature's hand has sown
To bloom and ripen in her hottest zone?
Is there a shrub which, ere its verdure blow,
Ask, all the suns that beam upon the Po?

Is there a flowret whose vermilion hue
Can only catch its beauty in Peru?
Is there a portal, colonnade, or dome,
The pride of Naples, or the boast of Rome?
We raise it here, in storms of wind and hail,
On the bleak bosom of a sunless vale;
Careless alike of climate, soil, and place,
The cast of nature, and the smiles of grace.

Hence all our stucco'd walls, Mosaic floors,
Palladian windows, and Venetian doors;
Our Gothic fronts, whose Attic wings unfold
Fluted pilasters tipp'd with leaves of gold;
Our mossy ciplings, grac'd with gay festoons,
The weeping marbles of our damp saloons,
Lawns fring'd with citrons, amaranthine bow'rs,
Expiring myrtles, and unop'ning flow'rs.
Hence the good Scotsman bids th' anana blow
In rocks of crystal, or in Alps of snow;
On Orcus' steep extends his wide arcade,
And kills his scanty sunshine in a shade.

One might expect a sanctity of style
August and manly in an holy pile,
And think an architect extremely odd
To build a playhouse for the church of God;
Yet half our churches, such the mode that reigns,
Are Roman theatres, or Grecian fanes;
Where broad-arch'd windows to the eye convey
The keen diffusion of too strong a day;
Where, in the luxury of wanton pride,
Corinthian columns languish side by side,
Clos'd by an altar exquisitely fine,
Loose and lascivious as a Cyprian shrine.

Of late, 'tis true, quite sick of Rome and Greece,
We fetch our models from the wise Chinese:
European artists are too cold and chaste,
For Mand'rin only is the man of taste;
Whose bolder genius, fondly wild to see
His grove a forest, and his pond a sea,
Breaks out — and, whimsically great, designs
Without the shackles or of rules or lines.
Form'd on his plans, our farms and seats begin
To match the boasted villas of Pekin.
On every hill a spire-crown'd temple swells,
Hung round with serpents, and a fringe of bells:
Junks and balcons along our waters sail,
With each a gilded cock-boat at his tail;
Our choice exotics to the breeze exhale
Within th' enclosure of a zig-zag rail;
In Tartar huts our cows and horses lie,
Our hogs are fatted in an Indian sty;
On ev'ry shelf a joss divinely stares,
Nymphs laid on chintzes sprawl upon our chairs;
While o'er our cabinets Confucius nods,
'Midst porcelain elephants, and China gods.

Peace to all such—but you whose chaster fires
True greatness kindles, and true sense inspires,
Or ere you lay a stone, or plant a shade,
Bend the proud arch, or roll the broad cascade,
Ere all your wealth in mean profusion waste,
Examine nature with the eye of taste; [rill,
Mark where she spreads the lawn, or pours the Falls in the vale, or breaks upon the hill;
Plan as she plans, and where her genius calls,
There sink your grottos, and there raise your walls.

Without this taste, beneath whose magic wand
Truth and correctness guide the artist's hand,
Woods, lakes, and palaces, are idle things,
The shame of nations, and the blush of kings.
Expencc and Vanbrugh, vanity and show,
May build a Blenheim, but not make a Stowe.

But what is Taste, you ask, this heav'n-born fire
We all pretend to, and we all admire?
Is it a casual grace? or lucky hit?
Or the cool effort of reflecting wit?
Has it no law but mere misguided will?
No just criterion fix'd to good and ill?
It has—True taste, when delicately fine,
Is the pure sunshine of a soul divine,
'The full perfection of each mental pow'r—
'Tis sense, 'tis nature, and 'tis something more.
'Twin-born with genius, of one common bed,
One parent bore them, and one master bred.
It gives the lyre with happier sounds to flow,
With purer blushes bids fair beauty glow;
From Raphael's pencil calls a nobler line,
And warms, Corregio! every touch of thine.

And yet, though sprung from one paternal flame,
Genius and Taste are different as their name:
Genius, all sunbeam, where he throws a smile,
Impregnates nature faster than the Nile;
Wild and impetuous, high as heav'n aspires,
All science animates, all virtue fires;
Creates ideal worlds, and there convenes
Aërial forms and visionary scenes.
But taste corrects, by one ethereal touch,
What seems too little, and what seems too much;
Marks the fine point where each consenting part
Slides into beauty with the ease of art;
This bids to rise, and that with grace to fall,
And bounds, unites, refines, and heightens all.

LIFE UNHAPPY, BECAUSE WE USE IT IMPROPERLY.

A MORAL ESSAY.

I own it, Belmour! say whate'er we can,
The lot of sorrow seems the lot of man;
Affliction feeds with all her keenest rage
On youth's fair blossoms, and the fruits of age;
And wraps alike beneath her harpy wings
The cells of peasants, and the courts of kings.

Yet sure unjustly we ascribe to fate
Those ills, those mischiefs, we ourselves create;
Vainly lament that all the joys we know
Are more than number'd by the pangs of woe;
And yet those joys in mean profusion waste,
Without reflection, and without a taste:
Careless of all that virtue gives to please,
For thought too active, and too mad for ease,
We give each appetite too loose a rein,
Push ev'ry pleasure to the verge of pain;
Impetuous follow where the passions call,
And live in rapture, or not live at all. [strife

Hence half the plagues that fill with pain and
Each softer moment of domestic life;
The palsied hand, the visionary brain,
Th' infected fluid, and the torpid vein;
The ruin'd appetite, that loathing flights
The richest olio of the cook at White's;

The aching impotence of loose desire,
A nerveless body, with a soul on fire;
Th' eternal blush that lights the cheek of shame
For wasted riches, and unheeded fame;
Unhallow'd reveries, low-thoughted cares,
The wish that riots, and the pang that tears;
Each awful tear that weeps the night away,
Each heartfelt sigh of each reflecting day;
All that around the low'ring eye of spleen
Throws the pale phantom, and terrific scene;
Or, direr still, calls from th' abyss below
Despair's dread genius to the couch of woe,
Where, lost to health, and hope's all cheering ray,
As the dead eye-ball to the orb of day,
Pale riot bleeds for all his mad expence
In each rack'd organ, or acuter sense;
Where sad remorse beholds in every shade
The murder'd friend, or violated maid;
And stung to madness in his inmost soul,
Grasps the keen dagger, or empoison'd bowl.

Impious it were to think th' Eternal Mind
Is but the scourge and tyrant of mankind.
Sure he who gives us sunshine, dew, and show'r,
The vine ambrosial, and the blooming flow'r,
Whose own bright image lives on man impress'd,
Meant that that being should be wise and blest,
And taught each instinct in his heart enshrined
To feel for bliss, to search it, and to find.

But where's this bliss, you ask, this heav'n-born
fire

We all pretend to, and we all admire?
Breathes it in Ceylon's aromatic isle?
Flows it along the waters of the Nile?
Lives it in India's animated mould,
In rocks of crystal, or in veins of gold?
Not there alone, but, boundless, unconfin'd,
Spreads through all life, and flows to all mankind;
Waits on the winds that blow, the waves that roll,
And warms alike the Equator and the Pole.
For as kind nature through the globe inspires
Her parent warmths, and elemental fires,
Forms the bright gem in earth's unfathom'd caves,
Bids the rich coral blush beneath the waves,
And with the same prolific virtue glows
In the rough bramble, as the damask rose;
So, in the union of her moral plan,
The ray of bliss shines on from man to man,
Whether in purples or in skins array'd,
He wields the sceptre, or he plies the spade,
Slaves on the Ganges, triumphs on the Rhone,
Hides in a cell, or beams upon a throne.

In vain the men whose soul ambition fires,
Whom birth ennobles, and whom wealth inspires,
Insists that happiness for courts was made,
And laughs at every genius of the shade.
As much mistakes the sage, who fain would prove
Fair pleasure lives but in his grot and grove.
Each scene of life, or open or confin'd,
Alike congenial to its kindred mind.
Alike ordain'd by heav'n to charm or please
The man of spirit and the man of ease;
Just as our taste is better or is worse,
Becomes a blessing, or becomes a curse.
When lust and envy share the soul by turns,
When fear unnerves her, or mad vengeance burns;

When luxury brutes her in the wanton bow'r,
And guilt's black phantoms haunt her midnight hour;

Not all the wealth each warmer sun provides,
All earth embosoms, and all ocean hides,
Not all the pomps that round proud greatness shine.
When suppliant nations bow before her shrine,
Can ease the heart, or ray upon the breast
Content's full sunshine, and the calm of rest.
No—all the bliss that nature feels, or knows,
Of heartfelt rapture, or of cool repose,
Howe'er improv'd by wisdom, and by art,
Lives in ourselves, and beams but from the heart.
Quite independent of those alien things,
Applauding senates, and the smiles of kings,
Of empty purses, or of wealthy bags,
A robe of ermines, or a coat in rags,

Conclude we then that Heav'n's supreme decree
Gives ease and joy to monarchs and to me:
Yet, such the fate of all that man obtains,
Our pleasures must be purchas'd by our pains,
And cost us every hour some small expence,
A little labour, and a little sense.
That heav'n-born bliss, that soul-illumin'd joy,
Which madmen squander, and which fools destroy,

To half the nations of the globe unknown,
Reflecting wisdom makes it all her own;
Coolly explores, in every scene and sphere,
What nature wants, what life inherits there;
What lenient arts can teach the soul to know
A purer rapture, and a softer woe;
What melt her idle vanities away,
And make to-morrow happier than to-day.
Without this cheap, this economic art,
This cool philosophy of head and heart,
A peer's proud bosom, rack'd by pangs and cares,
Feels not the splendor of the star he wears:
With it the wretch whom want has forc'd to dwell
In the last corner of her cheerless cell,
In spite of hunger, labour, cold, disease,
Lies, laughs, and slumbers on the couch of ease.

A coxcomb once in Handel's parlour found
A Grecian lyre, and try'd to make it sound;
O'er the fine stops his awkward fist he flings,
And rudely presses on th' elastic strings:
Awaken'd discord shrieks, and scolds, and raves,
Wild as the dissonance of winds and waves,
Loud as a Wapping mob at midnight bawls,
Harsh as ten chariots rolling round St. Paul's,
And hoarser far than all th' ecstatic race
Whose drunken orgies stunn'd the wilds of Thrace.

Friend! quoth the sage, that fine machine contains

Exacter numbers, and diviner strains;
Strains such as once could build the Theban wall,
And stop the mountain torrent in its fall:
But yet, to wake them, rouse them, and inspire,
Asks a fine finger, and a touch of fire,
A feeling soul, whose all expressive pow'rs
Can copy nature as she sinks or soars:
And, just alike to passion, time, and place,
Refine correctness into ease and grace.
He said—and, flying o'er each quiv'ring wire,
Spread his light hand, and swept it on the lyre.

Quick to his touch the lyre began to glow,
The sound to kindle, and the air to flow,
Deep as the murmurs of the falling floods,
Sweet as the warbles of the vocal woods:
The list'ning passions hear, and sink, and rise,
As the rich harmony or swells or dies;
The pulse of avarice forgets to move,
A purer rapture fills the breast of love;
Devotion lifts to heav'n a holier eye,
And bleeding pity heaves a softer sigh.
Life has its ease, amusement, joy, and fire,
Hid in itself, as music in the lyre;
And, like the lyre, with all its pow'rs impart,
When touch'd and manag'd by the hand of art.
But half mankind, like Handel's fool, destroy,
Through rage and ignorance, the strain of joy;
Irregularly will their passions roll
Through nature's finest instrument, the soul:
While men of sense, with Handel's happier skill,
Correct the taste, and harmonize the will;
Teach their affections like his notes to flow,
Not rais'd too high, nor ever sunk too low;
Till every virtue, measur'd and refin'd,
As fits the concert of the master-mind,
Melts in its kindred sounds, and pours along
Th' according music of the moral song.

PRUSSIA: A POEM.

AWAKE, Voltaire! with warmth, with rapture raise

Th' applauding pean, and the song of praise:
Again thy Fred'ric mounts the victor's car,
Again he thunders in the front of war;
Back to the desert flies the routed Gaul,
And proud Vienna shakes from wall to wall.

He hears me not—thy genius, France! prevails,

The poet feels but for his own Versailles;
With secret curses eyes the hero's sword,
And hates that virtue which he once ador'd.

And shall a king whose triumphs far exceed
The boasted glories of the Greek and Swede;
Who more than Cæsar, with a brighter ray
Ascends, and shines imperial Rome away—
Shall he through ages spread his mighty name
Without a verse to wait upon his fame?
Has Britain lost her spirit, soul, and fire?
Has she no patriot who dare touch the lyre?
Yes——while I live, thy virtues, prince! shall be
For ever sacred to the muse, and me.
What though I herd but with the vulgar throng,
The last, the lowest of the sons of song,
Thy bold exploits shall give my soul to glow,
My pulse to kindle, and my vein to flow;
Exalt my spirit, animate my line,
And lend my numbers all the strength of thine.

Now had pale fury drove her iron car
From fields of slaughter, and from wastes of war;
Returning peace led on the vernal year,
Sheath'd the keen sword, and broke the lifted spear,
Wide o'er the world her olive branch display'd,
And call'd the nations to its hallow'd shade.
And now the arts, inflam'd with gen'rous strife,
Rose in the softness of domestic life;

Exulting labour tam'd the stubborn plain,
The sail of commerce took up all the main,
With bolder wings th' immortal Muses flew,
And science trimm'd her faded wreath anew.

Ambition sigh'd—for now she heard no more
The war's loud thunder break from shore to shore;

No more beheld proud monarchs, meanly vain,
Rank'd in her files, or number'd in her train;
Lost to the glare of life, she lay unblest
In the lone cell of solitary rest,
Where spleen's pale visions round her slumbers throw

Eternal sadness, and a pomp of woe.
In vain kind nature pours upon her eye
A softer sunshine, and a richer sky,
Spreads the wild forest, heaves the cloud-topped hill,
Waves in the wood, and flows along the rill:
Woods, wilds, and waters, to her sense decay,
The warblers languish on the vocal spray;
Unclouded suns in heav'n's clear azure fade,
And night's black horrors wear a deeper shade.

At length arous'd she feels her wonted flame,
Revives, and opens to the voice of fame:
See sees new triumphs rising to her view,
And wing'd by rapture, to Vienna flew.
'Twas night—lull'd softly by the western breeze,
Fair Austria slumber'd on the couch of ease:
When as of old the first infernal pow'r
Stole on the sweets of Eden's nuptial bow'r,
And skill'd alike to flatter and deceive,
Crept in a reptile to the ear of Eve
So now ambition, with a nobler mien,
Approach'd, and whisper'd thus the sleeping queen.

"Canst thou, O princess! thou, whose glory springs

From heav'n-born heroes, and a race of kings,
Resign'd, and cool, to yonder Prussian yield
Silesia's sceptre, and her fruitful field?
Rise to thy wrongs, assert thy injur'd reign,
And bid the sword of vengeance rage again;
Tear from his hand the empire he hath won,
This moment crush him, or thou art undone.
Secret and strong, beneath his native fires,
The haughty genius of his soul aspires;
His realms enlarge, his sails begin to fly
O'er ev'ry ocean of the polar sky.

Rich harvests rise upon his barren waste,
His crowded cities are the seats of taste;
Another year's autumnal sun shall see
His broad dominions stretch from sea to sea;
Perhaps shall see him on th' imperial throne,
Europe enslav'd, and half the world his own."

Thus spake the fiend, and, with delusive art,
Breath'd her black spirit through Teresa's heart:
Rapt into future scenes she minds no more
The faith she plighted, and the oath she swore;
Strong, and more strong, the vision lives imprest,
Conquest's dread genius takes up all her breast;
Paints on her soul, in luxury of thought,
Th' ideal glories of a war unfought,
The laurel wreath, the military show,
The car of triumph, and the captive foe.
And now the queen, unfeeling, false, and vain,
Plans the wide ruin of a bold campaign;

Through all the north with all her spirit raves,
And wakes the nations in their huts, and caves;
With wild barbarians crowds her wanton war,
The savage Croat, and the fierce hussar;
Fires the proud Saxon's sanguinary vein,
And rouses all the dæmon of the Seine;
Leagues kings with kings, fills Europe with alarms,
Shakes heav'n and earth, and sets the world in arms.

O curst ambition! to each vice allied,
Begot by mischief in the womb of pride,
What ills, dread fury! from thy genius flow!
What awful scenes of unimagined woe!
Before thy footsteps, wrapp'd in flames of fire,
Sinks the tall column, and majestic spire.
Close at thy side her sword fell slaughter waves,
'Midst bleeding piles, and ever-op'ning graves;
The plague behind thee, with her tainted breath,
Sweeps through the nations on the wing of death;
Neglected genius in his cell expires,
To other worlds fair liberty retires;
The patriot muse forgets her voice divine,
Religion leaves her violated shrine;
And ev'ry meek ey'd virtue pines and mourns,
'Midst falling temples, and sepulchral urns.

The Prussian saw at one keen glance from far

The gath'ring tempest, and impending war:
He saw, and instant bids his armies form,
Heads the bold march, and bears upon the storm.
In vain the forest big with death extends,
The rampant thunders, and the flood descends;
In vain the foe each open field declines,
Hides in the trench, or lurks within his lines;
He storms the rampart, fords the rapid flood,
Leaps the broad trench, and clears th' enambush'd wood;

Now presses on, now reins his dread career,
Pours on the van, or steals upon the rear;
Marks ev'ry crisis, shines in ev'ry scene,
And is at once a Marlbro', and Eugene.
At length, in all the pomp of war, advance
Th' imperial eagles with the arms of France;
A mighty host, whose awful files contain
The vet'ran warriors of the Marne and Maine.
And will he yet, when nations round him close,
And his thin ranks scarce number half his foes;
Will he, ye heav'ns! th' unequal conflict try,
And brave his fate when glory bids him fly?
Ah! aught avails it that immortal fame
Fill'd her fond clarion with her Fred'ric's name?
Avails it aught that justice learn'd to awe
Misguided nature from his code of law?
That warm'd, and foster'd by his genial eye,
Transplanted science own'd the polar sky?
That Greece and taste upon the Baltic smil'd,
And new Lyceums open'd in the wild?
Alas! one moment—the bright scene is o'er—
He falls—he dies—and Prussia is no more.
Yet shall not France, in this her blissful hour,
Her dream of empire, and her pride of pow'r,
An easy, cheap, unbleeding conquest know,
Or rear her trophies o'er a flying foe:
For now the monarch, ere he gives the sign,
Serenely dreadful moves along the line:

The legions, far as each keen glance can fly,
Mark his firm step, and hang upon his eye;
That eye whose lightning terror round him flings;
That step which seems to tread on thrones, and kings.

At every look through all th' embattled van
The pulse of glory beats from man to man:
The soldier kindling at his prince aspires,
Swells with his hopes, and burns with all his fires;
Yet, 'midst his ardours, owns a softer flame,
And feels for Fred'ric while he feels for fame.

And now the sun, whose orb shall set in blood,
Faints on the umbrage of the western wood;
The distant hills in each horizon fade,
And night comes on in all her gloom and shade:
And now the trumpet's animating sound
Peals on the ear, and shakes the field around.
When, as the whirlwind tears its rapid way,
Roots up the rock, and sweeps the plain away;
Fierce on his foe th' intrepid Prussian springs,
Drives through his van, and breaks into his wings;
Wraps his whole war in one tremendous fire,
And sees the prowess of his host expire.
Th' imperial chiefs no more the shock sustain,
Their fainting battle bleeds in ev'ry vein;
France flies impetuous on the wings of fear,
And hungry slaughter feeds upon his rear.

Yet, stay thee, prince! all-conqueror as thou
art,

Indulge the milder virtues of thy heart;
Restrain fierce vengeance in her rage of ire,
And let us love the monarch we admire.
All that on earth proud conquest gives to shine,
All the dread glories of the sword are thine:
The victor-wreath applauding states decree,
The sacred pean only swells for thee.
Another toil remains ere yet thy name
Bears the full splendor of unclouded fame.
Enjoy that nobler fame—bid discord cease,
And lay pale Europe in the lap of peace:
Then shall the muse, who now thy triumph sings
O'er routed nations, and repenting kings,
With rapture wait thee to thy sylvan bow'r,
And watch the glories of thy softer hour,
When Rome's fine arts beneath thy shield shall win

A fairer laurel in thy own Berlin;
There fix the school of beauty, and adorn
Worlds unexplor'd, and empires yet unborn.

NOBILITY,

A MORAL ESSAY.

Spoken at the Visitation of Tunbridge-School, 1752.

'Tis said that ere fair virtue learn'd to sigh,
The crest to libel, and the star to lie,
The poet glow'd with all his sacred fire,
And bade each virtue live along the lyre;
Led humble science to the blest abode,
And rais'd the hero till he shone a god.

Our modern bards, by some unhappy fate,
Condemn'd to flatter ev'ry fool of state,
Have oft, regardless of their heav'n-born flame,
Enthron'd proud greatness in the shrine of fame;

Bestow'd on vice the wreaths that virtue wove,
And paid to Nero what was due to Jove.

Yet hear, ye great! whom birth and titles
crown

With alien worth, and glories not your own;
Hear me affirm, that all the vain can show,
All Anstis boasts of, and all kings bestow,
All envy wishes, all ambition hails,
All that supports St. James's and Versailles,
Can never give distinction to a knave,
Or make a lord whom vice has made a slave.

In elder times, ere heralds yet enroll'd
The bleeding ruby in a field of gold,
Or infant language pain'd the tender ear
With fess, bend, argent, chev'ron, and saltier;
'Twas he alone the bay's bright verdure wore,
Whose strength subdu'd the lion or the boar;
Whose art from rocks could call the mellowing grain,

And give the vine to laugh along the plain;
Or, tracing nature to her moral plan,
Explor'd the savage till he found the man.
For him the rustic hind, and village maid,
Stripp'd the gay spring of half its bloom and shade;
With annual dances grac'd the daisy-mead,
And sung his triumphs on the oaten reed;
Or, fond to think him sprung from yonder sky,
Rear'd the turf fane, and bade the victim die.

In Turkey, sacred as the Koran's page,
These simple manners live through ev'ry age:
The humblest swain, if virtue warms the man,
May rise the genius of the grave Divan;
And all but Othman's race, the only proud,
Fall with their fires, and mingle with the crowd.

For three campaigns Caprouli's hand display'd
The Turkish crescent on thy walls, Belgrade!
Imperial Egypt own'd him for her lord,
And Austria trembled if he touch'd the sword:
Yet all his glories set within his grave,
One son a Janissary, one a slave.
Politer courts, ingenious to extend
The father's glories, bid his pomps descend;
With strange good-nature give his worthless son
The very laurels that his virtue won;
And with the same appellatives adorn
A living hero, and a sot unborn.

Hence, without blushing (say whate'er we can)

We more regard th' escutcheon than the man;
Yet, true to nature and her instincts, prize
The hound or spaniel as his talent lies:
Careless from what paternal blood he rose,
We value Bowman only for his nose.

Say, should you see a generous steed outfly
The swiftest zephyr of th' autumnal sky,
Wou'd you at once his ardent wishes kill,
Give him the dogs, or chain him to a mill,
Because his humbler fathers, grave, and slow,
Clean'd half the jakes of Houndsditch or Soho?

In spite of all that in his grandfire shone,
An horse's worth is, like a king's, his own.
If in the race, when length'ning shouts inspire
His bold compeers, and set their hearts on fire,
He seems regardless of th' exulting sound,
And scarcely drags his legs along the ground;

What will't avail, that sprung from heav'nly seed,
His great forefathers swept th' Arabian mead;
Or, dress'd in half an empire's purple, bore
The weight of Xerxes on the Caspian shore?

I grant, my lord! your ancestors outshone
All that e'er grac'd the Ganges, or the Rhone;
Born to protect, to rouse those godlike fires
That genius kindles, or fair fame inspires;
O'er humble life to spread indulgent ease,
To give the veins to flow without disease;
From proud oppression injur'd worth to screen,
And shake alike the senate and the scene.

And see, to save them from the wrecks of age,
Exulting science fills her every page,
Fame grasps her trump, the epic muse attends,
The lyre re-echoes, and the song ascends,
The sculptor's chissel with the pencil vies,
Rocks leap, and animated marbles rise:
All arts, all pow'rs, the virtuous chiefs adorn,
And spread their pomps to ages yet unborn.

All this we own—but if, amidst the shine,
Th' enormous blaze that beams along the line,
Some scoundrel peer, regardless of his fires,
Pursues each folly, and each vice admires;
Shall we enrol his prostituted name
In honour's zenith, and the lists of fame?

Exalted titles, like a beacon, rise
To tell the wretched where protection lies.
He then who hears unmov'd affliction's cry,
His birth's a phantom, and his name's a lie.

The Egyptians thus on Cairo's sacred plain,
Saw half their marbles move into a fane;
The glorious work unnumber'd artists ply,
Now turn the dome, now lift it to the sky:
But when they enter'd the sublime abode,
They found a serpent where they hop'd a god.

Anstis observes, that when a thousand years
Roll through a race of princes, or of peers,
Obliging virtue sheds her every beam
From son to son, and waits upon the stream.
Yet say, ye great! who boast another's scars,
And think your lineage ends but in the stars,
What is this boon of Heav'n? dependent still
On woman's weakness, and on woman's will;
Dare ye affirm that no exotic blood
Has stain'd your glories ever since the flood?
Might not some brawny slave, from Afric fled,
Stamp his base image in the nuptial bed?
Might not, in pagan days, your mothers prove
The fire of Phœbus, and the strength of Jove?
Or, more politely to their vows untrue,
Love, and clope, as modern ladies do?

But grant that all your gentle grandames shone
Clear, and un sullied as the noon-day sun;
Though nature form'd them of her chastest mold,

Say, was their birth illustrious as their gold?
Full many a lord, we know, has chose to range
Among the wealthy beauties of the 'Change;
Or sigh'd, still humbler, to the midnight gale
For some fair peasant of th' Arcadian vale.
Then blame us not, if backward to adore
A name polluted by a slave or whore;
Since spite of patents, and of king's decrees,
And blooming coronets on parchment trees,

Some alien stain may darken all the line,
And Norfolk's blood descend as mean as mine.

You boast, my Lord! a race with laurels crown'd,
By senates honour'd, and in war renown'd;
Show then the martial soul to danger bred,
When Poitiers thunder'd, and when Cressy bled;
Show us those deeds, those heav'n-directed fires,
That ages past saw beaming on your fires;
That freeborn pride no tyrant durst enslave,
That godlike zeal that only liv'd to save.

Dare you, though faction bawl through all her tribe,
Though monarchs threaten, and though statesmen bribe,

Feel for mankind, and gallantly approve
All virtue teaches, and all angels love?
Know you the tear that flows o'er worth distress'd,
The joy that rises when a people's blest?
Then, if you please, immortalize your line,
With all that's great, heroic, and divine;
Explore with curious eye th' historic page,
The rolls of fame, the monuments of age;
Adopt each chief immortal Homer sings,
All Greece's heroes, and all Asia's kings:
If earth's too scanty, search the blest abode,
And make your first progenitor a god:
We grant your claim, whate'er you wish to prove,
The son of Priam, or the son of Jove.

Statesmen and patriots thus to glory rise,
The self-born sun that gilds them never dies:
While he ennobled by those gewgaw things,
The pride of patents, and the breath of kings,
Glares the pale meteor of a little hour,
Fed by court sunshine, and poetic show'r;
Then sinks at once, unpitied, and unblest,
A nation's scandal, and a nation's jest.

Nobility had something in her blood,
When to be great was only to be good:
Sublime she sat in virtue's sacred fane,
With all the sister graces in her train.
She still exists, 'tis true, in Grosvenor-Square,
And leads a life, a kind of—as it were ———.
And see! self-shelter'd from the world's alarms;
The dying goddess sleeps in Fortune's arms;
Fond luxury attends her soft retreats,
The modest Frazz warbles while she cats;
Arabia's sweets distil at ev'ry pore,
Her flatt'ers sooth her, and her slaves adore;
Indulg'd by all our senates to forget,
Those worst of plagues, a promise and a debt.

Not but there are, amidst the titled crew,
Unknown to all but Collins, and the stew,
Men who improve their heav'n-descended fires,
Rise on their blood, and beam upon their fires;
Men who, like diamonds from Golconda's mine,
Call from themselves the ray that makes them
shine.

Pleas'd let me view a Cecil's soul array'd
With all that Plato gather'd in the shade;
Reflect how nobly Radnor can descend
To lose his title in the name of friend;
At Dorset look, and bid Hibernia own
Her viceroy form'd to sit upon a throne;
Admire how innocence can lend to truth
Each grace of virtue, and each charm of youth,

And then enraptur'd bend the suppliant knee
To Heav'n's high throne, O Rockingham! for thee.
Let then vain fools their proud escutcheons
view,

Allied to half the Yncas of Peru;
With every vice those lineal glories stain
That rose in Pharamond, or Charlemagne:
But ye, dear youths! whom chance or genius calls
To court pale wisdom in these hallow'd walls,
Scorn ye to hang upon a blasted name
Another's virtue, and another's fame:
In two short precepts all your business lies—
Would you be great?—Be virtuous and be wife.

THE TEMPLE OF HYMEN.

A TALE.

In elder time when men were chaste,
And women had not got a taste,
It was ordain'd, to ease their cares,
The sexes should be link'd in pairs,
And pass the various scenes of life,
Known by the names of man and wife.

To aid this scheme, so just and wise,
The male had vigour, strength, and size:
Undaunted, active, bold and brave,
And fearless of wind or wave,
He scal'd the cliff's enormous steep,
He plung'd into the pathless deep,
And dar'd in open war engage
The lion's sanguinary rage.

Woman, as form'd to charm, and please,
Had more of elegance and ease,
A finer shape, a softer mien,
A heart more gentle and serene.
Her smile was sunshine—in her face
Sat sweetness on the throne of grace:
The accents melted from her tongue
In all the harmony of song;
And every glance that left her eye
Was milder than a vernal sky.

As nature now had done her best,
She left to accident the rest,
To accident!—you cry—Why, yes.
Yet think not that she acts by guess.
Events may baffle man's endeavour,
But nature is extremely clever,
And works with so exact a care,
She ne'er miscarries in a hair.
For now, when on a festal day
The sexes met, alert and gay,
And, in their pastimes, sports, and dances,
Had interchang'd some tender glances,
Th' impassion'd heart began to own
A set of instincts yet unknown;
To throb with momentary fires,
And melt away in young desires.
In short, the men began to bow,
To sooth, to ogle, whine, and vow;
To haunt the solitary shade,
And whisper to the village maid.
The village maid, who knew not yet
The breeding of a fly coquette;
And could not, with an artful sigh,
Like modern ladies, smile, and lie;

Indulgent heard her lover's flame,
Frankly confess'd she felt the same,
And ere the rosy-finger'd morn
Dried up the pearls upon the thorn,
Went with him, 'midst her virgin train,
In flow'rets drest, to Hymen's fane.

This mild divinity, so sung
By half the poets old and young,
The patron of connubial truth,
Was now in all the bloom of youth.
Roses fresh gather'd from the bush,
Sweet emblems of the female blush,
Wove in a wreath supremely fair,
Sat graceful on his auburn hair:
One hand sustain'd a torch on fire,
Significant of soft desire;
The other held in mystic show
A broider'd veil of saffron hue:
Majestic flow'd his azure vest,
And rubies bled upon his breast.

The meek-ey'd god an age or so
Succeeded, and had much to do;
In crowds his eager vot'ries came,
His altars never ceas'd to flame:
Besides an off'ring, frank and free,
First paid him as the marriage fee,
Some pretty toys of shells and corals,
With sprigs of ever-blooming laurels,
And bowls of consecrated wine,
Were yearly plac'd upon his shrine,
The gifts of many a grateful pair
Made happy by his guardian care.

It chanc'd three demons, fiends, or witches,
Ambition, Vanity, and Riches,
Walk'd out one evening bright and fair,
To breathe a little country air;
And, as old Nick would have it, found
This soul-enchancing spot of ground,
Where happy husbands, happy wives,
Enjoy'd the most delicious lives;
And resolv'd to buy, or hire,
A vacant cottage of the 'squire.

They came, they settled; sooth'd, carest,
Politely treated every guest,
And, with a world of pains and labours,
Lectur'd their simple-minded neighbours.
"My worthy friends!" says Wealth, "behold
The splendour of almighty gold!
These guineas here, these brilliant things,
Which bear the images of kings,
Within their little orbs contain
Fair pleasure's ever-smiling train,
And can to ev'ry swain dispense
Wit, spirit, virtue, taste, and sense.
Who but a fool would wed a Phillis,
Whose only portion is her lilies?
For ever doom'd, in life's low shade,
To ply the mercenary spade,
Till some disease, whose nature such is
To set us on a pair of crutches,
Force you to plunder, beg, or steal
From charity an humble meal;
And send your age, for want of vittle,
To a poor alms-house, or the 'spittle.
Be wise, and, when you mean to wed,
Scorn the fair forms of white and red;

And court the nymph whose genial charms,
Rich as the fruits upon her farms,
Will pour upon your daily toil
Abundant floods of wine and oil."

He said—Ambition then began
About the dignity of man;
He rallied all their groves and springs,
And finely talk'd of queens and kings:
It was, he thought, a want of grace
To mingle with the vulgar race;
For souls made up of heav'nly fire
Are form'd by nature to aspire.
He told them that a well-born wife
Ennobled every joy of life,
Without a patent gave her dear
Th' importance of a British peer;
Perhaps might to a prince ally him,
And make him cousin to old Priam.

While thus the fiends, with wily art,
Adroitly stole upon the heart,
And with their complaisance and tales,
Had ruin'd more than half the males,
Gay Vanity, with smiles and kisses,
Was busy 'mongst the maids and misses.
"My dears!" says she, "those pretty faces
Speak you the sisters of the Graces:
Immortal Venus would be vain
To have you in her court and train.
But sure, methinks, it something odd is,
That beauties who can match a goddess
Should give their more than mortal charms
To a dull rustic's joyless arms,
A mere unanimated clod,
As much a lover as a god.
O let those eyes, which far outshine
The brightest sapphires of the mine,
Their precious orbs no longer roll
On fellows without wealth or soul:
But fly, my charmers! fly the wretches,
Dame nature's first misshapen sketches,
Fly to the world where lords and 'squires
Are warm'd with more ethereal fires;
Where pleasure each gay moment wings,
Where the divine Mingotti sings:
So shall each all-commanding fair
Have her two pages and a chair,
Fine Indian tissues, Mechlin laces,
Rich essences in China vases,
And rise on life's exalted scene
With all the splendour of a queen."

She spoke, and in a trice possess'd
The empire of the female breast:
And now the visionary maids
Disdain'd their shepherds and their shades;
In every dream with rapture saw
Three footmen and a gilt landau;
Assum'd a fine majestic air,
And learnt to ogle, swim, and stare.
No longer beam'd the modest eye,
No longer heav'd the melting sigh.
Neglected love, whose blunted dart
Scarce once a-year could wound a heart,
Hung up his quiver on a yew,
And, sighing, from the world withdrew.

However, as the wheel of life
Subsisted still in man and wife,

Th' aforesaid fiends, for reasons good,
Coupled the sexes as they could.
For instance—Women made for thrones
Were match'd with idiots, fots, and drones;
And wits were every day disgrac'd
By honeys without sense or taste;
Gay libertines of sixty-five,
With scarce a single limb alive,
Had young coquettes just in their teens,
As wanton as Circassia's queens;
And youths, whose years were scarce a score,
Were pair'd with nymphs of sixty-four.
Matters, in short, were so contriv'd,
The men were most divinely wiv'd;
The women too, to grace their houses,
Were blest with most accomplish'd spouses.

In two short months, perhaps in one,
Both sexes found themselves undone,
And came in crowds, with each an halter,
To hang poor Hymen on his altar.
The god, though arm'd but with his torch,
Intrepid met them in the porch;
And, while they hector, brawl, and bully,
Harangu'd them with the ease of Tully.

"Good folks!" says he, "it gives me pain
To hear you murmur and complain,
When every barber in the town
Knows that the fault is all your own.
Seduc'd by show, misled by wealth,
Regardless of your peace, and health,
Panting for feathers, whims, and fashions,
You left plain nature's genuine passions,
And gave up all your real joys,
As Indians sell their gold for toys.
You, madam! who was pleas'd to fix
Your wishes on a coach and six,
Obtain'd your end, and now you find
Your husband ought to ride behind:
You might have had, without offence,
A man of spirit, soul, and sense,
Wou'd you have stoop'd to take the air
In a plain chariot and a pair.
You too, my venerable sage!
Had you reflected on your age,
Wou'd scarce have took, to be undone,
A sprightly girl of twenty-one.
Your ladyship disdain'd to hear
Of any husband but a peer;
Was pleas'd your angel-form to barter
For a blue ribbon and a garter:
And now, magnificently great,
You feel the wretchedness of state;
Neglected, injur'd, spurn'd, and poor,
The victim of an opera whore
Your neighbour there, the wealthy cit,
Like you is miserably bit:
Too proud to drag the nuptial chain
With the grave nymphs of Foster lane,
He married, such his fatal aim was,
A lady Charlotte, from St. James's;
And now supports, by scores, and dozens,
His very honourable cousins,
And entertains, with wine and cards,
Half the gay colonels of the guards.
Away, ye triflers! bear, endure
Afflictions which ye cannot cure;

At least with decency conceal
The pangs your follies make you feel,
In hopes that some obliging fever
Will ease you of your dears for ever."

The crowd dismiss'd—the God began
To muse upon a better plan :
He saw that things grew worse and worse,
That marriage was become a curse ;
And therefore thought it just and wise was
To rectify this fatal bias,
And in a tasteless world excite
Due reverence for his holy rite.
Full of his scheme he went one day
To a lone cottage in a shaw,
Where dwelt a nymph of strong and shrewd sense,
Known by the name of Gammer Prudence,
Whom Hymen, with a bow and bus,
Address'd most eloquently thus :

" Goody ! I've order'd Love to go
This evening to the world below ;
He travels in a coach and sparrows,
With a new set of bows and arrows :
But yet the rogue's so much a child,
So very whimsical, and wild,
His head has such strange fancies in it,
I cannot trust him half a minute.
Were I to let the little wanton
Rove as he lists through every canton,
Without a check, without a rein,
The world would be undone again—
We soon shou'd see the lawns and groves
Quite fill'd with zephyrs, sighs, and doves,
With am'rous ditties, fairy dances,
Such as we read of in romances ;
Where princes haunt the lonely rocks,
And duchesses are feeding flocks.
Go then, my venerable dame !
And qualify his idle flame ;
Instruct those hearts his arrows hit,
To pause, and have a little wit :
Bid them reflect, amidst their heat,
'Tis necessary Love should eat ;
That in his most ecstatic billing
He possibly may want a shilling.
Persuade them, ere they first engage,
To study temper, rank, and age,
To march beneath my holy banners,
Congenial in their tastes and manners,
Completing just as Heaven design'd,
An union both of sex and mind."

He said—he press'd—the matron maid,
Benevolent of heart, obey'd ;
Forsook her solitary grove,
And, waiting in the train of Love,
Watch'd with the sober eye of truth
The workings of misguided youth :
And when the heart began to sigh,
To melt, to heave, to bleed, to die,
She whisper'd many a wise remark
With all the dignity of Clark—
She hop'd the ladies, in their choice,
Would listen to her awful voice :
She begg'd the men, while yet their lives
Were free from fevers, plagues, and wives,

VOL. X.

Ere yet the chariot was bespoke,
To pause before they took the yoke.—
In short, when Cupid's lucky darts
Had pierc'd a pair of kindred hearts,
And Goody Prudence lik'd the houses,
Estates, and minds, of both the spouses,
And found, exact to form and law,
The settlement without a flaw,
She frankly gave them leave to wed,
And sanctified the nuptial bed.

Th' event was such, the God became Successful in his trade, and fame ;
For both the parties, on their marriage,
Improv'd in temper, sense, and carriage ;
Fair friendship ray'd on either breast
The sunshine of content and rest.
Studious each other's will to please,
And blest'd with affluence and ease,
Without vexation, words or strife,
They calmly walk'd the road of life ;
And, happy in their fondest joys,
Left a fine group of girls and boys,
Reflecting, lively, cool, and sage,
To shine upon a future age.

THE VANITY OF HUMAN ENJOYMENTS:

AN ETHIC EPISTLE.

To the Right Honourable George Lyttelton, Esq. afterwards Lord Lyttelton, one of the Lords of his Majesty's Treasury, 1749.

I GRANT it, Lyttelton ! that ease, or joy,
Forms ev'ry wish that glows beneath the sky ;
That when, 'mid nature's elemental strife,
Th' Almighty spoke the Chaos into life,
He meant that man, of ev'ry good possessor,
Should, like his seraphs, live but to be blest.

Yet, spite of Heav'n, and Heav'n's supreme decree,

We fondly wander, truth ! from bliss, and thee ;
Tasteless of all that virtue gives to please,
For thought too active, and too mad for ease ;
Of feeling exquisite, alive all o'er,
With ev'ry passion wing'd at ev'ry pore ;
To each soft breeze, or vig'rous blast resign'd,
That sweeps the ocean of the human mind,
We slip our anchors, spread the impatient sail,
Ply all our oars, and drive before the gale.

Hence, as opinion wakes our hopes or fears,
As pride inspires, or as anger tears,
These on the wings of moonstruck madness fly
To catch the meteors of ambition's sky ;
Those, in pale wisdom's humbler garb array'd,
Court the soft genius of the myrtle shade ;
While others, as the plastic atoms pour
More brilliant visions on each killing hour,
From scepter'd life and all its pomps retire,
Or set, like Phaeton, the world on fire.

Oft the same man, in one revolving sun,
In all he aims at, all he longs to shun ;
Each gay delusion shares his breast by turns,
With av'rice chills him, or with grandeur burns :
To-day the gilded shrines of honour move,
To-morrow yields his ev'ry pulse to love ;

E c

Now mad for wisdom, now for wit and sport,
 This hour at Oxford, and the next at court :
 Then, all for purity, he bids adieu
 To each loose goddess of the midnight stew,
 Enraptur'd hangs o'er Sherlock's labour'd page,
 Drinks all his sense, and glows with all his rage,
 Till some enormous crimes, unknown before,
 From Rome imported, or the Caspian shore,
 Nurs'd by thy hand, great Heidegger ! attend,
 And sink him to a Mohock, or a fiend.
 In one short space thus wanton, sober, grave,
 A friend to virtue, yet to vice a slave,
 From wish to wish in life's mad vortex tost,
 For ever struggling, yet for ever lost,
 The fickle wand'rer lives in ev'ry scene,
 A Clark, a Chartres, or an Aretine,

There are, 'tis true, plebeian souls array'd
 In one thick crust of apathy and shade,
 Whose dull sensoriums feel not once an age
 A spirit brighten, or a passion rage.
 As the swift arrow skims the viewless wind,
 No path indented, and no mark behind,
 So these, without or infamy or praise,
 Tread the dull circle of a length of days,
 To some poor sepulchre in silence glide,
 And scarcely tell us that they liv'd or died.

Peace to all such—but he whose warm desires
 Or genius kindles, or ambition fires ;
 Who, like a comet, sweeps th' aerial void
 Of wit and fame, too fine to be enjoy'd ;
 For him the muse shall wake her ev'ry art,
 Exhibit truth, and open all the heart,
 Display th' unnumber'd ills that hourly wait
 The cells of wisdom, or the rooms of state :
 Then, as o'er life's unfolding scenes we fly,
 Bid all his wishes pant but for the sky.

Heroic glory in the martial scene,
 From Rome's first Cæsar to the great Eugene,
 Has long engross'd the poet's heav'n-born flame,
 And pour'd her triumphs through the trump of fame :

She mounts the neighing steed, th' imperial car,
 Grasps the pale spear, and rushes to the war ;
 Beneath her steps earth's trembling orb recedes,
 A Poitiers thunders, and a Cressy bleeds :
 The battle raves—around her sabre flow
 Terrific pleasures, and a pomp of woe ;
 Poms ever lost in peace, and but ador'd
 When half a nation smokes upon her sword.

Fly then, ye Genii ! from the tumult fly,
 To all that opens in a rural sky :
 There, as the vale, the grove, the zephyrs pour
 Each purer rapture on the guiltless hour,
 From ev'ry shrub content's soft foliage glean,
 And rise the Platons of the vernal scene.

And is it so ? Does science then possess
 Alone the godlike privilege to bless ?
 Will fame her wreaths to moral wisdom yield,
 And give the pen to blaze above the shield ?
 Say, does fair bliss delight in Maudlin's grove,
 In Stanhope's villa, or in Young's alcove ?
 Deigns she on Secker's modest page to shine ?
 Or beams the goddess, Lyttelton ! on thine ?

Ask at yon tomb, where Cudworth's mighty
 name
 Weeps o'er the ruins of his wit and fame ;

Cudworth, whose spirit flew, with sails unfurl'd,
 Through each vast empire of th' ideal world,
 Pierc'd through the mystic shades o'er nature thrown,

And made the soul's immensity his own.
 Yet though his system wit and science fir'd,
 Though Wilmot trembled, and though Hobbes
 expir'd,

Mistaken zeal, mad bigotry conspire,
 All Turner's dullness, and all Oxford's fire,
 All envy's poisons, all a nation's rage,
 And all hell's imps to blast th' unfinish'd page.

Much-injur'd shade, to truth, to virtue dear,
 Be calm, ye witlings ! and, ye zealots ! hear :
 And, while this bright intelligence pervades
 Th' ideal world, and rises o'er the shades,
 His mines of wisdom, if you can explore,
 Then shut the volume, and be vain no more.

Genius, and Taste, alas ! too often prove
 The worst of mischiefs to the wretch they love ;
 Born but to vex, to torture, to destroy,
 Too wild for use, too exquisite for joy ;
 By some mysterious curse ordain'd to know
 Each wit a rival, and each fool a foe.

For 'tis a crime too great to be forgiv'n,
 A giant sin that bars the gate of heav'n,
 If these meridian suns but dare to shine
 In the same orb with Cibber's muse and mine.

Yet, spite of envy, science might be great,
 Could science but allow her sons to eat :
 Could he, whose name along the stream of time
 Expanded flies, and lives in ev'ry clime,
 Exalt his spirits with some nobler fare
 Than the thin breezes of St. James's air.

Immortal Halley ! thy unwearied soul
 On wisdom's pinion flew from pole to pole,
 Th' uncertain compass to its task restor'd,
 Each ocean fathom'd, and each wind explor'd,
 Commanded trade with ev'ry breeze to fly,
 And gave to Britain half the Zemblan sky.

And see, he comes, distinguish'd, lov'd, carest,
 Mark'd by each eye, and hugg'd to ev'ry breast ;
 His godlike labours wit and science fire,
 All factions court him, and all sects admire :
 While Britain, with a gratitude unknown
 To ev'ry age but Nero's and our own,
 A gratitude that will for ever shame
 The Spartan glory, and th' Athenian name—
 Tell it, ye winds ! that all the world may hear—
 Blest his old age with—ninety pounds a year.

Are these our triumphs ? these the sums we give

To ripen genius, and to bid it live ?
 Can Britain in her fits of madness pour
 One half her Indies on a Roman whore,
 And still permit the weeping muse to tell
 How poor neglected Desaguliers fell ?
 How he, who taught two gracious kings to view

All Boyle ennobled, and all Bacon knew,
 Died in a cell, without a friend to save,
 Without a guinea, and without a grave ?

Posterity, perhaps, may pay the debt
 That senates cancel, and that courts forget :
 Yet, ah ! what boots it when our bards expire
 That earth's last ages hang upon the lyre ?

Can Middleton the dust of Tully raise?
Does Pompey listen in his urn to praise?
Tell me if Philip's son enjoy to-day
Th' applauding pæan, or the loud huzza,
That shook pale Asia through her ev'ry shore
When Porus fell, and freedom was no more?
Yet though content's fantastic image flies
From the bright mirrors of the learn'd and wise,
Perhaps the fair, too partial to the great,
Lives but amidst the luxuries of state:
Fond to instruct ambition how to please,
She joins the pomps of majesty with ease,
Forfeakes the cottage to adorn the court,
Alike at Rome, Vienna, or the Porte.

Tell me, O Visier! if th' imperial robe
That gives a slave to nod o'er half the globe,
Say, if yon crescent, by each Turk ador'd,
The plume's proud fables, and the hallow'd sword,
Expand the heart, the gleams of bliss refine,
And make the virtues of the bosom thine?

Ill-fated wretch! to ev'ry storm a slave
That caprice wings, or madness bids to rave;
For ever jealous of a woman's pow'r,
For ever trembling at the midnight hour,
Through life's wild eddies toss'd by hope and fear,
Rais'd by a smile, and murder'd by a tear!
At length, each wish destroy'd, each vision fled,
The black seraglio steals upon his bed:
And he, whose glories mingled with the skies,
Adores the bowstring, licks the dust, and dies.

O! could a king in heav'n's bright pomps appear,
And make an angel as he makes a peer;
Could he command the heart to beam as far
As the soft radiance of the ducal star;
Forbid one sad anxiety to glow,
One pang to torture, and one tear to flow:
Fly then on all the whirlwind's rapid wing,
To steal a title, or to bribe a string;
In the full blaze of glory be display'd,
And leave affliction to the vale and shade.
Yet, ere you go, ere proud ambition call
Each yielding wish to Marli, or Whitehall,
O pause—lest virtue ev'ry guard resign,
And the sad fate of Ripperda be thine.

This glorious wretch, indulg'd at once to move
A nation's wonder, and a monarch's love,
Blest with each charm politer courts admire,
The grace to soften, and the soul to fire,
Forsook his native bogs with proud disdain,
And, though a Dutchman, rose the pride of Spain.
This hour the pageant waves th' imperial rod,
All Philip's empire trembling at his nod;
The next disgrac'd he flies to Britain's isle,
And courts the sunshine of a Walpole's smile:
Unheard, despis'd, to southern climes he steers,
And shines again at Salle, and Algiers,
Bids pale Morocco all his schemes adore,
And pours her thunder on th' Hesperian shore:
All nature's ties, all virtue's creeds belied,
Each church abandon'd, and each God denied,
Without a friend, a sepulchre to shield
His carcase from the vultures of the field,
He dies, of all ambition's sons the worst,
By Afric hated, and by Europe curst.

"He earns his fate who will for phantoms toil," Exclaims the goddess of the mirthful smile.
"From wild ambition, with her every care,
The scenes of grandeur, and the pomps of war,
From all a court's proud pageantry admires,
All science wishes, and all glory fires,
Fly to my arms, from fame, from anguish free,
And taste a luxury of bliss with me.

For me the genial spring, the vernal show'r,
Wake the bright verdure, and th' unfolding
flow'r;

Arabia's sweets in all my moments fly,
The zephyr's plumage, and the wing of joy,
Each richer viand that the air provides,
That earth unbestows, or that ocean hides,
All that can nature's finer organs move,
The pow'rs of music, and the folds of love,
To my keen senses are indulgent giv'n,
In one wild ecstasy of life and heav'n. [shun,

"Yet, yet, dear youth! the fair enchantress
To yield a moment is to be undone.
All Ætna's poisons mingle with her breath,
The seeds of sickness, and the gales of death,
She aims to ruin, lives but to beguile,
And all hell's horrors brood beneath her smile."

'Tis thus, my Lyttleton! that men pursue
Each varied mode of pleasure but the true;
To ev'ry vice, each luxury a prey,
That murders bliss, and hurries life away,
Their headstrong passions after phantoms run,
And still mistake a meteor for a sun.

Yet hear, ye wand'ers! hear, while we impart
A light that sheds fair peace on ev'ry heart;
Which, Aristides! beam'd on thy exile,
And made a Regulus 'mid tortures smile.

Virtue, immortal virtue! born to please,
The child of heaven, and the source of ease,
Bids ev'ry bliss on human life attend,
To ev'ry rank a kind, a faithful friend;
Inspires nature, 'midst the scenes of toil, [coil;
Smooths languor's cheek, and bids fell want re-
Shines from the mitre with un sullied rays,
Glazes on the crest, and gives the star to blaze;
Supports distinction, spreads ambition's wings,
Forms saints of queens, and demigods of kings;
O'er grief, oppression, envy, scorn prevails,
And makes a cottage greater than Versailles.

WIT AND LEARNING.

AN ALLEGORY.

WHOEVER looks on life will see
How strangely mortals disagree:
This reprobates what that approves,
And Tom dislikes what Harry loves;
The soldier's witty on the sailor,
The barber drolls upon the tailor;
And he who makes the nation's wills,
Laughs at the doctor and his pills.

Yet this antipathy we find
Not to the sons of earth confin'd;
Each school-boy sees, with half an eye,
The quarrels of the Pagan sky:
For all the poets fairly tell us,
That gods themselves are proud and jealous;

E e ij

And will, like mortals, swear, and hector,
When mellow'd with a cup of nectar.

But waving these, and such like fancies,
We meet with in the Greek romances,
Say, shall th' historic muse retail
A little allegoric tale?
Nor stole from Plato's mystic tome, nor
Translated from the verse of Homer,
But copied, in a modern age,
From nature, and her fairest page.

Olympian Jove, whose idle trade is Employ'd too much among the ladies,
Though not of manners mighty chaste,
Was certainly a god of taste;
Would often to his feasts admit
A deity, whose name was Wit;
And, to amuse the more discerning,
Would ask the company of Learning.

Learning was born, as all agree,
Of Truth's half-sister, Memory;
A nymph who rounded in her shape was,
By that great artist Esculapius.

Euphrosine, the younger Grace,
Matchless in feature, mien, and face,
Who, like the beauties of these late days,
Was fond of operas and cantatas,
Would often to a grot retire,
To listen to Apollo's lyre;
And thence became, so Ovid writ,
A mother to the god of wit.

Wit was a strange unlucky child,
Exceeding fly, and very wild;
Too volatile for truth or law,
He minded but his top, or yaw;
And, ere he reach'd the age of six,
Had play'd a thousand waggish tricks.—
He drill'd a hole in Vulcan's kettles,
He strew'd Minerva's bed with nettles,
Climb'd up the solar car to ride in't,
Broke off a prong from Neptune's trident,
Stole Amphitrite's fav'rite sea-knot,
And urin'd in Astrea's teapot.

Learning, a lad of sober mien,
And half a pedant at fifteen,
Had early thrown away his corals,
To study nature, and her morals;
Was always, let who would oppose it,
Fast by Minerva in her closet;
And while gay Wit, as black as foot all,
Was kicking up and down a foot-ball,
Learning, with philosophic eye,
Rang'd ev'ry corner of the sky;
Spent many a play-day to unriddle
The music of Apollo's fiddle;
And, if he ever chanc'd to meet
His uncle Mercury in the street,
Or on his flight the audacious brat
Stopp'd him to ask of this or that:
As how the moon was evanescent,
Was now an orb, and now a crescent?
Why of the Graces each undrest was?
Why Pallas never wore a cestus?
Why Ceres reign'd o'er corn and fallads?
And why the Muses dealt in ballads?

With these discordant tastes and manners,
And lifted under diff'rent banners,

Learning and Wit, as says the fable,
Appear'd at Jove's imperial table,
And threw out all their force and fire,
Obedient to th' ethereal fire.

Wit, with his fly satiric vein,
Was always sure to entertain:
He rallied with a tongue as keen
As Rab'lais, or the Irish Dean;
And told his tale with such a grace,
With such an eye, and such a face,
As made the nectar flow each cup o'er,
And set the synod in an uproar.

Learning had not the skill to hit
The comic cast, and life of Wit:
With look morose, and awkward air,
He sat ungraceful in his chair;
With diffidence and blushes spoke,
And had no relish for a joke;
So that the little urchin Cupid
Thought him insensible, and stupid;
And Hebe, though a well bred lass,
Would scarcely offer him his glass.

However, when the sprightly bowl
Had thaw'd the ice about his soul,
He then, with majesty, began
To talk of letters, and of man;
Correct, sententious, cool, severe,
He gain'd upon the attentive ear,
Charm'd all the gods, but Wit, and Comus
And that abusive cynic, Momus.

In length of time, as oft the case is
In many sublunary places,
These demigods with jealous eye
Began to look a little shy;
And oft, to wound each other's breast,
Let off a keen sarcastic jest.
Learning, with many a stroke, would hit
The pert vivacity of Wit;
And Wit threw all his keenest satire
On Learning's slow, pedantic nature.

It happen'd once when Jove had made
A feast in Ida's holy shade,
And all the gods, whose heads could bear it,
Had emptied each a flask of claret;
Wit, who from his celestial liquor
Wagg'd his free tongue a little quicker,
Begar, with many a bitter scoff,
To play his brother Learning off;
Ask'd him if yet his pains and care
Had learnt to make the circle square?
If all his visionary ravings
Cou'd weave brocade from walnut shavings?
If his mechanic skill cou'd catch
Perpetual motion in a watch?
Or forge a pendulum endued
With power to tell the longitude?

Learning had much ado to sit,
And hear the petulance of Wit:
A ghastly paleness spread his look,
His nerves with quick convulsions shook:
At length, in accents loud and high,
Vesuvius flaming in his eye,
He burst—"And dar'st thou, wayward chit!
Thou idiot god of idiot wit!
Untaught as yet to know thy letters,
Affront, thou insolent! thy betters?"

Here, puppy! with this penny get
A horn-book, or an alphabet;
And see if that licentious eye
Can tell a great A from an I?
Throw but another jest on me,
I'll lay thee, miscreant! on my knee,
And print such welks thy naked seat on,
As never truant felt at Eton.

Wit, with resentment raving wild,
Thus call'd an idiot and a child,
Without preambles, or excuses,
Seiz'd upon Mercury's caduceus,
And with such force the weapon throws,
It flatted half his rival's nose:
While he, Minerva's boast and care,
Pluck'd a large bodkin from her hair,
And aim'd the steely pointed dart
With such dexterity of art,
That, had not beauty's lovely queen,
Fair Venus, spread her fan between,
And taught the flying death to fix
Guiltless among the iv'ry sticks,
Wit's future triumphs had been o'er,
And Europe heard his name no more.

Jove, who had no supreme delight in Domestic brawls, or civil fighting,
Since first he heard the nuptial tune flow
So sweetly from the tongue of Juno,
Vex'd that these two illiberal guests
Should dare to violate his feasts,
In a tremendous fit of choler,
Seiz'd both their worships by the collar,
And, minding not their meek submitting,
Kick'd them from Ida down to Britain.

Poor Learning had the luck to fall
Plump in the area of Clare-hall,
Just as old Wilcox, from a slope,
Was gazing through his telescope,
To find a comet, whose bright tail is
Eccentric from the time of Thales.
Pleas'd with this scientific look,
He sent him first to Sam the cook;
And having fill'd his empty belly
With mutton-broth and meagre jelly,
Gave him a robe of sleek prunella,
And very wisely made him fellow.

Wit, as his destiny decrees,
Dropp'd in the Court of Common-Pleas,
Upon a truss of briefs and bills,
And took the shape of Justice Willes:
But soon observing round the columns
Reports in half a thousand volumes;
And, finding all those earth-worm souls
Who hold th' Exchequer, or the rolls,
He left the law, and all its drudges,
With curses, to my lords the judges,
Call'd for a coach, and went to dwell
At Robin Doddsley's in Pall-Mall.

'Twas right—for now where'er he came
He busied all the tongues of fame;
Was welcome to the festal board,
And had his footman, and his lord;
Would often visit in a chair
The noble Stanhope in May-fair;
Or dine, when business would permit,
With that great statesman William Pitt,

'Tis said too he was sometimes seen
On Garrick's visionary scene:
But Garrick, who prefers a guinea
To all the eloquence of Pliny,
Observing this unlucky railer
Was neither mechanist nor tailor;
That half the audience of the day
Came not to hear, but see a play;
That many a squire, and many a cit,
Were pleas'd with any thing but wit;
Shut out, with much indecent rage,
The genius of the comic stage,
And open'd his theatric inn
To Scaramouch, and Harlequin.

Learning would sometimes drop his gown
And take a winter jaunt to town;
Often call'd in at Hitch's shop,
And din'd at Dolly's on a chop;
On Thursday met the grave resort
Of spider merchants in Crane-court,
To rack a cockle, or to see
The nice dissection of a flea:
But having never chanc'd to wear
A bag-wig or a solitaire,
And dressing in a kersey, thicker
Than that which clothes a Cornish vicar,
He seldom had the luck to eat
In Berkley-square, or Grosvenor-street.

'Twas written in the book of fate,
These rivals should each other hate;
No wonder then that each proud imp was
As wayward here as on Olympus.
Wit look'd on Learning, as he grew great,
Just as a felon looks on Newgate:
While Learning, who could never hide
His haughty academic pride,
Had such a keen contempt for Wit,
He call'd him nothing, but the chit;
And, if he met him at noon-day,
Would turn his face another way.

However, on some festal nights
By chance they both dropp'd in at White's,
With learned lords, and noble bards,
Who had no appetite for cards,
And could decide where'er they met
Momentous truths without a bet.
Wit with vivacity of tongue
First led th' admiring ear along;
His fancy active, wild, and free as Conception when she breeds ideas,
Flew o'er each undiscover'd part
Of nature, and the worlds of art,
And brought with such a nice decorum
A group of images before him,
So genuine, yet so uncommon,
With such a glow of tints upon 'em,
That all was spirit, force, and sense,
Loose as the zone of negligence,
Simple as truth's fair handmaid nature,
And deadly as the sting of satire.
Dejected Learning sat oppress'd
Around him flew the taunt and jest:
Whatever just remarks he made,
Or to demonstrate, or persuade,
Wit, by some fly malicious comment,
Took off, or routed in a moment.

E c iiij

However, when a pause appear'd,
And sober reason could be heard,
He then in all his thunder rises,
Strips off his rival's thin disguises;
Shows where his misconceiving sense
Led to a groundless consequence,
Mistook an error for a wonder,
A demonstration for a blunder,
Or, having a delusive scent got,
Affirm'd the very thing he meant not.

Yet, after all, since mirth and drinking
Are priz'd above sedate thinking,
Though Learning got a world of praise,
And added splendour to his bays,
Their lordships, frighten'd at th' expence
Of list'ning to exalted sense,
And deeming that the taint of knowledge
Would make the coffee-house a college,
Determin'd in a full committee,
That man's great end was to be witty:
And therefore order'd, every soul,
Wit should be enter'd on the roll,
And be allow'd, to raise his vein,
A weekly present of champagne;
That if proud Learning should presume
To set his foot within the room,
Arthur should show him to the door,
And bid the pedant come no more.

Learning thus kick'd from ev'ry palace,
And left a victim to the gallows,
Began to see that skill in letters
Would ne'er advance him with his betters;
That though he led them through the dark
With all the lights of Locke and Clarke,
And made his heart, and head, and eyes ache
With reading nature, and Sir Isaac,
Yet all that wisdom could not be
Priz'd like a lively rapartee:
He, therefore, in a gloomy fit,
Resolv'd to set up for a wit;
But found, alas! howe'er he dress'd her,
That science was a wretched jester;
That though he jok'd from moon to moon,
He made a very dull buffoon;
For all his jocular narrations
Smelt of his algebra equations,
And came upon the tortur'd ear
Stiff as the periods of Dacier.
Wit, too, whose excellence and merit
Was mere vivacity of spirit,
Observing that your graver folk
Had little value for a joke,
Would needs, in nature's bold defiance,
Mount the tremendous chair of science;
And dar'd to argue pro and con
As gravely as the grave Sorbonne:
But wanting all that fine discerning
Which marks the character of Learning,
And all the elemental rules
Of erudition, and the schools,
The gay professor oft mistook
Alike his question and his book;
Dropp'd a conundrum out of season,
And jested when he ought to reason.

Thus on the world's wild billows tost,
And half their moments idly lost,

Tir'd of applause, and sick of strife,
They each resolv'd to take a wife.
Learning, who often went to see
Lady Anne Bentinck at her tea,
Met there a maid as fair as chaste,
In life's fool bloom, whose name was Taste.
'Twas then his heart began to move
With the first tender throb of love,
And often heav'd, it knew not why,
With something softer than a sigh.
He gaz'd, he blush'd, he courted, prest,
And was at length completely blest:
For she, who had not learnt to doat
On folly in a scarlet coat,
To Learning's blissful arms resign'd
Her graceful form, and lovely mind.
Wit too, when past the fire of youth,
Was married to the vestal, Truth;
A nymph whose awful air and mien
Display'd the beauty, and the queen.

Tradition tells us, Hymen swore
That, till this bright auspicious hour,
There never in his holy house was
So fine a group of noble spouses;
For both the bridegrooms, on their marriage,
Improv'd in temper, sense, and carriage.
Learning, his charming wife to please,
Assum'd her elegance and ease;
And Wit, to humour Truth, agreed
To pause, to doubt, reflect, and read.
In short, they led delicious lives,
Belov'd, and honour'd by their wives;
And, happy in their nuptial duties,
Each had a progeny of beauties,
Matchless in feature, form, and parts,
Distinguish'd by the name of Arts.

A FATHER'S EXTEMPORE CONSOLA- TION,

ON THE DEATH OF TWO DAUGHTERS,

Who lived only Two Days.

LET vulgar souls endure the body's chain,
Till life's dull current ebbs in ev'ry vein,
Dream out a tedious age, ere wide display'd,
Death's blackest pinion wraps them in the shade.

These happy infants, early taught to shun
All that the world admires beneath the sun,
Scorn'd the weak bands mortality could tie,
And fled impatient to their native sky.

Dear precious babes! — Alas! when, fondly wild,

A mother's heart hung melting o'er her child,
When my charm'd eye a flood of joy express'd,
And all the father kindled in my breast,
A sudden paleness seiz'd each guiltless face,
And death, though smiling, crept o'er ev'ry grace.

Nature! be calm — heave not th' impassion'd sigh,

Nor teach one tear to tremble in my eye.
A few unspotted moments pass'd between
Their dawn of being, and their closing scene:
And sure no nobler blessing can be giv'n,
When one short anguish is the price of heav'n

THE ANTIQUARIANS.

A TALE.

SOME Antiquarians, grave and loyal,
Incorporate by charter royal,
Last winter, on a Thursday night, were Met in full senate at the Mitre.
The president, like Mr. Mayor,
Majestic took the elbow chair,
And gravely sat in due decorum
With a fine gilded mace before him.
Upon the table were display'd
A British knife without a blade,
A comb of Anglo-Saxon steel,
A patent with king Alfred's seal,
Two rusted mutilated prongs,
Suppos'd to be St. Dunstan's tongs,
With which he, as the story goes,
Once took the devil by the nose.

Awhile they talk'd of ancient modes,
Of manuscripts, and Gothic codes,
Of Roman altars, camps, and urns,
Of Caledonian shields, and churns:
Whether the druid flipt or broke
The mistletoe upon the oak?
If Hector's spear was made of ash?
Or Agamemnon wore a fash?
If Cleopatra dress'd in blue,
And wore her tresses in a queue?

At length a Dean who understood
All that had pass'd before the flood,
And could in half a minute show ye
A pedigree as high as Noah,
Got up, and with a solemn air
(First humbly bowing to the chair)
"If aught," says he, "deserves a name
Immortal as the roll of fame,
This venerable group of sages
Shall flourish in the latest ages,
And wear an amaranthine crown
When kings and empires are unknown.
Perhaps e'en I, whose humbler knowledge
Ranks me the lowest of your college,
May catch from your meridian day
At least a transitory ray:
For I, like you, through ev'ry clime,
Have trac'd the step of hoary Time,
And gather'd up his sacred spoils
With more than half a cent'ry's toils.
Whatever virtue, deed, or name,
Antiquity has left to fame,
In every age, and every zone,
In copper, marble, wood, or stone,
In vases, flow'r-pots, lamps, and sconces,
Intaglios, cameos, gems, and bronzes,
These eyes have read through many a crust
Of lacker, varnish, grease and dust;
And now, as glory fondly draws
My soul to win your just applause,
I here exhibit to your view
A medal fairly worth Peru,
Found, as tradition says, at Rome,
Near the Quirinal catacomb."

He said, and from a purse of satin,
Wrapp'd in a leaf of monkish Latin,

And taught by many a clasp to join,
Drew out a dirty copper coin.
Still as pale midnight when she throws
On heav'n and earth a deep repose,
Lost in a trance too big to speak,
The synod ey'd the fine antique;
Examin'd ev'ry point, and part,
With all the critic skill of art;
Rung it alternate on the ground
In hopes to know it by the sound;
Applied the tongue's acuter sense
To taste its genuine excellence,
And with an animated gust
Lik'd up the consecrated rust:
Nor yet content with what the eye
By its own sunbeams could descry,
To ev'ry corner of the brass
They clapp'd a microscopic glass;
And view'd in raptures o'er and o'er
The ruins of the learned ore.

Pythagoras, the learned sage,
As you may read in Pliny's page,
With much of thought, and pains, and care,
Found the proportions of a square,
Which threw him in such frantic fits
As almost robb'd him of his wits,
And made him, awful as his name was,
Run naked through the streets of Samos.
With the same spirits doctor Romans,
A keen civilian of the Commons,
Fond as Pythagoras to claim
The wreath of literary fame,
Sprung in a phrenzy from his place
Across the table and the mace,
And swore by Varro's shade that he Conceiv'd the medal to a T.
"It rings," says he, "so pure, and chaste,
And has so classical a taste,
That we may fix its native home
Securely in imperial Rome.
That rascal, Time, whose hand purloins
From science half her kings and coins,
Has eat, you see, one half the tale,
And hid the other in a veil:
But if, through cankers, rust, and fetters,
Mishapen forms, and broken letters,
The critic's eye may dare to trace
An evanescent name, and face,
This injur'd medal will appear,
As mid-day sunshine, bright and clear,
The female figure on a throne
Of rustic work in Tibur' stone,
Without a sandal, zone, or boddice,
Is Liberty's immortal goddess;
Whose sacred fingers seem to hold
A taper wand, perhaps of gold:
Which has, if I mistake not, on it
The Pileus, or Roman bonnet:
By this the medallist would mean
To paint that fine domestic scene,
When the first Brutus nobly gave
His freedom to the worthy slave."

When a spectator 'as got the jaundice,
Each object, or by sea, or land, is Discolour'd by a yellow hue,
Though naturally red, or blue.

This was the case with 'squire Thynne,
A barrister of Lincoln's Inn,
Who never lov'd to think or speak
Of any thing but ancient Greek.
In all disputes his sacred guide was
The very venerable Suidas;
And though he never deign'd to look
In Salkel'd, Littleton, or Coke,
And liv'd a stranger to the fees
And practice of the Common-pleas;
He studied with such warmth, and awe,
The volumes of Athenian law,
That Solon's self not better knew
The legislative plan he drew;
Nor cou'd Demosthenes withstand
The rhet'ric of his wig, and band;
When, full of zeal, and Aristotle,
And fluster'd by a second bottle,
He taught the orator to speak
His periods in correcter Greek.

"Methinks," quoth he, "this little piece
Is certainly a child of Greece:
Th' Ærugo has a tinge of blue
Exactly of the Attic hue;
And, if the taste's acuter feel
May judge of medals as of veal,
I'll take my oath the mould and rust
Are made of Attic dew and dust.
Critics may talk, and rave, and foam,
Of Brutus, and imperial Rome;
But Rome, in all her pomp and blifs,
Ne'er struck so fine a coin as this.
Besides, though Time, as is his way,
Has eat th' inscription quite away,
My eye can trace, divinely true,
In this dark curve a little Mu:
And here, you see, there seems to lie
The ruins of a Doric Xi.

Perhaps, as Athens thought, and writ
With all the pow'rs of style, and wit,
The nymph upon a couch of mallows
Was meant to represent a Pallas;
And the baton upon the ore
Is but the olive-branch she bore."

He said—but Swinton, full of fire,
Asserted that it came from Tyre:
A most divine antique he thought it,
And with an empire wou'd have bought it.
He swore the head in full profile was Undoubtedly the head of Belus;
And the reverse, though hid in shade,
Appear'd a young Sidonian maid,
Whose tresses, buskins, shape, and mien,
Mark'd her for Dido at sixteen;
Perhaps the very year when she was
First married to the rich Sichæus.
The rod, as he cou'd make it clear,
Was nothing but a hunting-spear,
Which all the Tyrian ladies bore,
To guard them when they chas'd the boar.
A learned friend, he cou'd confide on,
Who liv'd full thirty years at Sidon,
Once show'd him, 'midst the seals and rings
Of more than thirty Syrian kings,
A copper piece, in shape, and size,
Exactly that before their eyes,

On which, in high relief, was seen
The image of a Tyrian queen;
Which made him think this other dame
A true Phœnician, and the same.

The next, a critic, grave, and big,
Hid in a most enormous wig,
Who in his manner, mien, and shape was
A genuine son of Esculapius,
Wonder'd that men of such discerning
In all th' abstruser parts of learning,
Cou'd err, through want of wit, or grace,
So strangely in so plain a case.

"It came," says he, "or I will be whipt,
From Memphis in the Lower Egypt.
Soon as the Nile's prolific flood
Has fill'd the plains with slime and mud,
All Egypt in a moment swarms
With myriads of abortive worms,
Whose appetites wou'd soon devour
Each cabbage, artichoke, and flow'r,
Did not some birds, with active zeal,
Eat up whole millions at a meal,
And check the pest while yet the year
Is ripening into stalk, and ear.
This blessing, visibly divine,
Is finely pourtray'd on the coin;
For here this line, so faint and weak,
Is certainly a bill, or beak;
Which bill, or beak, upon my word,
In hieroglyphics means a bird,
The very bird whose numerous tribe is Distinguish'd by the name of Ibis.
Besides, the figure with the wand,
Mark'd by a cistrum in her hand,
Appears, the moment she is seen,
An Isis, Egypt's boasted queen.
Sir, I'm as sure, as if my eye
Had seen the artist cut the die,
That these two curves, which wave, and float thus,
Are but the tendrils of the lotus,
Which, as Herodotus has said,
Th' Egyptians always eat for bread."

He spoke, and heard, without a pause,
The rising murmur of applause;
The voice of admiration rung
On ev'ry ear from ev'ry tongue:
Astonish'd at the lucky hit,
They star'd, they deify'd his wit.

But ah! what arts by fate are tried
To vex, and humble human pride!
To pull down poets from Parnassus,
And turn grave doctors into asses!
For whilst the band their voices raise
To celebrate the sage's praise,
And echo through the house convey'd
Their pæans loud to man and maid;
Tom, a pert waiter, smart, and clever,
A droit pretence who wanted never,
Curious to see what caus'd this rout,
And what the doctors were about,
Slily stepp'd in to snuff the candles,
And ask whate'er they pleas'd to want else.
Soon as the synod he came near,
Loud dissonance assail'd his ear;
Strange mingled sounds, in pompous style,
Of Isis, Ibis, Lotus, Nile:

And soon in Romans' hand he spies
The coin, the cause of all their noise.
Quick to his side he flies amain,
And peeps, and snuffs, and peeps again.
And though antiques he had no skill in,
He knew a sixpence from a shilling;
And, spite of rust, or rub, cou'd trace
On humble brass Britannia's face.
Soon her fair image he descries,
And, big with laughter, and surprise,
He burst—"And is this group of learning
So short of sense, and plain discerning,
That a mere halfpenny can be
To them a curiosity?"

If this is your best proof of science,
With wisdom Tom claims no alliance;
Content with nature's artless knowledge,
He scorns alike both school and college."
More had he said—but, lo! around
A storm in every face he found:
On Roman's brow black thunders hung,
And whirlwinds rush'd from Swinton's tongue;
Thynne lightning flash'd from ev'ry pore,
And reason's voice was heard no more.
The tempest ey'd, Tom speeds his flight,
And, sneering, bids 'em all good night;
Convinc'd that pedantry's allies
May be too learned to be wise.

LLOYD'S DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE AUTHOR AND HIS FRIEND.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE,

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF CHURCHILL.

CHARLES CHURCHILL, "the British Juvenal," was born in the parish of St. John's, Westminster, in 1731. His father was Curate and Lecturer of the parish, and had also a living in the country.

He received his education at Westminster School, where stories are yet told of his early proficiency in his studies, of his negligence, and the eccentricity of his conduct.

One day having got an exercise to make, he failed in bringing it at the time appointed; for which his master not only chastised him with some severity, but even charged him with stupidity. The last reproach made a strong impression on his mind, and the fear of shame wrought an effect which the fear of stripes could not produce. On the next day he brought his exercise finished in such a manner that he received the public thanks of the masters of the school.

This instance of his sensibility, and of the applause that resulted from it, was not followed by a complete reformation of his conduct. His application by no means kept pace with his natural talents. The vivacity of his imagination still prevented his walking regularly forward in the trammels of a scholastic education.

It is to be supposed, therefore, that his progress in classical learning was but slow; and it has been said that when he was sent to the university of Oxford, he was refused an admittance for want of a proper skill in the learned languages.

He often mentioned his repulse at Oxford, in the subsequent parts of his life, and asserted that he could have answered the college examination had he thought proper; but that he so much despised the trifling questions which were proposed to him, that instead of returning suitable replies, he only launched out into satirical reflections on the abilities of the gentleman whose office it was to judge of his.

It is also believed that he was a short time at Cambridge, under Dr. Rutherford of St. John's College. Neither of the universities can claim the honour of his education, which it is certain was begun and finished at Westminster.

When he was little more than seventeen years old, he contracted an intimacy with a young lady in the neighbourhood, which ended in a marriage. This union, which had its origin in passion, terminated in disgust. Their regard, however, for each other, which was mutual and sincere, was preserved in its purity and ardour for a number of years.

But during the time the attachment lasted, he made such a progress in literature, and sustained so good a character, that, notwithstanding the want of an university education, he was admitted into orders, and ordained by Dr. Sherlock, bishop of London.

His first provision in the church was a Curacy of thirty pounds a-year in Wales, to which remote part of the kingdom he retired, with his wife, and applied himself to the duties of his station with assiduity and cheerfulness. His behaviour gained him the love and esteem of his parishioners, and his sermons, though somewhat raised above the level of his audience, were commended and followed. But being prompted to engage in trade, to add to his income, he kept a cyder warehouse, with a view of vending that commodity in the neighbouring country. In a short time he experienced the folly of his deviation from his clerical profession, and a kind of rural bankruptcy soon followed.

His ill success brought him back to London; and his father dying soon after, he succeeded him as Curate and Lecturer of St. John's; but his income, which did not amount to a full hundred pounds a-year, being insufficient for the maintenance of his family, he employed himself in teaching young ladies to read and write English with propriety and correctness, and for some time attended Mrs. Dennis's boarding school, where he conducted himself with all the decorum becoming his clerical profession.

Still, however, his expences bore but a small proportion to his income. He became embarrassed with debts and involved in difficulties, from which he was extricated by the assistance of Dr. Lloyd, the second master of Westminster School, and father of his friend Lloyd, who prevailed on his creditors to give him a release, on receiving a fourth part of their respective debts.

It is to the honour of Churchill to record, that when his circumstances grew better, he voluntarily discharged the whole of the demands on him.

Though known to his intimate friends, Colman, Lloyd, and Thornton, to be possessed of abilities calculated to entertain and instruct the public, he was by no means forward to exhibit himself in that character.

He was little, if any thing, less than thirty years of age before he published any work with his name. If he produced any performance earlier, it was anonymous, and is now forgotten.

In 1760, his friend Lloyd published "The Actor," addressed to Thornton, which was received with great applause. The success of this performance probably induced Churchill to try his powers on a similar subject, though more appropriated and personal. Having been always fond of dramatic entertainments, he had been a constant attendant on the theatre, and an accurate observer of the beauties or defects of the several performers. These he made the subject of a poem which he called The Rosciad, first published anonymously in March 1761; but, on being invidiously ascribed to Lloyd, and to the triumvirate of wits, Thornton, Colman, and Lloyd, he immediately reprinted it with his name, and claimed the honours of a satirical poet. Few poems have been so generally received, and, perhaps, fewer so generally admired. The actors, in different ways expressed their resentment, and the public enjoyed their distress.

The Rosciad was regarded in general as a pleasant and reasonable retaliation for the mirth which the stage had continually excited, by the representation of the follies and frailties of mankind. Humanity, however, would wish that no set of men should be made ridiculous and contemptible by a profession from which they must draw their subsistence. It was not wholly satirical. Garrick was commended in the highest terms of applause; and the various and peculiar excellencies of Mrs. Pritchard, Mrs. Cibber, and Mrs. Clive, were celebrated with equal warmth and justice. Some of the players took no notice of the poem, and others wisely endeavoured to profit by the strictures bestowed on their faults. Foote was outrageously offended. He wrote a prose dialogue, in which he lampooned Churchill, and Lloyd, but did not print it. Making use of an alliteration, which he was very fond of doing, he called Churchill the Clumsy Curate of Clapham. The players who were the most eager in expressing their anger, had only the misfortune of being treated with greater severity in subsequent editions. In this respect he has been blamed; and it has been said that the poem was not always benefited by subsequent editions. However that may be, it is certain that its excellence enabled it firmly to maintain its ground against all opposition. Various pamphlets and poems appeared against it, in vindication of the players; but they were so poorly written, that they only served to swell his triumph.

His next performance was his Apology to the Critical Reviewers, who happened to be peculiarly unfortunate in the account which they gave of the Rosciad. Like most other modern apologies, it was not so much a defence as an attack. Whatever reasons the reviewers had to be dissatisfied with the poem, the players were not so much offended as they had been with the Rosciad. It was some consolation to them that the mighty Roscius himself was not spared; for Garrick was certainly aimed at in the following lines.

Let the vain tyrant sit amidst his guards,
His puny green-room wits, and venal bards, &c.

Garrick felt all the force of these sarcastic strokes, and wrote a letter to Churchill, which, besides comprehending an apology for himself and the players, was full of encomiums upon his uncommon vein of poetry, and contained a kind of deprecation of his future wrath. A friend to whom he showed it, entirely disapproved of it, and informed him that Churchill, who was a man of a quick discernment, and an undaunted spirit, would not think the better of him for his humiliation and flattery.

The reproaches which he brought upon himself by his late hours, and other irregularities, gave occasion to his next production, intituled Night, an Epistle to Robert Lloyd. The object of this poem was to vindicate his conduct, or rather to avow it in the face of the public; upon this false principle, that whatever our follies are, we should never undertake to conceal them.

The Night was followed by the first book of the Ghost, a poem that took its rise from a ridiculous imposture carried on in Cock-lane near West-Smithfield, and to which some men of eminent abilities and character paid too serious an attention. Neither of these performances ever became so popular as the Rosciad and the Apology.

The political dissensions at this period increasing every day, at length became so violent, that few persons escaped being influenced in some manner by them.

Churchill had contracted an intimacy with John Wilkes, Esq. and the heads of the party then called the Opposition, and agreeably to the warmth of his temper, endeavoured to promote the interest of those with whom he was connected, by every effort in his power. A subject had been suggested to him as adapted for the then popular paper, called the "North Briton;" but on considering it with attention, he thought it would be better to form it into a poem, which he executed under the title of The Prophecy of Famine, a Scots Pastoral, inscribed to Mr. Wilkes. Of this poem Mr. Wilkes is said to have pronounced before its appearance, that he was sure it would take, as it was at once personal, poetical, and political. His prediction was accomplished, for the poem had a very rapid and extensive sale, and Churchill was extolled by his admirers as superior to Pope.

Having thus embarked in politics, he soon rendered himself of importance enough to be included in the general warrant under which Mr. Wilkes was taken into custody. He escaped, however, the search made after him, and continued his exertions against Lord Bute with great perseverance, and not without some effect.

While he was advancing his fame as a writer, he was negligent of his reputation as a man. He laid aside all the external decorums of his profession, divested himself of his clerical habit, and dressed himself ridiculously in a blue coat, with metal buttons, a gold-laced waistcoat, a gold-laced hat, and ruffles. This part of his behaviour was justly considered as a very blameable opposition to the decencies of life, and hurtful to his interest. In other respects his conduct was more than indiscreet.

He was often to be seen in disgraceful societies, and indulged in intemperances, which the sober part of his friends could not avoid observing, and at the same time lamenting.

He plunged into various irregularities, and lived no longer with his wife; though whether his quitting her was at this particular juncture, his biographers do not determine.

"Some people," says a writer in the "Annual Register," "have been unkind enough to say that Mrs. Churchill gave the first cause of separation. But nothing can be more false than this rumour, and we can assure the public that her conduct in private life was ever irreproachable."

The truth of this assertion, notwithstanding the confidence with which it is delivered, may be reasonably doubted, "It was always understood," says Dr. Kippis, "in Westminster, that Mrs. Churchill's imprudence kept too near a pace with that of her husband. However, we do not hence mean to justify his disorderly and licentious manner of living."

His next performance, in his character of a political satirist, was a most virulent and vindictive Epistle to William Hogarth, the celebrated painter; a man whose genius he admired, and with whom he and Mr. Wilkes had been long in the habits of friendship. It must be acknowledged, that Hogarth himself afforded the original cause of offence. In a satirical print called "The Times" he had attacked Lord Temple and Mr. Pitt, though Mr. Wilkes had sent him a remonstrance, stating, that if his friends were attacked, it would wound him in the most sensible part, and he should revenge their cause.

The author of the "North Britain" employed a whole paper (No. 17.) to be revenged on Hogarth; and Hogarth, in return, published, May 16. 1763, a print of John Wilkes, Esq. Churchill, to revenge his friend, wrote the Epistle, in which all that relates to Hogarth is merely a paraphrase of the "North Briton."

It is not easy to comprehend upon what ground this print was denominated a satire; for it is not a caricature, but a very accurate and striking resemblance, with the identical accompaniments which Mr. Wilkes would at that time have chosen as the decorations of his portrait; the cap of liberty above his head, and two political papers, which he acknowledged himself to have written, in his right hand.

The portrait was taken by Hogarth in the court of Common Pleas, in the moment of acclamation and triumph, when Mr. Wilkes was in his own person asserting the cause of liberty, and by his own trial, ascertaining the law of his country.

It has been mistaken for a caricature, from the world knowing the provocation which Hogarth had previously received, and which every man felt, would have justified the most severe retaliation.

Hogarth took his revenge on Churchill, by vamping up an old portrait of himself and dog, which he published August 1. 1763, under the title of "The bruiser Charles Churchill (once the reverend) in the character of a Russian Hercules, regaling himself after having killed the monster Caricatura, that so sorely galled his virtuous friend the heaven born Wilkes."

It represents Churchill in the character of a bear, hugging a foaming tankard of porter, which was his favourite beverage, and, like another Hercules armed with a knotted club to attack hydras, destroy dragons, and discomfit giants.

To designate more positively the object of his ridicule, and render this rude representation still more ridiculous; it is decorated with a band and pair of ruffles, and with these characteristic ornaments, though it remains a good bear, it becomes a sort of overcharged portrait of the reverend satirist. So feeble a blow at his antagonist was but a poor compensation for the deep wound he had received. Churchill's satire struck him to the heart, and is thought to have contributed to accelerate his death, which happened October 27. 1764.

It must ever be lamented, that men of genius, who had been intimate friends, and might have continued such as long as they lived, should have their union dissolved, and discord sown among them by the demon of party.

He continued to publish, at different intervals, The Ghost, the fourth and concluding book of which appeared in 1763. It is written in verses of eight syllables, without any apparent plan or design. The most celebrated passage in this desultory and digressive performance, was the character of Pomposo, intended for Dr. Johnson, who had offended Churchill, by declaring that his poetry had but little merit. The only reply which Dr. Johnson made to Churchill's satire, was, that he thought him a shallow fellow in the beginning, and that he could say nothing worse of him still. However inferior Churchill might be in character and abilities to Dr. Johnson, he certainly did not deserve the appellation of a shallow fellow.

About the time when the last book of The Ghost appeared, he published The Conference, in which he returned to the heroic measure, in which he was most successful, though he had lately begun to introduce into it too many prosaic lines. The plan of this poem is similar to that of one of Pope's satires. A dialogue is supposed to be carried on between the author, and a noble Lord, who is represented as giving him much worldly advice, to which he answers with great spirit, and in his replies indulges his satiric vein with no small degree of freedom.

One of the most striking passages in The Conference, is that in which he expresses the deepest contrition for a recent action of his life, that was indeed highly dishonourable. He had seduced and carried off the daughter of a tradesman, in Westminster. In little more than a fortnight, his passion subsided; and the young woman became very sorry for her crime. Accordingly a wise and judicious friend wrote for her a letter to her father, expressive of her penitence, and of her desire to return home. Her father, with equal tenderness and prudence, received her into his house, and she might have been fully restored to a virtuous conduct, had it not been for the severity of an elder sister, who was continually loading her with reproaches. Wearied with this usage she applied to Churchill, offering to return to him again, which he thought himself bound to admit, by the ideas which he entertained of gratitude and honour. The true point of virtue would have been to have provided, as amply as he could for her support, and to have had no criminal connection with her in future.

His next performance was The Duellist, in three books, written in verses of eight syllables. It was occasioned by Mr. Martin's challenge to Mr. Wilkes. It is less desultory and digressive than The Ghost, though one principal object of it was to satirize other persons besides Mr. Martin; particularly Warburton, who is pointed out sufficiently to all who have the least literary knowledge.

His last publication in 1765, was The Author, and it is one of the most agreeable of his productions. In the latter part of it, however, he is extremely severe against the political writers of the times. The character of Kidgell, the informer, is drawn in a masterly manner.

His first publication in 1764, was his Gotham, the design of which, on the appearance of the first book, was not very obvious. It became manifest, from the second and third books, that it was his chief design, under the idea of his being proclaimed king of Gotham, to represent the real duty of a monarch, in which view, much good instruction is conveyed. This performance is less satirical than most of his pieces.

His next production was The Candidate, which took its title from the contest that had been carried on between the Earl of Hardwick, and the Earl of Sandwich, for the High Stewardship of the university of Cambridge. The character of Lord Sandwich is attacked with great severity.

The Candidate was succeeded by The Farewell, a dialogue, in which the poet is represented as having formed a design to quit his native country; from which his friend endeavours to dissuade him. Though there is much good sense in this performance, and several excellent observations of philosophy, and the love of our country, it cannot be considered as one of his best productions.

In his succeeding publication, intitled The Times, the satire is principally directed against an unnatural vice, which is exposed with an energy and indignation that cannot possibly be exceeded. It is indeed carried to the very height of extravagance; but this extravagance shows, at the same time, the wonderful powers of his mind, and his just and boundless detestation of the crime. It may, however, be reasonably doubted, whether it is fair for a satirist to attack crimes that are capital by law. Juvenal, in all his outrageous fury against vice, attacks no crimes that were punishable by the laws of his country. The Dutch have that noble and well-judged delicacy to punish the execrable practisers of this crime in the night-time, and in silence, by sewing up the offenders in a bag, and throwing them into the sea.

His next publication was Independence, a poem, which does not in every part of it display the vigour of imagination that is apparent in some of his performances. Much is said in it of poets and patrons, perhaps as much as the subject will well bear. The striking contrast between an effeminate lord and himself, is admirably represented, and he has drawn his own picture with great humour.

Independence was followed by The Journey, a short poem that reflects no disgrace on his abilities. The advice of his friends, and his answer to it are well conducted. Towards the conclusion, he indulges himself in satirizing several contemporary poets.

His last poetical production was the Dedication of his sermons to Warburton, which is written with his usual severity against that eminent prelate.

His literary career was but short. In the autumn of 1764, he went to Boulogne with Mr. Humphrey Cotes, in order to pay a visit to Mr. Wilkes, then in exile. There he was seized with a miliary fever, which baffled the medical aid of two physicians of skill and reputation, by whom he was attended. He died on the 4th of November 1764, in the 33d year of his age, and was buried at Dover; at which place, on a small stone, in the old church-yard, formerly belonging to the collegiate church of St. Martin, is the following inscription.

Mr. Davies, the biographer of Garrick, upon what he thinks good authority, has related, that Churchill's last words were, What a fool have I been! Though he might, on several accounts, have had too much cause to make such a reflection, Mr. Wilkes, whose testimony upon the subject must be decisive, has informed the world, that the goodness of Churchill's heart, and the firmness of his philosophy, were in full lustre during the whole time of his very severe illness; and that the amazing faculties of his mind were not in the least impaired, till a few moments before his death. He left two sons, the youngest of whom was generously educated at the expence of the late Sir Richard Jebb, Bart.

He was greatly lamented by his acquaintance and admirers. Lloyd was so deeply affected by his death, that he “took to his bed, from which he never rose again.” Such was at first the popular enthusiasm in favour of his memory, that there was a talk of erecting a monument to him, in Westminster Abbey; but the idea soon subsided, and will scarcely ever be revived. The following inscription, in the close style of the ancients, and engraven on a sepulchral urn of alabaster, was drawn up by Mr. Wilkes, and intended by him to give the true character of Churchill as a friend, a poet, and a patriot.

CAROLO CHURCHILL,
Amico jucundo,

Poetæ acri,

Civi optime de patria merito;

JOHANNES WILKES, 1765.

The same inscription has lately been engraved on a doric pillar, erected to his memory by Mr. Wilkes, in the Grove of Sandham-Cottage, in the Isle of Wight. It is in the middle of the grove, and backed with weeping willows, cypresses, yews, &c. Laurels seem to grow out of the column as from Virgil's tomb at Naples, and come nearly down to the tablet on the pillar, which is fluted, and appears in some parts already injured by time. On the fore ground are large myrtles, bays, laburnums, &c. The pillar is broken, about nine feet high, and about five feet diameter.

A collection of his Poems, containing The Rosciad, Apology, Night, Prophecy of Famine, Epistle to Hogarth, and the Ghost, was published by subscription, in one volume, 4to. 1763. A second volume containing The Conference, The Author, The Duellist, Gotham, The Candidate, The Farewell, The Times, Independence, and The Journey, was published by subscription after his death, in 4to. 1765. They have since been frequently reprinted, with the Dedication of his sermons, in 3 vols. 12mo., and were inserted in the collection of the “English Poets,” 1790. His Sermons, two upon the nature of prayer in general, and eight upon our Lord's prayer, were printed by subscription, in 1765. Some of his juvenile pieces are to be met with in the “Library,” published in 1761. Six of his letters to Mr. Wilkes are in the collection printed by him in 1769.

Churchill has unhappily added another name to the catalogue, already too numerous in literary history, of those men of genius, who would have arisen to a much greater excellence in writing, and to a far more illustrious reputation, had their intellectual talents been accompanied with the uniform practice of virtue. That he had great force of genius, cannot justly be denied; and there are scarcely any of his performances, in which the natural vigour of his mind is not in some instances displayed. It must at the same time be acknowledged, that he is very unequal in his compositions. The rapidity of his pen, and the eagerness with which his works were purchased, were circumstances not favourable to his reputation. As he proceeded in his literary career, he became more negligent; what he hastily wrote, he as hastily committed to the press. Writing from a spirit of party, being desirous of gratifying the eagerness of his admirers, and having a view to his customary tax, of half-a-crown for each of his publications, he was too rapid in sending them to the world, and too solicitous to fill up the quantity of pages expected from him, to attend to the necessary art of blotting. His latter works are manifestly inferior to his earliest productions. The genius of Churchill occasionally appears, but much dimmed and obscured. The fertility of his mind cannot be more clearly demonstrated, than by observing, that all his works now republished, were produced between May 1761, and November 1764; that is, in three years and a half. If his life had been protracted, if he had been placed in an independent situation, if he could have united application with leisure, he might have been capable of producing some work of solid excellence, which would have rescued his name for ever from oblivion. He has afforded a remarkable instance of a sudden and short-lived celebrity; and, perhaps, nothing will revive the memory of his writings, so as to cause them to be again generally read, excepting a new edition, with notes, fully explaining the satirical and historical allusions. This was what Churchill himself before his death wished to be done. In his will is the following passage. "I desire my dear friend, John Wilkes, Esq. to collect, and publish my works, with the remarks and explanations he has prepared, and any others he thinks proper to make." It is earnestly hoped, that Mr. Wilkes will comply with this request. But the time, perhaps, is not yet arrived for taking away the veil from certain objects; and, perhaps, it may never be desirable to revive party matters; which, though not sunk into oblivion, have happily ceased to inflame the passions of the mind.

Churchill, in his compositions for the pulpit, appears in the character of a sober, rational preacher. His Sermons are written with an uniform mediocrity. They have no animation, and show no traces of the natural vigour and acuteness of his mind. The sentiments are practical, and not usually to be found fault with; but there is not a thought that is new, or indicates any peculiar strength of conception. The style is perspicuous, without the least pretensions to elegance. The internal evidence is against the supposition of their being his own composition. It has an incongruous appearance, to see a commentary on that form of prayer, composed by Benevolence itself, preceded by a virulent libel.

In his Poems, he appears in the character of an outrageous and merciless satirist; though there is every reason to believe that his natural disposition was not severe. Like our national character, his satires are manly, rough, and vehement. A spirit of indignation, which gratifies the irascible passions, is the predominant principle. They resemble the satires of Hall, in style, sentiment, and spirit, more than those of Young; to whom he is not inferior in wit, force, pungency, and invention. He has the strength, fire, and brilliant diction of Dryden, of whom he was an ardent admirer; but he is greatly inferior in gracefulness, ease, and elevation of style, to Pope, whom he held in contempt. The reasons of it are given in his letters to Mr. Wilkes; but do not appear to be satisfactory. A sincere regard to Pope, is not inconsistent with the most ardent admiration of Dryden. Like Dryden, who "could write severely, with more ease than he could write gently," he seems to have preferred the model of his favourite Juvenal, rather than of Horace. He is all fire, spirit, and animation. His nervous verse is well adapted to express the vehemence of his indignation. Amid the most spirited invective, it emits many a luminous irradiation of beautiful descriptive poetry.

But he is inferior to Juvenal, in the importance of his subject, and in the harmony of his numbers. Juvenal pours his majestic verse with all the warmth of a zealot in the cause of virtue. He not only puts vice to shame, but countenances virtue, and points out the way to attain it. Churchill seems to have little else in view, than to gratify private pique, or party-prejudice. He did not possess dignity of character, and solidity of judgment, in a degree sufficient to enable him to stand forth as a disinterested censor of prevailing manners. His versification is extremely unequal; sometimes he reminds us of the roughness of Donne, and the looseness of Oldham; while at other times, he amply shows how well he understood all the powers of strong and harmonious numbers.

The Rosciad is an admirable poem, and justly deserves to be considered as a second "Dunciad." Strength of poetry, accuracy of observation, a happy vein of humour, and harmony of numbers, are its peculiar excellencies. The character of Mr. Fitzpatrick, The thing without a name, near the beginning, is drawn with uncommon severity and spirit. The lines in which he asserts that genius is of no country, are written with great energy. The character of Shakspeare is drawn with a masterly hand. His praises of Garrick, Mrs. Cibber, Mrs. Pritchard, &c. have great merit.

The Apology displays as much humour and fancy, facility of expression, and smoothness of versification, as are to be found in most productions of the present age. The frippery of some modern poetry, in particular, is pleasantly ridiculed in the lines beginning, Rude and unskilful in the poet's trade. The situation of a company of strolling players is described with great strength of humour. The apology for his own versification is truly admirable. The character of Dryden is drawn with great discrimination of judgment, and strength of colouring.

The Night has many lively and spirited passages. The character of himself is very favourable. The patriotic turn of the nation is exposed with great humour.

In the Prophecy of Famine, he has displayed great strength of sentiment, nervous expression, and elegant numbers; though the malignity which he has shown against Scotland, and its inhabitants, is totally inexcusable. The delineation of a young poet's mind, at the beginning, is both severe and pleasant. The description of Famine, has in it the terrible graces of Sir Joshua Reynolds' picture of "Ugolino." His description of Scotland, exceeds in severity that of Cleveland. The dialogue between Jockey and Sawney is well supported. In this performance, he shows a peculiar happiness in throwing his thoughts into poetical paragraphs; so that the sentence swells to the conclusion, as in prose.

In the Epistle to Hogarth, the expression is equally nervous, and the harmony as irregular as in his other pieces. The speech of Candour, near the beginning, is perhaps somewhat too long. The lines describing the obnoxiousness of merit to envy, are finely expressed. The address to Hogarth is equally spirited and severe. He shows an amiable generosity, and greatness of mind, when he mourns over his vanquished enemy, and condemns himself for attacking an object, wasted with years and infirmities. The conclusion of the poem exhibits such an affecting picture of the ruins of genius, and leaves such a pathetic melancholy, that every sentiment which the satire excited, is entirely effaced by it.

The Ghost, though inferior to some of his other pieces, has some shining and beautiful passages. It has the wit, humour, ridicule, satire, and extravagance of "Tristram Shandy." The first book exhibits a humorous sketch of the history of superstition and credulity, and a good representation of the characters that apply for information about their future fortune. In the description of truth, in the second book, are many happy strokes, among which his own regard to it is expressed with great energy. The verses beginning, Dark was the night, &c. are proofs of his ability in picturesque bold description, and bold personification. The line presents an image equally just and poetical. In the third book, the privileges of a poet are happily represented. The description of Fame, which is very long, has in it much satire; and several parts of it are happily imagined. The trite reflections which sometimes are found in poetry, are humorously ridiculed. The fourth book has in it some splendid passages; but it is in general very wild and irregular. Lloyd hints at the slovenly nature of the composition, in his "Cobler of Cripplegate's Letter."

"Trembling, and talking loud, went Fear."

The priest, I grant, has something clever,
A something that will last for ever;
Let him, in part, be made your pattern,
Whose muse, now queen, and now a flattern,
Trick'd out in Rosciad, rules the roast,
Turns trapes and trollop in the Ghost,
By turns, both tickles us, and warms,
And drunk, or sober, has her charms.

The Conference contains some pathetic and interesting passages; particularly the following beautiful confession, for the sake of which, possibly, the poem was written.

Ah, what, my lord, hath private life to do
With things of public nature? why to view,
Would you, thus cruelly those scenes unfold,
Which without pain, and horror to behold,
Must speak me something, more or less than man!
Which friends may pardon, but I never can!

Look back! a thought which borders on despair,
 Which human nature must, yet cannot bear;
 'Tis not the babbling of a busy world,
 Where praise and censure are at random hurl'd,
 Which can the meanest of my thoughts controul,
 Or shake one settled purpose of my soul:
 Free and at large might their wild curses roam,
 If all, if all, alas! were well at home,
 No—'tis the tale which angry conscience tells,
 When she, with more than tragic horror, swells
 Each circumstance of guilt; when stern, but true,
 She brings bad actions forth into review;
 And like the dread hand-writing on the wall,
 Bids late remorse awake at reason's call,
 Arm'd at all points bids scorpion vengeance pass,
 And to the mind holds up reflection's glass;
 The mind, which starting, heaves the heart-felt groan,
 And hates that form she knows to be her own.

After so feeling, so evidently contrite a declaration, who would not grant a full absolution for any venial offence, committed by a penitent, thus apparently, thus ardently sincere? The remainder of the poem is employed to assert his firm attachment to his country, to express his zeal in the glorious cause of liberty, and to evince the integrity of his public, whatever may have been the errors of his private, conduct. It concludes with an admirable address to the Supreme Being.

The Duelliſt has many poetical passages. The beginning of the first book is very striking, and has some fine personifications. The pictures of Ambition, Labour, Virtue, Vice, Study, Avarice, and Jealousy, are drawn with great strength and invention. The pictures of the three last, are worked up with the greatest vigour of imagination. The description of the night previous to the Duel, is greatly executed. The animated verses, beginning, Full in the front, &c. form a fine picture of the youthful exercises of our ancestors. The passage, beginning, When stern oppression, &c. breathes the heroic spirit of liberty, and glows with the enthusiastic heat of ancient valour. Some of the ancient inhabitants of the Temple of Liberty, are well described. The verses, beginning, Peace crown'd with olive, are eminently beautiful. In the third book, the Cave of Fraud is represented in no inadequate colours. The horrid fiend, Affassination, one of the inhabitants, is admirably described. The picture, however, is spoiled by the puerile introduction of an exciseman's lanthorn. The rest of the imagery is sublime; and, therefore, this low circumstance is extremely improper.

The Author is the most pleasing and unexceptionable of all his pieces. The tendency of the subject and the execution are equally commendable. The interests of genius and learning are cordially espoused and powerfully supported; while the contempt of professed ignorance, and the shallowness of pretenders to science, are justly exposed and lashed by the blameless rod of general satire. Sometimes, indeed, his disposition to private satire breaks forth; the force and efficacy of which, when the censure is just, he no less strenuously than truly maintains in the following lines:

When satire flies abroad on falsehood's wing,
 Short is her life indeed, and dull her sting;
 But when to truth allied, the wound she gives
 Sinks deep, and to remotest ages lives.
 When in the tomb thy pamper'd flesh shall rot,
 And e'en by friends thy memory be forgot;
 Still shalt thou live recorded for thy crimes,
 Live in her page, and stink to after-times.

The little advantages that attend the pursuit of science, and the distinguished labours of genius, are observed with a becoming spirit of indignation. The trammels of a college life are sarcastically described. His apology for quitting his gown is manly and indignant, but unsatisfactory. The poem concludes with the severest character that ever fell from the pen of satire.

His Gotham contains a number of beautiful passages. In the first book, his description of the different ages of mankind, rivals the descriptions of Aristotle, Horace, and Shakspeare. In the beginning of the second book, the business and labour of a poet are well described. The following account of his own manner of writing will justify the strictures that have been made on his compositions.

Had I the pow'r, I could not have the time,
 Whilst spirits flow, and life is in her prime ;
 Without a sin 'gainst pleasure, to design
 A plan, to methodize each thought, each line
 Highly to finish, and make ev'ry grace,
 In itself charming, take new charms from place.
 Nothing of books, and little known of men,
 When the mad fit comes on, I seize the pen,
 Rough as they run, the rapid thoughts set down,
 Rough as they run, discharge them on the town :
 Hence rude, unfinish'd brats, before their time,
 Are born into this idle world of rhyme,
 And the poor flattern muse is brought to bed
 With all her imperfections on her head.
Some, as no life appears, no pulses play
 Through the dull dubious mafs, no breath makes way,
 Doubt, greatly doubt, 'till for a glafs they call,
 Whether the child can be baptiz'd at all :
Others, on other grounds, objections frame,
 And, granting that the child may have a name,
 Doubt, as the sex might well a midwife pose,
 Whether they should baptize it, Verse or Prose.

The second book has many fine lines, and some happy strokes of fancy, but there is in it two great a neglect of poetic numbers. The imprecations, beginning, Let war with all his needy ruffian band, contain sublime imagery, and most powerful expression. The characters and reigns of the Stuarts in England, are not less happily than justly described. In the beginning of the third book, the versification is more correct and harmonious ; and towards the middle of it he displays a rich vein of poetry. His account of the duty of a King, is well conceived and expressed. The conditions of royalty and rustic poverty are admirably contrasted. The passages, beginning, When the fresh morn, &c. abound in rural scenery, fancy, and description, which rarely occur in his writings. In the description, beginning, When am'rous spring, &c. there is much poetical imagery. The lines in which he displays his love of poetry, when supposing himself King of Gotbam, he is obliged to take his farewell of the muses, are exquisitely beautiful.

The Candidate has the beauties and defects of his other pieces. The beginning of the poem is very spirited, and the words, Come, panegyric, introduce one of the severest satires which the pen of man ever wrote. The Farewell contains some excellent political and philosophical reflections ; but it is deficient in poetical fire, and many of the lines are feeble and prosaic.

The Times, however exceptionable, however enormous, is not without a very considerable share of poetical merit. In the group of follies and vices, which distinguish and disgrace the present age, Meanness is marked with striking features, and a masterly force. The characters of Faber and Apicius, whoever were intended by them, are drawn with equal strength and severity. The lines in which he strikes at the base and illiberal traffic which parents make of their children, cannot be read without all his indignation. The crimes and follies we borrow from foreign nations, are pursued with the same vengeance as those which are more peculiarly the product of our own climate. The characters of France, Spain, and Italy, are strongly marked ; the last in particular, is an admirable picture. The compliment to Lady Caroline Hervey is nervous and elegant.

His Independence has its brighter passages, but is justly chargeable, in many places, with vernacular inelegance, and vulgarity of sentiment and diction. The scene of weighing a Lord against a bard must be allowed to possess an odd species of whimsical humour. His own picture is drawn in a very jocular manner.

Some parts of the Dedication of his sermons to Warburton, are very spirited, especially those passages which begin with—Health to great Glosier. The same vigour is not maintained through the whole ; but as the poem was left unfinished, it cannot be known to what height the grave irony of the satire might have been carried.

The character of Churchill has been variously represented by his friends and his enemies. Should it be thought that a few of his friends have extolled him beyond his merit, it must be allowed, that by many persons he has been unduly depreciated.

Lloyd, as might be expected, in the following lines of his "epistle to C. Churchill," is very warm in the praises of his friend.

Yet in these leaden times, this idle age,
When blind with dulness, or as blind with rage,
Author 'gainst author rails with venom curst,
And happy he who calls out blockhead first,
From the low earth aspiring genius springs,
And sails triumphant, borne on eagle-wings :
No toothless spleen, no venom'd critic's aim,
Shall rob thee, Churchill, of thy proper fame ;
While pitch'd for ever in thy nervous rhyme,
Fool lives and shines out fool to latest time.

In the concluding lines of his poem called "The Poet," he has given the favourable side of his character.

Is there a man whose genius strong
Rolls like a rapid stream along,
Whose muse, long hid in cloudless night,
Pours on us like a flood of light ;
Whose acting comprehensive mind
Walks fancy's regions unconfin'd,
Whom not the surly sense of pride,
Nor affectation warps aside ;
Who drags no author from his shelf,
To talk on with an eye to self ;
Careless alike in conversation,
Of censure or of approbation ;
Who freely thinks, and freely speaks,
And meets the wit he never seeks ;
Whose reason calm and judgment cool,
Can pity, but not hate a fool ;
Who can a hearty praise bestow,
If merit sparkles in a foe ;
Who bold and open, firm, and true.
Flatters no friends—yet loves them too.
Churchill will be the last to know,
His is the portrait I would show.

Other writers are more sparing in their applause of Churchill.

"We all remember," says Dr. Warton, in his "Essay on Pope," "when even a Churchill was more in vogue than Gray. He that treats of fashionable follies and the topics of the day, that describes present persons and recent events, finds many persons whose understandings and whose passions he gratifies."

"Even Young," says Dr. Knox in his "Essays," popular as he was, has been eclipsed by a poet, who has shone with the effulgence and instability of a meteor. Churchill possessed merit ; a merit which was magnified, when seen through the medium of party, beyond that degree which it was able to support. When reason at last viewed what passion had exaggerated, she was disgusted with the disappointment, and turned away with neglect. Thus, the celebrated Churchill, with whose applause the town re-echoed, is sinking to an oblivion which he hardly deserves ; for though he wrote many careless lines, and many dull passages, yet the greater part of his productions displayed a genuine vein of satirical genius."

THE WORKS OF CHURCHILL.

THE ROSCIAD.

ROSCIUS deceas'd, each high aspiring play'r
Push'd all his int'rest for the vacant chair.
The buskin'd heroes of the mimic stage
No longer whine in love, and rant in rage;
The monarch quits his throne, and condescends
Humble to court the favour of his friends;
For pity's sake tells undeserv'd mishaps,
And their applause to gain, recounts his claps.
Thus the victorious chiefs of ancient Rome,
To win the mob, a suppliant's form assume,
In pompous strain fight o'er th' extinguish'd war,
And show where honour bled in ev'ry scar.

But though bare merit might in Rome appear
The strongest plea for favour, 'tis not here;
We form our judgment in another way;
And they will best succeed who best can pay:
Those, who would gain the votes of British tribes,
Must add to force of merit, force of bribes.

What can an actor give? In ev'ry age
Cash hath been rudely banish'd from the stage;
Monarchs themselves, to grief of ev'ry play'r,
Appear as often as their image there:
They can't, like candidate for other seat,
Pour seas of wine, and mountains raise of meat.
Wine! they could bribe you with the world as soon,

And of roast beef they only know the tune:
But what they have they give: could Clive do
more,

Though for each million he had brought home four?

Shuter keeps open house at Southwark fair,
And hopes the friends of humour will be there;
In Smithfield, Yates prepares the rival treat
For those who laughter love instead of meat;
Foote, at Old House, for even Foote will be
In self-conceit, an actor, bribes with tea;
Which Wilkinson at second hand receives,
And at the New, pours water on the leaves.

The town divided, each runs several ways,
As passion, humour, int'rest, party sways.
Things of no moment, colour of the hair,
Shape of a leg, complexion brown or fair,
A dress well-chosen, or a patch misplac'd,
Conciliate favour, or create distaste.

From galleries loud peals of laughter roll,
And thunder Shuter's praises—he's so droll.

Embox'd, the ladies must have something smart,
Palmer! Oh! Palmer tops the janty part.
Seated in pit, the dwarf, with aching eyes,
Looks up, and vows that Barry's out of size;
Whilst to six feet the vig'rous stripling grown,
Declares that Garrick is another Coan.

When place of judgment is by whim supply'd,
And our opinions have their rise in pride;
When, in discoursing on each mimic elf,
We praise and censure with an eye to self;
All must meet friends, and Ackman bids as fair
In such a court as Garrick for the chair.

At length agreed, all squabbles to decide,
By some one judge the cause was to be try'd;
But this their squabbles did afresh renew,
Who should be judge in such a trial:—Who?

For Johnson some, but Johnson, it was fear'd,
Would be too grave; and Sterne too gay appear'd:

Others for Francklin voted; but 'twas known,
He sicken'd at all triumphs but his own:
For Colman many, but the peevish tongue
Of prudent age found out that he was young:
For Murphy some few pilf'ring wits declar'd,
Whilst folly clapp'd her hands, and wisdom star'd.

To mischief train'd, ev'n from his mother's womb,

Grown old in fraud, though yet in manhood's bloom,
Adopting arts by which gay villians rise,
And reach the heights which honest men despise;
Mute at the bar, and in the senate loud,
Dull 'mongst the dullest, proudest of the proud;
A pert, prim prater of the northern race,
Guilt in his heart, and famine in his face,
Stood forth;—and thrice he wav'd his lily hand—
And thrice he twirl'd his eye—thrice strok'd his band.— [aim,

“ At friendship's call (thus oft with trait'rous
“ Men void of faith usurp faith's sacred name)

“ At friendship's call I come, by Murphy sent,

“ Who thus by me developes his intent,

“ But lest, transfus'd, the spirit should be lost,

“ That spirit which in storms of ret'ric toft,

“ Bounces about, and flies like bottled beer,

“ In his own words his own intentions hear.

“ Thanks to my friends.—But to vile fortunes
“ born,

“ No robes of fur these shoulders must adorn.

" Vain your applause, no aid from thence I draw,
 " Vain all my wit, for what is wit in law?
 " Twice (curs'd remembrance)! twice I strove
 " to gain

" Admittance 'mong' st the law-instructed train,
 " Who, in the Temple and Gray's-Inn prepare
 " For clients wretched feet the legal snare:
 " Dead to those arts which polish and refine,
 " Deaf to all worth, because that worth was mine,
 " Twice did those blockheads startle at my name,
 " And soul rejection gave me up to shame.
 " To laws and lawyers then I bid adieu,
 " And plans of far more lib'ral note pursue.
 " Who will may be a judge—my kindling breast
 " Burns for that chair which Roscius once pos-
 " sels'd.

" Here give your votes, your int'rest here exert,
 " And let success for once attend desert."

With sleek appearance, and with ambling pace,
 And, type of vacant head, with vacant face,
 The Proteus Hill put in his modest plea,—

" Let favour speak for others, worth for me."—
 For who, like him, his various powers could call
 Into so many shapes, and shine in all?

Who could so nobly grace the motley list,
Actor, inspector, doctor, botanist?

Knows any one so well—sure no one knows,—

At once to play, prescribe, compound, compose?

Who can—But Woodward came,—Hill slipp'd away,

Melting, like ghosts, before the rising day.

* With that low cunning, which in fools supplies,
 And amply too, the place of being wise,
 Which nature, kind, indulgent parent, gave
 To qualify the blockhead for a knave; [charmas,
 With that smooth falsehood, whose appearance
 And reason of each wholesome doubt disarms,
 Which to the lowest depths of guile descends,
 By vilest means pursues the vilest ends,
 Wears friendship's mask for purposes of spite,
 Fawns in the day, and butchers in the night;
 With that malignant envy, which turns pale,
 And sickens, even if a friend prevail,
 Which merit and success pursues with hate,
 And damns the worth it cannot imitate;
 With the cold caution of a coward's spleen,
 Which fears not guilt, but always seeks a screen,
 Which keeps this maxim ever in her view—
 What's basely done, should be done safely too;
 With that dull, rooted, callous impudence,
 Which, dead to shame, and ev'ry nicer sense,
 Ne'er blush'd, unless, in spreading vice's snares,
 She blunder'd on some virtue unawares:
 With all these blessings, which we seldom find
 Lavish'd by nature on one happy mind,
 A motley figure, of the fribble tribe,
 Which heart can scarce conceive, or pen describe,
 Came simp'ring on; to ascertain whose sex
 Twelve sage impanell'd matrons would perplex.

* This severe character was intended for Mr. Fitzpatrick, a person who had rendered himself remarkable by his activity in the playhouse riots of 1763, relative to the taking half prices. He was the hero of Garrick's Fribbleriad.

Nor male, nor female, neither, and yet both;
 Of neuter gender, though of Irish growth;
 A six-foot suckling, mincing in its gait;
 Affected, peevish, prim, and delicate;
 Fearful it seem'd, though of athletic make,
 Lest brutal breezes should too roughly shake
Its tender form, and savage motion spread
 O'er its pale cheeks the horrid manly red.

Much did it talk, in its own pretty phrase,
 Of genius and of taste, of play'rs and plays;
 Much too of writings, which itself had wrote,
 Of special merit, though of little note;
 For fate, in a strange humour, had decreed
 That what it wrote, none but itself should read;
 Much too it chatter'd of dramatic laws,
 Misjudging critics, and misplac'd applause,
 Then, with a self-complacent jutting air,
It smil'd, it smirk'd, it wriggled to the chair;
 And, with an awkward briskness not its own,
 Looking around, and perking on the throne,
 Triumphant seem'd, when that strange savage dame,

Known but to few, or only known by name,
 Plain common sense appear'd, by nature there
 Appointed, with plain truth, to guard the chair.
 The pageant saw, and blasted with her frown,
 To its first state of nothing melted down.

Nor shall the muse (for even there the pride
 Of this vain nothing shall be mortified)
 Nor shall the muse (should fate ordain her rhymes, Fond, pleasing thought! to live in after-times)
 With such a trifler's name her pages blot;
 Known be the character, the thing forgot;
 Let it, to disappoint each future aim,
Live without sex, and die without a name!

Cold-blooded critics, by enervate fires
 Scarce hammer'd out, when nature's feeble fires
 Glimmer'd their last; whose sluggish blood, half froze, [ne'er glows
 Creeps lab'ring through the veins; whose heart
 With fancy-kindled heat;—a servile race,
 Who in mere want of fault all merit place;
 Who blind obedience pay to ancient schools,
 Bigots to Greece, and slaves to musty rules;
 With solemn consequence declar'd that none
 Could judge that cause but Sophocles alone.
 Dupes to their fancied excellence, the crowd,
 Obsequious to the sacred dictate, bow'd.

When, from amidst the throng, a youth stood forth,
 Unknown his person, not unknown his worth;
 His look bespoke applause; alone he stood,
 Alone he stemm'd the mighty critic flood.
 He talk'd of ancients, as the man became
 Who priz'd our own, but envied not their fame;
 With noble rev'rence spoke of Greece and Rome,
 And scorn'd to tear the laurel from the tomb.

" But more than just to other countries grown,
 " Must we turn base apostates to our own?
 " Where do these words of Greece and Rome excel,
 " That England may not please the ear as well?
 " What mighty magic's in the place or air,
 " That all perfection needs must centre there?
 " In states, let strangers blindly be prefer'd;
 " In state of letters, merit should be heard.

" Genius is of no country; her pure ray
 " Spreads all abroad, as gen'ral as the day;
 " Foe to restraint, from place to place she flies,
 " And may hereafter e'en in Holland rise.
 " May not (to give a pleasing fancy scope,
 " And cheer a patriot heart with patriot hope)
 " May not some great extensive genius raise
 " The name of Britain 'bove Athenian praise;
 " And, whilst brave thirst of fame his bosom warms,
 " Make England great in letters as in arms?
 " There may—there hath—and Shakspeare's muse
 " aspires

" Beyond the reach of Greece: with native fires
 " Mounting aloft, he wings his daring flight,
 " While Sophocles below stands trembling at his
 " height.

" Why should we then abroad for judges roam,
 " When abler judges we may find at home?
 " Happy in tragic and in comic pow'rs,
 " Have we not Shakspeare?—Is not Jonson ours?
 " For them, your nat'ral judges, Britons, vote;
 " They'll judge like Britons, who like Britons
 " wrote."

He said, and conquer'd—Sense resum'd her sway,
 And disappointed pedants stalk'd away.
 Shakspeare and Jonson, with deserv'd applause,
 Joint-judges were ordain'd to try the cause.
 Meantime the stranger ev'ry voice employ'd,
 To ask or tell his name—Who is it?—Lloyd.

Thus, when the aged friends of Job stood mute,
 And, tamely prudent, gave up the dispute,
 Elihu, with the decent warmth of youth,
 Boldly stood forth the advocate of truth;
 Confuted falsehood, and disabled pride,
 Whilst baffled age stood snarling at his side.

The day of trial's fix'd, nor any fear
 Left day of trial should be put off here.
 Causes but seldom for delay can call
 In courts where forms are few, fees none at all.

The morning came, nor find I that the sun,
 As he on other great events hath done,
 Put on a brighter robe than what he wore
 To go his journey in the day before.

Full in the centre of a spacious plain,
 On plan entirely new, where nothing vain,
 Nothing magnificent appear'd, but art
 With decent modesty perform'd her part,
 Rose a tribunal: from no other court
 It borrow'd ornament, or sought support:
 No juries here were pack'd to kill or clear,
 No bribes were taken, nor oaths broken here;
 No gownsmen, partial to a client's cause,
 To their own purpose tun'd the pliant laws.
 Each judge was true and steady to his trust,
 As Mansfield wise, and as old Foster * just.

In the first seat, in robe of various dyes,
 A noble wildness flashing from his eyes,
 Sat Shakspeare.—In one hand a wand he bore,
 For mighty wonders fam'd in days of yore;
 The other held a globe, which to his will Obedient turn'd, and own'd the master's skill:
 Things of the noblest kind his genius drew,
 And look'd through nature at a single view:

* Sir Michael Foster, one of the Judges of the King's Bench.

A loose he gave to his unbounded soul,
 And taught new lands to rise, new seas to roll;
 Call'd into being scenes unknown before,
 And, passing nature's bounds, was something more.

Next Jonson sat, in ancient learning train'd,
 His rigid judgment fancy's flights restrain'd,
 Correctly prun'd each wild luxuriant thought,
 Mark'd out her course, nor spar'd a glorious fault.
 The book of man he read with nicest art,
 And ransack'd all the secrets of the heart;
 Exerted penetration's utmost force,
 And trac'd each passion to its proper source;
 Then strongly mark'd, in liveliest colours drew,
 And brought each foible forth to public view.
 The coxcomb felt a lash in ev'ry word,
 And fools, hung out, their brother fools deterr'd.
 His comic humour kept the world in awe,
 And laughter frighten'd folly more than law.

But, hark!—The trumpet sounds, the crowd
 gives way,
 And the procession comes in just array.

Now should I, in some sweet poetic line,
 Offer up incense at Apollo's shrine;
 Invoke the muse to quit her calm abode,
 And waken mem'ry with a sleeping ode.
 For how should mortal man, in mortal verse,
 Their titles, merits, or their names rehearse?
 But give, kind dullness, memory and rhyme,
 We'll put off genius till another time.

First, order came,—with solemn step, and slow,

In measur'd time his feet were taught to go.
 Behind, from time to time, he cast his eye,
 Lest this should quit his place, that step awry.
 Appearances to save his only care;
 So things seem right, no matter what they are.
 In him his parents saw themselves renew'd,
 Begotten by Sir Critic on Saint Prude.

Then came drum, trumpet, hautboy, fiddle, flute;
 Next snuffer, sweeter, shofter, soldier, mute;
 Legions of angels all in white advance;
 Furies, all fire, come forward in a dance;
 Pantomime figures then are brought to view,
 Fools hand in hand with fools, go two by two.
 Next came the treasurer of either house;
 One with full purse, t'other with not a sou.
 Behind, a group of figures awe create,
 Set off with all th' impertinence of state;
 By lace and feather consecrate to fame,
 Expletive kings, and queens without a name.

Here Havard, all serene, in the same strains,
 Loves, hates, and rages, triumphs, and complains;
 His easy vacant face proclaim'd a heart
 Which could not feel emotions, nor impart.
 With him came mighty Davies. On my life,
 That Davies hath a very pretty wife:—
 Statesman all over!—In plots famous grown!—
 He mouths a sentence, as curs mouth a bone.

Next Holland came.—With truly tragic stalk,
 He creeps, he flies.—A hero should not walk.
 As if with heav'n he warr'd, his eager eyes
 Planted their batteries against the skies;
 Attitude, action, air, pause, start, sigh, groan,
 He borrow'd, and made use of as his own.
 By fortune thrown on any other stage,
 He might, perhaps, have pleas'd an easy age;

But now appears a copy, and no more,
Of something better we have seen before.
The actor who would build a solid fame,
Must imitation's servile arts disclaim;
Act from himself, on his own bottom stand;
I hate e'en Garrick thus at second-hand.

Behind came King.---Bred up in modest lore,
Bashful and young he sought Hibernia's shore;
Hibernia, fam'd, 'bove ev'ry other grace,
For matchless intrepidity of face.
From her his features caught the gen'rous flame,
And bid defiance to all sense of shame.
Tutor'd by her all rivals to surpass,
'Mongst Drury's sons he comes, and shines in brass.

Lo Yates!—Without the least finesse of art
He gets applause—I wish he'd get his part.
When hot impatience is in full career,
How vilely "Hark'e! Hark'e!" grates the ear?
When active fancy from the brain is sent,
And stands on tip-toe for some wish'd event,
I hate those careless blunders which recal
Suspended sense, and prove it fiction all.

In characters of low and vulgar mould,
Where nature's coarsest features we behold,
Where, destitute of ev'ry decent grace,
Unmanner'd jests are blurted in your face,
There Yates with justice strict attention draws,
Acts truly from himself, and gains applause.
But when to please himself or charm his wife,
He aims at something in politer life,
When, blindly thwarting nature's stubborn plan,
He treads the stage, by way of gentleman,
The clown, who no one touch of breeding knows,
Looks like Tom Errand dress'd in Clincher's clothes.

Fond of his dress, fond of his person grown,
Laugh'd at by all, and to himself unknown,
From side to side he struts, he smiles, he prates,
And seems to wonder what's become of Yates.

Woodward, endow'd with various tricks of face,
Great master in the science of grimace,
From Ireland ventures, fav'rite of the town,
Lur'd by the pleasing prospect of renown;
A speaking Harlequin, made up of whim,
He twists, he twines, he tortures ev'ry limb,
Plays to the eye with a mere monkey's art,
And leaves to sense the conquest of the heart.
We laugh indeed, but on reflection's birth
We wonder at ourselves, and curse our mirth.
His walk of parts he fatally misplac'd,
And inclination fondly took for taste;
Hence hath the town so often seen display'd
Beau in burlesque, high life in masquerade.

But when bold wits, not such as patch up plays,
Cold and correct, in these insipid days,
Some comic character, strong featur'd, urge
To probability's extreme verge,
Where modest judgment her decree suspends,
And for a time nor censures nor commends,
Where critics can't determine on the spot,
Whether it is in nature found or not,
There Woodward safely shall his pow'rs exert,
Nor fail of favour where he shows desert.
Hence he in Bobadil such praises bore,
Such worthy praises, Kately scare had more.

By turns transform'd into all kind of shapes,
Constant to none, Foote laughs, cries, struts, and scrapes:

Now in the centre, now in van or rear,
The Proteus shifts, bawd, parson, auctioneer.
His strokes of humour, and his burst of sport,
Are all contain'd in this one word distort.

Doth a man stutter, look a-squint, or halt?
Mimics draw humour out of nature's fault,
With personal defects their mirth adorn,
And hang misfortunes out to public scorn.
Ev'n I, whom nature cast in hideous mould,
Whom, having made, she trembled to behold,
Beneath the load of mimicry may groan,
And find that nature's errors are my own.

Shadows behind of Foote and Woodward came;
Wilkinson this, Obrien was that name:
Strange to relate, but wonderfully true,
That even shadows have their shadows too!
With not a single comic pow'r endu'd,
The first a mere mere mimic's mimic stood;
The last by nature form'd to please, who shows,
In Jonson's Stephen, which way genius grows;
Self quite put off, affects, with too much art,
To put on Woodward in each mingled part;
Adopts his shrug, his wink, his stare; nay, more,
His voice, and croaks; for Woodward croak'd before.

When a dull copier simple grace neglects,
And rests his imitation in defects,
We readily forgive; but such vile arts
Are double guilt in men of real parts.

By nature form'd in her perversest mood,
With no one requisite of art endu'd,
Next Jackson came.—Observe that settled glare,
Which better speaks a puppet than a player:
Lift to that voice—did ever discord hear
Sounds so well fitted to her untun'd ear?
When, to enforce some very tender part,
The right hand sleeps by instinct on the heart,
His soul, of every other thought bereft,
Is anxious only where to place the left;
He sobs and pants to sooth his weeping spouse,
To sooth his weeping mother, turns and bows.
Awkward, embarrass'd, stiff, without the skill
Of moving gracefully, or standing still,
One leg, as if suspicious of his brother,
Desirous seems to run away from th' other.

Some errors, handed down from age to age,
Plead custom's force, and still possess the stage.
That's vile—should we a parent's faults adore,
And err, because our fathers err'd before?
If, inattentive to the author's mind,
Some actors made the jest they could not find,
If by low tricks they marr'd fair nature's mien,
And blurr'd the graces of the simple scene,
Shall we, if reason rightly is employ'd,
Not see their faults, or seeing not avoid?
When Falstaff stands detected in a lie,
Why, without meaning, rolls love's glassy eye?
Why?—There's no cause—at least no cause we know—

It was the fashion twenty years ago.
Fashion, a word which knaves and fools may use,
Their knavery and folly to excuse.

To copy beauties, forfeits all pretence
To fame—to copy faults, is want of sense.

Yet (though in some particulars he fails,
Some few particulars, where mode prevails),
If in these hallow'd times, when sober, sad,
All gentlemen are melancholy mad,
When 'tis not deem'd so great a crime by half
To violate a vestal, as to laugh,
Rude mirth may hope presumptuous to engage
An act of toleration for the stage,
And courtiers will, like reasonable creatures,
Suspend vain fashion, and unscrew their features,
Old Falstaff, play'd by love, shall please once more,
And humour set the audience in a roar.

Actors I've seen, and of no vulgar name,
Who, being from one part possess'd of fame,
Whether they are to laugh, cry, whine, or bawl,
Still introduce that fav'rite part in all.
Here, love, be cautious—ne'er be thou betray'd
To call in that wag Falstaff's dang'rous aid;
Like Goths of old, howe'er he seems a friend,
He'll seize that throne you wish him to defend.
In a peculiar mould by humour cast,
For Falstaff fram'd—himself the first and last,—
He stands aloof from all—maintains his state,
And scorns, like Scotsmen, to assimilate.
Vain all disguise—too plain we see the trick,
Though the knight wears the weeds of Dominic;
And Boniface, disgrac'd, betrays the smack,
In Anno Domini, of Falstaff's sack.

Arms cross'd, brows bent, eyes fix'd, feet marching slow,

A band of malecontents with spleen o'erflow;
Wrapt in conceit's impenetrable fog,
Which pride, like Phœbus, draws from ev'ry bog,
They curse the managers, and curse the town,
Whose partial favours keeps such merit down.

But if some man, more hardy than the rest,
Should dare attack these gnatlings in their nest;
At once they rise with impotence of rage,
Whet their small stings, and buzz about the stage.
" 'Tis breach of privilege!—Shall any dare
" To arm satiric truth against a player?
" Prescriptive rights we plead time out of mind;
" Actors, unlash'd themselves, may lash mankind."

What! shall opinion then, of nature free
And lib'ral as the vagrant air, agree
To rust in chains like these, impos'd by things
Which, less than nothing, ape the pride of kings?
No—though half-poets with half-players join
To curse the freedom of each honest line;
Though rage and malice dim their faded cheek;
What the muse freely thinks, she'll freely speak.
With just disdain of ev'ry paltry sneer,
Stranger alike to flattery and fear,
In purpose fix'd, and to herself a rule,
Public contempt shall wait the public fool.

Austin would always glisten in French silks,
Ackman would Norris be, and Packer Wilks.
For who, like Ackman, can with humour please?
Who can, like Packer, charm with sprightly ease?
Higher than all the rest, see Bransby strut:
A mighty Gulliver in Lilliput!
Ludicrous nature! which at once could show
A man so very high, so very low.

If I forget thee, Blakes, or if I say
Aught hurtful, may I never see the play.
Let critics, with a supercilious air,
Decry thy various merit, and declare
Frenchman is still at top;—but scorn that rage
Which, in attacking thee, attacks the age.
French follies, universally embrac'd,
At once provoke our mirth, and form our taste.

Long, from a nation ever hardly us'd,
At random censur'd, wantonly abus'd,
Have Britons drawn their sport, with partial view
Form'd gen'ral notions from the rascal few;
Condemn'd a people, as for vices known,
Which, from their country banish'd, seek our own.

At length, howe'er, the slavish chain is broke,
And, sense awaken'd, scorns her ancient yoke:
Taught by thee, Moody, we now learn to raise
Mirth from their foibles; from their virtues, praise.

Next came the legion, which our summer Bayes,
From alleys, here and there, contriv'd to raise,
Flush'd with vast hopes, and certain to succeed
With wits who cannot write, and scarce can read.
Vet'rans no more support the rotten cause,
No more from Elliot's worth they reap applause;
Each on himself determines to rely,
Be Yates disbanded, and let Elliot fly.
Never did play'rs so well an author fit,
To nature dead, and foes declar'd to wit.

So loud each tongue, so empty was each head
So much they talk, so very little said,
So wond'rous dull, and yet so wondrous vain,
At once so willing, and unfit to reign,
That reason swore, nor would the oath recal.
Their mighty master's soul inform'd them all.

As one with various disappointments sad,
Whom dullness only kept from being mad,
Apart from all the rest great Murphy came—
Common to fools and wits, the rage of fame.
What though the sons of nonsense hail him fire,
AUDITOR, AUTHOR, MANAGER, and 'SQUIRE,
His restless soul's ambition stops not there,
To make his triumphs perfect, dub him PLAYER.

In person tall, a figure form'd to please,
If symmetry could charm, depriv'd of ease;
When motionless he stands, we all approve;
What pity 'tis the thing was made to move.

His voice, in one dull, deep, unvaried sound,
Seems to break forth from caverns under ground.
From hollow chest the low sepulchral note
Unwilling heaves, and struggles in his throat.

Could authors butcher'd give an actor grace,
All must to him resign the foremost place.
When he attempts, in some one fav'rite part,
To ape the feelings of a manly heart,
His honest features the disguise defy,
And his face loudly gives his tongue the lie.

Still in extremes, he knows no happy mean,
Or raving mad, or stupidly serene.
In cold-wrought scenes the lifeless actor flags,
In passion tears the passion into rags.
Can none remember?—Yes—I know all must—
When in the Moor he ground his teeth to dust,
When o'er the stage he folly's standard bore,
Whilst common-sense stood trembling at the door.

How few are found with real talents blest'd,
Fewer with nature's gifts contented rest.
Man from his sphere eccentric starts astray;
All hunt for fame; but most mistake the way.
Bred at St. Omer's to the shuffling trade,
The hopeful youth a Jesuit might have made,
With various readings stor'd his empty skull,
Learn'd without sense, and venerably dull;
Or, at some banker's desk, like many more,
Content to tell that two and two make four,
His name had stood in city annals fair,
And prudent dullness mark'd him for a mayor.

What then could tempt thee, in a critic age,
Such blooming hopes to forfeit on a stage?
Could it be worth thy wond'rous waste of pains
To publish to the world thy lack of brains?
Or might not reason ev'n to thee have shown
Thy greatest praise had been to live unknown?
Yet let not vanity like thine despair:
Fortune makes folly her peculiar care.

A vacant throne high-plac'd in Smithfield view,
To sacred dullness and her first-born due,
Thither with haste in happy hour repair,
Thy birth-right claim, nor fear a rival there.
Shuter himself shall own thy juster claim,
And venal ledgers puff their Murphy's name,
Whilst Vaughan * or Dapper, call him what you
will,
Shall blow the trumpet and give out the bill.

There rules secure from critics and from sense,
Nor once shall genius rise to give offence;
Eternal peace shall bless the happy shore,
And little factions break thy rest no more.

From Covent-Garden crowds promiscuous go,
Whom the muse knows not, nor desires to know.
Vet'rans they seem'd, but knew of arms no more
Than if, till that time, arms they never bore,
Like Westminster militia train'd to fight,
They scarcely knew the left hand from the right.
Aflam'd among such troops to show the head,
Their chiefs were scatter'd, and their heroes fled.

Sparks at his glass sat comfortably down [frown;
To separate frown from smile, and smile from
Smith, the genteel, the airy, and the smart,
Smith was just gone to school to say his part;
Rofs (a misfortune which we often meet)
Was fast asleep at dear Statira's feet;
Statira, with her hero to agree,
Stood on her feet as fast asleep as he;
Macklin, who largely deals in half-form'd founds,
Who wantonly transgresses nature's bounds,
Whose acting's hard, affected, and constrain'd,
Whose features, as each other they disdain'd,
At variance set, inflexible and coarse,
Ne'er know the working of united force,
Ne'er kindly soften to each other's aid,
Nor show the mingled pow'rs of light and shade,
No longer for a thankless stage concern'd,
To worthier thoughts his mighty genius turn'd,
Harangu'd, gave lectures, made each simple elf
Almost as good a speaker as himself;
Whilst the whole town, mad with mistaken zeal,
An awkward rage for elocution feel;

* A gentleman who published at this juncture, a poem intitled "The Retort."

Dull cits and grave divines his praise proclaim,
And join with Sheridan's their Macklin's name;
Shuter, who never car'd a single pin
Whether he left out nonsense, or put in
Who aim'd at wit though levell'd in the dark,
The random arrow seldom hit the mark,
At Islington, all by the placid stream
Where city swains in lap of dullness dream,
Where, quiet as her strains their strains do flow,
That all the patron by the bards may know,
Secret as night, with Rolt's experienc'd aid,
The plan of future operations laid,
Projected schemes the summer months to cheer,
And spin out happy folly through the year. [fled,

But think not though these dastard-chiefs are
That Covent-Garden troops shall want a head:
Harlequin comes their chief!—See from afar,
The hero seated in fantastic car!

Wedded to novelty, his only arms
Are wooden swords, wands, talisman's, and charms;
On one side folly sits, by some call'd fun,
And on the other, his arch patron, Lun.
Behind, for liberty athirst in vain,
Sense, helpless captive, drags the galling chain.
Six rude misshapen beasts the chariot draw,
Whom reason lothes, and nature never saw;
Monsters with tails of ice and heads of fire;
Gorgons, and Hydras, and chimeras dire.
Each was bestrode by full as monstrous wight,
Giant, dwarf, genius, elf, hermaphrodite.
The town, as usual, met him in full cry;
The town, as usual, knew no reason why.
But fashion so directs, and moderns raise
On fashion's mould'ring base their transient praise.

Next to the field a band of females draw
Their force; for Britain owns no salique law:
Just to their worth, we female rights admit,
Nor bar their claim to empire or to wit.

First, giggling, plotting chamber-maids arrive,
Hoydens and romps led on by Gen'ral Clive.
In spite of outward blemishes, she shone
For humour fam'd, and humour all her own.
Easy, as if at home, the stage she trod,
Nor sought the critics praise, nor fear'd his rod.
Original in spirit and in ease,
She pleas'd by hiding all attempts to please.
No comic actresses ever yet could raise,
On humour's base, more merit or more praise.

With all the native vigour of sixteen,
Among the merry troop conspicuous seen,
See lively Pope advance in jig and trip,
Corinna, Cherry, Honeycomb, and Snip.
Not without art, but yet to nature true,
She charms the town with humour just, yet new.
Cheer'd by her promise, we the less deplore
The fatal time when Clive shall be no more.

Lo! Vincent comes—with simple grace array'd,
She laughs at paltry arts, and scorns parade.
Nature through her is by reflection shown,
Whilst Gay once more knows Polly for his own.

Talk not to me of diffidence and fear—
I see it all, but must forgive it here.
Defects like these which modest terrors cause,
From impudence itself extort applause.
Candour and reason still take virtue's part;
We love ev'n by foibles in so good an heart.

Let Tommy Arne, with usual pomp of style,
 Whose chief, whose only merit's to compile,
 Who meanly pilfering here and there a bit,
 Deals music out as Murphy deals out wit,
 Publish proposals, laws for taste prescribe,
 And chaunt the praise of an Italian tribe;
 Let him reverse kind nature's first decrees,
 And teach ev'n Brent a method not to please;
 But never shall a truly British age
 Bear a vile race of eunuchs on the stage.
 The boasted work's call'd national in vain,
 If one Italian voice pollutes the strain.
 Where tyrants rule, and slaves with joy obey,
 Let slavish minstrels pour th' enervate lay;
 To Britons far more noble pleasures spring,
 In native notes whilst Beard and Vincent sing.

Might figure give a title unto fame,
 What rival should with Yates dispute her claim;
 But justice may not partial trophies raise,
 Nor sink the actress in the woman's praise.
 Still hand in hand her words and actions go,
 And the heart feels more than the features show:
 For through the regions of that beauteous face,
 We no variety of passions trace:
 Dead to the soft emotions of the heart,
 No kindred softness can those eyes impart;
 The brow, still fix'd on sorrow's sullen frame,
 Void of distinction, marks all parts the same.

What's a fine person, or a beauteous face,
 Unless deportment gives them decent grace?
 Bless'd with all other requisites to please,
 Some want the striking elegance of ease;
 The curious eye their awkward movement tires;
 They seem like puppets led about by wires.
 Others, like statues, in one posture still,
 Give great ideas of the workman's skill;
 Wond'ring, his art we praise the more we view,
 And only grieve he gave not motion too.
 Weak of themselves are what we beauties call,
 It is the manner which gives strength to all.
 This teaches ev'ry beauty to unite,
 And brings them forward in the noblest light.
 Happy in this, behold, amidst the throng,
 With transient gleam of grace, Hart sweeps along.

If all the wonders of external grace,
 A person finely turn'd, a mould of face,
 Where, union rare, expression's lively force
 With beauty's softest magic holds discourse,
 Attract the eye; if feelings void of art,
 Rouse the quick passions, and enflame the heart;
 If music sweetly breathing from the tongue,
 Captives the ear, Bride must not pass unsung.

When fear, which rank ill-nature terms conceit,
 By time and custom conquer'd, shall retreat;
 When judgment tutor'd by experience sage,
 Shall shoot abroad and gather strength from age;
 When Heav'n in mercy shall the stage release
 From the dull slumbers of a still-life piece;
 When some stale flow'r, disgraceful to the walk,
 Which long hath hung, though wither'd on the stalk,
 Shall kindly drop, then Bride shall make her way,
 And merit find a passage to the day;
 Brought into action, she at once shall raise
 Her own renown, and justify our praise.

Form'd for the tragic scene, to grace the stage,
 With rival excellence of love and rage,
 Mistress of each soft art, with matchless skill
 To turn and wind the passions as she will;
 To melt the heart with sympathetic woe,
 Awake the sigh, and teach the tear to flow;
 To put on frenzy's wild distracted glare,
 And freeze the soul with horror and despair;
 With just desert enroll'd in endless fame,
 Conscious of worth superior, Cibber came.

When poor Alicia's madd'ning brains are rack'd,
 And strongly imag'd griefs her mind distract;
 Struck with her grief, I catch the madness too!
 My brain turns round, the headless trunk I view!
 The roof cracks, shakes and falls!—New horrors
 rise,

And reason buried in the ruin lies.

Nobly disdainful of each slavish art,
 She makes her first attack upon the heart;
 Pleas'd with the summons, it receives her laws,
 And all is silence, sympathy, applause.

But when, by fond ambition drawn aside,
 Giddy with praise, and puff'd with female pride,
 She quits the tragic scene, and, in pretence
 To comic merit, breaks down nature's fence;
 I scarcely can believe my ears or eyes,
 Or find out Cibber through the dark disguise.

Pritchard, by nature for the stage design'd,
 In person graceful, and in sense refin'd;
 Her art as much as nature's friend became,
 Her voice as free from blemish as her fame.
 Who knows so well in majesty to please,
 Attemper'd with the graceful charms of ease?

When Congreve's favour'd pantomime to grace,
 She comes a captive queen of Moorish race;
 When love, hate, jealousy, despair and rage,
 With wildest tumults in her breast engage;
 Still equal to herself is Zara seen;
 Her passions are the passions of a queen.

When she to murder whets the timorous thane,
 I feel ambition rush through ev'ry vein;
 Persuasion hangs upon her daring tongue,
 My heart grows flint, and ev'ry nerve's new strung.

In comedy—"Nay, there," cries critic, "hold,
 "Pritchard's for comedy too fat and old.

"Who can, with patience, bear the gray co-
 "quette,

"Or force a laugh with overgrown Juliet?

"Her speech, look, action, humour, all are just;

"But then, her age and figure give disgust."

Are foibles then, and graces of the mind,
 In real life, to size or age confin'd?

Do spirits flow, and is good-breeding plac'd
 In any set circumference of waist?

As we grow old, doth affectation cease,
 Or gives not age new vigour to caprice?

If in originals these things appear,
 Why should we bar them in the copy here?

The nice punctilio-mongers of this age,
 The grand minute reformers of the stage,
 Slaves to propriety of ev'ry kind,
 Some standard-measure for each part should find
 Which when the best of actors shall exceed,
 Let it devolve to one of smaller breed.

All actors too upon the back should bear
Certificate of birth;—time, when;—place, where.
For how can critics rightly fix their worth,
Unless they know the minute of their birth?
An audience too, deceiv'd, may find too late
That they have clapp'd an actor out of date.

Figure, I own, at first may give offence,
And harshly strike the eye's too curious sense:
But when perfections of the mind break forth,
Humour's chaste sallies, judgment's solid worth:
When the pure genuine flame, by nature taught,
Springs into sense, and ev'ry action's thought;
Before such merit all objections fly;
Pritchard's genteel, and Garrick's six feet high.

Oft have I Pritchard, seen thy wond'rous skill,
Confess'd thee great, but find thee greater still
That worth, which shone in scatter'd rays before.
Collected now, breaks forth with double pow'r.
The jealous wife! on that thy trophies raise,
Inferior only to the author's praise.

From Dublin, fam'd in legends of romance
For mighty magic of enchanted lance,
With which her heroes arm'd victorious prove,
And like a flood rush o'er the land of love,
Mossop and Barry came—names ne'er design'd
By fate in the same sentence to be join'd.
Rais'd by the breath of popular acclaim,
They mounted to the pinnacle of fame;
There the weak brain, made giddy with the height,
Spurr'd on the rival chiefs to mortal fight.
Thus sportive boys, around some basin's brim,
Behold the pipe-drawn bladders circling swim:
But if from lungs more potent, there arise
Two bubbles of a more than common size,
Eager for honour they for fight prepare,
Bubble meets bubble, and both sink to air.

Mossop, attach'd to military plan,
Still kept his eye fix'd on his right-hand man.
Whilst the mouth measures words with seeming
skill,
The right hand labours, and the left lies still;
For he resolv'd on scripture-grounds to go,
What the right doth, the left-hand shall not know.
With studied impropriety of speech,
He soars beyond the hackney critic's reach;
To epithets allots emphatic state,
Whilst principals, ungrac'd, like lacquies wait;
In ways first trodden by himself excels,
And stands alone in indeclinables;
Conjunction, preposition, adverb join
To stamp new vigour on the nervous line:
In monosyllables his thunders roll,
He, SHE, IT, AND, WE, YE, THEY, fright the soul.

In person taller than the common size,
Behold where Barry draws admiring eyes!
When lab'ring passions, in his bosom pent,
Convulsive rage, and struggling heave for vent;
Spectators, with imagin'd terrors warm,
Anxious expect the bursting of the storm:
But all unfit in such a pile to dwell,
His voice comes forth, like Echo from her cell;
To swell the tempest needful aid denies,
And all a-down the stage in feeble murmurs dies.

What man, like Barry, with such pains, can err
In elocution, action, character?

What man could give, if Barry was not here,
Such well-applauded tenderness to Lear?
Who else can speak so very, very fine,
That sense may kindly end with ev'ry line?

Some dozen lines before the ghost is there,
Behold him for the solemn scene prepare.
See how he frames his eyes, poises each limb,
Puts the whole body into proper trim.— [art,
From whence we learn, with no great stretch of Five lines hence comes a ghost, and, ha! a start.

When he appears most perfect, still we find
Something which jars upon, and hurts the mind.
Whatever lights upon a part are thrown,
We see too plainly they are not his own.
No flame from nature ever yet he caught;
Nor knew a feeling which he was not taught;
He rais'd his trophies on the base of art,
And conn'd his passions, as he conn'd his part.

Quin, from afar, lur'd by the scent of fame,
A stage Leviathan, put in his claim,
Pupil of Betterton and Booth. Alone,
Sullen he walk'd, and deem'd the chair his own.
For how should moderns, mushrooms of the day,
Who ne'er those masters knew, know how to play?
Gray-bearded vet'rans, who, with partial tongue,
Extol the times when they themselves were young;
Who having lost all relish for the stage,
See not their own defects, but lash the age,
Receiv'd with joyful murmurs of applause,
Their darling chief, and lin'd his favourite cause.

Far be it from the candid muse to tread
Insulting o'er the ashes of the dead,
But, just to living merit, she maintains,
And dares the test, whilst Garrick's genius reigns;
Ancients in vain endeavour to excel,
Happily prais'd, if they could act as well.
But though prescription's force we disallow,
Nor to antiquity submissive bow;
Though we deny imaginary grace,
Founded on accidents of time and place;
Yet real worth of ev'ry growth shall bear
Due praise, nor must we, Quin, forget thee there.

His words bore sterling weight, nervous and strong
In manly tides of sense they roll'd along.
Happy in art, he chiefly had pretence
To keep up numbers, yet not forfeit sense.
No actor ever greater heights could reach
In all the labour'd artifice of speech.

Speech! Is that all?—And shall an actor sound
An universal fame on partial ground?
Parrots themselves speak properly by rote,
And, in six months, my dog shall howl by note.
I laugh at those, who, when the stage they tread,
Neglect the heart, to compliment the head;
With strict propriety their care's confin'd
To weigh out words, while passion halts behind.
To syllable-difflectors they appeal,
Allow them accent, cadence,—fools may feel;
But, spite of all the criticising elves, [selves.
Those who would make us feel, must feel them—

His eyes, in gloomy socket taught to roll,
Proclaim'd the sullen habit of his soul.
Heavy and phlegmatic he trod the stage,
Too proud for tenderness, too dull for rage.

When Hector's lovely widow shines in tears,
Or Rowe's gay rake dependant virtue jeers,
With the same cast of features he is seen
To chide the libertine, and court the queen.
From the same scene, which without passion flows,
With just desert his reputation rose;
Nor less he pleas'd, when, on some surly plan,
He was, at once, the actor and the man.

In Brute he shone unequal'd: all agree
Garrick's not half so great a brute as he.
When Cato's labour'd scenes are brought to view,
With equal praise the actor labour'd too;
For still you'll find, trace passions to their root,
Small difference 'twixt the stoic and the brute.
In fancied scenes, as in life's real plan,
He could not, for a moment, sink the man.
In whate'er cast his character was laid,
Self still, like oil, upon the surface play'd.
Nature, in spite of all his skill, crept in:
Horatio, Dorax, Falstaff,—still 'twas Quin.

Next follows Sheridan—a doubtful name,
As yet unsettled in the rank of fame.
This, fondly lavish in his praises grown,
Gives him all merit: That allows him none.
Between them both we'll steer the middle course,
Nor, loving praise, rob judgment of her force.

Just his conceptions, natural and great:
His feelings strong, his words enforc'd with weight.

Was speech-fam'd Quin himself to hear him speak,

Envy would drive the colour from his cheek:
But step-dame nature, niggard of her grace,
Deny'd the social pow'rs of voice and face.
Fix'd in one frame of features, glare of eye,
Passions, like chaos, in confusion lie:
In vain the wonders of his skill are try'd
To form distinctions nature hath deny'd.
His voice no touch of harmony admits,
Irregularly deep and shrill by fits:
The two extremes appear like man and wife,
Coupled together for the sake of strife.

His action's always strong, but sometimes such,
That candour must declare he acts too much.
Why must impatience fall three paces back?
Why paces three return to the attack?
Why is the right-leg too forbid to stir,
Unless in motion semicircular?
Why must the hero with the nailor vie,
And hurl the close-clench'd fist at nose or eye?
In royal John, with Philip angry grown,
I thought he would have knock'd poor Davies down.

Inhuman tyrant! was it not a shame,
To fright a king so harmless and so tame,
But, spite of all defects, his glories rise;
And art, by judgment form'd, with nature vies:
Behold him sound the depth of Hubert's soul,
Whilst in his own contending passions roll;
View the whole scene, with critic judgment scan,
And then deny him merit if you can.
Where he falls short, 'tis nature's fault alone;
Where he succeeds, the merit's all his own.

Last Garrick came.—Behind him throng a train
Of snarling critics, ignorant as vain.

VOL. X.

One finds out,—“He's of stature somewhat “low,—

“Your hero always should be tall, you know.—
“True nat'ral greatness all consists in height.”
Produce your voucher, critic.—“Sergeant Kite.”
Another can't forgive the paltry arts
By which he makes his way to shallow hearts;
Mere pieces of finesse, traps for applause—
“Avaunt, unnat'ral start, affected pause.”

For me, by nature form'd to judge with phlegm,
I can't acquit by wholesale, nor condemn.
The best things carried to excess are wrong:
The start may be too frequent, pause too long;
But, only us'd in proper time and place,
Severest judgment must allow them grace.

If bunglers, form'd on imitation's plan,
Just in the way that monkeys mimic man,
Their copied scene with mangled arts disgrace,
And pause and start with the same vacant face;
We join the critic laugh; those tricks we scorn,
Which spoil the scenes they mean them to adorn.
But when, from nature's pure and genuine source,
These strokes of acting flow with gen'rous force,
When in the features all the soul's pourtray'd,
And passions, such as Garrick's, are display'd,
To me they seem from quickest feelings caught:
Each start is nature; and each pause is thought.

When reason yields to passion's wild alarms,
And the whole state of man is up in arms;
What but a critic could condemn the play'r,
For pausing here, when cool sense pauses there?
Whilst, working from the heart, the fire I trace,
And mark it strongly flaming to the face;
Whilst, in each sound, I hear the very man;
I can't catch words, and pity those who can.

Let wits, like spiders, from the tortur'd brain
Fine-draw the critic-web with curious pain;
The gods,—a kindness I with thanks must pay,—
Have form'd me of a coarser kind of clay;
Nor stung with envy, nor with spleen diseas'd,
A poor dull creature, still with nature pleas'd;
Hence to thy praises, Garrick, I agree,
And, pleas'd with nature, must be pleas'd with thee.

Now might I tell, how silence reign'd through-
And deep attention hush'd the rabble rout!
How ev'ry claimant, tortur'd with desire,
Was pale as ashes, or as red as fire:
But, loose to fame, the muse more simply acts,
Rejects all flourish, and relates mere facts.

The judges, as the several parties came, [claim,
With temper heard, with judgment weigh'd each
And, in their sentence happily agreed,
In name of both, great Shakspeare thus decreed:

“If manly sense; if nature link'd with art;
“If thorough knowledge of the human heart;
“If pow'rs of acting vast and unconfin'd;
“If fewest faults with greatest beauties join'd;
“If strong expression, and strange pow'rs which “Within the magic circle of the eye; [lie
“If feelings which few hearts, like his, can know,
“And which no face so well as his can show;
“Deserve the pref'rence;—Garrick, take the “chair;

Nor quit it---till thou place an equal there.”

THE APOLOGY.

Addressed to the Critical Reviewers.

LAUGHS not the heart, when giants, big with pride,

Assume the pompous port, the martial stride :
O'er arm Herculean heave th' enormous shield,
Vast as a weaver's beam the javelin wield ;
With the loud voice of thund'ring Jove defy,
And dare to single combat--What!--A fly.

And laugh we less, when giant names, which shine

Establish'd, as it were, by right divine ;
Critics, whom ev'ry captive art adores,
To whom glad science pours forth all her stores ;
Who high in letter'd reputation sit,
And hold, Astræa-like, the scales of wit ;
With partial rage rush forth,--Oh ! shame to tell !
To crush a bard just bursting from the shell ?

Great are his perils in this stormy time
Who rashly ventures on a sea of rhyme.

Around vast surges roll, winds envious blow,
And jealous rocks and quicksands lurk below :
Greatly his foes he dreads, but more his friends ;
He hurts me most who lavishly commends.

Look through the world--in ev'ry other trade
The same employment's cause of kindness made,
At least appearance of good-will creates,
And ev'ry fool puffs off the fool he hates.
Cobblers with cobblers smoke away the night,
And in the common cause e'en play'rs unite.
Authors alone, with more than savage rage,
Unnat'ral war with brother-authors wage.
The pride of nature would as soon admit
Competitors in empire as in wit :
Onward they rush at fame's imperious call,
And, less than greatest, would not be at all.

Smit with the love of honour,--or the pence,
O'er-run with wit, and destitute of sense,
Should any novice in the rhyming trade
With lawless pen the realms of verse invade ;
Forth from the court, where sceptred sages sit,
Abus'd with praise, and flatter'd into wit ;
Where in lethargic majesty they reign,
And what they won by dullness, still maintain ;
Legions of factious authors throng at once ;
Fool beckons fool, and dunce awakens dunce.
To Hamilton's * the ready lies repair ;--
Ne'er was lie made which was not welcome
there--

Thence, on maturer judgment's anvil wrought,
The polish'd falsehood's into public brought.
Quick-circulating slanders mirth afford,
And reputation bleeds in ev'ry word.

A critic was of old a glorious name,
Whose sanction handed merit up to fame ;
Beauties as well as faults he brought to view :
His judgment great, and great his candour too.
No servile rules drew sickly taste aside ;
Secure he walk'd, for nature was his guide.
But now, Oh strange reverse ! our critics bawl
In praise of candour with a heart of gall.

* Printer of the Critical Review.

Conscious of guilt, and fearful of the light,
They lurk enshrouded in the veil of night ;
Safe from detection, seize th' unwary prey,
And stab, like bravoës, all who come that way.

When first my muse, perhaps more bold than wise,

Bade the rude trifle into light arise,
Little she thought such tempests would ensue ;
Less, that those tempests would be rais'd by you.
The thunder's fury rends the tow'ring oak ;
Rosciads, like shrubs, might 'scape the fatal stroke.
Vain thought ! a critic's fury knows no bound ;
Drawcanfir-like, he deals destruction round ;
Nor can we hope he will a stranger spare,
Who gives no quarter to his friend Voltaire.

Unhappy genius ! plac'd by partial fate
With a free spirit in a slavish state ;
Where the reluctant muse, oppress'd by kings,
Or droops in silence, or in fetters sings ;
In vain thy dauntless fortitude hath borne
The bigot's furious zeal, and tyrant's scorn.
Why didst thou safe from home-bred dangers
steer,

Reserv'd to perish more ignobly here ?
Thus, when the Julian tyrant's pride to swell
Rome with her Pompey at Pharsalia fell,
The vanquish'd chief escap'd from Cæsar's hand
To die by ruffians in a foreign land.

How could these self-elected monarchs raise
So large an empire on so small a base ?
In what retreat, inglorious and unknown,
Did genius sleep, when dullness seiz'd the throne ?
Whence, absolute now grown, and free from awe,
She to the subject world dispenses law.
Without her licence not a letter stirs,
And all the captive criss-cross-row is her's.
The Stagyrite, who rules from nature drew,
Opinions gave, but gave his reasons too.
Our great dictators take a shorter way--
Who shall dispute what the reviewers say ?
Their word's sufficient ; and to ask a reason,
In such a state as theirs, is downright treason.
True judgment now with them alone can dwell ;
Like Church of Rome, they're grown infallible.
Dull superstitious readers they deceive,
Who pin their easy faith on critic's sleeve,
And, knowing nothing, ev'ry thing believe !
But why repine we, that these puny elves
Shoot into giants ?--We may thank ourselves ;
Fools that we are, like Israel's fools of yore,
The calf ourselves have fashion'd we adore.
But let true reason once resume her reign,
This god shall dwindle to a calf again.

Founded on arts which shun the face of day,
By the same arts they still maintain their sway,
Wrapp'd in mysterious secrecy they rise,
And, as they are unknown, are safe and wise.
At whomsoever aim'd, howe'er severe
Th' envenom'd slander flies, no names appear.
Prudence forbids that step.--Then all might know
And on more equal terms engage the foe.
But now, what Quixote of the age would care
To wage a war with dirt, and fight with air ?

By int'rest join'd th' expert confederates stand,
And play the game into each other's hand.

The vile abuse, in turn by all deny'd,
Is bandy'd up and down from side to side :
It flies---hey !---presto !---like a juggler's ball,
'Till it belongs to nobody at all. [known,

All men and things they know, themselves un-
And publish ev'ry name-- except their own.

Nor think this strange--secure from vulgar eyes
The nameless author passes in disguise.

But vet'ran critics are not so deceiv'd,

If vet'ran critics are to be believ'd.

Once seen, they know an author evermore,

Nay swear to hands they never saw before.

Thus in the Rosciad, beyond chance or doubt,

They, by the writing, found the writers out.

" That's Lloyd's---his manner there you plainly
" trace,

" And all the actor stares you in the face.

" By Colman that was written.---On my life,

" The strongest symptoms of the Jealous Wife.

" That little disingenuous piece of spite,

" Churchill, a wretch unknown, perhaps might
" write."

How doth it make judicious readers smile,

When authors are detected by their style :

Though ev'ry one who knows this author, knows

He shifts his style much oft'ner than his clothes ?

Whence could arise this mighty critic spleen,

The muse a trifier, and her theme so mean ?

What had I done, that angry heav'n should send

The bitt'rest foe where most I wish'd a friend ?

Oft hath my tongue been wanton at thy name,

And hail'd the honours of thy matchless fame.

For me let hoary Fielding bite the ground,

So nobler Pickle stands superbly bound.

From Livy's temples tear th' historic crown,

Which with more justice blooms upon thine own.

Compar'd with thee, be all life-writers dumb,

But he who wrote the life of Tommy Thumb.

Who ever read the Regicide, but swore

The author wrote as man ne'er wrote before ?

Others for plots and under-plots may call,

Here's the right method---have no plot at all.

Who can so often in his cause engage

The tiny pathos of the Grecian stage,

Whilst horrors rise, and tears spontaneous flow,

At tragic Ha ! and no less tragic Oh !

To praise his nervous weakness all agree ;

And then for sweetness, who so sweet as he !

Too big for utterance when sorrows swell,

The too big sorrows flowing tears must tell :

But when those flowing tears shall cease to flow,

Why---then the voice must speak again, you
know.

Rude and unskilful in the poet's trade,

I kept no Naiads by me ready-made ;

Ne'er did I colours high in air advance,

Torn from the bleeding fopperies of France ;

No flimsy linsley-woolsey scenes I wrote,

With patches here and there like Joseph's coat.

Me humbler themes besit : Secure, for me,

Let playwrights smuggle nonsense, duty free :

Secure for me, ye lambs, ye lambkins bound,

And frisk, and frolic o'er the fairy ground :

Secure, for me, thou pretty little fawn,

Lick Sylvia's hand, and crop the flow'ry lawn :

Uncensur'd let the gentle breezes rove
Through the green umbrage of th' enchanted
grove :

Secure, for me, let foppish nature smile,

And play the coxcomb in the desert isle.

The stage I chose---a subject fair and free---
'Tis yours---'tis mine---'tis public property.

All common exhibitions open lie

For praise or censure to the common eye.

Hence are a thousand hackney writers fed ;

Hence monthly critics earn their daily bread.

This is a gen'ral tax which all must pay,

From those who scribble, down to those who play.

Actors, a venal crew, receive support

From public bounty, for the public sport.

To clap or hiss, all have an equal claim,

The cobbler's and his lordship's right the same.

All join for their subsistence ; all expect [rect.

Free leave to praise their worth, their faults cor-

When active Pickle Smithfield stage ascends,

The three days wonder of his laughing friends ;

Each, or as judgment, or as fancy guides,

The lively witling praises or derides.

And where's the mighty diff'rence, tell me where,

Betwixt a merry-Andrew and a player ?

The strolling tribe, a despicable race,

Like wand'ring Arabs, shift from place to place.

Vagrants by law, to justice open laid,

They tremble, of the beadle's lash afraid,

And fawning cringe, for wretched means of life,

To madam mayorefs, or his worship's wife.

The mighty monarch, in theatric sack,

Carries his whole regalia at his back ;

His royal consort heads the female band,

And leads the heir apparent in her hand ;

The pannier'd ass creeps on with conscious pride,

Bearing a future prince on either side.

No choice musicians in this troop are found

To varnish nonsense with the charms of sound ;

No swords, no daggers, not one poison'd bowl ;

No lightning flashes here, no thunders roll ;

No guards to swell the monarch's train are shown ;

The monarch here must be a host alone.

No solemn pomp, no slow processions here ;

No Ammon's entry, and no Juliet's bier.

By need compell'd to prostitute his art,

The varied actor flies from part to part ;

And, strange disgrace to all theatric pride !

His character is shifted with his side.

Question and answer he by turns must be,

Like that small wit * in modern tragedy ;

Who, to patch up his fame,---or fill his purse,---

Still pilfers wretched plans, and makes them worse ;

Like gipsies, lest the stolen brat be known,

Defacing first, then claiming for his own.

In shabby state they strut, and tatter'd robe ;

The scene a blanket, and a barn the globe.

No high conceits their mod'rate wishes raise,

Content with humble profit, humble praise.

Let dowdies simper, and let bumpkins stare,

The strolling pageant hero treads in air :

Pleas'd for his hour, he to mankind gives law,

And snores the next out on a truss of straw.

But if kind fortune, who we sometimes know
Can take a hero from a puppet-show,
In mood propitious should her fav'rite call
On royal stage in royal pomp to bawl,
Forgetful of himself he rears the head,
And scorns the dunghill where he first was bred.
Conversing now with well-dress'd kings and queens,

With gods and goddesses behind the scenes,
He sweats beneath the terror-nodding plume,
Taught by mock honours real pride t' assume.
On this great stage the world, no monarch e'er
Was half so haughty as a monarch play'r.

Doth it more move our anger or our mirth,
To see these things, the lowest sons of earth,
Presume, with self-sufficient knowledge grac'd,
To rule in letters, and preside in taste?
The town's decisions they no more admit,
Themselves alone the arbiters of wit;
And scorn the jurisdiction of that court,
To which they owe their being and support.
Actors, like monks of old, now sacred grown,
Must be attack'd by no fools but their own.

Let the vain tyrant sit amidst his guards,
His puny Green-room wits and venal bards,
Who meanly tremble at the puppet's frown,
And for a playhouse-freedom lose their own;
In spite of new-made laws, and new-made kings,
The free-born muse with lib'ral spirit sings,
Bow down, ye slaves; before these idols fall;
Let genius stoop to them who've none at all;
Ne'er will I flatter, cringe, or bend the knee
To those who, slaves to all, are slaves to me.

Actors, as actors, are a lawful game;
The poet's right, and who shall bar his claim?
And if, o'erweening of their little skill,
When they have left the stage, they're actors still;
If to the subject world they still give laws,
With paper crowns, and sceptres made of straws;
If they in cellar or in garret roar,
And kings one night, are kings for evermore;
Shall not bold truth, e'en there, pursue her theme,
And 'wake the coxcomb from his golden dream?
Or if, well worthy of a better fate,
They rise superior to their present state;
If, with each social virtue grac'd, they blend
The gay companion and the faithful friend;
If they, like Pritchard, join in private life
The tender parent and the virtuous wife;
Shall not our verse their praise with pleasure
speak,

Though mimics bark, and envy splits her cheek;
No honest worth's beneath the muse's praise;
No greatness can above her censure raise;
Station and wealth to her are trifling things;
She stoops to actors, and she soars to kings.

Is there a man, in vice and folly bred,
To sense of honour as to virtue dead;
Whom ties nor human, nor divine, can bind;
Alien to God, and foe to all mankind;
Who spares no character; whose ev'ry word,
Bitter as gall, and sharper than the sword,
Cuts to the quick; whose thoughts with rancour
swell;

Whose tongue, on earth, performs the work of

If there be such a monster, the Reviews

Shall find him holding forth against abuse.

"Attack profession!---'tis a deadly breach!--"

"The Christian laws another lesson teach:---"

"Unto the end shall charity endure,

"And candour hide those faults it cannot cure."

Thus candour's maxims flow from rancour's
throat,

As devils, to serve their purpose, scripture quote.

The muse's office was by Heav'n design'd

To please, improve, instruct, reform mankind;

To make dejected virtue nobly rise

Above the tow'ring pitch of splendid vice;

To make pale vice, abash'd, her head hang down,

And trembling crouch at virtue's awful frown.

Now arm'd with wrath, she bids eternal shame,

With strictest justice, brand the villain's name:

Now in the milder garb of ridicule

She sports, and pleases while she wounds the fool.

Her shape is often varied; but her aim,

To prop the cause of virtue, still the same.

In praise of mercy let the guilty bawl,

When vice and folly for correction call,

Silence the mark of weakness justly bears,

And is partaker of the crimes it spares.

But if the muse, too cruel in her mirth,

With harsh reflections wounds the man of worth;

If wantonly she deviates from her plan,

And quits the actor to expose the man;

Asham'd, she marks that passage with a blot,

And hates the line where candour was forgot.

But what is candour, what is humour's vein,

Though judgment join to consecrate the strain,

If curious numbers will not aid afford,

Nor choicest music play in ev'ry word?

Verses must run, to charm a modern ear,

From all harsh, rugged interruptions clear.

Soft let them breathe, as zephyr's balmy breeze;

Smooth let their current flow, as summer seas;

Perfect then only deem'd when they dispense

A happy tuneful vacancy of sense.

Italian fathers thus, with barb'rous rage,

Fit helpless infants for the squeaking stage;

Deaf to the calls of pity, nature wound,

And mangle vigour for the sake of sound.

Henceforth farewell then sev'rish thirst of fame;

Farewel the longings for a poet's name;

Perish my muse;---a wish 'bove all severe

To him who ever held the muses dear---

If e'er her labours weaken to refine

The gen'rous roughness of a nervous line.

Others affect the stiff and swelling phrase;

Their muse must walk in stilts, and strut in stays:

The sense they murder, and the words transpose,

Lest poetry approach too near to prose.

See tortur'd reason how they pare and trim,

And, like Procrustes, stretch, or lop the limb.

Waller, whose praise succeeding bards rehearse,

Parent of harmony in English verse,

Whose tuneful muse in sweetest accents flows,

In couplets first taught straggling sense to close.

In polish'd numbers, and majestic sound,

Where shall thy rival, Pope, be ever found?

But whilst each line with equal beauty flows,

E'en excellence, unvaried, tedious grows,

Nature, through all her works, in great degree,
Borrows a blessing from variety.

Musick itself her needful aid requires
To rouse the soul, and wake our dying fires.
Still in one key, the nightingale would teize :
Still in one key, nor Brent would always please.

Here let me bend, great Dryden, at thy shrine,
Thou dearest name to all the tuneful nine.
What if some dull lines in cold order creep,
And with his theme the poet seems to sleep,
Still, when his subject rises proud to view,
With equal strength the poet rises too.
With strong invention, noblest vigour fraught,
Thought still springs up and rises out of thought ;
Numbers ennobling numbers in their course ;
In varied sweetness flow, in varied force ;
The pow'rs of genius and of judgment join,
And the whole art of poetry is thine.

But what are numbers, what are bards to me,
Forbid to tread the paths of poesy ?

" A sacred muse should consecrate her pen ;
" Priests must not hear nor see like other men ;
" Far higher themes should her ambition claim ;
" Behold where Sternhold points the way to
" fame."

Whilst with mistaken zeal dull bigots burn,
Let reason for a moment take her turn.
When coffee-sages hold discourse with kings,
And blindly walk in paper leading strings,
What if a man delight to pass his time
In spinning reason into harmless rhyme ;
Or sometimes boldly venture to the play !
Say, Where's the crime ?—great man of prudence, say ?

No two on earth in all things can agree ;
All have some darling singularity ;
Women and men, as well as girls and boys,
In gewgaws take delight, and sigh for toys.
Your sceptres, and your crowns, and such like things,

Are but a better kind of toys for kings.
In things indiff'rent reason bids us choose,
Whether the whim's a monkey or a muse.

What the grave triflers on this busy scene,
When they make use of this word reason, mean,
I know not ; but, according to my plan,
'Tis Lord Chief-Justice in the court of man,
Equally form'd to rule in age or youth,
The friend of virtue, and the guide to truth.
To her I bow, whose sacred pow'r I feel ;
To her decision make my last appeal ;
Condemn'd by her, applauding worlds in vain
Should tempt me to take up the pen again :
By her absolv'd, my course I'll still pursue :
If reason's for me, God is for me too.

NIGHT.

AN EPISTLE TO ROBERT LLOYD.

WHEN foes insult, and prudent friends dispense,
In pity's strains, the worst of insolence,
Oft with thee, Lloyd, I steal an hour from grief,
And in thy social converse find relief.
The mind, of solitude impatient grown,
Loves any sorrows rather than her own,

Let slaves to business, bodies without soul,
Important blanks in Nature's mighty roll,
Solemnize nonsense in the day's broad glare,
We night prefer, which heals or hides our care.

Rogues justified, and by success made bold,
Dull fools and coxcombs sanctified by gold,
Freely may bask in fortune's partial ray,
And spread their feathers op'ning to the day ;
But thread-bare merit dares not show the head
Till vain prosperity retires to bed.
Misfortunes, like the owl, avoid the light ;
The sons of care are always sons of night.

The wretch bred up in method's drowsy school,
Whose only merit is to err by rule,
Who ne'er through heat of blood was tripping
caught,

Nor guilty deem'd of one eccentric thought,
Whose soul directed to no use is seen,
Unless to move the body's dull machine,
Which, clock-work like, with the same equal pace,
Still travels on through life's insipid space ;
Turns up his eyes to think that there should be Among God's creatures two such things as we :
Then for his night-cap calls, and thanks the pow'rs
Which kindly gave him grace to keep good hours.

Good hours—Fine words!—But was it ever seen
That all men could agree in what they mean ?
Florio, who many years a course hath run
In downright opposition to the sun,
Expatriates on good hours, their cause defends
With as much vigour as our prudent friends.
Th' uncertain term no settled notion brings,
But still in diff'rent mouths means diff'rent things.
Each takes the phrase in his own private view,
With prudence it is ten, with Florio two.
Go on, ye fools, who talk for talking sake,
Without distinguishing distinctions make,
Shine forth in native folly, native pride,
Make yourselves rules to all the world beside ;
Reason, collected in herself, disdains
The slavish yoke of arbitrary chains ;
Steady and true, each circumstance she weighs,
Nor to bare words inglorious tribute pays.
Men of sense live exempt from vulgar awe,
And reason to herself alone is law.
That freedom she enjoys with lib'ral mind,
Which she as freely grants to all mankind.
No idol titled name her reverence stirs,
No hour she blindly to the rest prefers ;
All are alike, if they're alike employ'd,
And all are good, if virtuously enjoy'd.

Let the sage doctor (think him one we know)
With scraps of ancient learning overflow,
In all the dignity of twig declare
The fatal consequence of midnight air,
How damps and vapours, as it were by stealth,
Undermine life, and sap the walls of health.
For me let Galen moulder on the shelf,
I'll live, and be physician to myself.
While soul is join'd to body, whether fate
Allot a longer or a shorter date,
I'll make them live, as brother should with brother,
And keep them in good humour with each other.
The surest road to health, say what they will,
Is never to suppose we shall be ill.

Most of those evils we poor mortals know,
From doctors and imagination flow.
Hence to old women with your boasted rules,
Stale traps, and only sacred now to fools;
As well may sons of physic hope to find
One med'cine, as one hour, for all mankind.

If Rupert after ten is out of bed,
The fool next morning can't hold up his head.
What reason this which me to bed must call,
Whose head (thank Heaven) never aches at all?
In diff'rent courses diff'rent tempers run,
He hates the moon, I sicken at the sun.
Wound up at twelve at noon, his clock goes right,
Mine better goes, wound up at twelve at night.

Then in oblivion's grateful cup I drown
The galling sneer, the supercilious frown,
The strange reserve, the proud affected state
Of upstart knaves grown rich, and fools grown great.

No more that abject wretch disturbs my rest,
Who meanly overlooks a friend distressed.
Purblind to poverty the worldling goes,
And scarce sees rags an inch beyond his nose;
But from a crowd can single out his grace,
And cringe and creep to fools who strut in lace.

Whether those classic regions are survey'd
Where we in earliest youth together stray'd,
Where hand in hand we trod the flow'ry shore,
Though now thy happier genius runs before,
When we conspir'd a thankless wretch to raise,
And taught a stump to shoot with pilfer'd praise,
Who once for Rev'rend merit famous grown,
Gratefully strove to kick his Maker down;
Or if more gen'ral arguments engage
The court or camp, the pulpit, bar, or stage;
If half-bred surgeons, whom men doctors call,
And lawyers, who were never bred at all,
Those mighty letter'd monsters of the earth,
Our pity move, or exercise our mirth;
Or if in tittle-tattle, tooth-pick way,
Our rambling thoughts with easy freedom stray;
A gainer still thy friend himself must find,
His grief suspended, and improv'd his mind.

Whilst peaceful slumbers bless the homely bed,
Where virtue, self-approv'd, reclines her head;
Whilst vice beneath imagin'd horrors mourns,
And conscience plants the villain's couch with Impatient of restraint, the active mind, [thorns;
No more by servile prejudice confin'd,
Leaps from her seat, as waken'd from a trance,
And darts through Nature at a single glance.
Then we our friends, our foes, ourselves, survey,
And see by night what fools we are by day.

Stript of her gaudy plumes and vain disguise,
See where ambition mean and loathsome lies;
Reflection with relentless hand pulls down
The tyrant's bloody wreath and ravish'd crown.
In vain he tells of battles bravely won,
Of nations conquer'd, and of worlds undone:
Triumphs like these but ill with manhood suit,
And sink the conqueror beneath the brute.
But if, in searching round the world, we find
Some gen'rous youth, the friend of all mankind,
Whose anger, like the bolt of Jove, is sped
In terrors only at the guilty head,

Whose mercies, like heaven's dew, refreshing fall
In gen'ral love and charity to all,
Pleas'd we behold such worth on any throne,
And doubly pleas'd we find it on our own.

Through a false medium things are shown by day,

Pomp, wealth, and titles, judgment lead astray.
How many from appearance borrow state,
Whom night disdains to number with the great!
Must not we laugh to see yon lordling proud
Snuff up vile incense from a fawning crowd?
Whilst in his beam surrounding clients play,
Like insects in the sun's enlivening ray,
Whilst, Jehu-like, he drives at furious rate,
And seems the only charioteer of state,
Talking himself into a little god,
And ruling empires with a single nod;
Who would not think, to hear him law dispense,
That he had int'rest, and that they had sense?
Injurious thought! Beneath night's honest shade,
When pomp is buried, and false colours fade,
Plainly we see at that impartial hour
Them dupes to pride, and him the tool of pow'r.

God help the man, condemn'd by cruel fate
To court the seeming, or the real great.
Much sorrow shall he feel, and suffer more
Than any slave who labours at the oar.
By slavish methods must he learn to please,
By smooth-tongu'd flattery, that curst court-disease,
Supple to ev'ry wayward mood, strike sail,
And shift with shifting humour's peevish gale.
To nature dead he must adopt vile art,
And wear a smile, with anguish in his heart,
A sense of honour would destroy his schemes,
And conscience ne'er must speak unless in dreams.
When he hath tamely borne for many years
Cold looks, forbidding frowns, contemptuous sneers;
When he at last expects, good easy man,
To reap the profits of his labour'd plan,
Some cringing lacquey, or rapacious whore,
To favours of the great the surest door,
Some catamite, or pimp, in credit grown,
Who tempts another's wife, or sells his own,
Steps cross his hopes, the promis'd boon denies,
And for some minion's minion claims the prize.

Foe to restraint, unpractis'd in deceit,
Too resolute, from nature's active heat,
To brook affronts, and tamely pass them by,
Too proud to flatter, too sincere to lie,
Too plain to please, too honest to be great;
Give me, kind Heav'n, an humbler, happier state:
Far from the place where men with pride deceive,
Where rascals promise, and where fools believe;
Far from the walk of folly, vice, and strife,
Calm, independent, let me steal through life,
Nor one vain wish my steady thoughts beguile
To fear his lordship's frown, or court his smile.
Unfit for greatness, I her snares defy,
And look on riches with untainted eye.
To others let the glitt'ring bawbles fall,
Content shall place us far above them all.

Spectators only on this bustling stage,
We see what vain designs mankind engage;
Vice after vice with ardour they pursue,
And one old folly brings forth twenty new.

Successfully pursu'd the plan, and now,
 "Room for my lord,—virtue stand by and bow."

And is this all—is this the worldling's art,
 To mask, but not amend a vicious heart?
 Shall lukewarm caution and demeanour grave
 For wise and good stamp ev'ry supple knave?
 Shall wretches, whom no real virtue warms,
 Gild fair their names and flates with empty forms,
 Whilst virtue seeks in vain the wish'd-for prize
 Because, disdaining ill, she hates disguise;
 Because she frankly pours forth all her store,
Seems what she is, and scorns to pass for more?
 Well—be it so—let vile dissemblers hold
 Unenvy'd pow'r, and boast their dear-bought gold,
 Me neither pow'r shall tempt, nor thirst of pelf,
 To flatter others or deny myself;
 Might the whole world be plac'd within my span,
 I would not be that thing, that prudent man.

What, cries Sir Pliant, would you then oppose
 Yourself, alone, against an host of foes?
 Let not conceit, and peevish lust to rail,
 Above all sense of interest prevail.

Throw off for shame this petulance of wit,
 Be wise, be modest, and for once submit:
 Too hard the task 'gainst multitudes to fight,
You must be wrong, the world is in the right.

What is the world? A term which men have got

To signify, not one in ten knows what;
 A term, which with no more precision passes
 To point out herds of men than herds of asses;
 In common use no more it means, we find,
 Than many fools in same opinions join'd.

Can numbers then change nature's stated laws?
 Can numbers make the worse the better cause?
 Vice must be vice, virtue be virtue still,
 Though thousands rail at good and practise ill.
 Wouldst thou defend the Gaul's destructive rage
 Because vast nations on his part engage?
 Though to support the rebel Cæsar's cause
 Tumultuous legions arm against the laws,
 Though scandal would our patriot's name impeach,
 And rails at virtues which she cannot reach,
 What honest man but would with joy submit
 To bleed with Cato, and retire with PITT?

Stedfast and true to virtue's sacred laws,
 Unmov'd by vulgar censure or applause,
 Let the world talk, my friend; that world we know

Which calls us guilty, cannot make us so.
 Unaw'd by numbers, follow nature's plan,
 Assert the rights, or quit the name of man.
 Consider well, weigh strictly right and wrong
 Resolve not quick, but once resolv'd be strong.
 In spite of dullness, and in spite of wit,
 If to thyself thou canst thyself acquit,
 Rather stand up assur'd with conscious pride
 Alone, than err with millions on thy side.

THE PROPHECY OF FAMINE.

A SCOTS PASTORAL.

INSCRIBED TO JOHN WILKES, ESQUIRE.

WHEN Cupid first instructs his darts to fly
 From the fly corner of some cook-maid's eye,

The stripling raw, just enter'd in his teens,
 Receives the wound, and wonders what it means;
 His heart, like dripping, melts, and new desire
 Within him stirs, each time she stirs the fire;
 Trembling and blushing he the fair-one views,
 And fain would speak, but can't—without a muse.

So to the sacred mount he takes his way,
 Prunes his young wings, and tunes his infant lay,
 His oaten reed to rural ditties frames,
 To flocks and rocks, to hills and rills proclaims,
 In simplest notes, and all unpolish'd strains,
 The loves of nymphs, and eke the loves of swains.

Clad, as your nymphs were always clad of yore,
 In rustic weeds—a cook-maid now no more—
 Beneath an aged oak Lardella lies,
 Green moss her couch; her canopy the skies.
 From aromatic shrubs the roguish gale [vile,
 Steals young perfumes, and wafts them through the
 The youth, turn'd swain, and skill'd in rustic lays,
 Fast by her side his am'rous descant plays.
 Herds lowe, flocks bleat, pies chatter, ravens scream,

And the full chorus dies a-down the stream.
 The streams, with music freighted, as they pass,
 Present the fair Lardella with a glass,
 And Zephyr to complete the love-sick plan,
 Waves his light wings, and serves her for a fan.

But, when maturer judgment takes the lead,
 These childish toys on reason's altar bleed;
 Form'd after some great man, whose name breeds
 awe,

Whose ev'ry sentence fashion makes a law,
 Who on mere credit his vain trophies rears,
 And founds his merit on our servile fears;
 Then we discard the workings of the heart,
 And nature's banish'd by mechanic art;
 Then, deeply read, our reading must be shown;
 Vain is that knowledge which remains unknown.
 Then ostentation marches to our aid,
 And letter'd pride stalks forth in full parade;
 Beneath their care behold the work refine,
 Pointed each sentence, polish'd ev'ry line:
 Trifles are dignified, and taught to wear
 The robes of ancients with a modern air,
 Nonsense with classic ornaments is grac'd,
 And passes current with the stamp of taste.

Then the rude Theocrite is ransack'd o'er,
 And courtly Maro call'd from Mincio's shore;
 Sicilian muses on our mountains roam,
 Easy and free as if they were at home:
 Nymphs, naiads, nereids, dryads, satyrs, fauns,
 Sport in our floods, and trip it o'er our lawns;
 Flow'rs, which once flourish'd fair in Greece and Rome,

More fair revive in England's meads to bloom;
 Skies without cloud exotic suns adorn;
 And roses blush, but blush without a thorn;
 Landscapes unknown to dowdy nature, rise,
 And new creations strike our wond'ring eyes.

For bards like these, who neither sing nor say,
 Grave without thought, and without feeling gay;
 Whose numbers in one even tenor flow,
 Attun'd to pleasure, and attun'd to woe,
 Who, if plain common sense her visit pays,
 And mars one couplet in their happy lays,

As at some ghost affrighted, start and stare,
And ask the meaning of her coming there;
For bards like these a wreath shall Mason bring,
Lin'd with the softest down of folly's wing;
In love's pagoda shall they ever doze,
And Gisbal kindly rock them to repose;
My lord -- to letters as to faith most true --
At once their patron and example too --
Shall quaintly fashion his love-labour'd dreams,
Sigh with sad winds, and weep with weeping streams.

Curious in grief (for real grief, we know,
Is curious to dress up the tale of woe),
From the green umbrage of some druid's seat,
Shall his own works in his own way repeat.

Me, whom no muse of heav'nly birth inspires,
No judgment tempers when rash genius fires;
Who boast no merit but mere knack of rhyme,
Short gleams of sense, and satire out of time,
Who cannot follow where trim fancy leads
By prattling streams o'er flow'r-empurpled meads;
Who often, but without success, have pray'd
For apt alliteration's artful aid;

Who would, but cannot, with a master's skill,
Coin fine new epithets, which mean no ill;
Me, thus uncouth, thus ev'ry way unfit
For pacing poesy, and ambling wit,
Taste with contempt beholds, nor deigns to place
Amongst the lowest of her favour'd race.

Thou, nature, art my goddess -- to thy law
Myself I dedicate. -- Hence slavish awe
Which bends to fashion, and obeys the rules,
Impos'd at first, and since observ'd by fools.
Hence those vile tricks which mar fair nature's hue,
And bring the sober matron forth to view,
With all that artificial tawdry glare,
Which virtue scorns, and none but strumpets wear,
Sick of those pomps, those vanities, that waste
Of toil, which critics now mistake for taste,
Of false refinements sick, and labour'd ease,
Which art, too thinly veil'd, forbids to please,
By nature's charms (inglorious truth)! subdu'd,
However plain her dress, and 'haviour rude,
To northern climes my happier course I steer,
Climes where the goddess reigns throughout the
Where, undisturb'd by art's rebellious plan, [year,
She rules the loyal laird, and faithful clan.

To that rare soil, where virtues clust'ring grow,
What mighty blessings doth not England owe?
What waggon-loads of courage, wealth and sense,
Doth each revolving day import from thence?
To us she gives, disinterested friend,
Faith without fraud, and Stuarts without end.
When we prosperity's rich trappings wear,
Come not her gen'rous sons and take a share?
And if, by some disastrous turn of fate,
Change should ensue, and ruin seize the state,
Shall we not find, safe in that hallow'd ground,
Such refuge as the Holy Martyr found?

Nor less our debt in science, though depy'd
By the weak slaves of prejudice and pride.
Thence came the Ramsays, names of worthy note,
Of whom one paints, as well as t' other wrote;
Thence, home, disbanded from the sons of pray'r
For loving plays, though no dull dean was there;

Thence issued forth, at great Macpherson's call,
That old, new, epic pastoral Fingal;
Thence Malloch, friend alike of church and state,
Of Christ and liberty, by grateful fate
Rais'd to rewards which in a pious reign,
All darling infidels should seek in vain;
Thence simple bards, by simple prudence taught,
To this wise town by simple patrons brought,
In simple manner utter simple lays,
And take, with simple pensions, simple praise.
Wait me some muse to Tweed's inspiring
stream,

Where all the little loves and graces dream,
Where slowly winding the dull waters creep,
And seem themselves to own the power of sleep,
Where on the surface lead, like feathers, swims,
There let me bathe my yet unhallow'd limbs,
As once a Syrian bath'd in Jordan's flood,
Wash off my native stains, correct that blood
Which mutinies at call of English pride,
And, deaf to prudence, rolls a patriot tide.

From solemn thought which overhangs the brow
Of patriot care, when things are -- God knows how;
From nice trim points, where honour, slave to rule,
In compliment to folly, plays the fool; [pow'r,
From those gay scenes where mirth exalts his
And easy humour wings the laughing hour;
From those soft better moments, when desire
Beats high, and all the world of man's on fire,
When mutual ardours of the melting fair
More than repay us for whole years of care,
At friendship's summons will my Wilkes retreat,
And see, once seen before, that ancient seat,
That ancient seat, where majesty display'd
Her ensigns, long before the world was made!

Mean narrow maxims, which enslave mankind,
Ne'er from its bias warp thy settled mind.
Not dup'd by party, nor opinion's slave,
Those faculties which bounteous nature gave,
Thy honest spirit into practice brings, [kings.
Nor courts the smile, nor dreads the frown of
Let rude licentious Englishmen comply [why;
With tumult's voice, and curse they know not
Unwilling to condemn, thy soul disdains
To wear vile faction's arbitrary chains,
And strictly weighs, in apprehension clear,
Things as they are, and not as they appear.
With thee good-humour tempers lively wit,
Enthron'd with judgment, candour loves to sit,
And nature gave thee, open to distress,
A heart to pity, and a hand to bless.

Oft have I heard thee mourn the wretched lot
Of the poor, mean, despis'd, insulted Scot,
Who, might calm reason credit idle tales,
By rancour forg'd where prejudice prevails,
Or starves at home, or practises, through fear
Of starving, arts which damn all conscience here.
When scribblers, to the charge by int'rest led,
The fierce North-Britain foaming at their head,
Pour forth invectives, deaf to candour's call,
And injur'd by one alien, rail at all;
On Northern Pisgah when they take their stand,
To mark the weakness of that Holy Land,
With needless truths their libels to adorn,
And hang a nation up to public scorn,

Thy gen'rous soul condemns the frantic rage,
And hates the faithful but ill-natur'd page.

The Scots are poor, cries furly English pride;
True is the charge, nor by themselves deny'd.
Are they not then in strictest reason clear,
Who wisely come to mend their fortunes here?
If, by low supple arts successful grown,
They sapp'd our vigour to increase their own,
If, mean in want, and insolent in pow'r,
They only fawn'd more surely to devour,
Rous'd by such wrongs should reason take alarm,
And e'en the muse for public safety arm;
But if they own ingenuous virtue's sway,
And follow where true honour points the way,
If they revere the hand by which they're fed,
And bless the donors for their daily bread,
Or by vast debts of higher import bound,
Are always humble, always grateful found,
If they, directed by Paul's holy pen,
Become discreetly all things to all men,
That all men may become all things to them,
Envy may hate, but justice can't condemn.

"Into our places, states, and beds they creep;"
They've sense to get, what we want sense to keep.

Once, he the hour accurs'd, accurs'd the place,
I ventur'd to blaspheme the chosen race.
Into those traps, which men call'd patriots laid,
By specious arts unwarily betray'd,
Madly I leagu'd against that sacred earth,
Vile parricide! which gave a parent birth.
But shall I meanly error's path pursue,
When heavenly truth presents her friendly clue,
Once plung'd in ill, shall I go farther in?
To make the oath was rash; to keep it, sin.
Backward I tread the paths I trod before,
And calm reflection hates what passion swore.

Converted (blessed are the souls which know)
Those pleasures which from true conversion flow,
Whether to reason, who now rules my breast,
Or to pure faith, like Lyttleton and West),
Past crimes to expiate, be my present aim.
To raise new trophies to the Scottish name,
To make (what can the proudest muse do more)?
E'en faction's sons her brighter worth adore,
To make her glories, stamp'd with honest rhymes,
In fullest tide roll down to latest times.

"Presumptuous wretch! and shall a muse like
"An English muse, the meanest of the pine,
"Attempt a thence-like this? Can her weak strain
"Expect indulgence from the mighty Thane?
"Should he from toils of government retire,
"And for a moment fan the poet's fire,
"Should he, of sciences the moral friend,
"Each curious, each important search suspend,
"Leave unassisted Hill of herbs to tell,
"And all the wonders of a cockle-shell,
"Having the Lord's good grace before his eyes,
"Would not the Home step forth, and gain the "prize?
"Or if this wreath of honour might adorn
"The humble brows of one in England born,
"Presumptuous still thy daring must appear;
"Vain all thy tow'ring hopes, whilst I am here."

Thus spake a form, by filken smile, and tone
Dull and unvaried, for the laureat known,

Folly's chief friend, decorum's eldest son,
In ev'ry party found, and yet of none.
This airy substance, this substantial shade,
Abash'd I heard, and with respect obey'd.

From themes too lofty for a bard so mean,
Discretion beckons to an humbler scene.
The restless fever of ambition laid,
Calm I retire, and seek the sylvan shade.
Now be the muse disrob'd of all her pride,
Be all the glare of verse by truth supplied,
And if plain nature pours a simple strain,
Which Bute may praise, and Ossian not disdain,
Ossian, sublimest, simplest bard of all,
Whom English infidels Macpherson call,
Then round my head shall honour's ensigns wave,
And pensions mark me for a willing slave.

Two boys, whose birth beyond all question
springs

From great and glorious, though forgotten, kings,
Shepherds of Scottish lineage, born and bred
On the same bleak and barren mountain's head,
By niggard nature doom'd on the same rocks
To spin out life, and starve themselves and flocks,
Fresh as the morning, which, enrob'd in mist,
The mountain's top with usual dullness kifs'd,
Jockey and Sawney to their labours rose;
Soon clad I ween, where nature needs no clothes,
Where, from their youth inur'd to winter skies,
Dress and her vain refinements they despise.

Jockey, whose manly high-bon'd cheeks to
crown
With freckles spotted flam'd the golden down,
With mickle art could on the bagpipes play,
E'en from the rising to the setting day;
Sawney as long without remorse could bawl
Home's madrigals, and ditties from Fingal.
Oft at his strains, all natural though rude,
The Highland lass forgot her want of food,
And, whilst she scratch'd her lover into rest,
Sunk pleas'd, though hungry, on her Sawney's
breast,

Far as the eye could reach, no tree was seen,
Earth, clad in russet, scorn'd the lively green.
The plague of locusts they secure defy,
For in three hours a grasshopper must die.
No living thing, whate'er its food, feasts there,
But theameleon, who can feast on air.
No birds, except as birds of passage, flew,
No bee was known to hum, no dove to coo.
No streams as amber smooth, as amber clear,
Were seen to glide, or heard to warble here.
Rebellion's spring, which through the country ran,
Furnish'd, with bitter draughts, the steady clan.
No flow'rs embalm'd the air, but one white rose,
Which on the tenth of June by instinct blows,
By instinct blows at morn, and, when the shades
Of drizzly eve prevail, by instinct fades.

One, and but one poor solitary cave,
Too sparing of her favours, nature gave;
That one alone (hard tax on Scottish pride)!
Shelter at once for man and beast supplied.
Their snares without entangling briers spread,
And thistles, arm'd against th' invader's head,

Stood in close ranks all entrance to oppose,
 Thistles now held more precious than the rose.
 All creatures which, on nature's earliest plan,
 Were form'd to lothe, and to be loth'd by man,
 Which ow'd their birth to nastiness and spite,
 Deadly to touch, and hateful to the sight,
 Creatures, which when admitted in the ark,
 Their saviour shunn'd, and rankled in the dark,
 Found place within: marking her noisome road
 With poison's trail, here crawl'd the bloated toad;
There webs were spread of more than common size,
 And half-starv'd spiders prey'd on half-starv'd flies;
 In quest of food, efts strove in vain to crawl;
 Slugs, pinch'd with hunger, smear'd the slimy wall;
 The cave around with hissing serpents rung;
 On the damp roof unhealthy vapour hung;
 And FAMINE, by her children always known,
 As proud as poor, here fix'd her native throne.

Here, for the sullen sky was overcast,
 And summer shrunk beneath a wint'ry blast,
 A native blast, which, arm'd with hail and rain,
 Beat unrelenting on the naked swain,
 The boys for shelter made; behind, the sheep,
 Of which those shepherds every day take keep,
 Sickly crept on, and with complainings rude,
 On nature seem'd to call, and bleat for food.

Jockey.

Sith to this cave, by tempest, we're confin'd,
 And within ken our flocks, under the wind,
 Safe from the pelting of this perilous storm,
 Are laid among yon thistles, dry and warm,
 What, Sawney, if by shepherd's art we try
 To mock the rigour of this cruel sky?
 What if we tune some merry roundelay?
 Well dost thou sing, nor ill doth Jockey play.

Sawney.

Ah, Jockey, ill advisest thou, I wis,
 To think of songs at such a time as this.
 Sooner shall herbage crown these barren rocks,
 Sooner shall fleeces clothe these ragged flocks,
 Sooner shall want seize shepherds of the south,
 And we forget to live from hand to mouth,
 Than Sawney, out of season, shall impart
 The songs of gladness with an aching heart.

Jockey.

Still have I known thee for a silly swain;
 Of things past help, what boots it to complain?
 Nothing but mirth can conquer fortune's spite;
 No sky is heavy, if the heart be light;
 Patience is sorrow's salve; what can't be cur'd,
 So Donald right arceads, must be endur'd.

Sawney.

Full silly swain, I wot, is Jockey now;
 How didst thou bear thy Maggy's falsehood? how,
 When with a foreign lion she stole away,
 Didst thou forswear thy pipe and shepherd's lay?
 Where was thy boasted wisdom then, when I
 Applied those proverbs, which you now apply?

Jockey.

O she was bonny! All the Highlands round
 Was there a rival to my Maggy found!
 More precious (though that precious is to all)
 Than the rare medicine which we brimstone call,
 Or that choice plant, so grateful to the nose,
 Which in I know not what far country grows,

Was Maggy unto me; dear do I rue,
 A lass so fair should ever prove untrue.

Sawney.

Whether with pipe or song to charm the ear,
 Through all the land did Jamie find a peer?
 Curs'd be that year by ev'ry honest Scot,
 And in the shepherd's calendar forgot,
 That fatal year, when Jamie, hapless swain,
 In evil hour forsook the peaceful plain.
 Jamie, when our young laird discreetly fled,
 Was seiz'd and hang'd till he was dead, dead, dead.

Jockey.

Full sorely may we all lament that day;
 For all were losers in the deadly fray.
 Five brothers had I on the Scottish plains,
 Well dost thou know were none more hopeful
 swains;

Five brothers there I lost, in manhood's pride,
 Two in the field, and three on gibbets died:
Ab! silly swains, to follow war's alarms!
Ab! what hath shepherd's life to do with arms!

Sawney.

Mention it not—There saw I strangers clad
 In all the honours of our ravish'd plaid,
 Saw the ferrara too, our nation's pride,
 Unwilling grace the awkward victor's side.
 There fell our choicest youth, and from that day
Mote never Sawney tune the merry lay; [survive,
 Bless'd those which fell! curs'd those which still
 To mourn fifteen renew'd in forty-five.

Thus plain'd the boys, when from her throne
 of turf,

With boils emboss'd, and overgrown with scurf,
 Vile humours, which, in life's corrupted well,
 Mix'd at the birth, not abstinence could quell,
 Pale FAMINE rear'd the head: her eager eyes,
 Where hunger ev'n to madness seem'd to rise,
 Speaking aloud her throes and pangs of heart,
 Strain'd to get loose, and from their orbs to start;
 Her hollow cheeks were each a deep-sunk cell,
 Where wretchedness and horror lov'd to dwell;
 With double rows of useless teeth supplied,
 Her mouth, from ear to ear, extended wide,
 Which, when for want of food her entrails pin'd,
 She op'd, and, cursing, swallow'd nought but wind;
 All shrivell'd was her skin, and here and there,
 Making their way by force, her bones lay bare:
 Such filthy sight to hide from human view,
 O'er her foul limbs a tatter'd plaid she threw.

Cease, cried the goddess, cease, despairing swains,
 And from a parent hear what Jove ordains!

Pent in this barren corner of the isle,
 Where partial fortune never deign'd to smile;
 Like nature's bastards, reaping for our share
 What was rejected by the lawful heir;
 Unknown amongst the nations of the earth,
 Or only known to raise contempt and mirth;
 Long free, because the race of Roman braves
 Thought it not worth their while to make us slaves;
 Then into bondage by that nation brought,
 Whose ruin we for ages vainly sought;
 Whom still with unslack'd hate we view, and still,
 The pow'r of mischief lost, retain the will;

Consider'd as the refuse of mankind,
 A mass till the last moment left behind,
 Which frugal nature doubted, as it lay,
 Whether to stamp with life, or throw away;
 Which, form'd in haste, was planted in this nook,
 But never enter'd in creation's book;
 Branded as traitors, who for love of gold
 Would sell their God, as once their king they sold;
 Long have we borne this mighty weight of ill,
 These vile injurious taunts, and bear them still.
 But times of happier note are now at hand,
 And the full promise of a better land:
There, like the sons of Israel, having trod,
 For the fix'd term of years ordain'd by God,
 A barren desert, we shall seize rich plains,
 Where milk with honey flows, and plenty reigns.
 With some few natives join'd, some pliant few,
 Who worship int'rest, and our track pursue,
 There shall we, though the wretched people grieve,
 Ravage at large, nor ask the owners leave.

For us, the earth shall bring forth her increase;
 For us, the flocks shall wear a golden fleece;
 Fat beeves shall yield us dainties not our own,
 And the grape bleed a nectar yet unknown;
 For our advantage shall their harvests grow,
 And Scotsmen reap what they disdain'd to sow;
 For us, the sun shall climb the eastern hill;
 For us, the rain shall fall, the dew distil;
 When to our wishes nature cannot rise,
 Art shall be task'd to grant us fresh supplies.
 His brawny arm shall drudging labour strain,
 And for our pleasure suffer daily pain;
 Trade shall for us exert her utmost pow'rs,
 Her's all the toil, and all the profit our's;
 For us, the oak shall from his native steep
 Descend, and fearless travel through the deep;
 The sail of commerce for our use unfurl'd,
 Shall waft the treasures of each distant world;
 For us, sublimer heights shall science reach,
 For us, their statesmen plot, their churchmen preach;
 Their noblest limbs of counsel we'll disjoint,
 And, mocking, new ones of our own appoint;
 Devouring war, imprison'd in the north,
 Shall, at our call, in horrid pomp break forth,
 And when, his chariot wheels with thunder hung,
 Fell Discord braying with her brazen tongue,
 Death in the van, with Anger, Hate, and Fear,
 And Desolation stalking in the rear,
 Revenge, by Justice guided, in his train,
 He drives impetuous o'er the trembling plain,
 Shall, at our bidding, quit his lawful prey,
 And to meek, gentle, gen'rous Peace give way.

Think not, my sons, that this so blest'd estate
 Stands at a distance on the roll of fate;
 Already big with hopes of future sway,
 E'en from this cave I scent my destin'd prey.
 Think not, that this dominion o'er a race,
 Whose former deeds shall Time's last annals grace,
 In the rough face of peril must be fought,
 And with the lives of thousands dearly bought;
 No—fool'd by cunning, by that happy art
 Which laughs to scorn the blundering hero's heart,
 Into the snare shall our kind neighbours fall
 With open eyes, and fondly give us all.

When Rome, to prop her sinking empire, bore
 Their choicest levies to a foreign shore,
 What if we seiz'd, like a destroying flood,
 Their widow'd plains, and fill'd the realm with blood,

Gave an unbounded loose to manly rage,
 And scorning mercy, spar'd nor sex nor age;
 When, for our int'rest too mighty grown,
 Monarchs of warlike bent possess'd the throne,
 What if we strove divisions to foment,
 And spread the flames of civil discontent,
 Assisted those who 'gainst their king made head,
 And gave the traitors refuge when they fled;
 When restless Glory bade her sons advance,
 And pitch'd her standard in the fields of France;
 What if, disdaining oaths, and empty sound,
 By which our nation never shall be bound,
 Bravely we taught unmuzzled war to roam
 Through the weak land, and brought cheap laurels home;

When the bold traitors leagu'd for the defence
 Of Law, Religion, Liberty and Sense,
 When they against their lawful monarch rose,
 And dar'd the Lord's Anointed to oppose,
 What if we still rever'd the banish'd race,
 And strove the Royal Vagrants to replace,
 With fierce rebellions shook th' unsettled state,
 And greatly dar'd, though cross'd by partial fate;
 These facts, which might, where wisdom held the sway,

Awake the very stones to bar our way,
There shall be nothing, nor one trace remain
 In the dull region of an English brain.
 Bless'd with that faith, which mountains can remove, [prove.

First they shall dupes, next saints, last martyrs
 Already is this game of fate begun
 Under the sanction of my darling son:
 That son, of nature royal as his name,
 Is destin'd to redeem our race from shame;
 His boundless pow'r, beyond example great,
 Shall make the rough way smooth, the crooked
 straight,

Shall for our ease the raging floods restrain,
 And sink the mountain level to the plain.
 Discord, whom in a cavern under ground
 With massy fetters their late Patriot bound,
 Where her own flesh the furious hag might tear,
 And vent her curses to the vacant air,
 Where, that she never might be heard of more,
 He planted Loyalty to guard the door.
 For better purpose shall our chief release,
 Disguise her for a time, and call her Peace.

Lur'd by that name, fine engine of deceit,
 Shall the weak English help themselves to cheat;
 To gain our love, with honours shall they grace
 The old adherents of the Stuart race,
 Who pointed out, no matter by what name,
 Tories or Jacobites are still the same,
 To soothe our rage, the temporising brood
 Shall break the ties of truth and gratitude,
 Against their saviour venom'd falsehoods frame,
 And brand with calumny their William's name;
 To win our grace, (rare argument of wit)
 To our untainted faith shall they commit

(Our faith which, in extremest perils tried,
Disdain'd, and still disdains, to change her side)
That sacred Majesty they all approve,
Who most enjoys, and best deserves their love.

AN EPISTLE TO WILLIAM HOGARTH.

AMONGST the sons of men how few are known
Who dare be just to merit not their own !
Superior virtue and superior sense
To knaves and fools will always give offence ;
Nay, men of real worth can scarcely bear,
So nice is Jealousy, a rival there.

Be wicked as thou wilt, do all that's base,
Proclaim thyself the monster of thy race ;
Let vice and folly thy black soul divide,
Be proud with meanness, and be mean with pride ;
Deaf to the voice of faith and honour, fall
From side to side, yet be of none at all ;
Spurn all those charities, those sacred ties,
Which nature in her bounty, good as wise,
To work our safety, and ensure her plan,
Contriv'd to bind, and rivet man to man ;
Lift against virtue power's oppressive rod,
Betray thy country, and deny thy God ;
And, in one gen'ral comprehensive line,
To group, which volumes scarcely could define,
Whate'er of sin and dullness can be said,
Join to a F——'s heart a D——'s head ;
Yet may'st thou pass unnotic'd in the throng,
And, free from envy, safely sneak along.
The rigid saint, by whom no mercy's shown
To saints whose lives are better than his own,
Shall spare thy crimes ; and wit, who never once
Forgave a brother, shall forgive a dunce,
But should thy soul, form'd in some luckless hour,
Vile int'rest scorn, nor madly grasp at pow'r ;
Should love of fame, in ev'ry noble mind,
A brave disease, with love of virtue join'd,
Spur thee to deeds of pith, where courage, tried
In Reason's court, is amply justified ;
Or fond of knowledge, and averse to strife,
Should'st thou prefer the calmer walk of life ;
Should'st thou, by pale and sickly study led,
Pursue coy science to the fountain-head ;
Virtue thy guide, and public good thy end,
Should ev'ry thought to our improvement tend,
To curb the passions, to enlarge the mind,
Purge the sick weal, and humanize mankind :
Rage in her eye, and malice in her breast,
Redoubled horror grinning on her crest,
Fiercer each snake, and sharper ev'ry dart,
Quick from her cell shall mad'ning envy start.
Then shalt thou find, but find alas ! too late,
How vain is worth ! how short is glory's date !
Then shalt thou find, whilst friends with foes conspire

To give more proof than virtue would desire,
Thy danger chiefly lies in acting well ;
No crime's so great as daring to excel.
Whilst Satire thus, disdaining mean controul,
Urg'd the free dictates of an honest soul,
Candour, who, with the charity of Paul,
Still thinks the best, whene'er she thinks at all,

With the sweet milk of human kindness blest'd,
The furious ardour of my zeal repress'd.

Canst thou, with more than usual warmth, she cry'd,

Thy malice to indulge, and feed thy pride,
Canst thou, severe by nature as thou art,
With all that wond'rous rancour in thy heart,
Delight to torture truth ten thousand ways,
To spin detraction forth from themes of praise,
To make vice fit for purposes of strife,
And draw the hag much larger than the life,
To make the good seem bad, the bad seem worse,
And represent our nature as our curse ?
Doth not humanity condemn that zeal
Which tends to aggravate and not to heal ?
Doth not discretion warn thee of disgrace,
And danger grinning stare thee in the face ;
Loud as the drum, which spreading terror round
From emptiness acquires the pow'r of sound ?
Doth not the voice of Norton strike thy ear,
And the pale Mansfield chill thy soul with fear ?
Do'st thou, fond man, believe thyself secure,
Because thou'rt honest, and because thou'rt poor ?
Dost thou on law and liberty depend ?
Turn, turn thy eyes, and view thy injur'd friend.
Art thou beyond the ruffian gripe of pow'r ?
When Wilkes, prejudg'd, is sentenc'd to the Tow'r ?
Dost thou by privilege exemption claim,
When privilege is little more than name ?
Or to prerogative (that glorious ground
On which state-scoundrels oft have safety found)
Dost thou pretend, and there a sanction find,
Unpunish'd, thus to libel human kind ?

When poverty, the poet's constant crime,
Compell'd thee, all unfit, to trade in rhyme,
Had not romantic notions turn'd thy head,
Had'st thou not valu'd honour more than bread,
Had int'rest, pliant int'rest, been thy guide,
And had not prudence been debauch'd by pride,
In flatt'ry's stream thou would'st have dipp'd thy pen,

Applied to great, and not to honest men,
Nor should conviction have seduc'd thy heart
To take the weaker though the better part.

What but rank folly, for thy curse decreed,
Could into satire's barren path mislead,
When, open to thy view, before thee lay
Soul-soothing panegyric's flow'ry way ?
There might the muse have saunter'd at her ease,
And, pleasing others, learn'd herself to please ;
Lords should have listen'd to the sugar'd treat,
And ladies, simp'ring, own'd it vastly sweet ;
Rogues, in thy prudent verse with virtue grac'd,
Fools, mark'd by thee as prodigies of taste,
Must have forbid, pouring preferments down,
Such wit, such truth as thine to quit the gown.
Thy sacred brethren too (for they no less Than laymen, bring their off'rings to success)
Had hail'd thee good if great, and paid the vow
Sincere as that they pay to God, whilst thou
In lawn hadst whisper'd to a sleeping crowd
As dull as R —, and half as proud.

Peace, candour ! — Wisely had'st thou said, and well,

Could int'rest in this breast one moment dwell,

Could she, with prospect of success, oppose
The firm resolves which from conviction rose.
I cannot truckle to a fool of state,
Nor take a favour from the man I hate.

Free leave have others by such means to shine;
I scorn their practice, they may laugh at mine.

But in this charge, forgetful of thyself,
Thou hast assum'd the maxims of that elf,
Whom God in wrath for man's dishonour fram'd,
Cunning in heav'n, amongst us prudence nam'd,
That servile prudence which I leave to those
Who dare not be my friends, can't be my foes.

Had I with cruel and oppressive rhymes
Pursu'd, and turn'd misfortunes into crimes;
Had I, when virtue gasping lay and low,
Join'd tyrant vice, and added woe to woe;
Had I made modesty in blushes speak,
And drawn the tear down beauty's sacred cheek;
Had I (damn'd then) in thought debas'd my lays,
To wound that sex which honour bids me praise;
Had I, from vengeance by base views betray'd,
In endless night sunk injur'd Ayliff's shade;
Had I (which satirists of mighty name,
Renown'd in rhyme, rever'd for moral fame,
Have done before, whom justice shall pursue
In future verse) brought forth to public view
A noble friend, and made his foibles known,
Because his worth was greater than my own;
Had I spar'd those (so prudence had decreed)
Whom, God so help me at my greatest need,
I ne'er will spare, those vipers to their king, [sing,
Who smooth their looks, and flatter whilst they
Or had I not taught patriot zeal to boast
Of those who flatter least, but love him most;
Had I thus sinn'd, my stubborn soul should bend
At candour's voice, and take, as from a friend,
The deep rebuke; myself should be the first
To hate myself, and stamp my muse accurs'd.

But shall my arm—forbid it manly pride,
Forbid it reason, warring on my side—
For vengeance lifted high, the stroke forbear,
And hang suspended in the desert air,
Or to my trembling side unnerv'd sink down,
Palsied, forsooth, by candour's half-made frown?
When justice bids me on, shall I delay
Because insipid candour bars my way?
When she, of all alike the puling friend,
Would disappoint my satire's noblest end,
When she to villains would a sanction give,
And shelter those who are not fit to live,
When she would screen the guilty from a blush,
And bids me spare whom reason bids me crush,
All leagues with candour proudly I resign;
She cannot be for honour's turn nor mine.

Yet come, cold monitor, half foe, half friend,
Whom vice can't fear, whom virtue can't commend,
Come candour, by thy dull indiff'rence known,
Thou equal-blooded judge, thou lukewarm drone,
Who, fashion'd without feelings, dost expect
We call that virtue which we know defect;
Come, and observe the nature of our crimes,
The gross and rank complexion of the times,
Observe it well, and then review my plan;
Praise if you will, or censure if you can.

While vice presumptuous lords it as in sport,
And piety is only known at court;
Whilst wretched liberty expiring lies
Beneath the fatal burden of excise;
Whilst nobles act, without one touch of shame,
What men of humble rank would blush to name;
Whilst honour's plac'd in highest point of view,
Worshipp'd by those who justice never knew;
Whilst bubbles of distinction waste in play
The hours of rest, and blunder through the day,
With dice and cards opprobrious vigils keep,
Then turn to ruin empires in their sleep;
Whilst fathers, by relentless passion led,
Doom worthy injur'd sons to beg their bread,
Merely with ill got, ill sav'd, wealth, to grace
An alien, abject, poor, proud, upstart race;
Whilst Martin flatters only to betray,
And Webb gives up his dirty soul for pay;
Whilst titles serve to hush a villain's fears;
Whilst peers are agents made, and agents peers;
Whilst base betrayers are themselves betray'd,
And makers ruin'd by the thing they made;
Whilst C——, false to God and man, for gold,
Like the old traitor who a Saviour sold,
To shame his master, friend, and father gives;
Whilst Bute remains in pow'r, whilst Holland lives;
Can satire want a subject, where disdain,
By virtue fir'd, may point her sharpest strain;
Where, cloth'd with thunder, truth may roll along,
And candour justify the rage of song?

Such things! such men before thee! such an age!
Where rancour, great as thine, may glut her rage,
And sicken e'en to surfeit, where the pride
Of satire, pouring down in fullest tide,
May spread wide vengeance round, yet all the while

Justice behold the ruin with a smile;
Whilst I, thy foe misdeem'd, cannot condemn,
Nor disapprove that rage I wish to stem,
Wilt thou, degen'rate and corrupted, choose
To soil the credit of thy haughty muse?
With fallacy, most infamous, to stain
Her truth, and render all her anger vain?
When I beheld thee incorrect, but bold,
A various comment on the stage unfold;
When play'rs on play'rs before thy satire fell,
And poor reviews conspir'd thy wrath to swell;
When states and statesmen next became thy care,
And only kings were safe if thou wast there;
Thy ev'ry word I weigh'd in judgment's scale,
And in thy ev'ry word found truth prevail.
Why dost thou now to falsehood meanly fly?
Not even candour can forgive a lie.

Bad as men are, why should thy frantic rhymes
Traffic in slander, and invent new crimes?
Crimes, which existing only in thy mind,
Weak spleen brings forth to blacken all mankind.
By pleasing hopes we lure the human heart
To practise virtue, and improve in art; [fame,
To thwart these ends (which, proud of honest
A noble muse would cherish and enflame)
Thy drudge contrives, and in our full career
Sicklies our hopes with the pale hue of fear;
Tells us that all our labours are in vain;
That what we seek, we never can obtain;

That dead to virtue, lost to Nature's plan,
 Envy possesses the whole race of man;
 That worth is criminal, and danger lies,
 Danger extreme, in being good and wise.

'Tis a rank falsehood; search the world around,
 There cannot be so vile a monster found,
 Not one so vile, on whom suspicions fall
 Of that gross guilt, which you impute to all.
 Approv'd by those who disobey her laws,
 Virtue from vice itself extorts applause.
 Her very foes bear witness to her state;
 They will not love her, but they cannot hate.
 Hate virtue for herself, with spite pursue
 Merit for merit's sake! Might this be true,
 I would renounce my nature with disdain,
 And with the beasts that perish graze the plain:
 Might this be true, had we so far fill'd up
 The measure of our crimes, and from the cup
 Of guilt so deeply drank, as not to find,
 Thirsting for sin, one drop, one dreg behind,
 Quick ruin must involve this flaming ball,
 And Providence in justice crush us all.
 None but the damn'd, and amongst them the worst,
 Those who for double guilt are doubly curs'd,
 Can be so lost; nor can the worst of all
 At once into such deep damnation fall;
 By painful slow degrees they reach this crime,
 Which e'en in hell must be a work of time.
 Cease then thy guilty rage, thou wayward son,
 With the foul gall of discontent o'er-run,
 List to my voice—be honest, if you can,
 Nor slander nature in her fav'rite man.
 But if thy spirit, resolute in ill,
 Once having err'd, persists in error still,
 Go on at large, no longer worth my care,
 And freely vent those blasphemies in air,
 Which I would stamp as false, though on the tongue

Of angels the injurious slander hung.
 Dup'd by thy vanity (that cunning elf
 Who snares the coxcomb to deceive himself)
 Or, blinded by that rage, didst thou believe
 That we too, coolly, would ourselves deceive?
 That we as sterling falsehood would admit,
 Because 'twas season'd with some little wit?
 When fiction rises pleasing to the eye,
 Men will believe, because they love the lie;
 But truth herself, if clouded with a frown,
 Must have some solemn proof to pass her down.
 Hast thou, maintaining that which must disgrace
 And bring into contempt the human race,
 Hast thou, or canst thou, in truth's sacred court,
 To save thy credit, and thy cause support,
 Produce one proof, make out one real ground,
 On which so great, so gross a charge to found?
 Nay, dost thou know one man (let that appear,
 From wilful falsehood I'll proclaim thee clear)
 One man so lost, to Nature so untrue,
 From whom this gen'ral charge thy rashness drew?
 On this foundation shalt thou stand or fall—
 Prove that in one, which you have charg'd on all.
 Reason determines, and it must be done;
 'Mongst men, or past, or present, name me one.

Hogarth—I take thee, candour, at thy word,
 Accept thy proffer'd terms, and will be heard;

Thee have I heard with virulence declaim,
 Nothing retain'd of candour but the name;
 By thee have I been charg'd in angry strains
 With that mean falsehood which my soul disdains—
 Hogarth stand forth—Nay hang not thus aloof—
 Now, candour, now thou shalt receive such proof,
 Such damning proof, that henceforth thou shalt fear

To tax my wrath, and own my conduct clear—
 Hogarth stand forth—I dare thee to be tried
 In that great court, where conscience must preside;
 At that most solemn bar hold up thy hand;
 Think before whom, on what account you stand—
 Speak, but consider well—from first to last
 Review thy life, weigh ev'ry action past—
 Nay, you shall have no reason to complain—
 Take longer time, and view them o'er again—
 Canst thou remember from thy earliest youth,
 And as thy God must judge thee, speak the truth,
 A single instance where, self laid aside,
 And justice taking place of fear and pride,
 Thou with an equal eye didst genius view,
 And give to merit what was merit's due?
 Genius and merit are a sure offence,
 And thy soul sickens at the name of sense.
 Is any one so foolish to succeed,
 On envy's altar he is doom'd to bleed?
 Hogarth, a guilty pleasure in his eyes,
 The place of executioner supplies.
 See how he glotes, enjoys the sacred feast,
 And proves himself by cruelty a priest.

Whilst the weak artist, to thy whims a slave,
 Would bury all those pow'rs which Nature gave,
 Would suffer blank concealment to obscure
 Those rays thy jealousy could not endure;
 To feed thy vanity would rust unknown,
 And to secure thy credit blast his own,
 In Hogarth he was sure to find a friend;
 He could not fear, and therefore might commend.
 But when his spirit, rous'd by honest shame,
 Shook off that lethargy, and soar'd to fame,
 When, with the pride of man, resolv'd and strong,
 He scorn'd those fears which did his honour wrong,
 And, on himself determin'd to rely,
 Brought forth his labours to the public eye,
 No friend in thee could such a rebel know?
 He had desert, and Hogarth was his foe.

Souls of a tim'rous cast, of petty name
 In envy's court, not yet quite dead to shame,
 May some remorse, some qualms of conscience
 And suffer honour to abate their zeal; [feel,
 But the man truly and completely great,
 Allows no rule of action but his hate;
 Through ev'ry bar he bravely breaks his way,
 Passion his principle, and parts his prey.
 Mediums in vice and virtue speak a mind
 Within the pale of temperance confin'd;
 The daring spirit scorns her narrow schemes,
 And, good or bad, is always in extremes.

Man's practice duly weigh'd, through ev'ry age
 On the same plan hath envy form'd her rage:
 'Gainst those whom fortune hath our rivals made
 In way of science, and in way of trade,
 Stung with mean jealousy, she arms her spite,
 First works, then views their ruin with delight.

Our Hogarth here a grand improver shines,
And nobly on the gen'ral plan refines;
He like himself o'erleaps the servile bound;
Worth is his mark, wherever worth is found.
Should painters only his vast wrath suffice?
Genius in ev'ry walk is lawful prize.
'Tis a gross insult to his o'ergrown state;
His love to merit is to feel his hate.

When Wilkes, our countryman, our common
friend,
Arose, his king, his country to defend,
When tools of pow'r he bar'd to public view,
And from their holes the sneaking cowards drew,
When rancour found it far beyond her reach
To soil his honour, and his truth impeach,
What could induce thee, at a time and place,
Where manly foes had blush'd to show their face,
To make that effort, which must damn thy name,
And sink thee deep, deep in thy grave with shame?
Did virtue move thee? No, 'twas pride, rank
pride,
And if thou hadst not done it, thou hadst di'd.
Malice (who, disappointed of her end,
Whether to work the bane of foe or friend,
Preys on herself, and driven to the stake,
Gives virtue that revenge she scorns to take)
Had kill'd thee, tott'ring on life's utmost verge,
Had Wilkes and liberty escap'd thy scourge.
When that great charter, which our fathers bought
With their best blood, was into question brought;
When, big with ruin, o'er each English head
Vile flav'ry hung suspended by a thread;
When liberty, all trembling and aghast,
Fear'd for the future, knowing what was past;
When ev'ry breast was chill'd with deep despair,
Till reason pointed out that Pratt was there;
Lurking, most ruffian like, behind a screen,
So plac'd all things to see, himself unseen,
Virtue, with due contempt, saw Hogarth stand,
The murd'rous pencil in his palsied hand.
What was the cause of liberty to him,
Or what was honour? Let them sink or swim,
So he may gratify without controul,
The mean resentments of his selfish soul.
Let freedom perish, if, to freedom true,
In the same ruin Wilkes may perish too.
With all the symptoms of assur'd decay,
With age and sickness pinch'd, and worn away,
Pale quiv'ring lips, lank cheeks, and fault'ring
tongue,
The spirits out of tune, the nerves unstrung,
The body shrivell'd up, thy dim eyes sunk
Within their sockets deep, thy weak hams shrunk
The body's weight unable to sustain, [vein,
The stream of life scarce trembling through the
More than half-kill'd by honest truths, which fell,
Through thy own fault, from men who wish'd thee well, [give,
Canst thou, e'en thus, thy thoughts to vengeance
And, dead to all things else, to malice live?
Hence, dotard, to thy closet, shut thee in,
By deep repentance wash away thy sin,
From haunts of men to shame and sorrow fly,
And, on the verge of death, learn how to die.

Vain exhortation! Wash the Ethiop white,
Discharge the leopard's spots, turn day to night,
Controul the course of nature, bid the deep
Hush at thy pigmy voice her waves to sleep,
Perform things passing strange, yet own thy art
Too weak to work a change in such a heart.
That envy which was woven in the frame
At first, will to the last remain the same.
Reason may droop, may die, but envy's rage
Improves by time, and gathers strength from age.
Some, and not few, vain triflers with the pen,
Unread, unpractis'd in the ways of men,
Tell us that envy, who with giant stride
Stalks through the vale of life by virtue's side,
Retreats when she hath drawn her latest breath,
And calmly hears her praises after death.
To such observers Hogarth gives the lie;
Worth may be hears'd, but envy cannot die;
Within the mansion of his gloomy breast,
A mansion suited well to such a guest,
Immortal, unimpair'd she rears her head,
And damns alike the living and the dead.

Oft have I known thee, Hogarth, weak and vain,
Thyself the idol of thy awkward strain,
Through the dull measure of a summer's day,
In phrase most vile, prate long long hours away,
Whilst friends with friends all gaping sit, and gaze
To hear a Hogarth babble Hogarth's praise.
But if athwart thee interruption came,
And mention'd with respect some ancient's name,
Some ancient's name, who in the days of yore
The crown of art with greatest honour wore,
How have I seen thy coward cheek turn pale,
And blank confusion seize thy mangled tale!
How hath thy jealousy to madness grown,
And deem'd his praise injurious to thy own!
Then without mercy did thy wrath make way,
And arts and artists all became thy prey;
Then didst thou trample on establish'd rules,
And proudly levell'd all the ancient schools,
Condemn'd those works, with praise through ages grac'd,
Which you had never seen, or could not taste.

"But would mankind have true perfection shown,
"It must be found in labours of my own.
"I dare to challenge in one single piece,
"Th' united force of Italy and Greece."
Thy eager hand the curtain then undrew,
And brought the boasted masterpiece to view.
Spare thy remarks—say not a single word—
The picture seen, why is the painter heard?
Call not up shame and anger in our cheeks;
Without a comment Sigismunda speaks.

Poor Sigismunda! what a fate is thine!
Dryden, the great high priest of all the nine,
Reviv'd thy name, gave what a muse could give,
And in his numbers bade thy mem'ry live;
Gave thee those soft sensations, which might move
And warm the coldest anchorite to love;
Gave thee that virtue which could curb desire,
Refine and consecrate love's headstrong fire;
Gave thee those griefs which made the stoic feel,
And call'd compassion forth from hearts of steel;
Gave thee that firmness which our sex may shame,
And make man bow to woman's juster claim,

So that our tears, which from compassion flow,
Seem to debase thy dignity of woe.
But O, how much unlike! how fall'n! how chang'd!

How much from nature and herself estrang'd!
How totally depriv'd of all the pow'rs
To show her feelings, and awaken ours,
Doth Sigismunda now devoted stand,
The helpless victim of a Dauber's hand!

But why, my Hogarth, such a progress made,
So rare a pattern for the sign-post trade,
In the full force and whirlwind of thy pride,
Why was Heroic painting laid aside?
Why is it not resum'd? Thy friends at court,
Men all in place and pow'r, crave thy support;
Be grateful then for once, and, through the field
Of politics, thy Epic pencil wield,
Maintain the cause, which they, good lack! avow,
And would maintain too, but they know not how.

Through ev'ry Pannel let thy virtue tell
How Bute prevail'd, how Pitt and Temple fell!
How England's sons (whom they conspir'd to blefs

Against our will, with insolent success)
Approve their fall, and with addresses run,
How got, God knows, to hail the Scottish fun!
Point out our fame in war, when vengeance,
hurl'd

From the strong arm of justice, shook the world;
Thine, and thy country's honour to increase,
Point out the honours of succeeding peace;
Our moderation, Christian-like, display,
Show what we got, and what we gave away.
In colours, dull and heavy as the tale,
Let a State-chaos through the whole prevail.

But, of events regardless, whilst the muse,
Perhaps with too much heat, her theme pursues;
Whilst her quick spirits rouse at freedom's call,
And ev'ry drop of blood is turn'd to gall;
Whilst a dear country, and an injur'd friend,
Urge my strong anger to the bitt'rest end;
Whilst honest trophies to revenge are rais'd,
Let not one real virtue pass unprais'd:
Justice with equal course bids satire flow,
And loves the virtue of her greatest foe.

O! that I here could that rare virtue mean,
Which scorns the rule of envy, pride, and spleen,
Which springs not from the labour'd works of art,

But hath its rise from nature in the heart,
Which in itself with happiness is crown'd,
And spreads with joy the blessing all around!

But truth forbids, and in these simple lays,
Contented with a diff'rent kind of praise,
Must Hogarth stand: that praise which genius gives,

In which to latest time the Artist lives,
But not the Man; which, rightly understood,
May make us great, but cannot make us good;
That praise be Hogarth's; freely let him wear
The wreath which genius wove, and planted
there.

Foe as I am, should envy tear it down,
Myself would labour to replace the crown.

VOL. X.

In walks of humour, in that cast of style,
Which, probing to the quick, yet makes us smile;
In comedy, his nat'ral road to fame,
Nor let me call it by a meaner name,
Where a beginning, middle, and an end
Are aptly join'd; where parts on parts depend,
Each made for each, as bodies for their soul,
So as to form one true and perfect whole,
Where a plain story to the eye is told,
Which we conceive the moment we behold,
Hogarth unrivall'd stands, and shall engage
Unrivall'd praise to the most distant age.

How could'st thou then to shame perversely run,
And tread that path which nature bade thee
shun?

Why did ambition overleap her rules,
And thy vast parts become the sport of fools?
By diff'rent methods diff'rent men excel,
But where is he who can do all things well?
Humour thy province, for some monstrous crime
Pride struck thee with the phrenzy of Sublime.
But, when the work was finish'd, could thy mind
So partial be, and to herself so blind,
What with contempt all view'd, to view with
awe,

Nor see those faults which ev'ry blockhead saw?
Blush, thou vain man, and if desire of fame,
Founded on real art, thy thoughts inflame,
To quick destruction Sigismunda give,
And let her mem'ry die, that thine may live.

But should fond candour, for her mercy sake,
With pity view, and pardon this mistake;
Or should oblivion, to thy wish most kind,
Wipe off that stain, nor leave one trace behind;
Of arts despis'd, of artists by thy frown
Aw'd from just hopes, of rising worth kept down,
Of all thy meanness through this mortal race,
Can'st thou the living memory erase?
Or shall not vengeance follow to the grave,
And give back just that measure which you
gave?

With so much merit, and so much success,
With so much pow'r to curse, so much to blefs,
Would he have been man's friend instead of foe,
Hogarth had been a little god below.

Why then, like savage giants, fam'd of old,
Of whom in scripture story we are told,
Dost thou in cruelty that strength employ,
Which nature meant to save, not to destroy?
Why dost thou, all in horrid pomp array'd,
Sit grinning o'er the ruins thou hast made?
Most rank ill-nature must applaud thy art;
But even candour must condemn thy heart.

For me, who warm and zealous for my friend,
In spite of railing thousands, will commend,
And, no less warm and zealous 'gainst my foes,
Spite of commending thousands, will oppose,
I dare thy worst, with scorn behold thy rage,
But with an eye of pity view thy age;
Thy feeble age, in which, as in a glass,
We see how men to dissolution pass.
Thou wretched being, whom, on reason's plan,
So chang'd, so lost, I cannot call a man,
What could persuade thee, at this time of life,
To launch afresh into the sea of strife?

Hh

Better for thee, scarce crawling on the earth,
Almost as much a child as at thy birth,
To have resign'd in peace thy parting breath,
And sunk unnotic'd in the arms of death.
Why would thy gray, gray hairs resentment brave,
Thus to go down with sorrow to the grave?
Now, by my soul, it makes me blush to know
My spirit could descend to such a foe.
Whatever cause the vengeance might provoke,
It seems rank cowardice to give the stroke.

Sure 'tis a curse which angry fates impose,
To mortify man's arrogance, that those
Who're fashion'd of some better sort of clay,
Much sooner than the common herd decay.
What bitter pangs must humble genius feel,
In their last hours, to view a Swift and Steele?
How must ill-boding horrors fill her breast,
When she beholds men, mark'd above the rest
For qualities most dear, plung'd from that height,
And sunk, deep sunk, in second childhood's
night?

Are men, indeed, such things, and are the best
More subject to this evil than the rest,
To drivel out whole years of idiot breath,
And sit the monuments of living death?
O, galling circumstance to human pride!
Abasing thought, but not to be denied!
With curious art the brain too finely wrought,
Preys on herself, and is destroy'd by thought.
Constant attention wears the active mind,
Blots out her pow'rs and leaves a blank behind.
But let not youth, to insolence allied,
In heat of blood, in full career of pride,
Possess'd of genius, with unhallow'd rage,
Mock the infirmities of rev'rend age.
The greatest genius to this fate may bow;
Reynolds, in time, may be like Hogarth now.

THE GHOST.

IN FOUR BOOKS.

BOOK I.

WITH eager search to dart the soul,
Curiously vain, from pole to pole,
And from the planets wand'ring spheres
T' extort the number of our years,
And whether all those years shall flow
Serenely smooth, and free from woe,
Or rude misfortune shall deform
Our life with one continual storm;
Or if the scene shall motley be,
Alternate joy and misery;
Is a desire, which, more or less,
All men must feel, though few confess.
Hence, ev'ry place and ev'ry age
Affords subsistence to the sage,
Who, free from this world and its cares,
Holds an acquaintance with the stars,
From whom he gains intelligence
Of things to come some ages hence,
Which unto friends, at easy rates,
He readily communicates.

At its first rise, which all agree on,
This noble science was Chaldean,
That ancient people, as they fed
Their flocks upon the mountain's head,
Gaz'd on the stars, observ'd their motions,
And suck'd in astrologic notions,
Which they so eagerly pursue,
As folks are apt whate'er is new,
That things below at random rove,
Whilst they're consulting things above;
And when they now so poor were grown,
That they'd no houses of their own,
They made bold with their friends the stars,
And prudently made use of theirs.

To Egypt from Chaldaea it travell'd,
And fate at Memphis was unravell'd:
Th' exotic science soon struck root,
And flourish'd into high repute.
Each learned priest, O strange to tell!
Could circles make, and cast a spell;
Could read and write, and taught the nation
The holy art of divination.

Nobles themselves, for at that time
Knowledge in nobles was no crime,
Could talk as learned as the priest,
And prophecy as much at least.
Hence all the fortune-telling crew,
Whose crafty skill mars nature's hue,
Who, in vile tatters, with smirch'd face,
Run up and down from place to place,
To gratify their friends' desires,
From Bampfild Carew to Moll Squires,
Are rightly term'd Egyptians all,
Whom we, mistaking, gypsies call.

The Grecian sages borrow'd this,
As they did other sciences,
From fertile Egypt, though the loan
They had not honesty to own.
Dodona's oaks, inspir'd by Jove,
A learned and prophetic grove,
Turn'd vegetable necromancers,
And to all comers gave their answers:
At Delphos, to Apollo dear,
All men the voice of fate might hear;
Each subtle priest, on three-legg'd stool,
To take in wise men, play the fool.
A mystery, so made for gain,
E'en now in fashion must remain.
Enthusiasts never will let drop
What brings such business to their shop,
And that great saint we Whitefield call,
Keeps up the humbug spiritual.

Among the Romans, not a bird
Without a prophecy was heard;
Fortunes of empires often hung
On the magician magpie's tongue,
And ev'ry crow was to the state
A sure interpreter of fate.
Prophets, embodied in a college,
(Time out of mind your seat of knowledge,
For genius never fruit can bear
Unless it first is planted there,
And solid learning never falls
Without the verge of college walls)
Infallible accounts would keep
When it was best to watch or sleep,

To eat or drink, to go or stay,
 And when to fight or run away;
 When matters were for action ripe,
 By looking at a double tripe;
 When emperors would live or die,
 They in an ass's skull could spy;
 When gen'ral's would their station keep,
 Or turn their backs, in hearts of sheep.
 In matters, whether small or great,
 In private families or state,
 As among us, the holy seer
 Officiously would interfere,
 With pious arts and rev'rend skill
 Would bend lay-bigots to his will,
 Would help or injure foes or friends,
 Just as it serv'd his private ends.
 Whether in honest way of trade,
 Traps for virginity were laid,
 Or if, to make their party great,
 Designs were form'd against the state,
 Regardless of the common weal,
 By int'rest led, which they call zeal,
 Into the scale was always thrown
 The will of Heav'n to back their own.

England, a happy land we know,
 Where follies naturally grow;
 Where without culture they arise,
 And tow'r above the common size;
 England a fortune-telling host
 As num'rous as the stars could boast;
 Matrons who toss the cup, and see
 The grounds of fate in grounds of tea;
 Who vers'd in ev'ry modest lore,
 Can a lost maidenhead restore,
 Or, if their pupils rather choose it,
 Can show the readiest way to lose it;
 Gypsies who ev'ry ill can cure,
 Except the ill of being poor;
 Who charms 'gainst love and agues fell,
 Who can in hen-roost set a spell,
 Prepar'd by arts, to them best known,
 To catch all feet except their own;
 Who as to fortune can unlock it,
 As easily as pick a pocket;
 Scotchmen who, in their country's right,
 Possess the gift of second-sight,
 Who (when their barren heaths they quit,
 Sure argument of prudent wit,
 Which reputation to maintain,
 They never venture back again)
 By lies prophetic heap up riches,
 And boast the luxury of breeches.

Amongst the rest, in former years,
 Campbell, illustrious name, appears,
 Great hero of futurity,
 Who blind could every thing foresee,
 Who dumb could ev'ry thing foretell,
 Who fate with equity to sell,
 Always dealt out the will of Heaven
 According to what price was given.

Of Scottish race, in Highlands born,
 Possess'd with native pride and scorn,
 He hither came, by custom led,
 To curse the hands which gave him bread.

With want of truth and want of sense,
 Amply made up by impudence,
 (A succedaneum, which we find
 In common use with all mankind)
 Carefs'd and favour'd too by those,
 Whose heart with patriot feelings glows;
 Who foolishly, where'er dispers'd,
 Still place their native country first;
 (For Englishmen alone have sense,
 To give a stranger preference,
 Whilst modest merit of their own
 Is left in poverty to groan)
 Campbell foretold just what he would,
 And left the stars to make it good;
 On whom he had impress'd such awe,
 His dictates current pass'd for law;
 Submissive all his empire own'd;
 No star durst smile when Campbell frown'd.

This sage deceas'd, for all must die,
 And Campbell's no more safe than I,
 No more than I can guard the heart,
 When death shall hurl the fatal dart,
 Succeeded, ripe in art and years,
 Another fav'rite of the spheres;
 Another and another came,
 Of equal skill, and equal fame;
 As white each wand, as black each gown,
 As long each beard, as wise each frown;
 In ev'ry thing so like, you'd swear,
 Campbell himself was sitting there.
 To all the happy art was known,
 To tell our fortunes, make their own.

Seated in garret, for you know,
 The nearer to the stars we go,
 The greater we esteem his art,
 Fools curious flock from ev'ry part.
 The rich, the poor, the maid, the married,
 And those who could not walk were carried.

The butler, hanging down his head,
 By chamber-maid, or cook-maid led,
 Inquires, if from his friend the moon,
 He has advice of pilfer'd spoon.

The court-bred woman of condition
 (Who, to approve her disposition
 As much superior as her birth
 To those compos'd of common earth,
 With double spirit must engage
 In ev'ry folly of the age)

The honourable arts would buy,
 To pack the cards, and cog a die.

The hero (who for brawn and face
 May claim right honourable place
 Amongst the chiefs of Butcher-Row,
 Who might some thirty years ago,
 If we may be allow'd to guess
 At his employment by his dress,
 Put med'cines off from cart or stage,
 The grand Toscano of the age,
 Or might about the countries go,
 High steward of a puppet-show,
Steward and stewardship most meet,
 For all know puppets never eat;
 Who would be thought, (though, save the mark,
 That point is something in the dark)

H h ij

The man of honour, one like those
 Renown'd in story, who lov'd blows
 Better than victuals, and would fight,
 Merely for sport, from morn to night;
 Who treads like Mavors firm, whose tongue
 Is with the triple thunder hung;
 Who cries to fear—Stand off—aloof—
 And talks as he were cannon-proof;
 Would be deem'd ready when you list,
 With sword and pistol, stick and fist,
 Careless of points, balls, bruises, knocks,
 At once to fence, fire, cudgel, box,
 But at the same time bears about,
 Within himself some touch of doubt,
 Of prudent doubt, which hints—that fame
 Is nothing but an empty name;
 That life is rightly understood
 By all to be a real good;
 That even in a hero's heart,
Discretion is the better part;
 That this same honour may be won,
 And yet no kind of danger run)
 Like Drugger comes, that magic pow'rs
 May ascertain his lucky hours.
 For at some hours the fickle dame
 Whom fortune properly we name,
 Who ne'er considers wrong or right,
 When wanted most plays least in fight,
 And, like a modern court-bred jilt,
 Leaves her chief fav'rites in a tilt.
 Some hours there are, when from the heart
Courage into some other part,
 No matter wherefore, makes retreat,
 And fear usurps the vacant seat;
 Whence planet-struck we often find
Stuarts and Sackvilles of mankind.

Farther he'd know (and by his art
 A conjuror can that impart)
 Whether politer it is reckon'd
 To have or not to have a second,
 To drag the friends in, or alone
 To make the danger all their own;
 Whether repletion is not bad,
 And fighters with full stomachs mad;
 Whether before he seeks the plain,
 It were not well to breathe a vein;
 Whether a gentle salivation,
 Consistently with reputation,
 Might not of precious use be found,
 Not to prevent indeed a wound,
 But to prevent the consequence
 Which oftentimes arises thence,
 Those fevers, which the patient urge on
 To gates of death, by help of surgeon;
 Whether a wind at east or west
 Is for green wounds accounted best;
 Whether (was he to choose) his mouth
 Should point towards the north or south;
 Whether most safely he might use
 On these occasions, pumps or shoes;
 Whether it better is to fight
 By sun-shine, or by candle-light;
 Or (lest a candle should appear
 Too mean to shine in such a sphere,
 For who would of a candle tell
 To light a hero into hell,

And lest the sun should partial rise
 To dazzle one or t' other's eyes,
 Or one or t' other's brains to scorch)
 Might not Dame Luna hold a torch;

These points with dignity discuss'd,
 And gravely fix'd a task which must
 Require no little time and pains,
 To make our hearts friends with our brains,
 The man of war would next engage
 The kind assistance of the sage,
 Some previous method to direct,
 Which should make these of none effect.

Could he not, from the mystic school
 Of art, produce some sacred rule,
 By which a knowledge might be got,
 Whether men valiant were or not,
 So he that challenges might write
 Only to those who would not fight?

Or could he not some way dispense,
 By help of which (without offence
 To honour, whose nice nature's such,
 She scarce endures the slightest touch)
 When he, for want of t' other rule,
 Mistakes his man, and, like a fool,
 With some vain fighting blade gets in,
 He fairly may get out again?

Or, should some demon lay a scheme
 To drive him to the last extreme,
 So that he must confess his fears,
 In mercy to his nose and ears,
 And, like a prudent recreant knight,
 Rather do any thing than fight,
 Could he not some expedient buy
 To keep his shame from public eye?
 For well he held, and men review,
 Nine in ten hold the maxim too,
 That honour's like a maidenhead,
 Which, if in private brought to bed,
 Is none the worse, but walks the town,
 Ne'er lost, until the loss be known.

The parson too (for now and then
 Parsons are just like other men,
 And here and there a grave divine
 Has passions such as your's or mine)
 Burning with holy lust to know
 When fate preferment will bestow,
 'Fraid of detection, not of sin,
 With circumspection sneaking in
 To conj'ror, as he does to whore,
 Through some bye-alley, or back door,
 With the same caution orthodox
 Consults the stars, and gets a pox.

The citizen, in fraud grown old,
 Who knows no deity but gold,
 Worn out, and gasping now for breath,
 A med'cine wants to keep off death;
 Would know, if that he cannot have,
 What coins are current in the grave;
 If, when the stocks (which by his pow'r
 Would rise or fall in half an hour,
 For, though unthought of and unseen,
 He work'd the springs behind the screen)
 By his directions came about,
 And rose to par, he should sell out;
 Whether he safely might or no
 Replace it in the funds below.

By all address'd, believ'd, and paid,
 Many pursu'd the thriving trade,
 And, great in reputation grown,
 Successive held the magic throne.
 Favour'd by ev'ry darling passion,
 The love of novelty and fashion,
 Ambition, av'rice, lust, and pride,
 Riches pour'd in on ev'ry side.
 But when the prudent laws thought fit
 To curb this insolence of wit;
 When senates wisely had provided,
 Decreed, enacted, and decided,
 That no such vile and upstart elves
 Should have more knowledge than themselves;
 When fines and penalties were laid
 To stop the progress of the trade,
 And stars no longer could dispense,
 With honour, farther influence,
 And wizards (which must be confess'd
 Was of more force than all the rest)
 No certain way to tell had got,
 Which were informers, and which not;
 Affrighted sages were perforce
 Oblig'd to steer some other course.
 By various ways, these sons of chance
 Their fortunes labour'd to advance,
 Well knowing, by unerring rules,
 Knaves starve not in the land of fools.

Some, with high titles and degrees,
 Which wise men borrow when they please,
 Without or trouble or expence,
 Physicians instantly commence,
 And proudly boast an equal skill
 With those who claim the right to kill.

Others about the countries roam
 (For not one thought of going home)
 With pistol and adopted leg,
 Prepar'd at once to rob or beg.

Some, the more subtle of their race,
 (Who felt some touch of coward grace,
 Who Tyburn to avoid had wit,
 But never fear'd deserving it)
 Came to their brother Smollet's aid,
 And carried on the critic trade.

Attach'd to letters and the muse,
 Some verses wrote, and some wrote news;
 Those each revolving month are seen,
 The heroes of a magazine;
 These, ev'ry morning, great appear
 In Ledger, or in Gazetteer;
 Spreading the falsehoods of the day
 By turns for Faden and for Say;
 Like Swifts, their force is always laid
 On that side where they best are paid.
 Hence mighty prodigies arise,
 And daily monsters strike our eyes;
 Wonders, to propagate the trade,
 More strange than ever Baker made,
 Are hawk'd about from street to street,
 And fools believe, whilst liars eat.

Now armies in the air engage,
 To fright a superstitious age;
 Now comets through the ether range,
 In governments portending change;

Now rivers to the ocean fly
 So quick, they leave their channels dry;
 Now monstrous whales on Lambeth shore
 Drink the Thames dry, and thirst for more;
 And ev'ry now and then appears
 An Irish savage numb'ring years,
 More than those happy sages could
 Who drew their breath before the flood.
 Now, to the wonder of all people,
 A church is left without a steeple;
 A steeple now is left in lurch,
 And mourns departure of the church,
 Which, borne on wings of mighty wind,
 Remov'd a furlong off we find.
 Now, wrath on cattle to discharge,
 Hail-stones as deadly fall, and large
 As those which were on Egypt sent,
 At once their crime and punishment;
 Or those which, as the prophet writes,
 Fell on the necks of Amorites,
 When, struck with wonder and amaze,
 The sun suspended, stay'd to gaze,
 And, from her duty longer kept,
 In Ajalon his sister slept.

But if such things no more engage
 The taste of a politer age,
 To help them out in time of need
 Another Tofts must rabbits breed.
 Each pregnant female trembling hears,
 And, overcome with spleen and fears,
 Consults her faithful glass no more,
 But madly bounding o'er the floor,
 Feels hairs all o'er her body grow,
 By fancy turn'd into a doe.
 Now, to promote their private ends,
 Nature her usual course suspends,
 And varies from the stated plan,
 Observ'd e'er since the world began.
 Bodies (which foolishly we thought,
 By custom's servile maxims taught,
 Needed a regular supply,
 And without nourishment must die)
 With craving appetites and sense
 Of hunger easily dispense,
 And, pliant to their wond'rous skill,
 Are taught, like watchers, to stand still Uninjur'd, for a month or more,
 Then go on as they did before.
 The novel takes, the tale succeeds,
 Ample supplies its author's needs;
 And Betty Canning is at least,
 With Gascoyne's help, a six months feast.

Whilst, in contempt of all our pains,
 The tyrant superstition reigns
 Imperious in the heart of man,
 And warps his thoughts from nature's plan:
 Whilst fond credulity, who ne'er
 The weight of wholesome doubts could bear,
 To reason and herself unjust,
 Takes all things blindly up on trust;
 Whilst curiosity, whose rage
 No mercy shows to sex or age,
 Must be indulg'd at the expence
 Of judgment, truth, and common sense;

Impostures cannot but prevail,
And when old miracles grow stale,
Jugglers will still the art pursue,
And entertain the world with new.

For them, obedient to their will,
And trembling at their mighty skill,
Sad spirits, summon'd from the tomb,
Glide glaring ghastly through the gloom,
In all the usual pomp of storms,
In horrid customary forms,
A wolf, a bear, an horse, an ape,
As fear and fancy gave them shape
'Tormented with despair and pain,
'They roar, they yell, and clank the chain.
Folly and guilt (for guilt, how'er
'The face of courage it may wear,
Is still a coward at the heart)
At fear-created phantoms start.
The priest, that very word implies
'That he's both innocent and wise,
Yet fears to travel in the dark,
Unless escorted by his clerk.

But let not ev'ry bungler deem
Too lightly of so deep a scheme;
For reputation of the art,
Each ghost must act a proper part,
Observe decorum's needful grace,
And keep the laws of time and place,
Must change, with happy variation,
His manners with his situation;
What in the country might pass down,
Would be impertinent in town.
No spirit of discretion here
Can think of breeding awe and fear,
'I will serve the purpose more by half
To make the congregation laugh.
We want no ensigns of surprise,
Locks stiff with gore, and sawcer eyes;
Give us an entertaining sprite,
Gentle, familiar, and polite,
One who appears in such a form
As might an holy hermit warm,
Or who on former schemes refines,
And only talks by sounds and signs,
Who will not to the eye appear,
But pays her visits to the ear,
And knocks so gently, 'twould not fright
A lady in the darkest night.
Such is our FANNY, whose good will,
Which cannot in the grave lie still,
Brings her on earth to entertain
Her friends and lovers in Cock-lane.

BOOK II.

A SACRED standard rule we find,
By poets held time out of mind,
To offer to Apollo's shrine,
And call on one, or all the nine.

This custom, through a bigot zeal,
Which moderns of fine taste must feel
For those who wrote in days of yore
Adopted stands like many more,
Though ev'ry cause, which then conspir'd
To make it practis'd and admir'd,

Yielding to time's destructive course,
For ages past hath lost its force.

With ancient bards, an invocation
Was a true act of adoration,
Of worship an essential part,
And not a formal piece of art,
Of paltry reading a parade,
A dull solemnity in trade,
A pious fever, taught to burn
An hour or two, to serve a turn.

They talk'd not of Castalian springs,
By way of saying pretty things,
As we dress out our flimsy rhymes;
'Twas the religion of the times,
And they believ'd that holy stream
With greater force made fancy teem,
Reckon'd by all a true specific
To make the barren brain prolific:
Thus Romish church (a scheme which bears
Not half so much excuse as theirs)
Since faith implicitly hath taught her,
Reveres the force of holy water.

The Pagan system, whether true
Or false, its strength, like buildings, drew
From many parts dispos'd to bear,
In one great whole, their proper share.
Each god of eminent degree
To some vast beam compar'd might be;
Each godling was a peg, or rather
A cramp, to keep the beams together;
And man as safely might pretend
From Jove the thunder-bolt to rend,
As with an impious pride aspire
To rob Apollo of his lyre.

With settled faith and pious awe,
Establish'd by the voice of law,
Then poets to the muses came,
And from their altars caught the flame.
Genius, with Phœbus for his guide,
The muse ascending by his side,
With tow'ring pinions dar'd to soar,
Where eye could scarcely strain before.

But why should we, who cannot feel
These glowings of a Pagan zeal,
That wild enthusiastic force,
By which, above her common course,
Nature in ecstasy up-borne,
Look'd down on earthly things with scorn;
Who have no more regard, 'tis known,
For their religion than our own,
And feel not half so fierce a flame
At Clio's as at Fisher's name;
Who know these boasted sacred streams
Were mere romantic idle dreams,
That Thames has waters clear as those
Which on the top of Pindus rose,
And that the fancy to refine,
Water's not half so good as wine;
Who know, if profit strike our eye,
Should we drink Helicon quite dry,
Th' whole fountain would not thither lead
So soon as one poor jug from Tweed;
Who, if to raise poetic fire,
The pow'r of beauty we require,
In any public place can view
More than the Grecians ever knew;

If wit into the scale is thrown;
Can boast a Lennox of our own;
Why should we servile customs choose,
And court an antiquated muse?
No matter why—to ask a reason,
In pedant bigotry is treason.

In the broad, beaten, turnpike-road
Of backney'd panegyric ode,
No modern poet dares to ride
Without Apollo by his side,
Nor in a sonnet take the air,
Unless his lady muse be there.
She, from some amaranthine grove,
Where little loves and graces rove,
The laurel to my lord must bear,
Or garlands make for rubores to wear;
She, with soft elegiac verse,
Must grace some mighty villains' herse;
Or for some infant, doom'd by fate
To wallow in a large estate,
With rhymes the cradle must adorn,
To tell the world a fool is born.

Since then our critic lords expect
No hardy poet should reject
Establish'd maxims, or presume
To place much better in their room,
By nature fearful, I submit,
And in this dearth of sense and wit,
With nothing done, and little said,
(By wild excursive fancy led,
Into a second book thus far,
Like some unwary traveller,
Whom varied scenes of wood and lawn,
With treacherous delight, have drawn;
Deluded from his purpos'd way,
Whom ev'ry step leads more astray;
Who gazing round can no where spy,
Or house, or friendly cottage nigh,
And resolution seems to lack
To venture forward or go back)
Invoke some goddess to descend,
And help me to my journey's end.
Though conscious Arrow all the while
Hears the petition with a smile,
Before the glass her charms unfolds,
And in herself my muse beholds.

Truth, goddess of celestial birth,
But little lov'd, or known on earth,
Whose pow'r but seldom rules the heart,
Whose name, with hypocritic art,
An errant stalking-horse is made,
A snug pretence to drive a trade,
An instrument convenient grown
To plant, more firmly, falsehood's throne,
As rebels varnish o'er their cause
With specious colouring of laws,
And pious traitors draw the knife
In the king's name against his life;
Whether (from cities far away)
Where fraud and falsehood scorn thy sway)
The faithful nymph's and shepherd's pride,
With love and virtue by thy side,
Your hours in harmless joys are spent
Amongst the children of content;
Or, fond of gaiety and sport,
You tread the round of England's court;

Howe'er my lord may frowning go,
And treat the stranger as a foe,
Sure to be found a welcome guest
In George's and in Charlotte's breast,
If, in the giddy hours of youth,
My constant soul adher'd to truth;
If, from the time I first wrote man,
I still pursu'd thy sacred plan,
Tempted by interest in vain
To wear mean falsehood's golden chain;
If, for a season drawn away,
Starting from virtue's path astray,
All low disguise I scorn'd to try,
And dar'd to sin, but not to lie;
Hither, O hither, condescend,
Eternal Truth, thy steps to bend,
And favour him, who ev'ry hour
Confesses and obeys thy pow'r!

But come not with that easy mien,
By which you won the lively Dean,
Nor yet assume that strumpet air,
Which Rabelais taught thee first to wear,
Nor yet that arch ambiguous face,
Which with Cervantes gave thee grace,
But come in sacred vesture clad,
Solemnly dull, and truly sad!

Far from thy seemly matron train
Be idiot mirth, and laughter vain!
For wit and humour, which pretend
At once to please us and amend,
They are not for my present turn,
Let them remain in France with Sterne.

Of noblest city parents born,
Whom wealth and dignities adorn,
Who still one constant tenor keep,
Not quite awake, nor quite asleep,
With thee, let formal dullness come,
And deep attention, ever dumb,
Who on her lips her fingers lays,
Whilst every circumstance she weighs,
Whose downcast eye is often found
Bent without motion to the ground,
Or, to some outward thing confin'd,
Remits no image to the mind,
No pregnant mark of meaning bears,
But stupid without vision stares;
Thy steps let gravity attend,
Wisdom's and truth's unerring friend.
For one may see with half an eye,
That gravity can never lie;
And his arch'd brow, pull'd o'er his eyes,
With solemn proof proclaims him wise.

Free from all waggeries and sports,
The produce of luxurious courts,
Where sloth and lust enervate youth,
Come thou, a downright city truth;
The city, which we ever find
A sober pattern for mankind;
Where man, in equilibrio hung,
Is seldom old, and never young,
And from the cradle to the grave,
Not virtue's friend, nor vice's slave;
As dancers on the wire we spy,
Hanging between the earth and sky.

She comes—I see her from afar
Bending her course to Temple-Bar;

All sage and silent is her train,
 Deportment grave, and garments plain,
 Such as may suit a parson's wear,
 And fit the head-piece of a mayor.

By truth inspir'd, our Bacon's force
 Open'd the way to learning's source;
 Boyle through the works of nature ran;
 And Newton, something more than man,
 Div'd into nature's hidden springs,
 Laid bare the principles of things,
 Above the earth our spirits bore,
 And gave us worlds unknown before.
 By truth inspir'd, when Lauder's spight
 O'er Milton cast the veil of night,
 Douglas arose, and through the maze
 Of intricate and winding ways,
 Came where the subtle traitor lay,
 And dragg'd him trembling to the day;
 Whilst he (O shame to noblest parts,
 Dishonour to the lib'ral arts,
 To traffic in so vile a scheme) !
 Whilst he, our letter'd Polypheme,
 Who had confed'rate forces join'd,
 Like a base coward, skulk'd behind.
 By truth inspir'd, our critics go
 To track Fingal in Highland snow,
 To form their own and others creed
 From manuscripts they cannot read.
 By truth inspir'd, we numbers see
 Of each profession and degree,
 Gentle and simple, lord and cit,
 Wit without wealth, wealth without wit,
 When Punch and Sheridan have done,
 To FANNY's ghostly lectures run
 By truth and FANNY now inspir'd,
 I feel my glowing bosom fir'd;
 Desire beats high in ev'ry vein
 To sing the spirit of Cock-Lane;
 To tell (just as the measure flows
 In halting rhyme, half verse, half prose)
 With more than mortal arts endu'd,
 How she united force withstood,
 And proudly gave a brave defiance
 To wit and dulness in alliance.
 This APPARITION (with relation
 To ancient modes of derivation,
 This we may properly so call,
 Although it ne'er appears at all,
 As by the way of inuendo,
Lucas is made à non lucendo)
 Superior to the vulgar mode,
 Nobly disdains that servile road,
 Which coward ghosts, as it appears,
 Have walk'd in full five thousand years,
 And for restraint too mighty grown,
 Strikes out a method of her own.

Others may meanly start away,
 Aw'd by the herald of the day,
 With faculties too weak to bear
 The freshness of the morning air,
 May vanish with the melting gloom,
 And glide in silence to the tomb;
She dares the sun's most piercing light,
 And knocks by day as well as night.
Others, with mean and partial view,
 Their visits pay to one or two;

She great in reputation grown,
 Keeps the best company in town.
Our active enterprising ghost
 As large and splendid routes can boast
 As those which, rais'd by pride's command,
 Block up the passage through the Strand.
 Great adepts in the fighting trade,
 Who serve their time on the parade;
She-saints who, true to pleasure's plan,
 Talk about God, and lust for man;
 Wits, who believe nor God, nor ghost,
 And fools, who worship ev'ry post;
 Cowards, whose lips with war are hung;
 Men truly brave, who hold their tongue;
 Courtiers, who laugh they know not why,
 And cits, who for the same cause cry;
 The canting tabernacle-brother,
 (For one rogue still suspects another)
 Ladies, who to a spirit fly,
 Rather than with their husbands lie;
 Lords, who as chaste pass their lives
 With other women as their wives;
 Proud of their intellects and clothes,
 Physicians, lawyers, parsons, beaux,
 And, truant from their desks and shops,
 Spruce Temple clerks, and 'prentice sops,
 To FANNY come, with the same view,
 To find her false, or find her true.
 Hark! something creeps about the house!
 Is it a spirit, or a mouse?
 Hark! something scratches round the room!
 A cat, a rat, a stubb'd birch-broom.
 Hark! on the wainscot now it knocks!
 If thou'rt a ghost, cried orthodox,
 With that affected solemn air
 Which hypocrites delight to wear,
 And all those forms of consequence
 Which fools adopt instead of sense;
 If thou'rt a ghost, who from the tomb
 Stalk'st sadly silent through this gloom,
 In breach of nature's stated laws,
 For good, or bad, or for no cause,
 Give now nine knocks; like priests of old,
 Nine we a sacred number hold.

'Psha, cried Profound, (a man of parts,
 Deep read in all the curious arts,
 Who to their hidden springs had trac'd
 The force of numbers, rightly plac'd)
 As to the number, you are right,
 As to the form, mistaken quite.
 What's nine? Your adepts all agree,
 The virtue lies in three times three.

He said, no need to say it twice,
 For thrice she knock'd, and thrice, and thrice.

The crowd, confounded and amaz'd,
 In silence at each other gaz'd.
 From Celia's hand the snuff-box fell,
 Tinsel, who ogled with the belle,
 To pick it up attempts in vain,
 He stoops, but cannot rise again.
Immane Pomposo was not heard
 T' import one crabbed foreign word.
 Fear seizes heroes, fools, and wits,
 And Plausible his pray'rs forgets.

At length, as people just awake,
 Into wild dissonance they break;

All talk'd at once, but not a word
Was understood, or plainly heard.
Such is the noise of chatt'ring geese,
Slow sailing on the summer breeze;
Such is the language discord speaks
In Welch women o'er beds of leeks;
Such the confus'd and horrid sounds
Of Irish in potatoe grounds.

But tir'd, for even C——'s tongue
Is not on iron hinges hung,
Fear and confusion found retreat,
Reason and order take their seat.
The fact confirm'd beyond all doubt,
They now would find the causes out.
For this a sacred rule we find
Among the nicest of mankind,
Which never might exception brook,
From Hobbes e'en down to Bolingbroke,
To doubt of facts, however true,
Unless they know the causes too.

Trifle, of whom 'twas hard to tell
When he intended ill or well,
Who, to prevent all farther pother,
Probably meant nor one nor t'other,
Who to be silent always loth,
Would speak on either side, or both,
Who, led away by love of fame,
If any new idea came,
Whate'er it made for, always said it,
Not with an eye to truth, but credit;
For orators profeſt, 'tis known,
Talk not for our sake, but their own;
Who always show'd his talents best
When serious things were turn'd to jest,
And, under much impertinence,
Possess'd no common share of sense;
Who could deceive the flying hours
With chat on butterflies and flow'rs;
Could talk of powder, patches, paint,
With the same zeal as of a faint;
Could prove a Sibyl brighter far
Than Venus or the Morning Star;
Whilst something still so gay, so new,
The smile of approbation drew,
And females ey'd the charming man,
Whilst their hearts flutter'd with their fan;
Trifle, who would by no means miss
An opportunity like this,
Proceeding on his usual plan,
Smil'd, strok'd his chin, and thus began.

With speers, or scissors, sword or knife,
When the fates cut the thread of life,
(For if we to the grave are sent,
No matter with what instrument)
The body in some lonely spot,
On dunghill vile, is laid to rot,
Or sleeps among more boly dead,
With pray'rs irreverently read;
The soul is sent where fate ordains,
To reap rewards, to suffer pains.

The virtuous to those mansions go,
Where pleasures unembitter'd flow;
Where, leading up a jocund band,
Vigour and youth dance hand in hand,
Whilst zephyr, with harmonious gales,
Pipes softest music through the vales,

And spring and Flora, gaily crown'd,
With velvet carpets spread the ground;
With livelier blush where roses bloom,
And ev'ry shrub expires perfume;
Where crystal streams meand'ring glide,
Where warbling flows the amber tide;
Where other suns dart brighter beams,
And light through purer ether streams.

Far other seats, far diff'rent state
The sons of wickedness await.
Justice (not that old bag I mean,
Who's nightly in the garden seen,
Who lets no spark of mercy rise
For crimes, by which men lose their eyes;
Nor her who, with an equal hand,
Weighs tea and sugar in the Strand;
Nor her who, by the world deem'd wife,
Deaf to the widow's piercing cries,
Steel'd 'gainst the starving orphan's tears,
On parsons her base tribunal rears;
But her who after death presides,
Whom sacred truth unerring guides;
Who, free from partial influence,
Nor sinks nor raises evidence,
Before whom nothing's in the dark,
Who takes no bribe, and keeps no clerk)
Justice with equal scale below
In due proportion weighs out woe,
And always with such lucky aim
Knows punishments so fit to frame,
That she augments their grief and pain,
Leaving no reason to complain.

Old maids and rakes are join'd together,
Coquettes and prudes, like April weather.
Wit's forc'd to chum with common sense,
And lust is yok'd to impotence.
Professors (justice so decreed)
Unpaid must constant lectures read;
On earth it often doth befall,
They're paid, and never read at all.
Parsons must practise what they teach,
And Bishops are compell'd to preach.

She who on earth was nice and prim,
Of delicacy full, and whim,
Whose tender nature could not bear
The rudeness of the churlish air,
Is doom'd, to mortify her pride,
The change of weather to abide,
And sells, whilst tears with liquor mix,
Burnt brandy on the shore of Styx.

Avaro, by long use grown bold
In ev'ry ill which brings him gold,
Who his Redeemer would pull down,
And sell his God for half-a-crown;
Who, if some blockhead should be willing
To lend him on his soul a shilling,
A well-made bargain would esteem it,
And have more sense than to redeem it;
Justice shall in those shades confine,
To drudge for Plutus in the mine,
All the day long to toil and roar,
And cursing work the stubborn ore,
For coxcombs here, who have no brains,
Without a sixpence for his pains.
Thence, with each due return of night,
Compell'd the tall, thin, half-starv'd sprite.

Shall earth revisit, and survey
The place where once his treasure lay;
Shall view the stall, where boly pride
With letter'd ignorance allied,
Once hail'd him mighty and ador'd,
Descended to another lord.
Then shall he screaming pierce the air,
Hang his lank jaws, and scowl despair;
Then shall he ban at Heaven's decrees,
And, howling, sink to hell for ease.

Those who on earth through life have past
With equal pace, from first to last,
Nor vex'd with passions nor with spleen,
Insipid, easy, and serene;
Whose heads were made too weak to bear
The weight of business, or of care;
Who without merit, without crime,
Contrive to while away their time,
Nor good, nor bad, nor fools, nor wits,
Mild justice with a smile permits
Still to pursue their darling plan,
And find amusement how they can.

The beau, in gaudiest plumage drest
With lucky fancy, o'er the rest
Of air a curious mantle throws,
And chats among his brother beaux;
Or, if the weather's fine and clear,
No sign of rain or tempest near,
Encourag'd by the cloudless day,
Like gilded butterflies at play,
So lively all, so gay, so brisk,
In air they flutter, float, and frisk.

The belle (what mortal doth not know,
Belles after death admire a beau)?
With happy grace renews her art,
To trap the coxcomb's wand'ring heart.
And after death, as whilst they live,
A heart is all which beaux can give.

In some still, solemn, sacred shade,
Behold a group of authors laid,
News-paper wits, and sonneteers,
Gentlemen hards, and rhyming peers,
Biographers, whose wond'rous worth
Is scarce remember'd now on earth,
Whom Fielding's humour led astray,
And plaintive sops, debauch'd by Gray,
All sit together in a ring,
And laugh and prattle, write and sing.

On his own works, with laurel crown'd,
Neatly and elegantly bound,
(For this is one of many rules
With writing lords and laureat fools,
And which for ever must succeed
With other lords who cannot read,
However destitute of wit,
To make their works for book-case fit)
Acknowledg'd master of those seats,
Cibber his birth-day odes repeats.

With triumph now possess that seat,
With triumph now thy odes repeat,
Unrivall'd vigils proudly keep,
Whilst ev'ry hearer's lull'd to sleep;
But know, illustrious bard, when fate,
Which still pursues thy name with hate,
The regal laurel blasts, which now
Lies on the placid Whitehead's brow,

Low must descend thy pride and fame,
And Cibber's be the second name.
Here Trifle cough'd (for coughing still
Bears witness of the speaker's skill,
A necessary piece of art,
Of ret'ric an essential part,
And adepts in the speaking trade
Keep a cough by them ready made,
Which they successfully dispense
When at a loss for words or sense)
Here Trifle cough'd, here paus'd—but while
He strove to recollect his smile,
That happy engine of his art,
Which triumph'd o'er the female heart,
Credulity, the child of folly,
Begot on cloyster'd melancholy,
Who heard, with grief, the florid fool
Turn sacred things to ridicule,
And saw him, led by whim away,
Still farther from the subject stray,
Just in the happy nick, aloud,
In shape of M—e, address'd the crowd.

Were we with patience here to sit,
Dupes to th' impertinence of wit,
Till Trifle his harangue should end,
A Greenland night we might attend,
Whilst he, with fluency of speech,
Would various mighty nothings teach,
(Here Trifle, sternly looking down,
Gravely endeavour'd at a frown,
But nature unawares slept in,
And, mocking, turn'd it to a grin)
And when, in fancy's chariot hurl'd,
We had been carried round the world,
Involv'd in error, still in doubt,
He'd leave us where we first set out.
Thus soldiers (in whose exercise
Material use with grandeur vies)
Lift up their legs with mighty pain,
Only to set them down again.

Believe ye not (yes, all I see
In sound belief concur with me)
That Providence, for worthy ends,
To us unknown, this spirit sends!
Though speechless lay the trembling tongue,
Your faith was on your features hung,
Your faith I in your eyes could see,
When all were pale and star'd like me.
But scruples to prevent, and root
Out ev'ry shadow of dispute,
Pomposo, Plausible, and I,
With FANNY have agreed to try
A deep concerted scheme—This night,
To fix or to destroy her quite.
If it be true, before we've done,
We'll make it glaring as the sun;
If it be false, admit no doubt,
Ere morning's dawn we'll find it out.
Into the vaulted womb of death,
Where FANNY now, depriv'd of breath,
Lies fest'ring, whilst her troubled sprits
Adds horror to the gloom of night,
Will we descend, and bring from thence
Proofs of such force to common sense,
Vain triflers shall no more deceive,
And atheists tremble and believe.

He said, and ceas'd; the chamber rung
 With due applause from every tongue.
 The mingled sound (now let me see,
 Something by way of simile)
 Was it more like Strymonian cranes,
 Or winds, low murmuring, when it rains,
 Or drowsy hum of clust'ring bees,
 Or the boarse roar of angry seas?
 Or (still to heighten and explain,
 For else our simile is vain)
 Shall we declare it like all four,
 A scream, a murmur, hum, and roar?

Let fancy now in awful state
 Present this great triumvirate,
 (A method which receiv'd we find
 In other cases by mankind)
Elected with a joint consent,
 All fools in town to represent.

[swears.]

The clock strikes twelve—M—e starts and
 In oaths we know, as well as pray'rs,
 Religion lies, and a church brother
 May use at will or one or t'other.
 Plausible from his cassock drew
 A holy manual, seeming new;
 A book it was of private pray'r,
 But not a pin the worse for wear;
 For, as we by the bye may say,
 None but small saints in private pray.
 Religion, fairest maid on earth,
 As meek as good, who drew her birth
 From that blest union, when in heaven
 Pleasure was bride to Virtue given;
 Religion, ever pleas'd to pray,
 Possess'd the precious gift one day;
 Hypocrisy, of cunning born,
 Crept in and stole it ere the morn.
 Wh—te—d, that greatest of all saints,
 Who always prays and never faints,
 Whom she to her own brothers bore,
 Rapine and Lust, on Severn's shore,
 Receiv'd it from the squinting dame;
 From him to Plausible it came,
 Who with unusal care oppress'd,
 Now trembling, pull'd it from his breast.
 Doubts in his boding heart arise,
 And fancied spectres blast his eyes.
 Devotion springs from abject fear,
 And stamps his pray'rs for once sincere.

Pomposo (insolent and loud,
 Vain idol of a scribbling crowd,
 Whose very name inspires an awe,
 Whose ev'ry word is sense and law,
 For what his greatness hath decreed,
 Like laws of Persia and of Mede,
 Sacred through all the realm of wit,
 Must never of repeal admit;
 Who, cursing flattery, is the tool
 Of ev'ry fawning, flatt'ring fool;
 Who wit with jealous eye surveys,
 And sickens at another's praise;
 Who, proudly seiz'd of learning's throne,
 Now damns all learning but his own;
 Who scorns those common wares to trade in,
Reas'ning, convincing, and persuading,
 But makes each sentence current pass
 With puppy, concomb, scoundrel, ass;

For 'tis with him a certain rule,
 The folly's prov'd when he calls fool;
 Who, to increase his native strength,
 Draws words six syllables in length,
 With which, assisted with a frown
 By way of club, he knocks us down;
 Who 'bove the vulgar dares to rise,
 And sense of decency defies;
 For this same decency is made
 Only for bunglers in the trade,
 And, like the cobweb laws, is still Broke through by great ones when they will)—
 Pomposo, with strong sense supplied,
 Supported and confirm'd by pride,
 His comrades' terrors to beguile,
Grinn'd horribly a ghaustly smile:
 Features so horrid, were it light,
 Would put the devil himself to flight.

Such were the three in name and worth,
 Whom zeal and judgment singled forth
 To try the sprite on reason's plan,
 Whether it was of God or man.

Dark was the night, it was that hour
 When terror reigns in fullest pow'r,
 When, as the learn'd of old have said,
 The yawning grave gives up her dead,
 When murder, rapine by her side,
 Stalks o'er the earth with giant stride;
 Our Quixotes (for that knight of old
 Was not in truth by half so bold,
 Though reason at the same time cries,
 Our Quixotes are not half so wise,
 Since they, with other follies, boast
 An expedition 'gainst a ghost)
 Through the dull deep surrounding gloom,
 In close array, towards FANNY's tomb
 Adventur'd forth.—Caution before,
 With heedful step, the lantborn bore,
 Pointing at graves; and in the rear,
 Trembling, and talking loud, went Fear.
 The church-yard teem'd.—th' unsettled ground,
 As in ague, shook around;
 While in some dreary vault confin'd,
 Or riding on the hollow wind,
 Horror, which turns the heart to stone,
 In dreadful sounds was heard to groan,
 All staring, wild, and out of breath,
 At length they reach the place of death.

A vault it was, long time apply'd
 To hold the last remains of pride:
 No beggar there, of humble race,
 And humble fortunes, finds a place;
 To rest in pomp as well as ease,
 The only way's to pay the fees.
 Fools, rogues, and whores, if rich and great,
 Proud e'en in death, here rot in state.
 No thieves disrobe the well-drest dead,
 No plumbers steal the sacred lead;
 Quiet and safe the bodies lie,
 No sextons sell, no surgeons buy.

Thrice each the pond'rous key apply'd,
 And thrice to turn it vainly try'd,
 Till taught by prudence to unite,
 And straining with collected might,
 The stubborn wards resist no more,
 But open flies the growling door.

Three paces back they fell amaz'd,
Like statues stood, like madmen gaz'd;
The frighted blood forsakes the face,
And seeks the heart with quicker pace;
The throbbing heart its fears declares,
And upright stand the bristled hairs;
The head in wild distraction swims;
Cold sweats bedew the trembling limbs;
Nature, whilst fears her bosom chill,
Suspends her pow'rs, and life stands still.

Thus had they stood till now, but shame
(An useful, though neglected dame,
By Heav'n design'd the friend of man,
Though we degrade her all we can,
And strive, as our first proof of wit,
Her name and nature to forget)
Came to their aid in happy hour,
And with a wand of mighty pow'r
Struck on their hearts: vain fears subside,
And baffled, leave the field to pride.

Shall they, (forbid it Fame) shall they
The dictates of vile fear obey?
Shall they, the idols of the town,
To bugbears fancy form'd bow down?
Shall they, who greatest zeal express,
And undertook for all the rest,
Whose matchless courage all admire,
Inglorious from the task retire?
How would the wicked ones rejoice,
And infidels exalt their voice,
If M—e and Plausible were found,
By shadowes aw'd, to quit their ground?
How would fools laugh, should it appear
Pomposo was the slave of fear?
“Perish the thought! Though to our eyes
“In all its terrors hell should rise,
“Though thousand ghosts, in dread array,
“With glaring eye-balls, cross our way,
“Though caution, trembling, stands aloof,
“Still we will on, and dare the proof.”
They said; and without farther halt,
Dauntless march'd onward to the vault.

What mortal men, who e'er drew breath,
Shall break into the house of death,
With foot unballow'd, and from thence
The myst'ries of that state dispense,
Unless they, with due rites, prepare
Their weaker sense such sights to bear,
And gain permission from the State,
On earth their journal to relate?
Poets themselves, without a crime,
Cannot attempt it e'en in rhyme,
But always, on such grand occasion,
Prepare a solemn invocation,
A posy for grim Pluto weave,
And in smooth numbers ask his leave.
But why this caution? Why prepare
Rites, needless now? for thrice in air
The spirit of the night hath sneez'd,
And thrice hath clapp'd his wings well-pleas'd.

Descend then, Truth, and guard thy side,
My Muse, my Patroness, and Guide!
Let others at invention aim,
And seek by falsities for fame;
Our story wants not, at this time,
Flounces and furbelows in rhyme:

Relate plain facts; be brief and bold;
And let the poets, fam'd of old,
Seek, whilst our artless tale we tell,
In vain to find a parallel:

SILENT ALL THREE WENT IN, ABOUT
ALL THREE TURN'D SILENT, AND CAME OUT.

BOOK III.

IT WAS THE HOUR, when buswife Morn
With pearl and linen hangs each thorn,
When happy bards, who can regale
Their muse with country air and ale,
Ramble afield, to brooks and bow'rs,
To pick up sentiments and flow'rs;
When dogs and squires from kennel fly,
And hogs and farmers quit their sty;
When my Lord rises to the chase,
And brawny chaplain takes his place.

These images, or bad or good,
If they are rightly understood,
Sagacious readers must allow,
Proclaim us in the country now;
For observations mostly rise
From objects just before our eyes,
And ev'ry lord in critic wit
Can tell you where the piece was writ,
Can point out, as he goes along,
(And who shall dare to say he's wrong)?
Whether the warmth (for bards we know
At present, never more than glow)
Was in the town or country caught,
By the peculiar turn of thought.

IT WAS THE HOUR—though critics frown,
We now declare ourselves in town,
Nor will a moment's pause allow
For finding when we came, or how.
The man who deals in humble prose,
Tied down by rule and method, goes;
But they who court the vig'rous muse,
Their carriage have a right to choose.
Free as the air, and unconfin'd,
Swift as the motions of the mind,
The poet darts from place to place,
And instant bounds o'er time and space;
Nature (whilst blended fire and skill Inflame our passions to his will)
Smiles at her violated laws,
And crowns his daring with applause.

Should there be still some rigid few,
Who keep propriety in view,
Whose heads turn round, and cannot bear
This whirling passage through the air,
Free leave have such at home to sit,
And write a regimen for wit;
To clip our pinions let them try,
Not having heart themselves to fly.

IT WAS THE HOUR, when devotees
Breathe pious curses on their knees,
When they with pray'rs the day begin
To sanctify a night of sin;
When rogues of modesty, who roam
Under the veil of night, sneak home,
That free from all restraint and awe,
Just to the windward of the law,

Less modest rogues their tricks may play,
And plunder in the face of day.

But hold—whilst thus we play the fool,
In bold contempt of ev'ry rule,
Things of no consequence expressing,
Describing now, and now digressing,
To the discredit of our skill,
The main concern is standing still.

In Plays, indeed, when storms of rage
Tempestuous in the soul engage,
Or when the spirits, weak and low,
Are sunk in deep distress and woe,
With strict propriety we hear
Description stealing on the ear,
And put off feeling half an hour
To thatch a cot, or paint a flow'r;
But in these serious works, design'd
To mend the morals of mankind,
We must for ever be disgrac'd
With all the nicer sons of taste,
If once, the shadow to pursue,
We let the substance out of view.

Our means must uniformly tend
In due proportion to their end,
And ev'ry passage aptly join
To bring about the one design.
Our friends themselves cannot admit
This rambling, wild, digressive wit,
No—not those very friends, who found
Their credit on the self-same ground.

Peace, my good grumbling Sir—for once,
Sunk in the solemn, formal dunce,
This coxcomb shall your fears beguile—
We will be dull—that you may smile.

Come Method, come in all thy pride,
Dullness and Whitehead by thy side,
Dullness and method still are one,
And Whitehead is their darling son.
Not he * whose pen, above controul,
Struck terror to the guilty soul,
Made folly tremble through her state,
And villains blush at being great,
Whilst he himself with steady face,
Disdaining modesty and grace,
Could blunder on through thick and thin,
Through ev'ry mean and servile sin,
Yet swear by Philip and by Paul,
He nobly scorn'd to blush at all;
But he, who in the laureat chair,
By grace not merit planted there,
In awkward pomp is seen to sit,
And by his patent proves his wit;
For favours of the great, we know,
Can wit as well as rank bestow,
And they who without one pretension,
Can get for fools a place or pension,
Must able be suppos'd of course
(If reason is allow'd due force)
To give such qualities and grace
As may equip them for the place.

But he—who measures as he goes,
A mongrel kind of tinkling prose,
And is too frugal to dispense
At once both poetry and sense;

* Paul Whitehead.

Who, from amidst his slumb'ring guards,
Deals out a charge to subject bards,
Where couplets after couplets creep
Propitious to the reign of sleep,
Yet ev'ry word imprints an awe,
And all his dictates pass for law
With beaux, who simper all around,
And belles who die in every sound.
For in all things of this relation,
Men mostly judge from situation,
Nor in a thousand find we one
Who really weighs what's said or done.
They deal out censure or give credit,
Merely from him who did or said it.

But he—who, happily serene,
Means nothing, yet would seem to mean;
Who rules and cautions can dispense
With all that humble insolence
Which impudence in vain would teach,
And none but modest men can reach,
Who adds to sentiments the grace
Of always being out of place,
And drawls out morals with an air
A gentleman would blush to wear;
Who on the chastest, simplest plan,
As chaste, as simple as the man,
Without or character or plot,
Nature unknown, and art forgot,
Can, with much racking of the brains,
And years consum'd in letter'd pains,
A heap of words together lay,
And, smirking, call the thing a play;
Who champion sworn in virtue's cause,
'Gainst vice his tiny bodkin draws,
But to no part of prudence stranger,
First blunts the point for fear of danger.
So nurses sage, as caution works,
When children first use knives and forks,
For fear of mischief, it is known,
To others fingers, or their own,
To take the edge off wisely choose,
Though the same stroke takes off the use.

Thee, Whitehead, thee I now invoke,
Sworn foe to satire's generous stroke,
Which makes unwilling conscience feel,
And wounds, but only wounds to heal.
Good-natur'd, easy creature, mild,
And gentle as a new-born child,
Thy heart would never once admit
E'en wholesale rigour to thy wit;
Thy head, if conscience should comply,
Its kind assistance would deny,
And lend thee neither force nor art,
To drive it onward to the heart.
O may thy sacred pow'r controul
Each fiercer working of my soul,
Damp every spark of genuine fire,
And languors like thine own inspire;
Trite be each thought, and ev'ry line
As moral, and as dull as thine.

Pois'd in mid-air—(it matters not
To ascertain the very spot,
Nor yet to give you a relation,
How it eluded gravitation—).
Hung a watch-tower—by Vulcan plann'd
With such rare skill, by Jove's command,

That ev'ry word, which whisper'd here,
Scarce vibrates to the neighbour ear,
On the still bosom of the air
Is borne, and heard distinctly there,
The palace of an ancient dame,
Whom men as well as gods call fame.

A prattling gossip, on whose tongue
Proof of perpetual motion hung;
Whose lungs in strength all lungs surpass,
Like her own trumpet made of brass;
Who with an hundred pair of eyes
The vain attacks of sleep defies;
Who with an hundred pair of wings
News from the farthest quarters brings;
Sees, hears, and tells, untold before,
All that she knows, and ten times more.

Not all the virtues which we find
Concenter'd in a Hunter's mind,
Can make her spare the ranc'rous tale,
If in one point she chance to fail;
Or if, once in a thousand years,
A perfect character appears,
Such as of late with joy and pride
My soul possess'd ere Arrow died;
Or such as, envy must allow,
The world enjoys in H—— now;
This hag, who aims at all alike,
At virtue e'en like their's will strike,
And make faults in the way of trade,
When she can't find them ready made.

All things she takes in, small and great,
Talks of a toy-shop and a state;
Of wits and fools, of saints and kings,
Of garters, stars, and leading-strings;
Of old lords fumbling for a clap,
And young ones full of pray'r and pap;
Of courts, of morals, and tye-wigs.
Of bears and serjeants dancing jigs;
Of grave professors at the bar
Learning to thrum on the guittar,
Whilst laws are slubber'd o'er in haste,
And judgment sacrific'd to taste;
Of whited sepulchres, lawn sleeves,
And God's house made a den of thieves;
Of fun'ral pomps, where clamours hung,
And fix'd disgrace on ev'ry tongue,
Whilst sense and order blush'd to see
Nobles without humanity;
Of coronations, where each heart,
With honest raptures, bore a part;
Of city feasts, where elegance
Was proud her colours to advance,
And gluttony, uncommon case,
Could only get the second place;
Of new-rai'd pillars in the state,
Who must be good, as being great;
Of shoulders, on which honours sit,
Almost as clumsily as wit;
Of doughty knights, whom titles please,
But not the payment of the fees;
Of lectures, whither ev'ry fool
In second childhood goes to school;
Of gray-beards deaf to reason's call,
From Inn of court, or City hall,
Whom youthful appetites enslave,
With one foot fairly in the grave,

By help of crutch, a needful brother,
Learning of Hart to dance with t' other;
Of doctors regularly bred
To fill the mansions of the dead;
Of quacks (for quacks they must be still
Who save when forms require to kill)
Who life, and health, and vigour give
To him, not one would wish to live;
Of artists who, with noblest view,
Disinterested plans pursue,
For trembling worth the ladder raise,
And mark out the ascent to praise;
Of arts and sciences, where meet
Sublime, profound, and all complete,
A set (whom at some fitter time
The muse shall consecrate in rhyme)
Who humble artists to outdo
A far more lib'ral plan pursue,
And let their well-judg'd premiums fall
On those who have no worth at all;
Of sign-post exhibitions, rais'd
For laughter more than to be prais'd,
(Though by the way we cannot see
Why praise and laughter mayn't agree)
Where genuine humour runs to waste,
And justly chides our want of taste,
Censur'd, like other things, though good,
Because they are not understood.

To higher subjects now she soars,
And talks of politics and whores
(If to your nice and chaster ears
That term indelicate appears,
Scripture politely shall refine,
And melt it into concubine);
In the same breath spreads Bourbon's league,
And publishes the grand intrigue:
In Brussels or our own Gazette
Makes armies fight which never met,
And circulates the pox or plague
To London, by the way of Hague;
For all the lies which there appear
Stamp'd with authority come here;
Borrows as freely from the gabble
Of some rude leader of a rabble,
Or from the quaint harangues of those
Who lead a nation by the nose,
As from those forms, which, void of art,
Burst from our bonest patriot's heart,
When eloquence and virtue (late
Remark'd to live in mutual hate)
Fond of each other's friendship grown,
Claim ev'ry sentence for their own;
And with an equal joy recites
Parade amours, and half-pay fights,
Perform'd by heroes of fair weather,
Merely by dint of lace and feather,
As those rare acts which honour taught
Our daring sons where Granby fought,
Or those which, with superior skill,
Sackville achiev'd by standing still.

This hag (the curious if they please
May search from earliest times to these,
And poets they will always see,
With gods and goddesses make free,
Treating them all, except the muse,
As scarcely fit to wipe their shoes)

Who had beheld, from first to last,
How our triumvirate had pass'd
Night's dreadful interval, and heard
With strict attention every word,
Soon as she saw return of light,
On sounding pinions took her flight.

Swift through the regions of the sky,
Above the reach of human eye,
Onward she drove the furious blast,
And rapid as a whirlwind past
O'er countries, once the seats of taste,
By time and ignorance laid waste;
O'er lands, where former ages saw
Reason and truth the only law;
Where arts and arms, and public love
In gen'rous emulation strove;
Where kings were proud of legal sway,
And subjects happy to obey,
Though now in slav'ry sunk, and broke
To superstition's galling yoke;
Of arts, of arms, no more they tell,
Or Freedom, which with science fell.
By tyrants aw'd, who never find
Their passage to the people's mind,
To whom the joy was never known
Of planting in the heart their throne,
Far from all prospect of relief,
Their hours in fruitless pray'rs and grief,
For loss of blessings they employ,
Which we unthankfully enjoy.

Now is the time (had we the will)
'T' amaze the reader with our skill,
To pour out such a flood of knowledge
As might suffice for a whole college,
Whilst with a true poetic force
We trac'd the goddess in her course,
Sweetly describing, in our flight,
Each common and uncommon sight,
Making our journal gay and pleasant,
With things long past, and things now present.
Rivers—once nymphs—(a transformation
Is mighty pretty in relation)
From great authorities we know,
Will matter for a tale bestow.
To make the observation clear,
We give our friends an instance here.

The day (that never is forgot)
Was very fine, but very hot;
The nymph (another gen'ral rule)
Inflam'd with heat, laid down to cool;
Her bair (we no exceptions find)
Wav'd careless floating in the wind;
Her beaving breasts, like summer seas,
Seem'd am'rous of the playful breeze;
Should fond description tune our lays
On choicest accents to her praise,
Description we at last should find,
Baffled and weak, would halt behind.
Nature had form'd her to inspire
In ev'ry bosom soft desire,
Passions to raise she could not feel,
Wounds to inflict she would not heal.
A god (his name is no great matter,
Perhaps a Jove, perhaps a satyr)
Raging with lust, a godlike flame,
By chance, as usual, thither came;

With gloting eyes the fair-one view'd,
Desir'd her first, and then pursu'd.
She (for what other can she do)?
Must fly—or how can he pursue?
The musc (so custom hath decreed)
Now proves her spirit by her speed,
Nor must one limping line disgrace
The life and vigour of the race.
SHE RUNS, AND HE RUNS, 'till at length,
Quite destitute of breath and strength,
To beav'n (for there we all apply
For help, when there's no other nigh)
She offers up her virgin pray'r,
(Can virgins pray unpitied there)?
And when the god thinks he has caught her,
Slips through his hands, and runs to water,
Becomes a stream, in which the poet,
If he has any wit, may show it.

A city once for pow'r renown'd,
Now levell'd even to the ground,
Beyond all doubt is a direction
To introduce some fine reflection.

Ab, woeful me! Ab, woeful man!
Ab, woeful all! do all we can!
Who can on earthly things depend
From one to t' other moment's end?
Honour, wit, genius, wealth, and glory,
Good luck! good luck! are transitory;
Nothing is sure and stable found,
The very earth itself turns round.
Monarchs, nay ministers must die,
Must rot, must sink—Ab, me! ab, woe!
Cities themselves in time decay.
If cities thus—Ab, well-a-day!
If brick and mortar have an end,
On what can flesh and blood depend!
Ab, woeful me! Ab, woeful man!
Ab, woeful all! do all we can!

England (for that's at last the scene,
Though worlds on worlds should rise between,
Whither we must our course pursue)
England should call into review
Times long since past indeed, but not
By Englishmen to be forgot,
Though England, once so dear to fame,
Sinks in Great Britain's dearer name.

Here could we mention chiefs of old,
In plain and rugged honour bold,
To virtue kind, to vice severe,
Strangers to bribery and fear,
Who kept no wretched clans in awe,
Who never broke or warp'd the law;
Patriots, whom, in her better days,
Old Rome might have been proud to raise;
Who, steady to their country's claim,
Boldly stood up in freedom's name,
E'en to the teeth of tyrant pride,
And when they could no more, THEY DIED.

There (striking contrast)! might we place
A servile, mean, degenerate race,
Hirelings, who valued nought but gold,
By the best bidder bought and sold;
Truants from honour's sacred laws,
Betrayers of their country's cause;
The dupes of party, tools of pow'r,
Slaves to the minion of an hour;

Lacquies, who watch'd a favourite's nod,
And took a puppet for their God.

Sincere and honest in our rhymes,
How might we praise these happier times!
How might the muse exalt her lays,
And wanton in a monarch's praise!
Tell of a prince in England born,
Whose virtues England's crown adorn;
In youth a pattern unto age,
So chaste, so pious, and so sage;
Who true to all those sacred bands
Which private happiness demands,
Yet never lets them rise above
The stronger ties of public love.

With conscious pride see England stand,
Our holy charter in her hand,
She waves it round, and o'er the isle
See liberty and courage smile.
No more she mourns her treasures hurl'd
In subsidies to all the world;
No more by foreign threats dismay'd,
No more deceiv'd with foreign aid,
She deals out sums to petty states,
Whom honour scorns, and reason hates;
But, wiser by experience grown,
Finds safety in herself alone.

While thus, she cries, my children stand,
An honest, valiant, native band,
A train'd militia, brave and free,
True to their king, and true to me,
No foreign hirelings shall be known,
Nor need we hirelings of our own.
Under a just and pious reign
The statesman's sophistry is vain;
Vain is each vile corrupt pretence,
These are my natural defence;
Their faith I know, and they shall prove
The bulwark of the king they love.

These, and a thousand things beside,
Did we consult a poet's pride,
Some gay, some serious, might be said,
But ten to one they'd not be read;
Or were they by some curious few,
Not even those would think them true.
For, from the time that Jubal first
Sweet ditties to the harp rehears'd,
Poets have always been suspected
Of having truth in rhyme neglected,
That bard except, who from his youth
Equally fam'd for faith and truth,
By prudence taught, in courtly chime
To courtly ears brought truth in rhyme.

But though to poets we allow,
No matter when acquir'd or how,
From truth unbounded deviation,
Which custom calls imagination,
Yet can't they be suppos'd to lie
One-half so fast as fame can fly.
Therefore (to solve this Gordian knot,
A point we almost had forgot)
To courteous readers be it known,
That fond of verse and falsehood grown,
Whilst we in sweet digression sung,
Fame check'd her flight, and held her tongue,
And now pursues with double force
And double speed her destin'd course;

Nor stops, till she the place arrives
Where genius starves, and dullness thrives;
Where riches virtue are esteem'd,
And craft is truest wisdom deem'd;
Where commerce proudly rears her throne
In state to other lands unknown;
Where to be cheated, and to cheat,
Strangers from ev'ry quarter meet;
Where Christians, Jews, and Turks shake hands,
United in commercial bands,
All of one faith, and that, to own
No God but interest alone.

When gods and goddesses come down
To look about them here in town,
(For change of air is understood
By sons of physic to be good,
In due proportions now and then
For these same gods as well as men)
By custom rul'd, and not a poet
So very dull, but he must know it,
In order to remain incog.
They always travel in a fog.
For if we majesty expose
To vulgar eyes, too cheap it grows;
The force is lost, and free from awe,
We spy and censure ev'ry flaw.
But well preserv'd from public view,
It always breaks forth fresh and new;
Fierce as the sun in all his pride,
It shines, and not a spot's descried.

Was Jove to lay his thunder by,
And with his brethren of the sky
Descend to earth, and frisk about,
Like chattering N, from rout to rout,
He would be found, with all his host,
A nine days wonder at the most.
Would we in trim our honours wear,
We must preserve them from the air:
What is familiar, men neglect,
However worthy of respect.
Did they not find a certain friend
In novelty to recommend,
(Such we by sad experience find
The wretched folly of mankind)
Venus might unattractive shine,
And H fix no eyes but mine.

But fame, who never car'd a jot
Whether she was admir'd or not,
And never blush'd to show her face
At any time in any place,
In her own shape, without disguise,
And visible to mortal eyes,
On 'change, exact at seven o'clock,
Alighted on the weather-cock,
Which, planted there time out of mind,
To note the changes of the wind,
Might no improper emblem be
Of her own mutability.

Thrice did she sound her trump (the same
Which from the first belong'd to fame,
An old ill-favour'd instrument
With which the goddess was content,
Though under a politer race,
Bagpipes might well supply its place)
And thrice awaken'd by the sound,
A gen'ral din prevail'd around.

Confusion through the city past,
And fear bestrode the dreadful blast.

Those fragrant currents, which we meet
Distilling soft through ev'ry street,
Affrighted from the usual course,
Ran murm'ring upwards to their source;
Statues wept tears of blood, as fast
As when a Cæsar breath'd his last:
Horses, which always us'd to go
A foot-pace in my Lord Mayor's show,
Impetuous from their stable broke,
And aldermen and oxen spoke.

Halls felt the force, tow'rs shook around,
And *steeple*s nodded to the ground;
St. Paul himself (strange sight)! was seen
To bow as humbly as the Dean.
The mansion-house, for ever plac'd
A monument of city taste.
Trembled, and seem'd aloud to groan
Through all that hideous weight of stone.

To still the sound, or stop her ears,
Remove the cause or sense of fears,
Physic, in college seated high,
Would any thing but med'cine try.
No more in Pew'ers-hall * was heard
The proper force of ev'ry word;
Those seats were desolate become,
A hapless elocution dumb.
Form, city-born, and city bred,
By strict decorum ever led,
Who threescore years had known the grace
Of one, dull, stiff, unvaried pace,
Terror prevailing over pride,
Was seen to take a larger stride;
Worn to the bone, and cloth'd in rags,
See av'rice closer hug his bags;
With her own weight unwieldy grown,
See credit totter on her throne;
Virtue alone, had she been there,
The mighty sound, unmov'd, could bear.

Up from the gorgeous bed, where fate
Dooms annual fools to sleep in state,
To sleep so sound that not one gleam
Of fancy can provoke a dream,
Great Dullman started at the sound,
Gap'd, rubb'd his eyes, and star'd around.
Much did he wish to know, much fear
Whence sounds so horrid struck his ear,
So much unlike those peaceful notes,
That equal harmony which floats
On the dull wing of city air,
Grave prelude to a feast or fair:
Much did he inly ruminate
Concerning the decrees of fate,
Revolving, though to little end,
What this same trumpet might portend.

Could the French—no—that could not be
Under Bute's active ministry,
Too watchful to be so deceiv'd,
Have stolen hither unperceiv'd?
To Newfoundland indeed, we know,
Fleets of war unobserv'd may go;

* Where Mr. Sheridan, at this period, read lectures on elocution.

Or, if observ'd, may be suppos'd,
At intervals when reason doz'd,
No other point in view to bear
But pleasure, health, and change of air.
But reason ne'er could sleep so sound
To let an enemy be found

In our land's heart, ere it was known
They had departed from their own.

Or could his successor (ambition
Is ever haunted with suspicion)
His daring successor elect,

All customs, rules, and forms reject,
And aim, regardless of the crime,
To seize the chair before his time?

Or (deeming this the lucky hour,
Seeing his countrymen in pow'r,
Those countrymen, who, from the first,
In tumults and rebellion nurs'd,
Howe'er they wear the mask of art,
Still love a Stuart in their heart)
Could Scottish Charles—

Conjecture thus;

That mental Ignis Fatuus,
Led his poor brains a weary dance
From France to England, hence to France,
Till information (in the shape
Of chaplain learned, good Sir Crape,
A lazy, lounging, pamper'd priest,
Well known at ev'ry city feast,
For he was seen much oft'ner there
Than in the house of God at pray'r;
Who always ready in his place,
Ne'er let God's creatures wait for grace,
Though, as the best historians write,
Less fam'd for faith than appetite,
His disposition to reveal,
The grace was short, and long the meal;
Who always would excess admit,
If baunch or turtle came with it,
And ne'er engag'd in the defence
Of self-denying abstinence,
When he could fortunately meet
With any thing he lik'd to eat;
Who knew that wine, on Scripture plan,
Was made to cheer the heart of man;
Knew too, by long experience taught,
That cheerfulness was kill'd by thought;
And from those premises collected,
(Which few, perhaps, would have suspected)
That none, who with due share of sense
Observ'd the ways of Providence,
Could with safe conscience leave off drinking,
Till they had lost the pow'r of thinking;
With eyes half-clos'd came waddling in,
And, having strok'd his double chin,
(That chin, whose credit to maintain
Against the scoffs of the profane,
Had cost him more than ever state
Paid for a poor electorate,
Which after all the cost and rout
It had been better much without) Briefly, (for breakfast, you must know,
Was waiting all the while below)
Related, bowing to the ground,
The cause of that uncommon sound;

Related too, that at the door;
 Pompous, Plausible, and Moore *,
 Begg'd that Fame might not be allow'd
 Their shame to publish to the crowd;
 That some new law he would provide,
 (If old could not be misapplied,
 With as much ease and safety there,
 As they are misapplied elsewhere)
 By which it might be construed treason
 In man to exercise his reason;
 Which might ingeniously devise
 One punishment for truth and lies;
 And fairly prove, when they had done,
 That truth and falsehood were but one;
 Which juries must indeed retain,
 But their effect should render vain,
 Making all real pow'r to rest
 In one corrupted rotten breast,
 By whose false gloss the very Bible
 Might be interpreted a libel.

Moore (who, his rev'rence to save,
 Plead'd the fool to screen the knave,
 Though all, who witness'd on his part,
 Swore for his head against his heart),
 Had taken down from first to last,
 A just account of all that past;
 But, since the gracious will of fate,
 Who mark'd the child for wealth and state
 E'en in the cradle, had decreed
 The mighty Dullman ne'er should read,
 That office of disgrace to bear
 The smooth lipp'd Plausible was there.
 From H e'en to Clerkenwell
 Who knows not smooth lipp'd Plausible?
 A preacher deem'd of greatest note,
 For preaching that which others wrote.

Had Dullman now (and fools we see Seldom want curiosity)
 Consented (but the mourning shade
 Of Gascoyne * hasten'd to his aid,
 And in his hand, what could be more?
 Triumphant Canning's picture bore)
 That our three heroes should advance,
 And read their comical romance,
 How rich a feast, what royal fare
 We for our readers might prepare!
 So rich, and yet so safe a feast,
 That no one foreign blatant beast,
 Within the purlieus of the law
 Should dare thereon to lay his paw,
 And growling, cry, with surly tone,
 Keep off—this feast is all my own.

Bending to earth the downcast eye,
 Or planting it against the sky,
 As one immers'd in deepest thought,
 Or with some holy vision caught,
 His hands, to aid the traitor's art,
 Devoutly folded o'er his heart,
 Here Moore, in fraud well skill'd, should go,
 All Saint, with solemn step and flow.
 O that religion's sacred name,
 Meant to inspire the purest flame,

* Clergyman, who unluckily involved himself in the Cock-Lane Ghost imposition.

† Sir Crisp Gascoyne.

A prostitute should ever be
 To that arch fiend hypocrisy,
 Where we find ev'ry other vice
 Crown'd with damn'd sneaking cowardice;
 Bold sin reclaim'd is often seen
 Past hope that man who dares be mean.

There full of flesh and full of grace,
 With that fine round unmeaning face
 Which nature gives to sons of earth
 Whom she designs for ease and mirth,
 Should the prim Plausible be seen.
 Observe his stiff affected mien;
 'Gainst nature, arm'd by gravity,
 His features too in buckle see;
 See what with sanctity he reads,
 With what devotion tells his beads!
 Now prophet, show me, by thine art,
 What's the religion of his heart;
 Show there, if truth thou canst unfold,
 Religion center'd all in gold;
 Show him, nor fear correction's rod,
 As false to friendship, as to God.

Horrid, unwieldy, without form,
 Savage as ocean in a storm,
 Of size prodigious in the rear,
 That post of honour, should appear
 Pompous: fame around should tell
 How he a slave to int'rest sell;
 How, for integrity renown'd,
 Which booksellers have often found,
 He for subscribers baits his hook,
 And takes their cash—but where's the book?
 No matter where—Wife fear, we know,
 Forbids the robbing of a foe;
 But what, to serve our private ends,
 Forbids the cheating of our friends?
 No man alive, who would not swear
 All's safe, and therefore honest there.
 For, spite of all the learned say,
 If we to truth attention pay,
 The word dishonesty is meant
 For nothing else but punishment.
Fame too should tell, nor heed the threat
 Of rogues, who brother rogues abet,
 Nor tremble at the terrors hung
 Aloft, to make her hold her tongue,
 How to all principles untrue,
 Not fix'd to old friends, nor to new,
 He damns the pension which he takes,
 And loves the Stuart he forsakes.
 Nature (who justly regular
 Is very seldom known to err,
 But now and then in sportive mood,
 As some rude wits have understood,
 Or through much work requir'd in haste,
 Is with a random stroke disgrac'd)
 Pompous, form'd on doubtful plan,
 Not quite a beast nor quite a man,
 Like—God knows what—for never yet
 Could the most subtle human wit
 Find out a monster, which might be
 The shadow of a simile.

THESE THREE, THESE GREAT, THESE MIGHTY
 Nor can the poet's truth agree, [THREE,
 Howe'er report hath done him wrong,
 And warp'd the purpose of his song,

Amongst the refuse of their race,
The sons of infamy, to place
That open, gen'rous, manly mind
Which we with joy in Aldrich find.
These three, who now are faintly shown;
Just sketch'd, and scarcely to be known,
If Dullman their request had heard,
In stronger colours had appear'd;
And friends, though partial, at first view;
Shudd'ring, had own'd the picture true.

But had their journal been display'd;
And the whole process open laid,
What a vast unexhausted field
For mirth must such a journal yield!
In her own anger strongly charm'd,
'Gainst hope, 'gainst fear by conscience arm'd,
Then had bold satire made her way,
Knights, Lords, and Dukes, her destin'd prey.

But prudence, ever sacred name
To those who feel not virtue's flame,
Or only feel it at the best
As the dull dupe of interest,
Whisper'd aloud (for this we find
A custom current with mankind,
So loud to whisper, that each word
May all around be plainly heard
And prudence sure would never miss
A custom so contriv'd as this
Her candour to secure, yet aim
Sure death against another's fame)
Knights, Lords, and Dukes—mad wretch, forbear,
Dangers unthought of ambush there;
Confinè thy rage to weaker slaves.
Laugh at small fools, and lash small knaves,
But never, helpless, mean, and poor,
Rush on, where law cannot secure;
Nor think thyself, mistaken youth,
Secure in principles of truth.

Truth! Why, shall ev'ry wretch of letters
Dare to speak truth against his betters?
Let ragged virtue stand aloof,
Nor mutter accents of reproof;
Let ragged wit a mute become,
When wealth and pow'r would have her dumb.
For who the devil doth not know,
That titles and estates bestow
An ample stock, where'er they fall,
Of graces which we mental call?
Beggars, in ev'ry age and nation,
Are rogues and fools by situation;
The rich and great are understood
To be of course both wise and good.
Consult then int'rest more than pride,
Discreetly take the stronger side;
Desert in time the simple few,
Who virtue's barren path pursue;
Adopt my maxims—follow me—
To Baal bow the prudent knee;
Deny thy God, betray thy friend,
At Baal's altars hourly bend;
So shalt thou rich and great be seen;
To be great now, you must be mean.

Hence, tempter to some weaker soul,
Which fear and interest controul;
Vainly thy precepts are address'd,
Where virtue steals the steady breast.

Through meanness wade to boasted pow'r;
Through guilt repeated ev'ry hour;
What is thy gain, when all is done,
What mighty laurels hast thou won?
Dull crowds, to whom the heart's unknown;
Praise thee for virtues not thy own;
But will, at once man's scourge and friend;
Impartial conscience too commend?
From her reproaches canst thou fly?
Canst thou with worlds her silence buy?
Believe it not—her stings shall find
A passage to thy coward mind.
There shall she fix her sharpest dart,
There show thee truly, as thou art,
Unknown to those, by whom thou'rt priz'd;
Known to thyself to be despis'd.

The man who weds the sacred muse,
Disdains all mercenary views,
And he who virtue's throne would rear;
Laughs at the phantoms rais'd by fear.
I hough folly, robb'd in purple, shines
Though vice exhausts Peruvian mines,
Yet shall they tremble, and turn pale,
When satire wields her mighty sail;
Or should they of rebuke afraid,
With Melcombe seek hell's deepest shade;
Satire, still mindful of her aim,
Shall bring the cowards back to shame.

Hated by many, lov'd by few,
Above each little private view,
Honest, though poor (and who shall dare
To disappoint my boasting there)?
Hardy and resolute, though weak,
The dictates of my heart to speak,
Willing I bend at satire's throne;
What pow'r I have be all her own.
Nor shall yon lawyer's specious art,
Conscious of a corrupted heart,
Create imaginary fear,
To damp us in our bold career.
Why should we fear? and what? The laws?
They all are arm'd in virtue's cause?
And aiming at the self-same end,
Satire is always virtue's friend:
Nor shall that muse, whose honest rage,
In a corrupt degen'rate age
(When dead to ev'ry nicer sense,
Deep sunk in vice and indolence,
The spirit of old Rome was broke
Beneath the tyrant fiddler's yoke),
Banish'd the rose from Nero's cheek,
Under a Brunswick fear to speak.

Drawn by conceit from reason's plan,
How vain is that poor creature, man!
How pleas'd is ev'ry paltry elf
To prate about that thing himself!
After my promise made in rhyme,
And meant in earnest at that time,
To jog, according to the mode,
In one dull pace, in one dull road,
What but that curse of heart and head
To this digression could have led,
Where plung'd, in vain I look about,
And can't stay in, nor well get out.

Could I, whilst humour held the quill,
Could I digress with half that skill,

Could I with half that skill return,
Which we so much admire in Sterne;
Where each digression, seeming vain,
And only fit to entertain,
Is found on better recollection,
To have a just and nice connection,
To help the whole with wond'rous art,
Whence it seems idly to depart;
Then should our readers ne'er accuse
These wild excursions of the muse,
Ne'er backward turn dull pages o'er
To recollect what went before;
Deeply impress'd, and ever new,
Each image past should start to view,
And we to Dullman now come in,
As if we ne'er had absent been.

Have you not seen, when danger's near,
The coward cheek turn white with fear?
Have you not seen, when danger's fled,
The self-same cheek with joy turn red?
These are low symptoms which we find
Fit only for a vulgar mind,
Where honest features, void of art,
Betray the feelings of the heart:
Our Dullman with a face was bless'd
Where no one passion was express'd;
His eye, in a fine stupor caught,
Implied a plenteous lack of thought;
Nor was one line that whole face seen in,
Which could be justly charg'd with meaning.

To avarice by birth ally'd,
Debauch'd by marriage into pride,
In age grown fond of youthful sports,
Of pomps, of vanities, and courts,
And by success too mighty made
To love his country or his trade,
Stiff in opinion (no rare case
With blockheads in or out of place)
Too weak, and insolent of soul,
To suffer reason's just controul,
But bending, of his own accord,
To that trim transient toy, my lord;
The dupe of Scots (a fatal race,
Whom God in wrath contriv'd to place,
To scourge our crimes, and gall our pride,
A constant thorn in England's side;
Whom first, our greatness to oppose,
He in his vengeance mark'd for foes;
Then, more to serve his wrathful ends,
And more to curse us, mark'd for friends)
Deep in the state, if we give credit
To him, for no one else e'er said it;
Sworn friend of great ones not a few,
Though he their titles only knew,
And those (which envious of his breeding
Book-worms have charg'd to want of reading)
Merely to show himself polite,
He never would pronounce aright;
An orator with whom a host
Of those which Rome and Athens boast,
In all their pride might not contend:
Who, with no pow'rs to recommend,
Whilst Jackey Hume, and Billy Whitehead,
And Dickey Glover sat delighted,
Could speak whole days in nature's spite,
Just as those able verse-men write,

Great Dullman from his bed arose—
Thrice did he spit—thrice wip'd his nose—
Thrice strove to smile—thrice strove to frown—
And thrice look'd up—and thrice look'd down—
Then silence broke—Crape, who am I?
Crape bow'd, and smil'd an arch reply.
Am I not, Crape—I am, you know,
Above all those who are below.
Have I not knowledge? and for wit,
Money will always purchase it;
Nor, if it needful should be found,
Will I grudge ten, or twenty pound,
For which the whole stock may be bought
Of scoundrel wits not worth a groat.
But lest I should proceed too far,
I'll feel my friend the Minister,
(Great men, Crape, must not be neglected)
How he in this point is affected;
For, as I stand a magistrate,
To serve him first, and next the state,
Perhaps he may not think it fit
To let his magistrates have wit.

Boast I not, at this very hour,
Those large effects which troop with pow'r?
Am I not mighty in the land?
Do not I sit, whilst others stand?
Am I not with rich garments grac'd,
In seat of honour always plac'd?
And do not cits of chief degree,
Though proud to others, bend to me?

Have I not, as a justice ought,
The laws such wholesome rigour taught,
That fornication, in disgrace,
Is now afraid to show her face,
And not one whore these walls approaches,
Unless they ride in our own coaches?
And shall this fame, an old poor strumpet,
Without our licence sound her trumpet,
And, envious of our city's quiet,
In broad day-light blow up a riot?
If insolence like this we bear,
Where is our state? our office where?
Farewell all honours of our reign,
Farewell the neck-ennabling chain,
Freedom's known badge o'er all the globe,
Farewell the solemn-spreading robe,
Farewell the sword—farewell the mace,
Farewell all title, pomp, and place.
Remov'd from men of high degree,
(A loss to them, Crape, not to me)
Banish'd to Chippenham, or to Frome,
Dullman once more shall ply the loom.

Crape, lifting up his hands and eyes,
Dullman—the loom—at Chippenham—cries,
If there be pow'rs which greatness love,
Which rule below, but dwell above,
Those pow'rs united all shall join
To contradict the rash design.

Sooner shall stubborn Will lay down
His opposition with his gown,
Sooner shall Temple leave the road
Which leads to virtue's mean abode,
Sooner shall Scots this country quit,
And England's foes be friends to Pitt,
Than Dullman, from his grandeur thrown,
Shall wander out-cast, and unknown.

Sure as that cane (a cane there stood
Near to a table, made of wood,
Of dry fine wood a table made,
By some rare artist in the trade,
Who had enjoy'd immortal praise
If he had liv'd in Homer's days)
Sure as that cane, which once was seen,
In pride of life all fresh and green,
The banks of Indus to adorn;
Then, of its leafy honours shorn,
According to exactest rule,
Was fashion'd by the workman's tool,
And which at present we behold
Curiously polish'd, crown'd with gold,
With gold well-wrought; sure as that cane
Shall never on its native plain
Strike root afresh, shall never more
Flourish in tawny India's shore,
So sure shall Dullman and his race
To latest times this station grace

Dullman, who all this while had kept
His eye-lids clos'd as if he slept,
Now looking stedfastly on Crape,
As at some god in human shape---
Crape, I protest, you seem to me
To have discharg'd a prophecy;
Yes---from the first it doth appear,
Planted by fate, the Dullmans here
Have always held a quiet reign,
And here shall to the last remain.

Crape, they're all wrong about this ghost---
Quite on the wrong side of the post---
Blockheads, to take it in their head
To be a message from the dead,
For that by mission they design,
A word not half so good as mine.
Crape---here it is---start not one doubt---
A plot---a plot---I've found it out.

O God!--cries Crape,--how blest the nation,
Where one son boasts such penetration!

Crape, I've not time to tell you now
When I discover'd this, or how;
To Stentor go---if he's not there,
His place let Bully Norton bear---
Our citizens to council call---
Let all meet---'tis the cause of all.
Let the three witnesses attend
With allegations to befriend,
To swear just so much, and no more,
As we instruct them in before.

Stay---Crape---come back---what, don't you see
Th' effects of this discovery?
Dullman all care and toil endures---
The profit, Crape, will all be yours.
A mitre (for, this arduous task
Perform'd, they'll grant whate'er I ask)
A mitre (and perhaps the best)
Shall through my interest make thee blest.
And at this time, when gracious fate
Dooms to the Scot the reins of state,
Who is more fit (and for your use
We could some instances produce)
Of England's church to be the head,
Than you, a Presbyterian bred?
But when thus mighty you are made,
Unlike the brethren of thy trade,

Be grateful, Crape, and let me not,
Like old Newcastle, be forgot.

But an affair, Crape, of this size
Will ask from conduct vast supplies;
It must not, as the vulgar say,
Be done in bugger-mugger way.
Traitors indeed (and that's discreet)
Who hatch the plot, in private meet;
They should in public go, no doubt,
Whose business is to find it out.

To-morrow---if the day appear
Likely to turn out fair and clear---
Proclaim a grand processionade---
Be all the city pomp display'd.
Let the train-bands--- Crape shook his head---
They heard the trumpet and were fled---
Well---cries the knight---if that's the case,
My servants shall supply their place---
My servants---mine alone---no more
Than what my servants did before---
Dost not remember, Crape, that day,
When Dullman's grandeur to display,
As all too simple, and too low,
Our city friends were thrust below,
Whilst, as more worthy of our love,
Courtiers were entertain'd above?
Tell me, who waited then? and how?
My servants---mine---and why not now?
In haste then, Crape, to Stentor go---
But send up Hart, who waits below;
With him, till you return again,
(Reach me my spectacles and cane)
I'll make a proof how I advance in
My new accomplishment of dancing.

Not quite so fast as lightning flies,
Wing'd with red anger, through the skies;
Not quite so fast as sent by Jove,
Iris descends on wings of love;
Not quite so fast as terror rides
When he the chafing winds bestrides;
Crape hobbled---but his mind was good---
Cou'd he go faster than he cou'd?

Near to that tow'r, which, as we're told,
The mighty Julius rais'd of old,
Where to the block by justice led,
The rebel Scot hath often bled,
Where arms are kept so clean, so bright,
'Twere sin they should be soil'd in fight,
Where brutes of foreign race are shown
By brutes much greater of our own;
Fast by the crouded Thames, is found
An ample square of sacred ground,
Where artless eloquence presides,
And nature ev'ry sentence guides.

Here female parliaments debate
About religion, trade, and state;
Here ev'ry naiad's patriot soul,
Disdaining foreign base controul,
Despising French, despising Erse.
Pours forth the plain old English curse,
And bears aloft, with terrors hung,
The honours of the vulgar tongue.

Here Stentor, always heard with awe,
In thund'ring accents deals out law.
Twelve furlongs off each dreadful word
Was plainly and distinctly heard,

And ev'ry neighbour hill around
Return'd and swell'd the mighty sound.
The loudest virgin of the stream,
Compar'd with him, would silent seem;
Thames, (who, enrag'd to find his course
Oppos'd, rolls down with double force,
Against the bridge indignant roars,
And lashes the resounding shores)
Compar'd with him, at lowest tide,
In softest whisper seems to glide.

Hither directed by the noise,
Swell'd with the hope of future joys,
Through too much zeal and haste made lame,
The rev'rend slave of Dullman came.

Stentor—with such a serious air,
With such a face of solemn care,
As might import him to contain
A nation's welfare in his brain—
Stentor—cries Crape—I'm hither sent
On business of most high intent,
Great Dullman's orders to convey;
Dullman commands, and I obey.
Big with those throes which patriots feel,
And lab'ring for the commonweal,
Some secret which forbids him rest,
Tumbles and tosses in his breast,
Tumbles and tosses to get free;
And thus the chief commands by me.

To-morrow, if the day appear
Likely to turn out fair and clear—
Proclaim a grand processionade—
Be all the city pomp display'd—
Our citizens to council call—
Let all meet—'tis the cause of all.

BOOK IV.

Coxcombs, who vainly make pretence
To something of exalted sense
Above other men, and, gravely wise,
Affect those pleasures to despise,
Which, merely to the eye confin'd,
Bring no improvement to the mind,
Rail at all pomp: they would not go
For millions to a puppet-show,
Nor can forgive the mighty crime
Of countenancing pantomime;
No, not at Covent Garden, where,
Without a head for play or play'r,
Or, could a head be found most fit,
Without one play'r to second it,
They must, obeying folly's call,
Thrive by mere show, or not at all.

With these grave fops, who (bless their brains)
Most cruel to themselves, take pains
For wretchedness, and would be thought
Much wiser than a wise man ought
For his own happiness to be;
Who, what they hear, and what they see,
And what they smell, and taste, and feel,
Distrust, till reason sets her seal,
And, by long trains of consequences
Ensur'd, gives sanction to the senses;
Who would not, Heav'n forbid it! waste
One hour in what the world calls taste,

Nor fondly deign to laugh or cry,
Unless they know some reason why;
With these grave fops, whose system seems
To give up certainty for dreams,
The eye of man is understood
As for no other purpose good
Than as a door, through which of course
Their passage crowding objects force,
A downright usher, to admit
New-comers to the court of wit,
(Good gravity, forbear thy spleen,
When I say wit, I wisdom mean)
Where (such the practice of the court,
Which legal precedents support)
Not one idea is allow'd
To pass unquestion'd in the crowd,
But ere it can obtain the grace
Of holding in the brain a place,
Before the chief in congregation
Must stand a strict examination.

Not such as those, who physic twirl,
Full fraught with death, from ev'ry curl;
Who prove, with all becoming state,
Their voice to be the voice of fate;
Prepar'd with essence, drop, and pill,
To be another Ward, or Hill,
Before they can obtain their ends,
To sign death-warrants for their friends,
And talents vast as their's employ,
Secundum artem to destroy,
Must pass (or laws their rage restrain)
Before the chiefs of Warwick-Lane.
Thrice happy Lane, where uncontroll'd,
In pow'r and letbargy grown old,
Most fit to take in this blest land,
The reins which fell from Wyndham's hand,
Her lawful throne great dullness rears,
Still more herself as more in years;
Where she (and who shall dare deny
Her right, when Reeves and Chauncy's by)
Calling to mind, in ancient time,
One Garth who err'd in wit and rhyme,
Ordains from henceforth to admit
None of the rebel sons of wit,
And makes it her peculiar care
That Schomberg never shall be there.

Not such as those, whom folly trains
To letters, though unblest'd with brains;
Who destitute of pow'r and will
To learn, are kept to learning still;
Whose heads, when other methods fail,
Receive instruction from the tail,
Because their fires, a common case
Which brings the children to disgrace,
Imagine it a certain rule,
They never could beget a fool,
Must pass, or must compound for, ere
The chaplain, full of beef and pray'r,
Will give his reverend permit,
Announcing them for orders fit,
So that the prelate (what's a name?)
All prelates now are much the same)
May with a conscience safe and quiet,
With holy hands lay on that fat,
Which doth all faculties dispense,
All sanctity, all faith, all sense.

Makes Madan quite a faint appear,
And makes an oracle of Cheere.

Not such as in that solemn seat,
Where the nine ladies hold retreat,
The ladies nine, who, as we're told,
Scorning those haunts they lov'd of old,
The banks of Isis now prefer,
Nor will one hour from Oxford stir,
Are held for form; which Balaam's ass
As well as Balaam's self might pass,
And with his master take degrees,
Could he contrive to pay the fees.

Men of sound parts, who, deeply read,
O'erload the storehouse of the head
With furniture they ne'er can use,
Cannot forgive our rambling muse
This wild excursion; cannot see
Why physic and divinity,
To the surprise of all beholders,
Are lugg'd in by the head and shoulders;
Or how, in any point of view,
Oxford hath any thing to do;
But men of nice and subtle learning,
Remarkable for quick discerning,
Through spectacles of critic mould,
Without instruction, will behold
That we a method here have got,
To show what is, by what is not,
And that our drift (parentbesis
For once apart) is briefly this.

Within the brain's most secret cells
A certain Lord Chief Justice dwells
Of sov'reign pow'r, whom one and all,
With common voice, we reason call;
Though, for the purposes of satire,
A name in truth is no great matter,
Jefferies or Mansfield, which you will,
It means a Lord Chief Justice still.
Here so our great projectors say,
The senses all must homage pay;
Hither they all must tribute bring,
And prostrate fall before their king.
Whatever unto them is brought,
Is carry'd on the wings of thought
Before his throne, where, in full state,
He on their merits holds debate,
Examines, cross-examines, weighs
Their right to censure or to praise;
Nor doth his equal voice depend
On narrow views of foe and friend;
Nor can or flattery or force
Divert him from his steady course;
The channel of inquiry's clear,
No foam examination's here.

He, upright justicer, no doubt,
Ad libitum puts in and out,
Adjusts and settles in a trice
What virtue is, and what is vice,
What is perfection, what defect,
What we must choose, and what reject;
He takes upon him to explain
What pleasure is, and what is pain;
Whilst we, obedient to the whim,
And resting all our faith on him,
True members of the stoic weal,
Must learn to think, and cease to feel.

This glorious system form'd, for man
To practise when and how he can,
If the five senses in alliance
To reason hurl a proud defiance,
And, though oft conquer'd, yet unbroke,
Endeavour to throw off that yoke,
Which they a greater slav'ry hold,
Than Jewish bondage was of old;
Or if they, something touch'd with shame,
Allow him to retain the name
Of royalty, and, as in sport,
To hold a mimic formal court;
Permitted, no uncommon thing,
To be a kind of puppet king,
And suffer'd by the way of toy,
To hold the globe, but not employ;
Our system-mongers, struck with fear,
Prognosticate destruction near;
All things to anarchy must run;
The little world of man's undone.

Nay should the eye, that nicest sense,
Egleet to send intelligence
Unto the brain, distinct and clear,
Of all that passes in her sphere:
Should she presumptuous joy receive,
Without the understanding's leave,
They deem it rank and daring treason
Against the monarchy of reason,
Not thinking, though they're wond'rous wise,
That few have reason, most have eyes;
So that the pleasures of the mind
To a small circle are confin'd,
Whilst those which to the senses fall,
Become the property of all.
Besides (and this is sure a case
Not much at present out of place)
Where nature reason doth deny,
No art can that defect supply;
But if (for it is our intent
Fairly to state the argument)
A man should want an eye or two,
The remedy is sure, though new;
The cure's at hand—no need of fear—
For proof—behold the chevalier—
As well prepar'd, beyond all doubt,
To put eyes in, as put them out.

But, argument apart, which tends
To embitter foes and separate friends,
(Nor, turn'd apostate for the nine,
Would I, though bred up a divine,
And foe of course to reason's weal,
Widen that breach I cannot heal)
By his own sense and feelings taught,
In speech as lib'ral as in thought,
Let ev'ry man enjoy his whim;
What's he to me, or I to him?
Might I, though never rob'd in ermine,
A matter of this weight determine,
No penalties should settled be
To force men to hypocrisy,
To make them ape an awkward zeal,
And, feeling not, pretend to feel.
I would not have, might sentence rest
Finally fix'd within my breast,
E'en Annet censur'd and confin'd,
Because we're of a different mind.

Nature, who in her act most free,
Herself delights in liberty,
Profuse in love, and, without bound,
Pours joy on ev'ry creature round;
Whom yet, was ev'ry bounty shed
In double portions on our head,
We could not truly bounteous call,
If freedom did not crown them all.

By providence forbid to stray,
Brutes never can mistake their way;
Determin'd still, they plod along
By instinct, neither right nor wrong;
But man, had he the heart to use
His freedom, hath a right to choose;
Whether he acts or well or ill,
Depends entirely on his will:
To her last work, her fav'rite man,
Is giv'n on nature's better plan
A privilege in pow'r to err.
Nor let this phrase resentment stir
Amongst the grave ones, since indeed,
The little merit man can plead
In doing well, dependeth still
Upon his pow'r of doing ill.

Opinions should be free as air;
No man, whate'er his rank, whate'er
His qualities, a claim can found
That my opinion must be bound,
And square with his; such slavish chains
From foes the lib'ral soul disdains,
Nor can, though true to friendship, bend
To wear them even from a friend.
Let those, who rigid judgment own,
Submissive bow at judgment's throne;
And if they of no value hold
Pleasure, till pleasure is grown cold,
Pall'd and insipid, forc'd to wait
For judgment's regular debate,
To give it warrant, let them find
Dull subjects suited to their mind;
Their's be slow wisdom: Be my plan
To live as merry as I can,
Regardless as the fashions go,
Whether there's reason for't, or no;
Be my employment here on earth
To give a lib'ral scope to mirth,
Life's barren vale with flow'rs t' adorn,
And pluck a rose from ev'ry thorn.

But if, by error led astray,
I chance to wander from my way,
Let no blind guide observe, in spite,
I'm wrong, who cannot set me right.
That doctor could I ne'er endure,
Who sound disease, and not a cure;
Nor can I hold that man a friend,
Whose zeal a helping hand shall lend
To open happy folly's eyes,
And, making wretched, make me wise;
For next, a truth which can't admit
Reproof from wisdom or from wit,
To being happy here below,
Is to believe that we are so.

Some few in knowledge find relief,
I place my comfort in belief.
Some for reality may call,
Fancy to me is all in all.

Imagination, through the trick
Of doctors, often makes us sick;
And why, let any sophist tell,
May it not likewise make us well?
This am I sure, whate'er our view,
Whatever shadows we pursue,
For our pursuits, be what they will,
Are little more than shadows still,
Too swift they fly, too swift and strong,
For man to catch, or hold them long,
But joys which in the fancy live,
Each moment to each man may give.
True to himself, and true to ease,
He softens fate's severe decrees,
And (can a mortal wish for more)?
Creates, and makes himself new o'er,
Mocks boasted vain reality,
And is, whate'er he wants to be.

Hail, fancy---to thy pow'r I owe
Deliv'rance from the gripe of woe;
To thee I owe a mighty debt,
Which gratitude shall ne'er forget,
Whilst mem'ry can her force employ,
A large increase of ev'ry joy.
When at my doors, too strongly barr'd,
Authority had plac'd a guard.
A knave's guard, ordain'd by law
To keep poor honesty in awe;
Authority, severe and stern,
To intercept my wish'd return;
When foes grew proud, and friends grew cool,
And laughter seiz'd each sober fool;
When candour started in amaze,
And, meaning censure, hinted praise;
When prudence, lifting up her eyes
And hands, thank'd Heav'n, that she was wise;
When all around me, with an air
Of hopeless sorrow, look'd despair;
When they or said, or seem'd to say,
There is but one, one only way
Better, and be advis'd by us,
Not be at all, than to be thus;
When virtue shunn'd the shock, and pride
Disabled, lay by virtue's side,
Too weak my ruffled soul to cheer,
Which could not hope, yet would not fear;
Health in her motion, the wild grace
Of pleasure speaking in her face,
Dull regularity thrown by,
And comfort beaming from her eye;
Fancy, in richest robes array'd,
Came smiling forth, and brought me aid,
Came smiling o'er that dreadful time,
And, more to bless me, came in rhyme.

Nor is her pow'r to me confin'd,
It spreads, it comprehends mankind.

When (to the spirit-stirring sound
Of trumpets breathing courage round,
And fifes, well mingled to restrain,
And bring that courage down again,
Or to the melancholy knell
Of the dull, deep, and doleful bell,
Such as of late the good Saint Bride
Muffled, to mortify the pride
Of those who, England quite forgot,
Paid their vile homage to the Scot,

Where Afigill held the foremost place,
 Whilst my lord figur'd at a race)
Processions ('tis not worth debate
 Whether they are of stage or state)
 Move on, so very very slow,
 'Tis doubtful if they move or no;
 When the performers all the while
 Mechanically frown or smile,
 Or, with a dull and stupid stare,
 A vacancy of sense declare,
 Or, with down-bending eye, seem wrought
 Into a labyrinth of thought,
 Where reason wanders still in doubt,
 And, once got in, cannot get out;
 What cause sufficient can we find
 To satisfy a thinking mind,
 Why dup'd by such vain farces, man
 Descends to act on such a plan?
 Why they, who hold themselves divine,
 Can in such wretched follies join,
 Strutting like peacocks, or like crows,
Themselves and nature to expose?
 What cause, but that (you'll understand
 We have our remedy at hand,
 That if perchance we start at doubt,
 Ere it is fix'd, we wipe it out,
 As surgeons, when they lop a limb,
 Whether for profit, fame, or whim,
 Or mere experiment to try,
 Must always have a flyptic by)
 Fancy steps in, and stamps that real,
 Which, ipso facto, is ideal.

Can none remember, yes, I know,
 All must remember that rare show.
 When to the country sense went down,
 And fools came flocking up to town,
 When knights (a work which all admit
 To be for knighthood much unfit)
 Built booths for hire; when Parsons play'd,
 In robes canonical array'd,
 And, fiddling, join'd the Smithfield dance,
 The price of tickets to advance;
 Or, unto tapsters turn'd, dealt out,
 Running from booth to booth about,
 To ev'ry scoundrel, by retail,
 True pennyworths of beef and ale,
 Then first prepar'd, by bringing beer in,
 For present grand electioneering;
 When beralds, running all about
 To bring in order, turn'd it out;
 When, by the prudent marshal's care,
 Lest the rude populace should stare,
 And with unhallow'd eyes profane
 Gay puppets of patrician strain,
 The whole procession, as in spite,
 Unheard, unseen, stole off by night;
 When our lov'd monarch, nothing loth,
 Solemnly took that sacred oath,
 Whence mutual firm agreements spring
 Betwixt the subject and the king,
 By which, in usual manner crown'd,
 His head, his heart, his bands he bound,
 Against himself, should passion stir
 The least propensity to err,
 Against all slaves, who might prepare
 Or open force, or hidden snare,

That glorious charter to maintain,
 By which we serve, and he must reign;
 Then fancy, with unbounded sway,
 Revell'd sole mistress of the day,
 And wrought such wonders, as might make
Egyptian forcerers forsake
 Their baffled mockeries, and own
 The palm of magic her's alone.

A knight (who in the silken lap
 Of lazy peace had liv'd on pap,
 Who never yet had dar'd to roam
 'Bove ten or twenty miles from home,
 Nor even that, unless a guide
 Was plac'd to amble by his side,
 And troops of slaves were spread around
 To keep his honour safe and sound;
 Who could not suffer for his life
 A point to sword, or edge to knife,
 And always fainted at the sight
 Of blood, though 'twas not shed in fight
 Who disinherited one son
 For firing off an elder gun,
 And whipt another, six years old,
 Because the boy, presumptuous, bold
 To madness, likely to become
 A very Swift, had beat a drum,
 Though it appear'd an instrument
 Most peaceable and innocent,
 Having from first been in the hands
 And service of the city bands)
 Grac'd with those ensigns, which were meant
 To further honour's dread intent,
 The minds of warriors to inflame,
 And spur them on to deeds of fame,
 With little sword, large spurs, high feather,
 Fearful of ev'ry thing but weather.
 (And all must own, who pay regard
 To charity, it had been hard
 That in his very first campaign
 His honours should be soil'd with rain)
 A hero all at once became,
 And (seeing others much the same
 In point of valour as himself,
 Who leave their courage on a shelf
 From year to year, till some such rout
 In proper season calls it out)
 Strutted, look'd big, and swagger'd more
 Than ever hero did before;
 Look'd up, look'd down, look'd all around,
 Like Mavers, grimly smil'd and frown'd;
 Seem'd heav'n, and earth, and hell to call
 To fight, that he might rout them all;
 And personated valour's stile
 So long, spectators to beguile,
 That passing strange, and wond'rous true,
 Himself at last believ'd it too,
 Nor for a time could he discern,
 Till truth and darkness took their turn,
 So well did fancy play her part,
 That coward still was at the heart.

Whiffle (who knows not Whiffle's name,
 By the impartial voice of fame
 Recorded first through all this land,
 In vanity's illustrious band?)
 Who, by all-bounteous nature meant
 For offices of hardiment,

A modern Hercules at least,
 To rid the world of each wild beast,
 Of each wild beast which came in view,
 Whether on four legs or on two,
 Degenerate, delights to prove
 His force on the parade of love,
 Disclaims the joys which camps afford,
 And for the distaff quits the sword;
 Who fond of women would appear
 To public eye, and public ear,
 But when in private, lets them know
 How little they can trust to show;
 Who sports a woman as of course,
 Just as a jockey shows a horse,
 And then returns her to the stable,
 Or vainly plants her at his table,
 Where he would rather Venus find,
 (So pall'd, and so deprav'd his mind)
 Than, by some great occasion led,
 To seize her panting in her bed,
 Burning with more than mortal fires,
 And melting in her own desires;
 Who, ripe in years, is yet a child,
 Through fashion, not through feeling wild;
 Whate'er in others, who proceed
 As sense and nature have decreed,
 From real passion flows, in him
 Is mere effect of mode and whim;
 Who laughs, a very common way,
 Because he nothing has to say,
 As your choise spirits oaths dispense
 To fill up vacancies of sense;
 Who, having some small sense, defies it,
 Or, using, always misapplies it;
 Who now and then brings something forth,
 Which seems indeed of sterling worth,
 Something, by sudden start and fit,
 Which at a distance looks like wit,
 But, on examination near,
 To his confusion will appear
 By truth's fair glass, to be at best
 A threadbare jester's threadbare jest;
 Who frisks and dances through the street,
 Sings without voice, rides without seat,
 Plays o'er his tricks, like Æsop's ass,
 A gratis fool to all who pass;
 Who riots, though he loves not waste,
 Whores without lust, drinks without taste,
 Acts without sense, talks without thought,
 Does ev'ry thing but what he ought;
 Who, led by forms, without the pow'r
 Of vice, is vicious; who one hour,
 Proud without pride, the next will be
 Humble without humility;
 Whose vanity we all discern,
 The spring on which his actions turn;
 Whose aim in erring, is to err,
 So that he may be singular,
 And all his utmost wishes mean,
 Is, though he's laugh'd at, to be seen;
Such (for when flatt'ry's soothing strain
 Had robb'd the muse of her disdain,
 And found a method to persuade,
 Her art to soften ev'ry shade,
 Justice enrag'd, the pencil snatch'd
 From her degen'rate hand, and scratch'd

Out ev'ry trace; then, quick as thought,
 From life this striking likeness caught)
 In mind, in manners, and in mien,
Such Whiffle came, and such was seen
 In the world's eye; but (strange to tell)!
 Misled by fancy's magic spell,
 Deceiv'd, not dreaming of deceit,
 Cheated, but happy in the cheat,
 Was more than human in his own.
 O bow, bow all at fancy's throne,
 Whose pow'r could make so vile an elf
 With patience bear that thing, himself.

But, mistress of each art to please,
Creative fancy, what are these,
These pageants of a trifler's pen,
 To what thy power effected then?
 Familiar with the human mind,
 As swift and subtle as the wind,
 Which we all feel, yet no one knows
 Or whence it comes, or where it goes,
 Fancy at once in ev'ry part
 Possess'd the eye, the head, the heart,
 And, in a thousand forms array'd,
 A thousand various gambols play'd.

Here, in a face which well might ask
 The privilege to wear a mask
 In spite of law, and justice teach
 For public good t' excuse the breach,
 Within the furrow of a wrinkle
 'Twixt eyes, which could not shine but twinkle,
 Like centinels i' th' starry way,
 Who wait for the return of day,
 Almost burnt out, and seem to keep
 Their watch, like soldiers, in their sleep,
 Or like those lamps which, by the pow'r
 Of law, must burn from hour to hour,
 (Else they, without redemption, fall
 Under the terrors of that hall,
 Which, once notorious for a bop,
 Is now become a justice shop)
 Which are so manag'd, to go out
 Just when the time comes round about,
 Which yet through emulation strive
 To keep their dying light alive,
 And (not uncommon, as we find,
 Amongst the children of mankind)
 As they grew weaker, would seem stronger,
 And burn a little, little longer;
 Fancy betwixt such eyes enshrin'd,
 No brush to daub, no mill to grind,
 Thrice wav'd her wand around, whose force
 Chang'd in an instant Nature's course,
 And, hardly credible in rhyme,
 Not only stopp'd, but call'd back time.
 The face of ev'ry wrinkle clear'd,
 Smooth as the floating stream appear'd,
 Down the neck ringlets spread their flame,
 The neck admiring whence they came,
 On the arch'd brow the Graces play'd;
 On the full bosom Cupid laid;
Suns, from their proper orbits sent,
 Became for eyes a supplement;
 Teeth, white as ever teeth were seen
 Deliver'd from the hand of Green*,

* An eminent dentist at this period.

Started, in regular array,
Like train-bands on a grand field-day,
Into the gums, which would have fled,
But, wond'ring, turn'd from white to red,
Quite alter'd was the whole machine,
And Lady ——— was fifteen.

Here she made lordly temples rise
Before the pious Dashwood's eyes,
Temples which, built aloft in air,
May serve for show, if not for pray'r;
In solemn form herself before,
Array'd like Faith, the Bible bore.
There, over Melcomb's feather'd head,
Who, quite a man of gingerbread,
Savour'd in talk, in dress, and phiz,
More of another world than this,
To a dwarf muse a giant page,
The last grave top of the last age,
In a superb and feather'd herse,
Bescutecheon'd and betagg'd with verse,
Which, to beholders from afar,
Appear'd like a triumphal car,
She rode, in a cast rainbow clad;
There, throwing off the ballow'd plaid,
Naked, as when (in those drear cells
Where, self-bliss'd, self-curs'd madness dwells)
Pleasure, on whom, in laughter's shape,
Frenzy had perfected a rape,
First brought her forth, before her time,
Wild witness of her shame and crime,
Driving before an idol band
Of driv'ling Stuarts, hand in hand,
Some, who to curse mankind, had wore
A crown they ne'er must think of more,
Others, whose baby brows were grac'd
With paper crowns, and toys of paste,
She jigg'd, and playing on the flute,
Spread raptures o'er the soul of Bate.

Big with vast hopes, some mighty plan,
Which wrought the busy soul of man
To her full bent, the civil law,
Fit code to keep a world in awe,
Bound o'er his brows, fair to behold,
As Jewish frontlets were of old,
The famous charter of our land,
Defac'd, and mangled in his hand;
As one whom deepest thoughts employ,
But deepest thoughts of truest joy
Serious and slow he strode, he stalk'd,
Before him troops of heroes walk'd,
Whom best he lov'd, of heroes crown'd,
By Tories guarded all around,
Dull solemn pleasure in his face,
He saw the honours of his race,
He saw their lineal glories rise,
And touch'd, or seem'd to touch, the skies,
Not the most distant mark of fear,
No sign of axe, or scaffold near,
Not one curs'd thought, to cross his will,
Of such a place as Tower Hill.

Curse on this muse, a flippant jade,
A shrew, like ev'ry other maid
Who turns the corner of nineteen,
Devour'd with peevishness and spleen.
Her tongue (for as, when bound for life,
The husband suffers for the wife,

So if in any works of rhyme
Perchance there blunders out a crime,
Poor culprit bards must always rue it,
Although 'tis plain the muses do it)
Sooner or later cannot fail
To send me headlong to a jail.
Whate'er my theme (our themes we choose
In modern days without a muse,
Just as a father will provide
To join a bridegroom and a bride,
As if, though they must be the play'rs,
The game was wholly his, not theirs)
Whate'er my theme, the muse, who still Owns no direction but her will,
Flies off, and, ere I could expect,
By ways oblique and indirect,
At once quite over head and ears,
In fatal politics appears.
Time was, and, if I aught discern
Of fate, that time shall soon return,
When decent and demure at least,
As grave and dull as any priest,
I could see vice in robes array'd,
Could see the game of folly play'd
Successfully in fortune's school,
Without exclaiming rogue or fool;
Time was, when nothing loth or proud
I lacquied with the fawning crowd,
Scoundrels in office, and would bow
To cyphers great in place; but now
Upright I stand, as if wise fate,
To compliment a shatter'd state,
Had me, like Atlas, hither sent
To shoulder up the firmament,
And if I stoop'd, with gen'ral crack
The heavens would tumble from my back;
Time was, when rank and situation
Secur'd the great ones of the nation
From all controul, satire and law
Kept only little knaves in awe;
But now, decorum lost, I stand
Bemur'd, a pencil in my hand,
And, dead to ev'ry sense of shame,
Careless of safety and of fame,
The names of scoundrels minute down,
And libel more than half the town.

How can a statesman be secure
In all his villanies, if poor
And dirty authors thus shall dare
To lay his rotten bosom bare?
Muses should pass away their time
In dressing out the poet's rhyme
With bills and ribbands, and array
Each line in harmless taste, though gay.
When the hot burning fit is on,
They should regale their restless son
With something to allay his rage,
Some cool Castalian beverage,
Or some such draught (though they, 'tis plain,
Taking the muses name in vain,
Know nothing of their real court,
And only fable from report)
As makes a Whitehead's ode go down,
Or flakes the feverette of Brown:
But who would in his senses think
Of muses giving gall to drink,

Or that their folly should afford
To raving poets gun or sword?
Poets were ne'er design'd by fate
To meddle with affairs of state,
Nor should (if we may speak our thought Truly as men of honour ought)
Sound policy their rage admit,
To launch the thunderbolts of wit
About those heads, which, when they're shot,
Can't tell if 'was by wit or not.

These things well known, what devil in spite
Can have seduc'd me thus to write
Out of that road, which must have led
To riches, without heart or head,
Into that road, which, had I more
Than ever poet had before,
Of wit and virtue, in disgrace
Would keep me still, and out of place,
Which, if some judge (you'll understand
One famous, famous through the land
For making law) should stand my friend,
At last may in a pill'ry end,
And all this, I myself admit,
Without one cause to lead to it.—

For instance now—this book—the GHOST—
Methinks I hear some critic post
Remark most gravely—"The first word
"Which we about the GHOST have heard."
Peace, my good Sir—not quite so fast—
What is the first may be the last,
Which is a point, all must agree,
Cannot depend on you or me.
FANNY, no ghost of common mould,
Is not by forms to be controul'd;
'To keep her state, and show her skill,
She never comes but when she will.
I wrote and wrote (perhaps you doubt,
And shrewdly, what I wrote about,
Believe me, much to my disgrace,
I too am in the self-same case)
But still I wrote, till FANNY came
Impatient, nor could any shame
On me with equal justice fall,
If she had never come at all.
An underling, I could not stir
Without the cue thrown out by her,
Nor from the subject aid receive
Until she came, and gave me leave.
So that (ye sons of erudition
Mark, this is but a supposition,
Nor would I to so wise a nation
Suggest it as a revelation)
If henceforth dully turning o'er
Page after page, ye read no more
Of FANNY, who, in sea or air,
May be departed God knows where,
Rail at jilt fortune, but agree
No censure can be laid on me,
For sure (the cause let Mansfield try)
FANNY is in the fault, not I.

But to return—and this I hold,
A secret worth its weight in gold
To those who write, as I write now,
Not to mind where they go, or how,
Through ditch, through bog, o'er hedge and stile;
Make it but worth the reader's while,

And keep a passage fair and plain
Always to bring him back again.
Through dirt, who scruples to approach,
At pleasure's call, to take a coach?
But we should think the man a clown
Who in the dirt should set us down.
But to return—if wit, who ne'er
The shackles of restraint could bear,
In wayward humour should refuse
Her timely succour to the muse,
And to no rules and orders tied,
Roughly deny to be her guide,
She must renounce decorum's plan,
And get back when and how she can;
As parsons, who, without pretext,
As soon as mention'd, quit their text,
And, to promote sleep's genial pow'r,
Grope in the dark for half an hour,
Give no more reason (for we know
Reason is vulgar, mean, and low)
Why they come back (should it befall
That ever they come back at all)
Into the road, to end the rout,
Than they can give why they went out.

But to return—this book—the GHOST—
A mere amusement at the most,
A trifle, fit to wear away
The horrors of a rainy day,
A slight shot silk, for summer wear,
Just as our modern statesmen are,
If rigid honesty permit
That I for once purloin the wit
Of him, who, were we all to steal,
Is much too rich the theft to feel.
Yet in this book, where ease should join
With mirth to sugar ev'ry line,
Where it should all be mere chit-chat,
Lively, good-humour'd, and all that,
Where honest satire, in disgrace,
Should not so much as show her face,
The shrew, o'erleaping all due bounds,
Breaks into laughter's sacred grounds,
And, in contempt, plays o'er her tricks
In science, trade, and politics.

But why should the distemper'd scold
Attempt to blacken men enroll'd
In pow'rs dread book, whose mighty skill
Can twist an empire to their will;
Whose voice is fate, and on their tongue
Law, liberty, and life, are hung;
Whom, on inquiry, truth shall find
With Stuarts link'd, time out of mind
Superior to their country's laws,
Defenders of a tyrant's cause;
Men, who the same damn'd maxims hold
Darkly, which they avow'd of old;
Who, though by diff'rent means, pursue
The end which they had first in view,
And, force found vain, now play their part
With much less honour, much more art?
Why, at the corners of the streets,
To ev'ry patriot drudge she meets,
Known or unknown, with furious cry
Should she wild clamours vent; or why,
The minds of groundlings to inflame,
A Dashwood, Bute, and Wyndham name?

Why, having not to our surprise
 The fear of death before her eyes,
 Bearing, and that but now and then,
 No other weapon but her pen,
 Should she an argument afford,
 For blood, to men who wear a sword;
 Men, who can nicely trim and pare
 A point of honour to a hair
 (Honour—a word of nice import,
 A pretty trinket in a court,
 Which my lord quite in rapture feels
 Dangling and rattling with his seals—
 Honour—a word, which all the nine
 Would be much puzzled to define—
 Honour—a word which torture mocks,
 And might confound a thousand Lockes—
 Which (for I leave to wiser heads,
 Who fields of death prefer to beds
 Of down, to find out, if they can,
 What honour is, on their wild plan)
 Is not, to take it in their way,
 And this we sure may dare to say,
 Without incurring an offence,
Courage, law, honesty, or sense;
 Men, who all spirit, life, and soul,
 Neat butchers of a button-hole,
 Having more skill, believe it true
 That they must have more courage too;
 Men, who without a place or name,
 Their fortunes speechless as their fame,
 Would by the sword new fortunes carve,
 And rather die in fight than starve?
 At coronations, a vast field
 Which food of ev'ry kind might yield,
 Of good sound food, at once most fit
 For purposes of health and wit,
 Could not ambitious satire rest,
 Content with what she might digest?
 Could she not feast on things of course,
 A champion, or a champion's horse?
 A champion's horse—no, better say,
 Though better figur'd on that day—
 A horse, which might appear to us,
 Who deal in rhyme, a Pegasus;
 A rider, who, when once got on,
 Might pass for a Bellerophon,
 Dropt on a sudden from the skies,
 To catch and fix our wond'ring eyes,
 To witch, with wand instead of whip,
 The world with noble horsemanship,
 To twist and twine, both horse and man,
 On such a well-concerted plan,
 That centaur-like, when all was done,
 We scarce could think they were not one?
 Could she not to our itching ears
 Bring the new names of new-coin'd peers,
 Who walk'd, nobility forgot,
 With shoulders fitter for a knot
 Than robes of honour; for whose sake
 Heralds in form were forc'd to make,
 To make, because they could not find,
 Great predecessors to their mind?
 Could she not (though 'tis doubtful since Whether he plumber is, or prince)
 Tell of a simple knight's advance
 To be a doughty peer of France;

Tell how he did a dukedom gain,
 And Robinson was Aquitain*;
 Tell how her city-chiefs disgrac'd,
 Were at an empty table plac'd?
 A gross neglect, which, whilst they live,
 They can't forget, and won't forgive;
 A gross neglect of all those rights
 Which march with city appetites;
 Of all those canons, which we find
 By gluttony, time out of mind,
 Establish'd; which they ever hold
 Dearer than any thing but gold:

Thanks to my stars—I now see shore—
 Of courtiers, and of courts no more—
 Thus stumbling on my city friends,
 Blind chance my guide, my purpose bends
 In line direct, and shall pursue
 The point which I had first in view,
 No more shall with the reader sport,
 Till I have seen him safe in port.
 Hush'd be each fear—no more I bear
 Through the wide regions of the air
 The reader terrified, no more
 Wild ocean's horrid paths explore.
 Be the plain track from henceforth mine—
Cross-roads to Allen† I resign—
 Allen, the honour of this nation,
 Allen, himself a corporation,
 Allen, of late notorious grown
 For writings none, or all his own,
 Allen, the first of letter'd men,
 Since the good bishop holds his pen,
 And at his elbow takes his stand
 To mend his head, and guide his hand.
 But hold—once more digression hence—
 Let us return to Common-Sense;
 The car of Phœbus I discharge,
 My carriage now a Lord-Mayor's barge.

Suppose we now—we may suppose
 In verse, what would be sin in prose—
 The sky with darkness overspread,
 And ev'ry star retir'd to bed;
 The gewgaw robes of pomp and pride
 In some dark corner thrown aside;
 Great lords and ladies giving way
 To what they seem to scorn by day,
 The real feelings of the heart,
 And nature taking place of art;
Desire triumphant through the night,
 And beauty panting with delight;
Chastity, woman's fairest crown,
 Till the return of morn laid down,
 Then to be worn again as bright
 As if not sullied in the night;
 Dull ceremony, business o'er,
 Dreaming in form at Cottrell's door;
Precaution trudging all about
 To see the candles safely out,
 Bearing a mighty master-key,
 Habited like economy,

* At the coronation, Sir Thomas Robinson walked as the representative of the Duke of Aquitain.

† Ralph Allen, Esq. of Prior Park, near Bath, the correspondent of Pope, of whom Allworthby, in Tom Jones, is said to have been the representative.

Stamping each lock with triple seals,
 Mean av'rice creeping at her heels.
 Suppose we too, like sheep in pen,
 The Mayor and Court of Aldermen,
 Within their barge, which through the deep,
 The rowers more than half asleep,
 Mov'd slow, as overcharg'd with state;
 Thames groan'd beneath the mighty weight,
 And felt that burden heavier far
 Than a whole fleet of men of war.
 Sleep o'er each well-known faithful head
 With lib'ral hand his poppies shed,
 Each head, by dullness render'd fit
 Sleep and his empire to admit.
 Through the whole passage not a word,
 Not one faint, weak, half sound, was heard;
 Sleep had prevail'd to overwhelm
 The steersman nodding o'er the helm;
 The rowers, without force or skill,
 Left the dull barge to drive at will;
 To sluggish oars suspended hung,
 And even Beardmore * held his tongue.
 Commerce, regardless of a freight,
 On which depended half her state,
 Stepp'd to the helm, with ready hand
 She safely clear'd that bank of sand,
 Where, stranded, our west country fleet
 Delay and danger often meet;
 Till Neptune, anxious for the trade,
 Comes in full tides, and brings them aid.
 Next (for the muses can survey
 Objects by night as well as day,
 Nothing prevents their taking aim,
 Darkness and light to them the same)
 They pass that building, which of old
Queen-mothers was design'd to hold;
 At present a mere lodging-pen,
 A palace turn'd into a den,
 To barracks turn'd, and soldiers tread
 Where dowagers have laid their head.
 Why should we mention Surrey-street;
 Where ev'ry week grave judges meet,
 All fitted out with hum and ba,
 In proper form to drawl out law,
 To see all causes duly tried
 'Twixt knaves who drive, and fools who ride?
 Why at the Temple should we stay?
 What of the Temple dare we say?
 A dangerous ground we tread on there,
 And words perhaps may actions bear,
 Where, as the brethren of the seas
 For fares, the lawyers ply for fees.
 What of that bridge, most wisely made
 To serve the purposes of trade,
 In the great mart of all this nation,
 By stopping up the navigation,
 And to that sand-bank adding weight,
 Which is already much too great?—
 What of that bridge, which, void of sense,
 But well supplied with impudence,
Englishmen, knowing not the guild,
 Thought they might have a claim to build,

* An attorney and common-council-man, suppos'd to have afforded some assistance at times to "The Monitor."

Till Paterfon, as white as milk,
 As smooth as oil, as soft as silk,
 In solemn manner had decreed,
 That on the other side the Tweed,
 Art, born and bred, and fully grown,
 Was with one Mylne *, a man unknown,
 But grace, preferment, and renown
 Deserving, just arriv'd in town;
 One Mylne, an artist perfect quite,
 Both in his own and country's right,
 As fit to make a bridge, as he,
 With glorious proximity,
 To build inscriptions worthy found
 To lie for ever under ground.

Much more, worth observation too,
 Was this a season to pursue
 The theme, our muse might tell in rhyme;
 The will she hath, but not the time;
 For, swift a shaft from Indian bow,
 (And when a goddess comes, we know,
 Surpassing nature acts prevail,
 And boats want neither oar nor sail)
 The vessel past, and reach'd the shore
 So quick, that thought was scarce before.

Suppose we now our city-court
 Safely deliver'd at the port,
 And, of their state regardless quite,
 Landed, like smuggled goods, by night;
 The solemn magistrate laid down,
 The dignity of robe and gown,
 With ev'ry other ensign gone,
 Suppose the woollen nightcap on:
 The flesh-brush us'd with decent state
 To make the spirits circulate,
 (A form, which, to the senses true,
 The liq'rish chaplain uses too,
 Though, something to improve the plan,
 He takes the maid instead of man)
 Swath'd, and with flannel cover'd o'er
 To show the vigour of threescore,
 The vigour of threescore and ten
 Above the proof of younger men,
 Suppose the mighty Dullman led
 Betwixt two slaves, and put to bed;
 Suppose the moment he lies down,
 No miracle in this great town,
 The drone as fast asleep as he
 Must in the course of nature be,
 Who, truth for our foundation take,
 When up, is never half awake.

There let him sleep, whilst we survey
 The preparations for the day,
 That day on which was to be shown
Court-pride by city-pride outdone.

The jealous mother sends away,
 As only fit for childish play,
 That daughter, who, to gall her pride,
 Shoots up too forward by her side.

The curse, of God and man accurs'd,
 Of all hell's instruments the worst,
 Draws forth his patrons, and for the day
 Struts in some spendthrift's vain array;
 Around his awkward dext'ry shine
 The treasures of Golconda's mine;

* The architect of Blackfriars Bridge.

Each neighbour, with a jealous glare,
Beholds her folly publish'd there.

*Garments, well fav'd (an anecdote
Which we can prove or would not quote)
Garments well-fav'd, which first were made,
When tailors, to promote their trade,
Against the Picts in arms arose,
And drove them out or made them clothes;
Garments, immortal, without end,
Like names and titles, which descend
Successively from sire to son;
Garments, unless some work is done
Of note, not suffer'd to appear
'Bove once at most in ev'ry year,
Were now, in solemn form, laid bare
To take the benefit of air,
And, ere they came to be employ'd
On this solemnity, to void
That scent, which Russia's leather gave
From vile and impious moth to save.*

Each head was busy, and each heart
In preparation bore a part.
Running together all about,
The servant put each other out,
Till the grave master had decreed,
The more haste, ever the worse speed;
Miss, with her little eyes half-clos'd,
Over a smuggled toilet dos'd;
The waiting maid, whom story notes
A very scrub in petticoats,
Hir'd for one work, but doing all,
In slumbers lean'd against the wall;
Milliners, summon'd from afar,
Arriv'd in shoals at Temple-Bar,
Strictly commanded to import
Cart-loads of soppery from court;
With labour'd visible design
Art strove to be superbly fine;
Nature, more pleasing, though more wild,
Taught otherwise her darling child,
And cried with spirited disdain,
Be H—— elegant and plain,

Lo! from the chambers of the east,
A welcome prelude to the feast,
In saffron-olour'd robe array'd,
High in a car by Vulcan made,
Who work'd for Jove himself, each steed
High-mettled, of celestial breed,
Pawing and pacing all the way,
Aurora brought the wish'd-for day,
And held her empire, till outrun
By that brave jolly groom the sun.

The trumpet—hark!—It speaks—It swells
The loud full harmony—It tells
The time at hand, when Dullman, led
By form, his citizens must head,
And march those troops, which at his call
Were now assembled to Guild-Hall,
On matters of importance great
To court and city, church and state.

From end to end the sound makes way,
All hear the signal and obey;
But Dullman, who, his charge forgot,
By Morpheus fetter'd, heard it not;
Nor could, so sound he slept and fast,
Hear any trumpet but the last.

Crape, ever true and trusty known,
Stole from the maid's bed to his own,
Then in the spirituals of pride,
Planted himself at Dullman's side,
Thrice did the ever-faithful slave,
With voice which might have reach'd the grave,
And broke death's adamant chain,
On Dullman call, but call'd in vain;
Thrice with an arm, which might have made
The Theban boxer curse his trade,
The drone he shook, who rear'd the head,
And thrice fell backward on his bed,
What could be done? Where force hath fail'd,
Policy often hath prevail'd;
And what an inference most plain,
Had been, Crape thought might be again.

Under his pillow (still in mind
The proverb kept, Fast bind, fast find),
Each blessed night the keys were laid,
Which Crape to draw away essay'd.
What not the pow'r of voice or arm
Could do, this did, and broke the charm;
Quick started he with stupid stare,
For all his little soul was there.

Behold him taken up, rubb'd down,
In elbow-chair, and morning gown;
Behold him in his latter bloom,
Stripp'd, wash'd, and sprinkled with perfume;
Behold him, bending with the weight
Of robes and trumpery of state;
Behold him, (for the maxim's true,
Whate'er we by another do,
We do ourselves; and chaplain paid,
Like slaves in ev'ry other trade,
Had mutter'd over God knows what,
Something which he by heart had got),
Having, as usual, said his pray'rs,
Go titter totter to the stairs;
Behold him, for descent prepare,
With one foot trembling in the air;
He starts, he pauses on the brink,
And, hard to credit, seems to think;
Through his whole train (the chaplain gavē
The proper cue to ev'ry slave)
At once, as if infection caught,
Each started, paus'd, and aim'd at thought;
He turns, and they turn; big with care,
He waddles to his elbow-chair,
Squats down, and, silent for a season,
At last with Crape begins to reason:
But first of all he made a sign
That ev'ry soul but the divine,
Should quit the room; in him he knows,
He may all confidence repose.

Crape—though I'm yet not quite awake—
Before this awful step I take,
On which my future ail depends,
I ought to know my foes and friends.
By foes and friends, observe me still,
I meant not those who well or ill
Perhaps may wish me, but those who
Have 't in their power to do it too.
Now if, attentive to the state,
In too much hurry to be great,
Or through much zeal, a motive, Crape,
Deserving praise, into a scrape

I, like a fool, am got, no doubt,
 I, like a wise man, should get out.
 Not that, remark without replies,
 I say that to get out is wise,
 Or, by the very self-same rule
 That to get in was like a fool:
 The marrow of this argument
 Must wholly rest on the event;
 And therefore, which is really hard,
 Against events too I must guard.

Should things continue as they stand,
 And Bute prevail through all the land
 Without a rival, by his aid,
 My fortunes in a trice are made;
 Nay, honours on my zeal may smile,
 And stamp me Earl of some great isle:
 But if, a matter of much doubt,

The present minister goes out,
 Fain would I know on what pretext
 I can stand fairly with the next?
 For as my aim at ev'ry hour

Is to be well with those in pow'r,
 And my material point of view,
 Whoever's in, to be in too,
 I should not, like a blockhead, choose
 To gain these so as those to lose:

'Tis good in ev'ry case, you know,
 To have two strings unto our bow.

As one in wonder lost, Crape view'd
 His lord, who thus his speech pursu'd.

This, my good Crape, is my grand point,
 And as the times are out of joint,
 The greater caution is requir'd
 To bring about the point desir'd.
 What I would wish to bring about,
 Cannot admit a moment's doubt;
 The matter in dispute, you know,
 Is what we call the quomodo.

That be thy task.—The rev'rend slave,
 Becoming in a moment grave,
 Fix'd to the ground and rooted flood,
 Just like a man cut out of wood;
 Such as we see (without the least Reflection glancing on the priest)
 One or more, planted up and down,
 Almost in ev'ry church in town:
 He stood some minutes; then, like one
 Who wish'd the matter might be done,
 But could not do it, shook his head,
 And thus the man of sorrow said:

Hard is this task, too hard I swear,
 By much too hard for me to bear;
 Beyond expression hard my part,
 Could mighty Dullman see my heart,
 When he, alas! makes known a will,
 Which Crape's not able to fulfil.

Was ever my obedience barr'd
 By any trifling nice regard
 To sense and honour? Could I reach
 Thy meaning without help of speech,
 At the first motion of thy eye
 Did not thy faithful creature fly?
 Have I not said, not what I ought,
 But what by earthly master taught?
 Did I e'er weigh, through duty strong,
 In thy great biddings, right and wrong?

Did ever int'rest, to whom thou
 Can'st not with more devotion bow,
 Warp my sound faith, or will of mine
 In contradiction run to thine?
 Have I not, at thy table plac'd,
 When business call'd aloud for haste;
 Torn myself thence, yet never heard
 To utter one complaining word,
 And had, till thy great work was done,
 All appetites as having none?
 Hard is it, this great plan pursu'd
 Of voluntary servitude;

Pursu'd without or shame or fear,
 Through the great circle of the year;
 Now to receive, in this grand hour,
 Commands which lie beyond my pow'r;
 Commands which baffle all my skill,
 And leave me nothing but my will:
 Be that accepted; let my Lord
 Indulgence to his slave afford;
 This task, for my poor strength unfit,
 Will yield to none but Dullman's wit.

With such gross incense gratified,
 And turning up the lip of pride,
 Poor Crape—and shook his empty head—
 Poor puzzled Crape, wise Dullman said,
 Of judgment weak, of sense confin'd,
 For things of lower note design'd,
 For things within the vulgar reach,
 To run of errands, and to preach,
 Well hast thou judg'd, that heads like mine
 Cannot want help from heads like thine;
 Well hast thou judg'd thyself unmeet
 Of such high argument to treat;
 'Twas but to try thee that I spoke,
 And all I said was but a joke.

Nor think a joke, Crape, a disgrace
 Or to my person, or my place;
 The wisest of the sons of men
 Have deign'd to use them now and then:
 The only caution, do you see,
 Demanded by our dignity,
 From common use and men exempt,
 Is, that they may not breed contempt.
 Great use they have, when in the hands
 Of one, like me, who understands;
 Who understands the time and place,
 The persons, manner, and the grace,
 Which fools neglect; so that we find,
 If all the requisites are join'd,
 From whence a perfect joke must spring,
 A joke's a very serious thing.

But to our business—My design,
 Which gave so rough a shock to thine,
 To my capacity is made
 As ready as a fraud in trade,
 Which like broad-cloth, I can, with ease,
 Cut out in any shape I please.

Some, in my circumstance, some few,
 Aye, and those men of genius too,
 Good men, who, without love or hate,
 Whether they early rise or late,
 With names uncrack'd, and credit sound,
 Rise worth a hundred thousand pound,
 By threadbare ways and means would try
 To bear their point; so will not I.

New methods shall my wisdom find
To suit these matters to my mind,
So that the infidels at court,
Who make our city wits their sport,
Shall hail the honours of my reign,
And own that Dullman bears a brain.

Some, in my place, to gain their ends,
Would give relations up, and friends;
Would lend a wife, who they might swear
Safely, was none the worse for wear;
Would see a daughter, yet a maid,
Into a statesman's arms betray'd;
Nay, should the girl prove coy, nor know
What daughters to a father owe,
Sooner than schemes so nobly plann'd
Should fail, themselves would lend a hand;
Would vote on one side, whilst a brother,
Properly taught, would vote on t' other;
Would ev'ry petty band forget;
The public eye be with one set,
In private with a second herd,
And be by proxy with a third;
Would (like a queen, of whom I read
The other day—her name is fled—
In a book (where, together bound,
Whittington and his cat I found,
A tale most true, and free from art,
Which all Lord Mayors should have by heart)
A queen (O might those days begin Afresh when queens would learn to spin)
Who wrought, and wrought, but for some plot,
The cause of which I've now forgot,
During the absence of the sun
Undid what she by day had done)
Whilst they a double visage wear,
What's sworn by day, by night unswear.

Such be their arts, and such perchance
May happily their ends advance:
From a new system mine shall spring,
A locum-tenens is the thing.
That's your true plan.—I'll oblige
The present ministers of state,
My shadow shall our court approach,
And bear my pow'r, and have my coach;
My fine state coach, superb to view,
A fine state coach, and paid for too;
To curry favour, and the grace
Obtain, of those who're out of place:
In the mean time I—that's to say—
I proper, & myself—here stay.

But hold—perhaps unto the nation,
Who hate the Scot's administration,
To lend my coach may seem to be
Declaring for the ministry;
For where the city coach is, there
Is the true essence of the Mayor:
Therefore (for wise men are intent
Evils at distance to prevent,
Whilst fools the evils first endure,
And then are plagu'd to seek a cure)
No coach—a horse—and free from fear
To make our Deputy appear,
Fast on his back shall he be tied,
With two grooms marching by his side:
Then for a horse—through all the land,
To head our solemn city-band,

VOL. X.

Can any one so fit be found,
As he, who in Artill'ry ground,
Without a rider, noble fight,
Led on our bravest troops to fight.

But first, Crape, for my honour's sake,
A tender point, inquiry make
About that horse, if the dispute
Is ended, or is still in suit.
For whilst a cause (observe this plan
Of justice) whether horse or man
The parties be, remains in doubt,
Till 'tis determin'd out and out,
That pow'r must tyranny appear,
Which should, prejudging, interfere,
And weak faint judges over-awe
To bias the free course of law.

You have my will—now quickly run,
And take care that my will be done.
In public, Crape, you must appear,
Whilst I in privacy sit here;
Here shall great Dullman sit alone,
Making this elbow-chair my throne,
And you, performing what I bid,
Do all, as if I nothing did.

Crape heard, and speeded on his way;
With him to hear was to obey.
Not without trouble, be assur'd,
A proper proxy was procur'd
To serve such infamous intent,
And such a lord to represent;
Nor could one have been found at all
On t' other side of London wall.

The trumpet sounds—solemn and slow
Behold the grand procession go,
All moving on, cat after kind,
As if for motion ne'er design'd.

Constables, whom the laws admit
To keep the peace by breaking it;
Beadles, who hold the second place
By virtue of a silver mace,
Which ev'ry Saturday is drawn,
For use of Sunday, out of pawn;
Treasurers, who with empty key
Secure an empty treasury;
Churchwardens, who their course pursue
In the same state, as to their pew
Churchwardens of Saint Marg'ret go,
Since Peirson taught them pride and show,
Who in short transient pomp appear,
Like almanacks chang'd ev'ry year,
Behind whom, with unbroken locks,
Charity carries the Poor's Box,
Not knowing that with private keys
They ope and shut it when they please;
Overseers, who by frauds ensure
The heavy curses of the poor;
Unclean came flocking, Bulls and Bears,
Like beasts into the ark, by pairs.

Portentous flaming in the van
Stalk'd the Professor Sheridan;
A man of wire, a mere Pantine,
A downright animal machine.
He knows alone in proper mode
How to take vengeance on an Ode,
And how to butcher Ammon's son
And poor Jack Dryden both in one.

K k

On all occasions next the chair
 He stands for service of the mayor,
 And to instruct him how to use
 His a's and b's, and p's and q's.
 O'er letters, into tatters worn,
 O'er syllables, defac'd and torn,
 O'er words disjointed, and o'er sense
 Left destitute of all defence,
 He strides, and all the way he goes,
 Wades, deep in blood, o'er Crisp-Cross-Roxus.
 Before him, ev'ry Consonant
 In agonies is seen to pant;
 Behind, in forms not to be known,
 The ghosts of tortur'd Vowels groan.

Next Hart and Duke, well worthy grace
 And city favour, came in place.
 No children can their toils engage,
 Their toils are turn'd to rev'rend age.
 When a Court-Dame, to grace his brows
 Resolv'd, is wed to city spouse,
 Their aid with Madam's aid must join
 The awkward dotard to refine,
 And teach, whence truest glory flows,
Grave Sixty to turn out his toes.
 Each bore in hand a kit, and each
 To show how fit he was to teach
 A Cit, an Alderman, a Mayor,
 Led in a string a dancing bear.

Since the revival of Fingal,
 Custom, and custom's all in all,
 Commands that we should have regard,
 On all high seasons, to the Bard.
 Great acts like these, by vulgar tongue
 Profan'd, should not be said, but sung.
 This place to fill, renown'd in fame,
 The high and mighty Lockman * came;
 And, ne'er forgot in Dullman's reign,
 With proper order to maintain
 The uniformity of pride,
 Brought brother Whitehead by his side.

On horse, who proudly paw'd the ground,
 And cast his fiery eye-balls round,
 Snorting, and champing the rude bit,
 As if, for warlike purpose fit,
 His high and gen'rous blood disdain'd
 To be for sports and pastimes rein'd,
 Great Dymock, in his glorious station,
 Paraded at the coronation.
 Not so our City Dymock came,
 Heavy, dispirited, and tame;
 No mark of sense, his eyes half-clos'd,
 He on a mighty dray-horse doz'd.
 Fate never could a horse provide
 So fit for such a man to ride;
 Nor find a man, with strictest care,
 So fit for such a horse to bear.
 Hung round with instruments of death,
 The sight of him would stop the breath
 Of braggart cowardice, and make
 The very Court Dragoon quake.
 With dirks, which, in the hands of spite,
 Do their damn'd business in the night,

* John Lockman, secretary to the British herring fishery, author of many forgotten poems, and translator of several works from the French.

From Scotland sent, but here display'd
 Only to fill up the parade;
 With swords, unflesh'd, of maiden hue,
 Which rage or valour never drew;
 With blunderbusses, taught to ride,
 Like pocket-pistols, by his side,
 In girdle stuck, he seem'd to be
 A little moving armory.
 One thing much wanting to complete
 The fight, and make a perfect treat,
 Was, that the horse (a courtesy
 In horses found of high degree)
 Instead of going forward on,
 All the way backward should have gone.
 Horses, unless they breeding lack,
 Some scruple make to turn their back,
 Though riders, which plain truth declares,
 No scruple make of turning theirs.

Far, far apart from all the rest,
 Fit only for a standing jest,
 The independent (can you get
 A better suited epithet)
 The independent Amyand came,
 All burning with the sacred flame
 Of liberty, which well he knows
 On the great flock of slav'ry grows.
 Like sparrow, who, depriv'd of mate
 Snatch'd by the cruel hand of fate,
 From spray to spray no more will hop,
 But sits alone on the house-top,
 Or like himself, when all alone
 At Croydon, he was heard to groan,
 Lifting both hands in the defence
 Of interest and common sense;
 Both hands, for as no other man
 Adopted and pursu'd his plan,
 The left-hand had been lonesome quite,
 If he had not held up the right.
 Apart he came, and fix'd his eyes
 With rapture on a distant prize,
 On which in letters worthy note,
 There "twenty thousand pounds" was wrote:
 False trap, for credit sapp'd is found
 By getting twenty thousand pound.
 Nay, look not thus on me, and stare
 Doubting the certainty.—To swear
 In such a case I should be loth—
 But Perry Cust * may take his oath.

In plain and decent garb array'd,
 With the prim quaker fraud came trade;
 Connivance, to improve the plan,
 Habited like a Juryman,
 Judging as interest prevails,
 Came next with measures, weights, and scales;
 Extortion next, of hellish race,
 A cub most damn'd, to show his face
 Forbid by fear, but not by shame,
 Turn'd to a Jew, like ——— came;
 Corruption, Midas-like, behold
 Turning whate'er she touch'd to gold;
 Impotence led by lust, and pride
 Strutting with Ponton by her side;
 Hypocrisy, demure and sad,
 In garments of the priesthood clad,

* See North Briton, Vol. III.

So well disguis'd, that you might swear,
 Deceiv'd, a very priest was there;
 Bankruptcy, full of ease and health,
 And wallowing in well-fav'd wealth,
 Came sneering through a ruin'd band,
 And bringing B—— in her hand;
 Victory hanging down her head,
 Was by a Highland stallion led;
 Peace, cloth'd in fables, with a face
 Which witness'd sense of huge disgrace,
 Which spake a deep and rooted shame
 Both of herself and of her name,
 Mourning creeps on, and blushing feels
 War, grim war treading on her heels;
 Pale credit, shaken by the arts
 Of men with bad heads and worse hearts,
 Taking no notice of a band
 Which near her were ordain'd to stand,
 Well nigh destroy'd by sickly fit,
 Look'd wistful all around for Pitt;
 Freedom—at that most hallow'd name
 My spirits mount into a flame,
 Each pulse beats high, and each nerve strains
 E'en to the cracking; through my veins
 The tides of life more rapid run,
 And tell me I am freedom's son—
 Freedom came next, but scarce was seen,
 When the sky, which appear'd serene
 And gay before, was overcast;
 Horror bestrode a foreign blast,
 And from the prison of the North,
 To freedom deadly, storms burst forth.

A car like those, in which, we're told,
 Our wild forefathers warr'd of old,
 Loaded with death, six horses bear
 Through the blank region of the air.
 Too fierce for time or art to tame,
 They pour'd forth mingled smoke and flame
 From their wide nostrils; ev'ry steed
 Was of that ancient savage breed
 Which fell Geryon nurs'd; their food
 The flesh of man, their drink his blood.

On the first horses, ill-match'd pair,
This fat and sleek, that lean and bare,
 Came ill-match'd riders side by side,
 And poverty was yok'd with pride.
 Union most strange it must appear,
 Till other unions make it clear.

Next, in the gall of bitterness,
 With rage, which words can ill express,
 With unforgiving rage, which springs
 From a false zeal for holy things,
 Wearing such robes as prophets wear,
 False prophets plac'd in Peter's chair;
 On which, in characters of fire,
 Shapes antic, horrible and dire,
 Inwoven flam'd; where, to the view,
 In groups appear'd a rabble crew
 Of sainted devils, where all round
 Vile reliques of vile men were found,
 Who, worse than devils, from the birth
 Perform'd the work of hell on earth,
Jugglers, Inquisitors, and Popes,
 Pointing at axes, wheels, and ropes,
 And engines, fram'd on horrid plan,
 Which none but the destroyer man

Could, to promote his selfish views,
 Have heads to make, and hearts to use;
 Bearing, to consecrate her tricks,
 In her left hand a crucifix,
 Remembrance of our dying Lord,
 And in her right a two-edg'd sword;
 Having her brows, in impious sport,
 Adorn'd with words of high import,
 On earth peace, amongst men good-will,
 Love bearing, and forbearing still,
 All wrote in the heart's-blood of those
 Who rather death than falsehood chose;
 On her breast (where, in days of yore,
 When God lov'd Jews, the high-priest wore
 Those oracles, which were decreed
 T' instruct and guide the chosen seed)
 Having with glory clad and strength,
 The virgin pictur'd at full length,
 Whilst at her feet, in small pourtray'd,
 As scarce worth notice, Christ was laid;
 Came superstition, fierce and fell,
 An imp detested, e'en in hell;
 Her eye inflam'd, her face all o'er
 Fouly besmear'd with human gore,
 O'er heaps of mangled saints she rode;
 Fast at her heels death proudly strode,
 And grimly smil'd, well-pleas'd to see
 Such havoc of mortality.

Close by her side, on mischief bent,
 And urging on each bad intent
 To its full bearing, savage, wild,
 The mother fit of such a child,
 Striving the empire to advance
 Of sin and death, came ignorance.

With looks, where dread command was plac'd,
 And sov'reign pow'r by pride disgrac'd,
 Where loudly witnessing a mind
 Of savage more than human kind,
 Not choosing to be lov'd, but fear'd,
 Mocking at right, misrule appear'd.

With eyeballs glaring fiery red,
 Enough to strike beholders dead,
 Gnashing his teeth, and in a flood
 Pouring corruption forth and blood
 From his chaf'd jaws; without remorse
 Whipping, and spurring on his horse,
 Whose sides, in their own blood embay'd,
 E'en to the bone were open laid,
 Came tyranny; disdaining awe,
 And trampling over sense and law.
 One thing and only one he knew,
 One object only would pursue,
 Though less (so low doth passion bring)
 Than man, he would be more than king.

With ev'ry argument and art
 Which might corrupt the head and heart,
 Soothing the frenzy of his mind,
 Companion meet, was flattery join'd.
 Winning his carriage, ev'ry look
 Employ'd, whilst it conceal'd a hook;
 When simple most, most to be fear'd;
 Most crafty when no craft appear'd;
 His tales no man like him could tell;
 His words, which melted as they fell,
 Might e'en a hypocrite deceive,
 And make an infidel believe,

Wantonly cheating o'er and o'er
Those who had cheated been before :
Such flatt'ry came in evil hour,
Pois'ning the royal ear of pow'r,
And, grown by prostitution great,
Would be first minister of state.

Within the chariot, all alone,
High seated on a kind of throne,
With pebbles grac'd, a figure came,
Whom justice would, but dare not name.
Hard times when justice, without fear,
Dare not bring forth to public ear
The names of those, who dare offend
'Gainst justice, and pervert her end :
But, if the muse afford me grace,
Description shall supply the place.

In foreign garments he was clad :
Sage ermine o'er the glossy plaid
Cast rev'rend honour ; on his heart,
Wrought by the curious hand of art,
In silver wrought, and brighter far
Than heav'nly or than earthly star,
Shone a white rose, the emblem dear
Of him he ever must revere ;
Of that dread lord, who with his host
Of faithful native rebels lost,
Like those black spirits doom'd to hell,
At once from pow'r and virtue fell ;
Around his clouded brows was plac'd
A bonnet, most superbly grac'd
With mighty trifles, nor forgot
The sacred motto, Touch me not.

In the right-hand a sword he bore
Harder than adamant, and more
Fatal than winds, which from the mouth
Of the rough north invade the south :
The reeking blade to view presents
The blood of helpless innocents ;
And on the hilt, as meek become
As lambs before the shearers dumb,
With downcast eye, and solemn show
Of deep unutterable woe,
Mourning the time when freedom reign'd,
Fast to a rock was justice chain'd.

In his left-hand, in wax impress,
With bells and gewgaws idly dress,
An image, cast in baby mould,
He held, and seem'd o'erjoy'd to hold,
On this he fix'd his eyes, to this
Bowing he gave the loyal kifs,
And, for rebellion fully ripe,
Seem'd to desire the antitype.
What if to that pretender's foes
His greatness, nay, his life he owes,
Shall common obligations bind,
And shake his constancy of mind ?
Scorning such weak and petty chains,
Faithful to James he still remains,
Though he the friend of George appear :
Diffimulation's virtue here.

Jealous and mean, he with a frown
Would awe, and keep all merit down,
Nor would to truth and justice bend,
Unless out-bullied by his friend :
Brave with the coward, with the brave
He is himself a coward slave ;

Aw'd by his fears, he has no heart
To take a great and open part ;
Mines in a subtle train he springs,
And, secret, saps the ears of kings ;
But not e'en there continues firm
'Gainst the resistance of a worm :
Born in a country, where the will
Of one is law to all, he still
Retain'd th' infection, with full aim
To spread it wheresoe'er he came ;
Freedom he hated, law defied,
The prostitute of pow'r and pride :
Law he with ease explains away,
And leads bewilder'd sense astray ;
Much to the credit of his brain
Puzzles the cause he can't maintain,
Proceeds on most familiar grounds,
And, where he can't convince, confounds ;
Talents of rarest stamp and size,
To nature false, he misapplies,
And turns to poison what was sent
For purposes of nourishment.
Paleness, not such as on his wings
The messenger of sickness brings,
But such as takes its coward rise
From conscious baseness, conscious vice,
O'erspread his cheeks ; disdain and pride,
To upstart fortunes ever tied,
Scowl'd on his brow ; within his eye,
Insidious, lurking like a spy
To caution principled by fear,
Not daring open to appear,
Lodg'd covert mischiefs : passion hung
On his lip quiv'ring ; on his tongue
Fraud dwelt at large ; within his breast
All that makes villain found a nest,
All that, on hell's completest plan,
E'er join'd to damn the heart of man.

Soon as the car reach'd land, he rose,
And with a look which might have froze
The heart's best blood, which was enough,
Had hearts been made of sterner stuff
In cities than elsewhere, to make
The very stoutest quail and quake,
He cast his baleful eyes around.
Fix'd without motion to the ground,
Fear waiting on surprise, all stood,
And horror chill'd their curdled blood :
No more they thought of pomp, no more
(For they had seen his face before)
Of law they thought ; the cause forgot,
Whether it was or ghost, or plot,
Which drew them there. They all stood more
Like statues than they were before.

What could be done ? Could art, could force,
Or both direct a proper course
To make this savage monster tame,
Or send him back the way he came ?
What neither art, nor force, nor both
Could do, a lord of foreign growth,
A lord to that base wretch allied
In country, not in vice and pride,
Effected : from the self-same land,
(Bad news for our blaspheming band
Of scribblers, but deserving note)
The poison came, and antidote.

Abash'd the monster hung his head ;
 And like an empty vision fled ;
 His train, like virgin snows which run,
 Kiss'd by the burning bawdy sun,
 To love-sick streams, dissolv'd in air ;
 Joy, who from absence seem'd more fair,
 Came smiling, freed from slavish awe ;
 Loyalty, liberty, and law,
 Impatient of the galling chain,
 And yoke of pow'r, resum'd their reign ;
 And burning with the glorious flame
 Of public virtue, Mansfield came.

THE CONFERENCE.

GRACE said in form, which sceptics must agree,
 When they are told that grace was said by me ;
 The servants gone, to break the scurvy jest
 On the proud landlord, and his thread-bare guest ;

The king gone round, my lady too withdrawn,
 My lord, in usual taste, began to yawn,
 And lolling backward in his elbow-chair,
 With an insipid kind of stupid stare,
 Picking his teeth, twirling his seals about—
 Churchill, you have a poem coming out.
 You've my best wishes ; but I really fear
 Your muse in general is too severe ;
 Her spirit seems her int'rest to oppose,
 And where she makes one friend, makes twenty foes.

C. Your lordship's fears are just, I feel their force,

But only feel it as a thing of course.
 The man whose hardy spirit shall engage
 To lash the vices of a guilty age,
 At his first setting forward ought to know,
 That ev'ry rogue he meets must be his foe ;
 That the rude breath of satire will provoke
 Many who feel, and more who fear the stroke.
 But shall the partial rage of selfish men
 From stubborn justice wrench the righteous pen,
 Or shall I not my settled course pursue,
 Because my foes are foes to virtue too ?

L. What is this boasted virtue, taught in schools,
 And idly drawn from antiquated rules ?
 What is her use ? Point out one wholesome end :
 Will she hurt foes, or can she make a friend ?
 When from long fasts fierce appetites arise,
 Can this same virtue stifle nature's cries ?
 Can she the pittance of a meal afford,
 Or bid thee welcome to one great man's board ?
 When northern winds the rough December arm
 With frost and snow, can virtue keep thee warm ?
 Canst thou dismiss the hard unfeeling dun,
 Barely by saying, thou art virtue's son ?
 Or by base blund'ring statesmen sent to jail,
 Will Mansfield take this virtue for thy bail ?
 Believe it not, the name is in disgrace,
 Virtue and Temple now are out of place.

Quit then this meteor, whole delusive ray
 From wealth and honour leads thee far astray.
 True virtue means, let reason use her eyes,
 Nothing with fools, and int'rest with the wise.

Wouldst thou be great, her patronage disclaim,
 Nor madly triumph in so mean a name :
 Let nobler wreaths thy happy brows adorn,
 And leave to virtue poverty and scorn.
 Let prudence be thy guide ; who doth not know
 How seldom prudence can with virtue go ?
 To be successful try thy utmost force,
 And virtue follows as a thing of course.

Hirco, who knows not Hirco ? stains the bed
 Of that kind master who first gave him bread,
 Scatters the seeds of discord through the land,
 Breaks ev'ry public, ev'ry private band,
 Beholds with joy a trusting friend undone,
 Betrays a brother, and would cheat a son :
 What mortal in his senses can endure

The name of Hirco, for the wretch is poor !
 " Let him hang, drown, starve, on a dunghill rot,
 " By all detested live, and die forgot ;
 " Let him, a poor return, in ev'ry breath
 " Feel all death's pains, yet be whole years in
 " death,"

Is now the gen'ral cry we all pursue :
 Let fortune change, and prudence changes too ;
 Supple and pliant a new system feels,
 Throws up her cap, and spaniels at his heels ;
 Long live great Hirco, cries, by int'rest taught,
 And let his foes, though I prove one, be nought.

C. Peace to such men, if such men can have peace,

Let their possessions, let their state increase ;
 Let their base services in courts strike root,
 And in the season bring forth golden fruit ;
 I envy not : let those who have the will,
 And, with so little spirit, so much skill,
 With such vile instruments their fortunes carve ;
 Rogues may grow fat, an honest man dares starve.

L. These stale conceits thrown off, let us advance

For once to real life, and quit romance.
 Starve ! pretty talking ! but I fain would view
 That man, that honest man, would do it too.
 Hence to yon mountain which outbraves the sky,
 And dart from pole to pole the strengthen'd eye,
 Through all that space you shall not view one man,
 Not one, who dares to act on such a plan.
 Cowards in calms will say, what in a storm
 The brave will tremble at, and not perform.
 Thine be the proof, and, spite of all you've said,
 You'd give your honour for a crust of bread.

C. What proof might do, what hunger might effect,

What famish'd nature, looking with neglect
 On all she once held dear, what fear, at strife
 With fainting virtue for the means of life,
 Might make this coward flesh, in love with breath,
 Shudd'ring at pain, and shrinking back from death,
 In treason to my soul, descend to bear,
 Trusting to fate, I neither know nor care.

Once, at this hour those wounds afresh I feel,
 Which nor prosperity nor time can heal,
 Those wounds, which fate severely hath decreed,
 Mention'd or thought of, must for ever bleed,
 Those wounds, which humbled all that pride of
 man,

Which brings such mighty aid to virtue's plan ;

Once, aw'd by fortune's most oppressive frown,
By legal rapine to the earth bow'd down,
My credit at last gasp, my state undone,
Trembling to meet the shock I could not shun,
Virtue gave ground, and black despair prevail'd;
Sinking beneath the storm, my spirits fail'd,
Like Peter's faith; till one, a friend indeed,
May all distress find such in time of need,
One kind good man, in act, in word, in thought,
By virtue guided, and by wisdom taught,
Image of him whom Christians should adore,
Stretch'd forth his hand, and brought me safe to shore.

Since, by good fortune into notice rais'd,
And for some little merit largely prais'd,
Indulg'd in swerving from prudential rules,
Hated by rogues, and not belov'd by fools,
Plac'd above want, shall abject thirst of wealth
So fiercely war 'gainst my soul's dearest health,
That, as a boon, I should base shackles crave,
And, born to freedom, make myself a slave;
That I should in the train of those appear,
Whom honour cannot love, nor manhood fear?

That I no longer skulk from street to street,
Afraid lest duns assail, and bailiffs meet;
That I from place to place this carcase bear,
Walk forth at large, and wander free as air;
That I no longer dread the awkward friend,
Whose very obligations must offend,
Nor, all too forward, with impatience burn,
At suffer'd favours which I can't return;
That, from dependence and from pride secure,
I am not plac'd so high to scorn the poor,
Nor yet so low, that I my lord should fear,
Or hesitate to give him sneer for sneer;
That, whilst sage prudence my pursuits confirms,
I can enjoy the world on equal terms;
That, kind to others, to myself most true,
Feeling no want, I comfort those who do,
And with the will have power to aid distress:
These, and what other blessings I possess,
From the indulgence of the public rise;
All private patronage my soul defies.
By candour more inclin'd to save than damn,
A gen'rous PUBLIC made me what I am.
All that I have, they gave; just mem'ry bears
The grateful stamp, and what I am is theirs.

L. To feign a red-hot zeal for freedom's cause,
To mouth aloud for liberties and laws,
For public good to bellow all abroad,
Serves well the purposes of private fraud.
Prudence by public good intends her own;
If you mean otherwise, you stand alone.
What do we mean by country and by court?
What is it to oppose, what to support?
Mere words of course, and what is more absurd
Than to pay homage to an empty word?
Majors and minors differ but in name,
Patriots and ministers are much the same;
The only difference, after all their rout,
Is, that the one is in, the other out.

Explore the dark recesses of the mind,
In the soul's honest volume read mankind,
And own, in wise and simple, great and small,
The same grand leading principle in all.

Whate'er we talk of wisdom to the wise,
Of goodness to the good, of public ties
Which to our country link, or private bands
Which claim most dear attention at our hands,
For parent and for child, for wife and friend,
Our first great mover, and our last great end,
Is one, and, by whatever name we call
The ruling tyrant, self is all in all.
This, which unwilling faction shall admit,
Guided in different ways a Bute and Pitt,
Made tyrants break, made kings observe the law,
And gave the world a Stuart and Nassau.

Hath nature (strange and wild conceit of pride)
Distinguish'd thee from all her sons beside?
Doth virtue in thy bosom brighter glow,
Or from a spring more pure doth action flow?
Is not thy soul bound with those very chains
Which shackle us; or is that self, which reigns
O'er kings and beggars, which in all we see
Most strong and sov'reign, only weak in thee?
Fond man, believe it not; experience tells
'Tis not thy virtue, but thy pride rebels.
Think (and for once lay by thy lawless pen)
Think, and confess thyself like other men;
Think but one hour, and, to thy conscience led
By reason's hand, bow down and hang thy head;
Think on thy private life, recal thy youth,
View thyself now, and own with strictest truth,
That self hath drawn thee from fair virtue's way
Farther than folly would have dar'd to stray,
And that the talents lib'ral nature gave
To make thee free, have made thee more a slave.

Quit then, in prudence quit, that idle train
Of toys, which have so long abus'd thy brain,
And captive led thy pow'rs; with boundless will Let self maintain her state and empire still,
But let her, with more worthy objects caught,
Strain all the faculties and force of thought
To things of higher daring; let her range
Through better pastures, and learn how to change;
Let her, no longer to weak faction tied,
Wisely revolt, and join our stronger side.

C. Ah! what, my lord, hath private life to do
With things of public nature? Why to view
Would you thus cruelly those scenes unfold,
Which, without pain and horror to behold,
Must speak me something more or less than man;

Which friends may pardon, but I never can?
Look back! a thought which borders on despair,
Which human nature must, yet cannot bear.
'Tis not the babbling of a busy world,
Where praise and censure are at random hurl'd,
Which can the meanest of my thoughts controul,
Or shake one settled purpose of my soul.
Free and at large might their wild curses roam,
If all, if all, alas! were well at home.
No—'tis the tale which angry conscience tells,
When she with more than tragic horror swells
Each circumstance of guilt; when stern, but true,
She brings bad actions forth into review;
And, like the dread hand-writing on the wall,
Bids late remorse awake at reason's call;
Arm'd at all points, bids scorpion vengeance pass,
And to the mind holds up reflection's glass;

The mind, which starting, heaves the heart-felt groan,

And hates that form she knows to be her own.

Enough of this—let private sorrows rest—

As to the public I dare stand the test;

Dare proudly boast, I feel no wish above

The good of England, and my country's love:

Stranger to party-rage, by reason's voice,

Unerring guide, directed in my choice,

Not all the tyrant pow'rs of earth combin'd,

No, nor of hell, shall make me change my mind.

What! herd with men my honest soul disdains,

Men who, with servile zeal, are forging chains

For freedom's neck, and lend a helping hand,

To spread destruction o'er my native land.

What! shall I not, e'en to my latest breath,

In the full face of danger and of death,

Exert that little strength which nature gave,

And boldly stem, or perish in the wave?

L. When I look backward for some fifty years,

And see protesting patriots turn to peers;

Hear men, most loose, for decency declaim,

And talk of character without a name;

See infidels assert the cause of God,

And meek divines wield persecution's rod;

See men transform'd to brutes, and brutes to men,

See Whitehead * take a place, † Ralph change his pen,

I mock the zeal, and deem the men in sport,

Who rail at ministers, and curse a court.

Thee, haughty as thou art, and proud in rhyme,

Shall some preferment, offer'd at a time

When virtue sleeps, some sacrifice to pride,

Or some fair victim, move to change thy side.

Thee shall these eyes behold, to health restor'd,

Using, as prudence bids, bold satire's sword,

Galling thy present friends, and praising those

Whom now thy frenzy holds thy greatest foes.

G. May I (can worse disgrace on manhood fail)?

Be born a Whitehead, and baptiz'd a Paul;

May I (though to his service deeply tied

By sacred oaths, and now by will allied)

With false feign'd zeal an injur'd God defend,

And use his name for some base private end;

May I (that thought bids double horrors roll

O'er my sick spirits, and unmans my soul)

Ruin the virtue which I held most dear,

And still must hold; may I, through abject fear,

Betray my friend; may to succeeding times,

Engrav'd on plates of adamant, my crimes

Stand blazing forth, whilst mark'd with envious blot,

Each little act of virtue is forgot;

Of all those evils which, to stamp men curs'd,

Hell keeps in store for vengeance, may the worst

Light on my head, and in my day of woe,

To make the cup of bitterness o'erflow,

May I be scorn'd by every man of worth,

Wander, like Cain, a vagabond on earth,

Bearing about a hell in my own mind,

Or be to Scotland for my life confin'd,

* Paul Whitehead.

† James Ralph. See Lord Melcombe's "Diary."

If I am one among the many known,

Whom Shelburne fled, and Calcraft blush'd to own.

L. Do you reflect what men you make your foes?

C. I do, and that's the reason I oppose.

Friends I have made, whom envy must commend,

But not one foe, whom I would wish a friend.

What if ten thousand Butes and Hollands bawl,

One Wilkes hath made a large amends for all.

'Tis not the title, whether handed down

From age to age, or flowing from the crown

In copious streams on recent men, who came

From stems unknown, and fires without a name;

'Tis not the star, which our great Edward gave

To mark the virtuous, and reward the brave,

Blazing without, whilst a base heart within

Is rotten to the core with filth and sin;

'Tis not the tinsel grandeur, taught to wait,

At custom's call, to mark a fool of state

From fools of lesser note, that soul can awe

Whose pride is reason, whose defence is law.

L. Suppose (a thing scarce possible in art,

Were it thy cue to play a common part);

Suppose thy writings so well fenc'd in law,

That Norton * cannot find, nor make a flaw,

Hast thou not heard, that 'mongst our ancient tribes,

By party warpt, or lull'd asleep by bribes,

Or trembling at the ruffian hand of force,

Law hath suspended stood, or chang'd its course?

Art thou assur'd, that, for destruction ripe,

Thou may'st not smart beneath the self-same gripe?

What sanction hast thou, frantic in thy rhymes,

Thy life, thy freedom to secure?

C. The times.

'Tis not on law, a system great and good,

By wisdom penn'd, and bought by noblest blood,

My faith relies: by wicked men and vain,

Law, once abus'd, may be abus'd again.—

No, on our great lawgiver I depend,

Who knows and guides her to her proper end;

Whose royalty of nature blazes out

So fierce, 'twere sin to entertain a doubt—

Did tyrant Stuarts now the laws dispense,

(Blest be the hour and hand which sent them hence)

For something, or for nothing, for a word,

Or thought, I might be doom'd to death, unheard.

Life we might all resign to lawless pow'r,

Nor think it worth the purchase of an hour;

But envy ne'er shall fix so foul a stain

On the fair annals of a Brunswick's reign.

If, slave to party, to revenge, or pride,

If, by frail human error drawn aside,

I break the law, strict rigour let her wear;

'Tis her's to punish, and 'tis mine to bear;

Nor by the voice of justice doom'd to death,

Would I ask mercy with my latest breath.

But, anxious only for my country's good,

In which my king's, of course, is understood;

Form'd on a plan with some few patriot friends,

Whilst by just means I aim at noblest ends,

* Sir Fletcher Norton, Attorney-general.

My spirits cannot sink; though from the tomb
Stern Jeffries should be plac'd in Mansfield's
room;

Though he should bring his base designs to aid,
Some black attorney, for his purpose made,
And shove, whilst decency and law retreat,
The modest Norton from his maiden seat;
Though both, in ill confed'rates, should agree,
In damned league, to torture law and me,
Whilst George is king, I cannot fear endure;
Not to be guilty, is to be secure.

But when, in after-times, (be far remov'd
That day) our monarch, glorious and belov'd,
Sleeps with his fathers, should imperious fate,
In vengeance, with fresh Stuarts curse our state;
Should they, o'erleaping ev'ry fence of law,
Butcher the brave to keep tame fools in awe;
Should they, by brutal and oppressive force,
Divert sweet justice from her even course;
Should they, of ev'ry other means bereft,
Make my right-hand a witness 'gainst my left;
Should they, abroad by inquisitions taught,
Search out my soul, and damn me for a thought;
Still would I keep my course, still speak, still write,
'Till death had plung'd me in the shades of night.

Thou God of truth, thou great, all-searching eye,
To whom our thoughts, our spirits open lie,
Grant me thy strength, and in that needful hour,
(Should it e'er come) when law submits to pow'r,
With firm resolve my steady bosom steel,
Bravely to suffer, though I deeply feel.

Let me, as hitherto, still draw my breath,
In love with life, but not in fear of death;
And, if oppression brings me to the grave,
And marks me dead, she ne'er shall mark a slave.
Let no unworthy marks of grief be heard,
No wild laments, not one unseemly word;
Let sober triumphs wait upon my bier,
I won't forgive that friend who drops one tear.
Whether he's ravish'd in life's early morn,
Or, in old age, drops like an ear of corn,
Full ripe he falls, on nature's noblest plan,
Who lives to reason, and who dies a man.

THE AUTHOR.

Accurs'd the man, whom fate ordains in spite,
And cruel parents teach, to read and write!
What need of letters? Wherefore should we spell?
Why write our names? A mark will do as well,

Much are the precious hours of youth mispent,
In climbing learning's rugged steep ascent;
When to the top the bold advent'rer's got,
He reigns, vain monarch, o'er a barren spot,
Whilst in the vale of ignorance below,
Folly and vice to rank luxuriance grow;
Honours and wealth pour in on ev'ry side,
And proud preferment rolls her golden tide.

O'er crabbed authors life's gay prime to waste,
To cramp wild genius in the chains of taste,
To bear the slavish drudgery of schools,
And tamely stoop to ev'ry pedant's rules,
For seven long years debarr'd of lib'ral ease,
To plod in college trammels to degrees,

Beneath the weight of solemn toys to groan,
Sleep over books, and leave mankind unknown;
To praise each senior blockhead's thread bare tale,
And laugh till reason blush, and spirits fail,
Manhood with vile submission to disgrace,
And cap the fool, whose merit is his place;
Vice-chancellors whose knowledge is but small,
And chancellors, who nothing know at all:
Ill-brook'd the gen'rous spirit in those days
When learning was the certain road to praise,
When nobles, with a love of science blest'd,
Approv'd in others what themselves possess'd.

But now, when dullness rears aloft her throne,
When lordly vassals her wide empire own,
When wit, seduc'd by envy, starts aside,
And basely leagues with ignorance and pride,
What now should tempt us, by false hopes misled,
Learning's unfashionable paths to tread;
To bear those labours, which our fathers bore,
That crown with-held, which they in triumph wore?

When with much pains this boasted learning's
got,

'Tis an affront to those who have it not.

In some it causes hate, in other's fear,
Instructs our foes to rail, our friends to sneer.
With prudent haste the worldly-minded fool
Forgets the little which he learn'd at school;
The elder brother, to vast fortunes born,
Looks on all science with an eye of scorn;
Dependent brethren the same features wear,
And younger sons are stupid as the heir.
In senates, at the bar, in church and state,
Genius is vile, and learning out of date.
Is this—O death to think! is this the land
Where merit and reward went hand in hand,
Where heroes, parent-like, the poet view'd,
By whom they saw their glorious deeds renew'd;
Where poets, true to honour, tun'd their lays,
And by their patrons sanctify'd their praise?
Is this the land, where, on our Spenser's tongue,
Enamour'd of his voice, description hung;
Where Jonson rigid gravity beguil'd,
Whilst reason through her critic fences smil'd;
Where nature list'ning stood, whilst Shakspeare
play'd,

And wonder'd at the work herself had made?
Is this the land, where, mindful of her charge
And office high, fair freedom walk'd at large;
Where, finding in our laws a sure defence,
She mock'd at all restraints, but those of sense;
Where health and honour trooping by her side,
She spread her sacred empire far and wide;
Pointed the way affliction to beguile,
And bade the face of sorrow wear a smile;
Bade those, who dare obey the gen'rous call,
Enjoy her blessings, which God meant for all?
Is this the land, where in some tyrant's reign,
When a weak, wicked, ministerial train,
The tools of pow'r, the slaves of int'rest, plann'd
Their country's ruin, and with bribes unman'd
Those wretches, who, ordain'd in freedom's cause,
Gave up their liberties, and sold our laws;
When pow'r was taught by meanness where to go,
Nor dar'd to love the virtue of a foe;

When, like a lep'rous plague, from the foul head
To the foul heart her sores corruption spread,
Her iron arm when stern oppression rear'd,
And virtue, from her broad base shaken, fear'd
The scourge of vice; when, impotent and vain,
Poor freedom bow'd the neck to slav'ry's chain?
Is this the land, where in those worst of times,
The hardy poet rais'd his honest rhymes
To dread rebuke, and bade controulment speak
In guilty blushes on the villain's cheek,
Bade pow'r turn pale, kept mighty rogues in awe,
And made them fear the muse, who fear'd not law?

How do I laugh, when men of narrow souls,
Whom folly guides, and prejudice controuls;
Who, one dull drowsy track of business trod,
Worship their Mammon, and neglect their God;
Who, breathing by one musty set of rules,
Dote from the birth, and are by system fools;
Who, form'd to dullness from their very youth,
Lies of the day prefer to gospel truth,
Pick up their little knowledge from reviews,
And lay out all their stock of faith in news:
How do I laugh, when creatures, form'd like
these,

Whom reason scorns, and I should blush to please,
Rail at all lib'ral arts, deem verse a crime,
And hold not truth as truth, if told in rhyme?

How do I laugh, when Publius, hoary groan
In zeal for Scotland's welfare, and his own,
By slow degrees, and course of office, drawn
In mood and figure at the helm to yawn,
Too mean (the worst of curses Heav'n can send)
To have a foe, too proud to have a friend,
Erting by form, which blockheads sacred hold,
Ne'er making new faults, and ne'er mending old,
Rebukes my spirit, bids the daring muse
Subjects more equal to her weakness choose;
Bids her frequent the haunts of humble swains,
Nor dare to traffic in ambitious strains;
Bids her, indulging the poetic whim
In quaint-wrought ode, or sonnet pertly trim,
Along the church-way path complain with Gray,
Or dance with Mason on the first of May?

"All sacred is the name and pow'r of kings,
"All states and statesmen are those mighty things
"Which, howsoe'er they out of course may roll,
"Were never made for poets to controul."

Peace, peace, thou dotard, nor thus vilely deem
Of sacred numbers, and their pow'r blaspheme;
I tell thee, wretch, search all creation round,
In earth, in heav'n, no subject can be found
(Our God alone except) above whose weight
The poet cannot rise, and hold his state.
The blessed saints above in numbers speak [weak;
The praise of God, though there all praise is
In numbers here below the bard shall teach
Virtue to soar beyond the villain's reach;
Shall tear his lab'ring lungs, strain his hoarse
throat,

And raise his voice beyond the trumpet's note,
Should an afflicted country, aw'd by men
Of slavish principles, demand his pen.
This is a great, a glorious point of view,
Fit for an English poet to pursue,

Undaunted to pursue, though, in return,
His writings by the common hangman burn.

How do I laugh, when men, by fortune plac'd
Above their betters, and by rank disgrac'd,
Who found their pride on titles which they stain,
And, mean themselves, are of their fathers vain;
Who would a bill of privilege prefer,
And treat a poet like a creditor,
The gen'rous ardour of the muse condemn,
And curse the storm they know must break on them.

"What, shall a reptile bard, a wretch unknown,
"Without one badge of merit, but his own,
"Great nobles lash, and lords, like common men,
"Smart from the vengeance of a scribbler's pen?"

What's in this name of lord, that I should fear
To bring their vices to the public ear?
Flows not the honest blood of humble swains
Quick as the tide which swells a monarch's veins?
Monarchs, who wealth and titles can bestow,
Cannot make virtues in succession flow.
Wouldst thou, proud man, be safely plac'd above
The censure of the muse, deserve her love,
Act as thy birth demands, as nobles ought;
Look back, and by thy worthy father taught,
Who earn'd those honours, thou wert born to wear,
Follow his steps, and be his virtues' heir.
But if, regardless of the road to fame,

You start aside, and tread the paths of shame;
If such thy life, that should thy fire arise,
The sight of such a son would blast his eyes,
Would make him curse the hour which gave thee
birth,
Would drive him, shudd'ring, from the face of earth
Once more, with shame and sorrow, 'mongst the dead

In endless night to hide his rev'rend head;
If such thy life, though kings had made thee more
Than ever king a scoundrel made before;
Nay, to allow thy pride a deeper spring,
Though God in vengeance had made thee a king,
Taking on virtue's wing her daring flight,
The muse should drag thee trembling to the light,
Probe thy foul wounds, and lay thy bosom bare
To the keen question of the searching air.

Gods! with what pride I see the tird slave,
Who smarts beneath the stroke which satire gave,
Aiming at ease, and with dishonest art,
Striving to hide the feelings of his heart!
How do I laugh, when with affected air,
(Scarce able through despite to keep his chair,
Whilst on his trembling lip pale anger speaks,
And the chaf'd blood flies mounting to his cheeks)
He talks of conscience which good men secures
From all those evil moments guilt endures,
And seems to laugh at those, who pay regard
To the wild ravings of a frantic bard.

"Satire, whilst envy and ill-humour sway
"The mind of man, must always make her way;
"Nor to a bosom, with discretion fraught,
"Is all her malice worth a single thought.
"The wise have not the will, nor fools the pow'r
"To stop her headstrong course; within the hour,
"Left to herself, she dies; opposing strife
"Gives her fresh vigour, and prolongs her life

"All things her prey, and ev'ry man her aim,
 "I can no patent for exemption claim,
 "Nor would I wish to stop that harmless dart
 "Which plays around, but cannot wound my
 "heart;

"Though pointed at myself, be satire free;
 "To her 'tis pleasure, and no pain to me."

Dissembling wretch! hence to the Stoic school,
 And there amongst thy brethren play the fool;
 There, unrebuk'd, these wild, vain doctrines preach,
 Lives there a man, whom satire cannot reach?
 Lives there a man, who calmly can stand by,
 And see his conscience ripp'd with steady eye?
 When satire flies abroad on falsehood's wing,
 Short is her life, and impotent her sting;
 But, when to truth allied, the wound she gives
 Sinks deep, and to remotest ages lives.

When in the tomb thy pamper'd flesh shall rot,
 And ev'n by friends thy mem'ry be forgot,
 Still shalt thou live, recorded for thy crimes,
 Live in her page, and sink to after times.

Hast thou no feeling yet? Come throw off pride,
 And own those passions which thou shalt not hide.
 S——, who from the moment of his birth,
 Made human nature a reproach on earth;
 Who never dar'd, nor wish'd behind to stay,
 When folly, vice, and meanness led the way,
 Would blush, should he be told, by truth and wit,
 Those actions which he blush'd not to commit;
 Men the most infamous are fond of fame,
 And those who fear not guilt, yet start at shame.

But whither runs my zeal, whose rapid force,
 Turning the brain, bears reason from her course;
 Carries me back to times, when poets, bless'd
 With courage, grac'd the science they profess'd;
 When they, in honour rooted, firmly stood
 The bad to punish, and reward the good;
 When, to a flame by public virtue wrought,
 The foes of freedom they to justice brought,
 And dar'd expose those slaves who dar'd support
 A tyrant plan, and call'd themselves a court?
 Ah! what are poets now? As slavish those
 Who deal in verse, as those who deal in prose.
 Is there an author, search the kingdom round,
 In whom true worth and real spirit's found?
 The slaves of booksellers, or (doom'd by fate
 To baser chains) vile pensioners of state;
 Some, dead to shame, and of those shackles proud
 Which honour scorns, for slav'ry roar aloud;
 Others half-palsied only, mutes become, [dumb.
 And what makes Smollet write, makes Johnson

Why turns yon villain pale? Why bends his eye
 Inward, abash'd, when Murphy passes by?
 Dost thou sage Murphy for a blockhead take,
 Who wages war with vice for virtue's sake?
 No, no—like other wordlings, you will find
 He shifts his sails, and catches ev'ry wind.
 His soul the shock of int'rest can't endure:
 Give him a pension then, and sin secure.

With laurell'd wreaths the flatt'rer's brows adorn,
 Bid virtue crouch, bid vice exalt her horn,
 Bid cowards thrive, put honesty to flight,
 Murphy shall prove, or try to prove it right.
 Try, thou state-juggler, ev'ry paltry art,
 Ransack the inmost closet of my heart,

Swear thou'rt my friend; by that base oath make way

Into my breast, and flatter to betray:
 Or, if those tricks are vain, if wholesome doubt
 Detects the fraud, and points the villain out,
 Bribe those who daily at my board are fed,
 And make them take my life who eat my bread;
 On authors for defence, for praise depend;
 Pay him but well, and Murphy is thy friend.
 He, he shall ready stand with venal rhymes,
 To varnish guilt, and consecrate thy crimes;
 To make corruption in false colours shine,
 And damn his own good name, to rescue thine.

But if thy niggard hands their gifts withhold,
 And vice no longer rains down show'rs of gold,
 Expect no mercy; facts, well grounded, teach,
 Murphy, if not rewarded, will impeach.
 What though each man of nice and juster thought,
 Shunning his steps, decrees, by honour taught,
 He ne'er can be a friend, who stoops so low
 To be the base betrayer of a foe;
 What though, with thine together link'd, his name
 Must be with thine transmitted down to shame,
 To ev'ry manly feeling callous grown,
 Rather than not blast thine, he'll blast his own.

To ope the fountain whence sedition springs,
 To slander government, and libel kings,
 With freedom's name to serve a present hour,
 Though born and bred to arbitrary pow'r,
 To talk of William with insidious art,
 Whilst a vile Stuart's lurking in his heart,
 And, whilst mean envy rears her loathsome head,
 Flatt'ring the living, to abuse the dead,
 Where is Shebbeare? O, let not foul reproach,
 Travelling thither in a city coach,
 The pill'ry dare to name; the whole intent
 Of that parade was fame, not punishment,
 And that old staunch whig Beardmore standing by,
 Can in full court give that report the lie.

With rude unnat'ral jargon to support,
 Half Scotch, half English, a declining court;
 To make most glaring contraries unite,
 And prove, beyond dispute, that black is white;
 To make firm honour tamely league with shame,
 Make vice and virtue differ but in name;
 To prove that chains and freedom are but one,
 That to be fav'd must mean to be undone,
 Is there not Guthrie? Who, like him, can call
 All opposites to proof, and conquer all?
 He calls forth living waters from the rock;
 He calls forth children from the barren stock;
 He, far beyond the springs of nature led,
 Makes women bring forth after they are dead;
 He, on a curious, new, and happy plan,
 In wedlock's sacred bands joins man to man;
 And, to complete the whole, most strange, but true,

By some rare magic, makes them fruitful too,
 Whilst from their loins, in the due course of years,
 Flows the rich blood of Guthrie's English peers.

Dost thou contrive some blacker deed of shame,
 Something which nature shudders but to name,
 Something which makes the soul of man retreat,
 And the life-blood run backward to her seat?
 Dost thou contrive for some base private end,
 Some selfish view, to hang a trusting friend,

To lure him on, ev'n to his parting breath,
And promise life, to work him surer death?
Grown old in villany, and dead to grace,
Hell in his heart, and Tyburn in his face;
Behold, a parson at thy elbow stands,
Low'ring damnation, and with open hands
Ripe to betray his Saviour for reward;
The Atheist chaplain of an Atheist lord.

Bred to the church, and for the gown decreed,
Ere it was known that I should learn to read;
Though that was nothing, for my friends, who
What mighty dullness of itself could do, [knew
Never design'd me for a working priest,
But hop'd, I should have been a Dean at least;
Condemn'd (like many more, and worthier men,
To whom I pledge the service of my pen), Condemn'd (whilst proud and pamper'd sons of lawn,

Cramm'd to the throat, in lazy plenty yawn)
In pomp of rev'rend beggary to appear,
To pray, and starve on forty pounds a-year;
My friends, who never felt the galling load,
Lament that I forsook the packhorse road,
Whilst virtue to my conduct witness bears,
In throwing off that gown, which Francis wears.

What creature's that, so very pert and prim;
So very full of foppery, and whim;
So gentle, yet so brisk; so wond'rous sweet,
So fit to prattle at a lady's feet,
Who looks, as he the Lord's rich vineyard trod,
And by his garb appears a man of God?
Trust not to looks, nor credit outward show;
The villain lurks beneath the cassee'd beau;
That's an informer; what avails the name?
Suffice it that the wretch from Sodom came.

His tongue is deadly—from his presence run,
Unless thy rage would wish to be undone.
No ties can hold him, no affection bind,
And fear alone restrains his coward mind;
Free him from that, no monster is so fell,
Nor is so sure a blood-hound found in hell.
His silken smiles, his hypocritic air,
His meek demeanor, plausible and fair,
Are only worn to pave fraud's easier way,
And make gull'd virtue fall a surer prey.
Attend his church—his plan of doctrine view—
The preacher is a Christian, dull, but true;
But when the hallow'd hour of preaching's o'er,
That plan of doctrine's never thought of more;
Christ is laid by neglected on the shelf,
And the vile priest is gospel to himself.

By Cleland tutor'd, and with Blacow bred, (Blacow, whom by a brave resentment led,
Oxford, if Oxford had not sunk in fame,
Ere this, had damn'd to everlasting shame)
Their steps he follows, and their crimes partakes,
To virtue lost, to vice alone he wakes,
Most lusciously declaims 'gainst luscious themes,
And, whilst he rails at blasphemy, blasphemes.

Are these the arts, which policy supplies, [rise?
Are these the steps, by which grave churchmen
Forbid it, Heav'n; or, should it turn out so,
Let me and mine continue mean and low.
Such be their arts, whom interest controuls;
Kidgell and I have free and honest souls.

We scorn preferment which is gain'd by sin;
And will, though poor without, have peace within.

THE DUELLIST.

IN THREE BOOKS.

BOOK I.

THE clock struck twelve, o'er half the globe
Darkness had spread her pitchy robe;
Morpheus, his feet with velvet shod,
Treading as if in fear he trod,
Gentle as dew at even tide,
Distill'd his poppies far and wide.

Ambition, who, when waking dreams
Of mighty, but fantastic schemes,
Who, when asleep, ne'er knows that rest
With which the humbler soul is blest,
Was building castles in the air,
Goodly to look upon and fair,
But, on a bad foundation laid,
Doom'd at return of morn to fade.

Pale study by the taper's light,
Wearing away the watch of night,
Sat reading; but with o'ercharg'd head,
Remember'd nothing that he read.

Starving 'midst plenty, with a face
Which might the court of famine grace,
Ragged, and filthy to behold,
Gray avarice nodded o'er his gold.

Jealousy, his quick eye half-clos'd,
With watchings worn, reluctant doz'd,
And mean distrust not quite forgot,
Slumber'd, as if he slumber'd not,

Stretch'd at his length on the bare ground,
His hardy offspring sleeping round,
Snor'd restless labour; by his side
Lay health, a coarse, but comely bride.

Virtue, without the doctor's aid,
In the soft arms of sleep was laid,
Whilst vice, within the guilty breast,
Could not be physic'd into rest,

Thou bloody man! whose Russian knife
Is drawn against thy neighbour's life,
And never scruples to descend
Into the bosom of a friend,
A firm, fast friend, by vice allied,
And to thy secret service tied,
In whom ten murders breed no awe,
If properly secur'd from law.

Thou man of lust! whom passion fires
To foulest deeds, whose hot desires
O'er honest bars with ease make way,
Whilst idiot beauty falls a prey,
And to indulge thy brutal flame,
A Lucrece must be brought to shame;
Who dost, a brave, bold sinner, bear
Rank incest to the open air,
And rapes, full blown upon thy crown,
Enough to weigh a nation down.

Thou simular of lust! vain man,
Whose restless thoughts still form the plan
Of guilt, which wither'd to the root,
Thy lifeless nerves can't execute,

Whilst in thy marrowless dry bones,
 Desire without enjoyment groans.
Thou perjur'd wretch! whom falsehood clothes
 E'en like a garment; who with oaths
 Dost trifle, as with brokers, meant
 To serve thy ev'ry vile intent,
 In the day's broad and searching eye
 Making God witness to a lie,
 Blaspheming Heav'n and earth for pelf,
 And hanging friends to save thyself.
Thou son of chance! whose glorious soul
 On the four aces doom'd to roll,
 Was never yet with honour caught,
 Nor on poor virtue lost one thought;
 Who dost thy wife, thy children set,
 Thy all, upon a single bet,
 Risking, the desp'rate stake to try,
Here and hereafter on a die;
 Who on thy own private fortune lost,
 Dost game on at thy country's cost,
 And, grown expert in sharpening rules,
 First fool'd thyself, now prey'st on fools.
Thou noble gamester, whose high place
 Gives too much credit to disgrace;
 Who, with the motion of a die,
 Dost make a mighty island fly,
 The sums, I mean, of good French gold
 For which a mighty island sold;
 Who dost betray intelligence,
 Abuse the dearest confidence,
 And, private fortune to create,
 Most falsely play the game of state;
 Who dost within the Alley sport
 Sums, which might beggar a whole court,
 And make us bankrupts all, if care
 With good Earl Talbot, was not there.
Thou daring infidel! whom pride
 And sin have drawn from reason's side;
 Who fearing his avengeful rod,
 Dost wish not to believe a God;
 Whose hope is founded on a plan,
 Which should distract the soul of man,
 And make him curse his abject birth;
 Whose hope is, once return'd to earth,
 There to lie down for worms a feast,
 To rot and perish like a beast
 Who dost, of punishment afraid,
 And by thy crimes a coward made,
 To ev'ry gen'rous soul a curse,
 Than hell and all her torments worse,
 When crawling to thy latter end,
 Cail on destruction as a friend,
 Choosing to crumble into dust
 Rather than rise, though rise you must.
Thou hypocrite! who dost profane,
 And take the patriot's name in vain,
 Then most thy country's foe, when most
 Of love and loyalty you boast;
 Who for the filthy love of gold,
 Thy friend, thy king, thy God hast sold,
 And, mocking the just claim of hell,
 Were bidders found, thyself would sell.
Ye villians! of whatever name,
 Whatever rank, to whom the claim
 Of hell is certain, on whose lids
 That worm which never dies, forbids

Sweet sleep to fall, come and behold,
 Whilst envy makes your blood run cold,
Behold, by pitiless conscience led,
 So justice wills, that holy bed,
 Where peace her full dominion keeps,
 And innocence with Holland sleeps.

Bid terror, posting on the wind,
 Affray the spirits of mankind,
 Bid earthquakes heaving for a vent,
 Rive their concealing continent,
 And, forcing an untimely birth
 Through the vast bowels of the earth,
 Endeavour in her monstrous womb
 At once all nature to entomb;
 Bid all that's horrible and dire,
 All that man hates and fears, conspire
 To make night hideous, as they can;
 Still is thy sleep, thou virtuous man,
 Pure as the thoughts, which in thy breast
 Inhabit, and insure thy rest;
 Still shall thy Ayliff, taught, though late,
 Thy friendly justice in his fate,
 Turn'd to a guardian angel, spread
 Sweet dreams of comfort round thy head.

Dark as the night, by fate decreed
 For the contrivance of a deed
 More black than common, which might make
 This land from her foundations shake,
 Might tear up freedom from the root,
 Destroy a Wilkes, and fix a Bute.

Deep horror held her wide domain;
 The sky in fullen drops of rain
 Forewept the morn, and through the air,
 Which, op'ning, laid its bosom bare,
 Loud thunders roll'd, and lightning stream'd;
 The owl at freedom's window scream'd,
 The screech owl, prophet dire, whose breath
 Brings sickness, and whose note is death;
 The church-yard teem'd, and from the tomb,
 All sad and silent, through the gloom,
 The ghosts of men, in former times
 Whose public virtues were their crimes,
 Indignant stalk'd; sorrow and rage
 Blank'd their pale cheek; in his own age
 The prop of freedom, Hampden there
 Felt after death the gen'rous care;
Sidney by grief from heav'n was kept,
 And for his brother patriot wept;
 All friends of liberty, when fate
 Prepar'd to shorten Wilkes's date,
 Heav'd, deeply hurt, the heart-felt groan,
 And knew that wound to be their own.

Hail, LIBERTY! a glorious word,
 In other countries scarcely heard,
 Or heard but as a thing of course,
 Without or energy or force;
Here felt, enjoy'd, ador'd, she springs,
 Far, far beyond the reach of kings,
 Fresh blooming from our mother earth;
 With pride and joy she owns her birth
 Deriv'd from us, and in return
 Bids in our breasts her genius burn;
 Bids us with all those blessings live
 Which liberty alone can give,
 Or nobly with that spirit nobly die,
 Which makes death more than victory.

Hail those old patriots, on whose tongue
 Persuasion in the senate hung,
 Whilst they the sacred cause maintain'd!
 Hail those old chiefs, to honour train'd,
 Who spread, when other methods fail'd,
 War's bloody banner, and prevail'd!
 Shall men like these unmention'd sleep
 Promiscuous with the common heap,
 And (gratitude forbid the crime)
 Be carried down the stream of time
 In shoals, unnotic'd and forgot,
 On Lethe's stream, like flags, to rot?
 No—they shall live, and each fair name,
 Recorded in the book of fame,
 Founded on honour's basis, fast
 As the round earth to ages last.
 Some virtues vanish with our breath,
 Virtue like this lives after death.
 Old Time himself, his scythe thrown by,
 Himself lost in eternity,
 An everlasting crown shall twine
 To make a Wilkes and Sidney join.

But should some slave-got villain dare
 Chains for his country to prepare,
 And, by his birth to slav'ry broke,
 Make her to feel the galling yoke,
 May he be evermore accurs'd,
 Amongst bad men be rank'd the worst;
 May he be still himself, and still
 Go on in vice, and perfect ill;
 May his broad crimes each day increase,
 'Till he can't live, nor die in peace;
 May he be plung'd so deep in shame
 That Satan mayn't endure his name,
 And hear, scarce crawling on the earth,
 His children curse him for their birth;
 May liberty, beyond the grave,
 Ordain him to be still a slave,
 Grant him what here he most requires,
 And damn him with his own desires!

But should some villain, in support
 And zeal for a despairing court,
 Placing in craft his confidence,
 And making honour a pretence
 To do a deed of deepest shame,
 Whilst filthy lucre is his aim;
 Should such a wretch, with sword or knife,
 Contrive to practise 'gainst the life
 Of one, who honour'd through the land,
 For freedom made a glorious stand;
 Whose chief, perhaps his only crime,
 Is (if plain truth at such a time
 May dare her sentiments to tell)
 That he his country loves too well;
 May he—but words are all too weak
 The feelings of my heart to speak—
 May he—O for a noble curse
 Which might his very marrow pierce—
 The general contempt engage,
 And be the Martin of his age.

BOOK II.

DEEP in the bosom of a wood,
 Out of the road, a temple stood;

Ancient, and much the worse for wear,
 It call'd aloud for quick repair,
 And, tottering from side to side,
 Menac'd destruction far and wide.
 Nor able seem'd, unless made stronger,
 To hold out four or five years longer.
 Four hundred pillars, from the ground
 Rising in order, most unsound,
 Some rotten to the heart aloof,
 Seem'd to support the tottering roof,
 But to inspection nearer laid,
 Instead of giving wanted aid.

The structure, rare and curious, made
 By men most famous in their trade,
 A work of years, admir'd by all,
 Was suffer'd into dust to fall;
 Or, just to make it hang together,
 And keep off the effects of weather,
 Was patch'd and patch'd from time to time
 By wretches, whom it were a crime
 A crime, which art would treason hold,
 To mention with those names of old.

Builders, who had the pile survey'd,
 And those not *Flitcrofts in their trade,
 Doubt'd (the wise hand in a doubt Merely sometimes to hand her out)
 Whether (like churches in a brief,
 Taught wisely to obtain relief
 Through Chancery, who gives her fees
 To this and other charities)
 It must not, in all parts unsound,
 Be ripp'd, and pull'd down to the ground;
 Whether (though after-ages ne'er
 Shall raise a building to compare)
 Art, if they should their art employ,
 Meant to preserve, might not destroy:
 As human bodies, worn away,
 Batter'd and hasting to decay,
 Bidding the pow'r of art despair,
 Cannot those very medicines bear,
 Which, and which only can restore,
 And make them healthy as before.

To LIBERTY, whose gracious smile
 Shed peace and plenty o'er the isle,
 Our grateful ancestors, her plain
 But faithful children, rais'd this fane.

Full in the front, stretch'd out in length,
 Where nature put forth all her strength
 In spring eternal, lay a plain,
 Where our brave fathers us'd to train
 Their sons to arms, to teach the art
 Of war, and steel the infant heart.
 Labour, their hardy nurse, when young,
 Their joints had knit, their nerves had strung;
 Abstinence, foe declar'd to death,
 Had, from the time they first drew breath,
 The best of doctors, with plain food,
 Kept pure the channel of their blood;
 Health in their cheeks bade colour rise,
 And glory sparkled in her eyes.

The instruments of husbandry,
 As in contempt, were all thrown by,

* Henry Flitcroft was the architect of St. Giles's in the Fields, St. Olive, Southwark, &c.

And, flattering a manly pride,
 War's keener tools their place supplied.
 Their arrows to the head they drew;
 Swift to the point their javelins flew;
 They grasp'd the sword, they shook the spear;
 Their fathers felt a pleasing fear;
 And even courage, standing by,
 Scarcely beheld with steady eye.
 Each stripling, lesson'd by his fire,
 Knew when to close, when to retire;
 When near at hand, when from afar
 To fight, and was himself a war.

Their wives, their mothers all around,
 Careless of order, on the ground,
 Breath'd forth to Heav'n the pious vow,
 And for a son's or husband's brow,
 With eager fingers laurel wove;
 Laurel, which in the sacred grove,
 Planted by LIBERTY, they find,
 The brows of conquerors to bind,
 To give them pride and spirits, fit
 To make a world in arms submit.

What raptures did the bosom fire
 Of the young, rugged, peasant fire,
 When from the toil of mimic fight,
 Returning with return of night,
 He saw his babe resign the breast,
 And, smiling, stroke those arms in jest,
 With which hereafter he shall make
 The proudest heart in Gallia quake!

Gods! with what joy, what honest pride,
 Did each fond, wishing, rustic bride
 Behold her manly swain return!
 How did her love-sick bosom burn,
 Though on parades he was not bred,
 Nor wore the livery of red,
 When, pleasure height'ning all her charms,
 She strain'd her warrior in her arms,
 And begg'd, whilst love and glory fire,
 A son, a son just like his fire!

Such were the men in former times,
 Ere luxury had made our crimes
 Our bitter punishment, who bore
 Their terrors to a foreign shore;
 Such were the men, who free from dread,
 By Edwards and by Henries led,
 Spread, like a torrent swell'd with rains,
 O'er haughty Gallia's trembling plains;
 Such were the men, when lust of pow'r,
 To work him woe, in evil hour
 Debauch'd the tyrant from those ways
 On which a king should found his praise;
 When stern oppression, hand in hand
 With pride, stalk'd proudly through the land;
 When weeping justice was miss'd
 From her fair course, and mercy dead;
 Such were the men, in virtue strong,
 Who dar'd not see their country's wrong;
 Who left the mattock, and the spade,
 And, in the robes of war array'd,
 In their rough arms, departing, took
 Their helpless babes, and with a look
 Stern and determin'd, swore to see
 Those babes no more, or see them free;
 Such were the men whom tyrant pride
 Could never fasten to his side

By threats or bribes; who, freemen born,
 Chains, though of gold, beheld with scorn;
 Who, free from ev'ry servile awe,
 Could never be divorc'd from law,
 From that broad gen'ral law, which sense
 Made for the general defence;
 Could never yield to partial ties
 Which from dependent stations rise;
 Could never be to slav'ry led,
 For property was at their head;
 Such were the men in days of yore,
 Who, call'd by liberty, before
 Her temple on the sacred green,
 In martial pastimes oft were seen—
 Now seen no longer—in their stead,
 To laziness and vermin bred,
 A race who, strangers to the cause
 Of freedom, live by other laws,
 On other motives fight, a prey
 To interest, and slaves for pay.
 Valour, how glorious on a plan
 Of honour founded, leads their van;
 Discretion, free from taint of fear,
 Cool, but resolv'd, brings up their rear,
 Discretion, valour's better half;
 Dependence holds the gen'ral's staff.

In plain and home-spun garb array'd,
 Not for vain show, but service made,
 In a green flourishing old age,
 Nor damn'd yet with an equipage,
 In rules of portage untaught,
 Simplicity, not worth a groat,
 For years had kept the temple door;
 Full on his breast a glass he wore,
 Through which his bosom open lay
 To ev'ry one that pass'd that way.
 Now turn'd adrift—with humbler face
 But prouder heart, his vacant place
 Corruption fills, and bears the key;
 No entrance now without a fee.

With belly round, and fully fat face,
 Which on the house reflected grace,
 Full of good fare, and honest glee,
 The steward hospitality,
 Old welcome smiling by his side,
 A good old servant, often tried,
 And faithful found, who kept in view
 His lady's fame and int'rest too,
 Who made each heart with joy rebound,
 Yet never run her state a-ground,
 Was turn'd off, or (which word I find
 Is more in modern use) resign'd.

Half-starv'd, half-starving others, bred
 In beggary, with carrion fed,
 Detested, and detesting all,
 Made up of avarice and gall,
 Boasting great thrift, yet wasting more
 Than ever steward did before,
 Succeeding one, who, to engage
 The praise of an exhausted age,
 Assum'd a name of high degree,
 And call'd himself economy.

Within the temple, full in sight,
 Where, without ceasing, day and night,
 The workmen toil'd, where labour bar'd
 His brawny arm, where art prepar'd,

In regular and even rows,
Her types, a printing-press arose;
Each workman knew his task, and each
Was honest and expert as Leach.

Hence learning struck a deeper root,
And science brought forth riper fruit;
Hence loyalty receiv'd support,
Even when banish'd from the court;
Hence government gain'd strength, and hence
Religion fought, and found defence;
Hence England's fairest fame arose,
And liberty subdu'd her foes.

On a low, simple, turf-made throne
Rais'd by allegiance, scarcely known
From her attendants, glad to be
Pattern of that equality
She wish'd to all, so far as cou'd
Safely consist with social good,
The goddess sat; around her head
A cheerful radiance glory spread;
Courage, a youth of royal race,
Lovely stern, possess'd a place
On her left-hand, and on her right
Sat honour, cloth'd with robes of light;
Before her Magna Charta lay,
Which some great lawyer, of his day
The Pratt, was offic'd to explain,
And make the basis of her reign;
Peace, crown'd with olive, to her breast
Two smiling twin-born infants prest
At her feet couching, war was laid,
And with a brindled lion play'd;
Justice and mercy, hand in hand,
Joint guardians of the happy land,
Together held their mighty charge,
And truth walk'd all about at large;
Health for the royal troop the feast
Prepar'd, and virtue was high-priest.

Such was the fame our goddess bore,
Her temple such in days of yore.
What changes ruthless time presents!
Behold her ruin'd battlements,
Her walls decay'd, her nodding spires,
Her altars broke, her dying fires,
Her name despis'd, her priests destroy'd,
Her friends disgrac'd, her foes employ'd,
Herself (by ministerial arts
Depriv'd e'en of the people's hearts,
Whilst they, to work her surer woe,
Feign her to monarchy a foe)
Exil'd by grief, self-doom'd to dwell
With some poor hermit in a cell,
Or, that retirement tedious grown,
If she walks forth, she walks unknown,
Hooted and pointed at with scorn,
As one in some strange country born.

Behold a rude and ruffian race,
A band of spoilers, seize her place;
With looks, which might the heart dis-seat,
And make life sound a quick retreat,
To rapine from the cradle bred,
A staunch, old blood-bound at their head,
Who, free from virtue and from awe,
Knew none but the bad part of law,
They rov'd at large; each on his breast
Mark'd with a greyhound, stood confest.

Controulment waited on their nod,
High-wielding persecution's rod;
Confusion follow'd at their heels,
And a cast statesman held the seals,
Those seals, for which he dear shall pay,
When awful justice takes her day.

The printers saw—they saw and fled—
Science declining, hung her head,
Property in despair appear'd,
And for herself destruction fear'd;
Whilst under foot the rude slaves trod
The works of men, and word of God;
Whilst, close behind, on many a book,
In which he never deigns to look,
Which he did not, nay—could not read,
A bold, bad man (by pow'r decreed
For that bad end, who in the dark
Scorn'd to do mischief) set his mark
In the full day, the mark of hell,
And on the gospel stamp'd an L.

Liberty fled, her friends withdrew,
Her friends, a faithful, chosen few;
Honour in grief threw up, and shame,
Clothing herself with honour's name,
Usurp'd his station; on the throne
Which liberty once call'd her own,
(Gods, that such mighty ills should spring
Under so great, so good a king,
So lov'd, so loving, through the arts
Of statesmen curs'd with wicked hearts!)
For ev'ry darker purpose fit,
Behold in triumph state-craft sit.

BOOK III.

Alas! what mighty perils wait
The man who meddles with a state,
Whether to strengthen, or oppose!
False are his friends, and firm his foes.
How must his soul, once ventur'd in,
Plunge blindly on from sin to sin!
What toils he suffers, what disgrace,
To get, and then to keep a place!
How often, whether wrong or right,
Must he in jest or earnest fight,
Risking for those both life and limb,
Who would not risk one groat for him!

Under the temple lay a cave,
Made by some guilty, coward slave,
Whose actions fear'd rebuke, a maze
Of intricate and winding ways,
Not to be found without a clue;
One passage only, known to few,
In paths direct led to a cell,
Where fraud in secret lov'd to dwell,
With all her tools and slaves about her,
Nor fear'd lest honesty should rout her.

In a dark corner, shunning sight
Of man, and shrinking from the light,
One dull, dim taper through the cell
Glimm'ring, to make more horrible
The face of darkness, she prepares,
Working unseen, all kinds of snares,
With curious, but destructive art:
Here, through the eye to catch the heart,

Gay flats their tinsel beams afford,
 Neat artifice to trap a lord;
There, fit for all whom folly bred,
 Wave plumes of feathers for the head;
Garters the hag contrives to make,
 Which, as it seems, a babe might break,
 But which ambitious madmen feel
 More firm and sure than chains of steel;
 Which, slipp'd just underneath the knee,
 Forbid a freeman to be free;
Purses she knew (did ever curse
 Travel more sure than in a purse)?
 Which, by some strange and magic bands
 Enslave the soul, and tie the hands.

Here flattery, eldest-born of guile,
 Weaves with rare skill the silken smile.
 The courtly cringe, the supple bow,
 The private squeeze, the levee vow,
 With which, no strange or recent case,
 Fools in deceive fools out of place.

Corruption (who, in former times,
 Through fear or shame conceal'd her crimes,
 And what she did, contriv'd to do it
 So that the public might not view it)
 Presumptuous grown, unfit was held
 For their dark councils, and expell'd,
 Since in the day her business might
 Be done as safe as in the night.

Her eye down-bending to the ground,
 Planning some dark and deadly wound,
 Holding a dagger, on which stood,
 All fresh and reeking, drops of blood,
 Bearing a lanthorn, which of yore,
 By treason borrow'd, Guy Fawkes bore,
 By which, since they improv'd in trade,
Executioners have their lanthorns made,
 Assassination, her whole mind
 Blood-thirsting, on her arm reclin'd.
 Death, grinning, at her elbow stood,
 And held forth instruments of blood,
 Vile instruments, which cowards choose,
 But men of honour dare not use;
 Around his lordship and his grace,
 Both qualified for such a place,
 With many a Forbes*, and many a Dun†,
 Each a resolv'd, and pious son,
 Wait her high bidding; each prepar'd,
 As she around her orders shar'd,
 Proof 'gainst remorse, to run to fly,
 And bid the destin'd victim die,
 Posting on villainy's black wing,
 Whether he patriot is, or king.

Oppression, willing to appear
 An object of our love, not fear,
 Or at the most a rev'rend awe
 To breed, usurp'd the garb of law.
 A book she held, on which her eyes
 Were deeply fix'd whence seem to rise
 Joy in her breast; a book, of might
 Most wonderful, which black to white
 Could turn, and without help of laws,
 Could make the worse the better cause.

* A Scotch officer who challenged Mr. Wilkes.

† A poor lunatic, who was charged with an intention to assassinate Mr. Wilkes.

She read, by flatt'ring hopes deceiv'd,
 She wish'd, and what she wish'd, believ'd,
 To make that book for ever stand
 The rule of wrong through all the land;
 On the back, fair and worthy note,
 At large was Magna Charta wrote,
 But turn your eye within, and read,
 A bitter lesson, Norton's creed.
 Ready, e'en with a look, to run,
 Fast as the coursers of the sun,
 To worry virtue, at her hand
 Two half-starv'd greyhounds took their stand.
 A curious model cut in wood,
 Of a most ancient castle stood
 Full in her view; the gates were barr'd,
 And soldiers on the watch kept guard;
 In the front, openly, in black
 Was wrote, "the Tow'r," but on the back,
 Mark'd with a secretary's seal,
 In bloody letters, "the Bastille."

Around a table, fully bent
 On mischief of most black intent
 Deeply determin'd, that their reign
 Might longer last, to work the bane
 Of one firm patriot, whose heart, tied
 To honour, all their pow'r defied,
 And brought those actions into light
 They wish'd to have conceal'd in night,
 Begot, born, bred to infamy,
 A privy-council sat of three;
 Great were their names, of high repute
 And favour through the land of Bute.

The first (entitled to the place
 Of honour both by gown and grace,
 Who never let occasion slip
 To take right-hand of fellowship,
 And was so proud, that should he meet
 The twelve apostles in the street,
 He'd turn his nose up at them all,
 And shove his Saviour from the wall;
 Who was so mean, meanness and pride
 Still go together side by side)
 That he would cringe, and creep, be civil,
 And hold a stirrup for the devil,
 If in a journey to his mind,
 He'd let him mount and ride behind;
 Who basely sawn'd through all his life,
 For patrons first, then for a wife;
 Wrote dedications which must make
 The heart of ev'ry Christian quake;
 Made one man equal to, or more
 Than God, then left him, as before
 His God he left, and drawn by pride,
 Shifted about to t' other side)
 Was by his fire a parson made,
 Merely to give the boy a trade;
 But he himself was thereto drawn
 By some faint omens of the lawn,
 And on the truly Christian plan
 To make himself a gentleman,
 A title, in which form array'd him, [him,
 Though fate ne'er thought on't when she made

The oaths he took, 'tis very true,
 But took them, as all wise men do,
 With an intent, if things should turn,
 Rather to temporize, than burn.

Gospel and loyalty were made
To serve the purposes of trade ;
Religions are but paper ties,
Which bind the fool, but which the wise,
Such idle notions far above,
Draw on and off, just like a glove ;
All gods, all kings (let his great aim
Be answer'd) were to him the same.

A curate first, he read and read,
And laid in, whilst he should have fed
The souls of his neglected flock,
Of reading such a mighty stock,
That he o'ercharg'd the weary brain,
With more than she could well contain,
More than she was with spirits fraught
To turn, and methodize to thought,
And which, like ill-digested food,
To humours turn'd, and not to blood.
Brought up to London from the plough
And pulpit, how to make a bow
He try'd to learn, he grew polite,
And was the poet's parasite.
With wits conversing (and wits then
Were to be found 'mongst noblemen)
He caught, or would have caught the flame,
And would be nothing, or the same ;
He drank with drunkards, liv'd with sinners,
Herded with infidels for dinners ;
With such an emphasis and grace
Blasphem'd, that Potter kept not pace ;
He, in the highest reign of noon,
Bawl'd bawdry songs to a psalm tune ;
Liv'd with men infamous and vile,
Truck'd his salvation for a smile,
To catch their humour caught their plan,
And laugh'd at God to laugh with man ;
Prais'd them when living in each breath,
And damn'd their mem'ries after death.

To prove his faith, which all admit
Is at least equal to his wit,
And make himself a man of note,
He in defence of Scripture wrote ;
So long he wrote, and long about it,
That e'en believers 'gan to doubt it :
He wrote too of the inward light,
Though no one knew how he came by't,
And of that influencing grace,
Which in his life ne'er found a place :
He wrote too of the Holy Ghost,
Of whom no more than doth a post
He knew ; nor, should an angel show him,
Would he or know, or choose to know him.

Next (for he knew 'twixt ev'ry science
There was a natural alliance)
He wrote, t' advance his Maker's praise,
Comments on rhymes, and notes on plays,
And with an all-sufficient air
Plac'd himself in the critic's chair,
Usurp'd o'er reason full dominion,
And govern'd merely by opinion.
At length dethron'd, and kept in awe
By one plain simple man of law *,
He arm'd dead friends †, to vengeance true,
T' abuse the man they never knew.

Examine strictly all mankind,
Most characters are mix'd, we find ;
And vice and virtue take their turn
In the same breast to beat and burn.
Our priest was an exception here,
Nor did one spark of grace appear,
Not one dull, dim spark in his soul ;
Vice, glorious vice possess'd the whole,
And, in her service truly warm,
He was in sin most uniform.

Injurious satire, own at least
One snivelling virtue in the priest,
One sniveiling virtue which is plac'd,
They say, in or about the waist,
Call'd chastity ; the prudish dame
Knows it at large by virtue's name.
To this his wife (and in these days
Wives seldom without reason praise)
Bears evidence—then calls her child,
And swears that Tom was vastly wild.

Ripen'd by a long course of years,
He great and perfect now appears.
In shape scarce of the human kind ;
A man, without a manly mind ;
No husband, though he's truly wed ;
Though on his knees a child is bred,
No father ; injur'd, without end
A foe ; and though oblig'd, no friend ;
A heart, which virtue ne'er disgrac'd ;
A head, where learning runs to waste ;
A gentleman well bred, if breeding
Rests in the article of reading ;
A man of this world, for the next
Was ne'er included in his text ;
A judge of genius, though confess'd
With not one spark of genius blest ;
Amongst the first of critics plac'd,
Though free from ev'ry taint of taste ;
A Christian without faith or works,
As he would be a Turk 'mongst Turks ;
A great divine, as lords agree,
Without the least divinity ;
To crown all, in declining age,
Enflam'd with church and party rage,
Behold him, full and perfect quite,
A false saint, and true hypocrite.

Next sat a lawyer, often try'd
In perilous extremes ; when pride
And pow'r, all wild and trembling, stood,
Nor dar'd to tempt the raging flood ;
This bold, bad man arose to view,
And gave his hand to help them through.
Steel'd 'gainst compassion, as they pass'd,
He saw poor freedom breathe her last ;
He saw her struggle, heard her groan,
He saw her helpless and alone,
Whelm'd in that storm, which, fear'd and prais'd
By slaves less bold, himself had rais'd.

Bred to the law, he from the first
Of all bad lawyers was the worst.
Perfection (for bad men maintain
In ill we may perfection gain)
In others is a work of time,
And they creep on from crime to crime ;
He, for a prodigy design'd
To spread amazement o'er mankind,

Started full ripen'd all at once
A perfect knave, and perfect dunce.
Who will for him may boast of sense,
His better guard is impudence.
His front, with tenfold plates of brass,
Secur'd, shame never yet could pass,
Nor on the surface of his skin
Blush for that guilt which dwelt within.
How often in contempt of laws,
To sound the bottom of a cause,
To search out ev'ry rotten part,
And worm into its very heart,
Hath he ta'en briefs on false pretence,
And undertaken the defence
Of trusting fools, whom in the end
He meant to ruin, not defend?
How often, ev'n in open court,
Hath the wretch made his shame his sport,
And laugh'd off, with a villain's ease,
Throwing up briefs, and keeping fees?
Such things, as, though to roguery bred,
Had struck a little villain dead.

Causes, whatever their import,
He undertakes, to serve a court;
For he by heart this rule had got,
Pow'r can effect, what law cannot.

Fools he forgives, but rogues he fears;
If genius, yok'd with worth, appears,
His weak soul sickens at the sight,
And strives to plunge them down in night.

So loud he talks, so very loud,
He is an angel with the crowd,
Whilst he makes justice hang her head,
And judges turn from pale to red.

Bid all that nature, on a plan
Most intimate, makes dear to man,
All that with grand and gen'ral ties
Binds good and bad, the fool and wise,
Knock at his heart; they knock in vain,
No entrance there such suiters gain.
Bid kneeling kings forsake the throne;
Bid at his feet his country groan;
Bid liberty stretch out her hands;
Religion plead her stronger bands;
Bid parents, children, wife, and friends;
If they come 'thwart his private ends,
Unmov'd he hears the gen'ral call,
And bravely tramples on them all.
Who will for him may cant and whine,
And let weak conscience with her line
Chalk out their ways; such starving rules
Are only fit for coward fools,
Fellows who credit what priests tell,
And tremble at the thoughts of hell;
His spirit dares contend with grace,
And meets damnation face to face.

Such was our lawyer; by his side,
In all bad qualities allied,
In all bad counsels, sat a third,
By birth a lord. O sacred word!
O word most sacred, whence men get
A privilege to run in debt;
Whence they at large exemption claim
From satire, and her servant shame;
Whence they, depriv'd of all her force,
Forbid bold truth to hold her course.

Consult his person, dress, and air;
He seems, which strangers well might swear,
The master, or by courtesy,
The captain of a colliery.
Look at his visage, and agree
Half-hang'd he seems, just from the tree no way
Escap'd; a rope may sometimes break,
Or men be cut down by mistake.

He hath not virtue (in the school
Of vice bred up), to live by rule,
Nor hath he sense (which none can doubt)
Who know the man) to live without.
His life is a continued scene
Of all that's infamous and mean;
He knows not change, unless grown nice
And delicate, from vice to vice;
Nature design'd him, in a rage,
To be the Wharton of his age,
But, having giv'n all the sin,
Forgot to put the virtues in.

To run a horse, to make a match,
To revel deep, to roar a catch,
To knock a tottering watchman down,
To sweat a woman of the town,
By fits to keep the peace, or break it,
In turn to give a pox, or take it,
He is, in faith, most excellent,
And in the word's most full intent,
A true choice spirit we admit;
With wits a fool, with fools a wit:
Hear him but talk, and you would swear
Obscenity herself was there;
And that profaneness had made choice,
By way of trump, to use his voice;
That, in all mean and low things great,
He had been bred at Billingsgate;
And that, ascending to the earth
Before the season of his birth,
Blasphemy, making way and room,
Had mark'd him in his mother's womb;
Too honest (for the worst of men
In forms are honest now and then)
Not to have, in the usual way,
His bills sent in, too great, to pay;
Too proud to speak to, if he meets,
The honest tradesman whom he cheats;
Too infamous to have a friend,
Too bad for bad men to commend,
Or good to name; beneath whose weight
Earth groans; who hath been spar'd by fate,
Only to show, on mercy's plan,
How far and long God bears with man.

Such were the three, who, mocking sleep,
At midnight sat, in counsel deep,
Plotting destruction 'gainst a head,
Whose wisdom could not be mislead;
Plotting destruction 'gainst a heart,
Which ne'er from honour would depart.

"Is he not rank'd amongst our foes?
"Hath not his spirit dar'd oppose
"Our dearest measures, made our name
"Stand forward on the roll of shame?
"Hath he not won the vulgar tribes,
"By scorning menaces and bribes,
"And proving, that his darling cause
"Is of their liberties and laws

" To stand the champion? In a word,
 " Nor need one argument be heard
 " Beyond this, to awake our zeal,
 " To quicken our resolves, and steel
 " Our steady souls to bloody bent
 " (Sure ruin to each dear intent,
 " Each flatt'ring hope), he, without fear,
 " Hath dar'd to make the truth appear."

They said, and, by resentment taught,
 Each on revenge employ'd his thought;
 Each, bent on mischief, rack'd his brain
 To her full stretch, but rack'd in vain;
 Scheme after scheme they brought to view;
 All were examin'd, none would do.
 When fraud, with pleasure in her face,
 Forth issu'd from her hiding-place,
 And at the table where they meet,
 First having blest them, took her seat.

" No trifling cause, my darling boys,
 " Your present thoughts and cares employs;
 " No common snare, no random blow
 " Can work the bane of such a foe:
 " By nature cautious as he's brave,
 " To honour only he's a slave;
 " In that weak part without defence,
 " We must to honour make pretence:
 " That lure shall to his ruin draw
 " The wretch, who stands secure in law.
 " Nor think that I have idly plann'd
 " This full-ripe scheme; behold at hand,
 " With three months training on his head,
 " An instrument, whom I have bred,
 " Born of these bowels, far from sight
 " Of virtue's false, but glaring light,
 " My youngest-born, my dearest joy,
 " Most like myself, my darling boy.
 " He, never touch'd with vile remorse,
 " Resolv'd and crafty in his course,
 " Shall work our ends, complete our schemes,
 " Most mine, when most he honour's seems;
 " Nor can be found, at home, abroad,
 " So firm and full a slave of fraud."

She said, and from each envious son
 A discontented murmur run
 Around the table: all in place
 Thought his full praise their own disgrace,
 Wond'ring what stranger she had got,
 Who had one voice that they had not,
 When strait the portals open flew,
 And, clad in armour, to their view
 M——, the Duellist, came forth;
 All knew, and all confess his worth,
 All justified, with smiles array'd,
 The happy choice their dam had made.

GOTHAM.

IN THREE BOOKS.

BOOK I.

FAR off (no matter whether east or west,
 A real country, or one made in jest)
 Nor yet by modern Mandevilles disgrac'd,
 Nor by map-jobbers wretchedly misplac'd,

There lies an island, neither great nor small,
 Which, for distinction-sake, I Gotham call.

The man who finds an unknown country out,
 By giving it a name, acquires, no doubt,
 A gospel title, though the people there
 The pious Christian thinks not worth his care.
 Bar this pretence, and into air is hurl'd
 The claim of Europe to the western world.

Cast by a tempest on the savage coast,
 Some roving buccaneer set up a post;
 A beam in proper form transversely laid,
 Of his Redeemer's cross the figure made,
 Of that Redeemer, with whose laws his life,
 From first to last, had been one scene of strife;
 His royal master's name thereon engrav'd,
 Without more process, the whole race enslav'd,
 Cut off that charter they from nature drew,
 And made them slaves to men they never knew.
 Search ancient histories, consult records,
 Under this title the most Christian lords
 Hold (thanks to conscience) more than half the ball.

O'erthrow this title, they have none at all.
 For never yet might any monarch dare,
 Who liv'd to truth, and breath'd a Christian air,
 Pretend that Christ (who came, we all agree,
 To bless his people, and to set them free)
 To make a convert ever one law gave,
 By which converters made him first a slave.

Spite of the glosses of a canting priest,
 Who talks of charity, but means a feast;
 Who recommends it (whilst he seems to feel
 The holy glowings of a real zeal)
 To all his hearers, as a deed of worth,
 To give them heaven, whom they have robb'd
 of earth,

Never shall one, one truly honest man,
 Who, blest with liberty, reveres her plan,
 Allow one moment, that a savage fire
 Could from his wretched race, for childish hire,
 By a wild grant, their all, their freedom pass,
 And sell his country for a bit of glass.

Or grant this barb'rous right, let Spain and France,
 In slav'ry bred, as purchasers advance,
 Let them, whilst conscience is at distance hurl'd,
 With some gay bawble buy a golden world;
 An Englishman, in charter'd freedom born,
 Shall spurn the slavish merchandise, shall scorn
 To take from others, through base private views,
 What he himself would rather die, than lose.

Happy the savage of those early times,
 Ere Europe's sons were known; and Europe's crimes;
 Gold, cursed gold! slept in the womb of earth,
 Unfelt its mischiefs, as unknown its worth;
 In full content he found the truest wealth;
 In toil he found diversion, food, and health;
 Stranger to ease and luxury of courts,
 His sports were labours, and his labours sports;
 His youth was hardy, and his old age green;
 Life's morn was vig'rous, and her eve serene;
 No rules he held, but what were made for use;
 No arts he learn'd, nor ills which arts produce;
 False lights he follow'd, but believ'd them true;
 He knew not much, but liv'd to what he knew.

Happy, thrice happy now the savage race,
 Since Europe took their gold, and gave them grace!
 Pastors she sends to help them in their need,
 Some who can't write, with others who can't read,
 And on sure grounds the gospel pile to rear,
 Sends missionary felons ev'ry year;
 Our vices, with more zeal than holy pray'rs,
 She teaches them, and in return takes theirs;
 Her rank oppressions give them cause to rise,
 Her want of prudence means, and arms supplies,
 Whilst her brave rage, not satisfied with life,
 Rising in blood, adopts the scalping-knife;
 Knowledge she gives, enough to make them know
 How abject is their state, how deep their woe;
 The worth of freedom strongly she explains,
 Whilst she bows down, and loads their necks
 with chains;

Faith too she plants, for her own ends impress,
 To make them bear the worst, and hope the best;
 And whilst she teaches on vile int'rest's plan,
 As laws of God, the wild decrees of man,
 Like Pharisees, of whom the Scriptures tell,
 She makes them ten times more the sons of hell.

But whither do these grave reflections tend?
 Are they design'd for any, or no end?
 Briefly but this—to prove, that by no act
 Which nature made, that by no equal pact [heard,
 'Twixt man and man, which might, if justice
 Stand good, that by no benefits conferr'd,
 Or purchase made, Europe in chains can hold
 The sons of India, and her mines of gold.
 Chance led her there in an accursed hour,
 She saw, and made the country her's by pow'r;
 Nor drawn by virtue's love from love of fame,
 Shall my rash folly controvert the claim,
 Or wish in thought that title overthrown,
 Which coincides with, and involves my own.

Europe discover'd India first; I found
 My right to Gotham on the self-same ground:
 I first discover'd it, nor shall that plea
 To her be granted, and denied to me.
 I plead possession, and till one more bold
 Shall drive me out, will that possession hold:
 With Europe's rights my kindred rights I twine;
 Her's be the western world, be Gotham mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
 Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
 The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
 In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
 The praises of so great and good a king;
 Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

As on a day, a high and holy day,
 Let ev'ry instrument of music play,
Ancient and modern; those which drew their birth
 (Punctilio laid aside) from Pagan earth,
 As well as those by Christian made and Jew;
 Those known to many, and those known to few;
 Those which in whim and frolic lightly float,
 And those which swell the flow and solemn note;
 Those which (whilst reason stands in wonder by)
 Make some complexions laugh and others cry;
 Those which by some strange faculty of sound,
 Can build walls up, and raze them to the ground;
 Those which can tear up forests by the roots,
 And make brutes dance like men, and men like brutes;

Those which, whilst ridicule leads up the dance,
 Make clowns of Monmouth ape the fops of France;
 Those which, where Lady Dullness with Lord
 Mayors

Presides, disdaining light and trifling airs,
 Hallow the feast with psalmody; and those Which, planted in our churches to dispose
 And lift the mind to heaven, are disgrac'd
 With what a foppish organist calls taste:
 All, from the fiddle (on which ev'ry fool,
 The pert son of dull fire, discharg'd from school,
 Serves an apprenticeship in college ease,
 And rises through the gamut to degrees)
 To those which (though less common, not less sweet)

From fam'd St. Giles's, and more fam'd Vine-street, (Where Heav'n, the utmost wish of man to grant,
 Gave me an old house, and an older aunt)

Thornton, whilst humour pointed out the road
 To her arch cub, hath hitch'd into an ode*;
 All instruments (attend ye list'ning spheres,
 Attend ye sons of men, and hear with ears)
 All instruments (nor shall they seek one hand Impress from modern music's coxcomb band)
 All instruments, self-acted, at my name
 Shall pour forth harmony, and loud proclaim,
 Loud, but yet sweet, to the according globe,
 My praises; whilst gay nature, in a robe,
 A coxcomb doctor's robe, to the full sound [round,
 Keeps time, like Boyce, and the world dances.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
 Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
 The voice of gladness, and on every tongue,
 In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
 The praises of so great and good a king;
 Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?
 Infancy, straining backward from the breast,
 Techy and wayward, what he loveth best
 Refusing in his fits, whilst all the while
 The mother eyes the wrangler with a smile,
 And the fond father sits on th' other side,
 Laughs at his moods, and views his spleen with
 pride,

Shall murmur forth my name, whilst at his hand
 Nurse stands interpreter, through Gotham's land.

Childhood, who like an April morn appears,
 Sunshine and rain, hopes clouded o'er with fears,
 Pleas'd and displeas'd by starts, in passion warm,
 In reason weak; who, wrought into a storm,
 Like to the fretful bullies of the deep,
 Soon spends his rage, and cries himself asleep;
 Who, with a feverish appetite oppress'd,
 For trifles sighs, but hates them when possess'd;
 His trembling lash suspended in the air,
 Half bent, and stroking back his long lank hair,
 Shall to his mates look up with eager glee,
 And let his top go down to prate of me.

Youth who, fierce, fickle, insolent, and vain,
 Impatient urges on to manhood's reign,
 Impatient urges on, yet with a cast
 Of dear regard looks back on childhood past,
 In the mid-chase, when the hot blood runs high,
 And the quick spirits mount into his eye,

* A burlesque ode on St. Cecilia's day, by Bonnet
 Thornton, performed at Ranelagh.

When pleasure, which he deems his greatest wealth,
Beats in his heart, and paints his cheeks with health,
When the chaf'd steed tugs proudly at the rein,
And ere he starts, hath run o'er half the plain,
When, wing'd with fear, the stag flies full in view,
And in full cry the eager hounds pursue,
Shall shout my praise to hills which shout again,
And e'en the buntzman stop to cry Amen.

Manhood, of form erect, who would not bow
Though worlds should crack around him; on his brow

Wisdom serene, to passion giving law,
Bespeaking love, and yet commanding awe;
Dignity into grace by mildness wrought;
Courage attemper'd and refin'd by thought;
Virtue supreme enthron'd; within his breast
The image of his Maker deep impress'd;
Lord of this earth, which trembles at his nod,
With reason blest'd, and only less than God;
Manhood, though weeping beauty kneels for aid,
Though honour calls in danger's form array'd,
Though cloth'd with sackcloth, justice in the gates,
By wicked elders chain'd, redemption waits,
Manhood shall steal an hour, a little hour,
(Is't not a little one)? to hail my pow'r,

Old age, a second child, by nature curs'd
With more and greater evils than the first,
Weak, sickly, full of pains; in ev'ry breath
Railing at life, and yet afraid of death;
Putting things off, with sage and solemn air,
From day to day, without one day to spare;
Without enjoyment, covetous of pelf,
Tiresome to friends, and tiresome to himself;
His faculties impair'd, his temper sour'd,
His memory of recent things devour'd
E'en with the acting on his shatter'd brain,
Though the false registers of youth remain;
From morn to evening babbling forth vain praise
Of those rare men who liv'd in those rare days,
When he, the hero of his tale, was young;
Dull repetition falt'ring on his tongue,
Praising gray hairs, sure mark of wisdom's sway,
E'en whilst he curses time which made him gray;
Scoffing at youth, e'en whilst he would afford
All but his gold to have his youth restor'd;
Shall for a moment, from himself set free,
Lean on his crutch, and pipe forth praise to me.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?
Things without life shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others praise, be loud in mine.

The snow drop, who, in habit white and plain,
Comes on, the herald of fair Flora's train;
The coxcomb crocus, flow'r of simple note,
Who by her side struts in a herald's coat;
The tulip, idly glaring to the view, [drew,
Who, though no clown, his birth from Holland
Who, once full dress'd, fears from his place to stir,
The sop of flow'rs, the More of a parterre;
The woodbine, who her elm in marriage meets,
And brings her dowry in surrounding sweets;

The lily, silver mistress of the vale;
The rose of Sharon which perfumes the gale;
The jeffamine, with which the queen of flow'rs,
To charm her god, adorns his fav'rite bow'rs,
Which brides, by the plain hand of neatness dress'd,
Unenvied rival, wear upon their breast,
Sweet as the incense of the morn, and chaste
As the pure zone which circles Dian's waist;
All flow'rs, of various names, and various forms,
Which the sun into strength and beauty warms,
From the dwarf daify, which, like infants, clings,
And fears to leave the earth from whence it
springs,

To the proud giant of the garden race,
Who, madly rushing to the sun's embrace,
O'ertops her fellows with aspiring aim,
Demands his wedded love, and bears his name;
All, one and all, shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

Forming a gloom, through which to spleenstruck minds

Religion, horror-stamp'd, a passage finds,
The ivy crawling o'er the hallow'd cell,
Where some old hermit's wont his beads to tell
By day, by night; the myrtle ever green,
Beneath whose shade love holds his rites unseen;
The willow weeping o'er the fatal wave
Where many a lover finds a wat'ry grave;
The cypress sacred held, when lovers mourn
Their true love snatch'd away; the laurel worn
By poets in old time, but destin'd now
In grief to wither on a Whitehead's brow;
The fig, which, large as what in India grows,
Itself a grove, gave our first parents clothes;
The vine, which, like a blushing new-made bride,
Clust'ring, empurples all the mountain's side;
The yew, which, in the place of sculptur'd stone,
Marks out the resting place of men unknown;
The hedge-row elm, the pine of mountain race,
The sir, the Scotch sir, never out of place;
The cedar, whose top mates the highest cloud,
Whilst his old father Lebanon grows proud
Of such a child, and his vast body laid
Out many a mile, enjoys the filial shade;
The oak, when living, monarch of the wood;
The English oak, which, dead, commands the
All, one and all, shall in this chorus join, [flood;
And, dumb to others' praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

The snow's which make the young hills, like young lambs,
Bound and rebound; the old hills, like old rams,
Unwieldy, jump for joy; the streams which glide,
Whilst plenty marches smiling by their side,

And from their bosom rising commerce springs;
The winds which rise with healing on their wings,
Before whose cleansing breath contagion flies;
The sun, who, travelling in eastern skies,
Fresh full of strength, just risen from his bed,
Though in Jove's pastures they were born and bred,

With voice and whip, can scarce make his steeds
Step by step up the perpendicular;
Who, at the hour of eve panting for rest,
Rolls on amain, and gallops down the west,
As fast as Jchu, oil'd for Ahab's sin,
Drove for a crown, or post-boys for an inn;
The moon, who holds o'er night her silver reign,
Regent of tides, and mistress of the brain,
Who to her sons, those sons who own her pow'r,
And do her homage at the midnight hour,
Gives madness as a blessing, but dispenses
Wisdom to fools, and damns them with their senses;

The stars, who, by I know not what strange right,
Preside o'er mortals in their own despite,
Who without reason govern those, who most (How truly, judge from thence)! of reason boast,
And, by some mighty magic yet unknown,
Our actions guide, yet cannot guide their own;
All, one and all, shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others' praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

The moment, minute, hour, day, week, month, year,
Morning and Eve, as they in turn appear;
Moments and minutes which, without a crime,
Can't be omitted in accounts of time,
Or, if omitted (proof we might afford),
Worthy by parliaments to be restor'd;
The hours, which dress'd by turns in black and white,

Ordain'd as handmaids, wait on day and night;
The day, those hours I mean when light presides,
And business in a cart with prudence rides;
The night, those hours I mean with darkness hung,
When sense speaks free, and folly holds her tongue;
The morn, when nature, rousing from her strife
With death-like sleep, awakes to second life;
The eve, when, as unequal to the task,
She mercy from her foe descends to ask;
The week, in which six days are kindly given
To think of earth, and one to think of heaven;
The months, twelve sisters all of different hue,
Though there appears in all a likeness too;
Not such a likeness, as, through Hayman's works,
Dull mannerest, in Christians, Jews, and Turks,
Cloys with a sameness in each female face,
But a strange something, born of art and grace,
Which speaks them all, to vary and adorn,
At different times of the same parents born;
All, one and all, shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others' praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,

The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

From January, leader of the year,
Minc'd pies in van, and calves heads in the rear;
Dull February, in whose leaden reign
My mother bore a bard without a brain;
March various, fierce, and wild, with wind-crack'd cheeks,
By wilder Welchmen led, and crown'd with leeks!
April with fools, and May with bastards blest;
June with white roses on her rebel breast;
July, to whom, the dog-star in her train,
Saint James gives oysters, and Saint Swithin rain;
August, who, banish'd from her Smithfield stand,
To Chelsea flies, with dogget in her hand*;
September, when by custom (right divine)
Geese are ordain'd to bleed at Michael's shrine,
Whilst the priest, not so full of grace as wit,
Falls to, unblest, nor gives the saint a bit;
October, who the cause of freedom join'd,
And gave a second George to bless mankind;
November, who at once to grace our earth,
Saint Andrew boasts, and our Augusta's † birth;
December, last of months, but best, who gave
A Christ to man, a Saviour to the slave,
Whilst, falsely grateful, man, at the full feast,
To do God honour, makes himself a beast;
All, one and all shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others' praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises hung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

The Seasons as they roll; spring, by her side
Lech'ry and lent, lay-folly, and church-pride,
By a rank monk to copulation led,
A tub of sainted salt-fish on her head;
Summer, in light transparent gawze array'd,
Like maids of honour at a masquerade,
In bawdry gawze, for which our daughters leave
The fig, more modest, first brought up by Eve,
Panting for breath, enflam'd with lustful fires,
Yet wanting strength to perfect her desires,
Leaning on sloth, who, fainting with the heat,
Stops at each step, and slumbers on his feet;
Autumn, when nature, who with sorrow feels
Her dread foe winter treading on her heels,
Makes up in value what she wants in length,
Exerts her pow'rs and puts forth all her strength,
Bids corn and fruits in full perfection rise,
Corn fairly tax'd, and fruits without excise;
Winter, benumb'd with cold, no longer known
By robes of fur, since furs become our own;
A hag, who lothing all, by all is loth'd,
With weekly, daily, hourly libels cloth'd,
Vile faction at her heels, who mighty grown,
Would rule the ruler, and foreclose the throne,

* Dogget the celebrated comedian's badge, rowed for on the first of August.

† Princess Dowager of Wales.

Would turn all state-affairs into a trade,
Make laws one day, the next to be unmade,
Beggar at home a people fear'd abroad,
And, force defeated, make them slaves by fraud;
All, one and all, shall in this chorus join,
And, dumb to others praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises sung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

The year, grand circle, in whose ample round
The seasons regular and fix'd are bound,
(Who in his course repeated o'er and o'er,
Sees the same things which he had seen before;
The same stars keep their watch, and the same sun
Runs in the track where he from first hath run;
The same moon rules the night; tides ebb and
flow;

Man is a puppet, and this world a show;
Their old dull follies old dull fools pursue,
And vice in nothing but in mode is new;
He ——— a lord (now fair befall that pride,
He liv'd a villain, but a lord he died)
Dashmood is pious, Berkeley fix'd as fate*,
Sandwich (thank Heav'n) first minister of state;
And, though by fools despis'd, by saints unblest'd,
By friends neglected, and by foes oppress'd,
Scorning the servile arts of each court elf,
Founded on honour, Wilkes is still himself)

The year, encircled with the various train
Which waits, and fills the glories of his reign,
Shall, taking up this theme, in chorus join,
And, dumb to others praise, be loud in mine.

Rejoice, ye happy Gothamites, rejoice;
Lift up your voice on high, a mighty voice,
The voice of gladness, and on ev'ry tongue,
In strains of gratitude, be praises sung,
The praises of so great and good a king;
Shall Churchill reign, and shall not Gotham sing?

Thus far in sport—nor let our critics hence,
Who sell out monthly trash, and call it sense,
Too lightly of our present labours deem,
Or judge at random of so high a theme;
High is our theme, and worthy are the men
To feel the sharpest stroke of satire's pen;
But when kind time a proper season brings,
In serious mood to treat of serious things,
Then shall they find, disdaining idle play,
That I can be as grave and dull as they.

Thus far in sport—nor let half patriots, those Who shrink from ev'ry blast of pow'r which blows;

Who with tame cowardice familiar grown, [own;
Would hear my thoughts, but fear to speak their
Who (lest bold truths, to do sage prudence spite,
Should burst the portals of their lips by night,
Tremble to trust themselves one hour in sleep),
Condemn our course, and hold our caution cheap.
When brave occasion bids, for some great end
When honour calls the poet as a friend,

* A phrase used by Lord Botsclourt, then Norborne Berkeley, in an address to his electors.

Then shall they find, that, e'en on danger's brink,
He dares to speak, what they scarce dare to think.

BOOK II.

How much mistaken are the men, who think
That all who will, without restraint, may drink,
May largely drink, e'en till their bowels burst,
Pleading no right but merely that of thirst,
At the pure waters of the living well,
Beside whose streams the muses love to dwell!
Verse is with them a knack, an idle toy,
A rattle gilded o'er, on which a boy
May play untaught, whilst, without art or force,
Make it but jingle, music comes of course.

Little do such men know the toil, the pains,
The daily, nightly racking of the brains,
To range the thoughts, the matter to digest,
To cull fit phrases, and reject the rest;
To know the times when humour on the cheek
Of mirth may hold her sports; when wit should speak,

And when be silent; when to use the pow'rs
Of ornament, and how to place the flow'rs,
So that they neither give a tawdry glare,
Nor waste their sweetness in the desert air;
To form (which few can do, and scarcely one,
One critic in an age can find, when done)
To form a plan, to strike a grand outline,
To fill it up, and make the picture shine
A full, and perfect piece; to make coy rhyme
Renounce her follies, and with sense keep time;
To make proud sense against her nature bend,
And wear the chains of rhyme, yet call her friend.

Some sops there are, among the scribbling tribe,
Who make it all their business to describe,
No matter whether in, or out of place;
Studious of finery, and fond of lace,
Alike they trim, as coxcomb fancy brings,
The rags of beggars, and the robes of kings.
Let dull propriety in state preside
O'er her dull children, nature is their guide,
Wild nature, who at random breaks the fence
Of those tame drudges, judgment, taste, and sense,
Nor would forgive himself the mighty crime
Of keeping terms with person, place, and time.

Let liquid gold emblaze the sun at noon,
With borrow'd beams let silver pale the moon,
Let surges hoarse lash the resounding shore,
Let streams meander, and let torrents roar,
Let them breed up the melancholy breeze
To sigh with sighing, sob with sobbing trees,
Let vales embroid'ry wear, let flow'rs be ting'd
With various tints, let clouds be lac'd or fring'd,
They have their wish; like idle monarch boys,
Neglecting things of weight, they sigh for toys;
Give them the crown, the sceptre, and the robe,
Who will may take the pow'r, and rule the globe.

Others there are, who, in one solemn pace,
With as much zeal as Quakers rail at lace,
Railing at needful ornament, depend
On sense to bring them to their journey's end.
They would not (Heav'n forbid!) their course delay,
Nor for a moment step out of their way,

To make the barren road those graces wear,
Which nature would, if pleas'd, have planted there.

Vain men! who blindly thwarting nature's plan,
Ne'er find a passage to the heart of man;
Who, bred 'mongst fogs in Academic land,
Scorn ev'ry thing they do not understand;
Who, destitute of humour, wit, and taste,
Let all their little knowledge run to waste,
And frustrate each good purpose, whilst they wear
The robes of learning with a sloven's air.
Though solid reas'ning arms each sterling line,
Though truth declares aloud, "This work is
"mine,"

Vice, whilst from page to page dull morals creep,
Throws by the book, and virtue falls asleep.

Sense, mere, dull, formal sense, in this gay town
Must have some vehicle to pass her down,
Nor can she for an hour ensure her reign,
Unless she brings fair pleasure in her train.
Let her, from day to day, from year to year,
In all her grave solemnities appear, [streets
And, with the voice of trumpets, through the Deal lectures out to ev'ry one she meets,
Half who pass by are deaf, and t' other half
Can hear indeed, but only hear to laugh.

Quit then, ye graver sons of letter'd pride,
Taking for once experience as a guide,
Quit this grand error, this dull college mode;
Be your pursuits the same, but change the road;
Write, or at least appear to write with ease,
And, if you mean to profit, learn to please.

In vain for such mistakes they pardon claim,
Because they wield the pen in virtue's name.
'Thrice sacred is that name, thrice bless'd the man
Who thinks, speaks, writes, and lives on such a plan!

This, in himself, himself of course must bless,
But cannot with the world promote success.
He may be strong, but, with effect to speak,
Should recollect his readers may be weak;
Plain, rigid truths, which saints with comfort bear,
Will make the sinner tremble, and despair.
'True virtue acts from love, and the great end
At which she nobly aims, is to amend;
How then do those mistake, who arm her laws
With rigour not their own, and hurt the cause
They mean to help, whilst with a zealot rage
They make that goddess, whom they'd have engage

Our dearest love, in hideous terror rise!
Such may be honest, but they can't be wise.

In her own full, and perfect blaze of light,
Virtue breaks forth too strong for human sight:
The dazzled eye, that nice but weaker sense,
Shuts herself up in darkness for defence.
But, to make strong conviction deeper sink,
'To make the callous feel, the thoughtless think,
Like God made man, she lays her glory by,
And beams mild comfort on the ravish'd eye.
In earnest most, when most she seems in jest,
She worms into, and winds around the breast;
To conquer vice, of vice appears the friend,
And seems unlike herself to gain her end.
The sons of sin, to while away the time
Which lingers on their hands, of each black crime

To hush the painful memory, and keep
The tyrant conscience in delusive sleep,
Read on at random, nor suspect the dart,
Until they find it rooted in their heart.

'Gainst vice they give their vote, nor know at first
That, cursing that, themselves too they have
They see not, 'till they fall into the snares, [curs'd;
Deluded into virtue unawares.

Thus the shrewd doctor, in the spleen-struck mind
When pregnant horror sits, and broods o'er wind,
Discarding drugs, and striving how to please,
Lures on insensibly, by slow degrees,
The patient to those manly sports, which bind
The slacken'd sinews, and relieve the mind;
The patient feels a change as wrought by stealth,
And wonders on demand to find it health.

Some few, whom fate ordain'd to deal in rhymes
In other lands, and here, in other times,
Whom, waiting at their birth, the midwife muse
Sprinkled all over with Castalian dews,
To whom true genius gave his magic pen,
Whom art by just degrees led up to men;
Some few, extremes well shunn'd, have steer'd between

These dang'rous rocks, and held the golden mean;
Sense in their works maintains her proper state,
But never sleeps, or labours with her weight;
Grace makes the whole look elegant and gay,
But never dares from sense to run astray:
So nice the master's touch, so great his care,
The colours boldly glow, not idly glare;
Mutually giving and receiving aid,
They set each other off, like light and shade,
And, as by stealth, with so much softness blend,
'Tis hard to say, where they begin or end:
Both give us charms, and neither gives offence;
Sense perfects grace, and grace enlivens sense.

Peace to the men who these high honours
claim,
Health to their souls, and to their mem'ries fame:
Be it my task, and no mean task, to teach
A rev'rence for that worth I cannot reach:
Let me at distance, with a steady eye,
Observe, and mark their passage to the sky;
From envy free, applaud such rising worth,
And praise their heav'n, though pinion'd down
to earth.

Had I the pow'r, I could not have the time,
Whilst spirits flow, and life is in her prime,
Without a sin 'gainst pleasure, to design
A plan, to methodize each thought, each line
Highly to finish, and make ev'ry grace,
In itself charming, take new charms from place.
Nothing of book-, and little known of men,
When the mad fit comes on, I seize the pen,
Rough as they run, the rapid thoughts set down,
Rough as they run, discharge them on the town:
Hence rude, unfinish'd brats, before their time,
Are born into this idle world of rhyme,
And the poor flattern muse is brought to bed
With all her imperfections on her head.
Some, as no life appears, no pulses play [way.
Through the dull dubious mass, no breath makes
Doubt, greatly doubt, 'till for a glass they call,
Whether the child can be baptiz'd at all;

Others, on other grounds, objections frame,
And, granting that the child may have a name,
Doubt, as the sex might well a midwife pose,
Whether they should baptize it, verse or prose.

E'en what my masters please; bards, mild,
meek men,

In love to critics stumble now and then.
Something I do myself, and something too,
If they can do it, leave for them to do.

In the small compass of my careless page
Critics may find employment for an age;
Without my blunders they were all undone;
I twenty feed, where Mason can feed one.

When satire stoops, unmindful of her state,
To praise the man I love, curse him I hate;
When sense, in tides of passion borne along,
Sinking to prose, degrades the name of song;
The censor smiles, and, whilst my credit bleeds,
With as high relish on the carrion feeds
As the proud earl fed at a turtle feast,
Who, turn'd by gluttony to worse than beast,
Eat, 'till his bowels gush'd upon the floor,
Yet still eat on, and dying call'd for more.

When loose digression, like a colt unbroke,
Spurning connection, and her formal yoke,
Bounds through the forest, wanders far astray
From the known path, and loves to lose her way,
'Tis a full feast to all the mongrel pack
To run the rambler down, and bring her back.

When gay description, fancy's fairy child,
Wild without art, and yet with pleasure wild,
Waking with nature at the morning hour
To the lark's call, walk's o'er the op'ning flow'r
Which largely drank all night of heaven's fresh
dew,

And like a mountain nymph of Dian's crew,
So lightly walks, she not one mark imprints,
Nor brushes off the dews, nor soils the tints;
When thus description sports, e'en at the time
That drums should beat, and cannons roar in rhyme,

Critics can live on such a fault as that
From one month to the other, and grow fat.

Ye mighty monthly judges, in a dearth
Of letter'd blockheads, conscious of the worth
Of my materials, which against your will
Oft you've confess'd, and shall confess it still;
Materials rich though rude, inflam'd with thought,
Though more by fancy than by judgment
wrought;

Take, use them as your own, a work begin,
Which suits your genius well, and weave them in,
Fram'd for the critic loom, with critic art,
'Till thread on thread depending, part on part,
Colour with colour mingling, light with shade,
To your dull taste a formal work is made,
And, having wrought them into one grand piece,
Swears it surpasses Rome, and rivals Greece.

Nor think this much, for at one single word,
Soon as the mighty critic fiat's heard,
Science attends their call; their pow'r is own'd;
Order takes place, and genius is dethron'd!
Letters dance into books, defiance hurl'd
At means, as atoms danc'd into a world.

Me higher business calls, a greater plan,
Worthy man's whole employ, the good of man,

The good of man committed to my charge:
If idle fancy rambles forth at large,
Careless of such a trust, these harmless lays
May friendship envy, and may folly praise;
The crown of Gotham may some Scot assume,
And vagrant Stuarts reign in Churchill's room.

O my poor people, O thou wretched earth,
To whose dear love, though not engag'd by birth,
My heart is fix'd, my service deeply sworn,
How (by thy father can that thought be borne,
For monarchs, would they all but think like me,
Are only fathers in the best degree)
How must thy glories fade, in ev'ry land
Thy name be laugh'd to scorn, thy mighty hand
Be shorten'd, and thy zeal, by foes confess'd,
Bless'd in thyself, to make thy neighbours bless'd,
Be robb'd of vigour! how must freedom's pile,
The boast of ages, which adorns the isle,
And makes it great and glorious, fear'd abroad,
Happy at home, secure from force and fraud!
How must that pile, by ancient wisdom rais'd
On a firm rock, by friends admir'd and prais'd,
Envy'd by foes, and wonder'd at by all,
In one short moment into ruins fall,
Should any slip of Stuart's tyrant race,
Or bastard or legitimate, disgrace
Thy royal seat of empire! But what care,
What sorrow must be mine, what deep despair
And self-reproaches, should that hated line
Admittance gain through any fault of mine!
Curs'd be the cause whence Gotham's evils spring,
Though that curs'd cause be found in Gotham's
king.

Let war, with all his needy, ruffian band,
In pomp of horror stalk through Gotham's land
Knee-deep in blood; let all her stately tow'rs
Sink in the dust; that court which now is ours
Become a den, where beasts may, if they can,
A lodging find, nor fear rebuke from man;
Where yellow harvests rise, be brambles found;
Where vines now creep, let thistles curse the ground;

Dry in her thousand vallies be the rills;
Barren the cattle on her thousand hills;
Where pow'r is plac'd, let tygers prowl for prey;
Where justice lodges, let wild asses bray;
Let cormorants in churches make their nest,
And on the sails of commerce bitterns rest;
Be all, though princes in the earth before,
Her merchants bankrupts, and her marts no more;
Much rather would I, might the will of fate
Give me to choose, see Gotham's ruin'd state
By ills on ills thus to the earth weigh'd down,
Than live to see a Stuart wear a crown.

Let Heav'n in vengeance arm all nature's host,
Those servants who their Maker know, who boast
Obedience as their glory, and fulfil,
Unquestion'd, their great Master's sacred will;
Let raging winds root up the boiling deep,
And, with destruction big, o'er Gotham sweep;
Let rains rush down, till faith with doubtful eye
Looks for the sign of mercy in the sky;
Let pestilence in all her horrors rise;
Where'er I turn, let famine blast my eyes;
Let the earth yawn, and, ere they've time to
In the deep gulf let all my subjects sink [think,

Before my eyes, whilst on the verge I reel;
Feeling, but as a monarch ought to feel,
Not for myself, but them, I'll kiss the rod,
And, having own'd the justice of my God,
Myself, with firmness to the ruin give,
And die with those for whom I wish'd to live.

This (but may Heaven's more merciful decrees Ne'er tempt his servant with such ills as these)
This, or my soul deceives me, I could bear;
But that the Stuart race my crown should wear,
That crown, where, highly cherish'd, freedom shone

Bright as the glories of the mid-day sun;
Born and bred slaves, that they, with proud mis-
rule, [school,
Should make brave, free-born men, like boys at
To the whip crouch and tremble—O, that thought!
The lab'ring brain is e'en to madness brought
By the dread vision; at the mere surmise
The thronging spirits, as in tumult, rise;
My heart, as for a passage, loudly beats,
And, turn me where I will, distraction meets.

O my brave fellows, great in arts and arms,
The wonder of the earth, whom glory warms
To high achievements, can your spirits bend
Through base controul (ye never can descend
So low by choice) to wear a tyrant's chain,
Or let in freedom's seat a Stuart reign?
If fame, who hath for ages far and wide
Spread in all realms the cowardice, the pride,
The tyranny and falsehood of those lords,
Contents you not, search England's fair records;
England, where first the breath of life I drew,
Where next to Gotham my best love is due;
There once they rul'd, though crush'd by William's hand,

They rul'd no more, to curse that happy land.

The first, who, from his native soil remov'd,
Held England's sceptre, a tame tyrant prov'd:
Virtue he lack'd, curs'd with those thoughts which spring

In souls of vulgar stamp to be a king;
Spirit he had not, though he laugh'd at laws,
To play the bold-fac'd tyrant with applause;
On practices most mean he rais'd his pride,
And craft oft gave what wisdom oft denied.

Ne'er could he feel how truly man is blest
In blessing those around him; in his breast,
Crowded with follies, honour found no room;
Mark'd for a coward in his mother's womb,
He was too proud without affronts to live,
Too timorous to punish or forgive.

To gain a crown, which had in course of time,
By fair descent, been his without a crime,
He bore a mother's exile; to secure
A greater crown, he basely could endure
The spilling of her blood by foreign knife,
Nor dar'd revenge her death who gave him life;
Nay, by fond fear and fond ambition led,
Struck hands with those by whom her blood was shed. [throne,

Call'd up to pow'r, scarce warm on England's
He fill'd her court with beggars from his own:
Turn where you would, the eye with Scots was caught,

Or English knaves, who would be Scotsmen thought.

To vain expence unbounded loose he gave,
The dupe of minions, and of slaves the slave;
On false pretences mighty sums he rais'd,
And damn'd those senates rich, whom, poor, he
prais'd:

From empire thrown, and doom'd to beg her bread,
On foreign bounty whilst a daughter * fed,
He lavish'd sums, for her receiv'd, on men
Whose names would fix dishonour on my pen.

Lies were his play-things, parliaments his sport,
Book-worms and catamites engros'd the court:
Vain of the scholar, like all Scotsmen since,
The pedant scholar, he forgot the prince,
And having with some trifles stor'd his brain,
Ne'er learn'd, or wish'd to learn, the arts to reign.
Enough he knew to make him vain and proud,
Mock'd by the wise, the wonder of the crowd;
False friend, false son, false father, and false king,
False wit, false statesmen, and false ev'ry thing,
When he should act, he idly chose to prate,
And pamphlets wrote, when he should save the state.

Religious, if religion holds in whim,
To talk with all, he let all talk with him,
Not on God's honour, but his own intent,
Not for religion's sake, but argument;
More vain, if some sly, artful, High-Dutch slave,
Or, from the Jesuit school, some precious knave
Conviction feign'd, than if, to peace restor'd
By his full soldiership, worlds hail'd him lord.

Pow'r was his wish, unbounded as his will,
The pow'r, without controul, of doing ill.

But what he wish'd, what he made bishops preach,
And statesmen warrant, hung within his reach
He dar'd not seize: Fear gave, to gall his pride,
That freedom to the realm his will denied.

Of treaties fond, o'erweening of his parts,
In ev'ry treaty of his own mean arts
He sell the dupe: Peace was his coward care,
E'en at a time when justice call'd for war:
His pen he'd draw, to prove his lack of wit,
But, rather than unsheath the sword, submit.
Truth fairly must record, and, pleas'd to live
In league with mercy, justice may forgive
Kingdoms betray'd, and worlds resign'd to Spain,
But never can forgive a Raleigh slain.

At length (with white let freedom mark that year)

Not fear'd by those whom most he wish'd to fear,
Not lov'd by those whom most he wish'd to love,
He went to answer for his faults above;
To answer to that God, from whom alone
He claim'd to hold, and to abuse the throne;
Leaving behind, a curse to all his line,
The bloody legacy of right divine.

With many virtues, which a radiance fling
Round private men; with few which grace a king,
And speak the monarch; at the time of life
When passion holds with reason doubtful strife,
Succeeded Charles, by a mean fire undone,
Who envied virtue even in a son.

His youth was froward, turbulent, and wild;
He took the man up ere he left the child;

* The Queen of Bohemia, grandmother of George the First.

His soul was eager for imperial sway,
Ere he had learn'd the lesson to obey.
Surrounded by a fawning, flattering throng,
Judgment each day grew weak, and humour
strong:

Wisdom was treated as a noisome weed,
And all his follies let to run to seed. [spring!

What ills from such beginnings needs must
What ills to such a land from such a king!
What could she hope! what had she not to fear!
Base Buckingham possess'd his youthful ear;
Strafford and Laud, when mounted on the throne,
Engross'd his love, and made him all their own;
Strafford and Laud, who boldly dar'd avow
The trait'rous doctrines taught by Tories now:
Each strove t' undo him, in his turn and hour,
The first with pleasure, and the last with pow'r.

Thinking (vain thought, disgraceful to the throne)!

That all mankind were made for kings alone,
That subjects were but slaves, and what was whim
Or worse in common men, was law in him;
Drunk with prerogative, which fate decreed
To guard good kings, and tyrants to mislead;
Which in a fair proportion, to deny
Allegiance dares not; which to hold too high
No good can wish, no coward king can dare,
And held too high, no English subject bear;
Besieg'd by men of deep and subtle arts,
Men void of principle, and damn'd with parts,
Who saw his weakness, made their king their tool,
Then most a slave, when most he seem'd to rule;
Taking all public steps for private ends,
Deceiv'd by favourites, whom he called friends,
He had not strength enough of soul to find
That monarchs, meant as blessings to mankind,
Sink their great state, and stamp their fame un-
done,

When what was meant for all they give to one;
Lift'ning uxorious, whilst a woman's prate
Modell'd the church, and parcell'd out the state,
Whilst (in the state not more than women read)
High-churchmen preach'd, and turn'd his pious
Tutor'd to see with ministerial eyes; [head;
Forbid to hear a loyal nation's cries;
Made to believe (what can't a fav'rite do)
He heard a nation hearing one or two;
Taught by state-quacks himself secure to think,
And out of danger e'en on danger's brink;
Whilst pow'r was daily crumbling from his hand,
Whilst murmurs ran through an insulted land,
As if to sanction tyrants Heav'n was bound,
He proudly sought the ruin which he found.

Twelve years, twelve tedious and inglorious
years,

Did England, crush'd by pow'r and aw'd by fears,
Whilst proud oppression struck at freedom's root,
Lament her senates lost, her Hampden mute.
Illegal taxes and oppressive loans,
In spite of all her pride, call'd forth her groans;
Patience was heard her griefs aloud to tell,
And loyalty was tempted to rebel.

Each day new acts of outrage shook the state,
New courts were rais'd to give new doctrines
weight;

State-inquisitors kept the realm in awe,
And curs'd chambers made, or rul'd the law;
Juries were ck'd, and judges were unsound;
Through th' whole kingdom not one Pratt was found

From the first moments of his giddy youth
He hated fates, for they told him truth.
At length ainst his will compell'd to treat,
Those who he could not fright, he strove to che,

With base flsembling ev'ry grievance heard,
And, ofegiving, often broke his word.
O where all helpless truth for refuge fly,
If kings, so should protect her, dare to lie?

Those ho, the gen'ral good their real aim,
Sought in their country's good their monarch's
fate;

Those w) were anxious for his safety; those
Who we induc'd by duty to oppose;
Their trah suspected, and their worth unknown,
He held's foes, and traitors to his throne;
Nor found his fatal error till the hour
Of saving him was gone and past; till pow'r
Had shied hands, to blast his hapless reign,
Making their faith and his repentance vain.

Hence (be that curse confin'd to Gotham's foes)
War, dead to mention, civil war arose;
All act of outrage, and all acts of shame,
Stalk'd forth at large, disguis'd with honour's
name;

Rebellion, raising high her bloody hand,
Spread universal havoc through the land;
With zeal for party, and with passion drunk,
In public rage all private love was sunk;
Friend against friend, brother 'gainst brother stood,
And the son's weapon drank the father's blood;
Nature, aghast, and fearful lest her reign
Should last no longer, bled in ev'ry vein.

Unhappy Stuart! harshly though that name
Grates on my ear, I should have died with shame,
To see my king before his subjects stand,
And at their bar hold up his royal hand;
At their commands to hear the monarch plead,
By their decrees to see that monarch bleed.
What though thy faults were many, and were great,

What though they shook the basis of the state,
In royalty secure thy person stood,
And sacred was the fountain of thy blood.
Vile ministers, who dar'd abuse their trust,
Who dar'd seduce a king to be unjust,
Vengeance, with justice leagu'd, with pow'r made
strong,

Had nobly crush'd: The king could do no wrong.

Yet grieve not, Charles, nor thy hard fortunes
blame;

They took thy life, but they secur'd thy fame.
Their greater crimes made thine like specks appear,
From which the sun in glory is not clear.
Had'st thou in peace and years resign'd thy breath
At nature's call; had'st thou laid down in death
As in a sleep; thy name, by justice borne
On the four winds, had been in pieces torn.
Pity, the virtue of a gen'rous soul,
Sometimes the vice, hath made thy mem'ry whole.

Misfortunes gave what virtue could give,
And bade, the tyrant slain, the martyr live.

Ye princes of the earth, ye mighty w,
Who, worlds subduing, can't yourself subdue;
Who, goodness scorn'd, wish only to be great,
Whose breath is blasting, and whose will is fate;
Who own no law, no reason but your ill,
And scorn restraint, though 'tis from our ill;
Who of all passions groan beneath the worst,
Then only blest'd when they make oaths curst;
Think not for wrongs like these unscour'd to live;
Long may ye sin, and long may Heaven forgive:
But, when ye least expect, in sorrow's d,
Vengeance shall fall more heavy for del;
Nor think that vengeance heap'd on you alone:
Shall (poor amends) for injur'd worlds atone:
No; like some base distemper, which remains,
Transmitted from the tainted father's veins,
In the son's blood, such broad and gen'ral crimes
Shall call down vengeance e'en to latest times,
Call vengeance down on all who bear your name,
And make their portion bitterness and shame.

From land to land for years compell'd to roam,
Whilst usurpation lorded it at home,
Of majesty unmindful, forc'd to fly,
Not daring, like a king, to reign or die,
Recall'd to repossess his lawful throne
More at his people's seeking than his own,
Another Charles succeeded. In the school
Of travel he had learn'd to play the fool,
And, like pert pupils with dull tutors sent
To shame their country on the continent,
From love of England by long absence wean'd,
From ev'ry court he ev'ry folly glean'd,
And was, so close do evil habits cling, king.
Till crown'd, a beggar; and when crown'd, no

Those grand and gen'ral pow'rs which Heaven
An instance of his mercy to mankind, [design'd
Were lost, in storms of dissipation hurl'd,
Nor would he give one hour to bless a world;
Lighter than levity which strides the blast,
And of the present fond, forgets the past,
He chang'd and chang'd, but, ev'ry hope to curse,
Chang'd only from one folly to a worse;
State he resign'd to those whom state could please,
Careless of majesty, his wish was ease;
Pleasure, and pleasure only was his aim;
Kings of less wit might hunt the bubble fame;
Dignity through his reign was made a sport,
Nor dar'd decorum show her face at court.
Morality was held a standing jest,
And faith a necessary fraud at best;
Courtiers, their monarch ever in their view,
Possess'd great talents, and abus'd them too:
Whate'er was light, impertinent, and vain,
Whate'er was loose, indecent, and profane,
(So ripe was folly, folly to acquit)
Stood all absolv'd in that poor bauble, wit.

In gratitude, alas! but little read,
He let his father's servants beg their bread,
His father's faithful servants, and his own,
To place the foes of both around his throne.

Bad counsels he embrac'd through indolence,
Through love of ease, and not through want of sense;

He saw them wrong, but rather let them go
As right, than take the pains to make them so.

Women rul'd all, and ministers of state
Were for commands at toilettes forc'd to wait;
Women, who have, as monarchs, grac'd the land,
But never govern'd well at second-hand.

To make all other errors slight appear,
In mem'ry fix'd stand Dunkirk and Tangier;
In mem'ry fix'd so deep, that time in vain
Shall strive to wipe those records from the brain,
Amboyna stands—Gods, that a king should hold
In such high estimate vile paltry gold,
And of his duty be so careless found,
That, when the blood of subjects from the ground
For vengeance call'd, he should reject their cry,
And, brib'd from honour, lay his thunders by,
Give Holland peace, whilst English victims groan'd,
And butcher'd subjects wander'd unatton'd!
O dear, deep injury to England's fame,
To them, to us, to all! to him, deep shame!
Of all the passions which from frailty spring,
Avarice is that which least becomes a king.

To crown the whole, scorning the public good,
Which through his reign he little understood,
Or little heeded, with too narrow aim
He reassum'd a bigot brother's claim;
And, having made time-serving senates bow,
Suddenly died, that brother best knew how.

No matter how—he slept amongst the dead,
And James his brother reigned in his stead.
But such a reign—so glaring an offence
In ev'ry step 'gainst freedom, law, and sense,
'Gainst all the rights of nature's gen'ral plan,
'Gainst all which constitutes an Englishman,
That the relation would mere fiction seem,
The mock creation of a poet's dream,
And the poor bards would in this sceptic age,
Appear as false as their historian's page.

Ambitious folly seiz'd the seat of wit,
Christians were forc'd by bigots to submit;
Pride without sense, without religion zeal,
Made daring inroads on the commonweal;
Stern persecution rais'd her iron rod,
And call'd the pride of kings the power of God;
Conscience and fame were sacrific'd to Rome,
And England wept at freedom's sacred tomb.

Her laws despis'd, her constitution wrench'd
From its due nat'ral frame, her rights retrench'd
Beyond a coward's sufferance, conscience forc'd,
And healing justice from the crown divorc'd,
Each moment pregnant with vile acts of pow'r,
Her patriot bishops sentenc'd to the Tow'r,
Her Oxford (who yet loves the Stuart name)
Branded with arbitrary marks of shame,
She wept—but wept not long; to arms she flew,
At honour's call th' avenging sword she drew,
Turn'd all her terrors on the tyrant's head,
And sent him in despair to beg his bread;
Whilst she (may ev'ry state in such distress
Dare with such zeal, and meet with such success)
Whilst she (may Gotham, should my abject mind
Choose to enslave rather than free mankind,
Pursue her steps, tear the proud tyrant down,
Nor let me wear if I abuse the crown)

Whilst she (through ev'ry age, in ev'ry land,
Written in gold let revolution stand)
Whilst she, secur'd in liberty and law,
Found what she sought, a saviour in Nassau.

BOOK III.

CAN the fond mother from herself depart,
Can she forget the darling of her heart,
The little darling whom she bore and bred,
Nurs'd on her knees, and at her bosom fed?
To whom she seem'd her ev'ry thought to give,
And in whose life alone she seem'd to live?
Yes, from herself the mother may depart,
She may forget the darling of her heart,
The little darling whom she bore and bred,
Nurs'd on her knees, and at her bosom fed,
To whom she seem'd her ev'ry thought to give,
And in whose life alone she seem'd to live;
But I cannot forget, whilst life remains,
And pours her current through these swelling
veins,

Whilst mem'ry offers up at reason's shrine,
But I cannot forget that Gotham's mine.

Can the stern mother, than the brutes more wild,
From her disnatur'd breast tear her young child;
Flesh of her flesh, and of her bone the bone,
And dash the smiling babe against a stone?
Yes, the stern mother, than the brutes more wild,
From her disnatur'd breast may tear her child;
Flesh of her flesh, and of her bone the bone,
And dash the smiling babe against a stone;
But I (forbid it Heav'n), but I can ne'er
The love of Gotham from this bosom tear;
Can ne'er so far true royalty pervert
From its fair course, to do my people hurt.

With how much ease, with how much confidence,

As if, superior to each grosser sense,
Reason had only, in full pow'r array'd,
To manifest her will, and be obey'd,
Men make resolves, and pass into decrees
The motions of the mind! With how much ease
In such resolves doth passion make a flaw,
And bring to nothing what was rais'd to law!

In empire young, scarce warm on Gotham's throne,

The dangers and the sweets of pow'r unknown,
Pleas'd, though I scarce know why, like some young child,

Whose little senses each new toy turns wild,
How do I hold sweet dalliance with my crown,
And wanton with dominion! how lay down,
Without the sanction of a precedent,
Rules of most large and absolute extent;
Rules, which from sense of public virtue spring,
And all at once commence a patriot king.

But, for the day of trial is at hand,
And the whole fortunes of a mighty land
Are stak'd on me, and all their weal or woe
Must from my good or evil conduct flow,
Will I, or can I, on a fair review,
As I assume that name, deserve it too?
Have I well weigh'd the great, the noble part
I'm now to play? Have I explor'd my heart,

That labyrinth fraud, that deep dark cell,
Where, unsuspect e'en by me, may dwell
Ten thousand lies? Have I found out there
What I am fit to do, and what to bear?
Have I trac'd dry passion to its rise,
Nor spar'd onrking seed of treach'rous vice?
Have I famili'd with my nature grown,
And am I faito myself made known?

A patriot k—Why, 'tis a name which bears
The more indiate stamp of heav'n; which wears

The nearest, resemblance we can show
Of God aboveough all his works below

To still the re of discord in the land,
To make weaction's discontented band,
Detected, weand crumbling to decay,
With hunger p'd, on their own vitals prey;
Like brethren he self-same int'rests warm'd,
Like diff'renties with one soul inform'd,
To make a nat nobly rais'd above
All meaner that, grow up in common love;
To give the lawe vigour, and to hold
That sacred bal, temperate, yet bold,
With such an d hand, that those who fear
May yet appround own my justice clear;
To be a commether, to secure
The weak fromence, from pride the poor;
Vice and her so banish in disgrace,
To make corrup dread to show her face;
To bid afflictedae take new state,
And be at last ainted with the great;
Of all religions test the best,
Nor let her prier made a standing jest;
Rewards for worth lib'ral hand to carve,
To love the arts, let the artists starve;
To make fair ple through the realm increase,
Give same in wad happiness in peace;
To see my peopleuous, great and free,
And know that those blessings flow from me;

O 'tis a joy too exte, a thought
Which flatters na more than flatt'ry ought;
'Tis a great, glorisk, for man too hard,
But not less great, glorious the reward,
The best reward v here to man is giv'n,
'Tis more than eatud little short of heav'n;
A task (if such corson may be)
The same in natur' ring in degree,
Like that which Gn whom for aid I call,
Performs with ease yet performs to all.

How much do thistake, how little know
Of kings, of kingdnd the pains which flow
From royalty, who that a crown,
Because it glistens, be lin'd with down!
With outside show ain appearance caught,
They look no farther, by folly taught,
Prize high the toysrones, but never find
One of the many cahich lurk behind.
The gem they wor which a crown adorns,
Nor once suspect thwn is lin'd with thorns.
O might reflection place supply,
Would we one monse her piercing eye,
Then should we kn that woe from grandeur
springs,
And learn to pity, envy kings.

The villager, born humbly abred hard,
Content his wealth, and poverty's guard,
In action simply just, in conscience clear,
By guilt untainted, undisturb'd fear,
His means but scanty, and his wits but few,
Labour his business and his pleasure too,
Enjoys more comforts in a singour,
Than ages give the wretch confin'd to pow'r.

Call'd up by health, he rises in the day,
And goes to work as if he were at play,
Whistling off toils, one half of which might make
The stoutest Atlas of a palace cease;
'Gainst heat and cold, which make cowards faint,
Harden'd by constant use, with complaint
He bears what we should think death to bear;
Short are his meals, and home his fare;
His thirst he slakes at some neighbour's ring
brook,

Nor asks for sauce where apples stand to cook.
When the dews fall, and when the sun retires
Behind the mountains, when village fires,
Which, waken'd all at once, at supper night,
At distance catch and fix his single eye,
Homeward he hies, and with manly brood
Of raw-bon'd cubs enjoys the same, coarse food,
Which, season'd with good humour, his fond bride
'Gainst his return is happy to divide; [creeps
Then, free from care, and from thought, he
Into his straw, and 'till the morning sleeps.

Not so the king—With anxious cares oppress'd,
His bosom labours, and admits no rest.
A glorious wretch, he sweats beneath the weight
Of majesty, and gives up ear and state.
Even when his smiles, which the fools of pride,
Are treasure'd and preserv'd on side to side,
Fly round the court, even when compell'd by form,
He seems most calm, his face in a storm!
Care, like a spectre, seen but alone,
With all her nest of vipers and his throne
By day crawls full in view; at night bids sleep,
Sweet nurse of nature, o'er his senses creep,
When misery herself no more complains,
And slaves, if possible, for their chains,
Though his sense weaker, though his eyes grow dim,

That rest which comes to him comes not to him.
Even at that hour, care, that care forbids
The dew of sleep to fall on his lids;
From night to night sheches at his bed;
Now, as one mop'd, sits ling'ring o'er his head;
Anon she starts, and, on raven's wings,
Croaks forth aloud—"I was not made for kings." [ball,

Thrice hath the moon govern'd this vast
Who rules most absolute me, and all;
To whom by full consent taught to bow,
At new, at full, I pay devout vow;
Thrice hath the moon wonted course pursu'd,
Thrice hath she lost him, and thrice renew'd,
Since (blessed be that I, for before
I was a mere, mere man and no more,
One of the herd, a lump of common clay,
Inform'd with life to be and pass away)
Since I became a king Gotham's throne,
With full and ample, became my own;

Thrice hath the moon her wonted course pursu'd,
Thrice hath she lost her form, and thrice renew'd,
Since sleep, kind sleep, who like a friend supplies
New vigour for new toil, hath clos'd these eyes.
Nor, if my toils are answer'd with success,
And I am made an instrument to bless
The people whom I love, shall I repine;
Theirs be the benefit, the labour mine.

Mindful of that high rank in which I stand,
Of millions lord, sole ruler in the land,
Let me, and reason shall her aid afford,
Rule my own spirit, of myself be lord.
With an ill grace that monarch wears his crown,
Who, stern and hard of nature, wears a frown
'Gainst faults in other men, yet all the while
Meets his own vices with a partial smile.
How can a king (yet on record we find
Such kings have been, such curses of mankind)
Enforce that law 'gainst some poor subject elf,
Which conscience tells him he hath broke himself?
Can he some petty rogue to justice call
For robbing one, when he himself robs all?
Must not, unless extinguish'd, conscience fly
Into his cheek, and blast his fading eye,
To scourge the oppressor, when the state, distress'd
And sunk to ruin, is by him oppress'd?
Against himself doth he not sentence give?
If one must die, 't' other's not fit to live.

Weak is that throne, and in itself unsound,
Which takes not solid virtue for its ground;
All envy power in others, and complain
Of that which they would perish to obtain.
Nor can those spirits, turbulent and bold,
Not to be aw'd by threats, nor bought with gold,
Be hush'd to peace, but when fair legal sway
Makes it their real interest to obey;
When kings, and none but fools can then rebel,
Not less in virtue than in power excel.

Be that my object, that my constant care,
And may my soul's best wishes centre there.
Be it my task to seek, nor seek in vain,
Not only how to live, but how to reign;
And, to those virtues which from reason spring,
And grace the man, join those which grace the king.

First (for strict duty bids my care extend
And reach to all, who on that care depend,
Bids me with servants keep a steady hand,
And watch o'er all my proxies in the land)
First (and that method reason shall support)
Before I look into, and purge my court,
Before I cleanse the stable of the state,
Let me fix things which to myself relate.
That done, and all accounts well settled here,
In resolution firm, in honour clear,
Tremble, ye slaves, who dare abuse your trust,
Who dare be villains, when your king is just
Are there, amongst those officers of state
To whom our sacred power we delegate,
Who hold our place and office in the realm,
Who, in our name commission'd, guide the helm;
Are there, who, trusting to our love of ease,
Oppress our subjects, wrest our just decrees,
And make the laws, warp'd from their fair intent,
To speak a language which they never meant;

Are there such men, and can the fools depend
On holding out in safety to their end?
Can they so much, from thoughts of danger free,
Deceive themselves, so much misdeem of me,
To think that I will prove a statesman's tool,
And live a stranger where I ought to rule?
What, to myself and to my state unjust,
Shall I from ministers take things on trust,
And, sinking low the credit of my throne,
Depend upon dependants of my own?
Shall I, most certain source of future cares,
Not use my judgment, but depend on theirs?
Shall I, true puppet-like, be mock'd with state,
Have nothing but the name of being great;
Attend at councils which I must not weigh;
Do what they bid; and what they dictate say;
Enrob'd, and hoisted up into my chair,
Only to be a royal cypher there?
Perish the thought—'tis treason to my throne—
And who but thinks it, could his thoughts be known,

Insults me more, than he, who, leagu'd with hell,
Shall rise in arms, and 'gainst my crown rebel.

The wicked statesman, whose false heart pursues
A train of guilt; who acts with double views,
And wears a double face; whose base designs
Strike at his monarch's throne; who undermines
E'en whilst he seems his wishes to support;
Who seizes all departments, packs a court,
Maintains an agent on the judgment-seat
To screen his crimes, and make his frauds complete;

New-models armies, and around the throne
Will suffer none but creatures of his own;
Conscious of such his baseness, well may try,
Against the light to shut his master's eye,
To keep him coop'd, and far remov'd from those,
Who, brave and honest, dare his crimes disclose,
Nor ever let him in one place appear,
Where truth, unwelcome truth, may wound his ear.

Attempts like these, well weigh'd, themselves proclaim,

And, whilst they publish, baulk their author's aim,
Kings must be blind, into such snares to run;
Or worse, with open eyes must be undone.

The minister of honesty and worth
Demands the day to bring his actions forth;
Calls on the sun to shine with fiercer rays,
And braves that trial which must end in praise.
None fly the day, and seek the shades of night,
But those whose actions cannot bear the light;
None wish their king in ignorance to hold,
But those who feel that knowledge must unfold
Their hidden guilt, and that dark mist dispell'd
By which their places and their lives are held,
Confusion wait them, and by justice led,
In vengeance fall on ev'ry traitor's head.

Aware of this, and caution'd 'gainst the pit
Where kings have oft been lost, shall I submit,
And rust in chains like those? Shall I give way,
And whilst my helpless subjects fall a prey
To pow'r abus'd, in ignorance sit down,
Nor dare assert the honour of my crown?
When stern rebellion (if that odious name
Justly belongs to those, whose only aim

Is to preserve their country; who oppose,
In honour leagu'd, none but their country's foes;
Who only seek their own, and found their cause
In due regard for violated laws)
When stern rebellion, who no longer feels
Nor fears rebuke, a nation at her heels,
A nation up in arms, though strong not proud,
Knocks at the palace-gate, and, calling loud
For due redress, presents, from truth's fair pen,
A list of wrongs, not to be borne by men;
How must that king be humbled, how disgrace
All that is royal in his name and place,
Who, thus call'd forth to answer, can advance
No other plea but that of ignorance!
A vile defence, which was his all at stake,
The meanest subject well might blush to make;
A filthy source, from whence shame ever springs;
A stain to all, but most a stain to kings.
The soul, with great and manly feelings warm'd,
Panting for knowledge, rests not till inform'd:
And shall not I, fir'd with the glorious zeal,
Feel those brave passions which my subjects feel?
Or can a just excuse from ignorance flow
To me, whose first, great duty is—To know?

Hence ignorance—thy settled, dull, blank eye
Would hurt me, though I knew no reason why—
Hence ignorance—thy slavish shackles bind
The free-born soul, and lethargy the mind—
Of thee, begot by pride, who look'd with scorn
On ev'ry meaner match, of thee was born
That grave inflexibility of soul,
Which reason can't convince, nor fear controul;
Which neither arguments nor pray'rs can reach,
And nothing less than utter ruin teach—
Hence ignorance—hence to that depth of night
Where thou wast born, where not one gleam of light

May wound thine eye—hence to some dreary cell,
Where monks with superstition love to dwell;
Or in some college sooth thy lazy pride,
And with the heads of colleges reside;
Fit mate for royalty thou can'st not be;
And if no mate for kings, no mate for me.
Come study, like a torrent swell'd with rains,
Which, rushing down the mountains, o'er the plains
Spreads horror wide, and yet, in horror kind,
Leaves seeds of future fruitfulness behind;
Come study—painful though thy course and flow,
Thy real worth by thy effects we know—
Parent of knowledge, come!—Not thee I call,
Who, grave and dull, in college or in hall
Dost sit, all solemn sad, and moping weigh Things, which when found, thy labours can't repay—

Nor, in one hand, fit emblem of thy trade,
A rod; in t' other, gaudily array'd
A bornbook, gilt and letter'd; call I thee,
Who dost in form preside o'er A B C—:
Nor (siren though thou art, and thy strange
charms,
As 'twere by magic, lure men to thy arms)
Do I call thee, who through a winding maze,
A labyrinth of puzzling, pleasing ways,
Dost lead us at the last to those rich plains,
Where, in full glory, real science reigns:

Fair though thou art, and lovely to mine eye,
 Though full rewards in thy possession lie
 To crown man's wish, and do thy fav'rites grace,
 Though (was I station'd in an humbler place)
 I could be ever happy in thy sight,
 Toil with thee all the day, and through the night
 Toil on from watch to watch, bidding my eye,
 Fast rivetted on science, sleep defy;
 Yet (such the hardships which from empire flow)
 Must I thy sweet society forego,
 And to some happy rival's arms resign
 Those charms, which can, alas! no more be mine.

No more, from hour to hour, from day to day,
 Shall I pursue thy steps, and urge my way
 Where eager love of science calls; no more
 Attempt those paths which man ne'er trod before.
 No more the mountain scal'd, the desert crost,
 Losing myself, nor knowing I was lost,
 Travel through woods, through wilds, from morn
 to night,

From night to morn, yet travel with delight,
 And having found thee, lay me down content,
 Own all my toil well paid, my time well spent.

Farewell ye muses too—for such mean things
 Must not presume to dwell with mighty kings—
 Farewell ye muses—though it cuts my heart
 E'en to the quick, we must for ever part.

When the fresh morn bade lusty nature wake;
 When the birds, sweetly twitt'ring through the brake,

Tun'd their soft pipes; when from the neighb'ring
 bloom,

Sipping the dew, each zephyr stole perfume;
 When all things with new vigour were inspir'd,
 And seem'd to say they never could be tir'd;
 How often have we stray'd, whilst sportive rhyme
 Deceiv'd the way, and clipp'd the wings of time,
 O'er hill, o'er dale! how often laugh'd to see,
 Yourself made visible to none but me,
 The clown, his work suspended, gape and stare,
 And seem'd to think that I convers'd with air!

When the sun, beating on the parched soil,
 Seem'd to proclaim an interval of toil;
 When a faint languor crept through ev'ry breast,
 And things most us'd to labour, wish'd for rest;
 How often, underneath a rev'rend oak,
 Where safe, and fearless of the impious stroke,
 Some sacred dryad liv'd, or in some grove,
 Where with capricious fingers fancy wove
 Her fairy bow'r, whilst nature all the while
 Look'd on, and view'd her mock'ries with a smile,
 Have we held converse sweet! how often laid,
 Fast by the Thames, in Ham's inspiring shade,
 Amongst those poets which make up your train,
 And, after death, pour forth the sacred strain,
 Have I, at your command, in verse grown gray,
 But not impair'd, heard Dryden tune that lay,
 Which might have drawn an angel from his sphere,
 And kept him from his office list'ning here.

When dreary night, with Morpheus in her train,
 Led on by silence to resume her reign,
 With darkness covering as with a robe,
 This scene of levity, blank'd half the globe;
 How oft enchanted with your heav'nly strains,
 Which stole me from myself, which in soft chains

Of music bound my soul, how oft have I,
 Sounds more than human floating through the sky,
 Attentive sat, whilst night, against her will,
 Transported with the harmony, stood still!
 How oft in raptures, which man scarce could bear,
 Have I, when gone, still thought the muses there;
 Still heard their music, and, as mute as death,
 Sat all attention, drew in ev'ry breath,
 Left, breathing all too rudely, I should wound,
 And mar that magic excellence of sound;
 Then, sense returning with return of day,
 Have chid the night, which fled so fast away.

Such my pursuits, and such my joys of yore,
 Such were my mates, but now my mates no more.
 Plac'd out of envy's walk (for envy sure
 Would never haunt the cottage of the poor,
 Would never stoop to wound my homespun lays)
 With some few friends, and some small share of praise,

Beneath oppression, undisturb'd by strife,
 In peace I trod the humble vale of life,
 Farewell these scenes of ease, this tranquil state;
 Welcome the troubles which on empire wait.

Light toys from this day forth I disavow,
 They pleas'd me once, but cannot suit me now;
 To common men all common things are free,
 What honours then might fix disgrace on me.
 Call'd to a throne, and o'er a mighty land
 Ordain'd to rule, my head, my heart, my hand
 Are all engross'd, each private view withstood,
 And task'd to labour for the public good;
 Be this my study, to this one great end
 May ev'ry thought, may ev'ry action tend.

Let me the page of history turn o'er,
 Th' instructive page, and heedfully explore
 What faithful pens of former times have wrote
 Of former kings; what they did worthy note,
 What worthy blame; and from the sacred tomb
 Where righteous monarchs sleep, where laurels
 Unhurt by time, let me a garland twine, [bloom
 Which, robbing not their fame, may add to mine.

Nor let me with a vain and idle eye
 Glance o'er those scenes, and in a hurry fly
 Quick as a post which travels day and night;
 Nor let me dwell there, lur'd by false delight,
 And, into barren theory betray'd,
 Forget that monarchs are for action made.
 When am'rous spring, repairing all his charms,
 Calls nature forth from hoary winter's arms,
 Where, like a virgin to some lecher sold,
 Three wretched months she lay benumb'd, and cold; [breath

When the weak flow'r, which, shrinking from the
 Of the rude north, and timorous of death,
 To its kind mother earth for shelter fled,
 And on her bosom hid its tender head,
 Peeps forth afresh, and, cheer'd by milder skies,
 Bids in full splendour all her beauties rise;
 The hive is up in arms—expert to teach,
 Nor, proudly, to be taught unwilling, each
 Seems from her fellow a new zeal to catch:
 Strength in her limbs, and on her wings dispatch,
 The bee goes forth; from herb to herb she flies,
 From flow'r to flow'r, and loads her lab'ring thighs

With treasur'd sweets; robbing those flow'rs,
which left,

Find not themselves made poorer by the theft,
Their scents as lively, and their looks as fair,
As if the pillager had not been there.
Ne'er doth she flit on pleasure's filken wing,
Ne'er doth she, loit'ring, let the bloom of spring
Unrisked pass, and on the downy breast
Of some fair flow'r indulge untimely rest.
Ne'er doth she, drinking deep of those rich dews
Which chemist night prepar'd, that faith abuse
Due to the hive, and, selfish in her toils,
To her own private use convert the spoils.
Love of the stock first call'd her forth to roam,
And to the stock she brings her booty home.

Be this my pattern—As becomes a king,
Let me fly all abroad on reason's wing;
Let mine eye, like the lightning, through the earth
Run to and fro, nor let one deed of worth,
In any place and time, nor let one man
Whose actions may enrich dominion's plan,
Escape my note: be all, from the first day
Of nature to this hour, be all my prey.
From those, whom time at the desire of fame
Hath spar'd, let virtue catch an equal flame;
From those, who not in mercy, but in rage,
Time hath repriev'd to damn from age to age,
Let me take warning, lesson'd to distill,
And, imitating Heav'n, draw good from ill.
Nor let these great researches in my breast
A monument of useless labour rest;
No—let them spread—th' effects let Gotham share,
And reap the harvest of their monarch's care:
Be other times and other countries known,
Only to give fresh blessings to my own.

Let me (and may that God to whom I fly,
On whom for needful succour I rely
In this great hour, that glorious God of truth!
Through whom I reign, in mercy to my youth
Assist my weakness, and direct me right;
From ev'ry speck which hangs upon the sight
Purge my mind's eye, nor let one cloud remain
To spread the shades of error o'er my brain)
Let me, impartial, with unwearied thought
Try men and things; let me, as monarchs ought,
Examine well on what my pow'r depends;
What are the gen'ral principles and ends
Of government; how empire first began;
And wherefore man was rais'd to reign o'er man.

Let me consider, as from one great source
We see a thousand rivers take their course,
Dispers'd, and into diff'rent channels led,
Yet by their parent still supply'd and fed, [wide,
That government (though branch'd out far and
In various modes to various lands apply'd),
Howe'er it differs in its outward frame,
In the main groundwork's ev'ry where the same;
The same her view though different her plan,
Her grand and gen'ral view the good of man.

Let me find out, by reason's sacred beams,
What system in itself most perfect seems,
Most worthy man, most likely to conduce
To all the purposes of gen'ral use:
Let me find, too, where, by fair reason try'd,
It fails when to particulars apply'd;

VOL. X.

Why in that mode all nations do not join,
And, chiefly, why it cannot suit with mine.

Let me the gradual rise of empires trace,
Till they seem founded on perfection's base;
Then (for when human things have made their
To excellence they hasten to decay) [way
Let me, whilst observation lends her clue,
Step by step to their quick decline pursue,
Enabled by a chain of facts to tell,
Not only how they rose, but how they fell.

Let me not only the distempers know
Which in all states from common causes grow,
But likewise those which, by the will of fate,
On each peculiar mode of empire wait;
Which in its various constitution lurk,
Too sure at last to do its destin'd work:
Let me, forwarn'd, each sign, each system, learn,
That I my people's danger may discern,
Ere 'tis too late wish'd health to reassure,
And, if it can be found, find out a cure.

Let me (though great grave brethren of the gown

Preach all faith up, and preach all reason down,
Making those jar whom reason meant to join,
And vesting in themselves a right divine)
Let me through reason's glass, with searching eye,
Into the depth of that religion pry
Which law hath sanction'd; let me find out there
What's form, what's essence; what, like vagrant
air,

We well may change; and what, without a crime,
Cannot be chang'd to the last hour of time;
Nor let me suffer that outrageous zeal
Which, without knowledge furious bigots feel,
Fair in pretence, though at the heart unsound,
These sep'rate points at random to confound.

The times have been when priests have dar'd
to tread,

Proud and insulting, on their monarch's head;
When whilst they made religion a pretence,
Out of the world they banish'd common sense;
When some soft king, too open to deceit,
Easy and unsuspecting join'd the cheat,
Dup'd by mock piety, and gave his name
To serve the vilest purposes of shame.
Fear not, my people! where no cause of fear
Can justly rise—your king secures you here;
Your king, who scorns the haughty prelate's nod,
Nor deems the voice of priests the voice of God.

Let me (though lawyers may perhaps forbid
Their monarch to behold what they wish hid,
And for the purposes of knavish gain,
Would have their trade a mystery remain)
Let me, disdaining all such slavish awe,
Dive to the very bottom of the law;
Let me (the weak dead letter left behind)
Search out the principles, the spirit find,
Till from the parts made master of the whole,
I see the constitution's very soul.
Let me (though statemen will no doubt resist,
And to my eyes present a fearful list
Of men whose wills are opposite to mine,
Of men, great men! determin'd to resign),
Let me (with firmness, which becomes a king,
Conscious from what a source my actions spring,

M m

Determin'd not by worlds to be withstood,
 When my grand object is my country's good)
 Unravel all low ministerial scenes,
 Destroy their jobs, lay bare their ways and means,
 And trap them step by step; let me well know
 How places, pensions, and preferments, go;
 Why guilt's provided for when worth is not,
 And why one man of merit is forgot;
 Let me in peace, in war, supreme preside,
 And dare to know my way without a guide.

Let me (though dignity, by nature proud,
 Retires from view, and swells behind a cloud,
 As if the sun shone with less pow'rful ray,
 Less grace, less glory, shining ev'ry day,
 Though when she comes forth into public sight,
 Unbending as a ghost she stalks upright,
 With such an air as we have often seen,
 And often laugh'd at in a tragic queen,
 Nor at her presence, though base myriads crook
 The supple knee, vouchsafes a single look),
 Let me (all vain parade, all empty pride,
 All terrors of dominion laid aside,
 All ornament, and needless helps of art,
 All those big looks which speak a little heart)
 Know (which few kings, alas! have ever known)
 How affability becomes a throne,
 Destroys all fear, bids love with rev'rence live,
 And gives those graces pride can never give.
 Let the stern tyrant keep a distant state,
 And, hating all men, fear return of hate,
 Conscious of guilt, retreat behind his throne,
 Secure from all upbraidings but his own:
 Let all my subjects have access to me,
 Be my ears open as my heart is free;
 In full fair tide let information flow;
 That evil is half cur'd whose cause we know.

And thou, where'er thou art, thou wretched thing!

Who art afraid to look up to a king,
 Lay by thy fears—make but thy grievance plain,
 And, if I not redress thee, may my reign
 Close up that very moment—To prevent
 The course of justice from her fair intent,
 In vain my nearest, dearest friend shall plead,
 In vain my mother kneel—my soul may bleed,
 But must not change—When justice draws the dart,

Though it is doom'd to pierce a favourite's heart,
 'Tis mine to give it force, to give it aim—
 I know it duty, and I feel it same.

THE CANDIDATE.

ENOUGH of actors—let them play the play'r,
 And, free from censure, fret, sweat, strut, and stare.

Garrick abroad, what motives can engage
 To waste one couplet on a barren stage?
 Ungrateful Garrick! when these tasty days,
 In justice to themselves, allow'd thee praise;
 When, at thy bidding, sense for twenty years,
 Indulg'd in laughter, or dissolv'd in tears;
 When, in return for labour, time, and health,
 The town had giv'n some little share of wealth,

Could'st thou repine at being still a slave?
 Dar'st thou presume t' enjoy that wealth she gave?
 Could'st thou repine at laws ordain'd by those,
 Whom nothing but thy merit made thy foes;
 Whom, too refin'd for honesty and trade,
 By need made tradesmen, pride had bankrupts
 made;
 Whom fear made drunkards, and by modern rules,
 Whom drink made wits, though nature made them fools;
 With such, beyond all pardon is thy crime,
 In such a manner, and at such a time,
 To quit the stage; but men of real sense,
 Who neither lightly give nor take offence,
 Shall own thee clear, or pass an act of grace,
 Since thou hast left a Powell in thy place.

Enough of authors—Why, when scribblers fail,
 Must other scribblers spread the hateful tale?
 Why must they pity, why contempt express,
 And why insult a brother in distress?
 Let those, who boast th' uncommon gift of brains,
 The laurel pluck, and wear it for their pains;
 Fresh on their brows for ages let it bloom,
 And, ages past, still flourish round their tomb.
 Let those, who without genius write, and write,
 Versemen or prosemen, all in nature's spite,
 The pen laid down, their course of folly run
 In peace, unread, unmention'd, be undone.
 Why should I tell, to cross the will of fate,
 That Francis * once endeavour'd to translate?
 Why, sweet oblivion winding round his head,
 Should I recal poor Murphy from the dead?
 Why may not Langhorne, simple in his lay,
 Effusion on effusion pour away †;
 With friendship and with fancy trifle here,
 Or sleep in pastoral at Belvedere ‡?
 Sleep let them all, with dullness on her throne,
 Secure from any malice but their own.

Enough of critics—let them, if they please,
 Fond of new pomp, each month pass new decrees;
 Wide and extensive be their infant state,
 Their subjects many, and those subjects great,
 Whilst all their mandates as sound law succeed,
 With fools who write, and greater fools who read.
 What though they lay the realms of genius waste,
 Fetter the fancy, and debauch the taste;
 Though they, like doctors, to approve their skill,
 Consult not how to cure, but how to kill;
 Though by whim, envy, or resentment led,
 They damn those authors whom they never read;
 Though, other rules unknown, one rule they hold,
 To deal out so much praise for so much gold;
 Though Scot with Scot, in damned close intrigues,
 Against the commonwealth of letters leagues;
 Uncensur'd let them pilot at the helm,
 And rule in letters, as they rul'd the realm.
 Ours be the curse, the mean tame coward's curse,
 (Nor could ingenious malice make a worse,

* Dr. Philip Francis, the translator of Horace and Demosthenes.

† See the Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, by Langhorne, 2 vols. 12mo. 1763.

‡ See the Enlargement of the Mind, Langhorne's Poems.

To do our sense and honour deep despite)
To credit what they say, read what they write.

Enough of Scotland—let her rest in peace,
The cause remov'd, effects of course should cease.
Why should I tell, how Tweed, too mighty grown,
And proudly swell'd with waters not his own,
Burst o'er his banks, and by destruction led,
O'er our faint England desolation spread,
Whilst riding on his waves, ambition plum'd
In tenfold pride, the port of Bute assum'd,
Now that the river god, convinc'd, though late,
And yielding, though reluctantly, to fate,
Holds his fair course, and with more humble tides,
In tribute to the sea, as usual, glides.

Enough of states, and such like trifling things;
Enough of kinglings, and enough of kings;
Henceforth, secure, let ambush'd statesmen lie,
Spread the court web, and catch the patriot fly;
Henceforth, unwhipt of justice, uncontroul'd
By fear or shame, let vice, secure and bold,
Lord it with all her sons, whilst virtue's groan
Meets with compassion only from the throne.

Enough of patriots—all I ask of man,
Is only to be honest as he can.
Some have deceiv'd, and some may still deceive;
'Tis the fool's curse at random to believe.

Would those, who, by opinion plac'd on high,
Stand fair and perfect in their country's eye,
Maintain that honour, let me in their ear
Hint this essential doctrine—persevere.
Should they (which Heav'n forbid) to win the grace
Of some proud courtier, or to gain a place,
Their king and country sell, with endless shame
Th' avenging muse shall mark each traitorous
name;

But if, to honour true, they scorn to bend,
And, proudly honest, hold out to the end,
Their grateful country shall their fame record,
And I myself descend to praise a lord.

Enough of Wilkes—with good and honest men
His actions speak much stronger than my pen,
And future ages shall his name adore,
When he can act, and I can write no more.
England may prove ungrateful, and unjust,
But soft'ring France shall ne'er betray her trust;
'Tis a brave debt which gods on men impose,
To pay with praise the merit e'en of foes.
When the great warrior of Amilcar's race
Made Rome's wide empire tremble to her base,
To prove her virtue, though it gall'd her pride,
Rome gave that fame which Carthage had deny'd.

Enough of self—that darling luscious theme,
O'er which philosophers in raptures dream;
Of which with seeming disregard they write,
Then prizing most, when most they seem to flight;
Vain proof of folly tinctur'd strong with pride!
What man can from himself himself divide?
For me (nor dare I lie), my leading aim
(Conscience first satisfied) is love of fame,
Some little fame deriv'd from some brave few,
Who prizing honour, prize her vot'ries too.
Let all (nor shall resentment flush my cheek)
Who know me well, what they know, freely
Say those (the greatest curse I meet below) [speak,
Who know me not, may not pretend to know.

Let none of those, whom blest'd with parts above
My feeble genius, still I dare to love,
Doing more mischief than a thousand foes,
Posthumous nonsense to the world expose,
And call it mine, for mine though never known,
Or which, if mine, I living blush'd to own.
Know all the world, no greedy heir shall find,
Die when I will, one couplet left behind.

Let none of those, whom I despise though great,
Pretending friendship to give malice weight,
Publish my life; let no false, sneaking peer,
(Some such there are) to win the public ear,
Hand me to shame with some vile anecdote,
Nor foul-gall'd bishop damn me with a note.
Let one poor sprig of bay around my head
Bloom whilst I live, and point me out when dead;
Let it (may Heav'n indulgent grant that pray'r)
Be planted on my grave, nor wither there;
And when, on travel bound, some rhyming guest
Roams through the church-yard whilst his din-
ner's dress'd,

Let it hold up this comment to his eyes:
"Life to the last enjoy'd, here Churchill lies;"
Whilst (O, what joy that pleasing flatt'ry gives) Reading my works, he cries—"Here Churchill lives."

Enough of satire—in less harden'd times
Great was her force, and mighty were her rhymes.
I've read of men, beyond man's daring brave,
Who yet have trembled at the strokes she gave,
Whose souls have felt more terrible alarms
From her one line, than from a world in arms.
When, in her faithful and immortal page,
They saw transmitted down from age to age
Recorded villains, and each spotted name
Branded with marks of everlasting shame,
Succeeding villains fought her as a friend,
And, if not really mended, feign'd to mend.
But in an age, when actions are allow'd
Which strike all honour dead, and crimes avow'd,
Too terrible to suffer the report,
Avow'd and prais'd by men who stain a court;
Propp'd by the arm of pow'r, when vice, high-
born,

High-bred, high-station'd, holds rebuke in scorn;
When she is lost to ev'ry thought of fame,
And, to all virtue dead, is dead to shame;
When prudence a much easier task must hold
To make a new world, than reform the old;
Satire throws by her arrows on the ground,
And if she cannot cure, she will not wound.

Come, panegyric—though the muse disdains,
Founded on truth, to prostitute her strains
At the base instance of those men, who hold
No argument but pow'r, no god but gold;
Yet, mindful that from heav'n she drew her birth,
She scorns the narrow maxims of this earth,
Virtuous herself, brings virtue forth to view,
And loves to praise, where praise is justly due.

Come, panegyric—in a former hour,
My soul with pleasure yielding to thy pow'r,
Thy shrine I sought, I pray'd—but wanton air,
Before it reach'd thy ears, dispers'd my pray'r;
E'en at thy altars whilst I took my stand,
The pen of truth and honour in my hand,

Fate, meditating wrath 'gainst me and mine,
Chid my fond zeal, and thwarted my design,
Whilst, Hayter * brought too quickly to his end,
I lost a subject, and mankind a friend.

Come panegyric—bending at thy throne,
Thee and thy pow'r my soul is proud to own.
Be thou my kind protector, thou my guide,
And lead me safe through passes yet untry'd.
Broad is the road, nor difficult to find,
Which to the house of satire leads mankind;
Narrow and unfrequented are the ways,
Scarce found out in an age, which lead to praise.

What though no theme I choose of vulgar note,
Nor wish to write as brother-bards have wrote,
So mild, so meek in praising, that they seem
Afraid to wake their patrons from a dream;
What though a theme I choose, which might demand

The nicest touches of a master's hand;
Yet, if the inward workings of my soul
Deceive me not, I shall attain the goal,
And envy shall behold, in triumph rais'd,
The poet praising, and the patron prais'd.

What patron shall I choose? Shall public voice
Or private knowledge influence my choice?
Shall I prefer the grand retreat of Stowe,
Or, seeking patriots, to friend Wildman's † go?

To Wildman's! cry'd discretion, (who had heard,
Close-standing at my elbow, ev'ry word) [sure
To Wildman's! Art thou mad? Can'st thou be
One moment there to have thy head secure?
Are they not all (let observation tell)
All mark'd in characters as black as hell,
In Doomsday book by ministers set down,
Who style their pride the honour of the crown?
Make no reply—let reason stand aloof—
Presumptions here must pass as solemn proof.
That settled faith, that love which ever springs
In the best subjects for the best of kings,
Must not be measur'd now, by what men think,
Or say, or do—by what they eat, and drink;
Where and with whom, that question's to be try'd,
And statesmen are the judges to decide;
No juries call'd, or, if call'd, kept in awe,
They, facts confess, in themselves vest the law.
Each dish at Wildman's of sedition smacks;
Blasphemy may be gospel at Almack's. [vain;

Peace, good discretion, peace—thy fears are
Ne'er will I herd with Wildman's factious train,
Never the vengeance of the great incur,
Nor, without might, against the mighty stir.
If, from long proof, my temper you distrust,
Weigh my profession, to my gown be just;
Dost thou one parson know so void of grace
To pay his court to patrons out of place? [mains]

If still you doubt (though scarce a doubt re-
Search through my alter'd heart, and try my reins;
There, searching, find, nor deem me now in sport,
A convert made by Sandwich to the court.

* Dr. Thomas Hayter, Bishop of London. He died January 9. 1762.

† Master of the tavern where the then opposers of administration used to meet.

Let madmen follow error to the end,
I, of mistakes convinc'd, and proud to mend,
Strive to act better, being better taught,
Nor blush to own that change, which reason wrought.

For such a change as this, must justice speak;
My heart was honest, but my head was weak.

Bigot to no one man, or set of men,
Without one selfish view, I drew my pen;
My country ask'd, or seem'd to ask my aid,
Obedient to that call, I left off trade;
A side I chose, and on that side was strong,
'Till time hath fairly prov'd me in the wrong;
Convinc'd, I change (can any man do more?
And have not greater patriots chang'd before?)
Chang'd, I at once (can any man do less!)
Without a single blush, that change confess;
Confess it with a manly kind of pride,
And quit the losing for the winning side;
Granting, whilst virtuous Sandwich holds the rein,
What Bute for ages might have fought in vain.

Hail, Sandwich—nor shall Wilkes resentment show,

Hearing the praises of so brave a foe— [refuse
Hail, Sandwich—nor, through pride, shalt thou
The grateful tribute of so mean a muse—
Sandwich, all hail—when Bute with foreign hand,
Grown wanton with ambition, scourg'd the land,
When Scots, or slaves to Scotsmen, steer'd the helm,
When peace, inglorious peace, disgrac'd the realm,
Distrust, and gen'ral discontent prevail'd;
But when (he best knows why) his spirits fail'd;
When, with a sudden panic struck, he fled,
Sneak'd out of pow'r, and hid his recreant head;
When, like a Mars (fear order'd to retreat)
We saw thee nimbly vault into his seat,
Into the seat of pow'r, at one bold leap,
A perfect connoisseur in statemanship;
When, like another Machiavel, we saw
Thy fingers twisting and untwisting law,
Straining, where godlike reason bade, and where
She warranted thy mercy, pleas'd to spare;
Saw thee resolv'd, and fix'd (come what, come might)

To do thy God, thy king, thy country right;
All things were chang'd, suspense remain'd no more,

Certainty reign'd where doubt had reign'd before.
All felt thy virtues, and all knew their use,
What virtues such as thine must needs produce.

Thy foes (for honour ever meets with foes)
Too mean to praise, too fearful to oppose,
In fullen silence sit; thy friends (some few,
Who, friends to thee, are friends to honour too)
Plaud thy brave bearing, and the common weal
Expects her safety from thy stubborn zeal.
A place amongst the rest the muses claim,
And bring this free-will off'ring to thy fame,
To prove their virtue, make thy virtues known,
And, holding up thy fame, secure their own.

From his youth upwards, to the present day,
When vices more than years have mark'd him gray,
When riotous excess with wasteful hand
Shakes life's frail glass, and hastes each ebbing sand,

Unmindful from what stock he drew his birth,
Untainted with one deed of real worth,
Lothario, holding honour at no price,
Folly to folly added, vice to vice,
Wrought sin with greediness, and sought for shame
With greater zeal than good men seek for fame.

Where (reason left without the least defence)
Laughter was mirth, obscenity was sense,
Where impudence made decency submit,
Where noise was humour, and where whim was wit,

Where rude, untemper'd licence had the merit
Of liberty, and lunacy was spirit,
Where the best things were ever held the worst,
Lothario was, with justice, always first.

To whip a top, to knuckle down at taw,
To swing upon a gate, to ride a straw,
To play at push-pin with dull brother peers,
To belch out catches in a porter's ears,
To reign the monarch of a midnight cell,
To be the gaping chairman's oracle,
Whilst, in most blessed union, rogue and whore
Clap hands, huzza, and hiccup out—encore,
Whilst gray authority, who slumbers there
In robe's of watchman's fur, gives up his chair;
With midnight howl to bay th' affrighted moon,
To walk with torches through the streets at noon,
To force plain nature from her usual way,
Each night a vigil, and a blank each day;
To match for speed one feather 'gainst another,
To make one leg run races with his brother;
'Gainst all the rest to take the northern wind,
Bute to ride first, and he to ride behind;
To coin new-fangled wagers, and to lay 'em,
Laying to lose, and losing not to pay 'em;
Lothario, on that stock which nature gives,
Without a rival stands, though March * yet lives.

When folly (at that name, in duty bound,
Let subject myriads kneel, and kiss the ground,
Whilst they who, in the presence, upright stand,
Are held as rebels through the loyal land),
Queen ev'ry where, but most a queen in courts,
Sent forth her heralds, and proclaim'd her sports,
Bade fool with fool on her behalf engage,
And prove her right to reign from age to age;
Lothario, great above the common size,
With all engag'd, and won from all the prize;
Her cap he wears, which from his youth he wore,
And ev'ry day deserves it more and more.

Nor in such limits rests his soul confin'd;
Folly may share, but can't engross his mind;
Vice, bold, substantial vice, puts in her claim,
And stamps him perfect in the books of shame.
Observe his follies well, and you would swear
Folly had been his first, his only care;
Observe his vices, you'll that oath disown,
And swear that he was born for vice alone.

Is the soft nature of some hapless maid
Fond, easy, full of faith, to be betray'd;
Must she, to virtue lost, be lost to fame,
And he who wrought her guilt, declare her shame?
Is some brave friend, who, men but little known,
Deems ev'ry heart as honest as his own,

And, free himself, in others fears no guile,
To be ensnar'd, and ruin'd with a smile?
Is law to be perverted from her course?
Is abject fraud to league with brutal force?
Is freedom to be crush'd, and ev'ry son,
Who dares maintain her cause, to be undone?
Is base corruption, creeping through the land,
To plan, and work her ruin, underhand,
With regular approaches, sure, though slow?
Or must she perish by a single blow?
Are kings, who trust to servants, and depend
In servants (fond, vain thought!) to find a friend,
To be abus'd, and made to draw their breath
In darkness thicker than the shades of death?
Is God's most holy name to be profan'd,
His word rejected, and his laws arraign'd,
His servants scorn'd, as men who idly dream'd,
His service laugh'd at, and his Son blasphem'd?
Are debauchees in morals to preside?
Is faith to take an Atheist for her guide?
Is science by a blockhead to be led?
Are states to totter on a drunkard's head?
To answer all these purposes, and more,
More black than ever villain plann'd before,
Search earth, search hell, the devil cannot find
An agent, like Lothario, to his mind.

Is this nobility, which, sprung from kings,
Was meant to swell the pow'r from whence it
springs,

Is this the glorious produce, this the fruit,
Which nature hop'd for from so rich a root?
Were there but two (search all the world around)
Were there but two such nobles to be found,
The very name would sink into a term
Of scorn, and man would rather be a worm
Than be a lord; but nature, full of grace,
Nor meaning birth and titles to be base,
Made only one; and, having made him, swore,
In mercy to mankind, to make no more.
Nor stopp'd she there, but, like a gen'rous friend,
The ills which error caus'd, she strove to mend;
And, having brought Lothario forth to view,
To save her credit, brought forth Sandwich too.

Gods! with what joy, what honest joy of heart,
Blunt as I am, and void of ev'ry art,
Of ev'ry art which great ones in the state
Practise on knaves they fear, and fools they hate,
To titles with reluctance taught to bend,
Not prone to think that virtues can descend,
Do I behold (a sight, alas! more rare
Than honesty could wish) the noble wear
His father's honours, when his life makes known
They're his by virtue, not by birth alone,
When he recalls his father from the grave,
And pays with int'rest back the same he gave.
Cur'd of her splenetic and sullen fits,
To such a peer my willing soul submits,
And to such virtue is more proud to yield,
Than 'gainst ten-titled rogues to keep the field.
Such (for that truth e'en envy shall allow)
Such Wyndham * was, and such is Sandwich now.
O gentle Montague, in blessed hour
Didst thou start up, and climb the stairs of pow'r;

* Afterwards Duke of Queensberry.

Earl of Egremont. He died August 1763.

England of all her fears at once was eas'd,
 Nor, 'mongst her many foes, was one displeas'd.
 France heard the news, and told it cousin Spain;
 Spain heard, and told it cousin France again;
 The Hollander relinquisht his design
 Of adding spice to spice, and mine to mine,
 Of Indian villanies he thought no more,
 Content to rob us on our native shore;
 Aw'd by thy fame (which winds with open mouth
 Shall blow from east to west, from north to south),
 The western world shall yield us her increase,
 And her wild sons be soften'd into peace;
 Rich eastern monarchs shall exhaust their stores,
 And pour unbounded wealth on Albion's shores;
 Unbounded wealth, which from those golden
 scenes,

And all acquir'd by honourable means,
 Some honourable chief shall hither steer,
 To pay our debts, and set the nation clear.

Nabobs themselves, allur'd by thy renown,
 Shall pay due homage to the English crown,
 Shall freely as their king our king receive—
 Provided the directors give them leave.

Union at home shall mark each rising year;
 Nor taxes be complain'd of, though severe;
 Envy her own destroyer shall become,
 And faction with her thousand mouths be dumb;
 With the meek man thy meekness shall prevail,
 Nor with the spirited thy spirit fail;
 Some to thy force of reason shall submit,
 And some be converts to thy princely wit;
 Rev'rence for thee shall still a nation's cries,
 A grand concurrence crown a grand excise;
 And unbelievers of the first degree,
 Who have no faith in God, have faith in thee.

When a strange jumble, whimsical and vain,
 Possess'd the region of each heated brain;
 When some were fools to censure, some to praise,
 And all were mad, but mad in different ways;
 When commonwealth's-men, starting at the shade
 Which in their own wild fancy had been made,
 Of tyrants dream'd, who wore a thorny crown,
 And with state-bloodhounds hunted freedom down;
 When others, struck with fancies not less vain,
 Saw mighty kings by their own subjects slain,
 And in each friend to liberty and law,
 With horror big, a future Cromwell saw;
 Thy manly zeal stepp'd forth, bade discord cease,
 And sung each jarring atom into peace;
 Liberty, cheer'd by thy all-cheering eye,
 Shall, waking from her trance, live, and not die;
 And, patroniz'd by thee, prerogative
 Shall, striding forth at large, not die, but live;
 Whilst privilege, hung betwixt earth and sky,
 Shall not well know, whether to live or die.

When on a rock which overhung the flood,
 And seem'd to totter, commerce shiv'ring stood;
 When credit, building on a sandy shore,
 Saw the sea swell, and heard the tempest roar,
 Heard death in ev'ry blast, and in each wave
 Or saw, or fancied that she saw her grave;
 When property, transferr'd from hand to hand,
 Weaken'd by change, crawl'd sickly through the land;

When mutual confidence was at an end,
 And man no longer could on man depend;

Oppress'd with debts of more than common weight,
 When all men fear'd a bankruptcy of state;
 When, certain death to honour, and to trade,
 A sponge was talk'd of as our only aid.
 That to be sav'd we must be more undone,
 And pay off all our debts, by paying none;
 Like England's better genius, born to bless,
 And snatch his sinking country from distress,
 Didst thou step forth, and without fail or oar
 Pilot the shatter'd vessel safe to shore;
 Nor shalt thou quit, till anchor'd firm and fast,
 She rides secure, and mocks the threat'ning blast!

Born in thy house, and in thy service bred,
 Nurs'd in thy arms, and at thy table fed,
 By thy sage counsels to reflection brought,
 Yet more by pattern than by precept taught,
 Economy her needful aid shall join
 To forward and complete thy grand design,
 And, warm to save, but yet with spirit warm,
 Shall her own conduct from thy conduct form.
 Let friends of prodigals say what they will,
 Spendthrifts at home, abroad are spendthrifts still,
 In vain have fly and subtle sophists tried
 Private from public justice to divide;
 For credit on each other they rely,
 They live together, and together die.
 'Gainst all experience 'tis a rank offence,
 High-treason in the eye of common sense,
 To think a statesman ever can be known
 To pay our debts, who will not pay his own.
 But now, though late, now may we hope to see
 Our debts discharg'd, our credit fair and free,
 Since rigid honesty, fair fall that hour,
 Sits at the helm, and Sandwich is in pow'r.
 With what delight I view thee, word'rous man,
 With what delight survey thy sterling plan,
 That plan which all with wonder must behold,
 And stamp thy age the only age of gold.

Nor rest thy triumphs here—that discord fled,
 And sought with grief the hell where she was bred;
 That faction, 'gainst her nature forc'd to yield,
 Saw her rude rabble scatter'd o'er the field,
 Saw her best friends a standing jest become,
 Her fools turn'd speakers, and her wits struck dumb;

That our most bitter foes (so much depends
 On men of name) are turn'd to cordial friends;
 That our offended friends (such terror flows
 From men of name) dare not appear our foes;
 That credit, gasping in the jaws of death,
 And ready to expire with ev'ry breath,
 Grows stronger from disease; that thou hast sav'd
 Thy drooping country; that thy name engrav'd
 On plates of brass defies the rage of time;
 Than plates of brass more firm, that sacred rhyme
 Embalms thy mem'ry, bids thy glories live,
 And gives thee what the muse alone can give;
 These heights of virtue, these rewards of fame,
 With thee in common other patriots claim.

But that poor sickly science, who had laid
 And droop'd for years beneath neglect's cold shade,
 By those who knew her purposely forgot,
 And made the jest of those who knew her not,
 Whilst ignorance in pow'r, and pamper'd pride,
 Clad like a priest, pass'd by on t' other side,

Recover'd from her wretched state, at length
Puts on new health, and clothes herself with strength,

To thee we owe, and to thy friendly hand,
Which rais'd, and gave her to possess the land.
This praise, though in a court, and near a throne,
This praise is thine, and thine, alas! alone.

With what fond rapture did the goddess smile,
What blessings did she promise to this isle,
What honour to herself, and length of reign!
Soon as she heard, that thou didst not disdain
To be her steward; but what grief, what shame,
What rage, what disappointment shook her frame,
When her proud children dar'd her will dispute,
When youth was insolent, and age was mute.

That young men should be fools, and some wild few,

To wisdom deaf, be deaf to int'rest too,
Mov'd not her wonder; but that men grown gray
In search of wisdom, men who own'd the sway
Of reason, men who stubbornly kept down
Each rising passion, men who wore the gown,
That they should cross her will, that they should dare

Against the cause of int'rest to declare,
That they should be so abject and unwise,
Having no fear of loss before their eyes,
Nor hopes of gain, scorning the ready means
Of being vicars, rectors, canons, deans,
With all those honours which on mitres wait,
And mark the virtuous favourites of state;
That they should dare a Hardwick to support,
And talk within the hearing of a court,
Of that vile beggar conscience, who undone,
And starv'd herself, starves ev'ry wretched son;
This turn'd her blood to gall, this made her swear
No more to throw away her time and care
On wayward sons who scorn'd her love, no more
To hold her courts on Cam's ungrateful shore.
Rather than bear such insults, which disgrace
Her royalty of nature, birth, and place,
Though dullness there unrivall'd state dotb keep,
Would she at Winchester with Burton * sleep;
Or, to exchange the mortifying scene
For something still more dull, and still more mean,
Rather than bear such insults, she would fly
Far, far beyond the reach of English eye,
And reign amongst the Scots: to be a queen
Is worth ambition, though in Aberdeen.
O, stay thy flight, fair science! what though some,
Some base-born children rebels are become,
All are not rebels; some are duteous still,
Attend thy precepts, and obey thy will;
Thy int'rest is oppos'd by those alone,
Who either know not, or oppose their own.

Of stubborn virtue, marching to thy aid,
Behold in black, the liv'ry of their trade,
Marshall'd by form, and by discretion led,
A grave, grave troop, and Smith is at their head,
Black † Smith of Trinity; on Christian ground
For faith in mysteries none more renown'd.

* Dr. John Burton, master of Winchester school.

† Dr. Robert Smith, master of Trinity College,
Cambridge.

Next (for the best of causes now and then Must beg assistance from the worst of men)
Next (if old story lies not) sprung from Greece,
Comes Pandarus, but comes without his niece.
Her, wretched maid! committed to his trust,
To a rank lecher's coarse and bloated lust,
The arch, old, hoary hypocrite had sold,
And thought himself and her well damn'd for gold.
But (to wipe off such traces from the mind,
And make us in good humour with mankind)
Leading on men, who, in a college bred,
No woman knew but those which made their bed,
Who, planted virgins on Cam's virtuous shore,
Continued still male virgins at threescore,
Comes Sumner *, wise, and chaste as chaste can be,
With Long †, as wise, and not less chaste than he.

Are there not friends, too, enter'd in thy cause,
Who, for thy sake, defying penal laws,
Were, to support thy honourable plan,
Smuggled from Jersey and the Isle of Man?
Are there not Philomaths of high degree
Who, always dumb before, shall speak for thee?
Are there not proctors, faithful to thy will,
One of full growth, others in embryo still,
Who may, perhaps, in some ten years, or more,
Be ascertain'd that two and two make four,
Or may a still more happy method find,
And, taking one from two, leave none behind?

With such a mighty pow'r on foot, to yield
Were death to manhood; better in the field
To leave our carcases, and die with fame,
Than fly, and purchase life on terms of shame.
Sackvilles alone anticipate defeat,
And, ere they dare the battle, sound retreat.

But if persuasions ineffectual prove,
If arguments are vain, nor pray'rs can move,
Yet in thy bitterness of frantic woe,
Why talk of Burton? why to Scotland go?
Is there not Oxford? she with open arms
Shall meet thy wish, and yield up all her charms;
Shall for thy love her former loves resign,
And jilt the banish'd Stuarts, to be thine.

Bow'd to the yoke, and, soon as she could read,
Tutor'd to get by heart the despot's creed,
She, of subjection proud, shall knee thy throne,
And have no principles but thine alone;
She shall thy will implicitly receive,
Nor act, nor speak, nor think, without thy leave.
Where is the glory of imperial sway,
If subjects none but just commands obey?
Then, and then only is obedience seen,
When, by command, they dare do all that's mean.
Hither then wing thy flight, here fix thy stand,
Nor fail to bring thy Sandwich in thy hand.

Gods, with what joy (for fancy now supplies,
And lays the future open to my eyes)
Gods, with what joy I see the worthies meet,
And brother Litchfield ‡ brother Sandwich greet!

* Dr. John Sumner, provost of King's College, Cambridge.

† Dr. Roger Long, master of Pembroke College,
Cambridge.

‡ The Earl of Litchfield, then high steward of Oxford.

Blest be your greetings, blest each dear embrace,
 Blest to yourselves, and to the human race.
 Sick'ning at virtues which she cannot reach,
 Which seem her baser nature to impeach,
 Let envy, in a whirlwind's bosom hurl'd,
 Outrageous, search the corners of the world,
 Ranfack the present times, look back to past,
 Rip up the future, and confess at last,
 No times, past, present, or to come, could e'er
 Produce, and bless the world with such a pair.

Phillips *, the good old Phillips, out of breath,
 Escap'd from Monmouth, and escap'd from death,
 Shall hail his Sandwich, with that virtuous zeal,
 That glorious ardour for the commonweal,
 Which warm'd his loyal heart, and bless'd his tongue,
 When on his lips the cause of rebels hung;
 Whilst womanhood, in habit of a nun,
 At Mednam lies, by backward monks undone;
 A nation's reck'ning, like an alehouse score,
 Whilst Paul the aged chalks behind a door,
 Compell'd to hire a foe to cast it up;
 Dashwood † shall pour, from a communion cup,
 Libations to the goddess without eyes,
 And bob and nob in cyder and excise.

From those deep shades, where vanity, unknown,
 Doth penance for her pride, and pines alone;
 Curs'd in herself, by her own thoughts undone,
 Where she sees all, but can be seen by none;
 Where she no longer, mistress of the schools,
 Hears praise loud pealing from the mouths of fools,
 Or hears it at a distance; in despair
 To join the croud, and put in for a share,
 Twisting each thought a thousand diff'rent ways,
 For his new friends new-modelling old praise,
 Where frugal sense so very fine is spun,
 It serves twelve hours, though not enough for one,

‡ King shall arise, and bursting from the dead,
 Shall hurl his piebald Latin at thy head.

Burton (whilst awkward affectation's hung
 In quaint and labour'd accents on his tongue,
 Who 'gainst their will makes junior blockheads
 speak,

Ign'rant of both, new Latin, and new Greek,
 Not such as was in Greece and Latium known,
 But of a modern cut, and all his own;
 Who threads, like beads, loose thoughts on such a string,

They're praise, and censure; nothing, ev'ry thing;
Pantomime thoughts, and style so full of trick,
 They even make a Merry Andrew sick;
 Thoughts all so dull, so pliant in their growth,
 They're verse, they're prose, they're neither, and they're both)

Shall (though by nature ever loth to praise)
 Thy curious worth set forth in curious phrase;
 Obscurely stiff, shall crush poor sense to death,
 Or in long periods run her out of breath;

* Sir John Phillips. At this juncture he was so unpopular as to excite the rage of a mob at Monmouth against him.

† Sir Francis Dashwood, Lord Le Despenser.

‡ Dr. King, principal of St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

Shall make a babe, for which, with all his fame,
 Adam could not have found a proper name;
 Whilst, beating out his features to a smile,
 He hugs the bastard brat, and calls it style.

Hush'd be all nature as the land of death;
 Let each stream sleep, and each wind hold his breath;

Be the bells muffled, nor one sound of care,
 Pressing for audience, wake the slumb'ring air;
 Brown comes—behold how cautiously he creeps—
 How slow he walks, and yet how fast he sleeps—
 But to thy praise in sleep he shall agree;
 He cannot wake, but he shall dream of thee.

Physic, her head with opiate poppies crown'd,
 Her loins by the chaste matron camphire bound,
 Physic, obtaining succour from the pen
 Of her soft son, her gentle Heberden,
 If there are men who can thy virtue know,
 Yet spite of virtue treat thee as a foe,
 Shall, like a scholar, stop their rebel breath,
 And in each recipe send classic death.

So deep in knowledge, that few lines can sound
 And plumb the bottom of that vast profound,
 Few grave ones with such gravity can think,
 Or follow half so fast as he can sink,
 With nice distinctions glossing o'er the text,
 Obscure with meaning, and in words perplex,
 With subtleties on subtleties refin'd,
 Meant to divide and subdivide the mind,
 Keeping the forwardness of youth in awe,
 The scowling Blackstone * bears the train of law.

Divinity, enrob'd in college fur,
 In her right hand a new court calendar,
 Bound like a book of pray'r, thy coming waits
 With all her pack, to hymn thee in the gates.

Loyalty, fix'd on Isis' alter'd shore,
 A stranger long, but stranger now no more,
 Shall pitch her tabernacle, and with eyes
 Brim-full of rapture, view her new allies,
 Shall with much pleasure and more wonder view
 Men great at court and great at Oxford too.

O sacred loyalty! accurs'd be those,
 Who, seeming friends, turn out thy deadliest foes;
 Who prostitute to kings thy honour'd name,
 And sooth their passions to betray their fame:
 Nor prais'd be those, to whose proud nature clings

Contempt of government, and hate of kings;
 Who, willing to be free, not knowing how,
 A strange intemperance of zeal avow,
 And start at loyalty, as at a word
 Which without danger freedom never heard.

Vain errors of vain men—wild both extremes,
 And to the state not wholesome, like the dreams,
 Children of night, of indigestion bred,
 Which, reason clouded, seize and turn the head.

Loyalty without freedom is a chain
 Which men of lib'ral notice can't sustain;
 And freedom without loyalty, a name
 Which nothing means, or means licentious shame.

Thine be the art, my Sandwich, thine the toil,
 In Oxford's stubborn and untoward soil

* Sir William Blackstone, afterwards one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas.

To rear this plant of union, till at length,
Rooted by time, and foster'd into strength,
Shooting aloft, all danger it defies,
And proudly lifts its branches to the skies;
Whilst wisdom's happy son, but not her slave,
Gay with the gay, and with the grave ones grave,
Free from the dull impertinence of thought,
Beneath that shade which thy own labours wrought
And fashion'd into strength, shalt thou repose,
Secure of lib'ral praise, since Isis flows,
True to her Tame, as duty hath decreed,
Nor longer, like a harlot, lust for Tweed,
And those old wreaths, which Oxford once dar'd twine

To grace a Stuart brow, she plants on thine.

THE FAREWELL.

P. FAREWELL to Europe, and at once farewell
To all the follies which in Europe dwell!
To Eastern India now, a richer clime,
Richer, alas! in ev'ry thing but rhyme,
The muses steer their course, and, fond of change,
At large, in other worlds, desire to range;
Resolv'd at least, since they the fool must play,
To do it in a diff'rent place and way.

F. What whim is this, what error of the brain,
What madness worse than in the dog-star's reign?
Why into foreign countries would you roam,
Are there not knaves and fools enough at home?
If satire be thy object, and thy lays
As yet have shown no talents fit for praise;
If satire be thy object, search all round,
Nor to thy purpose can one spot be found
Like England, where to rampant vigour grown
Vice chokes up ev'ry virtue; where, self-sown,
The seeds of folly shoot forth rank and bold,
And every seed brings forth a hundred fold.

P. No more of this—though truth (the more
our shame [claim,
The more our guilt) though truth perhaps may
And justify her part in this, yet here,
For the first time, e'en truth offends my ear.
Declaim from morn to night, from night to morn,
Take up the theme anew, when day's new-born,
I hear, and hate—be England what she will,
With all her faults she is my country still. [word

F. Thy country, and what then? Is that mere
Against the voice of reason to be heard?
Are prejudices, deep imbib'd in youth,
To counteract, and make thee hate the truth?
'Tis the sure symptom of a narrow soul
To draw its grand attachment from the whole,
And take up with a part: men, not confin'd
Within such paltry limits, men design'd
Their nature to exalt; where'er they go,
Wherever waves can roll, and winds can blow,
Where'er the blessed sun, plac'd in the sky
To watch this subject world, can dart his eye,
Are still the same, and, prejudice out-grown,
Consider every country as their own.
At one grand view they take in nature's plan,
Not more at home in England than Japan.

P. My good grave Sir of theory, whose wit,
Grasping at shadows, ne'er caught substance yet,

'Tis mighty easy o'er a glass of wine
On vain refinements vainly to refine,
To laugh at poverty in plenty's reign,
To boast of apathy when out of pain,
And in each sentence, worthy of the schools,
Varnish'd with sophistry, to deal out rules
Most fit for practice but for one poor fault,
That into practice they can ne'er be brought.

At home, and sitting in your elbow chair,
You praise Japan, though you was never there.
But was the ship this moment under sail,
Would not your mind be chang'd, your spirits fail,
Would you not cast one longing eye to shore,
And vow to deal in such wild schemes no more?
Howe'er our pride may tempt us to conceal
Those passions which we cannot choose but feel,
There's a strange something, which without a brain

Fools feel, and which e'en wise men can't explain,
Planted in man, to bind him to that earth,
In dearest ties, from whence he drew his birth.

If honour calls, where'er she points the way,
The sons of honour follow, and obey;
If need compels, wherever we are sent,
'Tis want of courage not to be content;
But, if we have the liberty of choice,
And all depends on our own single voice,
To deem of ev'ry country as the same,
Is rank rebellion 'gainst the lawful claim
Of nature; and such dull indifference
May be philosophy, but can't be sense.

F. Weak and unjust distinction, strange design,
Most peevish, most perverse, to undermine
Philosophy, and throw her empire down
By means of sense, from whom she holds her crown.

Divine philosophy, to thee we owe
All that is worth possessing here below;
Virtue and wisdom consecrate thy reign,
Doubled each joy, and pain no longer pain.

When, like a garden, where, for want of toil,
And wholesome discipline, the rich rank soil
Teems with encumbrances; where all around
Herbs noxious in their nature make the ground,
Like the good mother of a thankless son,
Curse her own womb, by fruitfulness undone;
Like such a garden, when the human soul,
Uncultur'd, wild, impatient of controul,
Brings forth those passions of luxuriant race,
Which spread, and stifle ev'ry herb of grace,
Whilst virtue, check'd by the cold hand of scorn,
Seems with'ring on the bed where she was born,
Philosophy steps in; with steady hand
She brings her aid, she clears th' encumber'd land:
Too virtuous to spare vice one stroke, too wise
One moment to attend to pity's cries,
See with what godlike, what relentless pow'r
She roots up ev'ry weed

P. and ev'ry flow'r.

Philosophy, a name of meek degree,
Embrac'd, in token of humility,
By the proud sage, who, whilst he strove to hide,
In that vain artifice, reveal'd his pride:
Philosophy, whom nature had design'd
To purge all errors from the human mind,

Herself misled by the philosopher,
At once her priest and master, made us err;
Pride, pride, like leaven in a mass of flour,
Tainted her laws, and e'en made virtue sour.

Had she, content within her proper sphere,
Taught lessons suited to the human ear,
Which might fair virtue's genuine fruits produce,
Made not for ornament, but real use,
The heart of man unrivall'd she had sway'd,
Prais'd by the good, and by the bad obey'd.
But when she, overturning reason's throne,
Strove proudly in its place to plant her own;
When she with apathy the breast would steel,
And teach us, deeply feeling, not to feel;
When she would wildly all her force employ,
Not to correct our passions, but destroy;
When, not content our nature to restore,
As made by God, she made it all new o'er;
When, with a strange and criminal excess,
To make us more than men, she made us less;
The good her dwindled pow'r with pity saw,
The bad with joy, and none but fools with awe.

Truth with a simple and unvarnish'd tale
E'en from the mouth of N—— might prevail,
Could she get there; but falsehood's sugar'd strain
Should pour her fatal blandishments in vain,
Nor make one convert, though the syren hung,
Where she too often hangs, on M—— tongue.
Should all the Sophs, whom in his course the sun
Hath seen, or past or present, rise in one;
Should he, whilst pleasure in each sentence flows,
Like Plato, give us poetry in prose;
Should he, full orator at once, impart
Th' Athenian's genius with the Roman's art,
Genius and art should in this instant fail,
Nor Rome though join'd with Athens here prevail:

'Tis not in man, 'tis not in more than man,
To make me find one fault in nature's plan.
Plac'd low ourselves, we censure those above,
And, wanting judgment, think that she wants
love;

Blame where we ought in reason to commend,
And think her most a foe when most a friend.
Such be philosophers—their specious art,
Though friendship pleads, shall never warp my heart;

Ne'er make me from this breast one passion tear,
Which nature, my best friend hath planted there.

F. Forgiving, as a friend, what, whilst I live,
As a philosopher I can't forgive,
In this one point at last I join with you;
To nature pay all that is nature's due;
But let not clouded reason sink so low
To fancy debts she does not, cannot owe.
Bear, to full manhood grown, those shackles bear,
Which nature meant us for a time to wear,
As we wear leading-strings, which, useless grown,
Are laid aside, when we can walk alone.
But on thyself, by peevish humour sway'd,
Wilt thou lay burdens nature never laid? [errs,
Wilt thou make faults, whilst judgment weakly
And then defend, mistaking them for her's?
Dar'st thou to say, in our enlighten'd age,
That this grand master passion, this brave rage,

Which flames out for thy country, was impress'd
And fix'd by nature in the human breast?

If you prefer the place where you was born,
And hold all others in contempt and scorn
On fair comparison; if on that land
With lib'ral and a more than equal hand
Her gifts as in profusion plenty sends;
If virtue meets with more and better friends;
If science finds a patron 'mongst the great;
If honesty is minister of state;
If pow'r, the guardian of our rights design'd,
Is to that great, that only end confin'd;
If riches are employ'd to bless the poor;
If law is sacred, liberty secure;
Let but these facts depend on proofs of weight,
Reason declares, thy love can't be too great;
And in this light could be our country view,
A very Hottentot must love it too.

But if, by fate's decrees, you owe your birth
To some most barren and penurious earth,
Where, ev'ry comfort of this life denied,
Her real wants are scantily supplied,
Where pow'r is reason, liberty a joke,
Laws never made, or made but to be broke;
To fix thy love on such a wretched spot,
Because in lust's wild fever there begot,
Because, thy weight no longer fit to bear,
But chance, not choice, thy mother dropt thee
there,

Is folly, which admits not of defence;
It can't be nature, for it is not sense.
By the same argument which here you hold,
(When falsehood's insolent, let truth be bold)
If propagation can in torments dwell,
A devil must, if born there, love his hell.

P. Hard fate, to whose decrees I lowly bend,
And e'en in punishment confess a friend,
Ordain'd my birth in some place yet untry'd,
On purpose made to mortify my pride,
Where the sun never gave one glimpse of day,
Where science never yet could dart one ray;
Had I been born on some bleak, blasted plain
Of barren Scotland, in a Stuart's reign;
Or in some kingdom, where men, weak or worse,
Turn'd nature's ev'ry blessing to a curse,
Where crowns of freedom by the father's won,
Dropp'd leaf by leaf from each degen'rate son;
In spite of all the wisdom you display,
All you have said, and yet may have to say,
My weakness here, if weakness, I confess,
I, as my country, had not lov'd her less.

Whether strict reason bears me out in this,
Let those who, always seeking, always miss
The ways of reason, doubt with precious zeal;
Their's be the praise to argue, mine to feel.
Wish we to trace this passion to the root,
We, like a tree, may know it by its fruit,
From its rich stem ten thousand virtues spring,
Ten thousand blessings on its branches cling;
Yet in the circle of revolving years,
Not one misfortune, not one vice appears.
Hence then, and what you reason call adore;
This, if not reason, must be something more.

But (for I wish not others to confine,
Be their opinions unrestrain'd as mine)

Whether this love's of good or evil growth,
A vice, a virtue, or a spice of both,
Let men of nicer argument decide:
If it is virtuous, sooth an honest pride
With lib'ral praise; if vicious, be content,
It is a vice I never can repent;
A vice which, weigh'd in heav'n shall more avail
Than ten cold virtues in the other scale.

F. This wild untemper'd zeal (which after all
We, candour unimpeach'd, might madness call)
Is it a virtue? That you scarce pretend:
Or can it be a vice, like virtue's friend,
Which draws us off from and dissolves the force
Of private ties, nay stops us in our course
To that grand object of the human soul,
That nobler love which comprehends the whole?
Coop'd in the limits of this petty isle,
This nook, which scarce deserves a frown or smile,
Weigh'd with creation, you, by whim undone,
Give all your thoughts to what is scarce worth one.
The generous soul, by nature taught to soar,
Her strength confirm'd in philosophic lore,
At one grand view takes in a world with ease,
And, seeing all mankind, loves all she sees.

P. Was it most sure, which yet a doubt endures,
Not found in reason's creed, though found in yours,

That these two services, like what we're told
And know of God's and Mammon's cannot hold
And draw together, that however loth,
We neither serve, attempting to serve both;
I could not doubt a moment which to choose,
And which in common reason to refuse.

Invented oft for purposes of art,
Born of the head, though father'd on the heart,
This grand love of the world must be confest
A barren speculation at the best.
Not one man in a thousand, should he live
Beyond the usual term of life, could give,
So rare occasion comes, and to so few,
Proof whether his regards are feign'd or true.

The love we bear our country, is a root
Which never fails to bring forth golden fruit;
'Tis in the mind an everlasting spring
Of glorious actions, which become a king,
Nor less become a subject; 'tis a debt
Which bad men, though they pay not, can't forget;
A duty, which the good delight to pay,
And ev'ry man can practise ev'ry day.

Nor, for my life (so very dim my eye,
Or dull your argument), can I descry
What you with faith assert, how that dear love
Which binds me to my country can remove,
And make me of necessity forego,
That gen'ral love which to the world I owe.
Those ties of private nature, small extent,
In which the mind of narrow cast is pent,
Are only steps on which the gen'rous soul
Mounts by degrees 'till she includes the whole.
That spring of love, which in the human mind,
Founded on self, flows narrow and confin'd,
Enlarges as it rolls, and comprehends
The social charities of blood and friends,
'Till smaller streams included, not o'erpass,
It rises to our country's love at last;

And he, with lib'ral and enlarged mind,
Who loves his country, cannot hate mankind.

F. Friend as you would appear to common
sense,

Tell me, or think no more of a defence,
Is it a proof of love by choice to run
A vagrant from your country?

P. Can the son,
(Shame, shame, on all such sons) with ruthless eye,

And heart more patient than the flint, stand by,
And by some ruffian, from all shame divorc'd,
All virtue, see his honour'd mother forc'd!
Then, no, by him that made me, not e'en then,
Could I with patience, by the worst of men,
Behold my country plunder'd, beggar'd, lost
Beyond redemption, all her glories cross'd
E'en when occasion made them ripe, her fame
Fled like a dream, while she awakes to shame.

F. Is it not more the office of a friend,
The office of a patron, to defend
Her sinking state, than basely to decline
So great a cause, and in despair resign?

P. Beyond my reach, alas! the grievance lies,
And, whilst more able patriots doubt, she dies.
From a foul source, more deep than we suppose,
Fatally deep and dark, this grievance flows.

'Tis not that peace our glorious hopes defeats,
'Tis not the voice of faction in the streets,
'Tis not a gross attack on freedom made,
'Tis not the arm of privilege display'd
Against the subject, whilst she wears no sting
To disappoint the purpose of a king;
These are no ills, or trifles, if compar'd [clar'd.
With those, which are contriv'd, though not de-

Tell me philosopher, is it a crime
To pry into the secret womb of time;
Or, born in ignorance, must we despair
To reach events, and read the future there?
Why, be it so—still the right of man,
Imparted by his Maker, where he can,
To former times and men his eye to cast,
And judge of what's to come, by what is past.

Should there be found in some not distant year
(O how I wish to be no prophet here),
Amongst our British lords, should there be found
Some great in pow'r, in principles unsound,
Who look on freedom with an evil eye,
In whom the springs of loyalty are dry;
Who wish to soar on wild ambition's wings,
Who hate the commons, and who love not kings;
Who would divide the people and the throne
To set up sep'rate int'rests of their own;
Who hate whatever aids their wholesome growth,
And only join with, to destroy them both;
Should there be found such men in after times,
May Heav'n in mercy to our grievous crimes
Allot some milder vengeance, nor to them
And to their rage this wretched land condemn.

Thou God above, on whom all states depend,
Who knowest from the first their rise and end,
If there's a day mark'd in the book of fate
When ruin must involve our equal state;
When law, alas! must be no more, and we,
To freedom born, must be no longer free;

Let not a mob of tyrants seize the helm,
Nor titled upstarts league to rob the realm :
Let not, whatever other ills assail,
A damned aristocracy prevail.

If, all too short, our course of freedom run,
'Tis thy good pleasure we should be undone,
Let us, some comfort in our griefs to bring,
Be slaves to one, and be that one a king.

F. Poets, accusom'd by their trade to feign,
Oft substitute creations of the brain
For real substance, and themselves deceiv'd,
Would have the fiction by mankind believ'd.
Such is your case.—But grant, to sooth your
pride,

That you know more than all the world beside,
Why deal in hints, why make a moment's doubt?
Resolv'd, and like a man, at once speak out;
Show us our danger, tell us where it lies,
And, to ensure our safety, make us wise.

P. Rather than bear the pain of thought, fools
stray ;

The proud will rather lose than ask their way ;
To men of sense what needs it to unfold
And tell a tale which they must know untold ?

In the bad, int'rest warps the canker'd heart,
The good are hoodwink'd by the tricks of art ;
And whilst arch, subtle hypocrites contrive
To keep the flames of discontent alive,
Whilst they, with arts to honest men unknown,
Breed doubts between the people and the throne,
Making us fear, where reason never yet
Allow'd one fear, or could one doubt admit,
Themselves pass unsuspected in disguise,
And 'gainst our real danger seal our eyes.

F. Mark them, and let their names recorded stand

On shame's black roll, and stink through all the

P. That might some courage, but no prudence
No hurt to them, and jeopardy to me. [be ;

F. Leave out their names.

P. For that kind caution thanks ;
But may not judges sometimes fill up blanks ?

F. Your country's laws in doubt then you reject ?

P. The laws I love, the lawyers I suspect :

Amongst twelve judges may not one be found,
(On bare, bare possibility I ground

This wholesome doubt, who may enlarge, retrench,
Create and uncreate, and from the bench,

With winks, smiles, nods, and such like paltry arts,
May work and worm into a jury's hearts ;

Or, baffled there, may, turbulent of soul,
Cramp their high office, and their rights controul ;

Who may, though judge, turn advocate at large,
And deal replies out by the way of charge,

Making interpretation all the way,
In spite of facts, his wicked will obey,

And, leaving law without the least defence,
May damn his conscience to approve his sense ?

F. Whilst the true guardians of this charter'd
land,

In full and perfect vigour, juries stand,

A judge in vain shall awe, cajole, perplex.

P. Suppose I should be tried in Middlesex ?

F. To pack a jury they will never dare.

P. There's no occasion to pack juries there.

F. 'Gainst prejudice all arguments are weak,
Reason herself without effect must speak.

Fly then thy country, like a coward fly,
Renounce her int'rest, and her laws defy.

But why, bewitch'd, to India turn thy eyes ?
Cannot our Europe thy vast wrath suffice ?

Cannot thy misbegotten muse lay bare
Her brawny arm, and play the butcher there ?

P. Thy counsel taken, what should satire do ?
Where could she find an object that is new ?

Those travell'd youths, whom tender mothers
wean,

And send abroad to see, and to be seen,
With whom, lest they should fornicate, or worse,

A tutor's sent, by way of a dry nurse,
Each of whom just enough of spirit bears,

To show our follies, and to bring home theirs,
Have made all Europe's vices so well known,

They seem almost as nat'ral as our own.

F. Will India for thy purpose better do ? [new.

P. In one respect at least—there's something

F. A harmless people, in whom nature speaks
Free and untainted ; 'mongst whom satire seeks,

But vainly seeks, so simply plain their hearts,
One bosom where to lodge her poison'd darts.

P. From knowledge speak you this, or doubt on doubt

Weigh'd and resolv'd, hath reason found it out ?

Neither from knowledge, nor by reason taught,

You have faith ev'ry where but where you ought India or Europe—What's there in a name ?

Propensity to vice in both the same,

Nature alike in both works for man's good,

Alike in both by man himself withstood.

Nabobs, as well as those who hunt them down,

Deserve a cord much better than a crown,

And a Mogul can thrones as much debase

As any polish'd prince of Christian race.

F. Could you a task more hard than you suppose,

Could you, in ridicule whilst satire glows,

Make all their follies to the life appear,

'Tis ten to one you gain no credit here.

Howe'er well drawn, the picture after all,

Because we know not the original,

Would not find favour in the public eye.

P. That, having your good leave, I mean to try.

And if your observations sterling hold,

If the piece should be heavy, tame, and cold,

To make it to the side of nature lean,

And, meaning nothing, something seem to mean,

To make the whole in lively colours glow,

To bring before us something that we know,

And from all honest men applause to win,

I'll groupe the company, and put them in.

F. Be that ungen'rous thought by shame sup-

press'd,

Add not distress to those too much distress'd.

Have they not, by blind zeal misled, laid bare

Those sores which never might endure the air ?

Have they not brought their mysteries so low,

That what the wise suspected not, fools know ?

From their first rise e'en to the present hour,

Have they not prov'd their own abuse of pow'r ;

Made it impossible, if fairly view'd,

Ever to have that dang'rous pow'r renew'd ;

Whilst uneduc'd by ministers, the throne
Regards our interest, and knows its own?

P. Should ev'ry other subject chance to fail,
Those who have fail'd, and those who wish to fail
In the last fleet, afford an ample field,
Which must beyond my hopes a harvest yield.

F. On such vile food satire can never thrive.

P. She cannot starve, if there was only Clive.

THE TIMES.

THE time hath been, a boyish, blushing time,
When modesty was scarcely held a crime;
When the most wicked had some touch of grace,
And trembled to meet virtue face to face:
When those, who in the cause of sin grown gray,
Had serv'd her without grudging day by day,
Were yet so weak an awkward shame to feel,
And strove that glorious service to conceal;
We, better bred, and than our fires more wise,
Such paltry narrowness of soul despise,
To virtue ev'ry mean pretence disclaim,
Lay bare our crimes, and glory in our shame.

Time was, ere temperance had fled the realm;
Ere luxury sat guttling at the helm
From meal to meal, without one moment's space
Reserv'd for business, or allow'd for grace;
Ere vanity had so far conquer'd sense
To make us all wild rivals in expence,
To make one fool strive to outvie another,
And ev'ry coxcomb dress against his brother;
Ere banish'd industry had left our shores,
And labour was by pride kick'd out of doors;
Ere idleness prevail'd sole queen in courts,
Or only yielded to a rage for sports;
Ere each weak mind was with externals caught,
And dissipation held the place of thought;
Ere gambling Lords in vice so far were gone
To cog the die, and bid the sun look on;
Ere a great nation, not less just than free,
Was made a beggar by economy;
Ere rugged honesty was out of vogue,
Ere fashion stamp'd her sanction on the rogue;
Time was, that men had conscience, that they made

Scruples to owe, what never could be paid.
Was one then found, however high his name,
So far above his fellows damn'd to shame,
Who dar'd abuse and falsify his trust,
Who, being great, yet dar'd to be unjust;
Shunn'd like a plague, or but at distance view'd,
He walk'd the crowded streets in solitude,
Nor could his rank, and station in the land,
Bribe one mean knave to take him by the hand.
Such rigid maxims (O, might such revive
To keep expiring honesty alive)
Made rogues, all other hopes of fame deny'd,
Not just through principle, but just through pride.
Our times, more polish'd, wear a diff'rent face;
Debts are an honour: payment a disgrace.
Men of weak minds, high-plac'd on folly's list,
May gravely tell us trade cannot subsist,
Nor all those thousands who're in trade employ'd,
If faith 'twixt man and man is once destroy'd.

Why—be it so—We in that point accord;
But what is trade and tradesmen to a lord?

Faber, from day to day, from year to year,
Hath had the cries of tradesmen in his ear,
Of tradesmen by his villany betray'd,
And, vainly seeking justice, bankrupts made.
What is't to Faber? Lordly as before,
He sits at ease, and lives to ruin more.
Fix'd at his door, as motionless as stone,
Begging, but only begging for their own,
Unheard they stand, or only heard by those,
Those slaves in livery, who mock their woes.
What is't to Faber? He continues great,
Lives on in grandeur, and runs out in state.
The helpless widow, wrung with deep despair,
In bitterness of soul, pours forth her pray'r,
Hugging her starving babes with streaming eyes,
And calls down vengeance, vengeance from the skies.

What is't to Faber? He stands safe and clear,
Heav'n can commence no legal action here,
And on his breast a mighty plate he wears,
A plate more firm than triple brass, which bears
The name of privilege 'gainst vulgar awe;
He feels no conscience, and he fears no law.

Nor think, acquainted with small knaves alone,
Who have not shame outliv'd, and grace outgrown,
The great world hidden from thy reptile view,
That on such men, to whom contempt is due,
Contempt shall fall, and their vile author's name
Recorded stand through all the Land of Shame.
No—to his porch, like Persians to the sun,
Behold contending crowds of courtiers run;
See, to his aid what noble troops advance,
All sworn to keep his crimes in countenance.
Nor wonder at it—They partake the charge,
As small their conscience, and their debts as large.

Propp'd by such clients, and without controul
From all that's honest in the human soul,
In grandeur mean, with insolence unjust, [trust,
Whilst none but knaves can praise, and fools will Carefs'd and courted, Faber seems to stand
A mighty pillar in a guilty land,
And (a sad truth to which succeeding times
Will scarce give credit, when 'tis told in rhymes)
Did not strict Honour with a jealous eye
Watch round the throne, did not true piety
(Who, link'd with honour for the noblest ends, Ranks none but honest men amongst her friends)
Forbid us to be crush'd with such a weight,
He might in time be minister of state.

But why enlarge I on such petty crimes?
They might have shock'd the faith of former times,
But now are held as nothing.—We begin
Where our fires ended, and improve in sin,
Rack our invention, and leave nothing new
In vice and folly for our sons to do.

Nor deem this censure hard; there's not a place
Most consecrate to purposes of grace,
Which vice hath not polluted; none so high,
But with bold pinion she hath dar'd to fly,
And build there for her pleasure; none so low,
But she hath crept into it; made it know,
And feel her pow'r; in courts, in camps she reigns,
O'er sober citizens, and simple swains;

E'en in our temples she hath fix'd her throne,
And 'bove God's holy altars plac'd her own.

More to increase the horror of our state,
To make her empire lasting as 'tis great,
To make us in full-grown perfection feel
Curfes which neither art nor time can heal,
All shame discarded, all remains of pride,
Meanness sits crown'd, and triumphs by her side;
Meanness, who gleans out of the human mind
Those few good seeds which vice had left behind,
Those seeds which might in time to virtue tend,
And leaves the soul without a pow'r to mend;
Meanness, at sight of whom, with brave disdain
The breast of manhood swells, but swells in vain,
Before whom honour makes a forc'd retreat,
And freedom is compell'd to quit her seat;
Meanness, which, like that mark by bloody Cain
Borne in his forehead for a brother slain,
God, in his great and all-subduing rage,
Ordains the standing mark of this vile age.

The venal hero trucks his fame for gold,
The patriot's virtue for a place is sold,
The statesman bargains for his country's shame,
And for preferment priests their God disclaim.
Worn out with lust, her day of lech'ry o'er,
The mother trains the daughter which she bore
In her own paths; the father aids the plan,
And, when the innocent is ripe for man,
Sells her to some old lecher for a wife,
And makes her an adulteress for life,
Or in the papers bids his name appear,
And advertises for a L——;
Husband and wife (whom av'rice must applaud)
Agree to save the charge of pimp and bawd;
These parts they play themselves, a frugal pair,
And share the infamy, the gain to share;
Well pleas'd to find, when they the profits tell,
That they have play'd the whore and rogue so
well.

Nor are these things (which might imply a spark
Of shame still left) transacted in the dark.
No—to the public they are open laid,
And carried on like any other trade.
Scorning to mince damnation, and too proud
To work the works of darkness in a cloud,
In fullest vigour vice maintains her sway;
Free are her marts, and open at noon-day.
Meanness, now wed to impudence, no more
In darkness skulks, and trembles, as of yore,
When the light breaks upon her coward eye;
Boldly she stalks on earth, and to the sky
Lifts her proud head, nor fears lest time abate,
And turn her husband's love to canker'd hate,
Since fate, to make them more sincerely one,
Hath crown'd their loves with Montague their son;
A son so like his dam, so like his fire,
With all the mother's craft, the father's fire,
An image so express in every part,
So like in all bad qualities of heart,
That, had they fifty children, he alone
Would stand as heir apparent to the throne.

With our own island vices not content,
We rob our neighbours on the Continent,
Dance Europe round, and visit ev'ry court,
To ape their follies, and their crimes import.

To diff'rent lands for diff'rent sins we roam,
And, richly freighted, bring our cargo home,
Nobly industrious to make vice appear
In her full state, and perfect only here.

To Holland, where politeness ever reigns,
Where primitive sincerity remains
And makes a stand, where freedom in her course
Hath left her name, though she hath lost her force
In that, as other lands, where simple trade
Was never in the garb of fraud array'd,
Where av'rice never dar'd to show his head,
Where, like a smiling cherub mercy, led
By reason, blesses the sweet blooded race,
And cruelty could never find a place,
To Holland for that charity we roam,
Which happily begins and ends at home.

France, in return for peace and pow'r restor'd,
For all those countries, which the hero's sword
Unprofitably purchas'd, idly thrown
Into her lap, and made once more her own;
France hath afforded large and rich supplies
Of vanities full-trimm'd, of polish'd lies,
Of soothing flatteries, which through the ears
Steal to, and melt the heart, of slavish fears
Which break the spirit, and of abject fraud—
For which, alas! we need not send abroad.

Spain gives us pride—which Spain to all the earth
May largely give, nor fear herself a dearth—
Gives us that jealousy, which, born of fear
And mean distrust, grows not by nature here—
Gives us that superstition, which pretends
By the worst means to serve the best of ends—
That cruelty, which, stranger to the brave,
Dwells only with the coward, and the slave;
That cruelty, which led her Christian bands
With more than savage rage o'er savage lands,
Bade her without remorse whole countries thin,
And hold of nought but mercy as a sin.

Italia, nurse of ev'ry softer art,
Who, feigning to refine, unmans the heart,
Who lays the realms of sense and virtue waste,
Who mars whilst she pretends to mend our taste;
Italia, to complete and crown our shame,
Sends us a fiend, and Legion is his name.
The farce of greatness without being great,
Pride without pow'r, titles without estate,
Souls without vigour, bodies without force,
Hate without cause, revenge without remorse,
Dark mean revenge, murder without defence,
Jealousy without love, sound without sense,
Mirth without humour, without wit grimace,
Faith without reason, gospel without grace,
Zeal without knowledge, without nature art,
Men without manhood, women without heart,
Half-men, who, dry and pithless, are debarr'd
From man's best joys—no sooner made than marr'd—

Half-men, whom many a rich and noble dame,
To serve her lust, and yet secure her fame,
Keeps on high diet, as we capons feed,
To glut out appetites at last decreed;
Women, who dance in postures so obscene,
They might awaken shame in Aretine;
Who, when retir'd from the day's piercing light,
They celebrate the mysteries of night,

Might make the muses, in a corner plac'd
To view their monstrous lusts, deem Sappho chaste;
These, and a thousand follies rank as these,
A thousand faults, ten thousand fools, who please
Our pall'd and sickly taste, ten thousand knaves,
Who serve our foes as spies, and us as slaves,
Who by degrees, and unperceiv'd, prepare
Our necks for chains which they already wear,
Madly we entertain, at the expence
Of fame, of virtue, taste, and common sense.

Nor stop we here—the soft luxurious east,
Where man, his soul degraded, from the beast
In nothing diff'rent but in shape we view,
They walk on four legs, and he walks on two,
Attracts our eye; and flowing from that source,
Sins of the blackest character, sins worse
Than all her plagues, which truly to unfold
Would make the best blood in my veins run cold,
And strike all manhood dead, which but to name
Would call up in my cheeks the marks of shame;
Sins, if such sins can be, which shut out grace,
Which for the guilty leave no hope, no place
E'en in God's mercy, sins 'gainst nature's plan
Possess the land at large, and man for man
Burn in those fires, which hell alone could raise
To make him more than damn'd, which, in the days

Of punishment, when guilt becomes her prey,
With all her tortures she can scarce repay.

Be grace shut out, be mercy deaf; let God
With tenfold terrors arm that dreadful nod
Which speaks them lost, and sentenc'd to despair;
Distending wide her jaws, let hell prepare
For those who thus offend amongst mankind,
A fire more fierce, and tortures more refin'd;
On earth, which groans beneath their monstrous
weight,

On earth, alas! they meet a diff'rent fate;
And whilst the laws, false grace, false mercy
shown,

Are taught to wear a softness not their own,
Men, whom the beasts would spurn, should they appear

Amongst the honest herd, find refuge here.

No longer by vain fear or shame controul'd,
From long, too long security grown bold,
Mocking rebuke, they brave it in our streets,
And Lumley e'en at noon his mistress meets:
So public in their crimes, so daring grown,
They almost take a pride to have them known;
And each unnat'ral villain scarce endures
To make a secret of his vile amours.

Go where we will, at ev'ry time and place,
Sodom confronts, and stares us in the face;
They ply in public at our very doors,
And take the bread from much more honest whores.

Those who are mean high paramours secure,
And the rich guilty screen the guilty poor;
The sin too proud to feel from reason awe,
And those who practise it too great for law.

Woman, the pride and happiness of man,
Without whose soft endearments nature's plan
Had been a blank, and life not worth a thought;
Woman, by all the loves and graces taught,

With softest arts, and sure, though hidden skill,
To humanize, and mould us to her will;
Woman, with more than common grace form'd
bere,

With the persuasive language of a tear
To melt the rugged temper of our isle,
Or win us to her purpose with a smile;
Woman, by fate the quickest spur decreed,
The fairest, best reward of ev'ry deed,
Which bears the stamp of honour; at whose name
Our ancient heroes caught a quicker flame,
And dar'd beyond belief, whilst o'er the plain,
Spurning the carcases of princes slain,
Confusion proudly strode, whilst horror blew
The fatal trump, and death stalk'd full in view;
Woman is out of date, a thing thrown by
As having lost its use; no more the eye
With female beauty caught, in wild amaze,
Gazes entranc'd, and could for ever gaze;
No more the heart, that seat where love resides,
Each breath drawn quick and short, in fuller tides
Life posting through the veins, each pulse on fire,
And the whole body tingling with desire,
Pants for those charms, which virtue might engage
To break his vow, and thaw the frost of age,
Bidding each trembling nerve, each muscle strain,
And giving pleasure which is almost pain.

Women are kept for nothing but the breed;
For pleasure we must have a Ganymede;
A fine, fresh Hylas, a delicious boy,
To serve our purposes of beastly joy.

Fairest of nymphs where ev'ry nymph is fair,
Whom nature form'd with more than common
care,

With more than common care whom art improv'd,
And both declar'd most worthy to be lov'd,
—— neglected wanders, whilst a crowd
Pursue, and consecrate the steps ——
She, hapless maid, born in a wretched hour,
Wastes life's gay prime in vain, like some fair
flow'r,

Sweet in its scent, and lively in its hue,
Which withers on the stalk from whence it grew,
And dies uncropp'd; whilst he, admir'd, care's'd,
Belov'd, and ev'ry where a welcome guest,
With brutes of rank and fortune plays the whore,
For this unnat'ral lust a common sewer.

Dine with Apicius—at his sumptuous board
Find all the world of dainties can afford—
And yet (so much distemper'd spirits pall
The sickly appetite) amidst them all
Apicius finds no joy, but, whilst he carves
For ev'ry guest, the landlord sits and starves.

The forest haunch, fine fat, in flavour high,
Kept to a moment, smokes before his eye,
But smokes in vain; his heedless eye runs o'er
And lothes what he had deified before;
The turtle, of a great and glorious size,
Worth its own weight in gold, a mighty prize
For which a man of taste all risks would run,
Itself a feast, and ev'ry dish in one;
The turtle in luxurious pomp comes in,
Kept, kill'd, cut up, prepar'd, and dress'd by Quin:
In vain it comes, in vain lies full in view;
As Quin hath dress'd it, he may eat it too,

Apicius cannot.—When the glass goes round,
Quick-circling, and the roofs with mirth resound,
Sober he sits, and silent—All alone
Though in a crowd, and to himself scarce known,
On grief he feeds, nor friends can cure, nor wine
Suspend his cares, and make him cease to pine.

Why mourns Apicius thus? Why runs his eye,
Heedless, o'er delicacies, which from the sky
Might call down Jove? Where now his generous wish,

That, to invent a new and better dish,
The world might burn, and all mankind expire,
So he might roast a Phoenix at the fire?
Why swims that eye in tears, which, through a race

Of sixty years, ne'er show'd one sign of grace?
Why feels that heart, which never felt before?
Why doth that pamper'd glutton eat no more,
Who only liv'd to eat, his stomach pall'd,
And drown'd in floods of sorrow? Hath fate call'd
His father from the grave to second life?
Hath Clodius on his hands return'd his wife;
Or hath the law, by strictest justice taught,
Compell'd him to restore the dower she brought?
Hath some bold creditor against his will
Brought in, and forc'd him to discharge a bill,
Where eating had no share? Hath some vain wench

Run out his wealth, and forc'd him to retrench?
Hath any rival glutton got the start,
And beat him in his own luxurious art;
Bought cates for which Apicius could not pay,
Or dress'd old dainties in a newer way?
Hath his cook, worthy to be slain with rods,
Spoil'd a dish fit to entertain the gods;
Or hath some varlet, cross'd by cruel fate,
Thrown down the price of empires in a plate?

None, none of these—his servants all are try'd,
So sure they walk on ice, and never slide;
His cook, an acquisition made in France,
Might put a Chloe out of countenance,
Nor, though old Holles still maintains his stand,
Hath he one rival glutton in the land;
Women are all the objects of his hate,
His debts are all unpaid, and yet his state
In full security and triumph held,
Unless for once a knave should be expell'd;
His wife is still a whore, and in his pow'r,
The woman gone, he still retains the dow'r;
Sound in the grave (thanks to his filial care
Which mix'd the draught, and kindly sent him
there)

His father sleeps, and, till the last trump shake
The corners of the earth, shall not awake.

Whence flows this sorrow then? behind his chair
Didst thou not see, deck'd with a solitaire,
Which on his bare breast glitt'ring play'd, and grac'd

With nicest ornaments, a stripling plac'd,
A smooth, snug, stripling, in life's fairest prime?
Didst thou not mind too, how from time to time
The monstrous lecher, tempted to despise
All other dainties, thither turn'd his eyes?
How he seem'd only to reproach us all,
Who strove his fix'd attention to recal,

And how he wish'd, e'en at the time of grace,
Like Janus, to have had a double face?

His cause of grief behold in that fair boy;
Apicius dotes, and Corydon is coy.

Vain and unthinking stripling! When the glass
Meets thy too curious eye, and, as you pass,
Flat'ring, presents in smiles thy image there,
Why dost thou bless the gods, who made thee
fair?

Blame their large bounties, and with reason blame;
Curse, curse thy beauty, for it leads to shame.

When thy hot lord, to work thee to his end,
Bids show'rs of gold into thy breast descend,
Suspect his gifts, nor the vile giver trust;

They're baits for virtue, and smell strong of lust.
On those gay, gaudy trappings which adorn

The temple of thy body, look with scorn,
View them with horror; they pollution mean,

And deepest ruin: thou hast often seen,
From 'mongst the herd, the fairest and the best

Carefully singled out, and richly dress'd,
With grandeur mock'd, for sacrifice decreed,

Only in greater pomp at last to bleed.
Be warn'd in time, the threaten'd danger shun,

To stay a moment is to be undone.
What though, temptation proof, thy virtue shine,

Nor bribes can move, nor arts can undermine,
All other methods failing, one resource

Is still behind, and thou must yield to force.
Paint to thyself the horrors of a rape, [escape;

Most strongly paint, and, whilst thou can'st,
Mind not his promises—they're made in sport—

Made to be broke—Was he not bred at court?
Trust not his honour, he's a man of birth;

Attend not to his oaths—they're made on earth,
Not register'd in heav'n—He mocks at grace,

And in his creed God never found a place—
Look not for conscience—for he knows her not,

So long a stranger, she is quite forgot—
Nor think thyself in law secure and firm—

Thy master is a lord, and thou a worm,
A poor mean reptile, never meant to think,

Who, being well supplied with meat and drink,
And suffer'd just to crawl from place to place,

Must serve his lusts, and think he does thee grace.
Fly, then, whilst yet 'tis in thy pow'r to fly;

But whither canst thou go? on whom rely
For wish'd protection? Virtue's sure to meet

An armed host of foes in ev'ry street.
What boots it, of Apicius fearful grown,

Headlong to fly into the arms of Stone?
Or why take refuge in the house of pray'r,

If sure to meet with an Apicius there?
Trust not old age, which will thy faith betray,

Saint Socrates is still a goat, though gray;
Trust not green youth; Florio will scarce go down,

And, at eighteen, hath surfeited the town;
Trust not to rakes—alas! 'tis all pretence—

They take up raking only as a fence
'Gainst common fame—place H—in thy view;

He keeps one whore as Barrowby kept two;
Trust not to marriage—T—took a wife,

Who chaste as Dian might have pass'd her life,
Had she not, far more prudent in her aim,

(To propagate the honours of his name,

And save expiring titles) taken care
Without his knowledge to provide an heir;
Trust not to marriage, in mankind unread;
S——'s a married man, and S—— new wed.

Would'st thou be safe? Society forbear,
Fly to the desert, and seek shelter there,
Herd with the brutes—they follow nature's plan—
There's not a brute so dangerous as man
In Afric's wilds——'mongst them that refuge find,

Which lust denies thee here among mankind;
Renounce thy name, thy nature, and no more
Pique thy vain pride on manhood; on all four
Walk, as you see those honest creatures do,
And quite forget that once you walk'd on two.

But if the thoughts of solitude alarm,
And social life hath one remaining charm,
If still thou art to jeopardy decreed
Amongst the monsters of Augusta's breed,
Lay by thy sex, thy safety to procure;
Put off the man, from men to live secure;
Go forth a woman to the public view,
And with their garb assume their manners too.
Had the light-footed Greek of Chiron's school
Been wise enough to keep this single rule,
The maudlin hero, like a puling boy
Robb'd of his plaything, on the plains of Troy
Had never blubber'd at Patroclus' tomb,
And plac'd his minion in his mistress' room.
Be not in this than catamites more nice,
Do that for virtue which they do for vice.
Thus shalt thou pass untainted life's gay bloom,
Thus stand uncourted in the drawing-room,
At midnight thus, untempted, walk the street,
And run no danger but of being beat.

Where is the mother, whose officious zeal
Discreetly judging what her daughters feel
By what she felt herself in days of yore,
Against that lecher man makes fast the door?
Who not permits, e'en for the sake of pray'r,
A priest, uncastrated, to enter there,
Nor (could her wishes and her care prevail)
Would suffer in the house a fly that's male?
Let her discharge her cares, throw wide her doors,
Her daughters cannot, if they would, be whores;
Nor can a man be found, as times now go,
Who thinks it worth his while to make them so.

Though they more fresh, more lively than the morn,
And brighter than the noon-day sun, adorn
The works of nature; though the mother's grace
Revives, improv'd, in ev'ry daughter's face;
Undisciplin'd in dull discretion's rules,
Untaught, and undebauch'd by boarding-schools,
Free and unguarded, let them range the town,
Go forth at random, and run pleasure down,
Start where she will, discard all taint of fear,
Nor think of danger when no danger's near.
Watch not their steps---They're safe without thy care,

Unless, like jennets, they conceive by air,
And ev'ry one of them may die a nun,
Unless they breed, like carrion, in the sun.
Men, dead to pleasure, as they're dead to grace,
Against the law of nature set their face,

VOL. X.

The grand primeval law, and seem combin'd
To stop the propagation of mankind;
Vile Pathics read the marriage act with pride,
And fancy that the law is on their side.

Broke down, and strength a stranger to his bed,
Old L——, though yet alive, is dead;
T—— lives no more, or lives not to our ill;
No longer blest with a Cz——'s smile
T—— is at P—— disgrac'd,
And M—— grown gray, perforce grows chaste;
Nor, to the credit of our modest race,
Rises one stallion to supply their place.
A maidenhead, which, twenty years ago,
In mid December the rank fly would blow
Though closely kept, now, when the Dog-star's heat
Inflames the marrow in the very street,
May lie untouch'd, left for the worms, by those
Who daintily pass by, and hold their nose.
Poor, plain concupiscence is in disgrace,
And simple lech'ry dares not show her face,
Lest she be sent to Bridewell: bankrupts made,
To save their fortunes, bawds leave off that trade,
Which first had left off them; to Wellclose-Square
Fine, fresh, young strumpets (for Dodd preaches
there)

Throng for subsistence; pimps no longer thrive,
And pensions only keep L—— alive.

Where is the mother, who thinks all her pain,
And all her jeopardy of travail, gain,
When a man-child is born; thinks ev'ry pray'r
Paid to the full, and answer'd in an heir?
Short-sighted woman! little doth she know
What streams of sorrow from that source may flow;
Little suspect, while she surveys her boy,
Her young Narcissus, with an eye of joy
Too full for continence, that fate could give
Her darling as a curse; that she may live,
Ere sixteen winters their short course have run,
In agonies of soul, to curse that son.

Pray then for daughters, ye wise mothers,
pray;

They shall reward your love, not make you gray
Before your time with sorrow; they shall give
Ages of peace and comfort, whilst ye live
Make life most truly worth your care, and save,
In spite of death, your mem'ries from the grave.

That sense, with more than manly vigour
fraught,

That fortitude of soul, that stretch of thought,
That genius, great beyond the narrow bound
Of earth's low walk, that judgment perfect found
When wanted most, that purity of taste
Which critics mention by the name of chaste
Adorn'd with elegance, that easy flow
Of ready wit which never made a foe,
That face, that form, that dignity, that ease,
Those pow'rs of pleasing with that will to please,
By which Lepel, when in her youthful days,
E'en from the currish Pope extorted praise,
We see, transmitted, in her daughter shine,
And view a new Lepel in Caroline.

Is a son born into this world of woe?
In never-ceasing streams let sorrow flow;
Be from that hour the house with fables hung,
Let lamentations dwell upon thy tongue,

N n

E'en from the moment that he first began
To wail and whine; let him not see a man;
Lock, lock him up, far from the public eye,
Give him no opportunity to buy,
Or to be bought: B——, though rich, was sold,
And gave his body up to shame for gold.

Let it be bruited all about the town,
That he is coarse, indelicate and brown,
An antidote to lust, his face deep scarr'd
With the small-pox, his body maim'd and marr'd,
Eat up with the king's evil, and his blood,
Tainted throughout, a thick and putrid flood,
Where dwells corruption, making him all o'er,
From head to foot, a rank and running sore.
Should'st thou report him as by nature made,
He is undone, and by thy praise betray'd;
Give him out fair, lechers in number more, [door
More brutal and more fierce, than throng'd the
Of Lot in Sodom, shall to thine repair,
And force a passage, though a god is there.

Let him not have one servant that is male;
Where lords are baffled, servants oft prevail.
Some vices they propose, to all agree;

H—— was guilty, but was M—— free?

Give him no tutor—throw him to a punk,
Rather than trust his morals to a monk—
Monks we all know—we, who have liv'd at home,
From fair report, and travellers, who roam,
More feelingly—nor trust him to the gown,
'Tis oft a covering in this vile town
For base designs; ourselves have liv'd to see
More than one parson in the pillory.
Should he have brothers, (image to thy view
A scene, which, though not public made, is true)
Let not one brother be to t' other known,
Nor let his father sit with him alone.
Be all his servants female, young, and fair;
And if the pride of nature spur thy heir
To deeds of venery, if, hot and wild,
He chance to get some score of maids with child,
Chide, but forgive him; whoredom is a crime,
Which, more at this than any other time,
Call for indulgence, and, 'mongst such a race,
To have a bastard is some sign of grace.

Born in such times, should I sit tamely down,
Suppress my rage, and saunter through the town
As one who knew not, or who shar'd these crimes?

Should I at lesser evils point my rhymes,
And let this giant sin, in the full eye
Of observation, pass unwounded by?
Though our meek wives, passive obedience taught,
Patiently bear those wrongs for which they ought,
With the brave spirit of their dams possess'd,
To plant a dagger in each husband's breast,
To cut off male increase from this fair isle,
And turn our Thames into another Nile;
Though, on his Sunday, the smug pulpiter,
Loud 'gainst all other crimes, is silent here,
And thinks himself absolv'd, in the pretence
Of decency, which meant for the defence
Of real virtue, and to raise her price,
Becomes an agent for the cause of vice; [take Though the law sleeps, and through the care they
To drug her well, may never more awake;

Born in such times, nor with that patience curb
Which saints may boast of, I must speak, or burst.

But if, too eager in my bold career,
Haply I wound the nice and chaster ear,
If all unguarded, all too rude, I speak,
And call up blushes in the maiden's cheek,
Forgive, ye fair—my real motives view,
And to forgiveness add your praises too.
For you I write—nor wish a better plan,
The cause of woman is most worthy man—
For you I still will write, nor hold my hand,
Whilst there's one slave of Sodom in the land.

Let them fly far, and skulk from place to place,
Not daring to meet manhood face to face,
Their steps I'll track, nor yield them one retreat
Where they may hide their heads, or rest their feet,

'Till God in wrath shall let his vengeance fall,
And make a great example of them all,
Bidding in one grand pile this town expire,
Her towers in dust, her Thames a lake of fire;
Or they (most worth our wish) convinc'd, though late,

Of their past crimes, and dangerous estate,
Pardon of women with repentance buy,
And learn to honour them, as much as I.

INDEPENDENCE.

HAPPY the bard (though few such bards we find)
Who, 'bove controulment, dares to speak his mind;
Dares, unabash'd, in ev'ry place appear,
And nothing fears, but what he ought to fear.
His fashion cannot tempt, him abject need
Cannot compel, him pride cannot mislead
To be the slave of greatness, to strike sail,
When, sweeping onward with her peacock's tail,
Quality, in full plumage, passes by;
He views her with a fix'd, contemptuous eye,
And mock the puppet, keeps his own due state,
And is above conversing with the great.

Perish those slaves, those minions of the quill,
Who have conspir'd to seize that sacred hill
Where the nine sisters pour a genuine strain,
And sunk the mountain level with the plain;
Who, with mean, private views, and servile art,
No spark of virtue living in their heart,
Have basely turn'd apostates, have debas'd
Their dignity of office, have disgrac'd,
Like Eli's sons, the altar where they stand,
And caus'd their name to stink through all the land,

Have stoop'd to prostitute their venal pen
For the support of great but guilty men,
Have made the bard, of their own vile accord,
Inferior to that thing we call a lord.

What is a lord? Doth that plain, simple word
Contain some magic spell? As soon as heard,
Like an alarm-bell on night's dull ear,
Doth it strike louder, and more strong appear
Than other words? Whether we will or no,
Through reason's court doth it unquestion'd go
E'en on the mention and of course transmit
Notions of something excellent, of wit [chaste,
Pleasing though keen, of humour free though
Of sterling genius with sound judgment grac'd,

Of virtue far above temptation's reach,
And honour which not malice can impeach?
Believe it not—'twas nature's first intent,
Before their rank became their punishment.
They should have pass'd for men, nor blush'd to prize

The blessings she bestow'd.—She gave them eyes,
And they could see—she gave them ears—they heard—

The instruments of stirring, and they stir'd—
Like us, they were design'd to eat, to drink,
To talk, and (ev'ry now and then) to think:
'Till they, by pride corrupted, for the sake
Of singularity, disclaim'd that make;
'Till they, disdaining nature's vulgar mode,
Flew off, and struck into another road,
More fitting quality, and to our view
Came forth a species altogether new, [know,
Something we had not known, and could not
Like nothing of God's making here below;
Nature exclaim'd with wonder—lords are things,
Which, never made by me, were made by kings.

A lord (nor let the honest and the brave,
The true, old noble with the fool and knave
Here mix his fame: curst be that thought of mine,

Which with a B—and F—should Grafton join)
A lord (nor here let censure rashly call
My just contempt of some abuse of all,
And as of late, when S—dom was my theme,
Slander my purpose, and my muse blasphemous,
Because she stops not, rapid in her song,
To make exceptions as she goes along,
Though well she hopes to find, another year,
A whole minority exceptions here)
A mere, mere lord, with nothing but the name,
Wealth all his worth, and title all his fame,
Lives on another man; himself a blank,
Thankless he lives, or must some grandsire thank
For smuggled honours, and ill-gotten pelf;
A bard owes all to nature and himself.

Gods, how my soul is burnt up with disdain,
When I see men, whom Phœbus in his train
Might view with pride, lacquey the heels of those Whom genius ranks amongst her greatest foes!
And what's the cause? Why these same sons of scorn,

No thanks to them, were to a title born,
And could not help it; by chance hither sent,
And only deities by accident.
Had fortune on our getting chanc'd to shine,
Their birthright honours had been your's or mine.
'Twas a mere random stroke; and should the throne

Eye thee with favour, proud and lordly grown,
Thou, though a bard, might'st be their fellow yet,
But Felix never can be made a wit.
No, in good faith—that's one of those few things
Which fate hath plac'd beyond the reach of kings.
Bards may be lords, but 'tis not in the cards,
Play how we will, to turn lords into bards.

A bard—a lord—Why let them hand in hand
Go forth as friends, and travel through the land;
Observe which word the people can digest
Most readily, which goes to market best,

Which gets most credit; whether men will trust
A bard because they think he may be just,
Or on a lord will choose to risk their gains,
Though privilege in that point still remains.

A bard—a lord—let reason take her scales,
And fairly weigh those words; see which prevails,

Which in the balance lightly kicks the beam,
And which by sinking, we the victor deem.

'Tis done, and Hermes, by command of Jove,
Summons a synod in the sacred grove. [high,
Gods throng with gods to take their chairs on
And sit in state the senate of the sky;
Whilst, in a kind of parliament below,
Men stare at those above, and want to know
What they're transacting. Reason takes her stand
Just in the midst, a balance in her hand,
Which o'er and o'er she tries, and finds it true.
From either side, conducted full in view,
A man comes forth, of figure strange and queer;
We now and then see something like them here.

The first was meagre, flimsy, void of strength,
But nature kindly had made up in length
What she in breadth denied. Erect and proud,
A head and shoulders taller than the crowd,
He deem'd them pigmies all: loose hung his skin
O'er his bare bones; his face so very thin,
So very narrow, and so much beat out,
That physiognomists have made a doubt,
Proportion lost, expression quite forgot,
Whether it could be call'd a face or not;
At end of it howe'er, unblest with beard,
Some twenty fathom length of chin appear'd;
With legs, which we might well conceive that fate
Meant only to support a spider's weight,
Firmly he strove to tread, and with a stride
Which show'd at once his weakness and his pride,
Shaking himself to pieces, seem'd to cry,

"Observe, good people, how I shake the sky."
In his right hand a paper did he hold,
On which, at large, in characters of gold,
Distinct, and plain for those who run to see,
Saint Archibald had wrote L O, R, D.
This, with an air of scorn, he from afar
Twirl'd into reason's scales, and on that bar,
Which from his soul he hated, yet admir'd,
Quick turn'd his back, and as he came retir'd.

The judge to all around his name declar'd;
Each goddess titter'd, each god laugh'd, Jove
star'd,

And the whole people cried, with one accord,
"Good Heaven bless us all, is that a lord!"

Such was the first—the second was a man,
Whom nature built on quite a diff'rent plan;
A bear, whom from the moment he was born
His dam despis'd, and left unlick'd in scorn;
A Babel, which, the pow'r of art outdone,
She could not finish when she had begun;
An utter chaos, out of which no might
But that of God could strike one spark of light.

Broad were his shoulders, and from blade to blade

A H—— might at full length have laid;
Vast were his bones, his muscles twisted strong;
His face was short, but broader than 'twas long;

His features, though by nature they were large,
Contentment had contriv'd to overcharge,
And bury meaning, save that we might spy
Sense low'ring on the penthouse of his eye;
His arms were two twin oaks; his legs so stout
That they might bear a mansion-house about;
Nor were they, look but at his body there,
Design'd by fate a much less weight to bear.

O'er a brown caffock, which had once been black,
Which hung in tatters on his brawny back,
A sight most strange, and awkward to behold,
He threw a covering of blue and gold.

Just at that time of life, when man by rule,
The fop laid down, takes up the graver fool,
He started up a fop, and, fond of show,
Look'd like another Hercules turn'd beau.

A subject met with only now and then,
Much fitter for the pencil than the pen;
Hogarth would draw him (envy must allow)
E'en to the life, was Hogarth living now.

With such accoutrements, with such a form,
Much like a porpoise just before a storm,
Onward he roll'd: a laugh prevail'd around,
E'en Jove was seen to smiler; at the sound
(Nor was the cause unknown, for from his youth Himself he studied by the glass of truth)
He join'd their mirth, nor shall the gods condemn,
If, whilst they laugh'd at him, he laugh'd at them.
Judge Reason view'd him with an eye of grace,
Look'd through his soul, and quite forgot his face,
And, from his hand receiv'd, with fair regard
Plac'd in her other scale the name of bard.

Then (for she did as judges ought to do,
She nothing of the case beforehand knew,
Nor wish'd to know; she never stretch'd the laws,
Nor, basely to anticipate a cause,
Compell'd solicitors, no longer free,
To show those briefs she had no right to see)
Then she with equal hand her scales held out,
Nor did the cause one moment hang in doubt;
She held her scales out fair to public view,
The lord, as sparks fly upwards, upwards flew,
More light than air, deceitful in the weight;
The bard, preponderating, kept his state.

Reason approv'd, and with a voice, whose sound
Shook earth, shook heaven, on the clearest ground,
Pronouncing for the bards a full decree,
Cried—"Those must honour them who honour me;
"They from this present day, where'er I reign,
"In their own right precedence shall obtain:
"Merit rules here; be it enough that birth
"Intoxicates, and sways the fools of earth."

Nor think that here, in hatred to a lord,
I've forg'd a tale, or alter'd a record;
Search when you will (I am not now in sport)
You'll find it register'd in reason's court.

Nor think that envy here hath strung my lyre,
That I depreciate what I most admire;
And look on titles with an eye of scorn,
Because I was not to a title born.
By him that made me, I am much more proud,
More inly satisfied to have a crowd
Point at me as I pass, and cry,—"That's he—
"A poor, but honest bard, who dares be free
"Amidst corruption," than to have a train
Of s lick'ring levee slaves, to make me vain

Of things I ought to blush for; to run, fly,
And live but in the motion of my eye;
When I am less than man, my faults t'adore,
And make me think that I am something more.

Recal past times, bring back the days of old,
When the great noble bore his honours bold,
And in the face of peril, when he dar'd
Things which his legal bastard, if declar'd,
Might well discredit; faithful to his trust,
In the extremest points of justice just,
Well knowing all, and lov'd by all he knew,
True to his king, and to his country true;
Honest at court, above the baits of gain,
Plain in his dress, and in his manners plain;
Mod'rate in wealth, gen'rous, but not profuse,
Well worthy riches, for he knew their use;
Possessing much, and yet deserving more,
Deserving those high honours which he wore
With ease to all, and in return gain'd fame,
Which all men paid, because he did not claim;
When the grim war was plac'd in dread array,
Fierce as the lion roaring for his prey,
Or lionsess of royal whelps foredone,
In peace, as mild as the departing sun,
A gen'ral blessing wherefoe'er he turn'd,
Patron of learning, nor himself unlearn'd;
Ever awake at pity's tender call,
A father of the poor, a friend to all;
Recal such times, and from the grave bring back
A worth like this, my heart shall bend or crack,
My stubborn pride give way, my tongue proclaim,
And ev'ry muse conspire to swell his fame,
Till envy shall to him that praise allow
Which she cannot deny to Temple now.

This justice claims, nor shall the bard forget,
Delighted with the task, to pay that debt,
To pay it like a man, and in his lays,
Sounding such worth, prove his own right to praise.
But let not pride and prejudice misdeem,
And think that empty titles are my theme;
Titles with me are vain, and nothing worth,
I rev'rence virtue, but I laugh at birth.
Give me a lord that's honest, frank, and brave,
I am his friend, but cannot be his slave;
Though none indeed but blockheads would pretend
To make a slave where they may make a friend.
I love his virtues, and will make them known,
Confess his rank, but can't forget my own.
Give me a lord, who, to a title born,
Boasts nothing else, I'll pay him scorn with scorn.
What, shall my pride (and pride is virtue here)
Tamely make way, if such a wretch appear?
Shall I uncover'd stand, and bend my knee
To such a shadow of nobility,
A shred, a remnant? He might rot unknown
For any real merit of his own,
And never had come forth to public note,
Had he not worn by chance his father's coat.
To think a M—— worth my least regards,
Is treason to the majesty of bards.

By nature form'd (when for her honour's sake
She something more than common strove to make,
When, overlooking each minute defect,
And all too eager to be quite correct,
In her full heat and vigour she impress
Her stamp most strongly on the favour'd breast)

The bard, nor think too lightly that I mean
Those little, piddling witlings, who o'erween
Of their small parts, the Murphys of the stage,
The Masons and the Whiteheads of the age,
Who all in raptures their own works rehearse,
And drawl out measur'd prose, which they call verse)

The real bard, whom native genius fires,
Whom every maid of Castaly inspires,
Let him consider wherefore he was meant,
Let him but answer nature's great intent,
And fairly weigh himself with other men,
Would ne'er debase the glories of his pen,
Would in full state, like a true monarch, live,
Nor 'bate one inch of his prerogative.

Methinks I see old Wingate frowning here,
(Wingate may in the season be a peer,
Though now, against his will, of figures sick,
He's forc'd to diet on arithmetic,
E'en whilst he envies ev'ry Jew he meets,
Who cries old clothes to sell about the streets)
Methinks (his mind with future honours big,
His Tyburn bob turn'd to a dress'd bag wig)
I hear him cry—"What doth this jargon mean?
" Was ever such a damn'd dull blockhead seen?
" Majesty—Bard—Prerogative—Disdain
" Hath got into, and turn'd the fellow's brain;
" To Bethlem with him—give him whips and straw—

" I'm very sensible he's mad in law.
" A saucy groom who trades in reason, thus
" To set himself upon a par with us;
" If this here's suffer'd, and if that there fool
" May when he pleases send us all to school,
" Why then our only business is outright
" To take our caps, and bid the world good night.
" I've kept a bard myself this twenty years,
" But nothing of this kind in him appears.
" He, like a thorough true bred spaniel, licks
" The hand which cuffs him, and the foot which kicks;

" He fetches and he carries, blacks my shoes,
" Nor thinks it a discredit to his muse;
" A creature of the rightameleon hue,
" He wears my colours, yellow or true blue,
" Just as I wear them; 'tis all one to him
" Whether I change through conscience or through whim.

" Now this is something like; on such a plan
" A bard may find a friend in a great man;
" But this proud coxcomb—Zounds, I thought that all

" Of this queer tribe had been like my old Paul."
Injurious thought! accus'd be the tongue
On which the vile insinuation hung,
The heart where 'twas engender'd! Curst be those,
Those bards, who not themselves alone expose,
But me, but all, and make the very name
By which they're call'd a standing mark of shame.

Talk not of custom—'tis the coward's plea,
Current with fools, but passes not with me;
An old stale trick, which guilt hath often tried
By numbers to o'erpow'r the better side.
Why tell me then that from the birth of rhyme,
matter when, down to the present time,

As by th' original decree of fate,
Bards have protection sought amongst the great;
Conscious of weakness, have applied to them
As vines to elms, and twining round their stem,
Flourish'd on high; to gain this wish'd support,
E'en Virgil to Mæcenas paid his court?
As to the custom, 'tis a point agreed,
But 'twas a foolish diffidence, not need,
From which it rose: had bards but truly known
That strength, which is most properly their
own,

Without a lord, unpropp'd, they might have stood,
And overtopp'd those giants of the wood.

But why, when present times my care engage,
Must I go back to the Augustan age?
Why, anxious for the living, am I led
Into the mansions of the ancient dead?
Can they find patrons no where but at Rome,
And must I seek Mæcenas in the tomb?
Name but a Wingate, twenty fools of note
Start up, and from report Mæcenas quote;
Under his colours lords are proud to fight,
Forgetting that Mæcenas was a knight;
They mention him, as if to use his name
Was in some measure to partake his fame,
Though Virgil, were he living, in the street
Might rot for them, or perish in the Fleet.
See how they redden, and the charge disclaim—
Virgil, and in the Fleet!—Forbid it, shame.
Hence, ye vain boasters, to the Fleet repair,
And ask, with blushes ask, if LLOYD is there*.

Patrons, in days of yore, were men of sense,
Were men of taste, and had a fair pretence
To rule in letters.—Some of them were heard
To read off hand, and never spell a word;
Some of them too, to such a monstrous height
Was learning risen, for themselves could write,
And kept their secretaries, as the great
Do many other foolish things, for state.

Our patrons are of quite a different strain,
With neither sense nor taste, against the grain;
They patronize for fashion sake—no more—
And keep a bard, just as they keep a whore.
Melcombe† (on such occasion I am loth
To name the dead) was a rare proof of both.
Some of them would be puzzled e'en to read,
Nor could deserve their clergy by their creed;
Others can write, but such a pagan hand,
A Willes‡ should always at our elbow stand;
Many, if begg'd, a chancellor, of right,
Would order into keeping at first sight.
Those who stand fairest to the public view,
Take to themselves the praise to others due;
They rob the very spital, and make free
With those, alas! who've least to spare.—We see,
—hath not had a word to say,
Since winds and waves bore Single speech away.

Patrons in days of yore, like patrons now,
Expected that the bard should make his bow

* Lloyd died in the Fleet, Dec. 15, 1764, shortly after the publication of this poem.

† George Bubb Dodington, Lord Melcombe. He died July 28, 1762.

‡ Decipherer to the state.

At coming in, and ev'ry now and then
Hint to the world that they were more than men;
But, like the patrons of the present day,
They never birk'd the poet of his pay.
Virgil lov'd rural ease, and, far from harm,
Mæcenas fix'd him in a neat, snug farm,
Where he might free from trouble, pass his days
In his own way, and pay his rent in praise.
Horace lov'd wine, and, through his friend at court,

Could buy it off the quay in ev'ry port;
Horace lov'd mirth, Mæcenas lov'd it too,
They met, they laugh'd, as Goy * and I may do,
Nor in those moments paid the least regard
To which was minister, and which was bard.

Not so our patrons—grave as grave can be,
They know themselves, they keep up dignity;
Bards are a forward race, nor is it fit
That men of fortune rank with men of wit;
Wit, if familiar made, will find her strength—
'Tis best to keep her weak and at arms-length.
'Tis well enough for bards, if patrons give,
From hand to mouth, the scanty means to live.
Such is their language, and their practice such.
They promise little, and they give not much.
Let the weak bard, with prostituted strain, [dain;
Praise that proud Scot, whom all good men dis-
What's his reward? Why, his own fame undone,
He may obtain a patent for the run
Of his lord's kitchen, and have ample time,
With offal fed, to cou't the cook in rhyme;
Or (if he strives true patriots to disgrace)
May at the second table get a place,
With somewhat greater slaves allow'd to dine,
And play at crambo 'er his gill of wine.

And are there bards who on creation's file
Stand rank'd as men, who breathe in this fair isle
The air of freedom with so little gall,
So low a spirit, prostrate thus to fall
Before these idols, and without a groan
Bear wrongs might call forth murmurs from a stone?

Better and much more noble, to abjure
The sight of men, and in some cave, secure
From all the outrages of pride, to feast
On nature's sallads, and be free at least.
Better (though that, to say the truth, is worse
Than almost any other modern curse)
Discard all sense, divorce the thankless muse,
Critics commence, and write in the reviews;
Write without tremor, Griffiths cannot read;
No fool can fail, where Langhorne can succeed.

But (not to make a brave and honest pride
Try those means first, she must disdain when tried)

There are a thousand ways, a thousand arts,
By which, and fairly, men of real parts
May gain a living, gain what nature craves;
Let those, who pine for more, live, and be slaves.
Our real wants in a small compass lie,
But lawless appetite with eager eye,
Kept in a constant fever, more requires,
And we are burnt up with our own desires.

* A Frenchman, secretary to Mr. Wilkes.

Hence our dependence, hence our slav'ry springs;
Bards, if contented are as great as kings.
Ourselves are to ourselves the cause of ill;
We may be independent, if we will.
The man who suits his spirit to his state,
Stands on an equal footing with the great;
Moguls themselves are not more rich, and he
Who rules the English nation, not more free.
Chains were not forg'd more durable and strong
For bards than others, but they've worn them long,
And therefore wear them still; they've quite forgot

What freedom is, and therefore prize her not.
Could they, though in their sleep, could they but know

The blessings which from independence flow;
Could they but have a short and transient gleam
Of liberty though 'twas but in a dream;
They would no more in bondage bend their knees;
But, once made freemen, would be always free.
The muse, if she one moment freedom gains,
Can never more submit to sing in chains.
Bred in a cage, far from the feather'd throng,
The bird repays his keeper with his song,
But if some playful child sets wide the door,
Abroad he flies and thinks of home no more,
With love of liberty begins to burn,
And rather starves than to his cage return.

Hail, Independence—by true reason taught,
How few have known, and priz'd thee as they ought.

Some give thee up for riot; some, like boys,
Resign thee, in their childish moods, for toys;
Ambition some, some avarice misleads,
And in both cases independence bleeds:
Abroad, in quest of thee, how many roam,
Nor know they had thee in their reach at home;
Some, though about their paths, their beds about,
Have never had the sense to find thee out;
Others, who know of what they are possess'd,
Like fearful misers, lock thee in a chest,

or have the resolution to produce
In these bad times, and bring thee forth for use.
Hail, Independence—though thy name's scarce
known,

Though thou, alas! art out of fashion grown,
Though all despise thee, I will not despise,
Nor live one moment longer than I prize
Thy presence, and enjoy: by angry fate
Bow'd down, and almost crush'd, thou cam'st, though late,

Thou cam'st upon me, like a second birth,
And made me know what life was truly worth.

Hail, Independence—never may my cot,
Ill I forget thee, be by thee forgot;
Thither, O thither oftentimes repair;
Cotes *, whom thou lov'st too, shall meet thee
there;

All thoughts, but what arise from joy, give o'er;
Peace dwells within, and law shall guard the door.

O'erweening bard! law guard thy door, what law?

The law of England?—To controul, and awe

* Humphrey Cotes.

Those saucy hopes, to strike that spirit dumb,
Behold, in state, administration come.

Why let her come, in all her terrors too;
I dare to suffer all she dares to do
I know her malice well, and know her pride,
I know her strength, but will not change my side.
This melting mass of flesh she may controul
With iron ribs, she cannot chain my soul.
No—to the last resolv'd her worst to bear,
I'm still at large, and independent there.

Where is this minister? Where is the band
Of ready slaves, who at his elbow stand
To hear, and to perform his wicked will?
Why for the first time, are they slow to ill?
When some grand act 'gainst law is to be done,
Doth — sleep; doth bloodhound — run
To L —, and worry those small deer,
When he might do more precious mischief here?
Doth Webb turn tail? Doth he refuse to draw
Illegal warrants; and to call them law? [run,
Doth Webb, at Guildford kick'd, from Guildford
With that cold lump of unbak'd dough, his son,
And, his more honest rival Ketch to cheat,
Purchase a burial-place where three ways meet?
Believe it not; — is — still,
And never sleeps, when he should wake to ill;
— doth lesser mischiefs by the bye,
The great ones till the term in petto lie;
Webb lives, and, to the strictest justice true,
Scorns to defraud the hangman of his due.

O my poor country—weak and overpower'd
By thine own sons—eat to the bone—devour'd
By vipers, which, in thine own entrails bred,
Prey on thy life, and with thy blood are fed,
With unavailing grief thy wrongs I see,
And, for myself not feeling, feel for thee.
I grieve, but can't despair—for, lo, at hand
Freedom presents a choice, but faithful band
Of loyal patriots, men who greatly dare
In such a noble cause, men fit to bear
The weight of empires; fortune, rank, and sense,
Virtue, and knowledge, leagu'd with eloquence,
March in their ranks; freedom from file to file
Darts her delighted eye, and with a smile
Approves her honest sons, whilst down her cheek,
As 'twere by stealth (her heart too full to speak)
One tear in silence creeps, one honest tear,
And seems to say, "Why is not Granby here?"

O ye brave few, in whom we still may find
A love of virtue, freedom, and mankind,
Go forth, in majesty of woe array'd,
See, at your feet your country kneels for aid,
And (many of her children traitors grown)
Kneels to those sons she still can call her own;
Seeming to breathe her last in ev'ry breath,
She kneels for freedom, or she begs for death—
Fly then, each duteous son, each English chief,
And to your drooping parent bring relief.
Go forth—nor let the tyren voice of ease
Tempt ye to sleep, whilst tempests swell the seas;
Go forth—nor let the hypocrity, whose tongue
With many a fair, false, fatal art is hung,
Like Bethel's tawning prophet, cross your way,
When your great errand brooks not of delay;
Nor let vain fear, who cries to all she meets,
Trembling and pale—"A lion in the streets"—

Damp your free spirits; let not threats affright,
Nor bribes corrupt, nor flatteries delight.
Be as one man—concord success ensures—
There's not an English heart but what is yours.
Go forth—and virtue ever in your fight,
Shall be your guide by day, your guard by night—
Go forth the champions of your native land,
And may the battle prosper in your hand—
It may, must—Ye cannot be withstood—
Be your heart honest, as your cause is good.

THE JOURNEY.

SOME of my friends (for friends I must suppose
All, who, not daring to appear my foes,
Feign great good-will, and not more full of spite
Than full of craft, under false colours fight)
Some of my friends (so lavishly I print)
As more in sorrow than in anger, hint
(Though that indeed scarce will admit a doubt)
That I shall run my stock of genius out,
My no great stock, and, publishing so fast,
Must needs become a bankrupt at the last.

"The husbandman, to spare a thankful soil,
"Which, rich in disposition, pays his toil
"More than a hundred fold, which swells his store
"E'en to his wish, and makes his barns run o'er,
"By long experience taught who teaches best,
"Foregoes his hopes a while, and gives it rest.
"The land, allow'd its losses to repair,
"Refresh'd, and full in strength, delights to wear
"A second youth, and to the farmer's eyes
"Bids richer crops and double harvests rise.
"Nor think this practice to the earth confin'd;
"It reaches to the culture of the mind.
"The mind of man craves rest, and cannot bear,
"Though next in pow'r to God's continual care.
"Genius himself (nor here let genius frown)
"Must, to ensure his vigour, be laid down,
"And fallow'd well: had Churchill known but
"this, [miss,
"Which the most slight observer scarce could
"He might have flourish'd twenty years or more,
"Though now, alas! poor man! worn out in "four."

Recover'd from the vanity of youth,
I feel, alas! this melancholy truth,
Thanks to each cordial, each advising friend,
And am, if not too late, resolv'd to mend,
Resolv'd to give some respite to my pen,
Apply myself once more to books and men,
View what is present, what is past review,
And my old stock exhausted, lay in new.
For twice six moons (let winds, turn'd porters, beat
This oath to Heav'n) for twice six moons, I swear
No muse shall tempt me with her syren lay,
Nor draw me from improvement's thorny way:
Verse I abjure, nor will forgive that friend,
Who in my hearing shall a rhyme commend.
It cannot be—Whether I will, or no,
Such as they are, my thought in measures flow,
Convinc'd, determin'd, I in prose begin.
But ere I write one sentence, verse creeps in, [light,
And taints me through and through: by this good
In verse I talk by day, I dream by night;

If now and then I curse, my curses chime,
Nor can I pray, unless I pray in rhyme.
E'en now I err, in spite of common sense,
And my confession doubles my offence.

Rest then, my friends—spare, spare your precious breath,

And be your slumbers not less sound than death;
Perturbed spirits rest, nor thus appear
To waste your counsels in a spendthrift's ear;
On your grave lessons I cannot subsist,
Nor e'en in verse become economist;
Rest then, my friends, nor, hateful to my eyes,
Let envy in the shape of pity rise
To blast me ere my time; with patience wait,
('Tis no long interval) propitious fate
Shall glut your pride, and ev'ry son of phlegm
Find ample room to censure and condemn.
Read some three hundred lines (no easy task;
But probably the last that I shall ask),
And give me up for ever; wait one hour,
Nay not so much, revenge is in your pow'r,
And ye may cry, "Ere time hath turn'd his glass,
"Lo! what we prophesy'd is come to pass."

Let those, who poetry in poems claim,
Or not read this, or only read to blame;
Let those, who are by fiction's charms enslav'd,
Return me thanks for half-a-crown well sav'd;
Let those, who love a little gall in rhyme,
Postpone their purchase now, and call next time;
Let those, who, void of nature, look for art:
Take up their money, and in peace depart;
Let those, who energy of diction prize,
For Billingsgate quit Flexney, and be wise;
Here is no lie, no gall, no art, no force;
Mean are the words, and such as come of course,
'The subject not less simple than the lay;
A plain, unlabour'd Journey of a day.

Far from me now be ev'ry tuneful maid,
I neither ask, nor can receive their aid.

Pegasus turn'd into a common hack,
Alone I jog, and keep the beaten track,
Nor would I have the sisters of the hill
Behold their bard in such a dishabille.

Absent, but only absent for a time,
Let them carefs some dearer son of rhyme;
Let them, as far as decency permits,
Without suspicion, play the fool with wits,
'Gainst fools be guarded; 'tis a certain rule,
Wits are safe things, there's danger in a fool.

Let them, though modest, Gray more modest woo;

Let them with Mason bleat, and bray, and coo;
Let them with Franklin, proud of some small Greek,
Make Sophocles disguis'd, in English speak;
Let them with Glover o'er Medea doze;
Let them with Doddsley wail Cleone's woes,
Whilst he, fine feeling creature, all in tears,
Melts as they melt, and weeps with weeping peers;
Let them with simple Whitehead, taught to creep,
Silent and soft, lay Fontenelle asleep*;
Let them with Brown contrive, no vulgar trick,
To cure the dead, and make the living sick†;

* See the School for Lovers, by Mr. Whitehead, taken from Fontenelle.

† See the Cure of Saul, by Dr. Brown.

Let them in charity to Murphy give
Some old French piece, that he may steal and live;
Let them with antic Foote subscriptions get,
And advertise a summer-house of wit.

Thus, or in any better way they please,
While these great men, or with great men like these,

Let them their appetite for laughter feed:
I on my Journey all alone proceed.

If fashionable grown, and fond of pow'r,
With hum'rous Scots let them disport their hour:
Let them dance, fairy-like round Ossian's tomb;
Let them forge lies and histories for Hume;
Let them with Home, the very prince of verse,
Make something like a tragedy in Erse;
Under dark allegory's flimsy veil
Let them with Ogilvy spin out a tale
Of rueful length; let them plain things obscure,
Debase what's truly rich, and what is poor
Make poorer still by jargon most uncouth;
With ev'ry pert, prim prettiness of youth
Born of false taste, with fancy (like a child
Not knowing what it cries for) running wild,
With bloated style, by affectation taught,
With much false colouring, and little thought,
With phrases strange, and dialect decreed
By reason never to have pass'd the Tweed,
With words which nature meant each others foe,
Forc'd to compound whether they will or no;
With such materials, let them, if they will,
To prove at once their pleasantry and skill,
Build up a bard to war 'gainst common sense,
By way of compliment to Providence;
Let them with Armstrong, taking leave of sense,
Read musty lectures on benevolence,
Or con the pages of his gaping day,
Where all his former fame was thrown away,
Where all but barren labour was forgot,
And the vain stiffness of a letter'd Scot;
Let them with Armstrong pass the term of light,
But not one hour of darkness; when the night
Suspends this mortal coil, when memory wakes,
When for our past misdoings conscience takes
A deep revenge, when by reflection led,
She draws his curtains, and looks comfort dead,
Let ev'ry muse be gone; in vain he turns
And tries to pray for sleep; an Ætna burns,
A more than Ætna in his coward breast,
And guilt, with vengeance arm'd, forbids him rest
Though soft as plumage from young zephyr's wing,

His couch seems hard, and no relief can bring.
Ingratitude hath planted daggers there,
No good man can deserve, no brave man bear.

Thus, or in any better way they please
With these great men, or with great men like these,

Let them their appetite for laughter feed;
I on my Journey all alone proceed.

DEDICATION TO CHURCHILL'S SERMONS.

HEALTH to great Gloster—from a man unknown,
Who holds thy health as dearly as his own,

Accept this greeting—nor let modest fear
 Call up one maiden blush—I mean not here
 To wound with flattery—'tis a villain's art,
 And suits not with the frankness of my heart.
 Truth best becomes an orthodox divine,
 And, spite of hell, that character is mine :
 To speak e'en bitter truths I cannot fear ;
 But truth, my Lord, is panegyric here.

Health to great Gloster—nor, through love of ease,
 Which all priests love, let this address displease.
 I ask no favour, not one note I crave,
 And when this busy brain rests in the grave,
 (For till that time it never can have rest)
 I will not trouble you with one bequest ;
 Some humbler friend, my mortal journey done,
 More near in blood, a nephew, or a son,
 In that dread hour executor I'll leave ;
 For I, alas ! have many to receive,
 To give but little—to great Gloster health ;
 Nor let thy true and proper love of wealth
 Here take a false alarm—in purse though poor,
 In spirit I'm right proud, nor can endure
 The mention of a bribe—thy pocket's free,
 I, though dedicator, scorn a fee.
 Let thy own offspring all thy fortunes share ;
 I would not Allen rob, nor Allen's heir.

Think not, a thought unworthy thy great soul,
 Which pomps of this world never could controul,
 Which never offer'd up at power's vain shrine,
 Think not that pomp and pow'r can work on mine.
 'Tis not thy name, though that indeed is great,
 'Tis not the tinsel trumpery of state,
 'Tis not thy title, doctor though thou art,
 'Tis not thy mitre, which hath won my heart.
 State is a farce, names are but empty things,
 Degrees are bought, and, by mistaken kings,
 Titles are oft misplac'd ; mitres, which shine
 So bright in other eyes, are dull in mine,
 Unless set off by virtue : who deceives
 Under the sacred sanction of lawn sleeves,
 Enhances guilt, commits a double sin ;
 So fair without, and yet so foul within.
 'Tis not thy outward form, thy easy mien,
 Thy sweet complacency, thy brow serene,
 Thy open front, thy love-commanding eye,
 Where fifty cupids, as in ambush, lie,
 Which can from sixty to sixteen impart,
 The force of love, and point his blunted dart ;
 'Tis not thy face, though that by nature's made
 An index to thy soul, though there display'd
 We see thy mind at large, and through thy skin
 Peeps out that courtesy which dwells within ;
 'Tis not thy birth, for that is low as mine,
 Around our heads no lineal glories shine—
 But what is birth—when, to delight mankind,
 Heralds can make those arms they cannot find ;
 When thou art to thyself, thy sire unknown,
 A whole Welch genealogy alone ?
 No, 'tis thy inward man, thy proper worth,
 Thy right just estimation here on earth,
 Thy life and doctrine uniformly join'd,
 And flowing from that wholesome source thy mind,

Thy known contempt of persecution's rod,
 Thy charity for man, thy love of God,

Thy faith in Christ, so well approv'd 'mongst men,
 Which now give life and utterance to my pen :
 Thy virtue, not thy rank, demands my lays ;
 'Tis not the bishop, but the saint I praise.
 Rais'd by that theme, I soar on wings more strong,
 And burst forth into praise withheld too long.

Much did I wish, e'en whilst I kept those sheep,
 Which, for my curse, I was ordain'd to keep ;
 Ordain'd, alas ! to keep through need, not choice,
 Those sheep which never heard their shepherd's voice, [way,
 Which did not know, yet would not learn their
 Which stray'd themselves, yet griev'd that I should stray,

Those sheep, which my good father (on his bier
 Let filial duty drop the pious tear)
 Kept well, yet starv'd himself ; e'en at that time,
 Whilst I was pure, and innocent of rhyme,
 Whilst, sacred dullness ever in my view,
 Sleep at my bidding crept from pew to pew,
 Much did I wish, though little could I hope,
 A friend in him who was the friend of Pope.

His hand, said I, my youthful steps shall guide,
 And lead me safe where thousands fall beside ;
 His temper, his experience shall controul,
 And hush to peace the tempest of my soul ;
 His judgment teach me, from the critic school,
 How not to err, and how to err by rule ;
 Instruct me, mingle profit with delight,
 Where Pope was wrong, where Shakspeare was not right ; [whim,

Where they are justly prais'd, and where through
 How little's due to them, how much to him.
 Rais'd 'bove the slav'ry of common rules,
 Of common-sense, of modern, ancient schools,
 Those feelings banish'd, which mislead us all,
 Fools as we are, and which we nature call,
 He, by his great example, might impart
 A better something, and baptize it art ;
 He, all the feelings of my youth forgot,
 Might show me what is taste, by what is not ;
 By him supported, with a proper pride,
 I might hold all mankind as fools beside ;
 He (should a world perverse and peevish grown,
 Explode his maxims, and assert their own)
 Might teach me, like himself, to be content,
 And let their folly be their punishment ;
 Might like himself teach his adopted son,
 'Gainst all the world, to quote a Warburton.

Fool that I was, could I so much deceive
 My soul with lying hopes ; could I believe
 That he, the servant of his Maker sworn,
 The servant of his Saviour, would be torn
 From their embrace, and leave that dear employ,
 The cure of souls, his duty and his joy,
 For toys like mine, and waste his precious time,
 On which so much depended, for a rhyme ?
 Should he forsake the task he undertook,
 Desert his flock, and break his past'ral crook ?
 Should he (forbid it Heaven) so high in place,
 So rich in knowledge, quit the work of grace,
 And, idly wand'ring o'er the muses' hill,
 Let the salvation of mankind stand still ?

Far, far be that from thee—yes, far from thee
 Be such revolt from grace, and far from me

The will to think it—guilt is in the thought—
Not so, not so, hath Warburton been taught,
Not so learn'd Christ—Recal that day, well-
known,

When (to maintain God's honour—and his own)
He call'd blasphemers forth—Methinks I now
See stern rebuke enthroned on his brow,
And arm'd with tenfold terrors—from his tongue,
Where fiery zeal and Christian fury hung,
Methinks I hear the deep-ton'd thunders roll,
And chill with horror ev'ry sinner's soul—
In vain they strive to fly—flight cannot save,
And Potter trembles even in his grave—
With all the conscious pride of innocence,
Methinks I hear him, in his own defence,
Bear witness to himself, whilst all men knew,
By gospel rules, his witness to be true.

O glorious man, thy zeal I must commend,
Though it depriv'd me of my dearest friend.
The real motives of thy anger known,
Wilkes must the justice of that anger own,
And could thy bosom have been bar'd to view,
Pitied himself, in turn had pitied you.

Bred to the law, you wisely took the gown,
Which I, like Demas, foolishly laid down.
Hence double strength our Holy Mother drew:
Me she got rid of, and made prize of you.
I, like an idle truant, fond of play,
Doting on toys, and throwing gems away,
Grasping at shadows, let the substance slip;
But you, my Lord, renounc'd attorneyship
With better purpose, and more noble aim,
And wisely play'd a more substantial game.

Nor did law mourn, blest'd in her younger son,
For Mansfield does what Gloster would have done.

Dea., Dean, Bishop, Gloster, and my Lord,
If haply these high titles may accord
With thy meek spirit, if the barren sound
Of pride delights thee, to the topmost round
Of fortune's ladder got, despise not one,
For want of smooth hypocrisy undone,
Who, far below, turns up his wond'ring eye,
And, without envy, sees thee plac'd so high;
Let not thy brain (as brains less potent might)
Dizzy, confounded, giddy with the height,
Turn round, and lose distinction, lose her skill
And wanted powers of knowing good from ill,
Of sifting truth from falsehood, friends from
foes;

Let Gloster well remember, how he rose,
Nor turn his back on men who made him great;
Let him not, gorg'd with pow'r, and drunk with
state,

Forget what once he was, though now so high;
How low, how mean, and full as poor as I.

Have their black cannons the war is won,
The brave expir'd, and their blood is run;
And lowly ston'd the altar of the slain;

THE LIFE OF FALCONER.

Of the family, birth-place, and education of WILLIAM FALCONER, there are no memorials. He was a native of Scotland, and bred to the sea, in which he spent the greatest part of his life in a very low station.

He displayed his poetical powers at an early age, and published, at Edinburgh, A Poem sacred to the Memory of Frederick Prince of Wales, 8vo, 1751.

In the course of his sea life, he served on board the Britannia, a merchant-man, bound from Alexandria to Venice, which touched at the Island of Candia, whence, proceeding on her voyage, she met with a violent storm, that drove her on the coast of Greece, where she suffered shipwreck near Cape Colonne, three only of the crew being left alive. The dangers which he really experienced, he feelingly described in his next performance, intituled The Shipwreck, a Poem, in three Cantos, by a Sailor, 4to. 1762. He inscribed it to the Duke of York, and prefixed a chart of the ship's way, and a section of the ship itself, in order to render the poem completely intelligible.

It has been frequently observed, that true genius will surmount every obstacle that opposes its exertion. This very poetical and interesting performance, is a striking proof of this observation. The situation of a sailor may be thought unfavourable to the poet; but the two characters are not incompatible; for none but an able sailor could give so didactic an account, and so accurate a description of the voyage and catastrophe related in this performance; and none but a genuine poet could have embellished both with equal harmony of numbers and strength of imagery.

Unless a variety of affecting circumstances are to be attributed to the power of imagination, he appears to have been possessed of no inconsiderable share of fortitude, to possess, under such circumstances, so tenacious a memory; for it appears, from various parts of the poem, and particularly from the motto,

— quæque ipse miserrima vidi,
Et quorum pars magna fui—

that he was personally aboard, and shipwrecked by the storm he so poetically describes.

The publication of this work drew him from the obscurity of his situation; he was patronized by the Duke of York, to whom he addressed an Ode on his second departure from England, as Rear Admiral, and soon after received the appointment of Purser to the Royal George.

Availing himself of the disputes in politics, which were then carried on with peculiar acrimony, and eager to promote the interest of those with whom he was connected, he wrote a satirical poem, called The Demagogue, in which he censures the conduct of Mr. Pitt, and his defenders, Mr. Wilkes, Churchill, &c. with great severity.

In 1764, he published a new edition of The Shipwreck, in 8vo, with considerable additions, comprehending several new descriptions, characters, and episodes, amounting on the whole to upwards of a thousand lines.

In 1769, he published his Marine Dictionary, in one volume, 4to., an acknowledged useful work, and a third edition of the Shipwreck, in 8vo, with alterations; and soon afterwards embarked on board the Aurora, with the Indian supervisors, to settle in the East Indies.

In December 1769, he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, from whence he sailed soon after. These were the last tidings of the ship, which was never heard of afterwards. It is generally supposed to have taken fire, and that all the crew perished.

This is all that is known of Falconer, an able seaman, and an excellent poet, whose nautical knowledge and poetical abilities entitle him to more attention than he has hitherto received, from the writers of literary and poetical biography.

Since his death, The Shipwreck, his principal performance, and An Occasional Elegy, has been frequently reprinted; and, together with The Demagogue, Poem on the Death of the Prince of Wales, Ode on the Duke of York's departure from England, and The Fond Lover, a ballad, inserted in the edition of the "English Poets," 1790. They are republished in the present collection, with an Address to Miranda, a ballad, first printed in Dr. Stuart's "Edinburgh Magazine and Review," for 1773.

Falconer seems to have had a natural vein for poetry, and a facility of writing verses. His compositions appear to be the unstudied and genuine offspring of natural genius, more than of poetical art. He seems to have bestowed little attention to the art and mystery of a poet, which is not merely the effect of genius, but is to be acquired only by long application, or a due attention to the practice of the best writers. Of the two, he is perhaps a greater master of the nautical, than of the poetical art. Indeed, he himself confesses, that he is more tenacious of his reputation as a sailor than a poet; though, in the latter capacity, if not a first-rate writer, he may be justly reckoned the first poetical sailor of our nation.

The Shipwreck amply establishes his fame. It has received considerable additions since the first impression; but it may be reasonably doubted, whether it has been improved in the same proportion as it has been lengthened. There is frequently a copious simplicity in first designs, that no afterthought or labour can amend; an irregular beauty that every alteration must efface. In lengthening works, an author is apt to fall into repetitions, or to increase the number of words, without adding to the number or energy of the thoughts. Thus, the two following lines, in the first edition of the poem, are swelled into four, in the second; with what improvement, the critical reader will judge.

*Rous'd by the tempest, and the blustering night,
A troop of Grecians mount Colonna's height.*

*A troop of Grecians, who inhabit nigh,
And oft the perils of the deep descry,
Rous'd by the blustering tempest of the night,
Anxious had climb'd Colonna's neighbouring height.*

The alteration of two nervous and concise lines, the sense of which was full and perfect, into four same ones, whose imperfect expression lags to the very end of the sentence, cannot be justified by the unimportant and unnecessary information which they contain. The love tale of Palemon and Anna, is, however, interwoven with great art, and is in itself pathetic and affecting; but it diverts the attention from the more genuine and manly distress of the poem. It is to be regretted, that he altered the conclusion, for the sake of the particular catastrophe of Palemon, which, however affecting, does not compensate for the separation and alteration of the beautiful lines that ended the poem, in the first edition.

*Rous'd by the tempest, and the blustering night,
A troop of Grecians mount Colonna's height;
When gazing down with horror on the flood,
Full to the view a scene of horror stood;
The surf with mangled bodies cover'd o'er,
And those yet breathing on the sea-beat shore,
Though lost to science and the nobler arts,
Yet nature's lore inform'd their simple hearts;
Straight down the vale their hastening steps they bend,
The wretched sufferers helpful to attend.
Three still alive, in mournful plight they find,
Benumb'd and shivering, on a rock reclin'd.
Th' affected natives, touch'd with gen'rous pain,
The feeble seamen in their arms sustain;*

With pitying sighs their helpless lot deplore,
And lead them trembling from the fatal shore.

The poem opens with a general intimation of the subject, and a comparative description of the present state of the island of Candia and ancient Crete; which is followed by several beautiful marine descriptions, such as the prospect of the shore, a shoal of dolphins, a water spout, the method of taking an azimuth, working the ship, &c.

In the second canto, the storm begins, and with it the consultations of the pilots and operations of the seamen, which are described with an amazing minuteness, and the technical terms expressed in smooth and harmonious numbers. Homer has been justly admired for reducing a catalogue of ship into tolerably flowing verse. Falconer has versified his own sea language, reef-tackles, hall-yards, clue-garnets, bunt-lines, lashings, lanyards, &c. with equal happiness and skill.

The following lines, taken from many others of the same kind, may serve to show how successfully he has ventured out of the common road, to excel in his own.

The mainsail by the squall so lately rent,
In streaming pendants flying is unrent;
With sails refix'd, another soon prepar'd,
Ascending spreads along beneath the yard;
To each yard-arm the head-rope they extend,
And soon the earings and the robands bend
That task dispatch'd, they first the traces slack,
Then to the chefstree bring aboard the tack;
And while the lee clue-garnet's lower'd away,
Taught aft the sheet, they tally and belay.

The description of Parnassus is elegant and harmonious in the highest degree. His Pilot appears to much greater advantage than the Palinurus of Virgil, whom he sometimes imitates. The splitting of the ship on the rocks, beginning, Lifted on gathering billows, &c. is represented in glowing and lively colours. Nor is his talent confined to the description of inanimate scenes; he relates and bewails the fate of his companions in the most animated and pathetic strains. The close of the Pilot's address to the seamen, in the time of their greatest danger, is noble and philosophical. It is impossible to read the circumstantial account of the unfortunate end of the ship's crew, without being deeply affected by the tale, and charmed with the manner of the relation.

The Occasional Elegy on the unfortunate crew of the Britannia is appropriate, pathetic, and pleasing. The Demagogue is not one of the pleasantest of his poems, though it contains a number of animated passages. The sentiments are, for the most part, noble and manly, the satire poignantly severe, the expression strong and nervous; but the tendency of the poem cannot be commended, and the obloquy thrown on Mr. Pitt is totally inexcusable. The Poem on the Death of the Prince of Wales does not rise above the usual strain of funeral panegyric. His Ode on the Duke of York's departure from England, is written with uniform mediocrity. His Songs are tender and easy.

the author to give it a strict and thorough revision; in

VOL. X.

Sick of the scene, where war, with ruthless hand
Spreads desolation o'er the bleeding land;
Sick of the tumult, where the trumpet's breath
Bids ruin smile, and drowns the groan of death!
'Tis mine, retir'd beneath this cavern hoar,
That stands all lonely on the sea-beat shore,
Far other themes of deep distress to sing
Than ever trembled from the vocal string.
No pomp of battle swells th' exalted strain,
Nor gleaming arms ring dreadful on the plain:
But, o'er the scene while pale remembrance weeps,
Fate with fell triumph rides upon the deeps.
Here hostile elements tumultuous rise,
And lawless floods rebel against the skies;
Till hope expires, and peril and dismay
Wave their black ensigns on the watery way.

Immortal train, who guides the maze of song,
To whom all science, arts and arms belong;
Who bid the trumpet of eternal fame
Exalt the warrior's and the poet's name!
If e'er with trembling hope I fondly stray'd,
In life's fair morn, beneath your hallow'd shade,
To hear the sweetly-mournful lute complain,
And melt the heart with ecstasy of pain;
Or listen, while th' enchanting voice of love,
While all Elysium warbled through the grove;
Oh! by the hollow blast that means around,
That sweeps the wild harp with a plaintive sound;
By the long surge that foams through yonder
cave,

Whose vaults remurmur to the roaring wave;
With living colours give my verse to glow,
The sad memorial of a tale of woe!
A scene from dumb oblivion to restore,
To fame unknown, and new to epic lore!

Alas! neglected by the sacred nine,
Their suppliant feels no genial ray divine!
Ah! will they leave Pieria's happy shore,
To plow the tide where wint'ry tempests roar?

Or shall a youth approach their hallow'd fane,
 Stranger to Phœbus, and the tuneful train!--
 Far from the muses' academic grove,
 'Twas his the vast and trackless deep to rove.
 Alternate change of climates has he known,
 And felt the fierce extremes of either zone:
 Where polar skies congeal th' eternal snow,
 Or equinoctial suns for ever glow.
 Smote by the freezing or the scorching blast,
 "A ship-boy on the high and giddy mast!"
 From regions where Peruvian billows roar,
 To the bleak coasts of savage Labrador.
 From where Damascus, pride of Asian plains!
 Stoops her proud neck beneath tyrannic chains,
 To where the Isthmus†, lav'd by adverse tides,
 Atlantic and Pacific seas divides.
 But while he measur'd o'er the painful race,
 In fortune's wild illimitable chase,
 Adversity, companion of his way!
 Still o'er the victim hung with iron sway;
 Bade new distresses ev'ry instant grow,
 Marking each change of place with change of woe.
 In regions where the Almighty's chastening hand
 With livid pestilence afflicts the land;
 Or where pale famine blasts the hopeful year,
 Parent of want and misery severe!
 Or where, all dreadful in th' embattled line,
 The hostile ships in flaming combat join;
 Where the torn vessel wind and wave assail,
 'Till o'er her crew distress and death prevail--
 Where'er he wander'd, thus vindictive fate
 Pursued his weary steps with lasting hate!
 Rous'd by her mandate, storms of black array
 Winter'd the morn of life's advancing day;
 Relax'd the sinews of the living lyre,
 And quench the kindling spark of vital fire---
 Thus while forgotten or unknown he woos,
 What hope to win the coy reluctant muse!
 Then let not censure, with malignant joy,
 The harvest of his humble hope destroy!
 His verse no laurel wreath attempts to claim,
 Nor sculptur'd brass to tell the poet's name.
 If terms uncouth, and jarring phrases, wound
 The softer sense with inharmonious sound,
 Yet here let listening sympathy prevail,
 While conscious truth unfolds her piteous tale?
 And lo! the power that wakes the eventful
 song,
 Hastes hither from Lethæan banks along:
 She sweeps the gloom, and rushing on the sight,
 Spreads o'er the kindling scene propitious light!--
 In her right hand an ample roll appears,
 Fraught with long annals of preceding years;
 With every wise and noble art of man,
 Since first the circling hours their course began:
 Her left a silver wand on high display'd,
 Whose magic touch dispels oblivion's shade.
 Pensive her look; on radiant wings that glow,
 Like Juno's birds, or Iris' flaming bow,
 She sails; and swifter than the course of light,
 Directs her rapid intellectual flight.
 The fugitive ideas she restores, [shores.
 And calls the wandering thought from Lethe's

* Shakspeare.† Darien.

To things long past a second date she gives,
 And hoary time from her fresh youth receives.
 Congenial sister of immortal fame,
 She shares her power, and Memory is her name.
 O first-born daughter of primeval time!
 By whom transmitted down in every clime,
 The deeds of ages long elaps'd are known,
 And blazon'd glories spread from zone to zone;
 Whose breath dissolves the gloom of mental night,
 And o'er th' obscur'd idea pours the light!
 Whose wing unerring glides through time and place,
 And trackless scours th' immensity of space!
 Say! on what seas, for thou alone canst tell,
 What dire mishap a fated ship beset,
 Assail'd by tempests, girt with hostile shores?—
 Arise! approach! unlock thy treasure'd stores!

A SHIP from Egypt, o'er the deep impell'd
 By guiding winds, her course for Venice held;
 Of fam'd Britannia were the gallant crew,
 And from that isle her name the vessel drew.
 The wayward steps of fortune, that delude
 Full oft to ruin, eager they pursu'd,
 And, dazzled by her visionary glare,
 Advanc'd incautious of each fatal snare;
 Though warn'd full oft the slippery track to shun,
 Yet hope, with flattering voice, betray'd them on.
 Beguil'd to danger thus, they left behind
 The scene of peace, and social joy resign'd.
 Long absent they from friends and native home,
 The cheerless ocean were inur'd to roam:
 Yet Heaven, in pity to severe distress,
 Had crown'd each painful voyage with success;
 Still, to atone for toils and hazards past,
 Restor'd them to maternal plains at last.
 Thrice had the sun, to rule the varying year,
 Across th' equator roll'd his flaming sphere,
 Since last the vessel spread her ample sail
 From Albion's coast, obsequious to the gale.
 She o'er the spacious flood, from shore to shore,
 Unwearying wafted her commercial store.
 The richest ports of Afric she had view'd,
 Thence to fair Italy her course pursu'd;
 Had left behind Trinacria's burning isle,
 And visited the margin of the Nile.
 And now, that winter deepens round the pole,
 The circling voyage hastens to its goal.
 They, blind to fate's inevitable law,
 No dark event to blast their hope foresaw;
 But from gay Venice soon expect to steer
 For Britain's coast, and dread no perils near.
 A thousand tender thoughts their souls employ,
 That fondly dance to scenes of future joy.
 Thus time elaps'd, while o'er the pathless tide
 Their ship through Grecian seas the pilots guide.
 Occasion call'd to touch at Candia's shore,
 Which, blest with favouring winds, they soon explore;
 The haven enter, borne before the gale,
 Dispatch their commerce, and prepare to sail.
 Eternal Powers! what ruins from afar
 Mark the fell track of desolating war!
 Here art and commerce, with auspicious reign,
 Once breath'd sweet influence on the happy plain!

While o'er the lawn, with dance and festive song,
 Young pleasure led the jocund hours along.
 In gay luxuriance Ceres too was seen
 To crown the valleys with eternal green.
 For wealth, for valour, courted and rever'd,
 What Albion is, fair Candia then appear'd.—
 Ah! who the flight of ages can revoke?
 The free-born spirit of her sons is broke;
 They bow to Ottoman's imperious yoke!
 No longer fame the drooping heart inspires,
 For rude oppression quench'd its genial fires.
 But still her fields, with golden harvests crown'd,
 Supply the barren shores of Greece around.
 What pale distress afflicts those wretched isles!
 There hope ne'er dawns, and pleasure never smiles.

The vassal wretch obsequious drags his chain,
 And hears his famish'd babes lament in vain.
 These eyes have seen the dull reluctant soil
 A seventh year scorn the weary lab'rer's toil.
 No blooming Venus, on the desert shore,
 Now views with triumph, captive gods adore.
 No lovely Helens now, with fatal charms,
 Call forth th' avenging chiefs of Greece to arms.
 No fair Penelopes enchant the eye,
 For whom contending kings are proud to die.
 Here sullen beauty sheds a twilight ray,
 While sorrow bids her venal bloom decay.
 Those charms, so long renown'd in classic strains,
 Had dimly shone on Albion's happier plains!

Now, in the southern hemisphere the sun
 Through the bright Virgin and the Scales had run;

And on the ecliptic wheel'd his winding way,
 Till the fierce Scorpion felt his flaming ray.
 The ship was moor'd beside the wave-worn strand;
 Four days her anchors bite the golden sand;
 For sickening vapours lull the air to sleep,
 And not a breeze awakes the silent deep.
 This, when th' autumnal equinox is o'er,
 And Phœbus in the north declines no more,
 The watchful mariner, whom Heaven informs,
 Oft deems the prelude of approaching storms.
 True to his trust when sacred duty calls,
 No brooding storm the master's soul appals:
 Th' advancing season warns him to the main;
 A captive, fetter'd to the oar of gain!
 His anxious heart, impatient of delay,
 Expects the winds to sail from Candia's bay;
 Determin'd, from whatever point they rise,
 To trust his fortune to the seas and skies.

Thou living ray of intellectual fire,
 Whose voluntary gleams my verse inspire!
 Ere yet the deep'ning incidents prevail,
 Till rous'd attention feel our plaintive tale,
 Record whom, chief among the gallant crew,
 Th' unblest pursuit of fortune hither drew!
 Can sons of Neptune, generous, brave and bold,
 In pain and hazard toil for sordid gold?

They can! for gold too oft, with magic art,
 Subdues each nobler impulse of the heart:
 This crowns the prosperous villain with applause,
 To whom, in vain, sad merit pleads her cause:
 This strews with roses life's perplexing road,
 And leads the way to pleasure's blest abode;

With slaughter'd victims fills the weeping plain,
 And smooths the furrows of the treacherous main.

O'er the gay vessel, and her daring band,
 Experienc'd Albert held the chief command;
 Though train'd in boisterous elements, his mind
 Was yet by soft humanity refin'd.
 Each joy of wedded love at home he knew;
 Abroad confess the father of his crew!
 Brave, liberal, just, the calm domestic scene
 Had o'er his temper breath'd a gay serenity.
 Him science taught by mystic lore to trace
 The planets wheeling in eternal race;
 To mark the ship in floating balance held,
 By earth attracted and by seas repell'd;
 Or point her devious track, through climes un-

known,
 That leads to every shore and every zone.
 He saw the moon through heaven's blue con-

cave glide,
 And into motion charm th' expanding tide;
 While earth impetuous round her axle rolls,
 Exalts her watery zone, and sink the poles.
 Light and attraction, from their genial source,
 He saw still wandering with diminish'd force;
 While on the margin of declining day,
 Night's shadowy cone reluctant melts away.—
 Inur'd to peril, with unconquer'd soul,
 The chief beheld tempestuous ocean's roll;
 His genius, ever for the event prepar'd,
 Rose with the storm, and all its dangers shar'd.

The second powers and office Rodmond bore:
 A hardy son of England's furthest shore!
 Where bleak Northumbria pours her savage train
 In fable squadrons o'er the northern main;
 That, with her pitchy entrails stor'd, resort,
 A footy tribe! to fair Augusta's port.
 Where'er in ambush lurk the fatal sands,
 They claim the danger; proud of skilful hands!
 For while with darkling course their vessels sweep
 The winding shore, or plough the faithless deep,
 O'er bar* and shelf the watery path they sound,
 With dextrous arm; sagacious of the ground!
 Fearless they combat ev'ry hostile wind,
 Wheeling in mazy tracks with course inclin'd.
 Expert to moor, where terrors line the road;
 Or win the anchor from its dark abode:
 But drooping and relax'd in climes afar,
 Tumultuous and undisciplin'd in war.
 Such Rodmond was; by learning unrefin'd,
 That oft enlightens to corrupt the mind:
 Boisterous of manners; train'd in early youth
 To scenes that shame the conscious cheek of truth;
 To scenes that nature's struggling voice controul,
 And freeze compassion rising in the soul! [shore,
 Where the grim hell-hounds, prowling round the
 With foul intent the stranded bark explore—
 Deaf to the voice of woe, her decks they board,
 While tardy justice slumbers o'er her sword—
 Th' indignant muse, severely taught to feel,
 Shrinks from a theme she blushes to reveal!

* A bar is known, in hydrography, to be a mass of earth or sand collected by the surge of the sea, at the entrance of a river or haven; so as to render the navigation difficult, and often dangerous.

Too oft example, arm'd with poisons fell,
Pollutes the shrine where mercy loves to dwell :
Thus Rodmond, train'd by this unhallow'd crew,
The sacred social passions never knew :
Unskill'd to argue ; in dispute yet loud ;
Bold without caution : without honours proud ;
In art unschool'd, each veteran rule he priz'd,
And all improvement haughtily despis'd :
Yet though full oft to future perils blind,
With skill superior glow'd his daring mind,
Through snares of death the reeling bark to guide,

When midnight shades involve the raging tide.

To Rodmond next, in order of command,
Succeeds the youngest of our naval band.

But what avails it to record a name

That courts no rank among the sons of fame ?

While yet a stripling, oft with fond alarms,

His bosom danc'd to nature's boundless charms ;

On him fair science dawn'd in happier hour,

Awakening into bloom young fancy's flower ;

But frowning fortune with untimely blast

The blossom wither'd, and the dawn o'ercaft.

Forlorn of heart, and by severe decree

Condemn'd reluctant to the faithless sea,

With long farewell he left the laurel grove,

Where science and the tuneful sisters rove.---

Hither he wander'd, anxious to explore

Antiquities of nations now no more ;

To penetrate each distant realm unknown,

And range excursive o'er th' unravell'd zone.

In vain !---for rude adversity's command,

Still on the margin of each famous land,

With unrelenting ire his steps oppos'd,

And every gate of hope against him clos'd.

Permit my verse, ye blest Picrian train,

To call Arion this ill fated swain !

For, like that bard unhappy, on his head

Malignant stars their hostile influence shed.

Both, in lamenting numbers, o'er the deep,

With conscious anguish taught the harp to weep ;

And both the raging surge in safety bore

Amid destruction panting to the shore.

This last our tragic story from the wave

Of dark oblivion haply yet may save ;

With genuine sympathy may yet complain,

While sad remembrance bleeds at ev'ry vein.

Such were the pilots ; tutor'd to divine

Th' untravell'd course by geometric line ;

Train'd to command, and range the various sail,

Whose various force conforms to every gale.---

Charg'd with the commerce, hither also came

A gallant youth, Palemon was his name ;

A father's stern resentment doom'd to prove,

He came, the victim of unhappy love !

His heart for Albert's beauteous daughter bled ;

For her a secret flame his bosom fed.

Nor let the wretched slaves of folly scorn

This genuine passion, nature's eldest born !

'Twas his with lasting anguish to complain,

While blooming Anna mourn'd the cause in vain.

Graceful of form, by nature taught to please,

Of power to melt the female breast with ease,

To her Palemon told his tender tale,

Soft as the voice of summer's evening gale.

O'erjoy'd, he saw her lovely eyes relent ;

The blushing maiden smil'd with sweet consent.

Oft in the mazes of a neighbouring grove,

Unheard, they breath'd alternate vows of love :

By fond society their passion grew,

Like the young blossom fed with vernal dew.

In evil hour th' officious tongue of fame

Betray'd the secret of their mutual flame.

With grief and anger struggling in his breast,

Palemon's father heard the tale confess.

Long had he listen'd with suspicion's ear,

And learnt, sagacious, this event to fear.

Too well, fair youth ! thy liberal heart he knew ;

A heart to nature's warm impressions true !

Fall oft his wisdom strove, with fruitless toil,

With avarice to pollute that generous soil :

That soil, impregnated with nobler seed,

Refus'd the culture of so rank a weed.

Elate with wealth, in active commerce won,

And basking in the smile of fortune's sun,

With scorn the parent ey'd the lowly shade,

That veil'd the beauties of this charming maid.

Indignant he rebuk'd th' enamour'd boy,

The flattering promise of his future joy :

He sooth'd and menac'd, anxious to reclaim

This hopeless passion, or divert its aim :

Oft led the youth where circling joys delight

The ravish'd sense, or beauty charms the sight.

With all her powers enchanting music sail'd,

And pleasure's syren voice no more prevail'd.

The merchant, kindling then with proud disdain,

In look and voice assum'd an harsher strain.

In absence now his only hope remain'd ;

And such the stern decree his will ordain'd.

Deep anguish, while Palemon heard his doom,

Drew o'er his lovely face a saddening gloom.

In vain with bitter sorrow he repin'd,

No tender pity touch'd that sordid mind ;

To thee, brave Albert, was the charge consign'd. }

The stately ship, forsaking England's shore,

To regions far remote Palemon bore.

Incapable of change, th' unhappy youth

Still lov'd fair Anna with eternal truth :

From clime to clime an exile doom'd to roam,

His heart still panted for its secret home.

The moon had circled twice her wayward zone,

To him since young Arion first was known ;

Who, wandering here through many a scene re-

noun'd,

In Alexandria's port the vessel found ;

Where, anxious to review his native shore,

He on the roaring wave embark'd once more.

Oft by pale Cynthia's melancholy light,

With him Palemon kept the watch of night ;

In whose sad bosom many a sigh suppress'd,

Some painful secret of the soul confess'd.

Perhaps Arion soon the cause divin'd,

Though shunning still to probe a wounded mind :

He felt the chastity of silent woe,

Though glad the balm of comfort to bestow ;

He, with Palemon, oft recounted o'er }

The tales of hapless love in ancient lore,

Recall'd to memory by th' adjacent shore.

The scene thus present, and its story known,

The lover sigh'd for sorrows not his own.

Thus, though a recent date their friendship bore,
Soon the ripe metal own'd the quick'ning ore;
For in one tide their passions seem'd to roll,
By kindred age, and sympathy of soul.

These o'er th' inferior naval train preside,
The course determine, or the commerce guide:
O'er all the rest, an undistinguish'd crew!
Her wing of deepest shade oblivion drew.

A sullen languor still the skies oppress,
And held th' unwilling ship in strong arrest.
High in his chariot glow'd the lamp of day,
O'er Ida flaming with meridian ray.
Relax'd from toil the sailors range the shore,
Where famine, war, and storm are felt no more:
The hour to social pleasure they resign,
And black remembrance drown in generous wine.
On deck, beneath the shading canvas spread,
Rodmond a rueful tale of wonders read,
Of dragons roaring on the enchanted coast,
The hideous goblin, and the yelling ghost---
But with Arion, from the sultry heat
Of noon, Palemon sought a cool retreat.
And lo! the shore with mournful prospects
crown'd *;

The rampart torn with many a fatal wound;
The ruin'd bulwark tottering o'er the strand;
Bewail the stroke of war's tremendous hand.
What scenes of woe this hapless isle o'erspread!
Where late thrice fifty thousand warriors bled.
Full twice twelve summers were yon towers af-
Till barbarous Ottoman at last prevail'd; [fall'd,
While thundering mines the lovely plains o'er-turn'd,

While heroes fell, and domes and temples burn'd.

But now before them happier scenes arise!
Elysian vales salute their ravish'd eyes:
Olive and cedar form'd a grateful shade,
Where light with gay romantic error stray'd.
The myrtles here with fond caresses twine;
There, rich with nectar, melts the pregnant vine.
And lo! the stream, renown'd in classic song,
Sad Lethe, glides the silent vale along.
On mossy banks, beneath the citron grove,
The youthful wanderers found a wild alcove:
Soft o'er the fairy region languor stole,
And with sweet melancholy charm'd the soul.
Here first Palemon, while his pensive mind
For consolation on his friend reclin'd,
In pity's bleeding bosom pour'd the stream
Of love's soft anguish, and of grief supreme---
Too true thy words!--by sweet remembrance
taught,

My heart in secret bleeds with tender thought:
In vain it courts the solitary shade,
By every action, every look betray'd!--
The pride of generous woe disdains appeal
To hearts that unrelenting frosts congeal:
Yet sure, if right Palemon can divine,
The sense of gentle pity dwells in thine.

* The intelligent reader will readily discover, that these remarks allude to the ever-memorable siege of Candia, which was taken from the Venetians by the Turks in 1669; being then considered as impregnable, and esteemed the most formidable fortress in the universe.

Yes! all his cares thy sympathy shall know,
And prove the kind companion of his woe.

Albert thou know'st with skill and science grac'd,
In humble station though by fortune plac'd,
Yet never seaman more serenely brave
Led Britain's conqu'ring squadrons o'er the wave.
Where full in view Augusta's spires are seen,
With flow'ry lawns, and waving woods between,
A peaceful dwelling stands in modest pride,
Where Thames, slow-winding, rolls his ample tide.
There live the hope and pleasure of his life,
A pious daughter, with a faithful wife.
For his return, with fond officious care,
Still every grateful object these prepare;
Whatever can allure the smell or sight,
Or wake the drooping spirits to delight.

This blooming maid in virtue's path to guide,
Her anxious parents all their cares apply'd.
Her spotless soul, where soft compassion reign'd,
No vice untun'd, no sickening folly stain'd.
Not fairer grows the lily of the vale,
Whose bosom opens to the vernal gale:
Her eyes, unconscious of their fatal charms,
Thrill'd every heart with exquisite alarms:
Her face, in beauty's sweet attraction dress'd,
The smile of maiden innocence express'd:
While health, that rises with the new-born day,
Breath'd o'er her cheek the softest blush of May.
Still in her look complacence smil'd serene;
She mov'd the charmer of the rural scene.

'Twas at that season when the fields resume
Their loveliest hues, array'd in vernal bloom;
Yon ship, rich freighted from th' Italian shore,
To Thames' fair banks her costly tribute bore:
While thus my father saw his ample horde,
From this return, with recent treasure stor'd;
Me, with affairs of commerce charg'd, he sent
To Albert's humble mansion; soon I went,
Too soon, alas! unconscious of th' event---
There struck with sweet surprise and silent awe,
The gentle mistress of my hopes I saw:
There, wounded first by love's resistless arms,
My glowing bosom throbb'd with strange alarms.
My ever-charming Anna! who alone
Can all the frowns of cruel fate atone;
O! while all-conscious memory holds her power,
Can I forget that sweetly-painful hour,
When from those eyes, with lovely lightning
fraught,

My fluttering spirits first th' infection caught:
When, as I gaz'd, my faltering tongue betray'd
The heart's quick tumults, or refus'd its aid:
While the dim light my ravish'd eyes forsook,
And every limb unstrung with terror shook!
With all her powers dissenting reason strove
To tame at first the kindling flame of love;
She strove in vain! subdu'd by charms divine,
My soul a victim fell at beauty's shrine.
Oft from the din of bustling life I stray'd,
In happier scenes, to see my lovely maid.
Full oft, where Thames his wandering current leads,

We rov'd at evening hour through flowery meads,
There, while my heart's soft anguish I reveal'd,
To her with tender sighs my hope appeal'd.

While the sweet nymph my faithful tale believ'd,
 Her snowy breast with secret tumult heav'd;
 For, train'd in rural scenes from earliest youth,
 Nature was her's, and innocence and truth.
 She never knew the city damsel's art,
 Whose frothy pertness charms the vacant heart!—
 My suit prevail'd; for love inform'd my tongue,
 And on his votary's lips persuasion hung.
 Her eyes with conscious sympathy withdrew,
 And o'er her cheek the rosy current flew.—
 Thrice happy hours! where, with no dark allay,
 Life's fairest sunshine gilds the vernal day!
 For here the sigh, that soft affection heaves,
 From stings of sharper woe the soul relieves.
 Elysian scenes, too happy long to last!—
 Too soon a storm the smiling dawn o'ercast!
 Too soon some demon to my father bore
 The tidings that his heart with anguish tore—
 My pride to kindle, with dissuasive voice,
 Awhile he labour'd to degrade my choice:
 Then, in the whirling wave of pleasure, fought
 From its lov'd object to divert my thought.
 With equal hope he might attempt to bind,
 In chains of adamant, the lawless wind:
 For love had aim'd the fatal shaft too sure:
 Hope fed the wound, and absence knew no cure.
 With alienated look, each art he saw
 Still baffled by superior nature's law.
 His anxious mind on various schemes revolv'd;
 At last on cruel exile he resolv'd.
 The rigorous doom was fix'd; alas! how vain
 To him of tender anguish to complain!
 His soul, that never love's sweet influence felt,
 By social sympathy could never melt;
 With stern command to Albert's charge he gave,
 To waft Palemon o'er the distant wave.
 The ship was laden and prepar'd to sail,
 And only waited now the leading gale.
 'Twas ours, in that sad period, first to prove
 The heart-felt torments of despairing love.
 Th' impatient wish that never feels repose;
 Desire that with perpetual current flows;
 The fluctuating pangs of hope and fear;
 Joy distant still, and sorrow ever near!
 Thus, while the pangs of thought feverer grew,
 The western breezes inauspicious blew,
 Hastening the moment of our last adieu.
 The vessel parted on the falling tide;
 Yet time one sacred hour to love supply'd.
 The night was silent, and, advancing fast,
 The moon o'er Thames her silver mantle cast.
 Impatient hope the midnight path explor'd,
 And led me to the nymph my soul ador'd.
 Soon her quick footsteps struck my listening ear!
 She came confess'd the lovely maid drew near!
 But ah! what force of language can impart
 Th' impetuous joy that glow'd in either heart!
 O! ye, whose melting hearts are form'd to prove
 The trembling ecstasies of genuine love!
 When, with delicious agony, the thought
 Is to the verge of high delirium wrought;
 Your secret sympathy alone can tell
 What raptures then the throbbing bosom swell;
 O'er all the nerves what tender tumults roll
 While love with sweet enchantment melts the soul!

In transport lost, by trembling hope impress'd,
 The blushing virgin sunk upon my breast;
 While her's congenial beat with fond alarms;
 Dissolving softness! paradise of charms!
 Flash'd from our eyes, in warm transfusion flew
 Our blending spirits, that each other drew!
 O bliss supreme! where virtue's self can melt
 With joys that guilty pleasure never felt!
 Form'd to refine the thought with chaste desire,
 And kindle sweet affection's purest fire!
 Ah! wherefore should my hopeless love, she cries,
 While sorrow burst with interrupting sighs,
 For ever destin'd to lament in vain,
 Such flattering, fond ideas entertain?
 My heart through scenes of fair illusion stray'd,
 To joys decreed for some superior maid.
 'Tis mine to feel the sharpest stings of grief,
 Where never gentle hope affords relief.
 Go then, dear youth! thy father's rage atone;
 And let this tortur'd bosom beat alone!
 The hovering anger yet thou may'st appease;
 Go then, dear youth! nor tempt the faithless seas!
 Find out some happier daughter of the town,
 With fortune's fairer joys thy love to crown;
 Where smiling o'er thee, with indulgent ray,
 Prosperity shall hail each new-born day.
 Too well thou know'st good Albert's niggard
 Fate,
 Ill fitted to sustain thy father's hate;
 Go then, I charge thee, by thy generous love,
 That fatal to my father thus may prove!
 On me alone let dark affliction fall!
 Whose heart, for thee, will gladly suffer all.
 Then haste thee hence, Palemon, ere too late,
 Nor rashly hope to brave opposing fate!
 She ceas'd; while anguish in her angel-face
 O'er all her beauties shower'd celestial grace.
 Not Helen, in her bridal charms array'd,
 Was half so lovely as this gentle maid.
 O soul of all my wishes! I reply'd,
 Can that soft fabric stem affliction's tide?
 Canst thou, fair emblem of exalted truth!
 To sorrow doom the summer of thy youth;
 And I, perfidious! all that sweetness see
 Consign'd to lasting misery for me?
 Sooner this moment may the eternal doom
 Palemon in the silent earth entomb!
 Attest thou moon, fair regent of the night!
 Whose lustre sickens at this mournful sight;
 By all the pangs divided lovers feel,
 That sweet possession only knows to heal!
 By all the horrors brooding o'er the deep!
 Where fate and ruin sad dominion keep;
 Though tyrant duty o'er me threatening stands,
 And claims obedience to her stern commands:
 Should fortune cruel or auspicious prove,
 Her smile or frown shall never change my love!
 My heart, that now must every joy resign,
 Incapable of change, is only thine!—
 O cease to weep! this storm will yet decay,
 And these sad clouds of sorrow melt away.
 While through the rugged path of life we go,
 All mortals taste the bitter draught of woe.
 The fam'd and great, decreed to equal pain,
 Full oft in splendid wretchedness complain.

For this prosperity, with brighter ray,
In smiling contrast gilds our vital day.
Thou too, sweet maid! ere twice ten months are o'er

Shalt hail Palemon to his native shore,
Where never interest shall divide us more.

Her struggling soul, o'erwhelm'd with tender grief,

Now found an interval of short relief:
So melts the surface of the frozen stream,
Beneath the wint'ry sun's departing beam.
With warning haste the shades of night withdrew,
And gave the signal of a sad adieu.
As on my neck th' afflicted maiden hung,
A thousand racking doubts her spirit wrung;
She wept the terrors of the fearful wave,
Too oft, alas! the wandering lover's grave!
With soft persuasion I dispell'd her fear,
And from her cheek beguil'd the falling tear.
While dying fondness languish'd in her eyes,
She pour'd her soul to Heaven in suppliant sighs—
Look down with pity, oh! ye powers above,
Who hear the sad complaint of bleeding love!
Ye, who the secret laws of fate explore,
Alone can tell if he returns no more:
Or if the hour of future joy remain,
Long-wish'd atonement of long-suffer'd pain!
Bid every guardian minister attend,
And from all ill the much-lov'd youth defend!

With grief o'erwhelm'd we parted twice in vain,

And, urg'd by strong attraction, met again.
At last, by cruel fortune torn apart,
While tender passion stream'd in either heart,
Our eyes transfix'd with agonizing look,
One sad farewell, one last embrace we took.
Forlorn of hope the lovely maid I left,
Pensive and pale; of every joy bereft.
She to her silent couch retir'd to weep,
While her sad swain embark'd upon the deep.

His tale thus clos'd, from sympathy of grief,
Palemon's bosom felt a sweet relief.
The hapless bird, thus ravish'd from the skies,
Where all forlorn his lov'd companion flies,
In secret long bewails his cruel fate,
With fond remembrance of his winged mate:
Till grown familiar with a foreign train,
Compos'd at length, his sadly-warbling strain
In sweet oblivion charms the sense of pain.

Ye tender maids, in whose pathetic souls
Compassion's sacred stream impetuous rolls;
Whose warm affections exquisitely feel
The secret wound you tremble to reveal;
Ah! may no wanderer of the faithless main
Pour through your breast the soft delicious bane!
May never fatal tenderness approve
The fond effusions of their ardent love.
O! warn'd by friendship's counsel, learn to shun
The fatal path where thousands are undone!

Now as the youths, returning o'er the plain,
Approach'd the lonely margin of the main,
First, with attention rous'd, Arion ey'd
The graceful lover, form'd in nature's pride.
His frame the happiest symmetry display'd;
And locks of waving gold his neck array'd.

In every look the Paphian graces shine.
Soft breathing o'er his cheek their bloom divine.
With lighten'd heart he smil'd serenely gay,
Like young Adonis or the son of May.
Not Cytherea from a fairer swain
Receiv'd her apple on the Trojan plain!

The sun's bright orb, declining all serene,
Now glanc'd obliquely o'er the woodland scene.
Creation smiles around; on every spray
The warbling birds exalt their evening lay.
Blithe skipping o'er yon hill, the fleecy train
Join the deep chorus of the lowing plain:
The golden lime and orange there were seen,
On fragrant branches of perpetual green.
The crystal streams, that velvet meadows lave,
To the green ocean roll with chiding wave.
The glassy ocean hush'd forgets to roar,
But trembling murmurs on the sandy shore:
And lo! his surface, lovely to behold!
Gleams in the west, a sea of living gold!
While, all above, a thousand liveries gay
The skies with pomp ineffable array.
Arabian sweets perfume the happy plains:
Above, beneath, around enchantment reigns!
While yet the shades, on time's eternal scale,
With long vibration deepen o'er the vale;
While yet the songsters of the vocal grove
With dying numbers tune the soul to love;
With joyful eyes th' attentive master sees
Th' auspicious omens of an eastern breeze.—
Now radiant vesper leads the starry train,
And night slow draws her veil o'er land and main;
Round the charg'd bowl the sailors form a ring;
By turns recount the wond'rous tale, or sing;
As love or battle, hardships of the main,
Or genial wine, awake their homely strain:
Then some the watch of night alternate keep,
The rest lie buried in oblivious sleep.

Deep midnight now involves the livid skies,
While infant breezes from the shore arise.
The waning moon, behind a wat'ry shroud,
Pale-glimmer'd o'er the long-protracted cloud.
A mighty ring around her silver throne,
With parting meteors crost, portentous shone.
This in the troubled sky full oft prevails;
Oft deem'd a signal of tempestuous gales.—
While young Arion sleeps, before his sight
Tumultuous swim the visions of the night.
Now blooming Anna, with her happy swain,
Approach'd the sacred Hymeneal fane:
Anon tremendous lightnings flash between;
And funeral pomp, and weeping loves are seen!
Now with Palemon up a rocky sleep,
Whose summit trembles o'er the roaring deep,
With painful step he climb'd; while far above
Sweet Anna charm'd them with the voice of love.
Then sudden from the slippery height they fell,
While dreadful yawn'd beneath the jaws of hell.—
Amid this fearful trance, a thundering sound
He hears—and thrice the hollow decks rebound.
Upstarting from his couch, on deck he sprung;
Thrice with shrill note the boatswain's whistle rung.

All hands unmoor! proclaims a boisterous cry:
All hands unmoor, the cavern rocks reply!

Rous'd from repose, aloft the sailors swarm,
And with their levers soon the windlafs * arm.
The order given, up springing with a bound,
They lodge the bars, and wheel their engine round :

At every turn the clanging pauls resound.
Uptorn reluctant from its oozy cave,
The ponderous anchor rises o'er the wave.
Along their slippery masts the yards ascend,
And high in air the canvas wings extend :
Redoubling cords the lofty canvas guide,
And through inextricable mazes glide.
The lunar rays with long reflection gleam,
To light the vessel o'er the silver stream :
Along the glassy plain serene she glides,
While azure radiance trembles on her sides.
From east to north the transient breezes play ;
And in the Egyptian quarter soon decay.
A calm ensues ; they dread th' adjacent shore ;
The boats with rowers arm'd are sent before :
With cordage fasten'd to the lofty prow,
Aloof to sea the stately ship they tow †.
The nervous crew their sweeping oars extend ;
And pealing shouts the shore of Candia rend.
Success attends their skill ; the danger's o'er :
The port is doubled and beheld no more. [light,
Now morn, her lamp pale glimmering on the Scatter'd before her van reluctant night.
She comes not in refulgent pomp array'd,
But sternly frowning, wrapt in sullen shade.
Above incumbent vapours, Ida's height,
Tremendous rock ! emerges on the sight.
North-east the guardian isle of Standia lies,
And westward Freschin's woody capes arise.

With winning postures, now the wanton sails
Spread all their snares to charm th' inconstant gales.

The swelling stu'n sails ‡ now their wings extend,
Then stay-sails sidelong to the breeze ascend :
While all to court the wandering breeze are plac'd ;

With yards now thwarting, now obliquely brac'd.
The dim horizon lowering vapours shroud,
And blot the sun, yet struggling in the cloud :
Through the wide atmosphere, condens'd with
His glaring orb emits a sanguine blaze. [haze,
The pilots now their rules of art apply,
The mystic needle's devious aim to try.
The compass plac'd to catch the rising ray §,
The quadrant's shadows studious they survey !

* The windlafs is a sort of large roller, used to wind in the cable, or heave up the anchor. It is turned about vertically, by a number of long bars or levers ; in which operation it is prevented from recoiling, by the pauls.

† Towing is the operation of drawing a ship forward, by means of ropes, extending from her fore-part to one or more of the boats rowing before her.

‡ Studding-sails are long, narrow sails, which are only used in fine weather and fair winds, on the outside of the larger square-sails. Stay-sails are three-cornered sails, which are hoisted up on the stays, when the wind crosses the ship's course either directly or obliquely.

§ The operation of taking the sun's azimuth, in order to discover the eastern or western variation of the magnetical needle.

Along the arch the gradual index slides,
While Phæbus down the vertic circle glides.
Now, seen on ocean's utmost verge to swim,
He sweeps it vibrant with his nether limb.
Their sage experience thus explores the height
And polar distance of the source of light :
Then through the chiliads triple maze they trace
Th' analogy that proves the magnet's place.
The wayward steel, to truth thus reconcil'd,
No more the attentive pilot's eye beguil'd.

The natives, while the ship departs the land,
Ashore with admiration gazing stand.
Majestically flow, before the breeze,
In silent pomp she marches on the seas.
Her milk-white bottom cast a softer gleam,
While trembling through the green translucent stream.

The wales †, that close above in contrast shone,
Clasp the long fabric with a jetty zone.
Britannia, riding awful on the prow,
Gaz'd o'er the vassal-wave that roll'd below :
Where'er she mov'd, the vassal-waves were seen
To yield obsequious, and confess their queen.
Th' imperial trident grac'd her dexter-hand,
Of power to rule the surge, like Moses' wand,
Th' eternal empire of the main to keep,
And guide her squadrons o'er the trembling deep.
Her left propitious bore a mystic shield,
Around whose margin rolls the wat'ry field.
There her bold genius, in his floating car,
O'er the wild billow hurls the storm of war—
And lo ! the beasts, that oft with jealous rage
In bloody combat met, from age to age,
Tam'd into union, yok'd in friendship's chain,
Draw his proud chariot round the vanquish'd main.
From the broad margin to the centre grew
Shelves, rocks, and whirlpools, hideous to the view !—

Th' immortal shield from Neptune she receiv'd,
When first her head above the waters heav'd.
Loose floated o'er her limbs an azure vest ;
A figur'd scutcheon glitter'd on her breast ;
There, from one parent soil, for ever young,
The blooming rose and hardy thistle sprung.
Around her head an oaken wreath was seen,
Inwove with laurels of unfading green.
Such was the sculptur'd prow—from van to rear,
Th' artillery frown'd, a black tremendous tier !
Embalm'd with orient gum above the wave,
The swelling sides a yellow radiance gave.
On the broad stern, a pencil warm and bold,
That never servile rules of art controul'd,
An allegoric tale on high portray'd,
There a young hero, here a royal maid.
Fair England's genius, in the youth exprest,
Her ancient foe, but now her friend confest,
The warlike nymph with fond regard survey'd :
No more his hostile frown her heart dismay'd.
His look, that once shot terror from afar,
Like young Alcides, or the god of war,

† The wales here alluded to are an assemblage of strong planks which envelope the lower part of the ship's side, wherein they are broader and thicker than the rest, and appear somewhat like a range of booms, which separates the bottom from the upper works.

Serene as summer's evening skies she saw;
 Serene, yet firm; though mild, impressing awe.
 Her nervous arm, inur'd to toils severe,
 Brandish'd th' unconquer'd Caledonian spear.
 The dreadful falchion of the hills she wore,
 Sung to the harp in many a tale of yore,
 That oft her rivers dy'd with hostile gore.
 Blue was her rocky shield; her piercing eye
 Flash'd like the meteors of her native sky;
 Her crest, high-plum'd, was rough with many a scar,

And o'er her helmet gleam'd the northern star.
 The warrior youth appear'd of noble frame,
 The hardy offspring of some Runic dame.
 Loose o'er his shoulders hung the slacken'd bow,
 Renown'd in song, the terror of the foe!
 The sword, that oft the barbarous north defy'd,
 The scourge of tyrants! glitter'd by his side.
 Clad in refulgent arms, in battle won,
 The George emblazon'd on his corselet shone.
 Fast by his side was seen a golden lyre,
 Pregnant with numbers of eternal fire;
 Whose strings unlock the witches' midnight spell;
 Or waft wrapt fancy through the gulfs of hell—
 Struck with contagion, kindling fancy hears
 The songs of heaven! the music of the spheres!
 Borne on Newtonian wing through air she flies,
 Where other suns to other systems rise!—
 These front the scene conspicuous—over-head
 Albion's proud oak his filial branches spread:
 While on the sea-beat shore obsequious stood,
 Beneath their feet, the father of the flood—
 Here, the bold native of her cliffs above,
 Perch'd by the martial maid the bird of Jove;
 There on the watch, sagacious of his prey,
 With eyes of fire, an English mastiff lay.
 Yonder fair commerce stretch'd her winged sail;
 Here frown'd the god that wakes the living gale—
 High o'er the poop, the flattering winds unfurl'd
 Th' imperial flag that rules the wat'ry world.
 Deep-blushing armors all the tops invest;
 And warlike trophies either quarter drest:
 Then tower'd the masts; the canvas swell'd on high;
 And waving streamers floated in the sky.
 Thus the rich vessel moves in trim array,
 Like some fair virgin on her bridal day.
 Thus like a swan she cleaves the wat'ry plain,
 The pride and wonder of the Ægean main!

ADIEU, ye pleasures of the rural scene,
 Where peace and calm contentment dwell serene!
 To me in vain, on earth's prolific soil,
 With summer crown'd the Elysian vallies smile!
 To me those happier scenes no joy impart,
 But tantalize with hope my aching heart.
 For these, alas! reluctant I forego,
 To visit storms and elements of woe!
 Ye tempests, o'er my head congenial roll,
 To suit the mournful music of my soul!
 In black progression, lo! they hover near;
 Hail social horrors, like my fate severe!
 Old ocean hail, beneath whose azure zone
 The secret deep lies unexplor'd, unknown.
 Approach, ye brave companions of the sea,
 And fearless view this awful scene with me!
 Ye native guardians of your country's laws!
 Ye bold assertors of her sacred cause!
 The muse invites you; judge if she depart
 Unequal from the precepts of your art.
 In practice train'd, and conscious of her pow'r,
 Her steps intrepid meet the trying hour.

O'er the smooth bosom of the faithless tides,
 Propell'd by gentle gales, the vessel glides.
 Rodmond exulting felt th' auspicious wind,
 And by a mystic charm its aim confin'd.—
 The thoughts of home, that o'er his fancy roll,
 With trembling joy dilate Palemon's soul:
 Hope lifts his heart, before whose vivid ray
 Distress recedes, and danger melts away.
 Already Britain's parent-cliffs arise,
 And in idea greet his longing eyes!
 Each amorous sailor too, with heart elate,
 Dwells on the beauties of his gentle mate.
 E'en they th' impressiv' dart of love can feel,
 Whose stubborn souls are sheath'd in triple steel.
 Nor less o'erjoy'd, perhaps with equal truth,
 Each faithful maid expects th' approaching youth;
 In distant bosoms equal ardours glow,
 And mutual passions mutual joys bestow.—
 Tall Ida's summit now more distant grew,
 And Jove's high hill was rising on the view;
 When, from the left approaching, they descry
 A liquid column towering shoot on high.
 The foaming base an angry whirlwind sweeps,
 Where curling billows rouse the fearful deeps.
 Still round and round the fluid vortex flies,
 Scattering dun night and horror through the skies.

The swift volution, and th' enormous train,
 Let sages vers'd in nature's lore explain!
 The horrid apparition still draws nigh,
 And white with foam the whirling surges fly!—

The guns were prim'd; the vessel northward veers
 Till her black battery on the column bears.
 The nitre fir'd; and while the dreadful sound
 Convulsive shook the slumbering air around,
 The wat'ry volume, trembling to the sky,
 Burst down a dreadful deluge from on high!
 Th' affrighted surge, recoiling as it fell,
 Rolling in hills disclos'd th' abyfs of hell.
 But soon, this transient undulation o'er,
 The sea subsides, the whirlwinds rage no more.
 While southward now th' increasing breezes veer,
 Dark clouds incumbent on their wings appear.
 In front they view the consecrated grove
 Of cypress, sacred once to Cretan Jove.
 The thirsty canvas, all around supplied,
 Still drinks unquench'd the full aerial tide.
 And now, approaching near the lofty stern,
 A shoal of sportive dolphins they discern.
 From burnish'd scales they beam refulgent rays,
 Till all the glowing ocean seems to blaze.
 Soon to the sport of death the crew repair,
 Dart the long lance, or spread the baited snare.
 One in redoubling mazes wheels along,
 And glides unhappy near the triple prong.
 Rodmond unerring o'er his head suspends
 The barbed steel, and every turn attends;
 Unerring aim'd, the missile weapon flew,
 And, plunging, struck the fated victim through.
 Th' upturning points his ponderous bulk sustain;
 On deck he struggles with convulsive pain.
 But while his heart the fatal javelin thrills,
 And flitting life escapes in sanguine rills,
 What radiant changes strike th' astonish'd sight!
 What glowing hues of mingled shade and light!
 Not equal beauties gild the lucid west,
 With parting beams all o'er profusely drest.
 Not lovelier colours paint the vernal dawn,
 When orient dew impearl th' enamell'd lawn,
 Than from his sides in bright suffusion flow,
 That now with gold empyreal seem to glow;
 Now in pellucid sapphires meet the view,
 And emulate the soft celestial hue;
 Now beam a flaming crimson on the eye,
 And now assume the purple's deeper dye.
 But here description clouds each shining ray;
 What terms of art can nature's powers display?
 Now, while on high the fresh'ning gale she feels,
 The ship beneath her lofty pressure reels.
 The auxiliar sails that court a gentle breeze,
 From their high stations sink by slow degrees.
 The watchful ruler of the helm no more
 With fix'd attention eyes th' adjacent shore;
 But by the oracle of truth below,
 The wond'rous magnet, guides the wayward prow.
 The wind, that still the impressive canvas swell'd,
 Swift and more swift the yielding bark impell'd.
 Impatient thus she glides along the coast,
 Till far behind the hill of Jove is lost:
 And while aloof from Retimo she steers,
 Malacha's foreland full in front appears.
 Wide o'er yon isthmus stands the cypress-grove
 That once enclos'd the hallow'd fane of Jove.
 Here too, memorial of his name! is found
 A tomb, in marble ruins on the ground.

This gloomy tyrant, whose triumphant yoke
 The trembling states around to slav'ry broke,
 Through Greece for murder, rape, and incest
 known,

The muses rais'd to high Olympus' throne.—
 For oft, alas! their venal strains adorn
 The prince whom blushing virtue holds in scorn.
 Still Rome and Greece record his endless fame,
 And hence yon mountain yet retains his name.

But see! in confluence borne before the blast,
 Clouds roll'd on clouds the dusky noon o'ercaft;
 The black'ning-ocean curls; the winds arise;
 And the dark scud* in swift succession flies.

While the swollen canvas bends the masts on high,
 Low in the waves the leeward cannon lie †.

The sailors now, to give the ship relief,
 Reduce the topsails by a single reef ‡.
 Each lofty yard with slacken'd cordage reels,
 Rattle the creaking blocks, and ringing wheels.
 Down the tall masts the topsails sink amain;
 And, soon reduc'd, assume their post again.

More distant grew receding Candia's shore;
 And southward of the west Cape Spado bore.

Four hours the sun his high meridian throne
 Had left, and o'er Atlantic regions shone;
 Still blacker clouds, that all the skies invade,
 Draw o'er his sullied orb a dismal shade.

A squall deep-low'ring blots the southern sky,
 Before whose boisterous breath the waters fly.
 Its weight the topsails can no more sustain,
 Reef topsails. Reef, the boatswain calls again!

The haliards || and top-bowlines § soon are gone,
 To clue-lines and reef-tackles ¶ next they run:
 The shivering sails descend; and now they square

The yards, while ready sailors mount in air.

* Scud is a name given by seamen to the lowest clouds, which are driven with great rapidity along the atmosphere, in squally or tempestuous weather.

† When the wind crosses a ship's course, either directly or obliquely; that side of the ship upon which it acts, is called the weather-side; and the opposite one, which is then pressed downwards, is called the lee-side. Hence all the rigging and furniture of the ship are, at this time, distinguished by the side on which they are situated, as the lee-cannon, the lee-braces, the weather-braces, &c.

‡ The topsails are large square sails of the second degree in height and magnitude. Reefs are certain divisions or spaces by which the principal sails are reduced when the wind increases; and again enlarged proportionably when its force abates.

|| Haliards are either single ropes or tackles, by which the sails are hoisted up and lowered when the sail is to be extended or reduced.

§ Bow-lines are ropes intended to keep the windward edge of the sail steady, and prevent it from shaking in an unfavourable wind.

¶ Clue-lines are ropes used to truss up the clues, or lower corners, of the principal sails to their respective yards, particularly when the sail is to be close reefed or furled.—Reef-tackles are ropes employed to facilitate the operation of reefing, by confining the extremities of the reef close up to the yard, so that the interval becomes slack, and is therefore easily rolled up and fastened to the yard by the points employed for this purpose.

The weather-earings and the lee they past * ;
 The reefs enroll'd, and ev'ry point made fast.
 Their task above thus finish'd, they descend,
 And vigilant th' approaching squall attend.
 It comes resistless, and with foaming sweep
 Upturns the whitening surface of the deep.
 In such a tempest, borne to deeds of death,
 The wayward sisters scour the blasted heath.
 With ruin pregnant now the clouds impend,
 And storm and cataract tumultuous blend.
 Deep on her side the reeling vessel lies—
 Brail up the mizen quick † ! the master cries,
 Man the clue-garnets ‡ ! let the main-sheet fly || !—
 The boisterous squall still presses from on high,
 And swift, and fatal as the lightning's course,
 Through the torn main-sails bursts with thundering force.

While the rent canvas flutter'd in the wind,
 Still on her flank the stooping bark inclin'd.—
 Bear up the helm § a-weather ! Rodmond cries !
 Swift, at the word, the helm a-weather flies.
 The prow with secret instinct veers apace ;
 And now the fore sail right athwart the brace :
 With equal sheets restrain'd, the belying sail
 Spreads a broad concave to the sweeping gale.
 While o'er the foam the ship impetuous flies,
 Th' attentive timoneer ¶ the helm applies.
 As in pursuit along th' aerial way,
 With ardent eye, the falcon marks his prey,
 Each motion watches of the doubtful chase,
 Obliquely wheeling through the liquid space ;
 So, govern'd by the steersman's glowing hands,
 The regent helm her motion still commands.

But now the transient squall to leeward past,
 Again she rallies to the sullen blast.
 The helm to starboard * * turns ; with wings inclin'd
 The sidelong canvas claps the faithless wind.

* Earrings are small cords, by which the upper corners of the principal sails, and also the extremities of the reefs, are fastened to the yard-arms.

‡ Clue-garnets are employed for the same purposes on the mainsail and foresail, as the clue-lines are upon all other square sails.

|| It is necessary in this place to remark, that the sheets, which are universally mistaken by the English poets and their readers for the sails themselves, are no other than the ropes used to extend the clues, or lower the corners of the sails to which they are attached. To the main-sail and fore-sail there is a sheet and tack on each side ; the latter of which is a thick rope, serving to confine the weather-clue of the sail down to the ship's side, whilst the former draws out the lee clue or lower corner on the opposite side. Tacks are only used in a side-wind.

§ The helm is said to be a-weather, when the bar by which it is managed is turned to the side of the ship next the wind.

¶ Timoneer (from timonnier, Fr.) the helmsman or steersman.

* * The helm being turned to starboard, or to the right side of the ship, directs the prow to the left, or to port, and vice versa. Hence the helm being put a-starboard, when the ship is running northward, directs her prow towards the west.

The mizen draws ; the springs aloof once more,
 While the fore stay-sail * balances before,
 The fore-sail brac'd obliquely to the wind,
 They near the prow th' extended tack confin'd :
 Then on the leeward sheet the seamen bend,
 And haul the bowline to the bowsprit end.
 To topsails next they haste ; the buntlines gone,
 The cluelines through their wheel'd machinery run :
 On either side below the sheets are mann'd ;
 Again the fluttering sails their skirts expand.
 Once more the topsails, though with humbler
 plume,

Mounting aloft their ancient post resume.
 Again the bowlines and the yards are brac'd † ;
 And all th' entangled cords in order plac'd.

The sail, by whirlwinds thus so lately rent,
 In ratter'd ruins fluttering is unbent,
 With brails ‡ refix'd another soon prepar'd,
 Ascending, spreads along beneath the yard.
 To each yard-arm the head-rope || they extend,
 And soon their earings and the roebins § bend.
 That task perform'd, they the first braces ¶ slack,
 Then to its station drag th' unwilling tack ;
 And while the lee clue-garnet's lower'd away,
 Taught aft the sheet, they tally and belay * * .

Now to the north from Afric's burning shore,
 A troop of porpoises their course explore :
 In curling wreaths they gambol on the tide,
 Now bound aloft, now down the billow glide ;
 Their tracks awhile the hoary waves retain,
 That burn in sparkling trails along the main.
 The fleetest couriers of the finny race, [face,
 When threat'ning clouds th' ethereal vault de-
 Their route to leeward still sagacious form,
 To shun the fury of th' approaching storm.

Fair Candia now no more, beneath her lee,
 Protects the vessel from th' insulting sea :
 Round her broad arms, impatient of countroul,
 Rous'd from their secret deeps the billows roll.
 Sunk were the bulwarks of the friendly shore,
 And all the scene an hostile aspect wore.

* The sail, which is with more propriety called the fore topmast-stay-sail, is a triangular sail that runs upon the fore topmast stay, over the bowsprit. It is used to command the fore part of the ship, and counterbalance the sails extended towards the stern. See also the last note of this Canto.

† A yard is said to be braced, when it is turned about the mast horizontally, either to the right or left : the ropes employed in this service are accordingly called braces.

‡ The ropes used to truss up a sail to the yard or mast whereto it is attached, are, in a general sense, called brails.

|| The head rope is a cord to which the upper part of the sail is sewed.

§ Rope-bands, pronounced roebins, are small cords, used to fasten the upper edge of any sail to its respective yard.

¶ Because the lee-brace confines the yard so that the tack will not come down to its place till the braces are cast loose.

* * Taught implies stiff, tense, or extended straight ; and tally is a phrase particularly applied to the operation of hauling aft the sheets, or drawing them towards the ship's stern. To belay, is to fasten.

The flattering wind, that late with promis'd aid
 From Candia's bay th' unwilling ship betray'd,
 No longer saws beneath the fair disguise,
 But like a ruffian on his quarry flies.—
 Toss'd on the tide she feels the tempest blow,
 And dreads the vengeance of so fell a foe.
 As the proud horse, with costly trappings gay,
 Exulting prances to the bloody fray;
 Spurning the ground, he glories in his might,
 But reels tumultuous in the shock of fight;
 Even so, caparison'd in gaudy pride,
 The bounding vessel dances on the tide.—
 Fierce and more fierce the southern demon blew,
 And more incens'd the roaring waters grew.
 'The ship no longer can her topsails spread,
 And every hope of fairer skies is fled.
 Bowlines and haliards are relax'd again;
 Cluelines haul'd down, and sheets let fly amain;
 Clued-up each topsail, and by braces squar'd;
 The seamen climb aloft on either yard.
 They furl'd the sail, and pointed to the wind
 The yard, by rolling-tackles * then confin'd.
 While o'er the ship the gallant boatswain flies,
 Like a hoarse mulliff through the storm he cries:
 Prompt to direct the unskilful still appears;
 Th' expert he praises, and the fearful cheers.
 Now come to strike top-gallant yards † attend;
 Some travellers ‡ up the weather backstays || }
 send;
 At each mast-head the top-ropes others § bend. }
 The youngest sailors from the yards above
 Their parrels ¶, lifts , and braces soon remove;
 Then topt an end, and to the travellers tied, [slide.
 Charg'd with their sails, they down the backstays
 The yards secure along the booms †† reclin'd;
 While some they flying cords aloft confin'd.—

* The rolling tackle is an assemblage of pulleys, used to confine the yard to the weather-side of the mast, and prevent the former from rubbing against the latter by the fluctuating motion of the ship in a turbulent sea.

† It is usual to send down the top gallant yards on the approach of a storm. They are the highest yards that are rigged in a ship.

‡ Travellers are slender iron rings, encircling the backstays, and used to facilitate the hoisting or lowering the top-gallant yards, by confining them to the backstays, in their ascent or descent, so as to prevent them from swinging about by the agitation of the vessel.

|| Backstays are long ropes, extending from the right and left side of the ship to the topmast-heads, which they are intended to secure, by counteracting the effort of the wind upon the sails.

§ Top-ropes are the cords by which the top-gallant yards are hoisted up from the deck, or lowered again in stormy weather.

¶ The parrel, which is usually a moveable band of rope, is employed to confine the yard to its respective mast.

 Lifts are ropes extending from the head of any mast to the extremities of its particular yard, to support the weight of the latter; to retain it in balance; or to raise one yard-arm higher than the other, which is accordingly called topping.

†† The booms in this place imply any masts or yards lying on the deck in reserve, to supply the place of others which may be carried away by distress of weather, &c.

Their sails reduc'd, and all the rigging clear,
 Awhile the crew relax from toils severe.
 Awhile their spirits, with fatigue oppress'd,
 In vain expect th' alternate hour of rest:
 But with redoubling force the tempest blows,
 And watery hills in fell succession flow.
 A dismal shade o'ercasts the frowning skies;
 New troubles grow! new difficulties rise.
 No season this from duty to descend!—
 All hands on deck, th' eventual hour attend.

His race perform'd, the sacred lamp of day
 Now dipt in western clouds his parting ray.
 His sick'ning fires, half-lost in ambient haze,
 Refract along the dusk a crimson blaze;
 Till deep immerg'd the languid orb declines,
 And now to cheerless night the sky resigns!
 Sad evening's hour, how different from the past!
 No flaming pomp, no blushing glories cast,
 No ray of friendly light is seen around;
 The moon and stars in hopeless shade are drown'd.

The ship no longer can her courses * bear:
 To reef the courses is the master's care:
 The sailors summon'd aft, a daring band!
 Attend th' enfolding brails at his command.
 But here the doubtful officers dispute,
 Till skill and judgment prejudice confute.—
 Rodmond, whose genius never soar'd beyond
 The narrow rules of art his youth had conn'd,
 Still to the hostile fury of the wind
 Releas'd the sheet, and kept the tack confin'd.
 To long tried practice obstinately warm,
 He doubts conviction, and relies on form.
 But the sage master this advice declines;
 With whom Arion in opinion joins.—
 The watchful seaman, whose sagacious eye
 On sure experience may with truth rely,
 Who from the reigning cause foretels th' effect,
 This barbarous practice ever will reject.
 For, fluttering loose in air, the rigid sail
 Soon flits to ruins in the furious gale;
 And he who strives the tempest to disarm,
 Will never first embraile the lee yard-arm.
 The master said;—obedient to command,
 To raise the tack, the ready sailors stand †.—
 Gradual it loosens, while th' involving clue,
 Swell'd by the wind, aloft unruffling flew.
 The sheet and weather-brace they now stand
 by ‡;

The lee clue-garnet and the bunt-lines ply.
 Thus all prepar'd, Let go the sheet, he cries;
 Impetuous round the ringing wheels it flies;

* The courses are generally understood to be the mainsail, foresail, and mizen, which are the largest and lowest sails on their several masts: the term is however sometimes taken in a larger sense.

† It has been remarked before, that the tack is always fastened to windward: accordingly as soon as it is cast loose, and the clue-garnet hauled up, the weather clue of the sail immediately mounts to the yard: and this operation must be carefully performed in a storm, to prevent the sail from splitting, or being torn to pieces by shivering.

‡ It is necessary to pull in the weather-brace whenever the sheet is cast off, to preserve the sail from shaking violently.

Shivering at first, till by the blast impell'd,
 High o'er the lee yard-arm the canvas swell'd :
 By spilling-lines * embrac'd, with brails confin'd,
 It lies at length unshaken by the wind.
 The foresail then secur'd, with equal care
 Again to reef the mainsail they repair.—
 While some high-mounted overhaul the tie,
 Below the down-haul-tackle † others ply
 Jears ‡, lifts, and brails, a seaman each attends,
 Along the mast the willing yard descends.
 When lower'd sufficient they securely brace;
 And fix the rolling-tackle in its place;
 The reef-lines || and their earings now prepar'd,
 Mounting on piliant shrouds §, they man the yard.

Far on th' extremes two able hands appear,
 Arion there, the hardy boatswain here;
That in the van to front the tempest hung;
This round the lee yard-arm, ill-omen'd! clung.
 Each earing to its station first they bend;
 The reef-band ¶ then along the yard extend;
 The circling earings, round th' extremes entwin'd
 By outer and by inner turns  they bind.
 From hand to hand, the reef-lines, next receiv'd,
 Through eye-let holes and roebins-legs were reev'd.
 The reef in double folds involv'd they lay;
 Strain the firm cord, and either end belay.

Hadst thou, Arion, held the leeward post,
 While on the yard by mountain billows tost,
 Perhaps oblivion o'er our tragic tale
 Had then for ever drawn her dusky veil.—
 But ruling Heaven prolong'd thy vital date,
 Severer ills to suffer and relate!

For, while their orders those aloft attend,
 To furl the mainsail, or on deck descend,

* The spilling-lines, which are only used on particular occasions in tempestuous weather, are employed to draw together and confine the belly of the sail, when it is inflated by the wind over the yard.

† The violence of the wind forces the yard so much outward from the mast on these occasions, that it cannot easily be lowered, so as to reef the sail, without the application of a tackle to haul it down on the mast. This is afterwards converted into rolling-tackle.

‡ Jears are the same to the mainsail, foresail, and mizen, as the baliards are to all the inferior sails. The tie is the upper part of the jears.

|| Reef-lines are only used to reef the mainsail and foresail. They are passed in spiral turns through the eye-let holes of the reef, and over the head of the sails between the rope-band legs, till they reach the extremities of the reef, to which they are firmly extended, so as to lace the reef close up to the yard.

§ Shrouds are thick ropes, stretching from the mast-heads downwards, to the outside of the ship, serving to support the masts. They are also used as a range of rope-ladders, by which the seamen ascend or descend, to perform whatever is necessary about the sails and rigging.

¶ The reef-band is a long piece of canvas sewed across the sail, to strengthen the canvas in the place where the eye-let holes of the reef are formed.

 The outer turns of the earing serve to extend the sail along the yard; and the inner turns are employed to confine its head-rope close to its surface.

A sea *, up-surg'ing with tremendous roll,
 To instant ruin seems to doom the whole.
 O friends, secure your hold! Arion cries:—
 It comes all-dreadful, stooping from the skies!
 Uplifted on its horrid edge, she feels
 The shock, and on her side half-bury'd reels:
 The sail, half-bury'd in the whelming wave,
 A fearful warning to the seamen gave:
 While from its margin, terrible to tell!
 Three sailors with their gallant boatswain fell.
 Torn with resistless fury from their hold,
 In vain their struggling arms the yard enfold:
 In vain to grapple flying cords they try;
 The cords, alas, a solid gripe deny!
 Prone on the midnight surge, with panting breath
 They cry for aid, and long contend with death.
 High o'er their heads the rolling billows sweep;
 And down they sink in everlasting sleep.—
 Bereft of power to help, their comrades see
 The wretched victims die beneath the lee;
 With fruitless sorrow their lost state bemoan;
 Perhaps a fatal prelude to their own!

In dark suspense on deck the pilots stand,
 Nor can determine on the next command.
 Though still they knew the vessel's armed side
 Impenetrable to the clasp'ing tide;
 Though still the waters by no secret wound
 A passage to her deep recesses found;
 Surrounding evils yet they ponder o'er,
 A storm, a dangerous sea, and leeward shore!
 Should they, though reef'd, again their sails extend,
 Again in fluttering fragments they may rend;
 Or should they stand, beneath the dreadful strain
 The down-press'd ship may never rise again;
 Too late to weather † now Morea's land,
 Yet verging fast to Athens' rocky strand.—
 Thus they lament the consequence severe,
 Where perils unallay'd by hope appear.
 Long in their minds revolving each event,
 At last to furl the courses they consent.
 That done, to reef the mizen next agree,
 And try ‡ beneath it, sidelong in the sea.

Now down the mast the sloping yard declin'd,
 Till by the jeers and topping-lift || confin'd.
 The head, with doubling canvas fenc'd around,
 In balance, near the lofty peck, they bound.

* A sea is the general name given by sailors to a single wave or billow: hence when a wave bursts over the deck, the vessel is said to have shipped a sea.

† To weather a shore, is to pass to the windward of it, which at this time is prevented by the violence of the storm.

‡ To try, is to lay the ship with her side nearly in the direction of the wind and sea, with the head somewhat inclined to the windward; the helm being laid a-lee to retain her in that position. See a further illustration of this in the last note of this canto.

|| The topping-lift, which tops the upper end of the mizen-yard. This line, and the six following, describe the operation of reefing and balancing the mizen. The reef of this sail is towards the lower end, the knittles being small short lines used in the room of points for this purpose: they are accordingly knotted under the foot-rope, or lower edge of the sail.

The reef enwrapt, th' inserted knittles ty'd,
To hoist the shorten'd sail again they hied.
The order given, the yard aloft they sway'd;
The brails relax'd, th' extended sheet belay'd.
The helm its post forsook, and, lash'd a-lee*,
Inclin'd the wayward prow to front the sea.

When sacred Orpheus, on the Stygian coast,
With notes divine implor'd his consort lost;
Though round him perils grew in fell array,
And fates and furies stood to bar his way;
Not more advent'rous was th' attempt to move
The powers of hell with strains of heavenly love,
Than mine to bid th' unwilling muse explore
The wilderness of rude mechanic lore.
Such toil th' unwearied Dædalus endur'd,
When in the Cretan labyrinth immur'd;
Till art her salutary help bestow'd,
To guide him through that intricate abode.
Thus, long entangled in a thorny way,
That never heard the sweet Pierian lay,
The muse, that tun'd to barbarous sounds her string,

Now spreads, like Dædalus, a bolder wing;
The verse begins in softer strains to flow,
Replete with sad variety of woe.

As yet amid this elemental war,
That scatters desolation from afar,
Nor toil, nor hazard, nor distress appear
To sink the seamen with unmanly fear.
Though their firm hearts no pageant honour boast,
They scorn the wretch that trembles in his post;
Who from the face of danger strives to turn,
Indignant from the social hour they spurn.
Though now full oft they felt the raging tide,
In proud rebellion climb the vessel's side,
No future ills unknown their souls appal;
They know no danger, or they scorn it all!
But ev'n the generous spirits of the brave,
Subdu'd by toil, a friendly respite crave;
A short repose alone their thoughts implore,
Their harass'd powers by slumber to restore.

Far other cares the master's mind employ;
Approaching perils all his hopes destroy.
In vain he spreads the graduated chart,
And bounds the distance by the rules of art;
In vain athwart the mimic seas expands
The compasses to circumjacent lands.
Ungrateful task! for no asylum trac'd,
A passage open'd from the wat'ry waste.
Fate seem'd to guard, with adamantine mound,
The path to every friendly port around.
While Albert thus, with secret doubts dismay'd,
The geometric distances survey'd,
On deck the watchful Rodmond cries aloud,
Secure your lives—grasp every man a shroud!—
Rous'd from his trance he mounts with eyes aghast,
When o'er the ship, in undulation vast,
A giant surge down-rushes from on high,
And fore and aft dislever'd ruins lie.—
As when, Britannia's empire to maintain,
Great Hawke descends in thunder on the main;
Around the brazen voice of battle roars,
And fatal lightnings blast the hostile shores;

* Lash'd a-lee, is fastened to the lee-side.

Beneath the storm their shatter'd navies groan,
The trembling deeps recoil from zone to zone:
Thus the torn vessel felt th' enormous stroke;
The boats beneath the thundering deluge broke;
Forth started from their planks the bursting rings,
Th' extended cordage all asunder springs.
The pilot's fair machinery strews the deck,
And cards and needles swim in floating wreck.
The balanc'd mizen, rending to the head,
In streaming ruins from the margin fled.
The sides convulsive shook on groaning beams,
And rent with labour, yawn'd the pitchy seams.
They found the well†, and terrible to hear!
Five feet immers'd along the line appear.
At either pump they ply the clanking brake‡,
And turn by turn th' ungrateful office take.
Rodmond, Arion, and Palemon, here,
At this sad task, all diligent appear.
As some fair castle, shook by rude alarms,
Opposes long th' approach of hostile arms;
Grim war around her plants his black array,
And death and sorrow mark his horrid way;
Till in some destin'd hour, against her wall,
In tenfold rage the fatal thunders fall;
The ramparts crack, the solid bulwarks rend;
And hostile troops the shatter'd breach ascend;
Her valiant inmates still the foe retard,
Resolv'd till death their sacred charge to guard:
So the brave mariners their pumps attend,
And help incessant by rotation lend;
But all in vain—for now the sounding cord,
Updrawn, an undiminish'd depth explor'd.
Nor this severe distress is found alone;
The ribs oppress'd by ponderous cannon groan.—
Deep rolling from the wat'ry volume's height,
The tortur'd sides seem bursting with their weight.
So reels Pelorus, with convulsive throes,
When in his veins the burning earthquake glows;
Hoarse through his entrails roars th' infernal flame,
And central thunders rend his groaning frame—
Accumulated mischiefs thus arise,
And fate vindictive all their skill defies,
One only remedy the season gave;
To plunge the nerves of battle in the wave:
From their high platforms thus th' artillery thrown,
Eas'd of their load, the timbers less shall groan;
But arduous is the task their lot requires;
A task that hovering fate alone inspires!
For, while intent the yawning decks to ease,
That ever and anon are drench'd with seas,
Some fatal billow, with recoiling sweep,
May whirl the helpless wretches in the deep.
No season this for counsel or delay!
Too soon th' eventful moments haste away!
Here perseverance, with each help of art,
Must join the boldest efforts of the heart.
These only now their misery can relieve;
These only now a dawn of safety give!

* The well is an apartment in the ship's hold, serving to enclose the pumps. It is sounded by dropping a measured iron rod down into it by a long line. Hence the increase or diminution of the leaks are easily discovered.

† The brake is the lever or handle of the pump, by which it is wrought.

While o'er the quivering deck, from van to rear,
Broad furies roll in terrible career,
Rodmond, Arion, and a chosen crew,
This office in the face of death pursue.
The wheel'd artillery o'er the deck to guide,
Rodmond descending claim'd the weather-side.
Fearless of heart the chief his orders gave;
Fronting the rude assaults of every wave.
Like some strong watch-tower nodding o'er the deep,

Whose rocky base the foaming waters sweep,
Untam'd he stood; the stern aerial war
Had mark'd his honest face with many a scar.—
Meanwhile Arion, traversing the waist*, }
The cordage of the leeward guns unbrac'd, }
And pointed crows beneath the metal plac'd. }
Watching the roll, their forelocks they withdrew,
And from their beds the reeling cannon threw.
Then, from the windward battlements unbound,
Rodmond's associates wheel th' artillery round;
Pointed with iron fangs, their bars beguile
The ponderous arms across the steep defile;
Then, hurl'd from sounding hinges o'er the side,
Thundering they plunge into the flashing tide.

The ship thus eas'd, some little respite finds,
In this rude conflict of the seas and winds.
Such ease Alcides felt, when, clogg'd with gore,
Th' envenom'd mantle from his side he tore;
When, stung with burning pain, he strove, too late,
To stop the swift career of cruel fate.
Yet then his heart one ray of hope procur'd,
Sad harbinger of sevenfold pangs endur'd!
Such, and so short, the pause of woe she found!—
Cimmerian darkness shades the deep around,
Save when the lightnings gleaming on the sight,
Flash through the gloom a pale disastrous light.
Above all ether, fraught with scenes of woe,
With grim destruction threatens all below.
Beneath the storm-lash'd furies furious rise,
And wave uproll'd on wave assails the skies;
With ever-floating bulwarks they surround
The ship, half swallow'd in the black profound!
With ceaseless hazard and fatigue oppress'd,
Dismay and anguish every heart possess;
For, while with boundless inundation o'er
The sea-beat ship th' involving waters roar,
Displac'd beneath by her capacious womb,
They rage their ancient station to resume;
By secret ambushes, their force to prove,
Through many a winding channel first they rove;
Till, gathering fury, like the fever'd blood,
Through her dark veins they roll a rapid flood.
While unrelenting thus the leaks they found,
The pumps with ever-clanking strokes resound.
Around each leaping valve, by toil subdu'd,
The tough bull-hide must ever be renew'd.
Their sinking hearts unusual horrors chill;
And down their weary limbs thick dews distil.
No ray of light their dying hope redeems!
Pregnant with some new woe each moment teems!

* The waist of a ship of this kind is an hollow space, of about five feet in depth, contained between the elevations of the quarter-deck and fore-castle, and having the upper deck for its base, or platform.

Again the chief th' instructive draught extends,
And o'er the figur'd plane attentive bends;
To him the motion of each orb was known,
That wheels around the sun's refulgent throne:
But here, alas, his science nought avails!
Art droops unequal, and experience fails.
The different traverses, since twilight made,
He on the hydrographic circle laid;
Then the broad angle of lee-way* explor'd,
As swept across the graduated chord.
Her place discover'd by the rules of art,
Unusual terrors shook the master's heart;
When Falconera's rugged isle he found
Within her drift, with shelves and breakers bound;
For if on those destructive shallows tost,
The helpless bark with all her crew are lost:
As fatal still appears, that danger o'er,
The steep St. George, and rocky Gardalor.
With him the pilots of their hopeless state
In mournful consultation now debate.
Not more perplexing doubts her chiefs appal
When some proud city verges to her fall;
While ruin glares around, and pale affright
Convenes her councils in the dead of night—
No blazon'd trophies o'er their concave spread,
Nor storied pillars rais'd aloft the head:
But here the queen of shade around them threw
Her dragon-wing, disastrous to the view! {er;
Dire was the scene, with whirlwind, hail, and show-
Black melancholy rul'd the fearful hour!
Beneath tremendous roll'd the flashing tide,
Where fate on every billow seem'd to ride—
Enclos'd with ills, by peril unsubdu'd,
Great in distress the master-seaman stood:
Skill'd to command; deliberate to advise;
Expert in action; and in council wise;
Thus to his partners, by the crew unheard,
The dictates of his soul the chief referr'd:

Ye faithful mates, who all my trouble share,
Approv'd companions of your master's care!
To you, alas! 'twere fruitless now to tell
Our sad distress, already known too well!
This morn' with favouring gales the port we left,
Though now of every flattering hope bereft:
No skill nor long experience could forecast
Th' unseen approach of this destructive blast.
These seas, where storms at various seasons blow,
No reigning winds nor certain omens know.
The hour, th' occasion all your skill demands;
A leaky ship embay'd by dangerous lands,
Our bark no transient jeopardy surrounds;
Groaning she lies beneath unnumber'd wounds.
'Tis ours the doubtful remedy to find;
To shun the fury of the seas and wind.
For in this hollow swell, with labour sore,
Her flank can bear the bursting floods no more:
Yet this or other ills she must endure;
A dire disease, and desperate is the cure!
Thus two expedients offer'd to your choice,
Alone require your counsel and your voice.

* The lee-way, or drift, which in this place are synonymous terms, is the movement by which a ship is driven sideways at the mercy of the wind and sea, when she is deprived of the government of the sails and helm.

These only in our power are left to try;
 To perish here, or from the storm to fly.
 The doubtful balance in my judgment cast,
 For various reasons I prefer the last.
 'Tis true, the vessel and her costly freight,
 To me consign'd, my orders only wait;
 Yet, since the charge of every life is mine,
 To equal votes our counsels I resign;
 Forbid it, Heaven, that, in this dreadful hour,
 I claim the dangerous reins of purblind power!
 But should we now resolve to bear away,
 Our hopeless state can suffer no delay.
 Nor can we, thus bereft of every sail,
 Attempt to steer obliquely on the gale.
 For then, if breaching sideward to the sea,
 Our dropsy'd ship may founder by the lee;
 No more obedient to the pilot's power,
 Th' o'erwhelming wave may soon her frame devour.

He said; the listening mates with fix'd regard,
 And silent reverence, his opinion heard.
 Important was the question in debate,
 And o'er their counsels hung impending fate.
 Rodmond, in many a scene of peril try'd,
 Had oft the master's happier skill descri'd.
 Yet now, the hour, the scene, th' occasion known,
 Perhaps with equal right prefer'd his own.
 Of long experience in the naval art,
 Blunt was his speech, and naked was his heart;
 Alike to him each climate and each blast;
 The first in danger, in retreat the last:
 Sagacious balancing th' oppos'd events,
 From Albert his opinion thus dissents.

Too true the perils of the present hour,
 Where toils exceeding toils our strength o'erpower!
 Yet whither can we turn, what road pursue,
 With death before still opening on the view?
 Our bark, 'tis true, no shelter here can find,
 Sore shatter'd by the ruffian seas and wind.
 Yet with what hope of refuge can we flee,
 Chas'd by this tempest and outrageous sea?
 For while its violence the tempest keeps,
 Bereft of every sail we roam the deeps:
 At random driven, to present death we haste;
 And one short hour perhaps may be our last.
 In vain the gulf of Corinth on our lee,
 Now opens to her ports a passage free;
 Since, if before the blast the vessel flies,
 Full in her track unnumber'd dangers rise.
 Here Falconera spreads her lurking snares;
 There distant Greece her rugged shelves prepares.
 Should once her bottom strike that rocky shore,
 The splitting bark that instant were no more;
 Nor she alone, but with her all the crew
 Beyond relief were doom'd to perish too.
 Thus if to scud too rashly we consent,
 Too late in fatal hour we may repent.
 Then of our purpose this appears the scope,
 To weigh the danger with the doubtful hope.
 Though sorely buffeted by every sea,
 Our hull unbroken long may try a lee.
 The crew, though harass'd long with toils severe,
 Still at their pumps perceive no hazards near.
 Shall we, incautious, then the danger tell,
 At once their courage and their hope to quell?

Prudence forbids!—This southern tempest soon
 May change its quarter with the changing moon.
 Its rage, though terrible, may soon subside,
 Nor into mountains lash th' unruly tide.
 These leaks shall then decrease; the sails once more
 Direct our course to some relieving shore.—

Thus while he spoke, around from man to man
 At either pump a hollow murmur ran.
 For while the vessel, through unnumber'd chinks,
 Above, below, th' invading waters drinks,
 Sounding her depth, they ey'd the wetted scale,
 And lo! the leaks o'er all their powers prevail.
 Yet in their post, by terrors unsubdu'd,
 They with redoubling force their task pursu'd.

And now the senior pilot seem'd to wait
 Arion's voice to close the dark debate.
 Though many a bitter storm, with peril fraught,
 In Neptune's school the wandering stripling
 taught,
 Not twice nine summers yet matur'd his thought.

So oft he bled by fortune's cruel dart,
 It fell at last innoxious on his heart.
 His mind still shunning care with secret hate,
 In patient indolence resign'd to fate.
 But now the horrors that around him roll,
 Thus rous'd to action his rekindling soul.

With fix'd attention, pondering in my mind
 The dark distresses on each side combin'd;
 While here we linger in the pass of fate,
 I see no moment left for sad debate.
 For, some decision if we wish to form,
 Ere yet our vessel sink beneath the storm,
 Her shatter'd state and yon desponding crew
 At once suggest what measures to pursue.
 The labouring hull already seems half-fill'd
 With waters through an hundred leaks distill'd;
 As in a dropsy, wallowing with her freight,
 Half-drown'd she lies, a dead inactive weight!
 Thus drench'd by every wave, her riven deck
 Stript and defenceless, floats a naked wreck;
 Her wounded flanks no longer can sustain
 These fell invasions of the bursting main.
 At ev'ry pitch, th' o'erwhelming billows bend
 Beneath their load, the quiv'ring bowsprit-end.
 A fearful warning! since the masts on high
 On that support with trembling hope rely.
 At either pump our seamen pant for breath,
 In dark dismay anticipating death.
 Still all our powers th' increasing leak defy:
 We sink at sea, no shore, no haven nigh.
 One dawn of hope yet breaks athwart the gloom,
 To light and save us from the wat'ry tomb,
 That bids us shun the death impending here;
 Fly from the following blast, and shoreward
 steer,

'Tis urg'd indeed, the fury of the gale
 Precludes the help of every guiding sail;
 And driven before it on the wat'ry waste,
 To rocky shores and scenes of death we haste,
 But haply Falconera we may shun;
 And far to Grecian coasts is yet the run:
 Less harass'd then, our scudding ship may bear
 Th' assaulting surge repell'd upon her rear;
 Ev'n then the wearied storms as soon shall die,
 Or less torment the groaning pines on high.

Should we at last be driven by dire decree
Too near the fatal margin of the sea,
The hull dismasted there a while may ride,
With lengthen'd cables, on the raging tide.
Perhaps kind Heaven, with interposing power,
May curb the tempest ere that dreadful hour.
But here ingulf'd and foundering while we stay,
Fate hovers o'er and marks us for her prey.

He said, ---Palemon saw, with grief of heart,
The storm prevailing o'er the pilot's art;
In silent terror and distress involv'd,
He heard their last alternative resolv'd.
High beat his bosom: with such fear subdu'd,
Beneath the gloom of some enchanted wood,
Oft in old time the wandering swain explor'd
The midnight wizards, breathing rites abhorr'd;
Trembling approach'd their incantations fell,
And, chill'd with horror, heard the songs of hell.
Arion saw, with secret anguish mov'd,
The deep affliction of the friend he lov'd;
And, all awake to friendship's genial heat,
His bosom felt consenting tumults beat.
Alas! no season this for tender love;
Far hence the music of the myrtle grove! ---
With comfort's soothing voice, from hope deceiv'd,
Palemon's drooping spirit he reviv'd.
For consolation, oft with healing art,
Retunes the jarring numbers of the heart. ---
Now had the pilots all th' events resolv'd,
And on their final refuge thus resolv'd;
When, like the faithful shepherd, who beholds
Some prowling wolf approach his fleecy folds;
To the brave crew, whom racking doubts perplex,

The dreadful purpose Albert thus directs:

Unhappy partners in a wayward fate!
Whose gallant spirits now are known too late;
Ye! who unmov'd behold this angry storm
With terrors all the rolling deep deform;
Who, patient in adversity, still bear
The firmest front when greatest ills are near!
The truth, though grievous, I must now reveal,
That long in vain I purpos'd to conceal.
Ingulf'd, all helps of art we vainly try,
To weather leeward shores, alas! too nigh.
Our crazy bark no longer can abide
The seas that thunder o'er her batter'd side;
And, while the leaks a fatal warning give,
That in this raging sea she cannot live,
One only refuge from despair we find;
At once to wear and scud before the wind*.
Perhaps ev'n then to ruin we may steer;
For broken shores beneath our lee appear;
But that's remote, and instant death is here;
Yet there, by Heaven's assistance, we may gain
Some creek or inlet of the Grecian main;
Or, shelter'd by some rock, at anchor ride,
Till with abating rage the blast subside.

But if, determin'd by the will of Heaven,
Our helpless bark at last ashore is driven,
These counsels follow'd, from the wat'ry grave
Our floating sailors in the surf may save.

* For an explanation of these manœuvres the reader is referred to the last note of this canto.

And first let all our axes be secur'd,
To cut the masts and rigging from a board.
Then to the quarters bind each plank and oar,
To float between the vessel and the shore.
The longest cordage too must be convey'd
On deck, and to the weather-rails belay'd.
So they who haply reach alive the land,
Th' extended lines may fasten on the strand.
Whene'er, loud thundering on the leeward shore,
While yet aloof we hear the breakers roar,
Thus for the terrible event prepar'd,
Brace fore and aft to starboard every yard.
So shall our masts swim lighter on the wave,
And from the broken rocks our seamen save.
Then westward turn the stem, that every mast
May shoreward fall, when from the vessel cast. ---
When o'er her side once more the billows bound;
Ascend the rigging till she strikes the ground:
And when you hear aloft th' alarming shock
That strikes her bottom on some pointed rock,
The boldest of our sailors must descend,
The dangerous business of the deck to tend:
Then each, secur'd by some convenient cord,
Should cut the shrouds and rigging from the board.
Let the broad axes next assail each mast!
And booms, and oars, and rafts to leeward cast.
Thus, while the cordage stretch'd ashore may guide

Our brave companions through the swelling tide,
This floating lumber shall sustain them o'er
The rocky shelves, in safety to the shore.
But as your firmest succour, till the last,
O cling securely on each faithful mast!
Though great the danger, and the task severe,
Yet bow not to the tyranny of fear!
If once that slavish yoke your spirits quell,
Adieu to hope! to life itself farewell!

I know, among you some full oft have view'd,
With murd'ring weapons arm'd, a lawless brood,
On England's vile inhuman shore who stand,
The foul reproach and scandal of our land!
To rob the wanderers wreck'd upon the strand.
These, while their savage office they pursue,
Oft wound to death the helpless plunder'd crew,
Who, 'scap'd from every horror of the main,
Implor'd their mercy, but implor'd in vain.
But dread not this! ---a crime to Greece unknown,

Such blood-hounds all her circling shores disown:
Her sons, by barbarous tyranny oppress'd,
Can share affliction with the wretch distress'd:
Their hearts, by cruel fate inur'd to grief,
Oft to the friendless stranger yield relief.

With conscious horror struck, the naval band
Detested for a while their native land.
They curs'd the sleeping vengeance of the laws,
That thus forgot her guardian sailor's cause.
Mean while the master's voice again they heard,
Whom, as with filial duty, all rever'd.

No more remains---but now a trusty band
Must ever at the pump industrious stand;
And while with us the rest attend to wear,
Two skillful seamen to the helm repair! ---
O Source of life! our refuge and our stay!
Whose voice the warring elements obey,

On thy supreme assistance we rely;
Thy mercy supplicate, if doom'd to die!
Perhaps this storm is sent, with healing breath,
From neighbouring shores to scourge disease and death!

'Tis ours on thine unerring laws to trust:
With thee, great Lord! "whatever is, is just."

He said; and with consenting reverence fraught,
The sailors join'd his prayer in silent thought.
His intellectual eye, serenely bright!
Saw distant objects with prophetic light.
Thus in a land, that lasting wars oppress,
That groans beneath misfortunes and distress;
Whose wealth to conquering armies falls a prey;
Her bulwarks sinking, as her troops decay;
Some bold sagacious statesman, from the helm,
Sees desolation gathering o'er his realm:
He darts around his penetrating eyes,
Where dangers grow, and hostile unions rise!
With deep attention marks th' invading foe;
Eludes their wiles, and frustrates ev'ry blow;
Tries his last art the tottering state to save,
Or in its ruins find a glorious grave.

Still in the yawning trough the vessel reels,
Ingulf'd beneath two fluctuating hills;
On either side they rise; tremendous scene!
A long dark melancholy vale between*.

* That the reader who is unacquainted with the manœuvres of navigation, may conceive a clearer idea of a ship's state when trying, and of the change of her situation to that of scudding, I have quoted a part of the explanation of these articles, as they appear in the Dictionary of the Marine.

Trying is the situation in which a ship lies nearly in the trough or hollow of the sea in tempest, particularly when it blows contrary to her course.

In trying as well as in scudding the sails are always reduced in proportion to the increase of the storm, and in either state, if the storm is excessive, she may have all her sails furled; or be, according to the sea phrase, under bare poles.

The intent of spreading a sail at this time is to keep the ship more steady, and to prevent her from rolling violently, by pressing her side down in the water; and also to turn her head towards the source of the wind, so that the shock of the seas may fall more obliquely on her flank, than when she lies along the trough of the sea, or in the interval between two waves. While she lies in this situation, the helm is fastened close to the lee-side, to prevent her, as much as possible, from falling to leeward. But as the ship is not then kept in equilibrio by the operation of her sails, which at other times counter-balance each other at the head and stern, she is moved by a slow but continual vibration, which turns her head alternately to windward and to leeward forming an angle of 30 or 40 degrees in the interval. That part where she stops in approaching the direction of the wind, is called her coming to; and the contrary excess of the angle to leeward, is called her falling off.

Veering or wearing, as used in the present sense, may be defined the movement by which a ship changes her state from trying to that of scudding, or, of running before the direction of the wind and sea.

It is an axiom in natural philosophy, "That every body will persevere in a state of rest, or of moving uni-

Still felt th' impression of the waves and wind,
And to the right and left by turns inclin'd.

formly in a right line, unless it be compelled to change its state by forces impressed; and that the change of motion is proportional to the moving force impressed, and made according to the right line in which that force acts."

Hence it is easy to conceive how a ship is compelled to turn into any direction by the force of the wind, acting upon any part of her length, in lines parallel to the plane of the horizon. Thus, in the act of veering, which is a necessary consequence of this invariable principle, the object of the seaman is to reduce the action of the wind on the ship's hind part, and to receive its utmost exertion on her fore part, so that the latter may be pushed to leeward. This effect is either produced by the operation of the sails, or by the impression of the wind on the masts and yards. In the former case, the sails on the hind-part of the ship, are either furled or arranged nearly parallel to the direction of the wind, which then glides ineffectually along their surfaces; at the same time the foremast sails are spread abroad, so as to receive the greatest exertion of the wind. The fore-part accordingly yields to this impulse, and is put in motion; and this motion, necessarily conspiring with that of the wind, pushes the ship about as much as is requisite to produce the desired effect.

But when the tempest is so violent as to preclude the use of sails, the effort of the wind operates almost equally on the opposite ends of the ship, because the masts and yards, situated near the head and stern, serve to counter-balance each other, in receiving its impression. The effect of the helm is also considerably diminished, because the head way, which gives life and vigour to all its operations, is at this time feeble and ineffectual. Hence it becomes necessary to destroy this equilibrium which subsists between the masts and yards before and behind, and to throw the balance forward to prepare for veering. If this cannot be effected by the arrangement of the yards on the masts, and it becomes absolutely necessary to veer in order to save the ship from destruction, the mizen-mast must be cut away, and even the main-mast, if she still remains incapable of answering the helm by turning her prow to leeward.

Scudding is that movement in navigation by which a ship is carried precipitately before a tempest.

As a ship flies with amazing rapidity through the water, whenever this expedient is put in practice, it is never attempted in a contrary wind, unless when her condition renders her incapable of sustaining the mutual effort of the wind and waves any longer on her side, without being exposed to the most imminent danger.

A ship either scuds with a sail extended on her foremast, or if the storm is excessive, without any sail, which in the sea phrase is called scudding under bare poles.

The principal hazards incident to scudding are generally, a sea striking the ship's stern; the difficulty of steering, which perpetually exposes her to the danger of broaching to; and the want of sufficient sea room. A sea which strikes the stern violently, may scatter it in pieces, by which the ship must inevitably founder. By broaching to suddenly, she is threatened with losing all her masts and sails, or being immediately overturned; and for want of sea room, she is exposed to the dangers of being wrecked on a lee shore.

But Albert from behind the balance drew,
And on the prow its double efforts threw.---
The order now was given to bear away;
The order given, the timoneers obey.
High o'er the bowsprit stretch'd the tortur'd sail,
As on the rack, distends beneath the gale.
But scarce the yielding prow its impulse knew,
When in a thousand flitting shreds it flew!--
Yet Albert new resources still prepares,
And, bridling grief, redoubles all his cares.
Away there; lower the mizen-yard on deck!
He calls, and brace the foremast yards aback!
His great example every bosom fires;
New life rekindles, and new hope inspires;
While to the helm unfaithful still she lies,
One desperate remedy at last he tries.---
Haste, with your weapons cut the shrouds and stay;
And hew at once the mizen-mast away!

He said; th' attentive sailors on each side,
At his command the trembling cords divide.
Fast by the fated pine bold Rodmond stands;
Th' impatient axe hung gleaming in his hands;
Brandish'd on high, it fell with dreadful sound;
The tall mast groaning, felt the deadly wound.
Deep gash'd with fores, the tott'ring structure rings,
And crashing, thund'ring, o'er the quarter swings.
Thus when some limb, convuls'd with pangs of
death,

Imbibes the gangrene's pestilential breath;
Th' experienc'd artist from the blood betrays
The latent venom, or its course delays:
But if th' infection triumphs o'er his art,
Tainting the vital stream that warms the heart,
Resolv'd at last, he quits th' unequal strife,
Severs the member, and preserves the life.

The scene stretches from that part of the Archipelago which lies ten miles to the northward of Falconera, to Cape Colonna, in Attica--The time is about seven hours, being from one till eight in the morning.

WHEN in a barbarous age, with blood defil'd,
The human savage roam'd the gloomy wild;
When fallen ignorance her flag display'd,
And rapine and revenge her voice obey'd;
Sent from the shores of light the muses came,
The dark and solitary race to tame.
'Twas their's the lawless passions to controul,
And melt in tender sympathy the soul;
The heart from vice and error to reclaim,
And breathe in human breasts celestial flame.
The kindling spirit caught th' empyreal ray,
And glow'd congenial with the swelling lay.
Rous'd from the chaos of primeval night,
At once fair truth and reason sprung to light.---
When great Mæonides, in rapid song,
The thundering tide of battle rolls along,
Each ravish'd bosom feels the high alarms,
And all the burning pulses beat to arms.
From earth upborn, on Pegasean wings,
Far through the boundless realms of thought he
springs;

While distant poets, trembling as they view
His sunward flight, the dazzling track pursue.
But when his strings, with mournful magic, tell
What dire distress Laertes' son beset,
The strains, meand'ring through the maze of woe,
Bid sacred sympathy the heart o'erflow.
Thus, in old time, the muses' heavenly breath
With vital force dissolv'd the chains of death:
Each bard in epic lays began to sing,
Taught by the master of the vocal string.---
'Tis mine, alas! through dangerous scenes to stray,
Far from the light of his unerring ray!
While, all unus'd the wayward path to tread,
Darkling I wander with prophetic dread.
To me in vain the bold Mæonian lyre
Awakes the numbers, fraught with living fire!--
Full oft indeed, that mournful harp of yore
Wept the sad wanderer lost upon the shore;
But o'er that scene th' impatient numbers ran,
Subservient only to a nobler plan.
'Tis mine, the unravell'd prospect to display,
And chain th' events in regular array.
Though hard the task, to sing in varied strains,
While all unchang'd the tragic theme remains!
Thrice happy! might the secret powers of art
Unlock the latent windings of the heart!
Might the sad numbers draw compassion's tear
For kindred miseries, oft beheld too near:
For kindred wretches, oft in ruin cast
On Albion's strand, beneath the wintry blast:
For all the pangs, the complicated woe,
Her brave sons, her faithful sailors know!
So pity, gushing o'er each British breast,
Might sympathize with Britain's sons distress:
For this my theme through mazes I pursue,
Which nor Mæonides nor Maro knew.

Awhile the mast, in ruins dragg'd behind,
 Balanc'd the impression of the helm and wind :
 The wounded serpent, agoniz'd with pain,
 Thus trails his mangled volume on the plain,
 But now the wreck dis sever'd from the rear,
 The long reluctant prow began to veer ;
 And while around before the wind it falls,
 Square all the yards * ! the attentive master calls---
 You, timoneers, her motion still attend !
 For on your steerage all our lives depend.
 So, steady † ! meet her, watch the blast behind,
 And steer her right before the seas and wind !
 Starboard again ! the watchful pilot cries ;
 Starboard, th' obedient timoneer replies.
 Then to the left the ruling helm returns ;
 The wheel ‡ revolves ; the ringing axle burns !
 The ship no longer, foundering by the lee,
 Bears on her side th' invasions of the sea :
 All lonely o'er the desert waste she flies,
 Scourg'd on by furies, storm and bursting skies.
 As when the masters of the lance assail,
 In Hyperborean seas, the slumbering whale ;
 Soon as the javelins pierce his scaly hide,
 With anguish stung, he cleaves the downward tide ;
 In vain he flies ! no friendly respite found ;
 His life-blood gushes through th' inflaming wound.
 The wounded bark, thus smarting with her
 pain,

Scuds from pursuing waves along the main ;
 While, dash'd apart by her dividing prow,
 Like burning adamant the waters glow.
 Her joints forget their firm elastic tone ;
 Her long keel trembles, and her timbers groan.
 Upheav'd behind her, in tremendous height,
 The billows frown, with fearful radiance bright !
 Now shivering, o'er the topmost wave she rides,
 While deep beneath th' enormous gulf divides.
 Now launching headlong down the horrid vale,
 She hears no more the roaring of the gale ;
 Till up the dreadful height again she flies,
 Trembling beneath the current of the skies.
 As that rebellious angel who from heaven
 To regions of eternal pain was driven :
 When dreadful he forsook the Stygian shore,
 The distant realms of Eden to explore ;
 Here, on sulphureous clouds sublime upheav'd,
 With daring wing th' infernal air he cleav'd ;
 There, in some hideous gulf descending prone,
 Far in the rayless void of night was thrown :
 Even so she scales the briny mountain's height,
 Then down the black abyss precipitates her flight.
 The masts, around whose tops the whirlwinds sing

With long vibration round her axle swing.
 To guide the wayward course amid the gloom,
 The watchful pilots different posts assume.
 Albert and Rodmond, station'd on the rear,
 With warning voice direct each timoneer.

* To square the yards, in this place is meant to arrange them directly athwart the ship's length.

† Steady, is the order to steer the ship according to the line on which she advances at that instant, without deviating to the right or left thereof.

‡ In all large ships the helm is managed by a wheel.

High on the prow the guard Arion keeps,
 To shun the cruisers wand'ring o'er the deeps :
 Where'er he moves Palemon still attends,
 As if on him his only hope depends :
 While Rodmond, fearful of some neighbouring shore,
 Cries, ever and anon, Look out afore !
 Four hours thus scudding on the tide she flew,
 When Falconera's rocky height they view.
 High o'er its summit, through the gloom of night,
 The glimmering watch-tower cast a mournful
 light.

In dire amazement rivetted they stand,
 And hear the breakers lash the rugged strand :
 But soon beyond this shore the vessel flies,
 Swift as the rapid eagle cleaves the skies.
 So from the fangs of her insatiate foe,
 O'er the broad champain scuds the trembling
 roe.—

That danger past, reflects a feeble joy ;
 But soon returning fears their hope destroy.
 Thus, in th' Atlantic, oft the sailor eyes,
 While melting in the reign of softer skies,
 Some alp of ice from polar regions blown,
 Hail the glad influence of a warmer zone :
 Its frozen cliffs attemper'd gales supply ;
 In cooling stream the aerial billows fly ;
 Awhile deliver'd from the scorching heat,
 In gentler tides the feverish pulses beat.

So, when their trembling vessel past this isle,
 Such visionary joys the crew beguile :
 Th' illusive meteors of a lifeless fire !
 Too soon they kindle, and too soon expire !
 Say, memory ! thou, from whose unerring
 tongue

Instructive flows the animated song !
 What regions now the flying ship surround ?
 Regions of old, through all the world renown'd ;
 That, once the poet's theme, the muses boast,
 Now lie in ruins, in oblivion lost !
 Did they, whose sad distress these lays deplore,
 Unskill'd in Grecian or in Roman lore
 Unconscious pass each famous circling shore ?

They did ; for, blasted in the barren shade,
 Here, all too soon, the buds of science fade :
 Sad ocean's genius, in untimely hour,
 Withers the bloom of every springing flower.
 Here fancy droops, while sullen cloud and storm
 The generous climate of the soul deform.
 Then if, among the wandering naval train,
 One stripling, exil'd from th' Aonian plain,
 Had e'er, entranc'd in fancy's soothing dream,
 Approach'd to taste the sweet Castalian stream,
 (Since those salubrious streams, with power divine,
 To purer sense th' attemper'd soul refine)
 His heart, with liberal commerce here unblest,
 Alien to joy, sincerer grief possess'd.
 Yet on the youthful mind th' impression cast
 Of ancient glory, shall for ever last.

There, all unquench'd by cruel fortune's ire,
 It glows with inextinguishable fire.

Immortal Athens first, in ruin spread,
 Contiguous lies at Port Liono's head.
 Great source of science : whose immortal name
 Stands foremost in the glorious roll of fame.

Here godlike Socrates and Plato shone,
And, firm to truth eternal honour won.
The first in virtue's cause his life resign'd,
By heav'n pronounc'd the wisest of mankind:
The last foretold the spark of vital fire,
The soul's fine essence, never could expire.
Here Solon dwelt, the philosophic sage,
That fled Pisistratus' vindictive rage.
Just Aristides here maintain'd the cause,
Whose sacred precepts shine through Solon's laws.
Of all her towering structures, now alone
Some scatter'd columns stand, with weeds o'er-grown.

The wandering stranger, near the port, describes
A milk-white lion of stupendous size;
Unknown the sculptor; marble is the frame:
And hence th' adjacent haven drew its name.

Next, in the gulf of Engia, Corinth lies,
Whose gorgeous fabrics seem'd to strike the skies;
Whom, though by tyrant-victors oft subdu'd,
Greece, Egypt, Rome, with awful wonder view'd
Her name, for Pallas' heavenly art renown'd*,
Spread like the foliage which her pillars crown'd.
But now, in fatal desolation laid,
Oblivion o'er it draws a dismal shade.

Then further westward on Morea's land,
Fair Mistra! thy modern turrets stand.
Ah! who, unmov'd with secret woe, can tell
That here great Lacedemon's glory fell?
Here once she flourish'd, at whose trumpet's sound
War burst his chains, and nations shook around.
Here brave Leonidas from shore to shore
Through all Achaia bade her thunders roar:
He, when imperial Xerxes, from afar,
Advanc'd with Persia's sumless troops to war,
Till Macedonia shrunk beneath his spear,
And Greece dismay'd beheld the chief draw near;
He, at Thermopylae's immortal plain,
His force repell'd with Sparta's glorious train.
Tall Oeto saw the tyrant's conquer'd bands,
In gasping millions, bleed on hostile lands.
Thus vanquish'd Asia trembling heard thy name,
And Thebes and Athens sicken'd at thy fame!
Thy state, supported by Lycurgus' laws,
Drew, like thine arms, superlative applause.
Even great Epaminondas strove in vain
To curb that spirit with a Theban chain.
But ah! how low her free-born spirit now!
Her abject sons to haughty tyrants bow;
A false, degenerate, superstitious race
Infest thy region, and thy name disgrace!

Not distant far, Arcadia's blest domains
Peloponnesus' circling shore contains.
Thrice happy soil! where still serenely gay,
Indulgent Flora breath'd perpetual May;
Where buxom Ceres taught th' obsequious field,
Rich without art, spontaneous gifts to yield.
Then with some rural nymph supremely blest,
While transport glow'd in each enamour'd breast,
Each faithful shepherd told his tender pain,
And sung of sylvan sports in artless strain.
Now, sad reverse! oppression's iron hand
Enslaves her natives, and despoils the land.

* Architecture.

In lawless rapine bred, a sanguine train
With midnight-ravage scour th' uncultur'd plain.
Westward of these, beyond the Isthmus, lies
The long-lost isle of Ithacus the wife;
Where fair Penelope her absent lord
Full twice ten years with faithful love deplor'd.
Though many a princely heart her beauty won,
She, guarded only by her tripling son,
Each bold attempt of suitor-kings repell'd,
And undeil'd the nuptial contract held.
With various arts to win her love they toil'd,
But all their wiles by virtuous fraud she foil'd.
True to her vows, and resolutely chaste,

The beauteous princess triumph'd at the last.
Argos, in Greece forgotten and unknown,
Still seems her cruel fortune to bemoan;
Argos, whose monarch led the Grecian hosts
Far o'er th' Ægean main to Dardan coasts.
Unhappy prince! who, on a hostile shore,
Toil, peril, anguish, ten long winters bore.
And when to native realms restor'd at last,
To reap the harvest of thy labours past;
A perjur'd friend, alas! and faithless wife,
There sacrific'd to impious lust thy life!
Fast by Arcadia stretch these desert plains,
And o'er the land a gloomy tyrant reigns.

Next the fair isle of Helena* is seen,
Where adverse winds detain'd the Spartan queen,
For whom in arms combin'd the Grecian host,
With vengeance fir'd, invaded Phrygia's coast;
For whom so long they labour'd to destroy
The sacred turrets of imperial Troy.
Here, driven by Juno's rage, the hapless dame,
Forlorn of heart, from ruin'd Ilium came.
The port an image bears of Parian stone,
Of ancient fabric, but of date unknown.

Due east from this appears th' immortal shore
That sacred Phœbus and Diana bore:
Delos, through all th' Ægean seas renown'd!
(Whose coast the rocky Cyclades surround)
By Phœbus honour'd, and by Greece rever'd;
Her hallow'd groves even distant Persia fear'd,
But now, a silent unfrequented land!
No human footstep marks the trackless sand.
Thence to the north, by Asia's western bound,
Fair Lemnos stands, with rising marble crown'd;
Where, in her rage, avenging Juno hurl'd
Ill-fated Vulcan from th' ethereal world.
There his eternal anvils first he rear'd;
Then, forg'd by Cyclopean art, appear'd
Thunders, that shook the skies with dire alarms,
And, form'd by skill divine, Vulcanian arms.
There, with this crippled wretch, the foul disgrace

And living scandal of th' empyreal race,
The beauteous queen of love in wedlock dwelt,
In fires profane can heavenly bosoms melt?

Eastward of this appears the Dardan shore,
That once th' imperial towers of Ilium bore.
Illustrious Troy! renown'd in every clime,
Through the long annals of unfolding time!
How oft, thy royal bulwarks to defend,
Thou saw'st thy tutelary gods in vain descend!

† Now known by the name of Macronisi.

Though chiefs unnumber'd in her cause were slain,
Though nations perish'd on her bloody plain,
That refuge of perfidious Helen's shame
Was doom'd at length to sink in Grecian flame;
And now, by time's deep plough-share harrow'd

The seat of sacred Troy is found no more.
No trace of all her glories now remains;
But corn and vines enrich her cultur'd plains.
Silver Scamander laves the verdant shore;
Scamander oft o'erflow'd with hostile gore!

Not far remov'd from Ilion's famous land,
In counter view appears the Thracian strand;
Where beauteous Hero, from the turret's height,
Display'd her crescent each revolving night;
Whose gleam directed lov'd Leander o'er
The rolling Hellespont to Asia's shore;
Till, in a fated hour, on Thracia's coast
She saw her lover's lifeless body tost;
Then felt her bosom agony severe;
Her eyes sad-gazing pour'd th' incessant tear:
O'erwhelm'd with anguish, frantic with despair,
She beat her beauteous breast and tore her hair—
On dear Leander's name in vain she cry'd;
Then headlong plung'd into the parting tide,
The parting tide receiv'd the lovely weight,
And proudly flow'd, exulting in its freight.

Far west of Thrace, beyond th' Ægean main,
Remote from ocean, lies the Delphic plain.
The sacred oracle of Phœbus there
High o'er the mount arose, divinely fair!
Achaian marble form'd the gorgeous pile:
August the fabric, elegant its style!
On brazen hinges turn'd the silver doors,
And chequer'd marble pav'd the polish'd floors.
The roofs, where storied tablatures appear'd,
On columns of Corinthian mould were rear'd:
Of shining porphyry the shafts were fram'd,
And round the hollow dome bright jewels flam'd.
Apollo's suppliant priests, a blameless train!
Frail'd their oblations on the holy flame;
To front the sun's declining ray 'twas plac'd;
With golden harps and living laurels grac'd.
The sciences and arts around the shrine
Conspicuous shone, engrav'd by hands divine!
Here Æsculapius' snake display'd his crest,
And burning glories sparkled on his breast:
While from his eye's insufferable light
Disease and death recoil'd in headlong flight.
Of this great temple, through all time renown'd,
Sunk in oblivion, no remains are found.
Contiguous here, with hallow'd woods o'er,
Parnassus lifts to heaven its honour'd head;
Where, from the deluge sav'd, by Heaven's command, leading Pyrrha hand in hand, {
Repeopled all the desolated land.
Around the scene untading laurels grow,
And aromatic flowers for ever blow.
The winged choirs, on every tree above,
Carol sweet numbers through the vocal grove;
While o'er th' eternal spring that smiles beneath,
Young zephyrs borne on rosy pinions breathe.
Fair daughters of the sun! the sacred nine,
Here wake to ecstasy their songs divine;

Or crown'd with myrtle, in some sweet alcove
Attune the tender strings to bleeding love.
All sadly sweet the balmy currents roll,
Soothing to softest peace the tortur'd soul,
While hill and vale with choral voice around
The music of immortal harps resound,
Fair pleasure leads in dance the happy hours,
Still scattering where she moves Elysian flowers!
Even now the strains, with sweet contagion fraught,
Shed a delicious languor o'er the thought.—
Adieu ye vales, that smiling peace bestow,
Where Eden's blossoms ever-vernal blow!
Adieu ye streams, that o'er enchanted ground
In lucid maze th' Aonian hill surround!
Ye fairy scenes, where fancy loves to dwell,
And young delight, for ever, O farewell!
The soul with tender luxury you fill,
And o'er the sense Lethean dew distil!
Awake, O memory, from th' inglorious dream!
With brazen lungs resume the kindling theme!
Collect thy powers! arouse thy vital fire!
Ye spirits of the storm, my verse inspire!
Hoarse as the whirlwinds that enrage the main,
In torrents pour along the swelling strain!

Now borne impetuous o'er the boiling deeps,
Her course to Attic shores the vessel keeps:
The pilots, as the waves behind her swell,
Still with the wheeling stern their force repel.
For this assault should either quarter * feel,
Again to flank the tempest she might reel.
The steersmen every bidden turn apply;
To right and left the spokes alternate fly.
Thus when some conquer'd host retreats in fear,
The bravest leaders guard the broken rear;
Indignant they retire, and long oppose
Superior armies that around them close;
Still shield the flanks; the routed squadrons join;
And guide the flight in one embodied line:
So they direct the flying bark before
Th' impelling floods that lash her to the shore.
As some benighted traveller, through the shade,
Explores the devious path with heart dismay'd;
While prowling savages behind him roar,
And yawning pits and quagmires lurk before—
High o'er the poop th' audacious seas aspire,
Uproll'd in hills of fluctuating fire.
As some fell conqueror, frantic with success,
Sheds o'er the nations ruin and distress;
So, while the wat'ry wilderness he roams,
Incens'd to sevenfold rage the tempest foams;
And o'er the trembling pines, above, below, [woe.
Shrill through the cordage howls, with notes of
Now thunders, wafted from the burning zone,
Growl from afar a deaf and hollow groan!
The ship's high battlements, to either side
For ever rocking, drink the briny tide:
Her joints unhing'd, in palsied languors play,
As ice dissolves beneath the noon-tide ray.
The skies, asunder torn, a deluge pour;
The impetuous hail descends in whirling shower.
High on the masts, with pale and livid rays,
Amid the gloom portentous meteors blaze.

* The quarter is the binder part of a ship's side, or that part which is near the stern.

Th' etherial dome, in mournful pomp array'd,
Now lurks behind impenetrable shade;
Now, flashing round intolerable light,
Redoubles all the terrors of the night.
Such terror Sinai's quaking hill o'erspread, [head.
When Heaven's loud trumpet sounded o'er his
It seem'd the wrathful angel of the wind
Had all the horrors of the skies combin'd;
And here, to one ill-fated ship oppos'd,
At once the dreadful magazine disclos'd.
And lo! tremendous o'er the deep he springs,
Th' enflaming sulphur flashing from his wings!—
Hark! his strong voice the dismal silence breaks;
Mad chaos from the chains of death awakes!
Loud and more loud the rolling peals enlarge,
And blue on deck their blazing sides discharge;
There all aghast the shivering wretches stood,
While chill suspense and fear congeal'd their blood.
Now in a deluge bursts the living flame,
And dread concussion rends th' etherial frame;
Sick earth convulsive groans from shore to shore,
And nature shuddering feels the horrid roar.

Still the sad prospect rises on my sight,
Reveal'd in all its mournful shade and light.
Swift through my pulses glides the kindling fire,
As lightning glances on th' electric wire.
But ah! the force of numbers strives in vain,
The glowing scene unequal to sustain.

But lo! at last from tenfold darkness borne,
Forth issues o'er the wave the weeping morn.
Hail, sacred vision! who, on orient wing,
The cheering dawn of light propitious bring!
All nature smiling hail'd the vivid ray,
That gave her beauties to returning day:
All but our ship, that, groaning on the tide,
No kind relief, no gleam of hope descri'd.
For now in front her trembling inmates see
The hills of Greece emerging on the lee.
So the lost lover views that fatal morn,
On which, for ever from his bosom torn,
The nymph ador'd resigns her blooming charms,
To bless with love some happier rival's arms.
So to Eliza dawn'd that cruel day,
That tore Æneas from her arms away;
That saw him parting, never to return,
Herself in funeral flames decreed to burn.
O yet in clouds, thou genial source of light,
Conceal thy radiant glories from our sight!
Go, with thy smile adorn the happy plain, [reign:
And gild the scenes where health and pleasure
But let not here, in scorn, thy wanton beam
Insult the dreadful grandeur of my theme!

While shoreward now the bounding vessel flies,
Full in her van St. George's cliffs arise:
High o'er the rest a pointed crag is seen,
That hung projecting o'er a mossy green.
Nearer and nearer now the danger grows,
And all their skill relentless fates oppose.
For, while more eastward they direct the prow,
Enormous waves the quivering deck o'erflow.
While, as she wheels, unable to subdue
Her fallies, still they dread her broaching-to*.

* Broaching-to is a sudden and involuntary movement in navigation, wherein a ship, whilst scudding or sailing

Alarming thought! for now no more a-lee
Her riven side could bear th' invading sea;
And if the following surge she scuds before,
Headlong she runs upon the dreadful shore;
A shore where shelves and hidden rocks abound,
Where death in secret ambush lurks around.—
Far less dismay'd Anchises' wandering son
Was seen the straits of Sicily to shun:
When Palinurus from the helm delcay'd
The rocks of Scylla on his eastern side;
While in the west, with hideous yawn disclos'd,
His onward path Charybdis' gulf oppos'd;
The double danger as by turns he view'd,
His wheeling bark her arduous track pursu'd.
Thus, while to right and left destruction lies,
Between th' extremes the daring vessel flies,
With boundless involution, bursting o'er
The marble cliffs, loud-dashing surges roar.
Hearse through each winding creek the tempest
raves,

And hollow rocks repeat the groan of waves.
Destruction round th' insatiate coast prepares
To crush the trembling ship, unnumber'd snares.
But haply now she 'scapes the fatal strand,
Though scarce ten fathoms distant from the land.
Swift as the weapon issuing from the bow,
She cleaves the burning waters with her prow;
And forward leaping with tumultuous haste,
As on the tempest's wing, the isle she past.
With longing eyes, and agony of mind,
The sailors view this refuge left behind;
Happy to bribe, with India's richest ore,
A fate accession to that barren shore!

When in the dark Peruvian mine confin'd,
Lost to the cheerful commerce of mankind,
The groaning captive wastes his life away,
For ever exil'd from the realms of day;
Not equal pangs his bosom agonize,
When far above the sacred light he eyes,
While all forlorn the victim pines in vain
For scenes he never shall possess again.

But now Athenian mountains they descry,
And o'er the surge Colonna frowns on high.
Beside the cape's projecting verge is plac'd
A range of columns, long by time defac'd;
First planted by devotion to sustain,
In elder times, Tritonia's sacred fane.
Foams the wild beach below with madd'ning
rage,

Where waves and rocks a dreadful combat wage.
The sickly heaven, fermenting with its freight,
Still vomits o'er the main the feverish weight;
And now, while wing'd with ruin from on high,
Through the rent cloud the ragged lightnings fly,
A flash, quick glancing on the nerves of light,
Struck the pale helmsman with eternal night:
Rodmond, who heard a piteous groan behind,
Touch'd with compassion, gaz'd upon the blind;
And, while around his sad companions crowd,
He guides th' unhappy victim to the shroud.

before the wind, unexpectedly turns her side to wind-ward. It is generally occasioned by the difficulty of steering her, or by some disaster happening to the machinery of the helm. See the last note of the second canto.

Hie thee aloft, my gallant friend! he cries;
 Thy only succour on the mast relies!—
 The helm, bereft of half its vital force,
 Now scarce subdu'd the wild unbridled course:
 Quick to th' abandon'd wheel Arion came,
 The ship's tempestuous fallies to reclaim.
 Amaz'd he saw her, o'er the founding foam
 Upborne, to right and left distracted roam.
 So gaz'd young Phaeton, with pale dismay,
 When mounted on the flaming car of day,
 With rash and impious hand the stripling try'd
 Th' immortal coursers of the sun to guide.—
 The vessel, while the dread event draws nigh,
 Seems more impatient o'er the waves to fly:
 Fate spurs her on.—Thus issuing from afar,
 Advances to the sun some blazing star;
 And, as it feels th' attraction's kindling force,
 Springs onward with accelerated course.

With mournful look the seamen ey'd the strand,
 Where death's inexorable jaws expand:
 Swift from their minds elaps'd all dangers past,
 As, dumb with terror, they beheld the last.
 Now on the trembling shrouds, before, behind,
 In mute suspense they mount into the wind.—
 The genius of the deep, on rapid wing,
 The black eventful moment seem'd to bring.
 The fatal sisters, on the surge before,
 Yok'd their infernal horses to the prore.—
 The steerfmen now receiv'd their last command
 To wheel the vessel sidelong to the strand.
 Twelve sailors, on the foremast who depend,
 High on the platform of the top ascend;
 Fatal retreat! for while the plunging prow
 Immerges headlong in the wave below,
 Down-press'd by wat'ry weight the bowsprit bends,
 And from above the stem deep crashing rends.
 Beneath her beak the floating ruins lie;
 The foremast totters, unsustain'd on high;
 And now the ship, fore-listed by the sea,
 Hurls the tall fabric backward o'er her lee;
 While, in the general wreck, the faithful stay
 Drags the main-topmast from its post away.
 Clung from the mast, the seamen strive in vain
 Through hostile floods their vessel to regain.
 The waves they buffet, till bereft of strength,
 O'erpower'd they yield to cruel fate at length.
 The hostile waters close around their head,
 They sink for ever, number'd with the dead!

Those who remain their fearful doom await,
 Nor longer mourn their lost companions' fate.
 The heart that bleeds with sorrows all its own,
 Forgets the pangs of friendship to bemoan.—
 Albert and Rodmond and Palemon here,
 With young Arion, on the mast appear;
 Even they, amid th' unspeakable distress,
 In every look distracting thoughts confess;
 In every vein the reflux blood congeals,
 And every bosom fatal terror feels.
 Enclos'd with all the demons of the main,
 They view'd th' adjacent shore, but view'd in vain.

Such torments in the drear abodes of hell,
 Where sad despair laments with rueful yell,
 Such torments agonize the damned breast,
 While fancy views the mansions of the blest.

For Heaven's sweet help their suppliant cries implore;

But Heaven, relentless, deigns to help no more!
 And now, lash'd on by destiny severe,
 With horror fraught the dreadful scene drew near!
 The ship hangs hovering on the verge of death,
 Hell yawns, rocks rise, and breakers roar beneath!

In vain, alas! the sacred shades of yore
 Would arm the mind with philosophic lore;
 In vain they'd teach us, at the latest breath,
 To smile serene amid the pangs of death.
 Even Zeno's self, and Epictetus old,
 This fell abyss had shudder'd to behold.
 Had Socrates, for godlike virtue fam'd,
 And wisest of the sons of men proclaim'd,
 Beheld this scene of phrenzy and distress,
 His soul had trembled to its last recess!—
 O yet confirm my heart, ye powers above,
 This last tremendous shock of fate to prove.
 The tottering frame of reason yet sustain!
 Nor let this total ruin whirl my brain!

In vain the cords and axes were prepar'd,
 For now th' audacious seas insult the yard;
 High o'er the ship they throw a horrid shade,
 And o'er her burst, in terrible cascade.
 Uplifted on the surge, to heaven she flies,
 Her shatter'd top half buried in the skies,
 Then headlong plunging thunders on the ground,
 Earth groans! air trembles! and the deeps rebound!

Her giant bulk the dread concussion feels,
 And quivering with the wound, in torment, reels.
 So reels, convuls'd with agonizing throes,
 The bleeding bull beneath the murd'rer's blows.—
 Again she plunges! hark! a second shock
 Tears her strong bottom on the marble rock!
 Down on the vale of death, with dismal cries,
 The fated victims shuddering roll their eyes
 In wild despair; while yet another stroke,
 With deep convulsion, rends the solid oak:
 Till like the mine, in whose infernal cell
 The lurking demons of destruction dwell,
 At length afunder torn her frame divides,
 And crashing spreads in ruin o'er the tides.

O were it mine with tuneful Maro's art
 To wake to sympathy the feeling heart;
 Like him the smooth and mournful verse to dress
 In all the pomp of exquisite distress!
 Then, too severely taught by cruel fate
 To share in all the perils I relate,
 Then might I with unrivall'd strains deplore
 Th' impervious horrors of a leeward shore.

As o'er the surge the stooping main-mast hung,
 Still on the rigging thirty seamen clung:
 Some, struggling, on a broken crag were cast,
 And there by oozy tangles grappled fast:
 Awhile they bore th' o'erwhelming billows' rage,
 Unequal combat with their fate to wage;
 Till all benumb'd and feeble they forego
 Their slippery hold, and sink to shades below.
 Some, from the main-yard arm impetuous thrown
 On marble ridges, die without a groan.
 Three with Palemon on their skill depend,
 And from the wreck on oars and rafts descend.

Now on the mountain-wave on high they ride,
Then downward plunge beneath the involving tide;
Till one, whom seems in agony to strive,
The whirling breakers heave on shore alive;
The rest a speedier end of anguish knew,
And prest the stony beach, a lifeless crew!

Next, O unhappy chief! th' eternal doom
Of Heaven decreed thee to the briny tomb!
What scenes of misery torment thy view!
What painful struggles of thy dying crew!
Thy perish'd hopes all buried in the flood,
O'erspread with corse! red with human blood!
So pierc'd with anguish hoary Priam gaz'd,
When Troy's imperial domes in ruin blaz'd;
While he, severest sorrow doom'd to feel,
Expir'd beneath the victor's murdering steel.
Thus with his helpless partners till the last,
Sad refuge! Albert hugs the floating mast;
His soul could yet sustain the mortal blow,
But droops, alas! beneath superior woe:
For now soft nature's sympathetic chain
Tugs at his yearning heart with powerful strain;
His faithful wife for ever doom'd to mourn
For him, alas! who never shall return;
To black adversity's approach expos'd,
With want and hardships unforeseen enclos'd:
His lovely daughter left without a friend,
Her innocence to succour and defend;
By youth and indigence set forth a prey
To lawless guilt, that flatters to betray---
While these reflections rack his feeling mind,
Rodmond, who hung beside, his grasp resign'd;
And, as the tumbling waters o'er him roll'd,
His out-stretch'd arms the master's legs enfold.---
Sad Albert feels the dissolution near,
And strives in vain his fetter'd limbs to clear;
For death bids every clinching joint adhere.
All-faint, to Heaven he throws his dying eyes,
And, "O protect my wife and child!" he cries:
The gushing streams roll back th' unfinish'd sound!
He gasps! he dies! and tumbles to the ground!

Five only left of all the perish'd throng,
Yet ride the pine which shoreward drives along;
With these Arion still his hold secures,
And all the assaults of hostile waves endures.
O'er the dire prospect as for life he strives,
He looks if poor Palemon yet survives.
Ah wherefore, trusting to unequal art,
Didst thou, incautious! from the wreck depart?
Alas! these rocks all human skill defy,
Who strikes them once beyond relief must die:
And now, fore wounded, thou perhaps art tost
On these, or in some oozy cavern lost.
Thus thought Arion, anxious gazing round
In vain, his eyes no more Palemon found.
The demons of destruction hover nigh,
And thick their mortal shafts commission'd fly.
And now a breaking surge, with forceful sway,
Two next Arion furious tears away
Hurl'd on the crags, behold, they gasp! they bleed!
And, groaning, cling upon th' elusive weed!--
Another billow bursts in boundless roar!
Arion sinks! and memory views no more!

Ha! total night and horror here preside!
My stunn'd ear tingles to the whizzing tide!

It is the funeral knell! and, gliding near,
Methinks the phantoms of the dead appear!

But lo! emerging from the watery grave,
Again they float incumbent on the wave!
Again the dismal prospect opens round,
The wreck, the shores, the dying, and the drown'd!
And see! enfeebled by repeated shocks,
Those two who scramble on th' adjacent rocks,
Their faithless hold no longer can retain,
They sink o'erwhelm'd, and never rise again!

Two with Arion yet the mast upbore,
That now above the ridges reach'd the shore:
Still trembling to descend, they downward gaze,
With horror pale, and torpid with amaze:
The floods recoil! the ground appears below!
And life's faint embers now rekindling glow:
Awhile they wait th' exhausted wave's retreat,
Then climb slow up the beach with hands and feet.

O Heaven! deliver'd by whose sovereign hand,
Still on the brink of hell they shuddering stand,
Receive the languid incense they bestow,
That damp with death appears not yet to glow.
To thee each soul the warm oblation pays,
With trembling ardour of unequal praise;
In every heart dismay with wonder strives,
And hope the flicker'd spark of life revives;
Her magic powers their exil'd health restore,
Till horror and despair are felt no more.

A troop of Grecians who inhabit nigh,
And oft these perils of the deep descry,
Rous'd by the blustering tempest of the night,
Anxious had climb'd Colonna's neighbouring
height;
When gazing downward on th' adjacent flood,
Full to their view the scene of ruin stood;
The surf with mangled bodies strew'd around,
And those yet breathing on the sea-wash'd ground!
Though lost to science and the nobler arts,
Yet nature's lore inform'd their feeling hearts:
Strait down the vale with hast'ning steps they hied,

Th' unhappy sufferers to assist and guide.

Meanwhile those three escap'd beneath explore
The first advent'rous youth who reach'd the shore:
Panting, with eyes averted from the day,
Prone, helpless, on the tangly beach he lay---
It is Palemon:—oh! what tumult roll
With hope and terror in Arion's soul!
If yet unhurt he lives again to view
His friend and this sole remnant of our crew!
With us to travel through this foreign zone,
And share the future good or ill unknown.
Arion thus; but ah! sad doom of fate!
That bleeding memory sorrows to relate,
While yet afloat on some resisting rock,
His ribs were dash'd and fractur'd with the shock:
Heart-piercing sight! those cheeks so late array'd
In beauty's bloom, are pale with mortal shade
Distilling blood his lovely breast o'erspread,
And clogg'd the golden tresses of his head!
Nor yet the lungs by this pernicious stroke
Were wounded, or the vocal organs broke.
Down from his neck, with blazing gems array'd,
Thy image, lovely Anna! hung pourtray'd;

Th' unconscious figure smiling all serene,
 Suspended in a golden chain was seen.
 Hadst thou, soft maiden! in this hour of woe,
 Beheld him writhing from the deadly blow,
 What force of art, what language could express
 Thine agony? thine exquisite distress?
 But thou, alas! art doom'd to weep in vain
 For him thine eyes shall never see again!
 With dumb amazement pale, Arion gaz'd,
 And cautiously the wounded youth uprais'd;
 Palemon then, with cruel pangs oppress'd,
 In faltering accents thus his friend address'd:
 "O rescu'd from destruction late so nigh,
 "Beneath whose fatal influence doom'd I lie;
 "Are we then exil'd to this last retreat
 "Of life, unhappy! thus decreed to meet?
 "Ah! how unlike what yester-morn enjoy'd,
 "Enchanting hopes, for ever now destroy'd!
 "For wounded far beyond all healing power,
 "Palemon dies, and this his final hour;
 "By those fell breakers, where in vain I strove,
 "At once cut off from fortune, life, and love!
 "Far other scenes must soon present my sight,
 "That lie deep-buried yet in tenfold night.
 "Ah! wretched father of a wretched son,
 "Whom thy paternal prudence has undone!
 "How will remembrance of this blinded care
 "Bend down thy head with anguish and de"spair!
 "Such dire effects from avarice arise,
 "That, deaf to nature's voice, and vainly wise,
 "With force severe endeavours to controul
 "The noblest passions that inspire the soul.
 "But O, thou sacred Power! whose law connects
 "Th' eternal chain of causes and effects,
 "Let not thy chastening ministers of rage
 "Afflict with sharp remorse his feeble age!
 "And you, Arion! who with these the last
 "Of all our crew survive the shipwreck past—
 "Ah, cease to mourn! those friendly tears re-
 "strain!
 "Nor give my dying moments keener pain!
 "Since Heaven may soon thy wandering steps re-
 "store,
 "When parted hence, to England's distant shore;
 "Shouldst thou, th' unwilling messenger of fate,
 "To him the tragic story first relate,
 "Oh, friendship's generous ardour then suppress!
 "Nor hint the fatal cause of my distress;
 "Nor let each horrid incident sustain
 "The lengthen'd tale to aggravate his pain.
 "Ah! then remember well my last request
 "For her who reigns for ever in my breast;
 "Yet let him prove a father and a friend,
 "The helpless maid to succour and defend.
 "Say, I this suit implor'd with parting breath,
 "So Heaven befriend him at his hour of death!
 "But oh! to lovely Anna shouldst thou tell
 "What dire untimely end thy friend befall,
 "Draw o'er the dismal scene soft pity's veil,
 "And lightly touch the lamentable tale:
 "Say that my love, inviolably true,
 "No change, no diminution ever knew,
 "Lo! her bright image, pendent on my neck,
 "Is all Palemon rescu'd from the wreck;

"Take it, and say, when panting in the wave,
 "I struggled, life and this alone to save!
 "My soul that fluttering hastens to be free,
 "Would yet a train of thoughts impart to thee,
 "But strives in vain!—the chilling ice of death
 "Congeals my blood, and chokes the stream of
 "breath:
 "Resign'd she quits her comfortless abode,
 "To course that long, unknown, eternal road—
 "O Sacred Source of ever-living light!
 "Conduct the weary wanderer in her flight!
 "Direct her onward to that peaceful shore,
 "Where peril, pain, and death, are felt no more!
 "When thou some tale of hapless love shalt "hear,
 "That steals from pity's eye the melting tear,
 "Of two chaste hearts, by mutual passion join'd,
 "To absence, sorrow, and despair, consign'd,
 "Oh then! to swell the tides of social woe,
 "That health' afflicted bosom they o'erflow,
 "While memory dictates, this sad shipwreck tell,
 "And what distress thy wretched friend befall!
 "Then, while in streams of soft compassion
 "drown'd,
 "The swains lament, and maidens weep around;
 "While lisping children, touch'd with infant fear,
 "With wonder gaze, and drop th' unconscious
 "tear;
 "Oh! then this moral bid their souls retain.
 "All thoughts of happiness on earth are vain*."
 The last faint accents trembled on his tongue,
 That now inactive to the palate clung:
 His bosom heaves a mortal groan—he dies!
 And shades eternal sink upon his eyes!
 As thus defac'd in death Palemon lay,
 Arion gaz'd upon the lifeless clay;
 Transfix'd he stood, with awful terror fill'd,
 While down his cheek the silent drops distill'd.
 Oh, ill-starr'd vot'ry of unspotted truth!
 Untimely perish'd in the bloom of youth,
 Should e'er thy friend arrive on Albion's land,
 He will obey, though painful, thy demand:
 His tongue the dreadful story shall display,
 And all the horrors of this dismal day!
 Disastrous day! what ruin hast thou bred!
 What anguish to the living and the dead!
 How hast thou left the widow all forlorn,
 And ever doom'd the orphan child to mourn;
 Through life's sad journey hopeless to complain!
 Can sacred justice these events ordain?
 But, O my soul! avoid that wond'rous maze,
 Where reason, lost in endless error, strays!
 As through this thorny vale of life we run,
 Great Cause of all effects, "Thy will be done!"
 Now had the Grecians on the beach arriv'd,
 To aid the helpless few who yet surviv'd:
 While passing they behold the waves o'erspread
 With shatter'd rafts and corpses of the dead,
 Three still alive, benumb'd and faint they find,
 In mournful silence on a rock reclin'd.

* ——— fed scilicet ultima semper
 Expectanda dies homini; "dicique beatus
 "Ante obitum nemo supremæque funera debet."
 Ovid. Metam. lib. 3.

The generous natives, mov'd with social pain,
The feeble strangers in their arms sustain;
With pitying sighs their hapless lot deplore,
And lead them trembling from the fatal shore.

OCCASIONAL ELEGY.

THE scene of death is clos'd, the mournful strains
Dissolve in dying languor on the ear:
Yet pity weeps, yet sympathy complains [fear.
And dumb suspense awaits o'erwhelm'd with
But the sad muses with prophetic eye
At once the future and the past explore;
Their harps oblivion's influence can defy,
And waft the spirit to th' eternal shore.

Then, O Palemon! if thy shade can hear
The voice of friendship still lament thy doom;
Yet to the sad oblations bend thine ear,
That rise in vocal incense o'er thy tomb.

In vain, alas! the gentle maid shall weep,
While secret anguish nips her vital bloom;
O'er her soft frame shall stern diseases creep,
And give the lovely victim to the tomb.

Relentless phrenzy shall the father sting,
Untaught in virtue's school distress to bear;
Severe remorse his tortur'd soul shall wring,
'Tis his to groan and perish in despair.

Ye lost companions of distress, adieu!
Your toils, and pains, and dangers, are no more!
The tempest now shall howl unheard by you,
While ocean smites in vain the trembling shore.

On you the blast, furcharg'd with rain and snow,
In winter's dismal nights no more shall beat:
Unfelt by you the vertic fan may glow,
And scorch the panting earth with baneful heat.

No more the joyful maid, the sprightly strain,
Shall wake the dance to give you welcome home;
Nor hopeless love impart undying pain,
When far from scenes of social joy you roam.

No more on yon wide wat'ry waste you stray,
While hunger and disease your life consume;
While parching thirst, that burns without allay,
Forbids the blasted rose of health to bloom.

No more you feel contagion's mortal breath,
That taints the realms with misery severe;
No more behold pale famine, scattering death,
With cruel ravage desolate the year.

The thundering drum, the trumpet's swelling
strain,
Unheard shall form the long embattled line:
Unheard, the deep foundations of the main
Shall tremble when the hostile squadrons join.

Since grief, fatigue, and hazards, still molest
The wandering vassals of the faithless deep,
O! happier now escap'd to endless rest,
Than we, who still survive to wake and weep.

What though no funeral pomp, no borrow'd tear,
Your hour of death to gazing crowds shall tell;
Nor weeping friends attend your sable bier,
Who sadly listen to the passing bell:

The tutor'd sigh, the vain parade of woe,
No real anguish to the soul impart;
And oft, alas! the tear that friends bestow,
Betrays the latent feelings of the heart.

What though no sculptur'd pile your name displays,
Like those who perish in their country's cause;
What though no epic muse in living lays Records your dreadful daring with applause:

Full oft the flattering marble bids renown
With blazon'd trophies deck the spotted name;
And oft, too oft, the venal muses crown
The slaves of vice with never-dying fame.

Yet shall remembrance from oblivion's veil
Relieve your scene, and sigh with grief sincere;
And soft compassion, at your tragic tale,
In silent tribute pay her kindred tear.

P O E M S.

A POEM,

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS

FREDERIC PRINCE OF WALES.

FROM the big horror of war's hoarse alarms,
And the tremendous clang of clashing arms,
Descend, my muse! a deeper scene to draw
(A scene will hold the list'ning world in awe *)
Is my intent: Melpomene inspire,
While, with sad notes, I strike the trembling lyre!
And may my lines with easy motion flow,
Melt as they move, and fill each heart with woe:

* By awe, here, is meant attention.

Big with the sorrow it describes, my song,
In solemn pomp, majestic, move along.

Oh! bear me to some awful silent glade
Where cedars form an unremitting shade;
Where never track of human feet was known;
Where never cheerful light of Phœbus shone;
Where chirping linnets warble tales of love,
And hoarser winds howl murmur'ring through the
grove;

Where some unhappy wretch ay mourns his doom,
Deep melancholy wand'ring through the gloom;
Where solitude and meditation roam,
And where no dawning glimpse of hope can come:
Place me in such an unfrequented shade,
To speak to none but with the mighty dead:

T' assist the pouring rains with brimful eyes,
And aid hoarse howling Boreas with my sighs.

When winter's horrors left Britannia's isle,
And spring in blooming verdure 'gan to smile;
When rills unbound, began to purl along,
And warbling larks renew'd the vernal song;
When sprouting roses, deck'd in crimson dye,
Began to bloom.

Hard fate! then, noble Fred'ric, didst thou die:
Doom'd by inexorable fate's decree,
Th' approaching summer ne'er on earth to see;
In thy parch'd vitals burning fevers rage,
Whose flame the virtue of no herbs assuage;
No cooling medicine can its heat allay,
Relentless destiny cries, "No delay."

Ye pow'rs! and must a prince so noble die?
(Whose equal breathes not under th' ambient sky):
Ah! must he die, then, in youth's full-blown prime,

Cut by the scythe of all-devouring time?
Yes, fate has doom'd: his soul now leaves its weight,

And all are under the decree of fate;
Th' irrevocable doom of destiny
Pronounc'd, All mortals must submissive die.
The princes wait around with weeping eyes,
And the dome echoes all with piercing cries:
With doleful noise the matrons scream around,
With female shrieks the vaulted roofs rebound:
A dismal noise! Now one promiscuous roar
Cries, "Ah! the noble Fred'ric is no more!"
The chief reluctant yields his latest breath;
His eye-lids settle in the shades of death:
Dark sable shades present before each eye,
And the deep vast abyss, eternity:
Through perpetuity's expanse he springs;
And o'er the vast profound he shoots on wings:
The soul to distant regions steers her flight,
And sails incumbent on inferior night:
With vast celerity she shoots away,
And meets the regions of eternal day,
To shine forever in the heav'nly birth,
And leave the body here to rot on earth.
The melancholy patriots round it wait,
And mourn the royal hero's timeless fate.
Disconsolate they move, a mournful band!
In solemn pomp they march along the strand:
The noble chief interr'd in youthful bloom,
Lies in the dreary regions of the tomb.

Adown Augusta's pallid visage flow
The living pearls, with unaffected woe:
Disconsolate, hapless, see pale Britain mourn,
Abandon'd isle! forsaken and forlorn!
With desp'rate hands her bleeding breast she beats;
While o'er her, frowning, grim destruction threats,
She mourns with heart-felt grief, she rends her hair,
And fills with piercing cries the echoing air.
Well may'st thou mourn thy patriot's timeless end,
Thy muses patron, and thy merchants friend.
What heart shall pity thy full-flowing grief?
What hand now deign to give thy poor relief?
T' encourage arts, whose bounty now shall flow,
And learned science to promote, bestow?
Who now protect thee from the hostile frown,
And to the injur'd just return his own?

From us'ry and oppression who should guard
The helpless, and the threat'ning ruin ward?
Alas! the truly noble Briton's gone,
And left us here in ceaseless woe to moan!
Impending desolation hangs around,
And ruin hovers o'er the trembling ground:
The blooming spring droops her enamell'd head,
Her glories wither, and her flow'rs all fade:
The sprouting leaves already drop away;
Languish the living herbs with pale decay:
The bowing trees, see! o'er the blasted heath,
Depending, bend beneath the weight of death:
Wrapp'd in th' expansive gloom, the lightnings
play,

Hoarse thunder mutters through th' aerial way:
All nature feels the pangs, the storms renew,
And sprouts, with fatal haste, the baleful yew.

Some pow'r avert the threat'ning horrid weight,
And, godlike, prop Britannia's sinking state!
Minerva, hover o'er young George's soul;
May sacred wisdom all his deeds controul!
Exalted grandeur in each action shine,
His conduct all declare the youth divine.

Methinks I see him shine a glorious star,
Gentle in peace, but terrible in war!
Methinks each region does his praise resound,
And nations tremble at his name around!
His fame, through ev'ry distant kingdom rung,
Proclaims him of the race from whence he sprung:
So sable smoke, in volumes, curls on high,
Heaps roll on heaps, and blacken all the sky:
Already so, his fame, methinks, is hurl'd
Around th' admiring venerating world.
So the benighted wand'rer, on his way,
Laments the absence of all-cheering day;
Far distant from his friends and native home,
And not one glimpe does glimmer through the gloom:

In thought he breathes, each sigh his latest breath,
Present, each meditation, pits of death:
Irreg'lar, wild chimeras fill his soul,
And death, and dying, every step controul.
Till from the east there breaks a purple gleam,
His fears then vanish as a fleeting dream,
Hid in a cloud the sun first shoots his ray,
Then breaks effulgent on th' illumin'd day;
We see no spot then in the flaming rays,
Confus'd and lost within th' excessive blaze,

O D E

ON THE DUKE OF YORK'S SECOND DEPARTURE
FROM ENGLAND AS REAR ADMIRAL.

Written aboard the Royal George.

AGAIN the royal streamers play!
To glory Edward hastes away;
Adieu, ye happy sylvan bowers,
Where pleasure's sprightly throng await!
Ye domes, where regal grandeur towers
In purple ornaments of state!
Ye scenes where virtue's sacred strain
Bids the tragic muse complain!
Where satire treads the comic stage,
To scourge and mend a venal age;

Where music pours the soft, melodious lay,
And melting symphonies congenial play!
Ye filken sons of ease, who dwell
In flowery vales of peace, farewell!

In vain the goddess of the myrtle grove
Her charms ineffable dislays;
In vain she calls to happier realms of love,
Which spring's unfading bloom arrays:
In vain her living roses blow,
And ever vernal pleasures grow;
The gentle sports of youth no more
Allure him to the peaceful shore:
Arcadian ease no longer charms,
For war and fame alone can please.
His throbbing bosom beats to arms,
To war the hero moves, through storms and wintery seas.

CHORUS.

The gentle sports of youth no more
Allure him to the peaceful shore,
For war and fame alone can please;
To war the hero moves, through storms and
wintery seas.

Though danger's hostile train appears
To thwart the course that honour steers;
Unmov'd he leads the rugged way,
Despising peril and dismay:
His country calls; to guard her laws,
Lo! every joy the gallant youth resigns;
Th' avenging naval sword he draws,
And o'er the waves conducts her martial lines:
Hark! his sprightly clarions play;
Follow where he leads the way!
The piercing fife, the sounding drum,
Tell the deeps their master's come.

CHORUS.

Hark! his sprightly clarions play,
Follow where he leads the way!
The piercing fife, the sounding drum,
Tell the deeps their master's come.

Thus Alcmena's warlike son
The thorny course of virtue run,
When, taught by her unerring voice,
He made the glorious choice:
Severe, indeed, th' attempt he knew,
Youth's genial ardours to subdue:
For pleasure Venus' lovely form assum'd;
Her glowing charms, divinely bright,
In all the pride of beauty bloom'd,
And struck his ravish'd sight.

Transfix'd, amaz'd,

Alcides gaz'd:

Enchanting grace

Adorn'd her face,

And all his changing looks confess
Th' alternate passions in his breast:

Her swelling bosom half reveal'd,

Her eyes that kindling raptures fir'd,

A thousand tender pains mix'd,

A thousand flatt'ring thoughts inspir'd:

Persuasion's sweetest language hung

In melting accent on her tongue:

Deep in his heart, the winning tale

Infus'd a magic power;

She prest him to the rosy vale,

And show'd th' Elysian bower:

Her hand, that trembling ardours move,

Conducts him blushing to the blest alcove:

Ah! see, o'erpow'rd by beauty's charms,

And won by love's resistless arms,

The captive yields to nature's soft alarms!

CHORUS.

Ah! see, o'erpower'd by beauty's charms,
And won by love's resistless arms,
The captive yields to nature's soft alarms!

Affist, ye guardian powers above!

From ruin save the son of Jove!

By heavenly mandate virtue came,

And check'd the fatal flame:

Swift as the quivering needle wheels,

Whose point the magnet's influence feels.

Inspir'd with awe,

He, turning, saw

The nymph divine

Transcendent shine;

And, while he view'd the godlike maid,

His heart a sacred impulse sway'd:

His eyes with ardent motion roll,

And love, regret, and hope, divide his soul.

But soon her words his pain destroy,

And all the numbers of his heart,

Return'd by her celestial art,

Now swell'd to strains of nobler joy.

Instructed thus by virtue's lore,

His happy steps the realms explore

Where guilt and error are no more:

The clouds that veil'd his intellectual ray,

Before her breath dispelling, melt away:

Broke loose from pleasure's glittering chain,

He scorn'd her soft inglorious reign:

Convinc'd, resolv'd, to virtue then he turn'd,

And in his breast paternal glory burn'd.

CHORUS.

Broke loose from pleasure's glittering chain,

He scorn'd the soft inglorious reign:

Convinc'd, resolv'd, to virtue then he turn'd,

And in his breast paternal glory burn'd.

So when on Britain's other hope she shone,

Like him the royal youth she won:

Thus taught, he bids his fleet advance

To curb the power of Spain and France:

Aloft his martial ensigns flow,

And hark! his brazen trumpets blow!

The wat'ry profound,

Awak'd by the sound,

All trembles around:

While Edward o'er the azure fields

Fraternal wonder wields:

High on the deck behold he stands,

And views around his floating bands

In awful order join:

They, while the warlike trumpet's strain,

Deep sounding, swells along the main,

Extend the embattled line.

Then Britain triumphantly saw

His armament ride

Supreme on the tide,

And o'er the vast ocean give law.

CHORUS.

Then Britain triumphantly saw
His armament ride
Supreme on the tide,
And o'er the vast ocean give law.

Now with shouting peals of joy,
The ships their horrid tubes display,
Tier over tier in terrible array,
And wait the signal to destroy:
The sailors all burn to engage:
Hark! hark! their shouts arise,
And shake the vaulted skies!
Exulting with Bacchanal rage.
Then, Neptune, the hero revere,
Whose power is superior to thine!
And, when his proud squadrons appear,
The trident and chariot resign!

CHORUS.

Then, Neptune, the hero revere,
Whose power is superior to thine!
And, when his proud squadrons appear,
The trident and chariot resign!

Albion, wake thy grateful voice!
Let thy hills and vales rejoice:
O'er remotest hostile regions
Thy victorious flags are known;
Thy resistless martial legions
Dreadful move from zone to zone;
Thy flaming bolts unerring roll,
And all the trembling globe controul:
Thy seamen, invincibly true,
No menace, no fraud, can subdue:
To thy great trust
Severely just,

All dissonant strife they disclaim:
To meet the foe,
Their bosoms glow;
Who only are rivals in fame.

CHORUS.

Thy seamen, invincibly true,
No menace, no fraud can subdue:
All dissonant strife they disclaim,
And only are rivals in fame.

For Edward tune your harps, ye nine!
Triumphant strike each living string,
For him, in ecstasy divine,
Your choral to Pæans sing!
For him your festive concerts breathe!
For him your flowery garlands wreath!
Wake! O wake the joyful song!
Ye fauns of the woods,
Ye nymphs of the floods,
The musical current prolong!
Ye sylvans, that dance on the plain,
To swell the grand chorus accord!
Ye Tritons, that sport on the main,
Exulting, acknowledge your lord!
Till all the wild numbers combin'd,
That floating proclaim
Our admiral's name,
In symphony roll on the wind!

CHORUS.

Wake! O wake the joyful song!
Ye sylvans, that dance on the plain,

Ye Tritons, that sport on the main,
The musical current prolong!

O! while consenting Britons praise,
Those votive measures deign to hear;
For thee muse awakes her lays,
For thee th' unequal viol plays,
The tribute of a soul sincere.

Nor thou, illustrious chief, refuse
The incense of a nautic muse!

For ah! to whom shall Neptune's sons complain,
But him whose arms unrivall'd rule the main.

Deep on my grateful breast
Thy favour is impress;

No happy son of wealth or fame
To court a royal patron came!

A hapless youth, whose vital page
Was one sad lengthen'd tale of woe,

Where ruthless fate, impelling tides of rage,
Bade wave on wave in dire succession flow,

To glittering stars and titled names unknown,
Preferr'd his suit to thee alone.

The tale your sacred pity mov'd;
You felt, consented, and approv'd.

Then touch my strings, ye blest Pierian quire!
Exalt to rapture every happy line!

My bosom kindle with Promethean fire!
And swell each note with energy divine,

No more to plaintive sounds of woe
Let the vocal numbers flow!

Perhaps the chief to whom I sing
May yet ordain auspicious days,

To wake the lyre with nobler lays,
And tune to war the nervous string.

Though all the powers of genius he possess,
For who, untaught in Neptune's school,

Though disciplin'd by classic rule,
With daring pencil can display

The fight that thunders on the watery way,
And all its horrid incidents express?

To him, my muse, these warlike strains belong!
Source of thy hope, and patron of thy song.

CHORUS.

To him, my muse, these warlike strains belong
Source of thy hope, and patron of thy song.

THE FOND LOVER,

A BALLAD.

A NYMPH of ev'ry charm possess'd,
That native virtue gives,
Within my bosom all confess'd,
In bright idea lives.

For her my trembling numbers play
Along the pathless deep,
While sadly social with my lay
The winds in concert weep.

If beauty's sacred influence charms
The rage of adverse fate,

Say why the pleasing soft alarms
Such cruel pangs create?

Since all her thoughts by sense refin'd,
Unartful truth express,

Say wherefore sense and truth are join'd
To give my soul distress?

If when her blooming lips I press,
Which vernal fragrance fills,
Through all my veins the sweet excess
In trembling motion thrills;
Say whence this secret anguish grows,
Congenial with my joy?
And why the touch, where pleasure glows,
Should vital peace destroy?

If when my fair, in melting song,
Awakes the vocal lay,
Not all your notes, ye Phocian throng,
Such pleasing sounds convey;
Thus wrapt all o'er with fondest love,
Why heaves this broken sigh?
For then my blood forgets to move,
I gaze, adore, and die.

Accept, my charming maid, the strain
Which you alone inspire;
To thee the dying strings complain
That quiver on my lyre.
O! give this bleeding bosom ease,
That knows no joy but thee;
Teach me thy happy art to please,
Or deign to love like me.

AN ADDRESS TO MIRANDA.

THE smiling plains, profusely gay,
Are dress'd in all the pride of May;
The birds, on ev'ry spray above,
To rapture wake the vocal grove.

But ah! Miranda! without thee,
Nor spring, nor summer smiles on me:
All lonely in the secret shade,
I mourn thy absence, charming maid!

O soft as love! as honour fair!
Serenely sweet as vernal air!
Come to my arms, for you alone
Can all my absence past atone.

O come! and to my bleeding heart
The sovereign balm of love impart;
Thy presence lasting joy shall bring,
And give the year eternal spring!

THE DEMAGOGUE.

BOLD is the attempt, in these licentious times,
When with such towering strides sedition climbs,
With sense or satire to confront her power,
And charge her in the great decisive hour:
Bold is the man, who, on her conquering day,
Stands in the pass of fate to bar her way:
Whose heart, by frowning arrogance unaw'd,
Or the deep-lurking inares of specious fraud,
The threats of giant-faction can deride,
And stem, with stubborn arm, her roaring tide.
For him unnumber'd brooding ills await,
Scorn, malice, intolerance, reproach, and hate:
At him, who dares this legion to defy,
A thousand mortal shafts in secret fly:
Revenge, exulting with malignant joy,
Pursues the incautious victim to destroy:
And slander strive, with unrelenting aim,
To spit her blasting venom on his name:

Around him faction's harpies flap their wings,
And rhyming vermin dart their feeble stings:
In vain the wretch retreats, while, in full cry,
Fierce on his throat the hungry blood-hounds fly.
Enclos'd with perils thus the conscious muse,
Alarm'd, though undismay'd, her danger views.
Nor shall unmanly terror now controul
The strong resentment struggling in her soul.
While indignation, with resistless strain,
Pours her full deluge through each swelling vein.
By the vile fear that chills the coward breast,
By sordid caution is her voice suppress'd,
While arrogance, with big theatric rage,
Audacious struts on power's imperial stage;
While o'er our country, at her dread command,
Black discord, screaming, shakes her fatal brand:
While, in defiance of maternal laws,
The sacrilegious sword rebellion draws;
Shall she at this important hour retire,
And quench in Lethe's wave her genuine fire?
Honour forbid! she fears no threat'ning foe,
When conscious justice bids her bosom glow:
And while she kindles the reluctant flame,
Let not the prudent voice of friendship blame!
She feels the sting of keen resentment goad,
Though guiltless yet of satire's thorny road.
Let other Quixotes, frantic with renown,
Plant on their brows a tawdry paper crown!
While fools adore, and vassal-bards obey,
Let the great Monarch Afs through Gotham
bray!

Our poet brandishes no mimic sword,
To rule a realm of dunces self explor'd:
No bleeding victims curse his iron sway;
Nor murder'd reputation marks his way.
True to herself, unarm'd, the fearless muse
Through reason's path her steady course pursues;
True to herself advances, undeter'd
By the rude clamours of the savage herd.
As some bold surgeon, with inserted steel,
Probes deep the putrid sore, intent to heal;
So the rank ulcers that our PATRIOT load,
Shall she with caustic's healing fires corrode.
Yet ere from patient slumber satire wakes,
And brandishes th' avenging scourge of snakes;
Yet ere her eyes, with lightning's vivid ray,
The dark recesses of his heart display;
Let candour own th' undaunted pilot's power,
Felt in severest danger's trying hour!
Let truth consenting, with the trump of fame,
His glory, in auspicious strains, proclaim!
He bade the tempest of the battle roar,
That thunder'd o'er the deep from shore to shore.
How oft, amid the horrors of the war,
Chain'd to the bloody wheels of danger's car,
How oft my bosom at thy name has glow'd,
And from my beating heart applause bestow'd;
Applause, that, genuine as the blush of youth
Unknown to guile, was sanctify'd by truth!
How oft I blest the PATRIOT's honest rage,
That greatly dar'd to lash the guilty age;
That, rapt with zeal, pathetic, bold, and strong,
Roll'd the full tide of eloquence along;
That power's big torrent brav'd with manly pride
And all corruption's venal arts defy'd!

When from afar those penetrating eyes
Beheld each secret hostile scheme arise;
Watch'd every motion of the faithless foe,
Each plot o'erturn'd, and baffled every blow:
A fond enthusiast, kindling at thy name,
I glow'd in secret with congenial flame;
While my young bosom, to deceit unknown,
Believ'd all real virtue thine alone. [be,

Such then he seem'd, and such indeed might
If truth with error ever could agree!
Sure satire never with a fairer hand
Pourtray'd the object she design'd to brand.
Alas! that virtue should so soon decay,
And faction's wild applause thy heart betray!
The muse with secret sympathy relents,
And human failings, as a friend, laments:
But when those dangerous errors, big with fate,
Spread discord and distraction through the state,
Reason should then exert her utmost power
To guard our passions in that fatal hour.

There was a time, ere yet his conscious heart
Durst from the hardy path of truth depart,
While yet with generous sentiment it glow'd,
A stranger to corruption's slippery road;
There was a time our PATRIOT durst avow
Those honest maxims he despises now.
How did he then his country's wounds bewail,
And at the insatiate German vulture rail!
Whose cruel talons Albion's entrails tore,
Whose hungry maw was glutted with her gore!
The mists of error, that in darkness held
Our reason, like the sun, his voice dispell'd.
And lo! exhausted, with no power to save,
We view Britannia panting on the wave; [weight
Hung round her neck, a millstone's ponderous
Drags down the struggling victim to her fate!
While horror at the thought our bosom feels,
We bless the man this horror who reveals.

But what alarming thoughts the heart amaze,
When on this Janus' other face we gaze;
For, lo! possess'd of power's imperial reins,
Our chief those visionary ills disdains!
Alas! how soon the steady PATRIOT turns!
In vain this change astonish'd England mourns!
Her vital blood, that pour'd from every vein,
So late, to fill the accurs'd Westphalian drain,
Then ceas'd to flow; the vulture now no more
With unrelenting rage her bowels tore.
His magic rod transforms the bird of prey!
The millstone feels the touch, and melts away!
And, strange to tell, still stranger to believe,
What eyes ne'er saw, and heart could ne'er conceive,

At once, transplanted by the forcerer's wand,
Columbian hills in distant Austria stand!
America, with pangs before unknown,
Now with Westphalia utters groan for groan:
By sympathy she fevers with her fires,
Burns as she burns, and as she dies expires.

From maxims long adopted thus he flew,
For ever changing, yet for ever true:
Sworn with success, and with applause inflam'd,
He scorn'd all caution, all advice disclaim'd;
Arm'd with war's thunder, he embrac'd no more
Those patriot principles maintain'd before.

Perverse, inconstant, obstinate, and proud,
Drunk with ambition, turbulent, and loud,
He wrecks us headlong on that dreadful strand
He once devoted all his powers to brand!

Our hapless country views with weeping eyes
On every side o'erwhelming horrors rise;
Drain'd of her wealth, exhausted of her power,
And agoniz'd as in the mortal hour;
Her armies wasted with incessant toils,
Or doom'd to perish in contagious soils,
To guard some needy royal plunderer's throne,
And sent to fall in battles not their own. [charg'd,
Th' enormous debt at home, though long o'er-
With grievous burdens annually enlarg'd:
Crush'd with increasing taxes to the ground,
That suck like vampires every bleeding wound:
Ground with severe distress th' industrious poor,
Driven by the ruthless landlord to the door.

While thus our land her hapless fate bemoans
In secret, and with inward sorrow groans;
Though deck'd with tinsel trophies of renown,
All gash'd with sores, with anguish bending down,
Can yet some impious parricide appear,
Who strives to make this anguish more severe?
Can one exist, so much his country's foe,
To bid her wounds with fresh effusion flow?

There can; to him in vain she lifts her eyes,
His soul relentless hears her piercing sighs!
Shameless of front, impatient of controul,
He spurs her onward to destruction's goal!
Nor yet content on curst Westphalia's shore
With mad profusion to exhaust her store,
Still peace his pompous fulminations brand,
As pirates tremble at the sight of land:
Still to new wars the public eye he turns;
Defies all peril, and at reason spurns;
Till prest with danger, by distress assail'd,
That baffled courage, and o'er skill prevail'd;
Till foundering in the storm himself had brew'd,
He strives at last its horrors to elude.
Some wretched shift must still protect his name,
And to the guiltless head transfer his shame:
Then hearing modest diffidence oppose
His rash advice, that golden time he chose;
And while big surges threaten'd to o'erwhelm
The ship, ingloriously forsook the helm.

But all th' events collected to relate,
Let us his actions recapitulate.

He first assum'd, by mean perfidious art,
Those patriot tenets foreign to his heart:
Next, by his country's fond applauses swell'd,
Thrust himself forward into power, and held
The reins on principles which he alone, [own;
Grown drunk and wanton with success, could
Betray'd her interest, and abus'd his trust;
Then, deaf to prayers, forsook her in disgust;
With tragic mummery, and most vile grimace,
Rode through the city with a woeful face,
As in distress, a PATRIOT out of place!
Insults his generous prince, and in the day
Of trouble skulks, because he cannot sway!
In foreign climes embroils him with allies!
And bids at home the flames of DISCORD rise!

She comes! from hell the exulting fury springs!
With grim destruction sailing on her wings!

Around her scream an hundred harpies fell!
 An hundred demons shriek with hideous yell!
 From where, in mortal venom dipt on high,
 Full-drawn the deadliest shafts of satire fly,
 Where Churchill brandishes his clumsy club,
 And Wilkes unloads his excremental tub,
 Down to where Entick, awkward and unclean,
 Crawls on his native dust, a worm obscene!
 While with unnumber'd wings, from van to rear
 Myriads of nameless buzzing drones appear:
 From their dark cells the angry insects swarm,
 And every little sting attempt to arm.
 Here *Chaplains, *Privileges, moulder round,
 And feeble *Scourges rot upon the ground:
 Here hungry Kenrick strives, with fruitless aim,
 With Grub-street slander to extend his name:
 At Bruin flies the flavinging, snarling cur,
 But only fills his famish'd jaws with fur.
 Here Baldwin spreads th' assassinating cloke,
 Where lurking rancour gives the secret stroke;
 While gorg'd with filth, around this senseless block,
 A swarm of spider-bards obsequious flock:
 While his demure Welch Goat, with lifted hoof,
 In Poet's-Corner hangs each flimsy woof;
 And frisky grown, attempts, with awkward prance,
 On wit's gay theatre to bleat and dance.
 Here, seiz'd with iliac passion, mouthing Leech,
 Too low, alas! for satire's whip to reach,
 From his black entrails, faction's common sewer,
 Disgorges all her excremental store.

With equal pity and regret the muse
 The thundering storms that rage around her views;

Impartial views the tides of discord blend,
 Where lordly rogues for power and place contend;
 Were not her patriot-heart with anguish torn,
 Would eye the opposing chiefs with equal scorn.
 Let freedom's deadliest foes for freedom bawl,
 Alike to her who govern or who fall!

Aloof she stands, all unconcern'd and mute,
 While the rude rabble bellow, "Down with Bute!"

While villany the scourge of justice bilks,
 Howl on, ye ruffians! "Liberty and Wilkes."
 Let some soft mummy of a peer, who stains
 His rank, some sodden lump of ass's brains,
 To that abandon'd wretch his sanction give;
 Support his slander, and his wants relieve!
 Let the great hydra roar aloud for Pitt,
 And power and wisdom all to him submit!
 Let proud ambition's sons, with hearts severe,
 Like parricides, their mother's bowels tear!
 Sedition her triumphant flag display,
 And in embodied ranks her troops array!
 While coward justice, trembling on her seat,
 Like a vile slave descends to lick her feet!
 Nor here let censure draw her awful blade,
 If from her theme the wayward muse has stray'd!
 Sometimes th' impetuous torrent, o'er its mounds
 Redundant bursting, swamps the adjacent grounds;
 But rapid and impatient of delay,
 Through the deep channel still pursues its way.

* Certain poems intended to be very satirical; but alas!—we refer our reader to the Reviews.

Our pilot now retir'd, no pleasure knows,
 But every man and measure to oppose;
 Like Æsop's cur, still snarling and perverse,
 Bloated with envy, to mankind a curse,
 No more at council his advice will lend,
 But with all others who advise contend:
 He bids distraction o'er his country blaze,
 Then, swelter'd with revenge, retreats to Hayes*:
 Swallows the pension; but, aware of blame,
 Transfers the proffer'd peerage to his dame.
 The felon thus of old, his name to save,
 His pilfer'd mutton to a brother gave. [know

But should some frantic wretch, whom all men
 To nature and humanity a foe,
 Deaf to the widow's moan and orphan's cry,
 And dead to shame and friendship's social tie;
 Should such a miscreant, at the hour of death,
 To thee his fortunes and domains bequeath;
 With cruel rancour wresting from his heirs
 What nature taught them to expect as theirs;
 Would'st thou with this detested robber join,
 Their legal wealth to plunder and purloin?
 Forbid it, Heav'n! thou canst not be so base,
 To blast thy name with infamous disgrace!
 The muse who wakes, yet triumphs o'er thy hate,
 Dares not so black a thought anticipate:
 By Heaven, the muse her ignorance betrays;
 For while a thousand eyes with wonder gaze,
 Though gorg'd and glutted with his country's store,

The vulture pounces on the shining ore;
 In his strong talons grips the golden prey,
 And from the weeping orphan bears away.

The great, th' alarming deed is yet to come,
 That, big with fate, strikes expectation dumb.
 O! patient, injur'd England, yet unveil
 Thy eyes, and listen to the muse's tale,
 That true as honour, unadorn'd with art,
 Thy wrongs in fair succession shall impart!

Ere yet the desolating god of war
 Had crush'd pale Europe with his iron car,
 Had shook her shores with terrible alarms, [arms!
 And thunder'd o'er the trembling deep, to
 In climes remote, beyond the setting sun,
 Beyond th' Atlantic wave, his rage begun.
 Alas! poor country, how with pangs unknown
 To Britain did thy filial bosom groan!
 What savage armies did thy realms invade,
 Unarm'd, and distant from maternal aid!
 Thy cottages with cruel flames consum'd,
 And the sad owner to destruction doom'd;
 Mangled with wounds, with pungent anguish torn,
 Or left to perish naked and forlorn!
 What carnage reek'd upon thy ruin'd plain!
 What infants bled! what virgins shriek'd in vain!
 In every look distraction seem'd to glare,
 Each heart was rack'd with horror and despair.
 To Albion then, with groans and piercing cries,
 America lift up her dying eyes;
 To generous Albion pour'd forth all her pain,
 To whom the wretched never wept in vain.

* See anecdotes of Luca Pitt, a man of a very similar complexion and constitution, in "Machiavel's History of Florence," 1753.

She heard, and instant to relieve her flew,
Her arm the gleaming sword of vengeance drew;
Far o'er the ocean wave her voice was known,
That shook the deep abyss from zone to zone:
She bade the thunder of the battle glow,
And pour'd the storm of lightning on the foe:
Nor ceas'd till, crown'd with victory complete,
Pale Spain and France lay trembling at her feet*.

Her fears dispell'd, and all her foes remov'd,
Her fertile grounds industriously improv'd,
Her towns with trade, with fleets her harbours

crown'd,
And plenty smiling on her plains around;
Thus blest with all that commerce could supply,
America regards with jealous eye,
And canker'd heart, the parent, who so late
Had snatch'd her gasping from the jaws of fate;
Who now, with wars for her begun, relax'd,
With grievous aggravated burdens tax'd,
Her treasures wasted by a hungry brood
Of cormorants, that suck her vital blood;
Who now of her demands that tribute due,
For whom alone th' avenging sword she drew.

Scarce had America the just request
Receiv'd, when kindling in her faithless breast
Resentment glows, enrag'd sedition burns,
And, lo! the mandate of our laws she spurns!
Her secret hate, incapable of shame
Or gratitude, incenses to a flame,

Derides our power, bids insurrection rise,
Insults our honour, and our laws defies;
O'er all her coasts is heard th' audacious roar,
"England shall rule America no more!"

Soon as on Britain's shore th' alarm was heard,
Stern indignation in her look appear'd;
Yet, loth to punish, she her scourge withheld
From her perfidious sons who thus rebell'd:
Now stung with anguish, now with rage assail'd,
Till pity in her soul at last prevail'd,
Determin'd not to draw her penal steel
Till fair persuasion made her last appeal.

And now the great decisive hour drew nigh,
She on her darling patriot cast her eye;
His voice like thunder will support her cause,
Enforce her dictates, and sustain her laws;
Rich with her spoils, his sanction will dismay,
And bid th' insurgents tremble and obey.

He comes!—but where, th' amazing theme to Discover language or ideas fit? [hit,
Splay-footed words, that hector, bounce, and swag-

ger,
The sense to puzzle, and the brain to stagger?
Our patriot comes!—with frenzy fir'd, the muse
With allegoric eye his figure views:

Like the grim portress of hell-gate he stands,
Bellona's scourge hangs trembling in his hands!
Around him, fiercer than the ravenous shark,

A cry of hell-hounds never-ceasing bark!
And lo! th' enormous giant to bedeck,
A golden millstone hangs upon his neck!

* See Marine Dictionary, article Cartel, and a letter from Mr. Secretary Pitt to the several Governors and Councils in North America, relating to the Flag of Trade Trade, Aug. 24. 1760.

On him ambition's vulture darts her claws,
And with voracious rage his liver gnaws.
Our patriot comes!—the buckles of whose shoes
Not Cromwell's self was worthy to unloose.

Repeat his name in thunder to the skies!
Ye hills fall prostrate, and ye vales arise!
Through faction's wilderness prepare the way!
Prepare, ye listening senates, to obey!
The idol of the mob, behold him stand,
The alpha and omega of the land!

Methinks I hear the bellowing demagogue
Dumb-sounding declamations disembody,
Expressions of immeasurable length,
Where pompous jargon fills the place of strength;
Where fulminating, rumbling eloquence,
With loud theatric rage, bombards the sense;
And words, deep rank'd in horrible array,
Exasperated metaphors convey!
With these auxiliaries, drawn up at large,
He bids enrag'd sedition beat the charge;
From England's sanguine hope his aid withdraws,

And lifts to guide in insurrection's cause.
And lo! where, in her sacrilegious hand,
The parricide lifts high her burning brand!
Go, while she yet suspends her impious aim,
With those infernal lungs arouse the flame!
Though England merits not her least regard,
Thy friendly voice gold boxes shall reward!
Arise, embark! prepare thy martial car,
To lead her armies and provoke the war!
Rebellion waits, impatient of delay,
The signal her black ensigns to display*.

To thee, whose soul, all steadfast and serene,
Beholds the tumults that distract our scene;
And, in the calmer seats of wisdom plac'd,
Enjoys the sweets of sentiment and taste;
To thee, O Marius! whom no factions sway,
Th' impartial muse devotes her honest lay!
In her fond breast no prostituted aim,
Nor venal hope, assumes fair friendship's name:
Sooner shall Churchill's feeble meteor-ray,
That led our foundering demagogue astray,
Darkling to grope and flounce in error's night,
Eclipse great Mansfield's strong meridian light,
Than shall the change of fortune, time or place,
Thy generous friendship in my heart efface!
O! whether wandering from thy country far,
And plung'd amid the murdering scenes of war;
Or in the blest retreat of virtue laid,
Where contemplation spreads her awful shade;
If ever to forget thee I have power,
May Heaven desert me at my latest hour!

Still satire bids my bosom beat to arms,
And throb with irresistible alarms.
Like some full river charg'd with falling showers,
Still o'er my breast her swelling deluge pours.
But rest and silence now, who wait beside,
With their strong flood gates bar th' impetuous tide.

Peace to thy ashes, LLOYD, ill-treated bard—
Hard was thy lot, sweet bird! in this rude age,
That coop'd thee up to whistle in a cage:
Yet thou could'st even freedom's self survive,
And blithly sing while Churchill was alive,
But when your mate was snatch'd, you droop'd and died;
Blest was that trial, for thy truth was tried.
For ages hence your chaplet shall be green,
And, ages past, no withering leaf be seen.
Softly repose upon the Muse's breast,
And Phœbus' self shall sing you to your rest.

Pierced to the heart, I lay, ill-treated bard—
I had my lot, sweet bird, in this rude age,

THE LIFE OF LLOYD.

ROBERT LLOYD was the son of the Rev. Dr. Pearson Lloyd, second Master of Westminster School. He was born in 1733.

He received his education at Westminster School; and had for his schoolfellows, Churchill, Thornton, Colman, Bensley, and some others, who have distinguished themselves in the literary world. To Churchill, he was, through life, particularly attached.

In 1751, he stood first in the list of Westminster scholars who were sent to Trinity College, Cambridge; at the same time that his friend Colman obtained the same rank among those who were sent to Oxford.

So early as the year 1751, he had written The Progress of Envy, to shew his indignation at Lauder's malevolent attack upon Milton, and continued to cultivate his poetical talents during his residence at Cambridge.

In 1755, he took the degree of Bachelor, and in 1761, that of Master of Arts.

Though he went to the University from school, in a manner so honourable to his literature, he never became a Fellow of his College.

To the decency or propriety of his conduct at Cambridge, little commendation can be afforded; the report of his contemporaries is not the least favourable to his behaviour there.

On leaving the University, he returned to Westminster, and became an assistant to his father, as one of the Ushers of the school, an employment he undertook with reluctance, and retired from with disgust.

His motives for relinquishing this situation, the duties of which he was particularly well qualified to discharge, as assigned by himself, in his Apology, was his desire of farther improving his own mind, instead of vainly attempting the improvement of others.

For such his task, a dismal truth,
Who watches o'er the bent of youth;
And while a paltry stipend earning,
He sows the richest seeds of learning,
And tills their minds with proper care,
And sees them their due produce bear:
No joys, alas! his toil beguile,
His own lies fallow all the while.

It is probable, however, that this impatience of restraint and disgust at scholastic confinement were heightened by his intimacy with Churchill, Thornton, and Bensley, whose congenial talents and disposition might serve to encourage each other in the pursuit of such youthful amusements, as insensibly betrayed them into a liberality of life and conversation which the prudential part of the world condemned.

It is a melancholy reflection, and sufficiently mortifying to men of parts and genius, that every one of his spirited companions fell, with himself, a sacrifice in the prime of life to the want of that discretion in themselves which they so wittily ridiculed, and as imprudently despised in others.

Having resigned the Ushership of Westminster School, he became an author by profession, and experienced most of the vicissitudes of fortune to which men of that precarious profession are liable.

He engaged in many literary undertakings; but added little to his reputation, and nothing to his independence. The first performance which established his reputation as a poet was The Aſtor, published in 1760, and addressed to his friend Thornton, which not only gave proofs of great judgment, but had also the merit of smooth versification and great strength of poetry.

The same year, his ode, intituled, the Tears and Triumphs of Parnassus, was performed at Drury-Lane, and published in 4to.

It is supposed, that the reputation he acquired by the Aſtor, stimulated Churchill to write his celebrated "Rosciad;" the superior popularity of which, according to Dr. Kenrick, gave him at first some disgust; but on the farther exertion of Churchill's abilities, the superiority in force of numbers, and power of imagery, appearing so greatly on the side of his friend, with the modesty becoming real genius, and the complacency of a disposition untainted by envy, he joined the rest of his admirers in the unlimited applause bestowed on his productions.

For me, who labour with poetic sin,
Who often woo the muse I cannot win,
Whom pleasure first a willing poet made,
And folly spoilt by taking up the trade:
Pleas'd I behold superior genius shine,
Nor, ting'd with envy, wish that genius mine.
To Churchill's muse can bow with decent awe,
Admire his mode, nor make that mode my law:
Both may, perhaps, have various powers to please,
Be his the strength of numbers, mine the ease.

In the beginning of the poetical war, to which the "Rosciad" founded the first charge, Lloyd was suspected to be the author; but exculpated himself from the charge, by an advertisement in the public papers; on which occasion, Churchill came forward, and in the same public manner, declared himself the author, and drew on that torrent of "Anti Rosciads," "Apologies," "Murphiads," "Churchilliads," "Examiners," &c. which for a long time engaged the attention of the public.

In 1761, his Arcadia on the Shepherd's Wedding, a dramatic pastoral, was brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, and performed several nights, though with no great success. It is extremely short and simple, being only a compliment to their present Majesties on their nuptials.

The same year, he conducted the poetical department of a periodical publication, called, The Library, to which Churchill is supposed to have contributed.

His attachment to the pleasures of the table, particularly to those of the bottle, being much censured both by his real and pretended friends, Churchill attempted to apologize for him, and even to justify the practice, as well by precept as example. His gay and spirited epistle, intituled, "Night," inscribed to Lloyd, is a professed apology, if not a formal justification of their nocturnal festivity.

Let slaves to business, bodies without soul,
Important blanks in nature's nightly roll,
Solemnize nonsense in the day's broad glare,
We night prefer, which heals or hides our care.

The truth seems to be, that however eagerly they might enter on the career of these jovial amusements, they continued their race out of pique at the worldly disrespect, which they had imprudently, and perhaps unexpectedly incurred. This is pathetically insinuated in the following lines:

When foes insult, and prudent friends dispense
In pity's strains, the worst of insolence,
Oft with thee, Lloyd, I steal an hour from grief,
And in thy social converse find relief,
The mind, of solitude impatient grown,
Loves any sorrows rather than her own.

The expences necessary to support the character of a man of the town, exceeding the income of a man of wit, he was induced to engage in publications that promised to produce profit rather than praise. Among these was the St. James's Magazine, a periodical work, begun 1763, and which was soon discontinued for want of encouragement, though far superior to most other publications of the kind.

In this work, he inserted a translation of Moliere's Ecole des Femmes, which was published merely to show how much Mr. Murphy had borrowed in composing "The Way to keep Him."

The same year, he published The Death of Adam, a tragedy, translated from the German of Klopstock. Dr. Kenrick observes, that he was not sufficiently acquainted with that language, to do justice either to the original or to himself.

The St. James's Magazine not meeting with that success which, from its merit, might be reasonably expected, he found himself unable to discharge some pecuniary obligations which he had improvidently laid himself under on the flattering prospect of its success; and of course became a prisoner in the Fleet, where he was almost entirely supported by the benevolence of his friend Churchill, who allowed him a regular stipend, from the commencement of his confinement.

He was visited in the Fleet by a number of those who had, or would be thought to have pretensions to wit; but he was abandoned by almost all the friends and companions of his youth, especially those on whom he lavished many encomiums in his writings.

"Thornton," says he, in one of his letters to Mr. Wilkes, after the death of Churchill, "is what you thought him. I have many acquaintances, but now no friend here." Mr. Wilkes was then in France. Garrick, Colman, and Hogarth, whom he had so berhymed and bepraised, were in England.

During his confinement, he undertook, in conjunction with Mr. Charles Davies, a translation of the Contes Moraux of Marmontel; a careless performance that did them little credit.

In 1762, he collected his Poems into a 4to volume, for which he obtained a very liberal subscription.

He wrote also a comic opera, intitled, The Capricious Lovers, which was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane, in 1764, with some applause; but not with so much as it merited; though his genius does not appear to have led him strongly to dramatic composition. The ground-word of this piece is the Caprices d'Amour, or Ninette a la Cour, by Favart.

In this state of dereliction and depression, he had the affliction to lose his friend Churchill, whose kindness to him continued undiminished during all his necessities.

The following letters to their common friend, Mr. Wilkes, the one written before, and the other after the death of his liberal benefactor, sufficiently speak his apprehensions and sense of that melancholy event.

"Your letters have given me inexpressible uneasiness concerning my friend Charles; and your not giving me a direction, leaves me in still greater anxiety that this may not reach you, and I consequently hear nothing how he does. Indeed, we are all much alarmed; for though the seeming spirits of your letter to me gave us hopes that it might not be so bad with him, that which Jack has received entirely quashes them. Pray let me hear from you the earliest opportunity. I hope I shall not be doubly unfortunate in the loss of my friend, and be reduced to the comfortless necessity of brooding over my own calamities in this ungrateful situation. Dear Wilkes, give me all the information you can, and what services I can do, I in duty owe to you both, command."

"I will spare your own feelings," he writes him, Nov. 20, 1764, "and mine on our irreparable loss. You did not, I imagine, receive my letter, directed to you at an uncertainty, at the post-house, or if you did, you returned no answer, I suppose because you could give no comfort. I am pleased to find from Mr. Cotes, who communicated your letter to him this day to me, that you will be kind to the remains of our dear friend. What is in my power to execute, you will direct and command. And I could much wish, you would, as early as you can, bring your mind to write on such a subject.—Do, if it is only for my consolation, who indeed most truly want it; write to me, and as the memory of Charles was dear to you, do not forget him who is most unfortunate in the loss of the living and the dead friend."

The news of the melancholy event being announced to him somewhat abruptly while he was sitting at dinner, "he was seized," says Dr. Kenrick, "with a sudden sickness, and saying, 'I shall follow poor Charles,' took to his bed, from which he never rose again."

He fell into a fit of despondence, and survived him but a few weeks. He died on the 15th of December 1764, at the age of 31, and was buried on the 19th, in the church-yard of St. Bride's parish.

In his sickness, he was attended by Miss Patty Churchill, the favourite sister of his deceased friend, who is said to have possessed a considerable portion of the sense, spirit, and genius of her brother. She is reported to have been betrothed to Lloyd, and that so mournful was the effect, which the melancholy catastrophe of her lover and brother had on her susceptible mind, that she caught the contagion of grief, which preyed on her spirits, and did not permit her long to survive them.

His Poetical Works, with considerable additions from the St. James's Magazine, were reprinted, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1774, with "An Account of his Life," by Dr. Kenrick, and inserted, with additions, in the edition of the "English Poets," 1790.

Lloyd seems to have been of a disposition different from that of the genus irritabile vatum. In the general intercourse of life, he is said to have been generous and friendly: he had a grateful heart, and showed, by his warm attachment to his friends, how sensible he was of their kindness. Though the rigid moralist might have reason to censure his irregularities, they were of such a nature as betrayed no malevolence of temper, reflecting on him the character so well known under the denomination of no one's enemy but his own, rather than that of a friend only to himself, and an enemy to others. His grateful attachment to Churchill, needs no other proof than the fatal one of breaking his heart at his death.

"Mr. Lloyd," says Mr. Wilkes, "was mild and affable in private life, of gentle manners, and very engaging in conversation." Captain Edward Thompson describes him as of a tacit disposition, reserved and attentive; "he took much snuff," says he, "and would often sit the auditor of conversation rather than the promoter." "He was the worst reciter of his own verses," says Dr. Kenrick, "that I ever remember to have heard. At the same time, what he wanted in power of declamation, was amply supplied by tenaciousness of memory and facility of composition; the productions of no writer, perhaps ancient or modern, being more truly said to be written currente calamo than those of Mr. Lloyd. So ready was his pen, and retentive his mind, that when his devotion to the muses has been interrupted by the orgies of Bacchus, and the suspended fable, like that of Butler's tale, been broke off in the middle, he has pursued it from memory with the utmost composure, when the fever of the brain was over, and finished the composition as consistently as if the copy had been all before him."

As a poet, Lloyd is to be considered as an elegant and correct, rather than a very animated or first rate writer. His compositions are distinguished by a happy ease, and a graceful negligence of expression. But they are extremely unequal; sometimes terse and neat, and at other times slovenly and inaccurate. Prior, Gay, and Swift, were the models which he followed, in preference to Dryden, Pope, and Churchill. The Actor is one of his best productions. It is not a regular treatise of the whole art of acting, but only such particular parts of it as he probably thought best adapted to the improvement of the stage. He begins, by exploding the prevailing vice of imitation, and passes a very high and just encomium on Garrick, the great object of imitation among the inferior players. He then censures the most striking errors in theatrical action, particularly the studied affectation of attitude. He goes on to censure the disagreeable practice, not uncommon among players of great merit, of over-acting their parts; and censures, with equal justice and propriety, the monotony of some actors, the rant of others, and the inattention of most; as also, the several stage tricks of dress, ghosts, and the absurd entertainments of pantomime; concluding with the following apology for, and address to the actor, which is selected as a specimen of his terse style and easy versification.

Shall they, who trace the passions from their rise,
Show scorn her features, her own image vice?
Who teach the mind its proper force to scan,
And hold the faithful mirror up to man,
Shall their profession e'er provoke disdain,
Who stand the foremost in the moral train,
Who lend reflection all the grace of art,
And strike the precept home upon the heart?

Yet, hapless artist ! though thy skill can raise
 The bursting peal of universal praise,
 Though at thy beck applause delighted stands,
 And lifts, Briareus' like, her hundred hands,
 Know, fame awards thee but a partial breath !
 Not all thy talents brave the stroke of death.
 Poets to ages yet unborn appeal,
 And latest times th' eternal Nature feel.
 Though blended here the praise of bard and play'r,
 While more than half becomes the actor's share,
 Relentless death untwists the mingled fame,
 And sinks the player in the poet's name.
 The pliant muscles of the various face,
 The mien that gave each sentence strength and grace,
 The tuneful voice, the eye that spoke the mind,
 Are gone, nor leave a single trace behind.

Of his Occasional Pieces, the Epistle to Garrick, Epistle to Churchill, Shakspeare, The Poet, The Cocker of Tif-fington's and The Cocker of Cripplegate's Letters, &c. have considerable merit. His Progress of Envy, is a happy imitation of the style and manner of Spenser. The two Odes to Obscurity and Oblivion, written in conjunction with Colman, are admirable parodies of Gray's "Progress of Poetry, and Bard," and Mason's "Ode to Memory," &c. In the first, the birth of Fashion is humorously and poetically described, and in the latter, the goddess Oblivion is pleasantly and characteristically represented. His Latin version of Gray's "Elegy in a Country Church-Yard," is inferior to some other versions of that exquisite performance. His translation of the first book of Voltaire's Henriade is executed with spirit and elegance. The Imitation from the Spectator is exquisitely beautiful. His Songs are tender and elegant. His Fables, Tales, &c. are familiar and easy. His other levities and pieces of humour have their proportion of wit and pleasantry ; but require no distinct enumeration or particular criticism.

"To expatiate on his merit as a writer," says Dr. Kenrick, "would be needless ; as nothing can be more fully said of him than he hath occasionally said of himself, in reply to the censure of the critics :

Hist ! 'tis a critic—yes—'tis he—
 What would your graceless form with me ?
 Is it t' upbraid me with the crime
 Of spinning unlaborious rhyme,
 Of stringing various thoughts together
 In verse or prose, or both, or neither ?
 A vein which, though it must offend
 You, lofty Sirs ! who can't descend
 To fame, has often made its way,
 From Butler, Prior, Swift, and Gay.

"In his classical allusions, and happy imitations of the Greek and Latin poets, Mr. Lloyd bears away the palm from all other English poets. I do not mean to refer the reader to his translation of Homer's Hymn, which appears (as well as his imitation of Spenser) to be a very juvenile performance. The classical reader, however, cannot fail of being pleased with most of his Latin compositions, his translation of Mr. Gray's celebrated Ode, [Elegy] and particularly on making the comparison with his English imitation of Theocritus.

"It is yet remarkable, that Mr. Lloyd, though so excellent a scholar, had not the least tincture of the pedant in his character ; none being more ready to turn pedants into ridicule ; particularly those affected pedagogues who attempted to reduce the numbers of English verse to the scale of Greek and Roman feet. He was indeed one of those whom he describes under the title of real scholars :

Whose knowledge unaffected flows,
 And sits as easy as their clothes.

"Mr. Lloyd," says Mr. Wilkes, "was an excellent scholar, and an easy, natural poet. His peculiar excellence was the dressing up an old thought in a new, neat, and trim manner. He was content to scamper round the foot of Parnassus on his little Welch poney, which seems never to have tired. He left the fury of the winged steed, and the daring flights of the sacred mountain, to the sublime genius of his friend Churchill."

THE WORKS OF LLOYD.

THE AUTHOR'S APOLOGY.

My works are advertis'd for sale,
And censures fly as thick as hail;
While my poor scheme of publication
Supplies the dearth of conversation.

What will the world say?—That's your cry.
Who is the world? and what am I?

Once, but thank Heaven, those days are o'er,
And persecution reigns no more,
One man, one hardy man alone,
Usurp'd the critic's vacant throne,
And thence with neither taste nor wit,
By powerful catcall from the pit,
Knock'd farce, and play, and actor down.
Who pass'd the sentence then?—the town.
So now each upstart puny elf
Talks of the world, and means himself.

Yet in the circle there are those
Who hurt e'en more than open foes:
Whose friendship serves the talking turn,
Just simmers to a kind concern.
And with a wond'rous soft expression
Expatriates upon indiscretion;
Flies from the poems to the man,
And gratifies the favourite plan
To pull down others' reputation,
And build their own on that foundation.

The scholar grave, of taste discerning,
Who lives on credit for his learning,
And has no better claim to wit,
Than carping at what others writ,
With pitying kindness, friendly fear,
Whispers conjectures in your ear.

"I'm sorry—and he's much to blame—
"He might have publish'd—but his name!
"The thing might please a few, no doubt,
"As handed privately about—
"It might amuse a friend or two,
"Some partial friend like me and you;
"But when it comes to press and print,
"You'll find, I fear, but little in't.
"He stands upon a dangerous brink,
"Who totters o'er the sea of ink,
"Where reputation runs aground,
"The author cast away, and drown'd.
"And then—'twas wilful and absurd,
"(So well approv'd, so well preferr'd)
"Abruptly thus a place to quit,
"A place which most his genius hit,
"The theatre for Latin wit!

"With critics round him chaste and terse,
"To give a plaudit to his verse!"

Latin, I grant, shows college breeding,
And some school-common-place of reading.
But has in moderns small pretension
To real wit, or strong invention.

The excellence you critics praise
Hangs on a curious choice of phrase;
Which pick'd and chosen here and there,
From prose or verse, no matter where,
Jumbled together in a dish,
Like Spanish olio, fowl, flesh, fish,
You set the classic hodge-podge on
For pedant wits to feed upon.

Your would-be genii vainly seek
Fame for their Latin verse, or Greek;
Who would for that be most admir'd
Which blockheads may, and have acquir'd.
A mere mechanical connection
Of favourite words—a bare collection
Of phrases—where the labour'd cento
Presents you with a dull memento,
How Virgil, Horace, Ovid, join,
And club together half a line.
These only strain their motly wits
In gathering patches, shreds, and bits,
To wrap their barren fancies in,
And make a classic Harlequin.

—Were I at once empower'd to show
My utmost vengeance on my foe,
To punish with extremest rigour,
I could inflict no penance bigger
Than using him as learning's tool,
To make him usher of a school.
For, not to dwell upon the toil
Of working on a barren soil,
And lab'ring with incessant pains
To cultivate a blockhead's brains,
The duties there but ill besit
The love of letters, arts, or wit.
For whosoe'er, though slightly, sips,
Their grateful flavour with his lips,
Will find it leave a smatch behind,
Shall sink so deeply in the mind,
It never thence can be eras'd—
But, rising up, you call it taste.

'Twere foolish for a drudge to choose
A gusto which he cannot use.
Better discard the idle whim,
What's he to taste? or taste to him?

For me, it hurts me to the soul
To brook confinement or controul;
Still to be pinion'd down to teach
The syntax and the parts of speech;
Or, what perhaps is drudging worse,
The links, and joints, and rules of verse;
To deal out authors by retail,
Like penny-pots of Oxford ale;
—Oh! 'tis a service irksome more
Than tugging at the slavish oar.

Yet such his task, a dismal truth,
Who watches o'er the bent of youth;
And while, a paltry stipend earning,
He sows the richest seeds of learning,
And tills their minds with proper care,
And sees them their due produce bear,
No joys, alas! his toil beguile,
His own lies fallow all the while.

"Yet still he's in the road, you say,
Of learning."—Why, perhaps, he may.
But turns like horses in a mill,
Nor getting on, nor standing still:
For little way his learning reaches,
Who reads no more than what he teaches.

"Yet you can send advent'rous youth,
In search of letters, taste, and truth,
Who ride the highway-road to knowledge,
Through the plain turnpikes of a college,"
True.—Like way-posts, we serve to show
The road which travellers should go;
Who jog along in easy pace,
Secure of coming to the place,
Yet find, return where'er they will,
The post, and its direction still:
Which stands an useful unthank'd guide,
To many a passenger beside.

'Tis hard to carve for others' meat,
And not to have time one's self to eat.
Though, be it always understood,
Our appetites are full as good.

"But there have been, and proofs appear,
Who bore this load from year to year;
Whose claim to letters, parts, and wit,
The world has ne'er disputed yet.
Whether the flowing mirth prevail
In Wesley's song, or humorous tale;
Or happier Bourne's expression please
With graceful turns of classic ease;
Or Oxford's well-read poet sings
Pathetic to the ear of kings:
These have indulg'd the muses' flight,
Nor lost their time or credit by't;
Nor suffer'd fancy's dreams to prey
On the due business of the day.
Verse was to them a recreation,
Us'd by way of relaxation."

Your instances are fair and true,
And genius I respect with you.
I envy none their honest praise;
I seek to blast no scholar's bays:
Still let the graceful foliage spread
Its greenest honours round their head,
Blest, if the muses hand entwined
A sprig at least to circle mine!

Come—I admit, you tax me right.
Prudence, 'tis true, was out of sight,

And you may whisper all you meet,
The man was vague and indiscreet.
Yet tell me, while you censure me,
Are you from error sound and free?
Say, does your breast no bias hide,
Whose influence draws the mind aside!

All have their hobby-horse you see,
From Tristram down to you and me.
Ambition, splendour may be thine;
Ease, indolence, perhaps are mine.
Though prudence, and our nature's pride
May with our weaknesses to hide,
And set their hedges up before 'em,
Some sprouts will branch, and straggle o'er 'em.
Strive, fight against her how you will,
Nature will be the mistress still,
And though you curb with double rein
She'll run away with us again.

But let a man of parts be wrong,
'Tis triumph to the leaden throng.
The fools shall cackle out reproof,
The very asses will raise his hoof:
And he who holds in his possession,
The single virtue of discretion,
Who knows no overflow of spirit,
Whose want of passions is his merit,
Whom wit, and taste, and judgment flies,
Shall shake his noddle, and seem wise,

THE ACTOR.

ADDRESSED TO BONNEL THORNTON, ESQ.

ACTING, dear Thornton, its perfection draws,
From no observance of mechanic laws;
No settled maxims of a fav'rite stage,
No rules deliver'd down from age to age,
Let players nicely mark them as they will,
Can e'er entail hereditary skill.
If 'mongst the humble hearers of the pit,
Some curious vet'ran critic chance to sit,
Is he pleas'd more because 'twas acted so
By Booth and Cibber thirty years ago?
The mind recalls an object held more dear,
And hates the copy, that it comes so near.
Why lov'd he Wilkes's air, Booth's nervous tone?
In them 'twas natural, 'twas all their own.
A Garrick', genius must our wonder raise.
But gives his mimic no reflected praise.

Thrice happy genius, whose unrivall'd name,
Shall live for ever in the voice of fame!
'Tis thine to lead with more than magic skill,
The train of captive passions at thy will;
To bid the bursting tear spontaneous flow
In the sweet sense of sympathetic woe:
Through ev'ry vein I feel a chillness creep,
When horrors such as thine have murder'd sleep;
And at the old man's look and frantic stare
'Tis Lear alarms me, for I see him there.
Nor yet confin'd to tragic walks alone,
The comic muse too claims thee for her own.
With each delightful requisite to please,
Taste, spirit, judgment, elegance, and ease,
Familiar nature forms thy only rule,
From Ranger's rake to Druggier's vacant fool.
With powers so pliant, and so various blest,
That what we see the last, we like the best.

Not idly pleas'd, at judgment's dear expence,
But burst outrageous with the laugh of sense.

Perfection's top, with weary toil and pain,
'Tis genius only that can hope to gain.
The play'r's profession (though I hate the phrase,
'Tis so mechanic in these modern days)
Lies not in trick, or attitude, or start,
Nature's true knowledge is the only art.
The strong-felt passion bolts into his face,
The mind untouch'd, what is it but grimace!
To this one standard make your just appeal,
Here lies the golden secret; learn to FEEL
Or fool, or monarch, happy, or distress'd,
No actor pleases that is not possess'd.

Once on the stage, in Rome's declining days,
When Christian's were the subject of their plays,
E'er persecution dropp'd her iron rod,
And men still wag'd an impious war with God,
An actor flourish'd of no vulgar fame,
Nature's disciple, and Genes't his name.
A noble object for his skill he chose,
A martyr dying 'midst insulting foes.
Resign'd with patience to religion's laws,
Yet braving monarchs in his Saviour's cause,
Fill'd with th' idea of the sacred part,
He felt a zeal beyond the reach of art,
With look and voice, and gesture, all express'd
A kindred ardour in the player's breast;
Till as the flame through all his bosom ran,
He lost the actor, and commenc'd the man;
Profest the faith; his pagan gods denied,
And what he acted then, he after died.

The player's province they but vainly try,
Who want these pow'rs, deportment, voice, and eye.

The critic sight 'tis only grace can please,
No figure charms us if it has not ease.
There are, who think the stature all in all,
Nor like the hero, if he is not tall.
The feeling sense all other want supplies,
I rate no actor's merit from his size.

Superior height requires superior grace,
And what's a giant with a vacant face?

Theatric monarchs, in their tragic gait,
Affect to mark the solemn pace of state.
One foot put forward in position strong,
The other, like its vassal, drag along.
So grave each motion, so exact and slow,
Like wooden monarchs at a puppet-show.

The mien delights us with that native grace,
But affectation ill supplies its place.

Unskilful actors, like your mimic apes,
Will writhe their bodies in a thousand shapes;
However foreign from the poet's art,
No tragic hero but admires a start.

What though unfeeling of the nervous line,
Who but allows his attitude is fine?

While a whole minute equipoisd he stands,
Till praise dismiss him with her echoing hands!
Resolv'd, though nature hate the tedious pause,
By perseverance to extort applause.

When Romeo, sorrowing at his Juliet's doom,
With eager madness bursts the canvas tomb,
The sudden whirl, stretch'd leg, and list'd staff,
Which please the vulgar, make the critic laugh.

To paint the passion's force, and mark it well,
The proper action nature's self will tell;

No pleasing pow'rs distortions can express,
And nicer judgment alway lothes excess.
In sock or buskin, who o'erleaps the bounds,
Disgusts our reason, and the taste confounds.

Of all the evils which the stage molest,
I hate your fool who overacts his jest;
Who murders what the poet finely writ,
And, like a bungler, haggles all his wit,
With shrug, and grin, and gesture out of place,
And writes a foolish comment with his face.

Old Johnson once, though Cibber's perter vein*,
But meanly groups him with a num'rous train,
With steady face, and sober hum'rous mien,
Fill'd the strong outlines of the comic scene,
What was writ down, with decent utterance spoke,
Betray'd no symptom of the conscious joke;
The very man in look, in voice, in air,
And though upon the stage, appear'd no play'r.

The word and action should conjointly suit,
But acting words is labour too minute.
Grimace will ever lead the judgment wrong;
While sober humour marks th' impression strong.

Her proper traits the fixt attention hit,
And bring me closer to the poet's wit;
With her delighted o'er each scene I go,
Well-pleas'd, and not ashamed of being so.

But let the generous actor still forbear
To copy features with a mimic's care!

'Tis a poor skill which ev'ry fool can reach,
A vile stage-custom, honour'd in the breach.

Worse as more close, the dissingenuous art,
But shows the wanton looseness of the heart.

When I behold a wretch, of talents mean,
Drag private foibles on the public scene,

Forfaking nature's fair and open road,
To mark some whim, some strange peculiar mode,

Fir'd with disgust I lothe his servile plan,
Despise the mimic, and abhor the man.

Go to the lame, to hospitals repair,
And hunt for humour in distortion there!

Fill up the measure of the motely whim
With shrug, wink, snuffle, and convulsive limb;

Then shame at once, to please a trifling age,
Good sense, good manners, virtue, and the stage!

'Tis not enough the voice be found and clear,
'Tis modulation that must charm the ear,

When desperate heroines grieve with tedious mean,
And whine their sorrows in a fee-saw tone,

The same soft sounds of unimpassioned woes
Can only make the yawning hearers doze.

The voice all modes of passion can express,
That marks the proper word with proper stress,

But none emphatic can that actor call,
Who lays an equal emphasis on all.

Some o'er the tongue the labour'd measures roll
Slow and delib'rate as the parting toll,

Point ev'ry stop, mark ev'ry pause so strong,
Their words, like stage-processions stalk along.

All affectation but creates disgust,
And e'en in speaking we may seem too just.

Nor proper, Thornton, can those sounds appear
Which bring not numbers to thy nicer ear;

In vain for them the pleasing measure flows,
Whose recitation runs it all to prose;

* See Cibber's Apology, 8vo, 1750.

Repeating what the poet sets not down,
The verb disjointing from its friendly noun;
While pause, and break, and repetition join
To make a discord in each tuneful line.

Some placid natures fill th' allotted scene
With lifeless drone, insipid and serene;
While others thunder ev'ry couplet o'er,
And almost crack your ears with rant and roar.

More nature oft and finer strokes are shown,
In the low whisper than tempestuous tone;
And Hamlet's hollow voice and fix'd amazement,
More powerful terror to the mind conveys,
Than he, who, swol'n with big impetuous rage,
Bullies the bulky phantom off the stage.

He, who in earnest studies o'er his party,
Will find true nature cling about his heart.
The modes of grief are not included all
In the white handkerchief and mournful drawl;
A single look more marks th' internal woe,
Than all the windings of the lengthen'd Oh.

Up to the face the quick sensation flies,
And darts its meaning from the speaking eyes;
Love, transport, madness, anger, scorn, despair,
And all the passions, all the soul is there.

In vain Ophelia gives her flowrets round,
And with her straws fantastic strewns the ground,
In vain now sings, now heaves the desp'rate sigh,

If phrenzy sit not in the troubled eye.
In Cibber's look commanding sorrows speak,
And call the tear fast trickling down my cheek.

There is a fault which stirs the critic's rage;
A want of due attention on the stage.
I have seen actors, and admir'd ones too,
Whose tongues wound up set forward from their cue;
In their own speech who whine, or roar away,
Yet seem unmov'd at what the rest may say;
Whose eyes and thoughts on diff'rent objects
roam.

Until the prompter's voice recal them home.

Diveest yourself of hearers, if you can,
And strive to speak, and be the very man.
Why should the well-bred actor wish to know
Who sits above to-night, or who below?
So, 'mid th' harmonious tones of grief or rage,
Italian squallers oft disgrace the stage;
When, with a simp'ring leer, and bow profound,

The squeaking Cyrus greets the boxes round;
Or proud Mandane, of imperial race,
Familiar drops a curt'sie to her grace.

To suit the dress demands the actor's art,
Yet there are those who over-dress the part.
To some prescriptive right gives settled things,
Black wigs to murd'ers, feather'd hats to kings.
But Michael Cassio might be drunk enough,
Though all his features were not grim'd with snuff.

Why should Poll Peachum shine in satin clothes?
Why ev'ry devil dance in scarlet hose?

But in stage customs what offends me most
Is the slip-door, and slowly-rising ghost.
Tell me, nor count the question too severe,
Why need the dismal powder'd forms appear?

When chilling horrors shake th' affrighted king,
And guilt torments him with her scorpion sting;
When keenest feelings at his bosom pull,
And fancy tells him that the seat is full,
Why need the ghost usurp the monarch's place,
To frighten children with his mealy face?

The king alone should form the phantom there,
And talk and tremble at the vacant chair;

If Belvidera her lov'd loss deplore,
Why for twin spectres bursts the yawning floor?
When, with disorder'd starts, and horrid cries,
She paints the murder'd forms before her eyes,
And still pursues them with a frantic stare,
'Tis pregnant madness brings the visions there.
More instant horror would enforce the scene
If all her shudd'ring things were at shapes unseen.

Poet and actor thus, with blendid skill,
Mould all our passions to their instant will:
'Tis thus, when feeling Garrick treads the stage,
(The speaking comment of his Shakspeare's page)
Oft as I drink the words with greedy ears,
I shake with horror, or dissolve with tears.

O, ne'er may folly seize the throne of taste,
Nor dullness lay the realms of genius waste!
No bouncing crackers ape the thund'ring fire,
No tumbler float upon the bending wire!
More natural uses to the stage belong
Than tumblers, monsters, pantomime, or song.
For other purpose was that spot design'd;
To purge the passions, and reform the mind,
To give to nature all the force of art,
And, while it charms the ear, to mend the heart.

Thornton, to thee I dare with truth commend
The decent stage as virtue's natural friend.
Though oft debas'd with scenes profane and loose,
No reason weighs against its proper use.
Though the low priest his sacred function shame,
Religion's perfect law is still the same.

Shall they, who trace the passions from their rise,

Show scorn her features, her own image vice?
Who teach the mind its proper force to scan,
And hold the faithful mirror up to man;
Shall their profession e'er provoke disdain,
Who stand the foremost in the moral train,
Who lend reflection all the grace of art,
And strike the precept home upon the heart?

Yet, hapless artist! though thy skill can raise
The bursting peal of universal praise;
Though at thy beck applause delighted stands,
And lifts, Briareus' like, her hundred hands;
Know, fame awards thee but a partial breath!
Not all thy talents brave the stroke of death.
Poets to ages yet unborn appeal,
And latest times th' eternal nature feel.
Though blended here the praise of bard and play'r.

While more than half becomes the actor's share,
Relentless death untwists the mingled fame,
And sinks the player in the poet's name.
The pliant muscles of the various face,
The mien that gave each sentence strength and
grace,
The tuneful voice, the eye that spoke the mind,
Are gone, nor leave a single trace behind.

THE LAW STUDENT*.

TO GEORGE COLMAN, ESQ.

Quid tibi cum Cirrhâ? quid cum Permessidos undâ? Romanum propius divitiisque Forum
est. MART.

Now Christ-Church left, and fixt at Lincoln's Inn,
Th' important studies of the law begin.
Now groan the shelves beneath th' unusual charge
Of records, statutes, and reports at large.
Each classic author seeks his peaceful nook,
And modest Virgil yields his place to Coke.
No more, ye bards, for vain precedence hope,
But even Jacob take the lead of Pope!

While the pil'd shelves sink down on one another,
And each huge folio has its cumb'rous brother,
While, arm'd with these, the student views with awe
His rooms become the magazine of law,
Say whence so few succeed? where thousands aim,
So few e'er reach the promis'd goal of fame?
Say why Cæcilius quits a gainful trade
For regimentals, sword, and smart cockade?
Or Sextus why his first profession leaves
For narrower band, plain shirt, and pudding sleeves?

The depth of law asks study, thought, and care;
Shall we seek these in rich Alonzo's heir?
Such diligence, alas! is seldom found
In the brisk heir to forty thousand pound.
Wealth, that excuses folly, sloth creates,
Few who can spend e'er learn to get estates,
What is to him dry case, or dull report,
Who studies fashions at the inns of court;
And proves that thing of emptiness and show,
That mungrel, half-form'd thing, a temple-beau?
Observe him daily faunt'ring up and down,
In purple slippers, and in silken gown;
Last night's debauch his morning conversation,
The coming all his evening preparation.

By law let others toil to gain renown!
Florio's a gentleman, a man o' th' town.
He nor courts clients, or the law regarding;
Hurries from Nando's down to Covent-Garden:
Yet he's a scholar;—mark him in the pit
With critic catcall sound the stops of wit!
Supreme at George's he harangues the throng,
Censor of style from tragedy to song:
Him ev'ry witling views with secret awe,
Deep in the drama, shallow in the law.

Others there are, who, indolent and vain,
Contemn the science they can ne'er attain:
Who write, and read, but all by fits and starts,
And varnish folly with the name of parts;
Trust all to genius, for they scorn to pore,
Till e'en that little genius is no more.

Knowledge in law care only can attain,
Where honour's purchas'd at the price of pain.

* In the preface to Colman's prose, that gentleman claims the present performance, and says that it was given to our author to fill up a volume of poems published by subscription.

If, loit'ring, up th' ascent you cease to climb,
No starts of labour can redeem the time.
Industrious study wins by slow degrees,
True sons of Coke can ne'er be sons at ease.

There are, whom love of poetry has smit,
Who, blind to interest, arrant dupes to wit,
Have wander'd devious in the pleasing road,
With Attic flowers and classic wreaths bestrew'd:
Wedded to verse, embrac'd the muse for life,
And ta'en, like modern bucks, their whores to wife.

Where'er the muse usurps despotic sway,
All other studies must of force give way,
Int'rest in vain puts in her prudent claim,
Nonsuited by the pow'rful plea of fame.
As well you might weigh lead against a feather,
As ever jumble wit and law together.
On Lyttleton Coke gravely thus remarks,
(Remember this, ye rhyming temple sparks)!
"In all our author's tenures, BE IT NOTED,
"This is the fourth time any verse is quoted."
Which, 'gainst the muse and verse, may well imply
What lawyers call a noli prosequi.

Quit then, dear George, O quit the barren field,
Which neither profit nor reward can yield!
What though the sprightly scene, well acted, draws
From unpack'd Englishmen unbrib'd applause,
Some monthly Grub, some Dennis of the age,
In print cries shame on the degen'rate stage.
If haply Churchill strive with generous aim,
To fan the sparks of genius to a flame;
If all UNASK'D, UNKNOWING, AND UNKNOWN,
By noting thy desert, he prove his own;
Envy shall straight to Hamilton's repair,
And vent her spleen, and gall, and venom there;
Thee, and thy works, and all thy friends decry,
And boldly print and publish a rank lie,
Swear your own hand the flatt'ring likeness drew,
Swear your own breath fame's partial trumpet
blew.

Well I remember oft your friends have said,
(Friends, whom the surest maxims ever led)
Turn parson, Colman, that's the way to thrive:
Your parsons are the happiest men alive.
Judges, there are but twelve, and never more,
But stalls untold, and bishops, twenty-four,
Of pride and claret, sloth and ven'son full,
Yon prelate mark, right reverend and dull!
He ne'er, good man, need pensive vigils keep
To preach his audience once a week to sleep;
On rich preferments battens at his ease,
Nor sweats for tithes, as lawyers toil for fees.

Thus they advis'd. I know thee better far;
And cry, stick close, dear Colman, to the bar!
If genius warm thee, where can genius call
For nobler action than in yonder hall?

* See the very curious and very similar criticisms on the comedy of the Jealous Wife, in two Reviews, together with the most malicious and insolent attack on the writer, and the author of this collection, in the Critical Review for March; an injury poorly repaired by a lame apology in the Review for the succeeding month, containing fresh insults on one of the injured parties.

'Tis not enough each morn, on term's approach,
To club your legal threepence for a coach;
Then at the hall to take your silent stand,
With ink-horn and long note-book in your hand,
Marking grave serjeants cite each wise report,
And noting down sage dictums from the court,
With overwhelming brow and law-learn'd face,
The index of your book of common-place.

These are mere drudges, that can only plod,
And tread the path their dull forefathers trod, Doom'd through law's maze, without a clue, to range,

From second Vernon down to second Strange.
Do thou uplift thine eyes to happier wits!
Dulness no longer on the woolpack sits;
No longer on the drawling dronish herd
Are the first honours of the law confer'd;
But they whose fame reward's due tribute draws.
Whose active merit challenges applause,
Like glorious beacons, are set high to view,
To mark the paths which genius should pursue.

O for thy spirit, MANSFIELD! at thy name
What bosom glows not with an active flame?
Alone from jargon born to rescue law,
From precedent, grave hum, and formal saw!
To strip chican'ry of its vain pretence,
And marry common law to common sense!

PRATT! on thy lips persuasion ever hung!
English falls, pure as manna, from thy tongue;
On thy voice truth may rest, and on thy plea
Unerring HENLEY! found the just decree.

HENLEY! than whom, to HARDWICKE's wellrais'd fame,
No worthier second Royal GEORGE cou'd name:
No lawyer of prerogative; no tool
Fashion'd in black corruption's pliant school;
Form'd 'twixt the people and the crown to stand,
And hold the scales of right with even hand!

True to our hopes, and equal to his birth,
See, see in YORKE! the force of lineal worth!

But why their sev'ral merits need I tell
Why on each honour'd sage's praises dwell
WILMOT! how well his place, or FOSTER ||

Or, shrew'd sense beaming from the eye of Such, while thou seest the public care engage,

Their fame increasing with increasing age,
Rais'd by true genius, bred in Phœbus' school,
Whose warmth of soul found judgment knew to

THE POETRY PROFESSORS.

OLD ENGLAND has not lost her pray'r,
And GEORGE, (thank Heav'n!) has got an heir.
A royal babe, a PRINCE of WALES.

--Poets! I pity all your nails--
What reams of paper will be spoil'd!
What graduses be daily soil'd
By inky fingers, greasy thumbs,
Hunting the word that never comes!

Now academics pump their wits,
And lash in vain their lazy tits;
In vain they whip, and flash, and spur,
The callous jades will never stir;
Nor can they reach Parnassus' hill,
Try every method which they will.
Nay, should the tits get on for once,
Each rider is so grave a dance,
That, as I've heard good judges say,
'Tis ten to one they'd lose their way;
Though not one wit bestrides the back
Of useful drudge, ycleped hack,
But fine bred things of mettled blood,
Pick'd from Apollo's royal stud.

Greek, Roman, nay Arabian steeds,
Or those our mother country breeds;
Some ride ye in, and ride ye out,
And to come home go round about,
Nor on the green sward, nor the road,
And that I think they call an ODE.
Some take the pleasant country air,
And smack their whips and drive a pair.
Each horse with bells which clink and chime,
And so they march--and that is rhyme.

Some copy with prodigious skill
The figures of a buttery-bill,
Which, with great folks of erudition,
Shall pass for Coptic or Phœnician.
While some, as patriot love prevails,
To compliment a prince of Wales,
Salute the royal babe in Welsh,
And send forth gutturals like a belch.

What pretty things imagination
Will fritter out in adulation!
The Pagan gods shall visit earth,
To triumph in a Christian's birth.
While classic poets, pure and chaste,
Of trim and academic taste,
Shall lug them in by head and shoulders,
To be or speakers, or beholders.

MARS shall present him with a lance,
To humble Spain and conquer France;
The GRACES, buxom, blithe and gay,
Shall at his cradle dance the Hay;
And VENUS, with her train of LOVES,
Shall bring a thousand pair of doves
To bill, to coo, to whine, to squeak,
Through all the dialects of Greek.
How many swains of classic breed,
Shall deftly tune their oaten reed,
And bring their Doric nymphs to town,
To sing their measures up and down,

In notes alternate, clear, and sweet,
Like ballad-singers in a street.
While those who grasp at reputation,
From imitating imitation,
Shall hunt each cranny, nook, and creek,
For precious fragments in the Greek,
And rob the spital, and the waste,
For sense, and sentiment, and taste.

What Latin bodgepodge Grecian basb,
With Hebrew roots, and English trash,
Shall academic cooks produce
For present show and future use!
FELLOWS! who've soak'd away their knowledge,
In sleepy residence at college;
Whose lives are like a stagnant pool,
Muddy and placid, dull and cool;
Mere drinking, eating; eating, drinking;
With no impertinence of thinking;
Who lack no farther erudition,
Than just to set an imposition
To cramp, demolish, and dispirit,
Each true begotten child of merit;
Censors, who, in the day's broad light,
Punish the vice they act at night;
Whose charity with self begins,
Nor covers others venial sins;
But that their feet may safely tread,
Take up hypocrisy instead,
As knowing that must always hide
A multitude of sins beside;
Whose rusty wit is at a stand,
Without a fresh man at their hand;
(Whose service must of course create
The just return of sev'nfold hate)
Lord! that such good and useful men
Should ever turn to books agen.

YET matter must be gravely plann'd,
And syllables on fingers scann'd,
And racking pangs rend lab'ring head,
Till lady muse is brought-to-bed:
What hunting, changing, toiling, sweating,
To bring the usual epithet in!
Where the cramped measure kindly shows
It will be verse, but should be prose.
So, when its neither light nor dark,
To prentice spruce, or lawyer's clerk,
The nymph, who takes her nightly stand
At some fly corner in the Strand,
Plump in the chest, tight in the boddice,
Seems to the eye a perfect goddess;
But canvass'd more minutely o'er,
Turns out an old, stale, batter'd whore.

Yet must these sons of GOWNED EASE,
Proud of the plumage of degrees,
Forfake their APATHY a while,
To figure in the Roman style,
And offer incense at the shrine
Of LATIN POETRY divine.

Upon a throne the goddess sits,
Surrounded by her bulky wits;
FABRICIUS, COOPER, CALEPINE,
AINSWORTHUS, FABER, CONSTANTINE;
And he, who like DODONA spoke,
DE SACRA QUERCU, HOLYOAKE;
These are her counsellors of state,
Men of much words, and wits of weight;

VOL. X.

Here GRADUS, full of phrases clever,
Lord of her treasury for ever,
With liberal hand his bounty deals;
SIR CENTO KEEPER of the Seals,
Next to the person of the queen,
Old madam PROSODY is seen;
Talking incessant, although dumb,
Upon her fingers to her thumb.

And all around her portraits hung
Of heroes in the Latin tongue;
Italian, English, German, French,
Who most laborously entrench
In deep parade of language dead,
What would not in their own be read,
Without impeachment of that TASTE,
Which LATIN IDIOM turns to chasse.
SANTOLIUS here, whose flippant joke,
Sought refuge in a Roman cloke:
With dull COMMIRIUS at his side,
In all the pomp of Jesuit pride.
MENAGE, the pedant figur'd there,
A trifler with a solemn air;
And there in loose, unseemly view,
The graceless, easy LOVELING too.

'Tis here grave poets urge their claim,
For some thin blast of tiny fame;
Here bind their temples drunk with praise,
With half a sprig of witherd bays.

O poet, if that honour'd name
Befits such idle childish aim;
If VIRGIL ask thy sacred care,
If HORACE charm thee, Oh, forbear
To spoil with sacrilegious hand
The glories of the CLASSIC land!
Nor sow thy dorulas on the SATIN,
Of their pure uncorrupted Latin.
Better be native in thy verse,—
What is FINGAL but genuine Erse?
Which all sublime sonorous flows,
Like HERVEY's thoughts in drunken prose.

Hail, SCOTLAND, hail, to thee belong
All pow'rs, but most the pow'rs of song;
Whether the rude unpolish'd Erse
Stalk in the buckram prose or verse,
Or bonny RAMSAY please thee no,
Who sang sae sweetly aw his woe.
If ought (and say who knows so well)
The second-sighted muse can tell,
The happy LAIRDS shall laugh and sing,
When ENGLAND's GENIUS droops his wing.
So shalt thy soil new wealth disclose,
So thy own THISTLE choke the ROSE.

But what comes here? Methinks I see
A walking university.
See how they press to cross the TWEED,
And strain their limbs with eager speed!
While SCOTLAND, from her fertile shore,
Cries, On my sons, return no more.

Hither they haste with willing mind,
Nor cast one longing look behind;
On ten-toe carriage to salute,
The k—, and q—n, and EARL OF BUTE.
No more the gallant northern sons
Spout forth their strings of Latin puns;
Nor course all languages to frame,
The quibble suited to their name;

R r

As when their ancestors be-vers'd,
 That glorious STUART, JAMES the FIRST,
 But with that elocution's GRACE,
 That oratorical flashy lace,
 Which the fam'd Irish TOMMY PUFF,
 Would sow on sentimental stuff;
 'Twang with a sweet pronunciation,
 The flow'rs of bold imagination.
 MACPHERSON leads the flaming van,
 LAIRD of the new Fingalian clan;
 While JACKIEY HOME brings up the rear,
 With new-got pension neat and clear
 Three hundred Englisch pounds a-year.
 While sister PEG, our ancient Friend,
 Sends MACS and DONALDS without end;
 To GEORGE awhile they tune their lays,
 Then all their choral voices raise,
 'To heap their panegyric wit on
 Th' illustrious chief, and our NORTH BRITON.

Hail to the THANE, whose patriot skill
 Can break all nations to his will;
 Master of sciences and arts,
 MÆCENAS to all men of parts;
 Whose fust'ring hand, and ready wit,
 Shall find us all in places fit;
 So shall thy friends no longer roam,
 But change to meet a settled home.
 Hail mighty THANE, for SCOTLAND born,
 To fill her almost empty horn:
 Hail to thy ancient glorious stem,
 NOT THEY from kings, BUT KINGS FROM THEM.

THE CIT'S COUNTRY BOX, 1757.

"Vos sapere et solos aio bene vivere, quorum,
 "Conspicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis."
 HOR.

THE wealthy Cit, grown old in trade,
 Now wishes for the rural shade,
 And buckles to his one-horse chair,
 Old Dobbin, or the founder'd mare;
 While wedg'd in closely by his side,
 Sits Madam, his unwieldy bride,
 With Jacky on a stool before 'em,
 And out they jog in due decorum.
 Scarce past the turnpike half a mile,
 How all the country seems to smile!
 And as they slowly jog together,
 The Cit commends the road and weather;
 While madam doats upon the trees,
 And longs for ev'ry house she sees,
 Admires its views, its situation,
 And thus she opens her oration.

What signify the loads of wealth,
 Without that richest jewel, health?
 Excuse the fondness of a wife,
 Who doats upon your precious life!
 Such ceaseless toil, such constant care,
 Is more than human strength can bear.
 One may observe it in your face—
 Indeed, my dear, you break apace:
 And nothing can your health repair,
 But exercise and country air,
 Sir Traffic has a house, you know,
 About a mile from Cheney-Row;

He's a good man, indeed 'tis true,
 But not so warm, my dear, as you:
 And folks are always apt to sneer—
 One would not be out-done my dear!

Sir Traffic's name so well apply'd
 Awak'd his brother merchant's pride;
 And Thrifty, who had all his life
 Paid utmost deference to his wife,
 Confess'd her arguments had reason,
 And by th' approaching summer season,
 Draws a few hundreds from the stocks,
 And purchases his country box.

Some three or four mile out of town,
 (An hour's ride will bring you down,)
 He fixes on his choice abode,
 Not half a furlong from the road:
 And so convenient does it lay,
 The stages pass it ev'ry day:
 And then so snug, so mighty pretty,
 To have an house so near the city!
 Take but your places at the Boar
 You're set down at the very door.

Well then, suppose them fix'd at last,
 White-washing, painting, scrubbing past,
 Hugging themselves in ease and clover,
 With all the fufs of moving over;
 Lo, a new heap of whims are bred!
 And wanton in my lady's head.

Well to be sure, it must be own'd,
 It is a charming spot of ground;
 So sweet a distance for a ride,
 And all about so countrified!
 'Twould come but to a trifling price
 To make it quite a paradise;
 I cannot bear those nasty rails,
 Those ugly broken mouldy pales:
 Suppose, my dear, instead of these,
 We build a railing, all Chinese.

Although one hates to be expos'd;
 'Tis dismal to be thus enclos'd;
 One hardly any object sees—
 I wish you'd fell those odious trees.
 Objects continual passing by
 Were something to amuse the eye,
 But to be pent within the walls—
 One might as well be at St. Paul's.
 Our house, beholders would adore,
 Was there a level lawn before,
 Nothing its views to incommode,
 But quite laid open to the road;
 While ev'ry trav'ler in amaze,
 Should on our little mansion gaze,
 And pointing to the choice retreat,
 Cry, that's Sir Thrifty's country seat.
 No doubt her arguments prevail,
 For madam's TASTE can never fail.

Blest age! when all men may procure,
 The title of a connoisseur;
 When noble and ignoble herd,
 Are govern'd by a single word;
 Though, like the royal German dames,
 It bears an hundred Christian names;
 As genius, fancy, judgment, goût,
 Whim, caprice, je-ne-scai-quoi, virtù
 Which appellations all describe
 TASTE, and the modern tasteful tribe.

Now bricklay'rs, carpenters, and joiners,
 With Chinese artists, and designers,
 Produce their schemes of alteration,
 To work this wond'rous reformation.
 The useful dome, which secret stood,
 Embosom'd in the yew-tree's wood,
 The trav'ler with amazement sees
 A temple, Gothic, or Chinese,
 With many a bell, and tawdry rag on,
 And crested with a sprawling dragon;
 A wooden arch is bent astride
 A ditch of water, four foot wide,
 With angles, curves, and zigzag lines,
 From halfpenny's exact designs.
 In front, a level lawn is seen,
 Without a shrub upon the green,
 Where taste would want its first great law,
 But for the skulking, fly ba-ba,
 By whose miraculous assistance,
 You gain a prospect two fields distance.
 And now from Hyde-Park corner come
 The gods of Athens, and of Rome.
 Here squabby Cupids take their places,
 With Venus, and the clumsy graces:
 Apollo there, with aim so clever,
 Stretches his leaden bow for ever;
 And there without the pow'r to fly,
 Stands fix'd a tip-toe Mercury.

The villa thus completely grac'd,
 All own that Thrifty has a taste;
 And madam's female friends, and cousins,
 With common-council-men, by dozens,
 Flock every Sunday to the seat,
 To stare about them, and to eat.

GENIUS, ENVY, AND TIME.

A FABLE.

Addressed to William Hogarth, Esq.

In all professionary skill,
 There never was, nor ever will
 Be excellence, or exhibition,
 But fools are up in opposition:
 Each letter'd, grave, pedantic dunce
 Wakes from his lethargy at once,
 Shrugs, shakes his head, and rubs his eyes;
 And, being dull, looks wond'rous wise,
 With solemn phiz, and critic scowl,
 The wisdom of his brother owl.

MODERNS! He hates the very name;
 Your ancients have prescriptive claim:—
 But let a century be past,
 And we have taste and wit at last;
 For at that period moderns too
 Just turn the corner of virtu.
 But merit now has little claim
 'To any meed of present fame,
 For 'tis not worth that get you friends,
 'Tis excellence that most offends.
 If, Proteus-like, a GARRICK's art,
 Shows taste and skill in every part;
 If, ever just to nature's plan,
 He is in all the very man,
 E'en here shall envy take her aim,
 ——— write and ——— blame.

The JEALOUS WIFE, though chaste writ,
 With no parade of frippery wit,
 Shall set a scribbling, all at once,
 Both giant wit, and pigmy dunce;
 While Critical Reviewers write,
 Who show their teeth before they bite,
 And sacrifice each reputation,
 From wanton false imagination.
 These observations, rather stale,
 May borrow spirit from a tale.

GENIUS, a bustling lad of parts,
 Who all things did by fits and starts,
 Nothing above him or below him,
 Who'd make a riot, or a poem,
 From eccentricity of thought,
 Not always do the thing he ought;
 But was it once his own election,
 Would bring all matters to perfection;
 Would act, design, engrave, write, paint,
 But neither from the least constraint,
 Who hated all pedantic schools,
 And scorn'd the gloss of knowing fools,
 That hold perfection all in all,
 Yet treat it as mechanical,
 And give the same sufficient rule
 To make a poem, as a stool—
 From the first spring time of his youth,
 Was downright worshipper of truth;
 And with a free and liberal spirit,
 His courtship paid to lady MERIT.

ENVY, a squint-ey'd, mere old maid,
 Well known among the scribbling trade;
 A hag, so very, very thin,
 Her bones peep'd through her bladder-skin;
 Who could not for her soul abide
 That folks should praise where she must chide,
 Follow'd the youth where'er he went,
 To mar each good and brave intent;
 Would lies, and plots, and mischief hatch,
 To ruin HIM and spoil the match.
 Honour she held at bold defiance,
 Talk'd much of façion, gang, alliance,
 As if the réal sons of taste
 Had clubb'd to lay a DESERT waste.

In short, wherever GENIUS came,
 You'd find this antiquated dame;
 Whate'er he did, where'er he went,
 She follow'd only to torment;
 Call'd MERIT by a thousand names,
 Which decency or truth disclaims,
 While all her business, toil, and care,
 Was to depreciate, lie, compare,
 To pull the modest maiden down,
 And blast her fame to all the town.

The youth, inflam'd with conscious pride,
 To Prince POSTERITY apply'd,
 Who gave his answer thus in rhyme,
 By his chief minister, Old TIME.

"Repine not at what pedants say,
 "We'll bring thee forward on the way;
 "If wither'd ENVY strive to hurt
 "With lies, with impudence and dirt,
 "You only pay a common tax
 "Which fool, and knave, and dunce exacts.
 "Be this thy comfort, this thy joy,
 "Thy strength is in its prime, my boy,

R r ij

" And ev'ry year thy vigour grows,
 " Impairs the credit of my foes
 " ENVY shall sink, and be no more
 " Than what her NAIADS were before;
 " Mere excremental maggots, bred,
 " In poet's topsy-turvy head,
 " Born like a momentary fly,
 " To flutter, buzz about, and die.
 " Yet, GENIUS, mark what I presage,
 " Who look through every distant age:
 " MERIT shall bless thee with her charms,
 " FAME lift thy offspring in her arms,
 " And stamp eternity of grace
 " On all thy numerous various race.
 " ROUBILLIAC, WILTON, names as high
 " As Phidias of antiquity,
 " Shall strength, expression, manner give,
 " And make e'en marble breathe and live;
 " While SIGISMUNDA's deep distress,
 " Which looks the soul of wretchedness,
 " When I, with slow and soft'ning pen,
 " Have gone o'er all the tints agen,
 " Shall urge a bold and proper claim
 " To level half the ancient fame;
 " While future ages yet unknown
 " With critic air shall proudly own
 " Thy HOGARTH first of every clime
 " For humour keen, or strong sublime,
 " And hail him from his fire and spirit,
 " The child of GENIUS and of MERIT."

THE HARE AND TORTOISE. 1757.

A FABLE.

GENIUS, blest term, of meaning wide,
 For sure no term so misapply'd,
 How many bear thy sacred name,
 That never felt a real flame!
 Proud of the specious appellation,
 Thus fools have christen'd inclination.

But yet suppose a genius true,
Exempli gratia, me or you;
 Whate'er he tries with due attention,
 Rarely escapes his apprehension;
 Surmounting ev'ry opposition,
 You'd swear he learnt by intuition,
 Should he rely alone on parts,
 And study therefore but by starts,
 Sure of success whene'er he tries,
 Should he forego the means to rise?

Suppose your watch a Graham make,
 Gold, if you will, for value's sake;
 Its springs within in order due
 No watch, when going, goes so true;
 If ne'er wound up with proper care,
 What service is it in the wear?

Some genial spark of Phœbus' rays,
 Perhaps within your bosom plays:
 O how the purer rays aspire,
 If application fans the fire
 Without it genius vainly tries,
 How e'er sometimes it seems to rise:
 Nay application will prevail
 When braggart parts and genius fail;

And now to lay my proof before ye,
 I here present you with a story.

In days of yore, when time was young,
 When birds convers'd as well as fung,
 When use of speech was not confin'd,
 Merely to brutes of human kind,
 A forward hare, of swiftness vain,
 The genius of the neighb'ring plain,
 Would oft deride the drudging crowd:
 For geniuses are ever proud.
 He'd boast, his flight 'twere vain to follow,
 For dog and horse he'd beat them hollow,
 Nay, if he put forth all his strength,
 Outstrip his brethren half a length.

A tortoise heard his vain oration,
 And vented thus his indignation.
 Oh pufs, it bodes thee dire disgrace,
 When I defy thee to the race.
 Come, 'tis a match, nay, no denial,
 I lay my shell upon the trial.

'Twas done and gone, all fair, a bet,
 Judges prepar'd, and distance set.

The scamp'ring hare outstript the wind,
 The creeping tortoise lagg'd behind,
 And scarce had pass'd a single pole,
 When pufs had almost reach'd the goal.
 Friend tortoise, quoth the jeering hare,
 Your burden's more than you can bear,
 To help your speed, it were as well
 That I should ease you of your shell:
 Jog on a little faster pr'ythee,
 I'll take a nap, and then be with thee.
 So said, so done, and safely sure,
 For say, what conquest more secure?
 Whene'er he walk'd (that's all that's in it)
 He could o'ertake him in a minute.

The tortoise heard his taunting jeer,
 But still resolv'd to persevere,
 Still draw'd along, as who should say,
 I'll win, like Fabius, by delay;
 On to the goal securely crept,
 While pufs unknowing soundly slept.

The bets were won, the hare awake,
 When thus the victor tortoise spake.

Pufs, though I own thy quicker parts,
 Things are not always done by starts,
 You may deride my awkward pace,
 But slow and steady wins the race.

THE SATYR AND PEDLAR. 1757.

WORDS are, so Wollaston defines,
 Of our ideas merely signs,
 Which have a pow'r at will to vary,
 As being vague and arbitrary.
 Now damn'd for instance—all agree,
Damn'd 's the superlative degree;
 Means that alone, and nothing more,
 However taken heretofore;
Damn'd is a word can't stand alone,
 Which has no meaning of its own,
 But signifies or bad or good,
 Just as its neighbour's understood.
 Examples we may find enough.
Damn'd high, damn'd low, damn'd fine, damn'd stiff.

So fares it too with its relation,
 I mean its substantive, damnation.
 The wit with metaphors makes bold,
 And tells you he's damnation cold;
 Perhaps, that metaphor forgot,
 The self-same wit's damnation hot.
 And here a fable I remember—
 Once in the middle of December,
 When ev'ry mead in snow is lost,
 And ev'ry river bound with frost,
 When families get all together,
 And feelingly talk o'er the weather;
 When—pox on the descriptive rhyme—
 In short it was the winter time.
 It was a pedlar's happy lot,
 To fall into a satyr's cot:
 Shivering with cold, and almost froze,
 With pearly drop upon his nose,
 His fingers' ends all pinch'd to death.
 He blew upon them with his breath.
 "Friend, quoth the satyr, what intends
 That blowing on thy fingers' ends?"
 "It is to warm them thus I blow,
 For they are froze as cold as snow."
 "And so inclement has it been I'm like a cake of ice within."
 Come, quoth the satyr, comfort, man!
 I'll cheer thy inside, if I can;
 You're welcome in my homely cottage
 To a warm fire, and mugs of portage.

This said, the satyr, nothing loth,
 A bowl prepar'd of sav'ry broth,
 Which with delight the pedlar view'd,
 As smoking on the board it stood.
 But, though the very steam arose
 With grateful odour to his nose,
 One single sip he ventur'd not,
 The gruel was so wond'rous hot.
 What can be done?—with gentle puff
 He blows it, till it's cool enough.

Why, how now, pedlar, what's the matter?
 Still at thy blowing! quoth the satyr.
 I blow to cool it, cries the clown,
 That I may get the liquor down:
 For though I grant, you've made it well,
 You've boil'd it, sir, as hot as hell.

Then raising high his cloven stump,
 The satyr smote him on the rump.
 "Begone, thou double knave, or fool,
 With the same breath to warm and cool:
 Friendship with such I never hold
 "Who're so damn'd hot, and so damn'd cold."

THE NIGHTINGALE, THE OWL, AND THE CUCKOW.

A FABLE.

Addressed to David Garrick, Esq. on the report of his retiring from the Stage, Dec. 1760.

CRITICS, who like the scarecrows stand
 Upon the poet's common land,
 And with severity of sense,
 Drive all imagination thence,
 Say that in truth lies all sublime,
 Whether you write in prose or rhyme.

And yet the truth may lose its grace,
 If blurted to a person's face;
 Especially if what you speak
 Should crimson o'er the glowing cheek:
 For when you throw that flatter o'er him,
 And tumble out your praise before him,
 However just the application,
 It looks a squint at adulation.

I would be honest and sincere,
 But not a flatterer, or severe.
 Need I be surly, rough, uncouth,
 That folks may think I love the truth?
 And she, good dame, with beauty's queen,
 Was not at all times naked seen:
 For every boy, with Prior, knows,
 By accident she lost her clothes,
 When falsehood stole them to disguise
 Her misbegotten brood of lies.
 Why should the prudish goddess dwell
 Down at the bottom of a well,
 But that she is in pious fright,
 Lest, rising up to mortal sight,
 The modest world should flee and flout her.
 With not a rag of clothes about her?
 Yet she might wear a proper dress
 And keep her essence ne'ertheless,
 So Delia's bosom still will rise,
 And fascinate her lover's eyes,
 Though round her ivory neck she draws,
 The decent shade of specious gauze,
 I hear it buzz'd about the table,
 What can this lead to?—Sirs,

A FABLE.

WHEN birds allow'd the eagle's sway,
 Ere eagles turn'd to fowls of prey,
 His royal majesty of air
 Took music underneath his care;
 And, for his queen and court's delight,
 Commanded concerts ev'ry night.
 Here every bird of parts might enter,
 The nightingale was made precentor;
 Under whose care and just direction,
 Merit was sure to meet protection.
 The lark, the blackbird, and the robin
 This concert always bore a bob in:
 The best performers all were in it,
 The thrush, canary-bird, and linnet.

But birds, alas! are apt to aim
 At things, to which they've smallest claim.
 The staring owl, with hideous hoot,
 Offer'd his service for a flute.

The cuckow needs would join the band;
 "The thrush is but a paucity hand:
 "And I can best supply that place,
 "For I've a shake, a swell, a grace."

The manager their suit prefer'd:
 Both tun'd their pipes, and both were heard;
 Yet each their several praises miss'd,
 For both were heard, and both were hiss'd.

The cuckow hence, with rancour stirr'd,
 (A kind of periodic bird,
 Of nasty hue, and body scabby,
 No would-be-play-wright half so shabby)

R r iij

Reviles, abuses, and defames,
Screams from a branch, and calls hard names,
And strikes at nightingale or lark,
Like Lisbon ruffians, in the dark.

The owl harangues the gaping throng
On poor's, and excellence of song,
"The blackbird's note has lost its force;
"The nightingale is downright hoarse;
"The linnet's harsh; the robin shrill;
"—The sparrow has prodigious skill!"

At length they had what they desir'd:
The skilful nightingale retir'd.
When folly came, with wild uproar,
And harmony was heard no more.

A TALE.

VENUS, of laughter queen and love,
The greatest demirep above,
Who scorn'd restriction, hated custom,
Knew her own sex too well to trust 'em,
Proceeded on the noble plan,
At any rate, to have her man;
Look'd on decorum, as mere trash,
And liv'd like  and ***,
From Paphos, where they her revere
As much as we do Cælia here,
Or from Cythera, where her altars
Are deck'd with daggers, true-love halters,
Garters yclept, and other trophies,
Which prove that man in love an oaf is,
According to appointment, came
To see CÆCILIA, tuneful dame,
Whose praise by Dryden's ode is grown
Bright and immortal as his own;
And who hath been for many years
The chief directress of the spheres.

Thomas, who rode behind the car,
And for a flambeau held a star,
Who, in the honest way of trade,
Hath forg'd more horns, and cuckolds made,
Than Vulcan and his brawny dolts
Ever for Jove forg'd thunderbolts,
Slipt gently down, and ran before 'em,
Ringing the bell with due decorum.

But, truth to say, I cannot tell
Whether it knocker was or bell,
(This for vertu an anecdote is),
Which us'd to give CÆCILIA notice,
When any lady of the sky
Was come to bear her company.
But this I'm sure, be which it will,
Thomas perform'd his part with skill.

Methinks I hear the reader cry—
His part with skill? why, you or I,
Or any body else, as well
As Thomas, sure, could ring a bell,
Nor did I ever hear before
Of skill in knocking at a door.

Poor low-liv'd creature! I suppose,
Nay, and am sure, you're one of those
Who, at what door so'er they be,
Will always knock in the same key.
Thinking that bell and knocker too
Were found out nothing else to do,

But to inform the house, no doubt,
That there was somebody without,
Who, if they might such favour win,
Would rather choose to be within.

But had our servants no more sense,
Lord! what must be the consequence?
Error would error still pursue,
And strife and anarchy ensue,
Puntilio from her altar hurl'd,
Whence she declares unto the world
Whate'er by fancy is decreed,
Through all her niceties must bleed.

For if there was not to be found
Some wholesome difference of sound,
But the same rap foretold th' approach
Of him who walk'd, or rode in coach,
A poor relation now and then,
Might to my lord admittance gain,
When his good lordship hop'd to see
Some rascal of his own degree;
And, what is more unhappy still,
The stupid wretch who brings a bill,
Might pass through all the motley tribe,
As free as one, who brings a bribe.

My lady too might pique her grace
With carriage stiff, and formal face,
Which, she deceiv'd, had taken care
For some inferior to prepare;
Or might some wretch from Lombard-street
With greater ease and freedom meet,
Than sense of honour will admit
Between my lady and a cit.

Those evils wisely to prevent,
And root out care and discontent,
Ev'ry gay smart, who rides behind,
With rose and bag in taste refin'd,
Must music fully understand,
Have a nice ear and skilful hand;
At ev'ry turn be always found
A perfect connoisseur in sound;
Through all the gamut skilful fly,
Varying his notes, now low, now high,
According as he shifts his place;
Now hoarsely grumbling in the base,
Now turning tenor, and again
To treble raising his shrill strain;
So to declare, where'er he be,
His master's fortune and degree,
By the distinguishing address,
Which he'll upon the door express.

Thomas, whom I have nam'd before
As ringing at CÆCILIA's door,
Was perfect master of this art,
And vers'd alike in ev'ry part:
So that Cæcilia knew, before
Her footman came unto the door,
And in due form had told her so,
That Madam VENUS was below.

The doors immediate open flew,
The GODDESS, without more ado,
Displaying beauty's thousand airs,
Skim'd through the hall, and tripp'd up stairs.

CÆCILIA met her with a smile
Of great delight, when all the while,
If her false heart could have been seen,
She wish'd she had at Cyprus been.

But ladies, skill'd in forms and arts,
Don't in their faces wear their hearts,
And those above, like those below,
Deal frequently in outside show,
And always to keep up parade,
Have a smile by them ready made.

The forms, which ladies when they meet
Must for good manners' sake repeat,
As bumble servant, bowo d'you do,
And in return, pray how are you?
Enrich'd at ev'ry proper space,
With due integuments of lace,
As Madam, Grace, and Godship,
Which we for brevity shall skip,
Happily past, in elbow-chair
At length our ladies seated are.

Indiff'rent subjects first they choose,
And talk of weather and the news.
That done, they sit upon the state,
And snarl at the decrees of fate,
Invectives against Jove are hurl'd,
And they alone should rule the world.

Dull politics at length they quit,
And by ill-nature show their wit;
For hand in hand, too well we know,
These intimates are said to go,
So that where either doth preside
T' others' existence is implied.
The man of wit, so men decree,
Must without doubt ill-natur'd be;
And the ill-natur'd scarce forgets
To rank himself among the wits.

Malicious VENUS, who by rote
Had ev'ry little anecdote,
And most minutely could advance
Each interesting circumstance,
Which unto all intrigues related,
Since Jupiter the world created,
Display'd her eloquence with pride,
Hinted, observ'd, enlarg'd, applied;
And not the reader to detain
With things impertinent and vain,
She did, as ladies do on earth
Who cannot bear a rival's worth,
In such a way each tale rehearse
As good made bad, and bad made worse:

CÆCILIA too, with saint-like air,
But lately come from evening pray'r,
Who knew her duty, as a saint,
Always to pray, and not to faint,
And, rain or shine, her church ne'er mist,
Prude, devotee, and Methodist,
With equal zeal the cause promoted,
Misconstru'd things, and words misquoted,
Misrepresented, misapplied,
And, inspiration being her guide,
The very heart of man dissected,
And to his principles objected.
Thus, amongst us, the sanctified,
In all the spirituals of pride,
Whose honest consciences ne'er rested,
Till of carnalities divested,
They knew and felt themselves t' inherit
A double portion of the spirit:
Who from one church to th' other roam,
Whilst their poor children starve at home,

Confid'ring they may claim the care
Of Providence, who sent them there,
And therefore certainly is tied
To see their ev'ry want supplied;
Who unto preachers give away,
That which their creditors should pay,
And hold that chosen vessels must
Be generous before they're just,
And that their charity this way
Shall bind o'er Heaven their debts to pay,
And serve their temp'ral turn, no doubt,
Better than if they'd put it out,
Whilst nought hereafter can prevent,
Their sure reward of cent. per cent.
Who honest labour scorn, and say
None need to work who love to pray,
For Heaven will satisfy their cravings,
By sending of Elijah's ravens,
Or rain down, when their spirits fail,
A dish of manna, or a quail;
Who from Moorfields to Tottenham-Court
In furious fits of zeal resort,
Praise what they do not understand,
Turn up the eye, stretch out the hand,
Melt into tears, whilst ——— blows
The twang of nonsense through his nose;
Or ——— deals in speculation,
Or ——— hums his congregation,
Or ——— talks with the Lord of Hosts,
—— with pillars and with posts;
Who strictly watch, lest Satan should,
Roaring like lion for his food,
Ensnare their feet his fatal trap in,
And their poor souls be taken napping;
Who strictly fast, because they find,
The flesh still wars against the mind,
And flesh of saints, like sinner's, must
Be mortified, to keep down lust;
Who, four times in the year at least,
Join feast of love to love of feast,
Which, though the profligate and vain
In terms of blasphemy profane,
Yet all the ceremony here is,
Pure as the mysteries of Ceres;
Who, God's elect, with triumph feel
Within themselves salvation's seal,
And will not, must not, dare not doubt,
That Heav'n itself can't blot it out;
After they've done their holy labours,
Return to scandalize their neighbours,
And think they can't serve Heav'n so well,
As with its creatures filling hell:
So that, inflam'd with holy pride,
They save themselves, damn all beside.
For persons, who pretend to feel
The glowings of uncommon zeal,
Who others scorn, and seem to be
Righteous in very great degree,
Do, 'bove all others, take delight
To vent their spleen in tales of spite,
And think they raise their own renown
By pulling of a neighbour's down;
Still lying on with most success,
Because they charity profess,
And make the outside of religion,
Like Mahomet's inspiring pigeon,

To all their forgeries gain credit,
'Tis enough sure that ——— said it.

But what can all this rambling mean?
Was ever such an hodgepodge seen?

VENUS, CÆCILIA, saints, and whores,
Thomas, Vertù, bells, knockers, doors,
Lords, rogues, relations, ladies, cits,
Stars, flambeaux, thunderbolts, horns, wits,
Vulcan, and cuckold-maker, scandal,
Music, and footmen, ear of Handel,
Weather, news, envy, politics,
Intrigues, and women's thousand tricks,
Prudes, Methodists, and devotees,
Fasting, feasts, pray'rs, and charities,
Ceres, with her mysterious train,
———, ———, ———, and ———,
Flesh, spirit, love, hate, and religion,
A quail, a raven, and a pigeon,
All jumbled up in one large dish,
Red-herring, bread, fowl, flesh, and fish.

Where's the connection, where's the plan,
The devil sure is in the man.
All in an instant we are hutl'd
From place to place all round the world,
Yet find no reason for it—mum—
There, my good critic, lies the hum—
Well, but methinks, it would avail
To know the end of this—A TALE.

SHAKSPEARE.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. GARRYCK.

THANKS to much industry and pains,
Much twisting of the wit and brains,
Translation has unlock'd the store,
And spread abroad the Grecian lore,
While Sophocles his scenes are grown
E'en as familiar as our own.

No more shall taste presume to speak
From its enclosures in the Greek;
But, all its fences broken down,
Lie at the mercy of the town.

Critic, I hear thy torrent rage,
" 'Tis blasphemy against that stage,
" Which Æschylus his warmth design'd,
" Euripides his taste refin'd,
" And Sophocles his last direction,
" Stamp'd with the signet of perfection."

Perfection! 'tis a word ideal,
That bears about it nothing real:
For excellence was never hit
In the first essays of man's wit.
Shall ancient worth, or ancient fame
Preclude the moderns from their claim?
Must they be blockheads, dolts, and fools,
Who write not up to Grecian rules?
Who tread in buskins or in socks.
Must they be damn'd as heterodox,
Nor merit of good works prevail,
Except within the classic pale?
'Tis stuff that bears the name of knowledge,
Not current half a mile from college;
Where half their lectures yield no more
(Before I speak of times of yore)

Than just a niggard light; to mark
How much we all are in the dark:
As rushlights in a spacious room,
Just burn enough to form a gloom.

When Shakspeare leads the mind a dance,
From France to England, hence to France,
Talk not to me of time and place;
I own I'm happy in the chase.
Whether the drama's here or there,
'Tis nature, Shakspeare, every where.
The poet's fancy can create,
Contract, enlarge, annihilate,
Bring past and present close together,
In spite of distance, seas, or weather;
And shut up in a single action
What cost whole years in its transaction.
So, ladies at a play, or rout,
Can flirt the universe about,
Whose geographical account
Is drawn and pictured on the mount:
Yet, when they please, contract the plan,
And shut the world up in a fan.

True genius, like Armida's wand,
Can raise the spring from barren land.
While all the art of imitation,
Is pilf'ring from the first creation;
Transplanting flowers, with useless toil,
Which wither in a foreign soil.
As conscience often sets us right
By its interior active light,
Without th' assistance of the laws
To combat in the moral cause;
So genius, of itself discerning,
Without the mystic rules of learning,
Can, from its present intuition,
Strike at the truth of composition.

Yet those who breathe the classic vein,
Enlisted in the mimic train,
Who ride their steed with double bit,
Ne'er run away with by their wit,
Delighted with the pomp of rules,
The specious pedantry of schools,
(Which rules, like crutches, ne'er became
Of any use but to the lame,)
Pursue the method set before 'em;
Talk much of order, and decorum,
Of probability, of fiction,
Of manners, ornament, and diction,
And with a jargon of hard names,
(A privilege which dulness claims,
And merely us'd by way of fence,
To keep out plain and common sense),
Extol the wit of ancient days,
The simple fabric of their plays;
Then from the fable, all so chaste,
I rick'd up in ancient-modern taste,
So mighty gentle all the while,
In such a sweet descriptive style,
While chorus marks the servile mode
With fine reflection, in an ode,
Present you with a perfect piece,
Form'd on the model of old Greece.

Come, pr'ythee critic, set before us,
The use and office of a chorus.
What! silent! why then, I'll produce
Its services from ancient use.

'Tis to be ever on the stage,
Attendants upon grief or rage;
To be an arrant go-between;
Chief-mourner at each dismal scene;
Showing its sorrow, or delight,
By shifting dances, left and right,
Not much unlike our modern notions,
Adagio or Allegro motions;
To watch upon the deep distress,
And plaints of royal wretchedness;
And when, with tears, and execration,
They've pour'd out all their lamentation,
And wept whole cataracts from their eyes,
To call on rivers for supplies,
And with their bais, and bees, and bees,
To make a symphony of woes.

Doubtless the ancients want the art
To strike at once upon the heart:
Or why their prologues of a mile
In simple—call it—humble style,
In unimpassion'd phrase to say
“Fore the beginning of this play,
“I, hapless Polydore, was found
“By fishermen, or others drown'd!”
Or, “I, a gentleman, did wed,
“The lady I wou'd never bed,
“Great Agamemnon's royal daughter,
“Who's coming hither to draw water.”

Or need the chorus to reveal
Reflections, which the audience feel;
And jog them, lest attention sink,
To tell them how and what to think!

Oh, where's the bard, who at one view
Could look the whole creation through,
Who travers'd all the human heart,
Without recourse to Grecian art?
He scorn'd the modes of imitation,
Of altering, pilfering, and translation,
Nor painted horror, grief, or rage,
From models of a former age;
The bright original he took,
And tore the leaf from nature's book.
'Tis Shakspeare, thus, who stands alone—
—But why repeat what you have shown?
How true, how perfect, and how well,
The feelings of our hearts must tell.

AN EPISTLE TO C. CHURCHILL,

AUTHOR OF THE ROSCIAD.

Is at a tavern, where you'd wish to dine,
They cheat your palate with adulterate wine,
Would you, resolve me, critics, for you can,
Send for the master up, or chide the man?
The man no doubt a knavish business drives,
But tell me what's the master who connives?
Hence you'll infer, and sure the doctrine's true,
Which says, no quarter to a foul review.
It matters not who vends the nauseous fop,
Master or prentice; we detest the shop.

Critics of old, a manly liberal race,
Approv'd or censur'd with an open face:
Boldly pursu'd the free decisive task,
Nor flabb'd, conceal'd beneath a ruffian's mask.

To works not men, with honest warmth, severe,
Th' impartial judges laugh'd at hope or fear:
Theirs was the noble skill, with gen'rous aim,
To fan true genius to an active flame;
To bring forth merit in its strongest light,
Or damn the blockhead to his native night.
But, as all states are subject to decay,
The state of letters too will melt away,
Smit with the harlot charms of trilling sound,
Softness now wantons e'en on Roman ground;
Where Thebans, Spartans, fought their honour'd graves,
Behold a weak enervate race of slaves.
In classic lore, deep science, language dead,
Thou modern wittings are but scantily read,
Professors * fail not, who will loudly bawl
In praise of either, with the want of all:
Hail'd mighty critics to this present hour.
—The tribune's name surviv'd the tribune's
pow'r.

Now quack and critic differ but in name,
Empirics frontless both, they mean the same;
This raw in physic, that in letters fresh,
Both spring, like warts, excrecence from the flesh.
Half form'd, half bred in printer's hireling schools,
For all professions have their rogues and fools,
Though the pert witling, or the coward knave,
Casts no reflection on the wise or brave.

Yet, in these leaden times, this idle age,
When, blind with dulness, or as blind with rage,
Author 'gainst author rails with venom curst,
And happy he who calls out blockhead first;
From the low earth aspiring genius springs,
And sails triumphant, born on eagle wings.
No toothless spleen, no venom'd critic's aim,
Shall rob thee, Churchill, of thy proper fame;
While hitch'd for ever in thy nervous rhyme,
Fool lives, and shines out fool to latest time.

Pity perhaps might wish a harmless fool
To 'scape th' observance of the critic school;
But if low malice, leagu'd with folly, rise,
Arm'd with invectives, and hedg'd round with lies;

Should wakeful dulness, if she ever wake,
Write sleepy nonsense but for writing's sake,
And, stung with rage, and piously severe,
Wish bitter comforts to your dying ear;
If some small wit, some silk-lin'd verselman, rakes,
For quaint reflections in the putrid jakes,
Talents usurp'd demand a censor's rage,
A dunce is dunce proscib'd in ev'ry age
Courtier, physician, lawyer, parson, cit,
All, all are objects of theatric wit.
Are ye then, actors, privileg'd alone,
To make that weapon, ridicule, your own?
Professions bleed not from his just attack,
Who laughs at pedant, coxcomb, knave, or quack;

Fools on and off the stage are fools the same,
And every dunce is satire's lawful game.

* The author takes this opportunity, notwithstanding all insinuations to the contrary, to declare, that he has no particular aim at a gentleman, whose ability he sufficiently acknowledges.

Freely you thought, where thought has freest
room,

Why then apologize? for what? to whom?

Though Gray's-Inn wits with author squires
unite,

And self-made giants club their labour'd mite,
Though pointless satire make its weak escape,
In the dull babble of a mimic ape,
Boldly pursue where genius points the way,
Nor heed what monthly puny critics say.
Firm in thyself, with calm indifference smile,
When the wise vet'ran knows you by your style,
With critic scales weighs out the partial wit,
What I, or you, or he, or no one writ;
Denying thee thy just and proper worth,
But to give falsehood's spurious issue birth;
And all self-will'd with lawless hand to raise
Malicious slander on the base of praise.

Disgrace eternal wait the wretch's name
Who lives on credit of a borrow'd fame;
Who wears the trappings of another's wit,
Of fathers bantlings which he could not get!
But shrewd suspicion with her squinting eye,
To truth declar'd, prefers a whisper'd lie.
With greedy mind the proffer'd tale believes,
Relates her wishes, and with joy deceives.

The world, a pompous name, by custom due
To the small circle of a talking few,
With heart-felt glee th' injurious tale repeats,
And sends the whisper buzzing through the streets,
The prude demure, with sober faint-like air,
Pities her neighbour for she's wond'rous fair.
And when temptations lie before our feet,
Beauty is frail, and females indiscreet:
She hopes the nymph will every danger shun,
Yet prays devoutly—that the deed were done.
Mean time sits watching for the daily lie,
As spiders lurk to catch a simple fly.

Yet is not scandal to one sex confin'd,
Though men would fix it on the weaker kind.
Yet, this great lord, creation's master, man,
Will vent his malice where the blockhead can,
Imputing crimes, of which e'en thought is free,
For instance now, your Rosciad, all to me.

If partial friendship, in thy sterling lays,
Grows all too wanton in another's praise,
Critics, who judge by ways themselves have
known,
Shall swear the praise, the poem is my own;
For 'tis the method in these learned days
For wits to scribble first, and after praise.
Critics and Co. thus vend their wretched stuff,
And help out nonsense by a monthly puff,
Exalt to giant forms weak puny elves,
And descant sweetly on their own dear selves;
For works per month by learning's midwives paid,
Demand a puffing in the way of trade.

Reserv'd and cautious, with no partial aim
My muse e'er sought to blast another's fame.
With willing hand could twine a rival's bays,
From candour silent where she could not praise:
But if vile rancour, from (no matter who)
Astor or mimic, printer, or review;
Lies, oft o'erthrown, with ceaseless venom spread
Still hiss out scandal from their Hydra head;

If the dull malice boldly walk the town,
Patience herself would wrinkle to a frown.
Come then with justice draw the ready pen,
Give me the works, I would not know the men:
All in their turns might make reprisals too,
Had all the patience but to tread them through.
Come, to the utmost, probe the desperate wound,
Nor spare the knife where'er infection's found!

But, prudence, Churchill, or her sister, fear,
Whispers forbearance to my fright'ned ear,
Oh! then with me forsake the thorny road,
Lest we should flounder in some Fleet-Ditch ode,
And sunk for ever in the lazy flood
Weep with the Naiads heavy drops of mud.

Hail mighty ode! which like a picture frame,
Holds any portrait, and with any name;
Or, like your niches, planted thick and thin,
Will serve to cram the random hero in.
Hail mighty bard too—whatsoe'er thy name,
—— or Durfy, for it's all the same.

To brother bards shall equal praise belong,
For wit, for genius, comedy, and song?
No costly muse is thine, which freely rakes
With ease familiar in the well-known jakes,
Happy in skill to souse through foul and fair,
And toss the dung out with a lordly air.

So have I seen, amidst the grinning throng,
The sledge procession slowly dragg'd along,
Where the mock female shrew and hen-peck'd male

Scoop'd rich contents from either copious pail,
Call'd bursts of laughter from the roaring rout,
And dash'd and splash'd the filthy grains about.

Quit then, my friend, the muse's lov'd abode,
Alas! they lead not to preferment's road.
Be solemn, sad, put on the priestly frown,
Be dull! 'tis sacred, and becomes the gown.
Leave wit to others, do a Christian deed, [need.
Your foes shall thank you, for they know their

Broad is the path by learning's sons possess'd,
A thousand modern wits might walk abreast,
Did not each poet mourn his luckless doom,
Jostled by pedants out of elbow room.
I, who nor court their love, nor fear their hate,
Must mourn in silence o'er the muse's fate.

No right of common now on Pindus' hill,
While all our tenures are by critic's will;
Where, watchful guardians of the lady muse,
Dwell monstrous giants, dreadful tall REVIEWS,
Who, as we read in fam'd romance of yore,
Sound but a horn, press forward to the door:
But let some chief, some bold advent'rous knight,
Provoke these champions to an equal fight,
Strait into air to spaceless nothing fall
The castle, lions, giants, dwarf and all.

Ill it befits with undiscerning rage,
To censure giants in this polish'd age.
No lack of genius stains these happy times,
No want of learning, and no dearth of rhymes.
The see-saw muse that flows by measur'd laws,
In tuneful numbers, and affected pause,
With sound alone, sound's happy virtue fraught,
Which hates the trouble and expence of thought,
Once, every moon throughout the circling year,
With even cadence charms the critic ear.

While, dire promoter of poetic sin,
A magazine must hand the lady in. [well,
How moderns write, how nervous, strong and
The ANTI-ROSCIAD's decent muse does tell:
Who, while she strives to cleanse each actor hurt,
Daubs with her praise, and rubs him into dirt.

Sure never yet was happy era known
So gay, so wise, so tasteful as our own.
Our curious histories rise at once COMPLETE,
Yet still continued, as they're paid, per sheet.

See every science which the world would know,
Your magazines shall every month bestow,
Whose very titles fill the mind with awe,
Imperial, Christian, Royal, British, Law;
Their rich contents will every reader fit,
Statesman, Divine, Philosopher, and Wit; [once,
Compendious schemes: which teach all things at
And make a pedant coxcomb of a dunce.

But let not anger with such frenzy grow,
Drawcanfir like, to strike down friend and foe,
To real worth be homage duly paid,
But no allowance to the paltry trade.
My friends I name not (though I boast a few,
To me an honour, and to letters too)
Fain would I praise, but, when such things oppose,
My praise of course must make them —'s foes.

If manly JOHNSON, with satyric rage,
Lash the dull follies of a trifling age,
If his strong muse with genuine strength aspire,
Glow not the reader with the poet's fire?

HIS the true fire, where creep the witling fry
To warm themselves, and light their rushlights by.

What muse like GRAY's shall pleasing pensive
flow

Attemper'd sweetly to the rustic woe?
Or who like him shall sweep the Theban lyre,
And, as his master pour forth thoughts of fire?

E'en now to guard afflicted learning's cause,
To judge by reason's rules, and nature's laws,
Boast we true critics in their proper right,
While LOWTH and Learning, HURD and Taste
unite.

Hail sacred names!—Oh guard the muse's page,
Save your lov'd mistresses from a ruffian's rage;
See how she gasps and struggles hard for life,
Her wounds all bleeding from the butcher's knife:
Critics, like surgeons, blest with curious art,
Should mark each passage to the human heart,
But not, unskilful, yet with lordly air,
Read surgeon's lectures while they scalp and tear.

To names like these I pay the hearty vow,
Proud of their worth, and not ashamed to bow.
To these inscribe my rude, but honest lays,
And feel the pleasures of my conscious praise:
Not that I mean to court each letter'd name,
And poorly glimmer from reflected fame,
But that the muse, who owns no servile fear,
Is proud to pay her willing tribute here.

EPISTLE TO J. B. ESQ. 1757.

AGAIN I urge my old objection,
That modern rules obstruct perfection,
And the severity of taste
Has laid the walk of genius waste.

Fancy's a flight we deal no more in
Our authors creep instead of soaring,
And all the brave imagination
Is dwindled into declamation.

But still you cry in sober sadness,
"There is discretion ev'n in madness,"
A pithy sentence, which wants credit:
Because I find a poet said it;
Their verdict makes but small impression,
Who are known liars by profession.
Rise what exalted flights it will,
True genius will be genius still;
And say, that horse would you prefer,
Which wants a bridle or a spur?
The mettled steed may lose his tricks;
The jade grows callous to your kicks.

Had Shakspeare crept by modern rules,
We'd lost his witches, fairies, fools:
Instead of all that wild creation,
He'd form'd a regular plantation,
A garden trim, and all enclos'd,
In nicest symmetry dispos'd,
The hedges cut in proper order,
Nor e'en a branch beyond the border:
Now like a forest he appears,
The growth of twice three hundred years;
Where many a tree aspiring shrouds
Its airy summit in the clouds,
While round its root still love to twine
The ivy or wild eglantine.

"But Shakspeare's all creative fancy
Made others love extravagancy;
"While cloud-capt nonsense was their aim,
"Like Hurlothrumbo's mad Lord Flame."
True—who can stop dull imitators?
Those younger brothers of translators,
Those insects, which from genius rise,
And buzz about, in swarms, like flies?
Fashion, that sets the modes of dress,
Sheds too her influence o'er the press:
As formerly the sons of rhyme
Sought Shakspeare's fancy and sublime
By cool correctness now they hope
To emulate the praise of Pope.
But Pope and Shakspeare both disclaim
Those low retainers to their fame.

What task can dullness e'er effect
So easy, as to write correct?
Poets, 'tis said, are sure to split
By too much or too little wit;
So, to avoid th' extremes of either,
They miss their mark and follow neither;
They so exactly poise the scale
That neither measure will prevail,
And mediocrity the muse
Did never in her sons excuse,
'Tis true, their tawdry works are grac'd
With all the charms of modern taste,
And every senseless line is dress'd
In quaint expression's tinsel vest,
Say, did you never chance to meet
A monsieur barber in the street,
Whose ruffle, as it lank depends,
And dangles o'er his fingers ends,
His olive-tann'd complexion graces
With little dabs of Dresden laces,

While for the body Monsieur Puff,
Would think e'en dowlas fine enough?
So fares it with our men of rhymes,
Sweet tinklers of poetic chimes,
For lace, and fringe, and tawdry clothes,
Sure never yet were greater beaux;
But fairly strip them to the shirt,
They're all made up of rags and dirt.

And shall these wretches bards commence,
Without or spirit, taste, or sense?
And when they bring no other treasure,
Shall I admire them for their measure?
Or do I scorn the critic's rules
Because I will not learn of fools?
Although Longinus' full mouth'd prose
With all the force of genius glows;
Though Dionysius' learned taste
Is ever manly, just, and chaste,
Who, like a skillful wise physician,
Dissects each part of composition,
And shows how beauty strikes the soul
From a just compact of the whole;
Though judgment in Quintilian's page,
Holds forth her lamp for ev'ry age;
Yet Hephercritics I disdain,
A race of blockheads dull and vain,
And laugh at all those empty fools,
Who cramp a genius with dull rules,
And what their narrow science mocks
Damn with the name of heretodox.

These butchers of a poet's fame,
While they usurp the critic's name,
Cry—"This is taste—that's my opinion."
And poets dread their mock dominion.

So have you seen with dire affright,
The petty monarch of the night,
Seated aloft in elbow chair,
Command the prisoners to appear,
Harangue an hour on watchmen's praise,
And on the dire effect of frays;
Then cry, "You'll suffer for your daring,
"And d—n you, you shall pay for swearing."
Then turning, tell th' astonish'd ring,
I sit to represent the KING.

EPISTLE TO THE SAME. 1757.

HAS my good dame a wicked child?
It takes the gentle name of wild;
If chests he breaks, if locks he picks,
'Tis nothing more than youthful tricks:
The mother's fondness stamps it merit,
For vices are a sign of spirit.

Say, do the neighbours think the same
With the good old indulgent dame?
Cries gossip Prate, "I hear with grief
"My neighbour's son's an arrant thief.
"Nay, could you think it, I am told,
"He stole five guineas, all in gold,
"You know the youth was always wild—
"He got his father's maid with child;
"And robb'd his master, to defray
"The money he had lost at play.
"All means to save him must now fail.
"What can it end in?—In a jail."

Howe'er the dame doats o'er her youth,
My gossip says the very truth.

But as his vices love would hide,
Or torture them to virtue's side,
So friendship's glass deceives the eye,
(A glass too apt to magnify)
And makes you think at least you see
Some spark of genius, ev'n in me.
You say I should get fame: I doubt it:
Perhaps I am as well without it.
For what's the worth of empty praise?
What poet ever din'd on bays?
For though the laurel, rarest wonder!
May screen us from the stroke of thunder,
This mind I ever was, and am in,
It is no antidote to famine.
And poets live on slender fare,
Who, like cameleons, feed on air,
And starve, to gain an empty breath,
Which only serves them after death.

Grant I succeed, like Horace rise,
And strike my head against the skies;
Common experience daily shows,
That poets have a world of foes;
And we shall find in every town
Gossips enough to cry them down;
Who meet in pious conversation
T' anatomize a reputation,
With flippant tongue, and empty head,
Who talk of things they never read.

Their idle censures I despise;
Their niggard praises won't suffice.
Tempt me no more then to the crime
Of dabbling in the font of rhyme.
My muse has answer'd all her end
If her productions please a friend.
The world is burden'd with a store,
Why need I add one scribbler more?

TO * * *

About to publish a Volume of Miscellanies.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1755.

SINCE now, all scruples cast away,
Your works are rising into day,
Forgive, though I presume to send
This honest counsel of a friend.

Let not your verse, as verse now goes,
Be a strange kind of measur'd prose;
Nor let your prose, which sure is worse,
Want nought but measure to be verse.
Write from your own imagination,
Nor curb your muse by imitation:
For copies show, howe'er express'd,
A barren genius at the best.

— But imitation's all the mode—
Yet where one hits, ten miss the road.

The mimic bard with pleasure sees
Mat Prior's unaffected ease:
Assumes his style, affects his story.
Sets every circumstance before ye,
The day, the hour, the name, the dwelling,
And mars a curious tale in telling:
Observe how easy Prior flows,
Then runs his numbers down to prose.

Others have sought the filthy stews
To find a dirty slipshod muse.
Their groping genius, while it rakes
The bogs, the common sewers, and jakes,
Ordure and filth in rhyme exposes,
Disgustful to our eyes and noses;
With many a dash that must offend us,
And much

Hiatus non desendus.

O Swift! how wouldst thou blush to see,
Such are the bards who copy thee?

This, Milton for his plan will choose:
Wherein resembling Milton's muse?
Milton, like thunder, rolls along
In all the majesty of song;
While his low mimics meanly creep,
Not quite awake, nor quite asleep;
Or, if their thunder chance to roil,
'Tis thunder of the mustard bowl.
The stiff expression, phrases strange,
The epithet's preposterous change.
Forc'd numbers, rough and unpolite,
Such as the judging ear affright,
Stop in mid verse. Ye mimics vile!
Is't thus you copy Milton's style?
His faults religiously you trace,
But borrow not a single grace.

How few (say, whence can it proceed)?
Who copy Milton, e'er succeed!
But all their labours are in vain:
And wherefore so?—The reason's plain.
Take it for granted, 'tis by those
Milton's the model mostly chose,
Who can't write verse, and won't write prose.

Others, who aim at fancy, choose
To woo the gentle Spenser's muse.
This poet fixes for his theme
An allegory, or a dream;
Fiction and truth together joins
Through a long waste of flimsy lines;
Fondly believes his fancy glows,
And image upon image grows;
Thinks his strong muse takes wondrous flights,
Whene'er she sings of peerless wights,
Of dens, of palaces, spells and knights:
Till allegory, Spenser's veil
T' instruct and please in moral tale,
With him's no veil the truth to shroud,
But one impenetrable cloud.

Others, more daring, fix their hope
On rivalling the fame of Pope
Satire's the word against the times—
These catch the cadence of his rhymes,
And borne from earth by Pope's strong wings,
Their muse aspires, and boldly flings
Her dirt up in the face of kings
In these the spieen of Pope we find;
But where the greatness of his mind?
His numbers are their whole pretence,
Mere strangers to his manly sense.

Some few, the favourites of the muse,
Whom with her kindest eye she views;
Round whom Apollo's brightest rays
Shine forth with undiminish'd blaze;

Some few, my friend, have sweetly trod
In imitation's dangerous road,
Long as tobacco's mild perfume
Shall scent each happy curate's room,
Oft as in elbow-chair he smokes.
And quaffs his ale and cracks his jokes,
So long, O Brown, shall last thy praise,
Crown'd with tobacco-leaf for bays;
And whoso'er thy verse shall see,
Shall fill another pipe to thee.

TO GEORGE COLMAN, ESQ.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE.

Written January 1. 1761. From Tiffington in Derbyshire.

FRIENDSHIP with most is dead and cool,
A dull, inactive, stagnant pool;
Yours like the lively current flows,
And shares the pleasure it bestows.
If there is ought, whose lenient pow'r
Can sooth affliction's painful hour,
Sweeten the bitter cup of care,
And snatch the wretched from despair,
Superior to the sense of woes,
From friendship's source the balsam flows.
Rich then am I, possess'd of thine,
Who know that happy balsam mine.

In youth, from nature's genuine heat,
The souls congenial spring to meet,
And emulation's infant strife,
Cements the man in future life.
Oft too the mind well pleas'd surveys
Its progress from its childish days;
Sees how the current upwards ran,
And reads the child o'er in the man.
For men, in reason's sober eyes,
Are children, but of larger size,
Have still their idle hopes and fears,
And hobby-horse of riper years.

Whether a blessing or a curse,
My rattle is the love of verse.
Some fancied parts, and emulation,
Which still aspires to reputation,
Bade infant fancy plume her flight,
And held the laurel full to sight.
For vanity the poet's sin,
Had ta'en possession all within:
And he whose brain is verse-possess'd,
Is in himself as highly blest,
As he, whose lines and circles vie
With heav'n's direction of the sky.

Howe'er the river rolls its tides,
The cork upon the surface rides.
And on ink's ocean, lightly buoy'd,
The cork of vanity is Lloyd.
Let me too use the common claim
And souce at once upon my name,

* Isaac Hawkins Brown, Esq. author of a piece called the Pipe of Tobacco, a most excellent imitation of six different authors.

Which some have done with greater stress,
Who know me, and who love me less.

Poets are very harmless things,
Unless you tease one till it stings;
And when affronts are plainly meant,
We're bound in honour to resent:
And what tribunal will deny
An injur'd person to reply?

In these familiar emanations,
Which are but writing conversations,
Where thought appears in dishabille,
And fancy does just what she will,
The fourest critic would excuse
The vagrant fallies of the muse:
Which lady, for Apollo's blessing,
Has still attended our caressing,
As many children round her feet
As maggots in a Cheshire cheese,
Which I maintain at vast expence,
Of pen and paper, time and sense:
And surely 'twas no small miscarriage
When first I enter'd into marriage.
The poet's title which I bear,
With some strange castles in the air,
Was all my portion with the fair.

However narrowly I look,
In Phœbus's valorem book,
I cannot from inquiry find
Poets had much to leave behind.
They had a copyhold estate
In lands which they themselves create,
A foolish title to a fountain,
A right of common in a mountain,
And yet they liv'd amongst the great,
More than their brethren do of late;
Invited out at feasts to dine,
Eat as they pleas'd, and drank their wine;
Nor is it any where set down
They tip the servants half-a-crown,
But pass'd amid the waiting throng
And pay'd the porter with a song;
As once, a wag, in modern days,
When all are in these bribing ways,
His shillings to dispense unable,
Scrap'd half the fruit from off the table,
And walking gravely through the crowd,
Which stood obsequiously, and bow'd,
To keep the fashion up of tipping,
Dropt in each hand a golden pippin.

But there's a difference indeed
'Twixt ancient bards and modern breed.
Though poet known, in Roman days,
Fearless he walk'd the public ways,
Nor ever knew that sacred name
Contemptuous smile, or painful shame:
While with a foolish face of praise,
The folks would stop to gape and gaze,
And half untold the story leave,
Pulling their neighbour by the sleeve,
While th' index of the finger shows,
—There—yonder's Horace—there he goes.

This finger, I allow it true,
Points at us modern poets too;
But 'tis by way of wit and joke,
To laugh, or as the phrase is, smoke,

Yet there are those, who're fond of wit,
Although they never us'd it yet,
Who wits and wittings entertain;
Of taste, virtù, and judgment vain,
And dinner, grace, and grace-cup done,
Expect a wond'rous deal of fun:

"Yes—He at bottom—don't you know him?"

"That's he that wrote the last new poem.

"His humour's exquisitely high,

"You'll hear him open by and by."

The man in print and conversation
Have often very small relation;
And he, whose humour hits the town,
When copied fairly, and set down,
In public company may pass,
For little better than an ass.
Perhaps the fault is on his side,
Springs it from modesty, or pride,
These qualities ashamed to own,
For which he's happy to be known;
Or that his nature's strange and shy,
And diffident, he knows not why;
Or from a prudent kind of fear,
As knowing that the world's severe,
He wou'd not suffer to escape
Familiar wit in easy shape:
Lest gaping fools, and vile repeaters,
Should catch her up, and spoil her features,
And, for the child's unlucky maim,
The faultless parent come to shame.

Well, but methinks I hear you say,

"Write then, my friend!"—Write what?—"a play.

"The theatres are open yet,
"The market for all sterling wit;
"Try the strong efforts of your pen,
"And draw the characters of men;
"Or bid the bursting tear to flow,
"Obedient to the fabled woe;
"With tragedy's severest art,
"Anatomize the human heart,
"And, that you may be understood,
"Bid nature speak, as nature shou'd."

That talent, George, though yet untried,
Perhaps my genius has denied;
While you, my friend, are sure to please
With all the pow'rs of comic ease.

Authors, like maids at fifteen years,
Are full of wishes, full of fears.
One might by pleasant thoughts be led,
To lose a trifling maiden-head;
But 'tis a terrible vexation
To give up with it reputation.
And he, who has with plays to do,
Has got the devil to go through.
Critics have reason for their rules,
I dread the censure of your fools.
For tell me, and consult your pride,
(Set Garrick for a while aside)
How cou'd you, George, with patience bear,
The critic prosing in the play'r?

Some of that calling have I known,
Who held no judgment like their own;
And yet their reasons fairly scan,
And separate the wheat and bran;

You'd be amaz'd indeed to find
What little wheat is left behind.
For, after all their mighty rout
Of chatt'ring round and round about,
'Tis but a kind of clock-work talking,
Like crossing on the stage, and walking.

The form of this tribunal past,
The play receiv'd, the parts all cast,
Each actor has his own objections,
Each character new imperfections:
The man is drawn too coarse and rough,
The lady has not smut enough.
It wants a touch of Cibber's ease,
A higher kind of talk to please;
Such as your titled folks would choose,
And lords and ladyships might use;
Which style, whoever would succeed in,
Must have small wit, and much good breeding.
If this is dialogue—ma foi,
Sweet Sir, say I, pardonnez moi!

As long as life and business last,
The actors have their several cast,
A walk where each his talent shows,
Queens, nurses, tyrants, lovers, beaux;
Suppose you've found a girl of merit,
Would show your part in all its spirit,
Take the whole meaning in the scope,
Some little lively thing, like Pope,
You rob some others of a feather
They've worn for thirty years together.

But grant the cast is as you like
To actors which you think will strike.
To-morrow then—(but as you know
I've ne'er a comedy to show,
Let me a while in conversation
Make free with yours for application)
The arrow's flight can't be prevented—
To-morrow then will be presented
The JEALOUS WIFE! To-morrow? Right.
How do you sleep, my friend, to-night?
Have you no pit-pat hopes and fears,
Roast beef, and catcalls in your ears?
Mab's wheels a-cross your temples creep,
You toils and tumble in your sleep,
And cry aloud, with rage and spleen,
"That fellow murders all my scene."

To-morrow comes. I know your merit,
And see the piece's fire and spirit;
Yet friendship's zeal is ever hearty,
And dreads the efforts of a party.

The coach below, the clock gone five,
Now to the theatre we drive:
Peeping the curtain's eyelet through,
Behold the house in dreadful view!
Observe how close the critics sit,
And not one bonnet in the pit.
With horror hear the galleries ring,
Nofy! Black Jock! God save the King!
Sticks clatter, catcalls scream, Encore!
Cocks crow, pit hisses, galleries roar:
E'en cha' some oranges is found
This night to have a dreadful sound;
Till, decent fables on his back,
(Your prologuizers all wear black)
The prologue comes; and, if it's mine,
It's very good, and very fine;

If not, I take a pinch of snuff,
And wonder where you got such stuff.

That done, a-gape the critics sit,
Expectant of the comic wit.
The fiddlers play again pell-mell:
—But hilt!—the prompter rings his bell.
—Down there! hats off!—the curtain draws!
What follows is—the just applause.

TWO ODES *.

ΦΩΝΑΝΤΑ ΣΥΝΕΤΟΙΣΙΝ. ΕΣ
ΔΕ ΤΟ ΠΑΝ, ΕΡΜΗΝΕΩΝ
ΧΑΤΙΖΕΙ. PINDAR, Olymp. II.

ODE I.

I. 1.

DAUGHTER of chaos and old night,
Cimmerian muse, all hail!
That wrapt in never-twinkling gloom canst write,
And shadowest meaning with thy dusky veil!
What poet sings, and strikes the strings?
It was the mighty Theban spoke,
He from the ever-living lyre
With magic hand elicits fire.
Heard ye the din of modern rhymers bray?
It was cool M—n, or warm G—y,
Involv'd in tenfold smoke.

I. 2.

The shallow sop in antic vest,
Tir'd of the beaten road,
Proud to be singly drest,
Changes, with every changing moon, the mode.
Say, shall not then the heav'n-born muses too
Variety pursue?
Shall not applauding critics hail the vogue?
Whether the muse the style of Cambria's sons,
Or the rude gabble of the Huns,
Or the broader dialect
Of Caledonia she affect,
Or take, Hibernia, thy still ranker brogue?

I. 3.

On this terrestrial ball
The tyrant fashion governs all.
She, fickle goddess, whom, in days of yore,
The ideot Moria, on the banks of Seine,
Unto an antic fool, hight Andrew, bore:
Long she paid him with disdain,
And long his pangs in silence he conceal'd:
At length, in happy hour, his love-sick pain
On thy blest calends, April, he reveal'd.
From their embraces sprung,
Ever changing, ever ranging,
Fashion, goddess ever young.

II. 1.

Perch'd on the dubious height, she loves to ride
Upon a weather-cock astride.

* I take the liberty of inserting the two following odes, though I cannot, with strict propriety, print them as my own composition. The truth is, they were written in concert with a friend, to whose labours I am always happy to add my own; I mean the author of the Jealous Wife.

Each blast that blows, around she goes,
 While nodding o'er her crest,
 Emblem of her magic pow'r,
 The lightameleon stands confest,
 Changing it's hues a thousand times an hour.
 And in a vest is she array'd,
 Of many a dancing moon-beam made,
 Nor zoneless is her waist:
 But fair and beautiful I ween,
 As the cestus-cinctur'd queen,
 Is with the rainbow's shadowy girdle brac'd.

II. 2.

She bids pursue the fav'rite road
 Of lofty cloud-capt ode.
 Meantime each bard, with eager speed,
 Vaults on the Pegasean steed:
 Yet not that Pegasus of yore
 Which th' illustrious Pindar bore,
 But one of nobler breed;
 High blood and youth his lusty veins inspire:
 From Tottipontimoy he came;
 Who knows not, Tottipontimoy, thy name?
 The bloody-shoulder'd Arab was his sire;
 * His White-nose. He on fam'd Doncastria's plains
 Resign'd his fatal breath:
 In vain for life the struggling courser strains.
 Ah! who can run the race with death?
 The tyrant's speed, or man, or steed,
 Strives all in vain to fly.
 He leads the chase, he wins the race,
 We stumble, fall, and die.

II. 3.

Third from White-nose springs
 Pegasus with eagle wings:
 Light o'er the plain, as dancing cork,
 With many a bound he beats the ground,
 While all the turf with acclamation rings:
 He won Northampton, Lincoln, Oxford, York:
 He too Newmarket won:
 There Granta's son
 Seiz'd on the steed,
 And thence him led (so fate decreed)
 To where old Cam, renown'd in poet's song,
 With his dark and inky waves,
 Either bank in silence laves,
 Winding slow his sluggish streams along.

III. 1.

What stripling neat, of visage sweet,
 In trimmest guise array'd,
 First the neighing steed assay'd?
 His hand a taper switch adorns, his heel
 Sparkles refulgent with elastic steel:
 The whiles he wins his whiffling way,
 Prancing, ambling, round and round,
 By hill, and dale, and mead, and greensward
 gay:
 Till fated with the pleasing ride,
 From the lofty steed dismounting,
 He lies along, enwrapt in conscious pride,
 By gurgling rill, or crystal fountain.

* The author is either mistaken in this place, or has else indulged himself in a very unwarrantable poetical licence. White-nose was not the sire, but a son of the Godolphin Arabian. See my Calendar. HEBER.

III. 2.

Lo! next a bard, secure of praise,
 His self complacent countenance displays.
 His broad mustachios, ring'd with golden dye,
 Flame like a meteor to the troubled air:
 Proud his demeanor, and his eagle eye,
 O'erhung with lavish lid, yet shone with glorious glare.

The grizzle grace
 Of bushy peruke shadow'd o'er his face.
 In large wide boots, whose ponderous weight
 Would sink each wight of modern date,
 He rides well pleas'd: So large a pair
 Not Garagantua's self might wear:
 Not he, of nature fierce and cruel,
 Who, if we trust to ancient ballad,
 Devour'd three pilgrims in a fallad;
 Nor he of fame germane, hight Pantagruel.

III. 3.

Accoutred thus, th' advent'rous youth
 Seeks not the level lawn, or velvet mead,
 Fast by whose side clear streams meand'ring
 creep;
 But urges on amain the fiery steed
 Up Snowdon's shaggy side, or Cambrian rock uncouth:
 Where the venerable herd
 Of goats, with long and sapient beard,
 And wanton kidlings their blithe revels keep.
 Now up the mountain see him strain,
 Now down the vale he's tost,
 Now flashes on the sight again,
 Now in the palpable obscure quite lost.

IV. 1.

Man's feeble race eternal dangers wait,
 With high or low all, all is woe,
 Disease, mischance, pale fear, and dubious fate.
 But, o'er every peril bounding,
 Ambition views not all the ills surrounding,
 And, tiptoe on the mountains steep,
 Reflects not on the yawning deep.

IV. 2.

See, see, he soars! With mighty wings out-
 spread,
 And long resounding mane,
 The courser quits the plain.
 Aloft in air, see, see him bear
 The bard, who shrouds
 His lyric glory in the clouds,
 Too fond to strike the stars with lofty head,
 He topples headlong from the giddy height,
 Deep in the Cambrian gulf immerg'd in endless night!

IV. 3.

O steed divine! what daring spirit
 Rides thee now? though he inherit
 Nor the pride, nor self opinion,
 Which elate the mighty pair,
 Each of taste the fav'rite nunion,
 Prancing through the desert air;
 By help mechanic of equestrian block,
 Yet shall he mount, with classic housings grac'd,
 And, all unheedful of the critic mock,
 Drive his light courser o'er the bounds of taste.

ODE II.

TO OBLIVION.

* PARENT OF EASE! OBLIVION old,
 Who lov'st thy dwelling-place to hold,
 Where scepter'd Pluto keeps his dreary sway,
 Whose fullen pride the shiv'ring ghosts obey!
 Thou, who delightest still to dwell
 By some hoar and moss-grown cell,
 At whose dank foot Cocytus joys to roll,
 Or Styx' black streams, which even Jove controul!
 Or if it suit thy better will
 To choose the tinkling weeping rill,
 Hard by whose side the seeded poppy red
 Heaves high in air his sweetly curling head,
 While, creeping in meanders flow,
 Lethe's drowsy waters flow,
 And hollow blasts, which never cease to sigh,
 Hum to each care-struck mind their lulla-lulla-by!
 A prey no longer let me be
 To that gossip MEMORY,
 Who waves her banners trim, and proudly flies
 To spread abroad her bribble-brabble lies.
 With thee, OBLIVION, let me go,
 For MEMORY's a friend to woe;
 With thee, FORGETFULNESS, fair silent queen,
 The solemn stole of grief is never seen.

All, all is thine. Thy pow'rful sway
 The throng'd poetic hosts obey:
 Though in the van of MEM'RY proud t' appear,
 At thy command they darken in the rear.
 What though the modern tragic strain
 For nine whole days protract thy reign,
 Yet through the nine, like whelps of currish kind,
 Scarcely it lives, weak, impotent, and blind.
 Sacred to thee the Crambo rhyme,
 The motley forms of pantomime:
 For thee from eunuch's throat still loves to flow
 The soothing sadness of his warbled woe:
 Each day to thee falls pamphlet clean:
 Each month a new-born magazine:
 Hear then, O GODDESS, hear thy vot'ry's pray'r!
 And, if thou deign'st to take one moment's care,
 Attend thy bard! who duly pays
 The tribute of his votive lays;
 Whose muse still offers at thy sacred shrine;—
 Thy bard, who calls THEE his, and makes him
 THINE.
 O sweet FORGETFULNESS supreme!
 Rule supine o'er ev'ry theme,
 O'er each sad subject, o'er each soothing strain,
 Of mine, O GODDESS, stretch thine awful reign!
 Nor let MEM'RY steal one note,
 Which this rude hand to thee hath wrote!
 So shalt thou save me from the poet's shame,
 Though on the letter'd rubric DODSLEY post my
 name.

* According to Lillaus, who bestows the parental function on oblivion.

Verba OBLIVISCENDI regunt GENITIVUM.

Lib. xiii. Cap. 8.

There is a similar passage in Bysticus.

VOL. X

O come, with opiate poppies crown'd,
 Shedding slumbers soft around! [sack!—
 O come, FAT GODDESS, drunk with laureat's
 See, where she sits on the benumb'd Torpe-do's back!
 Me, in thy dull Elysium lapt, O blest
 With thy calm forgetfulness!
 And gently lull my senses all the while
 With placid poems in the sinking style!
 Whether the herring-poet sing,
 Great laureat of the fishes king,
 Or Lycophron prophetic rave his fill,
 Wrapt in the darker strains of Johnny —;
 Or, if HE sing, whose verse affords
 A bewy of the choicest words,
 Who meets his lady muse by moss-grown cell,
 Adorn'd with epithet and tinkling bell:
 These, GODDESS, let me still forget,
 With all the dearth of modern wit!
 So mayst thou gently o'er my youthful breast,
 Spread, with thy welcome hand, OBLIVION's friendly vest.

THE PROGRESS OF ENVY.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1751.

Ah me! unhappy state of mortal wight,
 Sith ENVY's sure attendant upon fame,
 Ne doth she rest from rancorous despight,
 Until she works him mickle woe and shame;
 Unhappy he whom ENVY thus doth spoil,
 Ne doth she check her ever-restless hate:
 Until she doth his reputation foil:
 Ah! luckless imp is he, whose worth elate,
 Forces him pay this heavy tax for being great.

There stood an ancient mount, yclept Parnass,
 (The fair domain of sacred poetry)
 Which, with fresh odours ever-blooming, was Besprinkled with the dew of Castaly;
 Which now in soothing murmurs whisp'ring
 glides,
 Wat'ring with genial waves the fragrant soil,
 Now rolls adown the mountain's steepy sides,
 Teaching the vales full beautifully to smile,
 Dame NATURE's handywork, not form'd by lab'ring toil.

The MUSES fair, these peaceful shades among,
 With skillful fingers sweep the trembling strings;
 The air in silence listens to the song,
 And TIME forgets to ply his lazy wings;
 Pale-visag'd CARE, with foul unhallow'd feet,
 Attempts the summit of the hill to gain,
 Ne can the hag arrive the blissful seat;
 Her unavailing strength is spent in vain, [pain.
 CONTENT sits on the top, and mocks her empty

Of PHOEBUS self left his divine abode,
 And here enshrouded in a shady bow'r,
 Regardless of his state, lay'd by the god,
 And own'd sweet music's more alluring pow'r.
 On either side was plac'd a peerless wight,
 Whose merit long had fill'd the trump of FAME;
 This, FANCY's darling child, was SPENSER hight,

S f

Who pip'd full pleasing on the banks of Tame;
That no less fam'd than he, and MILTON was his name.

In these cool bow'rs they live supinely calm;
Now harmless talk, now emulously sing;
While VIRTUE, pouring round her sacred balm,
Makes happiness eternal as the spring.
Alternately they sung; now SPENSER 'gan,
Of jousts and tournaments, and champions strong;
Now MILTON sung of disobedient man,
And Eden lost: The bards around them throng,
Drawn by the wondrous magic of their princes'
song.

Not far from these, Dan CHAUCER, ancient wight,
A lofty seat on Mount Parnassus held,
Who long had been the muses chief delight;
His reverend locks were silver'd o'er with eld;
Grave was his visage, and his habit plain;
And while he sung, fair nature he display'd,
In verse albeit uncouth, and simple strain;
Ne mote he well be seen, so thick the shade,
Which elms and aged oaks had all around him
made.

Next SHAKSPEARE sat, irregularly great,
And in his hand a magic rod did hold,
Which visionary beings did create,
And turn the foulest dross to purest gold:
Whatever spirits rove in earth or air,
Or bad or good, obey his dread command;
To his behests these willingly repair,
Those aw'd by terrors of his magic wand,
The which not all their pow'rs united might withstand.

Beside the bard there stood a beauteous maid,
Whose glittering appearance dimn'd the eyes;
Her thin-wrought vesture various tints dis-
play'd,
FANCY her name, ysprung of race divine;
Her mantle * wimpled low, her silken hair,
Which loose adown her well-turn'd shoulders
stray'd,
* She made a net to catch the wanton air,
Whose love-sick breezes all around her play'd
And seem'd in whispers soft to court the heav'nly maid.

And ever and anon she wav'd in air
A sceptre, fraught with all-creative pow'r:
She wav'd it round: Eftsoons there did appear
Spirits and witches, forms unknown before:
Again she lifts her wonder-working wand;
Eftsoons upon the flow'ry plain were seen
The gay inhabitants of Fairy-Land,
And blithe attendants upon MAB their queen
In mystic circles danc'd along th' enchanted green.

On th' other side stood NATURE, goddess fair;
A matron seem'd she, and of manners staid;

* Wimpled. A word used by Spenser for hung down.—The line enclosed within commas is one of Fair-fax's, in his translation of Tasso.

Beauteous her form, majestic was her air,
In loose attire of purest white array'd:
A potent rod she bore, whose pow'r was such (As from her darling's works may well be shown,)

That often with its soul-enchancing touch,
She rais'd or joy, or caus'd the deep-felt groan,
And each man's passions made subservient to her
own.

But lo! thick fogs from out the earth arise,
And murky mists the buxom air invade,
Which with contagion dire infect the skies,
And all around their baleful influence shed;
Th' infected sky, which whilom was so fair,
With thick Cimmerian darkness is o'erspread;
The sun, which whilom shone without compare,
Muffles in pitchy veil his radiant head, [bed.
And fore the time fore-grieving seeks his wat'ry

ENVY, the daughter of fell Acheron,
(The flood of deadly hate and gloomy night)
Had left precipitate her Stygian throne,
And through the frighted heavens wing'd her flight:

With careful eye each realm she did explore,
Ne mote she ought of happiness observe;
For happiness, alas! was now no more,
Sith ev'ry one from virtue's paths did swerve,
And trample on religion base designs to serve.

At length, on blest Parnassus seated high,
Their temple circled with a laurel crown,
SPENSER and MILTON met her scowling eye,
And turn'd her horrid grin into a frown.
Full fast unto her sister did she post,
There to unload the venom of her breast,
To tell how all her happiness was cross'd,
Sith others were of happiness possest:
Did never gloomy hell send forth like ugly pest.

Within the covert of a gloomy wood,
Where sun'ral cypress star-proof branches spread,
O'ergrown with tangling briars a cavern stood;
Fit place for melancholy * dreary-head.
Here a deformed monster joy'd to won,
Which on fell rancour ever was ybent,
All from the rising to the setting sun,
Her heart pursued spite with black intent,
Ne could her iron mind at human woes relent.

In flowing sable stole she was yclad,
Which with her countenance did well accord;
Forth from her mouth, like one through grief
gone mad,
A frothy sea of nauseous foam was pour'd;
A ghastly grin and eyes askint, display
The rancour which her hellish thoughts contain,
And how, when man is blest, she pines away,
Burning to turn his happiness to pain; [man.
MALICE the monster's name, a foe to God and

Along the floor black loathsome toads still crawl,
Their gullets swell'd with poison's mortal bane,
Which ever and anon they spit at all
Whom hapless fortune leads too near her den

* Dreary-head. Gloominess.

Around her waist, in place of filken zone,
A life-devouring viper rear'd his head,
Who no distinction made 'twixt friend and foe,
But death on ev'ry side fierce brandish'd,
Fly, reckless mortals, fly, in vain is * hardy-head.

Impatient ENVY, through th' etherial waste,
With inward venom fraught, and deadly spite,
Unto this cavern steer'd her panting haste,
Enshrouded in a darksome veil of night.
Her inmost heart burnt with impetuous ire,
And fell destruction sparkled in her look,
Her ferret eyes flash'd with revengeful fire,
Awhile contending passions utt'rance choke,
At length the fiend in furious tone her silence
broke.

Sister, arise! see how our pow'r decays,
No more our empire thou and I can boast,
Sith mortal man now gains immortal praise,
Sith man is blest, and thou and I are lost:
See in what state Parnassus' hill appears;
See PHOEBUS' self two happy bards atween;
See how the God their song attentive hears;
This SPENSER hight, that MILTON, well I ween!

Who can behold unmov'd like heart-tormenting
scene?

Sister, arise! ne let our courage droop,
Perforce we will compel these mortals own,
That mortal force unto our force shall stoop;
ENVY and MALICE then shall reign alone:
Thou best has known to file thy tongue with lies,
And to deceive mankind with specious bait:
Like TRUTH accoutred, spreadest forgeries,
The fountain of contention and of hate:
Arise, unite with me, and be as whilom great!

The fiend obey'd, and with impatient voice—
"Tremble, ye bards, within that blissful seat;
"MALICE and ENVY shall o'erthrow your joys,
"Nor PHOEBUS self shall our designs defeat.
"Shall we, who under friendship's feigned veil,
"Prompted the bold archangel to rebel;
"Shall we, who under show of sacred zeal,
"Plung'd half the pow'rs of heav'n in lowest
"hell— [tell.]

Such vile disgrace of us no mortal man shall

And now, more hideous rendered to the sight,
By reason of her raging cruelty,
She burnt to go, equipt in dreadful plight,
And find fit engine for her forgery.
Her eyes inflam'd did cast their rays askance,
While hellish imps prepare the monster's car,
In which she might cut through the wide ex-
panse,

And find out nations that extended far,
When all was pitchy dark, ne twinkled one bright star.

Black was her chariot, drawn by dragons dire,
And each fell serpent had a double tongue,
Which ever and anon spit flaming fire,
The regions of the tainted air among;

* Hardy-head. Courage.

A lofty seat the sister-monsters bore,
In deadly machinations close combin'd,
Dull FOLLY drove with terrible uproar,
And cruel DISCORD follow'd fast behind:
God help the man 'gainst whom such caitiff foes
are join'd.

Aloft in air the rattling chariot flies,
While thunder harshly grates upon its wheels;
Black pointed spires of smoke around them rise,
The air depress'd unusual burthen feels!
Detested sight! in terrible array,
They spur their fiery dragons on amain,
Ne mote their anger suffer cold delay,
Until the wish'd-for region they obtain,
And land their dingy car on Caledonian plain.

Here, eldest son of MALICE, long had dwelt
A wretch of all the joys of life forlorn;
His fame on double falsities was built:
(Ah! worthless son, of worthless parent born):
Under the show of semblance fair, he veil'd
The black intentions of his hellish breast;
And by these guileful means he more prevail'd
Than had he open enmity profess'd;
The wolf more safely wounds when in sheep's clothing drest.

Him then themselves atween they joyful place,
(Sure sign of woe when such are pleas'd, alas!)
Then measure back the air with swifter pace,
Until they reach the foot of Mount Parnass.
Hither in evil hour the monsters came,
And with their new companion did alight,
Who long had lost all sense of virtuous shame,
Beholding worth with poisonous despight;
On his success depends their impious delight.

Long burnt he sore the summit to obtain,
And spread his venom o'er the blissful seat;
Long burnt he sore, but still he burnt in vain;
Mote none come there, who come with impious
feet.

At length, at unawares, he out doth spit
That spite which else had to himself been bane;
The venom on the breast of MILTON lit,
And spread benumbing death through every vein;
The bard of life bereft fell senseless on the plain.

As at the banquet of Thyestes old,
The sun is said t' have shut his radiant eye,
So did he now through grief his beams withhold,
And darkness to be felt o'erwhelm'd the sky;
Forth issued from their dismal dark abodes
The birds attendant upon hideous night,
Shriek-owls and ravens, whose fell croaking bodes

Approaching death to miserable wight:
Did never mind of man behold like dreadful sight?

APOLLO wails his darling done to die
By foul attempt of ENVY's fatal bane;
The MUSES sprinkle him with dew of Castaly,
And crown his death with many a living strain;
Hoary PARNASSUS beats his aged breast,
Aged, yet ne'er before did sorrow know;
The flowers drooping their despair attest,

S f ij

Th' aggrieved rivers querulously flow;
All nature sudden groan'd with sympathetic woe.

But, lo! the sky a gayer livery wears,
The melting clouds begin to fade apace,
And now the cloak of darkness disappears,
(May darkness ever thus to light give place!)
Ere griev'd APOLLO jocund looks resumes,
The NINE renew their whilom cheerful song,
No grief PARNASSUS' aged breast consumes,
For from the teeming earth new flowers sprong,
The plenteous rivers flow'd full peacefully along.

The stricken bard fresh vital heat renews,
Whose blood, erst stagnate, rushes through his veins;
Life through each pore her spirit doth infuse,
And FAME by MALICE unextinguish'd reigns:
And see, a form breaks forth, all heav'nly bright,
Upheld by one of mortal progeny,
A female form, yclad in snowy white,
Ne half so fair at distance seen as nigh;
DOUGLAS and TRUTH appear, ENVY and LAUDER die.

PROLOGUE TO THE JEALOUS WIFE,

SPOKEN BY MR. GARRICK.

THE JEALOUS WIFE! a comedy! poor man!
A charming subject! but a wretched plan.
His skittish wit, o'erleaping the due bound,
Commits flat trespass upon tragic ground.
Quarrels, upbraidings, jealousies, and spleen,
Grow too familiar in the comic scene.
Tinge but the language with heroic chime,
'Tis passion, pathos, character, sublime! [scene,
What round big words had swell'd the pompous
A king the husband, and the wife a queen!
Then might distraction rend her graceful hair,
See fightless forms, and scream, and gape, and stare.
Drawcanfir death had rag'd without controul,
Here the drawn dagger, there the poison'd bowl.
What eyes had stream'd at all the whining woe!
What hands had thunder'd at each Hab and Ob?
But peace! the gentle prologue custom sends,
Like drum and serjeant, to beat up for friends,
At vice and folly, each a lawful game,
Our author flies, but with no partial aim.
He read the manners, open as they lie
In nature's volume to the general eye.
Books too he read, nor blush'd to use their store.—
He does but what his betters did before.
Shakspeare has done it, and the Grecian stage
Caught truth of character from Homer's page.

If in his scenes an honest skill is shown,
And borrowing little, much appears his own;
If what a master's happy pencil drew
He brings more forward, in dramatic view;
'To your decision he submits his cause,
Secure of candour, anxious for applause.

But if all rude, his artless scenes deface
The simple beauties which he meant to grace;
If, an invader upon others' land,
He spoil and plunder with a robber's hand,
Do justice on him!—As on fools before,
And give to blockheads past one blockhead more.

PROLOGUE,

Intended to have been spoken at Drury-Lane Theatre, on his Majesty's Birth-day, 1761.

GENIUS, neglected, mourns his wither'd bays;
But soars to heav'n from virtue's generous praise.
When kings themselves the proper judges sit
O'er the blest realms of science, arts and wit,
Each eager breast beats high for glorious fame,
And emulation glows with active flame.
Thus, with Augustus rose imperial Rome,
For arms renown'd abroad, for arts at home.
Thus, when Eliza fill'd Britannia's throne,
What arts, what learning was not then our own?
Then sinew'd genius, strong and nervous rose,
In Spenser's numbers, and in Raleigh's prose;
On Bacon's lips then every science hung,
And nature spoke from her own Shakspeare's tongue.

Her patriot smiles fell, like refreshing dews,
To wake to life each pleasing useful muse,
While every virtue which the queen profess'd,
Beam'd on her subjects, but to make them blest.
O glorious times!—O theme of praise divine!
—Be happy, Britain, then—such times are thine.
Behold e'en now strong science imp's her wing,
And arts revive beneath a patriot king.
The muses too burst forth with double light,
To shed their lustre in a monarch's sight.
His cheering smiles alike to all extend—
Perhaps this spot may boast a royal friend.
And when a prince, with early judgment grac'd,
Himself shall marshal out the way to taste,
Caught with the flame perhaps e'en here may rise
Some powerful genius of uncommon size,
And, pleas'd with nature, nature's depth explore,
And be what our great Shakspeare was before.

PROLOGUE TO HECUBA.

SPOKEN BY MR. GARRICK, 1761.

A GRECIAN bard, two thousand years ago,
Plann'd this sad fable of illustrious woe;
Waken'd each soft emotion of the breast,
And called forth tears, that would not be suppress'd.

Yet, O ye mighty Sirs, of judgment chaste,
Who, lacking genius, have a deal of taste,
Can you forgive our modern ancient piece,
Which brings no chorus, though it comes from Greece?

Kind social chorus, which all humours meets,
And sings and dances up and down the streets.
—Oh! might true taste, in these unclassic days,
Revive the Grecian fashions with their plays!
Then, rais'd on stilts, our players would stalk and
rage,

And, at three steps, stride o'er a modern stage;
Each gesture then would boast unusual charms,
From lengthen'd legs, stuff'd body, sprawling arms!

Your critic eye would then no pigmies see,
But buskins make a giant, even of me.
No features then the poet's mind would trace,
But one black vizor blot out all the face.

O! glorious times, when actors thus could strike,
Expressive, inexpressive, all alike!
Less change of face than in our punch they saw,
For punch can roll his eyes, and wag his jaw;
With one set glare they mouth'd the rumbling
verse;

Our Gog and Magog look not half so fierce!

Yet, though depriv'd of instruments like these,
Nature, perhaps, may find a way to please;
Which, wheresoe'er she glows with genuine flame,
In Greece, in Rome, in England, is the same.

Of raillery, then, ye modern wits, beware,
Nor damn the Grecian poet for the player.
Theirs was the skill, with honest help of art,
To win, by just degree, the yielding heart,
What if our Shakspeare claims the magic throne,
And in one instant makes us all his own;
They differ only in one point of view,
For Shakspeare's nature, was their nature too.

O D E

SPOKEN ON A PUBLIC OCCASION AT WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

NOR at Apollo's vaunted shrine,
Nor to the fabled sisters nine,
Offers the youth his ineffectual vow,
Far be their rites!—Such worship fits not now;
When at Eliza's sacred name
Each breast receives the present flame:
While eager genius plumes her infant wings,
And with bold impulse strikes th' accordant strings,
Reflecting on the crowded line

Of mitred sages, bards divine,
Of patriots, active in their country's cause,
Who plan her councils, or direct her laws.

Oh memory! how thou lov'st to stray,
Delighted, o'er the flow'ry way
Of childhood's greener years! when simple youth
Pour'd the pure dictates of ingenuous truth!

'Tis then the souls congenial meet,
Inspir'd with friendship's genuine heat,
Ere interest, frantic zeal, or jealous art,
Have taught the language foreign to the heart.

'Twas here, in many an early strain
Dryden first try'd his classic vein,
Spurr'd his strong genius to the distant goal,
In wild effusions of his manly soul;
When Busby's skill, and judgment sage,
Represent'd the poet's frantic rage,
Cropt his luxuriance bold, and blended taught
The flow of numbers with the strength of thought.

Nor, Cowley, be thy muse forgot! which strays
In wit's ambiguous flowery maze,
With many a pointed turn and studied art:
Though affectation blot thy rhyme,
Thy mind was lofty and sublime,
And manly honour dignified thy heart:
Though fond of wit, yet firm to virtue's plan,
The poet's trifles ne'er disgrac'd the man.

Well might thy morals sweet engage
Th' attention of the mitred sage,
Smit with the plain simplicity of truth.

For not ambition's giddy strife,
The gilded toys of public life,
Which snare the gay unstable youth,
Cou'd lure thee from the sober charms,
Which lapt thee in retirement's arms,
Whence thou, untainted with the pride of state,
Cou'dst smile with pity on the bustling great.

Such were Eliza's sons. Her fost'ring care
Here bade free genius tune his grateful song;
Which else had wafted in the desert air,
Or droop'd unnotic'd 'mid the vulgar throng.
—Ne'er may her youth degenerate shame
The glories of Eliza's name!
But with the poet's frenzy bold,
Such as inspir'd her bards of old,
Pluck the green laurel from the hand of fame!

THE

TEARS AND TRIUMPH OF PARNASSUS.

AN ODE,

Set to Music and performed at Drury-Lane, 1760.

The scene discovers Apollo and the Nine Muses in their proper habits.

Apollo.

FATE gave the word; the deed is done;
AUGUSTUS is no more;
His great career of fame is run,
And all the loss deplore.

[The muses tear off their laurels.
Calliope.

Well, sisters of the sacred spring,
Well may you rend your golden hair;
Well may you now your dirges sing,
And pierce with cries the troubled air.

Cerberus.

Fate gave the word, &c.

Clio.

Founded in justice was his sway;
Ambition never mark'd his way.

Calliope.

Unless the best ambition that can fire
A monarch's breast and all his soul inspire,
The gen'rous purpose of the noble mind,
The best ambition—to serve human kind.

Apollo.

Yes, virgins, yes; that wish sublime
Rank'd him with those of earliest time,
Who for a people's welfare strove;
Whose spirits breathe ethereal air,
And for their meed of earthly care,
Drink nectar with Olympian Jove.

Calliope.

Oh TRUTH! fair daughter of the sky,
And MERCY!—that with asking eye
Near the OMNIPOTENT dost stand;
And, when mankind provoke his rage,
Dost clasp his knees, his wrath assuage,
And win the thunder from his hand!

Clio.

Oh white-rob'd FAITH! celestial maid!
Twin-born with JUSTICE! by whose aid
He liv'd the guardian of the laws;

Dear LIBERTY! round ALBION's isle
That bid'st eternal sunshine smile,
Who now will guard your sacred cause?

CHORUS.

Dear liberty, &c.

Calliope.

Where were ye, muses, when the fatal sheers
The FURY rais'd, to close his rev'rend years?
But ah, vain wish!—you could not stop the blow!

No omen warn'd ye of th' impending woe.

Apollo.

See, where BRITANNIA stands
With close-enfolded hands,

On yonder sea-beat shore!

Behold her languid air!

Lo, her dishevell'd hair!

Majestic now no more!

Still on the fullen wave her eye is bent,
The TRIDENT of the MAIN thrown idle by;
OLD THAMES, his sea-green mantle rent,
Inverts his urn, and heaves a doleful sigh.

Hark! to the winds and waves

Frantic with grief she raves,

And, cruel gods! she cries;

Each chalky cliff around,

Each rock returns the sound,

And, cruel gods! replies.

Calliope.

See, the procession sad and slow,
Walks in a solemn pomp of woe
Through awful arches, gloomy-aisles,
And rows of monumental piles,
Where lie the venerable just,
Where heroes moulder into dust.

Now quietly inurn'd he lies,

Pale! pale! inanimate and cold!

Where round him baleful vapours rise,
'Midst bones of legislators old!

Clio.

Of him who fought th' ambitious Gaul
O'er thick-embattled plains,
Who felt, who liv'd, and reign'd for all,
This only now remains.

Apollo.

Bring, in handfuls, lilies bring
Bring me all the flow'ry spring.
Scatter roses on his bier;
Ever honour'd, ever dear!

CHORUS.

Scatter roses, &c.

Mercury descends.

No more, harmonious progeny of Jove,
No more let fun'ral accents rise;
The great, the good AUGUSTUS reigns above,
Translated to his kindred skies.

Clio.

No more for my historic page—

Calliope.

No more for my great epic rage—

Both.

Will by the hero now be done—

CHORUS.

His great career of fame is run,
And all the loss deplore.

Enter Mars.

Lo! Mars, from his beloved land,
Where freedom long hath fix'd her stand,
Bids ye collect your flowing hair,
And again the laurel wear:

For see, BRITANNIA rears her drooping head;
Again resumes her TRIDENT of the main;
THAMES takes his urn, and seeks his wat'ry bed,
While gay content sits smiling on the plain.

Hark! a glad voice

Proclaims the people's choice.

CHORUS, within the scenes.

He is our liege, our rightful lord!

Of heart and tongue with one accord

We all will sing

Long live the king!

He is our liege!—he!—he alone!

With BRITISH HEART he mounts the throne;

Around him throngs a loyal band;

He will protect his NATIVE LAND!

He is our liege, &c.

[The muses rise and put on their laurels.

Calliope.

The muses now their heads shall raise;

The arts to life shall spring;

Virgins, we'll trim our wither'd bays,

And wake each vocal string;

Now shall the sculptor's happy skill

Touch the rude stone to life;

The painter shall his canvas fill,

Pleas'd with his mimic strife.

Clio.

Sweet MERCY, FAITH, CELESTIAL TRUTH,

Now by your aid the royal youth

Shall live the guardian of the laws;

Dear LIBERTY! round ALBION's isle

That bid'st eternal sunshine smile,

He now will guard your sacred cause.

Apollo.

Blest prince! whose subjects in each adverse hour,
For freedom still have stood!

Blest isle! whose prince but deems the sov'reign
pow'r,

The pow'r of doing good!

Mars.

Now open all your Helicon; explore

Of harmony the loftiest store;

Let the drum beat alarms,

Such as rouse us to arms; [the sky!]

The trumpet's shrill clangor shall pierce through

Swell the rapture, swell it high;

And in notes sublime and clear

Pour the strong melody, that Heav'n may hear.

Apollo.

Nothing mortal will I sound;

Lo, the flame, the flame divine!

High I mount, I quit the ground,

Holy fury! I am thine.

With rage possess'd

Big swells my breast!

In visions rapt, before my sight appears

A brighter order of increasing years.

Mars.

I see the Rhine devolve his flood,

Deep-crimson'd with the Gallic blood!

I hear, I hear the distant roar
Of ruin on yon hostile shore !
I see, young prince, to thee I see
The savage Indian bend the knee !
Lo, AFRIC from her sable kings
Her richest stores in tribute brings !
And farthest IND, beneath the rising day
Lays down her arms, and venerates thy sway.

Calliope.

I see Bellona banish'd far !
I see him close the gates of war,
While purple rage within
With ghastly ire shall grin,
And rolling his terrific eyes,
Where round him heaps of arms arise,
Bound with a hundred brazen chains,
In vain shall foam, and thirst for sanguine plains.

Clio.

Sweet peace returns ;
O'er Albion's sons
She waves her dove-like wing :
On ev'ry plain
The shepherd train
Their artless loves shall sing.
Pale DISCORD shall fly
From the light of the sky.
To black Cocytus hurl'd ;
There, there shall feel
Ixion's wheel,
The furies with their serpents curl'd ;
With the unceasing toil shall groan
Of the unconquerable stone,
And leave in harmony the British world.

Apollo.

Proceed great days ; lead on th' auspicious years ;
Such years, (--- for lo ! the scene of fate appears) !
Such years, the DESTINIES have said, shall roll ;
Jove nods consent, and thunder shakes the pole.

ARCADIA, A DRAMATIC PASTORAL.

SCENE I. A view of the country.

Shepherds and Shepherdesses.

CHORUS.

SHEPHERDS, buxom, blithe and free,
Now's the time for jollity.

Sylvia.

AIR.

Hither haste, and bring along
Merry tale and jocund song,
To the pipe and tabor beat
Frolic measures with your feet.
Ev'ry gift of time employ ;
Make the most of proffer'd joy.
Pleasure hates the scanty rules
Portion'd out by dreaming fools.

CHORUS.

Shepherds, buxom, blithe and free
Now's the time for jollity.

[A dance of Shepherds, &c.]

Sylvia.

RECITATIVE.

Rejoice, ye happy swains, rejoice ;
It is the heart that prompts the voice.

Be sorrow banish'd far away ;
Thyrsis shall make it holiday.
Who at his name can joy suppress ?
ARCADIAN-BORN to rule and bless.

Damon.

And hark ! from rock to rock the sound
Of winding horn, and deep-mouth'd hound,
Breaking with rapture on the ear,
Proclaims the blithesome Phœbe near :
See where she hastes with eager pace,
To speak the joys that paint her face.

SCENE II. Opens to a prospect of rocks.

Huntsmen, Huntresses, &c. coming down from them.

Phœbe.

Hither I speed with honest glee,
Such as befits the mind that's free ;
Your cheerful troop, blithe youth, to join,
And mix my social joys with thine.
Now may each nymph and frolic swain,
O'er mountain steep, or level plain,
Court buxom health, while jocund horn
Bids echo wake the sluggard morn.

AIR.

When the morning peeps forth, and the zephyr's
cool gale, [dale ;
Carries fragrance and health over mountain and
Up, ye nymphs, and ye swains, and together we'll rove,
Up hill, down the valley, by thicket or grove :
Then follow with me, where the welkin resounds
With the notes of the horns, and the cry of the hounds.

Let the wretched be slaves to ambition and wealth ;
All the blessing we ask is the blessing of health.
So shall innocence self give a warrant to joys
No envy disturbs, no dependence destroys.
Then follow with me, where the welkin resounds
With the notes of the horn, and the cry of the hounds.

O'er hill, dale, and woodland, with rapture we
roam ;
Yet returning, still find the dear pleasures at home ;
Where the cheerful good humour gives honesty
grace, [face.
And the heart speaks content in the smiles of the
Then follow with me, where the welkin resounds
With the notes of the horn, and the cry of the hounds.

Dametas.

RECITATIVE.

Small care, my friends, your youth annoys,
Which only looks to present joys.

Sylvia.

Though the white locks of silver'd age,
And long experience hail thee sage ;
Ill suits it in this joy, to wear
A brow so overhung with care.
Better with us thy voice to raise,
And join a whole Arcadian's praise.

Dametas.

With you I joy that Thyrsis reigns
The guardian o'er his native plains

But praise is scanty to reveal
The speaking blessings all must feel.

Damon.

True, all must feel—but thankless too?
Nor give to virtue, virtue's due?
My grateful heart shall ever show
The debt I need not blush to owe.

AIR.

That I go where I list, that I sing what I please,
That my labour's the price of contentment and ease,
That no care from abroad my retirement annoys,
That at home I can taste the true family joys,
That my kids wanton safely o'er meadows and rocks,

That my sheep graze secure from the robber or fox;
These are blessings I share with the rest of the
swains,

For its Thyrsis who gave them, and Thyrsis maintains.

Dametas.

RECITATIVE.

Perish my voice, if e'er I blame
Thy duty to our guardian's name!
His active talents I revere,
But eye them with a jealous fear.
Intent to form our bliss alone,
The generous youth forgets his own;
Nor e'er his busy mind employs
To find a partner of his joys.
So might his happy offspring own
The virtues which their sire hath shown.

AIR.

With joy the parent loves to trace
Resemblance in his children's face:
And as he forms their docile youth
To walk the steady paths of truth,
Observes them shooting into men,
And lives in them life o'er again.

While active sons, with eager flame,
Catch virtue at their father's name;
When full of glory, full of age,
The parent quits this busy stage,
What in the sons we most admire,
Calls to new life the honour'd fire.

Sylvia.

RECITATIVE.

O prudent sage forgive the zeal
Of thoughtless youth. With thee I feel,
The glories now Arcadia shares
May but embitter future cares.

Oh mighty Pan! attend Arcadia's voice,
Inspire, direct, and sanctify his choice.

AIR.

So may all the sylvan train,
Dryad, nymph, and rustic fawn,
To the pipe and merry strain,
Trip it o'er the russet lawn!
May no thorn or bearded grass
Hurt their footsteps as they pass,
Whilst in gambols round and round
They sport it o'er the shaven ground!

Though thy syrinx, like a dream,
Flying at the face of day,
Vanish'd in the limpid stream,
Bearing all thy hopes away,

If again thy heart should burn,

In carelling,

Blest, and blessing,

May'st thou find a wish'd return.

CHORUS.

O mighty Pan! attend Arcadia's voice,
Inspire, direct, and sanctify his choice.

[A dance of Huntsmen and Huntresses.

Dametas.

RECITATIVE.

Peace, shepherds, peace, with jocund air,
Which speaks a heart unknown to care,
Young Delia hastes. The glad surprise
Of rapture flashing from her eyes.

Enter DELIA.

Delia.

AIR.

Shepherds, shepherds, come away;
Sadness were a sin to-day.

Let the pipe's merry notes aid the skill of the voice;
For our wishes are crown'd, and our hearts shall rejoice.

Rejoice, and be glad;

For sure he is mad

Who, where mirth and good humour, and har-
mony's found, [round.

Never catches the smile, nor lets pleasure go

Let the stupid be grave,

'Tis the vice of the slave;

But can never agree

With a maiden like me,

Who is born in a country that's happy and free.

Dametas.

RECITATIVE.

What means this rapture, Delia? Show
Th' event our bosoms burn to know.

Delia.

Now as I trod yon verdant side,
Where Ladon rolls its silver tide,
All gaily deck'd in gorgeous state,
Sail'd a proud barge of richest freight:
Where sat a nymph, more fresh and fair
Than blossoms which the morning air
Steals perfume from; the modest grace
Of maiden blush bespread her face.
Hither it made, and on this strand
Pour'd its rich freight for shepherds' land.
Ladon, for this, smooth flow thy tide!
The precious freight was Thyrsis' bride.

Dametas.

RECITATIVE.

Stop, shepherds, if aright I hear,
The sounds of joy proclaim them near:
Let's meet them, friends, I'll lead the way;
Joy makes me young again to-day.

SCENE III.

A view of the sea, with a vessel at a distance.

[Here follows a Pastoral Procession to the wedding of Thyrsis.

Priest.

RECITATIVE.

Mighty Pan! with tender care,
View this swain and virgin fair;
May they ever thus impart
Just return of heart for heart.

May the pledges of their bliss
Climb their knees to share the kiss.
May their steady blooming youth,
While they tread the paths of truth,
Virtues catch from either side,
From the bridegroom and the bride.

CHORUS.

May their steady blooming youth,
While they tread the paths of truth,
Virtues catch from either side,
From the bridegroom and the bride.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. COLMAN.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1756.

You know, dear George, I'm none of those
That condescend to write in prose;
Inspir'd with pathos and sublime,
I always soar—in doggrel rhyme,
And scarce can ask you how you do,
Without a jingling line or two.
Besides, I always took delight in
What bears the name of easy writing;
Perhaps the reason makes it please
Is, that I find its writ with ease.

I vent a notion here in private,
Which public taste can ne'er connive at,
Which thinks no wit or judgment greater
Than Addison and his Spectator,
Who says (it is no matter where,
But that he says it, I can swear)
With easy verse most bards are smitten,
Because they think its easy written;
Whereas the easier it appears,
The greater marks of care it wears;
Of which, to give an explanation,
Take this by way of illustration:
The fam'd Mat. Prior, it is said,
Oft bit his nails, and scratch'd his head,
And chang'd a thought a hundred times,
Because he did not like the rhymes.
To make my meaning clear, and please ye,
In short, he labour'd to write easy.
And yet, no critic e'er defines
His poems into labour'd lines.
I have a simile will hit him;
His verse, like clothes, was made to fit him,
Which (as no tailor e'er denied)
The better fit, the more they're tried.

Though I have mention'd Prior's name,
Think not I aim at Prior's fame.
'Tis the result of admiration
To spend itself in imitation;
If imitation may be said,
Which is in me by nature bred,
And you have better proofs than these,
That I'm idolater of ease.

Who, but a madman, would engage
A poet in the present age?
Write what we will, our works bespeak us
Imitatores, servum Pecus.
Tale, elegy, or lofty ode,
We travel in the beaten road:
The proverb still sticks closely by us,
Nil dictum, quod non dictum prius.

The only comfort that I know
Is, that 'twas said an age ago,
Ere Milton soar'd in thought sublime,
Ere Pope refin'd the chink of rhyme,
Ere Colman wrote in style so pure,
Or the great TWO the CONNOISSEUR;
Ere I burlesqu'd the rural cit,
Proud to hedge in my scraps of wit,
And happy in the close connection,
T' acquire some name from their reflection;
So (the similitude is trite)
The moon still shines with borrow'd light,
And, like the race of modern beaux,
Ticks with the sun for her lac'd clothes.

Methinks there is no better time
To show the use I make of rhyme,
Than now, when I, who from beginning
Was always fond of couplet singing,
Presuming on good-nature's score,
Thus lay my bantling at your door.

The first advantage which I see,
Is, that I ramble loose and free:
The bard indeed full oft complains,
That rhymes are fetters, links, and chains,
And when he wants to leap the fence,
Still keep him pris'ner to the sense.
Howe'er in common place he rage,
Rhymes like your fetters on the stage,
Which when the player once hath wore,
It makes him only strut the more,
While, raving in pathetic strains,
He shakes his legs to clank his chains.

From rhyme, as from a handsome face,
Nonsense acquires a kind of grace;
I therefore give it all its scope,
That sense may unperceiv'd clope:
So ministers of basest tricks
(I love a fling at politics)
Amuse the nation, court, and king,
With breaking Fowke, and hanging Byng;
And make each puny rogue a prey,
While they, the greater flink away.
This simile perhaps would strike,
If match'd with something more alike;
Then take it dress'd a second time
In Prior's case, and my sublime.
Say, did you never chance to meet
A mob of people in the street,
Ready to give the robb'd relief,
And all in haste to catch a thief,
While the sly rogue, who filch'd the prey,
Too close beset to run away,
Stop thief! stop thief! exclaims aloud,
And so escapes among the crowd?
So ministers, &c.

O England, how I mourn thy fate!
For sure thy losses now are great;
Two such, what Briton can endure,
Minorca and the connoisseur!
To-day, before the sun goes down,
Will die the censor, Mr. Town!
He dies, whoe'er takes pains to con him,
With blushing honours thick upon him;
O may his name these verses save,
Be these inscrib'd upon his grave!

Know, reader, that on Thursday died
The CONNOISSEUR, a suicide!
Yet think not that his soul is fled,
Nor rank him 'mongst the vulgar dead.
Howe'er defunct you set him down,
He's only going out of town.

THE PUFF.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE BOOKSELLER AND
AUTHOR.

Bookseller.

MUSEUM, sir! that's not enough.
New works, we know, require a puff;
A title to entrap the eyes,
And catch the reader by surprise:
As gaudy signs, which hang before
The tavern or the alehouse door,
Hitch every passer's observation,
Magnetic in their invitation.
—That SHAKESPEARE is prodigious fine!
Shall we step in, and taste the wine?
Men, women, houses, horses, books,
All borrow credit from their looks.
Externals have the gift of striking,
And lure the fancy into liking.

Author.

Oh! I perceive the thing you mean—
Call it St. James's Magazine.

Bookseller.

Or the New Britisk—

Author.

Oh! no more.

One name's as good as half a score.
And titles oft give nothing less
Than what they flaringly profess.
Puffing, I grant, is all the mode;
The common hackney turnpike road:
But custom is the blockhead's guide,
And such low arts disgust my pride.
Success on merit's force depends,
Not on the partial voice of friends;
Not on the seems, that bully sin;
But that which passeth show within:
Which bids the warmth of friendship glow,
And wrings conviction from a foe.—
Deserve success, and proudly claim,
Not steal a passage into fame.

Bookseller.

Your method, sir, will never do;
You're right in theory, it's true.
But then, experience in our trade
Says, there's no harm in some parade.
Suppose we said, by Mr. Lloyd?

Author.

The very thing I would avoid;
And would be rather pleas'd to own
Myself unknowing, and unknown:
What could th' unknowing muse expect,
But information or neglect?
Unknown—perhaps her reputation
Escapes the tax of defamation,
And wrapt in darkness, laughs unhurt,
While critic blockheads throw their dirt:

But he who madly prints his name,
Invites his foe to take sure aim.

Bookseller.

True---but a name will always bring
A better sanction to the thing:
And all your scribbling foes are such,
Their censure cannot hurt you much;
And, take the matter ne'er so ill,
If you don't print, Sir, they will.

Author.

Well, be it so---that struggle's o'er---
Nay,---this shall prove one spur the more
Pleas'd if success attends, if not,
I've writ my name, and made a blot.

Bookseller.

But a good print.

Author.

The print? why there

I trust to honest LEACH's care.
What is't to me? in verse or prose,
I find the stuff, you make the clothes:
Add paper, print, and all such dress,
Will lose no credit from his press.

Bookseller.

You quite mistake the thing I mean,
---I'll fetch you, Sir, a MAGAZINE;
You see that picture there---the QUEEN.

Author.

A dedication to her too!

What will not folly dare to do?
O days of art! when happy skill
Can raise a likeness whence it will;
When portraits ask no REYNOLDS' aid,
And queens and kings are ready made.
No, no, my friend, by helps like these,
I cannot wish my work should please;
No pictures taken from the life,
Where all proportions are at strife;
NO HUMMING-BIRD, NO PAINTED FLOWER,
NO BEAST just landed in the TOWER,
NO WOODEN NOTES, NO COLOUR'D MAP,
NO COUNTRY-DANCE shall stop a gap;
O PHILOMATH, be not severe,
If not one problem meets you here;
Where gossip A, and neighbour B,
Pair, like good friends, with C and D;
And E F G, H I K join;
And curve and incidental line
Fall out, fall in, and cross each other,
Just like a sister and a brother.
Ye tiny poets, tiny wits,
Who frisk about on tiny tits,
Who words disjoin, and sweetly sing,
Take one third part and take the thing;
Then close the joints again, to frame
Some LADY's, or some CITY's name,
Enjoy your own, your proper Phæbus;
We neither make, nor print a REBUS,
NO CRAMBO, NO ACROSTIC fine,
Great letters lacing down each line;
No strange CONUNDRUM, no invention
Beyond the reach of comprehension,
NO RIDDLE, which whoe'er unties,
Claims twelve MUSEUMS for the PRIZE,
Shall strive to please you, at th' expence
Of simple taste and common sense.

Bookfeller.

But would not ORNAMENT produce
Some real grace and proper use?
A FRONTISPIECE would have its weight,
Neatly engrav'd on copper-plate.

Author.

Plain letter-press shall do the feat;
What need of foppery to be neat?
The pasteboard guard delights me more
That stands to watch a bun-house door,
Than such a mockery of grace,
And ornament so out of place.

Bookfeller.

But one word more, and I have done—
A PATENT might ensure its run.

Author.

Patent! for what? can patents give
A genius, or make blockheads live?
If so, O hail the glorious plan!
And buy it at what price you can.
But what, alas! will that avail
Beyond the property of sale?
A property of little worth,
If weak our produce at its birth.
For fame, for honest fame we strive,
But not to struggle half alive,
And drag a miserable being,
Its end still fearing and foreseeing.
Oh! may the flame of genius blaze,
Enkindled with the breath of praise!
But far be ev'ry fruitless puff
To blow to light a dying snuff.

Bookfeller.

But should not something, Sir, be said
Particular on ev'ry head?
What your ORIGINALS will be,
What infinite variety,
Multum in parvo, as they say,
And something neat in every way?

Author.

I wish there could—but that depends
Not on myself so much as friends.
I but set up a new machine,
With harness tight, and furnish'd clean;
Where such, who think it no disgrace
To send in time, and take a place,
The book-keeper shall minute down,
And I with pleasure drive to town.

Bookfeller.

Ay, tell them that, Sir, and then say,
What letters come in every day;
And what great wits your care procures,
To join their social hands with yours.

Author.

What! must I huge proposals print,
Merely to drop some saucy hint,
That real folks of real fame
Will give their works, and not their name?
—This puff's of use, you say—why let it,
We'll boast such friendship when we get it.

Bookfeller.

Get it! Ah, Sir, you do but jest;
You'll have assistance, and the best.
There's CHURCHILL—will not CHURCHILL lend Assistance?

Author.

Surely—to his FRIEND.

Bookfeller.

And then your interest might procure
Something from either CONNOISSEUR.
COLMAN and THORNTON, both will join
Their social hand, to strengthen thine;
And when your name appears in print,
Will GARRICK never drop a hint?

Author.

True, I've indulg'd such hopes before
From those you name, and many more;
And they, perhaps, again will join
Their hand, if not ashamed of mine.
Bold is the task we undertake;
The friends we wish, the WORK must make:
For wits, like adjectives, are known
To cling to that which stands alone.

Bookfeller.

Perhaps too, in our way of trade,
We might procure some useful aid:
Could we engage some able pen
To furnish matter now and then;
There's—what's his name, Sir? would com-
pile,
And methodise the news in style.

Author.

Take back your newsmen whence he came,
Carry your clutches to the lame.

Bookfeller.

You must enrich your book, indeed!
Bare MERIT never will succeed;
Which readers are not now a-days
By half so apt to buy as praise;
And praise is hardly worth pursuing,
Which tickles authors to their ruin.
Books shift about like ladies' dresses,
And there's a fashion in success.
But could not we, like little Bayes,
Armies imaginary raise?
And bid our generals take the field,
To head the troops that lie conceal'd?
Bid General ESSAY lead the van,
By—Oh! the style will show the man:
Bid Major SCIENCE bold appear,
With all his pot-hooks in the rear.

Author.

True, true—our NEWS, our PROSE, our RHYMES,
Shall show the colour of the times;
For which most salutary ends
We've fellow-soldiers, fellow-friends.
For city and for court affairs,
My lord duke's butler, and the mayor's.
For politics—eternal talkers,
Profound observers, and park-walkers.
For plays, great actors of renown,
(Lately or just arriv'd in town)
Or some, in state of abdication,
Of oratorical reputation;
Or those who live on scraps and bits,
Mere green-room wasps, and temple wits;
Shall teach you, in a page or two,
What GARRICK should, or should not do.
Trim poets from the city desk,
Deep vers'd in rural picturesque,

Who minute down, with wond'rous pains,
 What RIDER's autumn contains
 On flow'r and seed, and wind, and weather,
 And bind them in an ode together;
 Shall through the seasons monthly sing
Sweet WINTER, AUTUMN, SUMMER, SPRING.

Bookfeller.

Ah, sir! I see you love to jest,
 I did but hint things for the best.
 Do what you please, 'tis your design,
 And if it fails, no blame is mine;
 I leave the management to you,
 Your servant, Sir,

Author.

I'm yours,—Adieu.

CHIT-CHAT.

An Imitation of Theocritus.

IDYLL. XV. Εὔδοι Πραξινοῦ, &c.

Mrs. Brown.

Is Mistress SCOT at home, my dear?

Servant.

MA'M, is it you? I'm glad you're here,
 My Mistress, though resolv'd to wait,
 Is quite unpatient—'tis so late.
 She fancy'd you would not come down,
 —But pray walk in, MA'M—Mrs. BROWN.

Mrs. Scot.

Your servant, MADAM. Well, I swear
 I'd giv'n you over—Child, a chair.
 Pray, MA'M, be seated.

Mrs. Brown.

Lard! my dear,
 I vow I'm almost dead with fear.
 There is such scrouging and such squeeging,
 The folks are all so disobliging;
 And then the waggons, carts and drays
 So clog up all these narrow ways,
 What with the bustle and the throng,
 I wonder how I got along.
 Besides the walk is so immen c—
 Not that I grudge a coach expence,
 But then it jumbles me to death,
 —And I was always short of breath.
 How can you live so far, my dear?
 It's quite a journey to come here.

Mrs. Scot.

Lard! MA'M, I left it all to him,
 Husbands you know, will have their whim.—
 He took this house.—This house! this den
 See but the temper of some men.
 And I, forsooth, am hither hurl'd,
 To live quite out of all the world.
 Husband, indeed!

Mrs. Brown.

Hist! lower, pray,
 The child hears every word you say.
 See how he looks—

Mrs. Scot.

Jacky, come here,
 There's a good boy, look up, my dear.
 'Twas not papa we talk'd about,
 —Surely he cannot find it out.

Mrs. Brown.

See how the urchin holds his hands.
 Upon my life he understands.
 —There's a sweet child, come, kiss me, come,
 Will Jacky have a sugar-plumb?

Mrs. Scot.

This person, MADAM (call him so
 And then the child will never know)
 From house to house would ramble out,
 And every night a drunken-bout.
 For at a tavern he will spend
 His twenty shillings with a friend.
 Your rabbits fricasseed and chicken,
 With curious choice of dainty picking,
 Each night got ready at the Crown,
 With port and punch to wash 'em down,
 Would scarcely serve this belly-glutton,
 Whilst we must starve on mutton, mutton.

Mrs. Brown.

My good man, too—Lord bless us! wives
 Are born to lead unhappy lives,
 Although his profits bring him clear
 Almost two hundred pounds a-year,
 Keeps me of cash so short and bare,
 That I have not a gown to wear;
 Except my robe, and yellow sack,
 And this old lutestring on my back.
 —But we've no time, my dear, to waste.
 Come, where's your cardinal, make haste.
 The KING, God bless his majesty, I say,
 Goes to the house of lords to-day,
 In a fine painted coach and eight,
 And rides along in all his state.
 And then the QUEEN—

Mrs. Scot.

Aye, aye, you know,
 Great folks can always make a show,
 But tell me, do—I've never seen
 Her present majesty, the QUEEN.

Mrs. Brown.

Lard! we've no time for talking now,
 Hark!—one—two—three—'tis twelve I vow!

Mrs. Scot.

KITTY, my things,—I'll soon have done,
 It's time enough, you know, at one.
 —Why, girl! see how the creature stands!
 Some water here, to wash my hands.
 —Be quick—why sure the gipsy sleeps!
 —Look how the drawling daudle creeps.
 That basin there—why don't you pour,
 Go on, I say—stop, stop—no more—
 Lud! I could beat the huffey down,
 She's pour'd it all upon my gown.
 —Bring me my ruffles—can't not mind?
 And pin my handkerchief behind.
 Sure thou hast awkwardness enough,
 Go—fetch my gloves, and fan, and muff.
 —Well, heav'n be prais'd—this work is don
 I'm ready now, my dear—let's run.
 Girl,—put that bottle on the shelf,
 And bring me back the key yourself.

Mrs. Brown.

That clouded silk becomes you much,
 I wonder how you meet with such,

But you've a charming taste in drefs.
What might it cost you, Madam?

Mrs. Scot.

Guests.

Mrs. Brown.

Oh! that's impossible---for I
Am in the world the worst to buy.

Mrs. Scot.

I never love to bargain hard,
Five shillings, as I think, a-yard.
---I was afraid it should be gone---
'Twas what I'd set my heart upon.

Mrs. Brown.

Indeed you bargain'd with success,
For its a most delightful drefs.
Besides, it fits you to a hair,
And then 'tis flop'd with such an air.

Mrs. Scot.

I'm glad you think so,---Kitty, here,
Bring me my cardinal, my dear.
Jacky, my love, nay don't you cry,
Take you abroad!--indeed not I;
For all the Bugaboos to fright ye---
Besides, the naughty horse will bite ye;
With such a mob about the street,
Bless me, they'll tread you under feet.
Whine as you please, I'll have no blame,
You'd better blubber than be lame.
The more you cry, the less you'll li---
---Come, come then, give mamma a kifs,
KITTY, I say, here take the boy,
And fetch him down the last new toy,
Make him as merry as you can,
---There, go to KITTY---there's a man,
Call in the dog, and shut the door,
Now, Ma'm.

Mrs. Brown.

Oh Lard!

Mrs. Scot.

Pray go before.

Mrs. Brown.

I can't indeed, now.

Mrs. Scot.

MADAM, pray.

Mrs. Brown.

Well then, for once, I'll lead the way.

Mrs. Scot.

Lard! what an uproar! what a throng!
How shall we do to get along?
What will become of us?---look here,
Here's all the king's horse-guards, my dear.
Let us cross over---haste, be quick,
---Pray sir, take care---your horse will kick,
He'll kill his rider---he's so wild.
---I'm glad I did not bring the child.

Mrs. Brown.

Don't be afraid, my dear, come on,
Why don't you see the guards are gone?

Mrs. Scot.

Well, I begin to draw my breath;
But I was almost scar'd to death
For when a horse rears up and capers,
It always puts me in the vapours.
For as I live,---nay, don't you laugh,
I'd rather see a toad by half,

They kick and prance, and look so bold,
It makes my very blood run cold.
But let's go forward---come, be quick,
The crowd again grows vastly thick.

Mrs. Brown.

Come you from Palace-yard, old dame?

Old Woman.

Troth, do I, my young ladies, why?

Mrs. Brown.

Was it much crowded when you came?

Mrs. Scot.

And is his majesty gone by?

Mrs. Brown.

Can we get in, old lady, pray
To see him robe himself to-day?

Mrs. Scot.

Can you direct us, dame?

Old Woman.

Endeavour.

TROY could not stand a siege for ever.
By frequent trying, TROY was won.
All things, by trying, may be done.

Mrs. Brown.

Go thy ways, proverbs---well she's gone---
Shall we turn back, or venture on?
Look how the folks press on before,
And throng impatient at the door.

Mrs. Scot.

Perdigious! I can hardly stand,
Lord bless me, Mrs. BROWN, your hand;
And you, my dear, take hold of hers,
For we must stick as close as burrs,
Or in this racket, noise and pother,
We certainly shall lose each other.
---Good God! my cardinal and sack
Are almost torn from off my back.
Lard, I shall faint---Oh Lud---my breast---
I'm crush'd to atoms, I protest.
God bless me---I have dropt my fan,
---Pray did you see it, honest man?

Man.

I, madam! no,---indeed, I fear
You'll meet with some misfortune here.
---Stand back, I say---pray, sir, forbear---
Why, don't you see the ladies there?
Put yourselves under my direction,
Ladies, I'll be your safe protection.

Mrs. Scot.

You're very kind, sir; truly few
Are half so complaisant as you.
We shall be glad at any day
This obligation to repay,
And you'll be always sure to meet
A welcome, sir, in---Lard! the street
Bears such a name, I can't tell how
To tell him where I live, I vow.
---Mercy! what's all this noise and stir?
Pray is the KING a-coming, sir?

Man.

No---don't you hear the people shout?
'Tis Mr. PITT just going out.

Mrs. Brown.

Aye, there he goes, pray Heav'n bless him!
Well may the people all caress him.

---Lord, how my husband us'd to sit,
And drink success to honest PITT,
And happy o'er his evening cheer,
Cry, you shall pledge this toast, my dear.

Man.

Hist---silence---don't you hear the drumming?
Now, ladies, now, the KING's a-coming.
There, don't you see the guards approach?

Mrs. Brown.

Which is the king?

Mrs. Scot.

Which is the coach?

Scotchman

Which is the noble EARL OF BUTE,
Geud-faith, I'll gi him a salute.
For he's the laird of aw our clan,
Troth he's a bonny muckle man.

Man.

Here comes the coach, so very flow
As if it ne'er was made to go,
In all the gingerbread of state,
And staggering under its own weight.

Mrs. Scot.

Upon my word, it's monstrous fine!
Would half the gold upon't were mine!
How gaudy all the gilding shows!
It puts one's eyes out as it goes.
What a rich glare of various hues,
What shining yellows, scarlets, blues!
It must have cost a heavy price;
'Tis like a mountain drawn by mice.

Mrs. Brown.

So painted, gilded, and so large,
Bless me! 'tis like my lord mayor's barge.
And so it is---look how it reels!
'Tis nothing else---a barge on wheels.

Man.

Large! it can't pass St. James's gate,
So big the coach, the arch so strait,
It might be made to rumble through
And pass as other coaches do.
Could they a body-coachman get
So most preposterously fit,
Who'd undertake (and no rare thing)
Without a bead to drive the king.

Mrs. Scot.

Lard! what are those two ugly things
There---with their hands upon the springs,
Filthy, as ever eyes beheld,
With naked breasts, and faces swell'd?
What could the saucy maker mean,
To put such things to fright the QUEEN?

Man.

Oh! they are gods, ma'm, which you see,
Of the Marine Society,
Tritons, which in the ocean dwell,
And only rise to blow their shell.

Mrs. Scot.

Gods, d'ye call those filthy men?
Why don't they go to sea again?
Pray, tell me, sir, you understand,
What do these Tritons do on land?

Mrs. Brown.

And what are they? those hideous things,
Men, fish and birds, with flesh, scales, wings?

Man.

Oh, they are gods too, like the others,
All of one family and brothers,
Creatures, which seldom come a-shore,
Nor seen about the king before.
For show, they wear the yellow hue,
Their proper colour is true-blue.

Mrs. Scot.

Lord bless us! what's this noise about?
Lord, what a tumult and a rout!
How the folks holla, hiss, and hoot!
Well---Heav'n preserve the EARL OF BUTE!
I cannot stay, indeed, not I,
If there's a riot I shall die.
Let's make for any house we can,
Do---give us shelter, honest man.

Mrs. Brown.

I wonder'd where you was, my dear.
I thought I should have died with fear.
This noise and racketing and hurry
Has put my nerves in such a flurry!
I could not think where you was got,
I thought I'd lost you, Mrs. Scott;
Where's Mrs. Tape, and Mr. Grin?
Lard, I'm so glad we're all got in.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN THE AUTHOR AND HIS FRIENDS.

Friend.

You say, "it hurts you to the soul
To brook confinement or controul."
And yet will voluntary run
To that confinement you would shun,
Content to drudge along the track,
With bells and harness on your back.
Alas! what genius can admit
A monthly tax on spendthrift wit,
Which often flings whole stores away,
And oft has not a doit to play!
---Give us a work, indeed---of length---
Something which speaks poetic strength;
Is sluggish fancy at a stand?
No scheme of consequence in hand?
I, nor your plan, nor book condemn,
But why your name, and why A. M.?

Author.

Yes---it stands forth to public view,
Within, without, on white, on blue,
In proper, tall, gigantic letters,
Nor dash'd---emvowell'd---like my betters.
And though it stares me in the face,
Reflects no shame, hints no disgrace.
While these unlaboured trifles please,
Familiar chains are worn with ease.
---Behold! to yours and my surprise,
These trifles to a VOLUME rise.
Thus will you see me, as I go,
Still gath'ring bulk like balls of snow,
Steal by degrees upon your shelf,
And grow a giant from an elf.
The current studies of the day,
Can rarely reach beyond a PLAY:
A PAMPHLET may deserve a look,
But Heav'n defend us from a BOOK!

A LIBEL flies on scandal's wings,
But works of length are heavy things.
---Not one in twenty will succeed---
Consider, Sir, how few can read.

Friend.

I mean a work of merit—

Author.

True.

Friend.

A man of taste MUST buy.

Author.

Yes;—You

And half a dozen more, my friend,
Whom your good taste shall recommend.
Experience will by facts prevail,
When argument and reason fail;
The NUPTIALS now—

Friend.

Whose nuptials, sir?—

Author.

A poet's—did that poem sir?
No—fixt—though thousand readers pass,
It still looks through its pane of glass,
And seems indignant to exclaim
Pass on ye SONS of TASTE, for shame!

While duly each revolving moon,
Which often comes, God knows too soon,
Continual plagues my soul molest,
And magazines disturb my rest,
While scarce a night I steal to bed,
Without a couplet in my head.
And in the morning, when I stir,
Pop comes a devil, “copy sir.”
I cannot strive with daring flight
To reach the bold Parnassian HEIGHT;
But at it's foot, content to stray,
In easy unambitious way,
Pick up those flowers the muses send,
To make a nosegay for my friend.
In short, I lay no idle claim
To genius strong, and noisy fame.
But with a hope and wish to please,
I write, as I would live, with ease.

Friend.

But you must have a fund, a mine,
Prose, poems, letters,

Author.

Not a line.

And here, my friend, I rest secure;
He can't lose much, who's always poor.
And if, as now, through numbers five,
This work with pleasure kept alive
Can still its currency afford,
Nor fear the breaking of its hoard,
Can pay you, as at sundry times,
For self per Mag, two thousand rhymes,
From whence should apprehension grow,
That self should fail, with richer Co?

No poet of a monthly grub,
Myself alone a learned club,
I ask my readers to no treat
Of scientific hash'd-up meat,
Nor seek to please theatric friends,
With scraps of plays, and odds and ends.

Friend.

Your method, Sir, is plain enough;
And all the world has read your PUFF*.
Th' allusion's neat, expression clean,
About your travelling MACHINE,
But yet---it is a magazine.

Author.

Why let it be, and wherefore shame?
As JULIET says, what's in a name?
Besides it is the way of trade,
Through which all science is convey'd,
Thus knowledge parcels out her shares;
The COURT has hers, the LAWYERS theirs.
Something to SCHOLARS sure is due,---
Why not one MAGAZINE for YOU?

Friend.

That's an Herculean task, my friend,
You toil and labour---to offend.
Part of your scheme---a free translation,
To SCHOLARS is a profanation;
What! break up Latin! pull down Greek!
(Peace to the soul of Sir JOHN CHEEKE †)!
And shall the gen'rous liquor run,
Broach'd from the rich FALERNIAN tun?
Will you pour out to English swine,
Neat as imported, old GREEK wine?
Alas! such beverage only fits
Collegiate tastes, and classic wits.

Author.

I seek not, with satiric stroke,
To strip the pedant of his cloak;
No—let him cull and spout quotations,
And call the jabber, demonstrations,
Be his the great concern to show,
If Roman gowns were tied or no ‡;
Whether the Grecians took a slice
Four times a-day, or only twice,
Still let him work about his hole,
Poor, busy, blind, laborious mole;
Still let him puzzle, read, explain,
Oppugn, remark, and read again.
Such, though they waste the midnight oil
In dull, minute, perplexing toil,
Not understanding, do no good,
Nor can do harm, not understood.

By scholars, apprehend me right,
I mean the learned, and polite,
Whose knowledge unaffected flows,
And sits as easy as their clothes;
Who care not though an ac or sed
Misplac'd, endanger PRISCIAN's head;
Nor think his wit a grain the worse,
Who cannot frame a Latin verse,
Or give the Roman proper word
To things the ROMANS never heard.

'Tis true, except among the great,
Letters are rather out of date,
And quaking genius more discerning,
Scoffs at your regulars in learning.
---PEDANTS, indeed, are learning's curse,
But IGNORANCE is something worse:

† The first restorer of Greek learning in England.

‡ See Sigonius and Manutius.

All are not blest with reputation,
Built on the WANT of EDUCATION,
And some, to letters duly bred,
Mayn't write the worse, because they've read.
Though books had better be unknown,
Than not one thought appear our own ;
As some can never speak themselves,
But through the authors on their shelves,
Whose writing smacks too much of reading,
As affectation spoils good breeding.

Friend.

True ; but that fault is seldom known,
Save in your bookish college drone.
Who, constant (as I've heard them say)
Study their fourteen hours a-day,
And squatting close, with dull attention,
Read themselves out of apprehension ;
Who scarce can wash their hands or face,
For fear of losing time, or place,
And give one hour to meat and drink,
But never half a one to THINK.

Author.

Lord ! I have seen a thousand such,
Who read, or seem to read, too much,
So have I known, in that rare place,
Where classics always breed disgrace,
A wight, upon discoveries hot,
As whether flames have heat or not,
Study himself, poor sceptic dunce,
Into the very fire at once,
And clear the philosophic doubt,
By burning all ideas out.
With such, eternal books, successive
Lead to no sciences progressive,
While each dull fit of study past,
Just like a wedge drives out the last.

From these I ground no expectation
Of genuine wit, or free translation ;
But you mistake me, friend. Suppose,
(Translations are but modern clothes)
I dress my boy—(for instance sake Maintain these children which I make)
I give him coat and breeches—

Friend.

True—

But not a bib and apron too !
You would not let your child be seen,
But dress consistent, neat, and clean.

Author.

So would I clothe a free translation,
Or as Pope calls it, imitation ;
Not pull down authors from my shelf,
To spoil their wit, and plague myself,
My learning studious to display,
And lose their spirit by the way.

Friend.

Your HORACE now—e'en borrow thence
His easy wit, his manly sense,
But let the moralist convey
Things in the manners of to-day,
Rather than that old garb assume,
Which only suits a man at Rome.

Author.

Originals will always please,
And copies too, if done with ease.

Would not old PLAUTUS wish to wear,
Turn'd English host, an English air,
If THORNTON, rich in native wit,
Would make the modes and diction fit ?
Or, as I know you hate to roam,
To fetch an instance nearer home ;
Though in an idiom most unlike,
A similarity must strike,
Where both of simple nature fond,
In art and genius correspond ;
And native both (allow the phrase
Which no one English word conveys)
Wrapt up their stories neat and clean,
Easy as —————

Friend.

DENNIS's you mean.

—The very man—not mere translation,
But LA FONTAINE by transmigration.

Author.

Authors, as DRYDEN's maxim runs
Have what he calls poetic sons,
Thus MILTON, more correctly wild,
Was richer Spenser's lawful child :
And CHURCHILL, got on all the nine,
Is DRYDEN's heir in every line.
Thus DENNIS proves his parents plain,
The child of EASE and LA FONTAINE.

Friend.

His muse, indeed, the work secures,
And asks our praise as much as your's ;
For if, delighted, readers too
May pay their thanks as well as you.

But YOU, my friend (so folks complain)
For ever in this easy vein,
This prose in verse, this measur'd talk,
This pace that's neither trot nor walk,
Aim at no flights, nor strive to give
A real poem fit to live.

Author.

(To critics no offence I hope)
PaiOR shall live as long as POPE.
Each in his manner, sure to please,
While both have strength, and both have ease,
Yet though their various beauties strike,
Their ease, their strength is not alike.
Both with consummate horseman's skill,
Ride as they list about the bill ;
But take, peculiar in their mode,
Their favourite horse, and favourite road.

For me, once fond of author fame,
Now forc'd to bear its weight and shame,
I have no time to run a race,
A traveller's my only pace.
They, whom their steeds unjaded bear
Around Hyde-Park, to take the air,
May frisk and prance, and ride their fill,
And go all paces which they will ;
We backney tits—nay, never smile,
Who trot our stage of thirty mile,
Must travel in a constant plan,
And run our journey, as we can.

Friend.

A critic says, upon whose sleeve
Some pin more faith than you'll believe,

That writings which as easy please,
Are not the writings wrote with ease.
From whence the inference is plain,
Your friend MAT. PRIOR wrote with pain.

Author.

With pain perhaps he might correct
With care supply each loose defect,
Yet sure, if rhyme, which seems to flow
Whether its master will or no,
If humour, not by study sought,
But rising from immediate thought,
Are proofs of ease, what hardy name
Shall e'er dispute a PRIOR's claim!

But still your critic's observation
Strikes at no POET's reputation,
His keen reflection only hits
Your rhyming fops and pedling wits.
As some take stiffness for a grace,
And walk a dancing-master's pace,
And others, for familiar air
Mistake the slouching of a bear;
So some will finically trim,
And dress their lady muse too prim,
Others, mere slovens in their pen
(The mob of Lords and Gentlemen)
Fancy they write with ease and pleasure,
By rambling out of rhyme and measure.
And, on your critic's judgment, these
Write easy, and not with EASE.

There are, indeed, whose wish pursues,
And inclination courts the muse;
Who happy in a partial fame,
A while possess a poet's name.
But read their works, examine fair.
—Show me invention, fancy there,
Taste I allow; but is the flow
Of genius in them? Surely, no.
'Tis labour from the classic brain.
Read your own ADDISON's CAMPAIGN.
E'en he, nay, think me not severe,
A critic fine, of Latin ear,
Who tofs'd his classic thoughts around
With elegance on Roman ground,
Just simmering with the muse's flame
Woos but a cool and sober dame;
And all his English rhymes express
But beggar-thoughts in royal dress.
In verse his genius seldom glows,
A POET only in his prose,
Which rolls luxuriant, rich, and chaste,
Improv'd by fancy, wit, and taste.

Friend.

I task you for yourself, my friend,
A subject you can ne'er defend,
And you cajole me all the while
With dissertations upon style.
Leave others wits and works alone,
And think a little of your own.
For FAME, when all is said and done,
Though a coy mistress may be won;
And half the thought, and pains, and time,
You take to jingle easy rhyme,
Would make an ODE, would make a PLAY,
Done into English, MALLOCH's way,
—Stretch out your more Heroic feet,
And write an ELEGY complete.

VOL. I

Or, not a more laborious task,
Could you not pen a classic MASQUE?

Author.

With will at large, and unclogg'd wings,
I durst not soar to such high things.
For I, who have more phlegm than fire,
Must understand, or not admire,
But when I read with admiration,
Perhaps I'll write in IMITATION.

Friend.

But business of this monthly kind,
Need that alone engross your mind.
Assistance must pour in a-pace,
New passengers will take a place,
And then your friends—

Author.

Aye, they indeed,
Might make a better work succeed,
And with the helps which they shall give,
I and the Magazine shall live.

Friend.

Yes, live, and eat, and nothing more,

Author.

I'll live as—Authors did before.

THE POET.

AN EPISTLE TO C. CHURCHILL.

WELL—shall I wish you joy of fame,
That loudly echoes CHURCHILL's name,
And sets you on the muses' throne,
Which right of conquest made your own?
Or shall I (knowing how unfit
The world esteems a man of wit,
That wheresoever he appears,
They wonder if the knave has ears)
Address with joy and lamentation,
CONDOLENCE and CONGRATULATION,
As colleges, who duly bring
Their mels of verse to every king,
Too economical in taste,
Their sorrow or their joy to waste:
Mix both together, sweet and sour;
And bind the thorn up with the flow'r?
Sometimes 'tis elegy, or ode,
Epistle now's your only mode.
Whether that style more glibly hits,
The fancies of our rambling wits,
Who wince and kick at all oppression,
But love to straggle in digression;
Or, that by writing to the GREAT
In letters, honours, or estate,
We slip more easy into fame,
By clinging to another's name,
And with their strength our weakness yoke,
As ivy climbs about an oak;
As TUFT-HUNTERS will buzz and purr
About a FELLOW COMMONER,
Or crows will wing a higher flight,
When sailing round the floating kite.
Whate'er the motive, 'tis the mode,
And I will travel in the road,
The fashionable track pursue,
And write my simple thoughts to YOU,
Just as they rise from head or heart,
Not marshall'd by the herald art.

T t

By vanity or pleasure led,
From thirst of fame, or want of bread,
Shall any start up sons of rhyme

PATHETIC, EASY, or SUBLIME?

—You'd think, to hear what critics say,

Their labour was no more than play:

And that, but such a paltry station

Reflects disgrace on education,

(As if we could at once forsake

What education helps to make)

Each reader has superior skill,

And can write better when he will.

In short, howe'er you toil and drudge,

The world, the mighty world, is judge,

And nice and fanciful opinion

Sways all the world with strange dominion;

Opinion! which on crutches walks,

And sounds the words another talks.

Bring me eleven critics grown,

Ten have no judgment of their own:

But, like the Cyclops watch the nod

Of some informing master god.

Or as, when near his latest breath,

The patient fain would juggle death,

When DOCTORS sit in CONSULTATION

(Which means no more than conversation,

A kind of comfortable chat

'Mongst social friends, on this and that,

As whether stocks get up or down,

And tittle-tattle of the town;

Books, pictures, politics, and news,

Who lies with whom, and who got whose)

Opinions never disagree,

One doctor writes, all take the fee.

But eminence offends at once

The owlish eye of critic dunce,

DULLNESS alarm'd, collects her force,

And FOLLY screams till she is hoarse.

Then far abroad the LIBEL flies

From all th' artillery of lies,

MALICE, delighted, flaps her wing,

And EPIGRAM prepares her sting.

Around the frequent pellets whistle

From SATIRE, ODE, and pert EPISTLE;

While every blockhead strives to throw

His share of vengeance on his foe:

As if it were a Shrove-tide game,

And cocks and poets were the same.

Thus should a wooden collar deck

Some woeful 'quire's embarrass'd neck,

When high above the crowd he stands

With equi-distant sprawling hands,

And without hat, politely bare,

Pops out his head to take the air;

The mob his kind acceptance begs

Of dirt, and stones, and addle-eggs.

O GENIUS! though thy noble skill

Can guide thy Pegasus at will;

Flee; let him bear thee as the wind—

DULLNESS mounts up and clings behind,

In vain you spur, and whip, and smack,

You cannot shake her from your back.

Ill nature springs as merit grows,

Close as the thorn is to the rose.

Could HERCULANEUM's friendly earth

Give MÆVIUS' works a second birth,

MALEVOLENCE, with lifted eyes,

Would sanctify the noble prize.

While modern critics should behold

Their near relation to the old,

And wondering gape at one another,

To see the likeness of a brother.

But with us rhyming moderns here,

Critics are not the only fear;

The poet's bark meets sharper shocks

From other sands, and other rocks.

Not such alone who understand,

Whose book and memory are at hand,

Who scientific skill profess,

And are great adepts—more or less;

(Whether distinguish'd by degree,

They write A. M. or sign M. D.

Or make advances somewhat higher

And take a new degree of 'SQUIRE.)

Who read your authors, Greek and Latin,

And bring you strange quotations pat in,

As if each sentence grew more terse

From odds and ends, and scraps of verse;

Who with true poetry dispense,

So social sound suits simple sense,

And load one letter with the labours,

Which should be shar'd among its neighbours.

Who know that thought produces pain,

And deep reflection made the brain,

And therefore, wise and prudent grown,

Have no ideas of their own.

But if the man of nature speak,

Advance their bayonets of Greek,

And keep plain sense at such a distance,

She cannot give a friend assistance.

Not these alone in judgment rise,

And shoot at genius as it flies,

But those who cannot spell, will TALK,

As women scold, who cannot walk.

Your man of habit, who's wound up

To eat and drink, and dine and sup,

But has not either will or pow'r

To break out of his formal hour;

Who lives by rule, and ne'er outgoes it;

Moves like a clock, and hardly knows it;

Who is a kind of breathing being,

Which has but half the pow'r of seeing;

Who stands for ever on the brink,

Yet dare not plunge enough to think,

Nor has one reason to supply

Wherefore he does a thing, or why,

But what he does proceeds so right,

You'd think him always guided by't;

Joins poetry and vice together

Like sun and rain in April weather,

Holds rake and wit as things the same,

And all the difference but a NAME.

A rake! alas! how many wear

The brow of mirth, with heart of care!

The desperate wretch reflection flies,

And shuns the way where madness lies,

Dreads each increasing pang of grief,

And runs to FOLLY for relief,

There, 'midst the momentary joys

Of giddy mirth and frantic noise,

FORGETFULNESS, her eldest born,

Smooths the world's hate, and blockhead's scorn,

Then PLEASURE wins upon the mind,
Ye CARES, go whistle to the wind,
Then welcome frolic, welcome whim!
The world is all alike to him.

Distress is all in apprehension;
It ceases when 'tis past prevention:
And happiness then presses near,
When not a hope's left, not a fear.
—But you've enough, nor want my preaching,
And I was never form'd for teaching.

Male prudes we know (those driv'ling things),
Will have their gibes, and taunts, and flings.
How will the sober cit abuse,
The fallies of the culprit muse;
To her and poet shut the door,
And whip the beggar, with his whore!

POET! — a FOOL! a WRETCH! a KNAVE!
A mere mechanic dirty slave!
What is his verse, but cooping sense
Within an arbitrary fence?
At best, but ringing that in rhyme,
Which prose would say in half the time?
Measure and numbers! what are those
But artificial chains for prose?
Which mechanism quaintly joins
In parallels of see-saw lines.
And when the frisky wanton writes
In PINDAR'S (what d'ye call 'em) — flights
Th' uneven measure, short and tall,
Now rhyming twice, now not at all,
In curves and angles twirls about,
Like Chinese railing, in and out.

Thus when you've labour'd hours on hours,
Cull'd all the sweets, cull'd all the flow'rs,
The churl, whose dull imagination
Is dead to every fine sensation,
Too gross to relish nature's bloom,
Or taste her simple rich perfume,
Shall cast them by as useless stuff,
And fly with keenness to his — stuff.

Look round the world, not one in ten,
Thinks poets good, or honest men.

'Tis true their conduct not o'er nice,
Sits often loose to easy vice.
Perhaps their temperance will not pass
The due rotation of the glass;
And gravity denies 'em pow'r
T' unpeg their hats at such an hour.

Some vices must to all appear
As constitutional as FEAR;
And every moralist will find
A ruling passion in the mind:
Which, though pent up and barricado'd;
Like winds, where Æolus bravado'd;
Like them, will sally from their den,
And raise a tempest now and then;
Unhinge dame PRUDENCE from her plan,
And ruffle all the world of man.

Can authors then exemption draw
From nature's, or the common law?
They err alike with all mankind,
Yet not the same indulgence find.
Their lives are more conspicuous grown,
More talk'd of, pointed at, and shown.
Till every error seems to rise
To SINS of most gigantic size.

Thus fares it still, however hard,
With every wit, and ev'ry bard.
His public writings, private life,
Nay more, his mistress, or his wife,
And ev'ry social, dear connection,
Must bear a critical dissection:
While friends connive, and rivals hate,
Scoundrels traduce, and blockheads bait.
Perhaps you'll readily admit
There's danger from the trading wit,
And dunce and fool, and such as those,
Must be of course the poet's foes:
But sure no sober man alive,
Can think that friends would e'er connive.

From just remarks on earliest time,
In the first infancy of rhyme,
It may be fairly understood
There were two sects — the bad, the good.
Both fell together by the ears,
And both beat up for volunteers.
By interest, or by birth allied,
Numbers flock'd in on either side.
WIT to his weapons ran at once,
While all the cry was — down with DUNCE!
Onward he led his social bands,
The common cause had join'd their hands.
Yet even while their zeal they show,
And war against the gen'ral foe,
Howe'er their rage flam'd fierce and cruel,
They'd stop it all to fight a duel.
And each cool wit would meet his brother,
To pink and tilt at one another.

Jealous of every puff of fame,
The idle whist'ling of a name,
The property of half a line,
Whether a comma's yours or mine,
Shall make a bard a bard engage,
And shake the friendship of an age.
But diffident and modest wit
Is always ready to submit;
Fearful of press and publication,
Consults a brother's observation,
Talks of the maggot of his brains,
As hardly worth the critic pains;
"If ought disgusts the sense or ear,
"You cannot, Sir, be too severe.
"Expunge, correct, do what you will.
"I leave it to superior skill;
"Exert the office of a friend,
"You may oblige, but can't offend."

This bard too has his private clan,
Where be's the great, the only man.
Here, while the bottle and the bowl
Promote the joyous flow of soul,
(And sense of mind, no doubt, grows stronger
When failing legs can stand no longer)
Emphatic judgment takes the chair,
And damns about her with an air.
Then each, self-puff'd, and hero grown,
Able to cope with hosts alone,
Draw canfir like his murders blends,
First slays his foes, and then his friends.

While your good word, or conversation,
Can lend a brother reputation;
While verse or preface quaintly penn'd,
Can raise the consequence of friend,

How visible the kind affection!
 How close the partial fond connection!
 Then he is quick, and I'm discerning,
 And I have wit, and he has learning,
 My judgment's strong, and his is chaste;
 And BOTH—ay BOTH, are men of taste.

Should you nor steal nor borrow aid,
 And set up for yourself in trade,
 Resolv'd imprudently to show
 That 'tis not alway wit and Co.
 Feelings, before unknown, arise,
 And genius looks with jealous eyes.
 Though thousands may arrive at fame,
 Yet never take one path the same,
 An author's vanity or pride
 Can't bear a neighbour by his side,
 Although he but delighted goes
 Along the track which nature shows,
 Nor ever madly runs astray,
 To cross his brother in his way.
 And some there are, whose narrow minds
 Center'd in self, self always blinds,
 Who, at a friend's re-echoed praise,
 Which their own voice conspir'd to raise,
 Shall be more deep and inly hurt,
 Than from a foe's insulting dirt.

And some, too timid to reveal
 That glow of heart, and forward zeal,
 Which words are scanty to express,
 But friends must feel from friends' success,
 When full of hopes and fears, the muse,
 Which every breath of praise pursues,
 Would open to their free embrace,
 Meet her with such a blasting face,
 That all the brave imagination,
 Which seeks the sun of approbation,
 No more its early blossoms tries,
 But curls its tender leaves, and dies.

Is there a man, whose genius strong,
 Rolls like a rapid stream along,
 Whose muse, long hid in cheerless night,
 Pours on us like a flood of light,
 Whose acting comprehensive mind
 Walks fancy's regions, unconfin'd;
 Whom, nor the surly sense of pride,
 Nor affectation, warps aside;
 Who drags no author from his shelf,
 To talk on with an eye to self;
 Careless alike, in conversation,
 Of censure, or of approbation;
 Who freely thinks, and freely speaks,
 And meets the wit he never seeks;
 Whose reason calm, and judgment cool,
 Can pity but not hate a fool;
 Who can a hearty praise bestow,
 If merit sparkles in a foe;
 Who bold and open, firm and true,
 Flatters no friends—yet loves them too;
 CHURCHILL will be the last to know
 His is the portrait, I would show.

THE TWO RUBRIC POSTS.

A DIALOGUE.

IN Russel-street, ensued of late,
 Between two posts a strange debate.

—Two posts—aye posts—for posts can speak,
 In Latin, Hebrew, French or Greek.

One Rubric thus address'd the other:

—A noble situation, brother,

With authors lac'd from top to toe,

Methinks we cut a taring show,

The dia ogues of famous dead *.

You know how much they're bought and read.

Suppose again we raise their ghosts,

And make them chat through us two posts;

A thing's half finish'd well begun,

So take the authors as they run.

The list of names is mighty fine,

You look down this, and I that line.

Here's POPE and SWIFT, and STEELE and GAY,

And CONGREVE, in the modern way.

Whilst you have those, I cannot speak,

But found most wonderful in Greek.

—A dialogue—I should adore it,

With such a show of names before it.

Modern, your judgment wanders wide,

The ancient Rubric strait reply'd.

It grieves me much, indeed, to find

We never can be of a mind;

Before one door, and in one street,

Neither ourselves nor thoughts can meet.

And we, as brother oft with brother,

Are at a distance from each other.

Suppose among the letter'd dead,

Some author should erect his head,

And starting from his rubric, pop

Directly into Davies' shop,

Turn o'er the leaves, and look about.

To find his own opinions out;

D'ye think one author out of ten

Would know his sentiments agen?

Thinking, your authors differ less in,

Than in their manner of expressing.

'Tis style which makes the writer known,

The mark he sets upon his own.

Let CONGREVE speak as CONGREVE writ,

And keep the ball up of his wit;

Let SWIFT be SWIFT, nor e'er demean

The sense and humour of the DEAN.

E'en let the ancients rest in peace,

Nor bring good folks from Rome or Greece

To give a cause for past transactions,

They never dreamt of in their actions.

I can't help quibbling, brother post,

'Twere better we should lay the ghost,

But 'twere a task of real merit

Could we contrive to raise their spirit.

Peace, brother, peace, though what you say,

I own has reason in its way,

On dialogues to bear so hard,

Is playing with a dangerous card;

Writers of rank are sacred things,

And crush like arbitrary kings.

Perhaps your sentiment is right,

Heav'n grant we may not suffer by't.

For should friend DAVIES overhear,

He'll publish ours another year."

* By Lord Lyttleton.

S O N G.

THOUGH winter its desolate train
Of frost and of tempest may bring,
Yet Flora steps forward again,
And nature rejoices in spring.

Though the sun in his glories decreast,
Of his beams in the evening is shorn,
Yet he rises with joy from the east,
And repairs them again in the morn.

But what can youth's sunshine recal,
Or the blossoms of beauty restore?
When its leaves are beginning to fall,
It dies, and is heard of no more.

The spring time of love then employ,
'Tis a lesson that's easy to learn,
For Cupid's a vagrant, a boy,
And his seasons will never return.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE TO J. B. ESQ.

SHALL I, from worldly friends estrang'd,
Embitter'd much, but nothing chang'd
In that affection firm and true,
Which gratitude excites to you;
Shall I indulge the muse, or stifle
This meditation of a trifle?

But you, perhaps, will kindly take
The trifle for the giver's sake,
Who only pays his grateful mite,
The just acknowledgment of right,
As to the landlord duly sent
A pepper-corn shall pass for rent.

Yet trifles often show the man,
More than his settled life and plan:
These are the starts of inclination;
Those the mere gloss of EDUCATION,
Which has a wond'rous knack at turning
A blockhead to a man of learning;
And, by the help of form and place,
The child of sin to babe of grace.
Not that it alters nature quite,
And sets perverted reason right,
But, like hypocrisy, conceals
The very passions which she feels;
And claps a vizard on the face,
To hide us from the world's disgrace,
Which as the first appearance strikes,
Approves of all things or dislikes.
Like the fond fool with eager glee,
Who sold his all, and put to sea,
Lur'd by the calm which seem'd to sleep
On the smooth surface of the deep;
Nor dreamt its waves could proudly rise,
And toss up mountains to the skies.

APPEARANCE is the only thing,
A king's a wretch, a wretch a king.
Undress them both-- You king, suppose
For once you wear the beggar's clothes;
Clothes that will take in every air;
--Bless me! they fit you to a hair.
Now you, Sir Vagrant, quickly don
The robes his majesty had on.

And now, O WORLD, so wond'rous wife,
Who see with such discerning eyes,
Put observation to the stretch,
Come--which is king, and which is wretch?

To cheat this world, the hardest task
Is to be constant to our mask.

Externals make direct impressions,
And masks are worn by all professions.

What need to dwell on topics stale?

Of parsons drunk with wine or ale?

Of lawyers, who with face of brass,

For learned rhetoricians pass?

Of scientific doctors big,

Hid in the pent house of their wig?

Whose conversation hardly goes

Beyond half words, and hums! and Oh's!

Of scholars, of superior taste,

Who cork it up for fear of waste,

Nor bring one bottle from their shelves,

But keep it always for themselves?

Wretches like these my soul disdains,

And doubts their hearts as well as brains,

Suppose a neighbour should desire

To light a candle at your fire,

Would it deprive your flame of light,

Because another profits by't?

But youth must often pay its court,

To these great scholars by report,

Who live on hoarded reputation

Which dares no risk of conversation,

And boast within a store of knowledge,

Sufficient, biefs us! for a college,

But take a prudent care, no doubt,

That not a grain shall straggle out;

And are of wit too nice and fine,

To throw their pearl and gold to swine;

And therefore, to prevent deceit,

Think every man a hog they meet.

These may perhaps as scholars shine,

Who hang themselves out for a sign.

What signifies a lion's skin,

If it conceals an ass within?

If thou'rt a lion, prithee roar;

If ass--bray once, and stalk no more;

In words as well as looks be wise,

Silence is folly in disguise;

With so much wisdom bottled up,

Uncork, and give your friends a sup.

What need your nothings thus to save?

Why place the dial in the grave?

A fig for wit and reputation,

Which sneaks from all communication.

So in a post-bag, cheek by jole,

Letters will go from pole to pole,

Which may contain a wond'rous deal;

But then they travel under seal,

And though they bear your wit about,

Yet who shall ever find it out,

Till trusty wax foregoes its use,

And sets imprison'd meaning loose?

Yet idle folly often deems

What man must be from what he seems;

As if, to look a dwelling o'er,

You'd go no farther than the door.

Mark yon round parson, fat and sleek,

Who preaches only once a week,

Whom claret, flesh, and ven'son join
To make an orthodox divine;
Whose holiness receives its beauty
From income large, and little duty;
Who loves the pipe, the glass, the smock,
And keeps---a curate for his flock.
The world, obsequious to his nod,
Shall hail this oily man of God,
While the poor priest, with half a score
Of prattling infants at his door,
Whose sober wishes ne'er regale
Beyond the homely jug of ale,
Is hardly deem'd companion fit
For man of wealth, or man of wit,
Though learn'd perhaps and wise as he
Who signs with staring S. T. P.
And full of sacerdotal pride,
Lays God and duty both aside.

"This curate, say you, learn'd and wise!
"Why does not then this curate rise?"

This curate then, at forty-three,
(Years which become a curacy)
At no great mart of letters bred,
Had strange odd notions in his head,
That parts, and books, and application,
Furnish'd all means of education;
And that a pulpiteer should know
More than his gaping flock below;
That learning was not got with pain,
To be forgotten all again;
That Latin words, and rumbling Greek,
However charming sounds to speak,
Apt or unapt in each quotation,
Were insults on a congregation,
Who could not understand one word
Of all the learned stuff they heard;
That something more than preaching fine,
Should go to make a sound divine;
That church, and prayer, and holy Sunday,
Were no excuse for sinful Monday;
That pious doctrine, pious life,
Should both make one, as man and wife.

Thinking in this uncommon mode,
So out of all the priestly road,
What man alive can e'er suppose,
Who marks the way PREFERMENT goes,
That she should ever find her way
To this poor curate's house of clay?

Such was the priest, so strangely wise!
He could not bow---How should he rise?
Learned he was, and deeply read;
---But what of that?---not duly bred.
For he had suck'd no grammar-rules
From royal founts or public schools,
Nor gain'd a single corn of knowledge
From that vast granary---a college.
A granary, which food supplies
To vermin of uncommon size.

Aye, now indeed the matter's clear,
There is a mighty error here.
A public school's the place alone,
Where duly talents may be known.
It has, no doubt, its imperfections,
But then, such friendships, such connections!
The parent who has form'd his plan,
And in his child consider'd man,

What is his grand and golden rule?

"Make your connections, child at school.
"Mix with your equals fly inferiors,
"But follow closely your superiors,
"On them your every hope depends,
"Be prudent, Tom, get useful friends;
"And therefore like a spider wait,
"And spin your web about the great,
"If my Lord's genius wants supplies,
"Why---You must make his exercise.
"Let the young Marquis take your place,
"And bear a whipping for his Grace.
"Suppose (such things may happen once)
"The nobles wits, and you the dunce,
"Improve the means of education;
"And learn commodious adulation.
"Your master scarcely holds it sin,
"He chucks his Lordship on the chin,
"And would not for the world rebuke,
"Beyond a pat, the school-boy Duke.
"The pastor there, of --- what's the place?

"With smiles eternal in his face,
"With dimpling cheek, and snowy hand, A
"That shames the whiteness of his band;
"Whose mincing dialect abounds
"In hums and hahs, and half-form'd sounds;
"Whose elocution, fine and chaste,
"Lays his commands with judgment waist;
"And lest the company should hear,
"Whispers his nothings in your ear;
"Think you 'twas zeal, or virtue's care
"That plac'd the smirking doctor there?
"No---'twas connections form'd at school
"With some rich wit, or noble fool,
"Obsequious flattery, and attendance,
"A wilful, useful, base dependance;
"A supple bowing of the knees
"To any human god you please,
"(For true good-breeding's so polite,
"I would call the very devil white)
"I was watching others shifting will,
"And veering to and fro with skill:
"These were the means that made him rise,
"Mind your connections, and be wise.
Methinks I hear son Tom reply,
I'll be a bishop by and by.

Connections at a public school
Will often serve a wealthy fool,
By lending him a letter'd knave
To bring him credit, or to save;
And knavery gets a profit real,
By giving parts and worth ideal.
The child that marks this slavish plan,
Will make his fortune when a man.
While honest wit's ingenious merit
Enjoys his pittance, and his spirit.

The strength of public education
Is quick'ning parts by EMULATION;
And emulation will create
In narrow minds a jealous state,
Which stifled for a course of years,
From want of skill or mutual fears,
Breaks out in manhood with a zeal,
Which none but trival wits can feel.
For when good people wits commence,
They lose all other kind of sense;

(The maxim makes you smile, I see,
Retort it when you please on me);
One writer always hates another,
As emperors would kill a brother,
Or empress-queen to rule alone,
Pluck down a husband from the throne.

When tir'd of friendship and alliance,
Each side springs forward to defiance,
Inveterate hate and resolution,
Faggot, and fire, and persecution,
Is all their aim, and all their cry,
Though neither side can tell you why.
To it they run like valiant men,
And flash about them with their pen.

What inkshed springs from altercation!
What loppings off of reputation!
You might as soon hush stormy weather,
And bring the north and south together,
As reconcile your letter'd foes,
Who come to all things but dry blows.

Your desperate lovers wan and pale,
As needy culprits in a jail,
Who muse, and doat, and pine, and die,
Scorch'd by the lightning of an eye,
(For ladies' eyes, with fatal stroke,
Will blast the veriest heart of oak)
Will wrangle, bicker, and complain,
Merely to make it up again.
Though swain look glum, and miss look fiery,
'Tis nothing but amantium ira,
And all the progress purely this—
A frown, a pout, a tear, a kiss.
Thus love and quarrels (April weather)
Like vinegar and oil together,
Join in an easy mingled strife,
To make the salad up of life.
Love settles best from altercation,
As liquors after fermentation.

In a stage-coach, with lumber cramm'd,
Between two bulky bodies jamm'd,
Did you ne'er writhe yourself about,
To find the seat and cushion out?
How disagreeably you sit,
With b—m awry, and place unfit,
Till some kind jolt o'er ill-pav'd town
Shall wedge you close, and nail you down,
So fares it with your fondling dolts,
And all love's quarrels are but jolts.

When tiffs arise, and words of strife
Turn one to two in man and wife,
(For that's a matrimonial course
Which yoke-mates must go through perforce,
And ev'ry married man is certain
T' attend the lecture call'd the curtain)
Though not another word is said
When once the couple are in bed:
There things their proper channel keep,
(They make it up, and go to sleep)
These fallings in and fallings out,
Sometimes with cause, but most without,
Are but the common modes of strife,
Which oil the springs of married life,
Where sameness would create the spleen,
For ever stupidly serene.

Observe yon downy bed—to make it,
You toss the feathers up, and shake it.

So fondness springs from words and scuffling,
As beds lie smoothest after shuffling.

But authors' wranglings will create
The very quintessence of hate:
Peace is a fruitless vain endeavour,
Sworn foes for once, they're foes for ever.

—Oh! had it pleas'd my wiser betters
That I had never tasted letters,
Then no Parnassian maggots bred
Like fancies in a madman's head,
No graspings at an idle name,
No childish hope of future fame,
No impotence of wit had ta'en
Possession of my muse-struck brain.

Or had my birth, with fortune fit,
Varnish'd the dunce, or made the wit;
I had not held a shameful place,
Nor letters paid me with disgrace.

—O! for a pittance of my own,
That I might live unsought, unknown!
Retir'd from all this pedant strife,
Far from the cares of bustling life;
Far from the wits, the fools, the great,
And all the little world I hate.

THE MILK-MAID.

WHOE'ER for pleasure plans a scheme,
Will find it vanish like a dream,
Affording nothing found or real,
Where happiness is all ideal;
In grief, in joy, or either state,
Fancy will always antedate,
And when the thoughts on evil pore,
Anticipation makes it more.
Thus while the mind the future sees,
It cancels all its present ease.

Is pleasure's scheme the point in view;
How eagerly we all pursue!

Well—Tuesday is th' appointed day;
How slowly wears the time away!
How dull the interval between,
How darken'd o'er with clouds of spleen,
Did not the mind unlock her treasure,
And fancy feed on promis'd pleasure.

DELIA surveys, with curious eyes,
The clouds collected in the skies;
Wishes no storm may rend the air,
And Tuesday may be dry and fair;
And I look round, my boys, and pray
That Tuesday may be holiday.
Things duly settled—what remains?
Lo! Tuesday comes—alas! it rains;
And all our visionary schemes
Have died away, like golden dreams.

Once on a time, a rustic dame,
(No matter for the lady's name)
Wrapt up in deep imagination,
Indulg'd her pleasing contemplation;
While on a bench she took her seat,
And plac'd the milk-pail at her feet,
Oft in her hand she chink'd the pence,
The profits which arose from thence;
While fond ideas fill'd her brain
Of layings up, and monstrous gain.

Till every penny which she told
Creative fancy turn'd to gold;
And reasoning thus from computation,
She spoke aloud her meditation.

" Please Heav'n but to preserve my health,
" No doubt I shall have store of wealth;
" It must of consequence ensue
" I shall have store of lovers too.
" Oh! how I'll break their stubborn hearts
" With all the pride of female arts.
" What suitors then will kneel before me!
" Lords, Earls, and Viscounts, shall adore me.
" When in my gilded coach I ride,
" My Lady at his Lordship's side,
" How will I laugh at all I meet
" Clatt'ring in pattens down the street!
" And LOBBIN then I'll mind no more,
" Howe'er I lov'd him heretofore;
" Or, if he talks of plighted truth,
" I will not hear the simple youth,
" But rise indignant from my seat,
" And spurn the lubber from my feet."

Action, alas! the speaker's grace,
Ne'er came in more improper place,
For in the tossing forth her shoe,
What fancied bliss the maid o'erthrew!
While down at once, with hideous fall,
Came lovers, wealth, and milk, and all.

Thus fancy ever loves to roam,
To bring the gay materials home;
Imagination forms the dream,
And accident destroys the scheme.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE,

From the Rev. Mr. Hanbury's Horse to the Rev.
Mr. Scot.

AMONGST you bipeds, reputation
Depends on rank and situation;
And men increase in fame and worth,
Not from their merits, but their birth.
Thus he is born to live obscure,
Who has the sin of being poor;
While wealthy dullness lolls at ease,
And is—as witty as you please.
—" What did his Lordship say?—O! fine!
" The very thing! bravo! divine!"
And then 'tis buzz'd from route to route,
While ladies whisper it about,
" Well, I protest, a charming hit!
" His Lordship has a deal of wit.
" How elegant that double sense!
" Perdigious! vastly fine! immense!"
When all my lord has said or done
Was but the letting off a pun.

Mark the fat cit, whose good round sum
Amounts at least to half a plumb;
Whose chariot whirls him up and down
Some three or four miles out of town;
For thither sober folks repair
To take the dust, which they call air.
Dull folly (not the wanton wild
Imagination's younger child)
Has taken lodgings in his face,
As finding that a vacant place,

And peeping from his windows, tells
To all beholders where she dwells.
Yet once a week this purse-proud cit
Shall ape the fallies of a wit,
And after ev'ry Sunday's dinner,
To priestly faint, or city sinner,
Shall tell the story o'er and o'er
H'as told a thousand times before;
Like gamesters, who, with eager zeal,
Talk the game o'er between the deal.

Mark! how the fools and knaves admire
And chuckle with their Sunday 'quire:
While he looks pleas'd at every guest,
And laughs much louder than the rest;
And cackling with incessant grin,
Triples the double of his chin.

Birth, rank, and wealth, have wond'rous skill
Make wits and statesmen when they will;
While genius holds no estimation
From luckless want of situation;
And if through clouded scenes of life
He takes dame poverty to wife,
Howe'er he work and teaze his brain,
His pound of wit scarce weighs a grain;
While with his Lordship it abounds,
And one light grain swells out to pounds.

Receive, good Sir, with aspect kind,
This wanton gallop of the mind;
But, since all things increase in worth,
Proportion'd to their rank and birth;
Lest you should think the letter base,
While I supply the poet's place,
I'll tell you whence and what I am,
My breed, my blood, my fire, my dam.

My fire was PINDAR's eagle, son
Of Pegasus of HELICON;
My dam, the bippogryph, which whirl'd
Asolopho to the lunar world.
Both high-bred things of mettled blood,
The best in all APOLLO's stud.

Now CRITICS here would bid me speak
The old horse language, that is, Greek;
For HOMER made us talk, you know,
Almost three thousand years ago;
And men of taste and judgment FINE,
Allow the passage is divine.
They were fine mettled things indeed,
And of peculiar strength and breed;
What leaps they took, how far and wide!
—They'd take a country at a stride.
How great each leap, LONGINUS knew,
Who from dimensions ta'en of two,
Affirms, with equal ardour whirl'd,
A third, good Lord! would clear the world.

But till some learned wight shall show
If accents MUST be us'd, or no,
A doubt, which puzzles all the wise
Of giant and of pigmy size,
Who waste their time, and fancies vex
With asper, lenis, circumflex,
And talk of mark and punctuation,
As 'twere a matter of salvation;
For when your pignies take the pen
They fancy they grow up to men,
And think they keep the world in awe
By brandishing a very straw;

Till they have clear'd this weighty doubt,
Which they'll be centuries about,
As a plain nag, in homely phrase,
I'll use the language of our days;
And, for this first and only time,
Just make a trot in easy rhyme.

Nor let it shock your thought or sight,
That thus a quadruped should write;
Read but the papers, and you'll see
More prodigies of wit than me;
Grown men and sparrows taught to dance,
By monsieur Passerat from France;
The learned dog, the learned mare,
The learned bird, the learned hare;
And all are fashionable too,
And play at cards as well as you.

Of paper, pen, and ink possess'd,
With faculties of writing blest,
Why should not I then, Howannybrom bred
(A word that must be seen, not said)
Rid you of all that anxious care,
Which good folks feel for good and fair,
And which your looks betray'd indeed,
To more discerning eyes of steed;
When in the shape of useful hack,
I bore a poet on my back?

Know, safely rode my master's bride,
The bard before her for my guide.
Yet think not, Sir, his awkward care
Ensur'd protection to the fair.
No—conscious of the prize I bore,
My wayward footsteps slipt no more,
For though I scorn the poet's skill,
My mistress guides me where she will.

Abstract in wond'rous speculation,
Lost in laborious meditation,
As whether 'twould promote sublime
If silver could be pair'd in rhyme;
Or, as the word of sweeter tune,
Month might be clink'd instead of moon;
No wonder poets hardly know
Or what they do, or where they go.
Whether they ride or walk the street,
Their heads are always on their feet;
They now and then may get astride
Th' ideal Pegasus, and ride
Prodigious journeys—round a room,
As boys ride cock-horse on a broom.

Whether acrostics teize the brain,
Which goes a hunting words in vain,
(For words most capitally sin,
Unless their letters right begin.)
Since how to man or woman's name,
Could you or I acrostic frame.
Or make the flaring letters join,
To form the word, that tells us thine,
Unless we'd right initials got,
S, C, O, T, and so made SCOT?
Or whether Rebus, Riddle's brother
(Both which had DULLNESS for their mother)
Employ the gentle poet's care,
To celebrate some town or fair,
Which all ad libitum he flits
For you to pick it up by bits,
Which bits together plac'd, will frame
Some city's or some lady's name;

As when a worm is cut in twain,
It joins and is a worm again;
When thoughts so weighty, so intense,
Above the reach of common sense,
Distract and twirl the mind about,
Which fain would hammer something out;
A kind discharge relieves the mind,
As folks are eas'd by breaking wind;
Whatever whims or maggots bred
Fake place of sense in poet's head,
They fix themselves without controul,
Where'er its seat is on the soul.
Then, like your heathen idols, we
Have eyes indeed, but cannot see.
(We, for I take the poet's part,
And for my blood, am bard at heart)
For in reflection deep immerst,
The man muse-bitten and be-verst,
Neglectful of eternal all,
Will run his head against a wall,
Walk, through a river as it flows,
Nor see the bridge before his nose.

Are things like these equestrians fit
To mount the back of mettled tit?
Are--but farewell, for here comes Bob,
And I must serve some hackney job;
Fetch letters, or, for recreation,
Transport the bard to our plantation.
Robert joins compts with Burnam Black.
Your humble servant, Hanbury's hack.

THE NEW-RIVER HEAD.

A TALE.

Attempted in the manner of Mr. C. Denis.

INSCRIBED TO JOHN WILKES, ESQ.

"Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum."

HOR.

DEAR WILKES, whose lively social wit
Disdains the prudish affectation
Of gloomy folks, who love to sit
As doctors should at consultation,
Permit me in familiar strain,
To steal you from the idle hour
Of combating the NORTHERN THAME,
And all his puppet tools of pow'r.
Shame to the wretch, if sense of shame
Can ever touch the miscreant's breast,
Who dead to virtue as to fame,
(A monster whom the gods detest)
Turns traitor to himself, to court
Or minister or monarch's smile;
And dares, in insolence of sport,
Invade the CHARTER of our isle.
But why should I, who only strive
By telling of an easy tale,
To keep attention half alive
'Gainst BOLGOLAM and FLIMNAP rail?
For whether ENGLAND be the name,
(Name which we're taught no more to prize)
Or BRITAIN, it is all the same,
The Lilliputian statesmen rise
To malice of gigantic size.

Let them enjoy their warmth a-while,
 Truth shall regard them with a smile,
 While you, like GULLIVER, in sport
 Piss out the fire, and save the court.
 But to return---The tale is old;
 Indecent, truly none of mine---
 What BEROALDUS gravely told;
 I read it in that sound divine.
 And for indecency, you know
 He had a fashionable turn,
 As prim observers clearly show
 In t'other parson doctor STERNE.
 Yet POPE denies it all defence,
 And calls it, blest us! want of sense.
 But e'en the decent POPE can write
 * Of bottles, corks, and maiden sighs,
 Of charming beauties less in sight,
 Of the more secret precious hair,
 † "And something else of little size,
 You know where."
 If such authorities prevail,
 To varnish o'er this petty sin,
 I plead a pardon for my tale,
 And having hemm'd and cough'd---begin.
 A genius (one of those I mean.
 We read of in th' Arabian Nights;
 Not such as every day are seen
 At Bob's or Arthur's, whilom White's;
 For howsoe'er you change the name,
 The clubs and meetings are the same;
 Nor those prodigious learned folks,
 Your haberdashers of stale jokes,
 Who dress them up so neat and clean
 For news-paper or magazine;
 But one that could play wond'rous tricks,
 Changing the very course of nature,
 Not ASMODEUS on two sticks
 Or sage URGANDA could do greater.)
 Once on a time incog came down
 From his equivocal dominions,
 And travell'd o'er a country town
 To try folks' tempers and opinions.
 When to accomplish his intent
 (For had the cobbler known the king,
 Lord! it would quite have spoil'd the thing)
 In strange disguise he slyly went
 And stump'd along the high-way track,
 With greasy knapsack at his back;
 And now the night was pitchy dark,
 Without one star's indulgent spark,
 Whether he wanted sleep or not,
 Is of no consequence to tell;
 A bed and lodging must he got,
 For geniuses live always well.
 At the best house in all the town,
 (It was th' attorneys you may swear)
 He knock'd as he'd have beat it down,
 Knock as you would, no entrance there:
 But from the window cried the dame,
 Go, firrah go, from whence you came.
 Here, Nell, John, Thomas, see who knocks,
 Fellow, I'll put you in the stocks.

* Rape of the Lock.

† Popes Letters.

Be gentle ma'm, the genius cried;
 Have mercy on the wand'ring poor,
 Who knows not where his head to hide,
 And ask a pittance at your door.
 A mug of beer, a crust of bread---
 Have pity on the houseless head;
 Your husband keeps a lordly table,
 I ask but for the offal crumbs,
 And for a lodging---barn or stable
 Will shroud me till the morning comes.
 'Twas all in vain; she rang the bell,
 The servants trembl'd at the knell;
 Down flew the maids to tell the men,
 To drive the vagrant back agen.
 He trudg'd away in angry mind,
 And thought but cheaply of mankind,
 Till through a casement's dingy pane,
 A rush-light's melancholy ray,
 Bad him e'en try his luck again;
 Perhaps beneath a house of clay
 A wand'ring passenger might find,
 A better friend to human kind,
 And far more hospitable fare,
 Though not so costly, nice, or rare,
 As smokes upon the silver plate
 Of the luxurious pamper'd great.
 So to this cot of homely thatch,
 In the same plight the genius came:
 Down comes the dame, lifts up the latch;
 What want ye sir?
 God save you, dame.
 And so he told the piteous tale,
 Which you have heard him tell before;
 Your patience and my own would fail
 Were I to tell it o'er and o'er,
 Suffice it, that my goody's care
 Brought forth her best, though simple fare,
 And from the corner-cupboard's hoard,
 Her stranger guest the more to please,
 Bespread her hospitable board
 With what she had---'twas bread and cheese.
 'Tis honest though but homely cheer;
 Much good may't do ye, eat your fill,
 Would I could treat you with strong beer,
 But for the action take the will,
 You see my cot is clean, though small,
 Pray Heav'n increase my slender stock!
 You're welcome, friend, you see my all;
 And for your bed, sir, there's a flock.
 No matter what was after said,
 He eat and drank, and went to bed.
 And now the cock his mattins sung,
 (Howe'er such singing's light esteem'd,
 'Tis precious in the muses' tongue
 When sung, rhymes better than he scream'd);
 The dame and pedlar both arose,
 At early dawn of rising day,
 She for her work of folding clothes,
 And he to travel on his way;
 But much he thought himself to blame,
 If, as in duty surely bound,
 He did not thank the careful dame
 For the reception he had found:
 Hostess, quoth he, before I go,
 I thank you for your hearty fare;

Would it were in my pow'r to pay,
 My gratitude a better way;
 But money now runs very low,
 And I have not a doit to spare;
 But if you'll take this piece of stuff—
 —No, quoth the dame, I'm poor as you,
 Your kindest wishes are enough,
 You're welcome, friend, farewell—Adieu.
 But first reply'd the wand'ring guest,
 For bed and board and homely dish,
 May all things turn out for the best,
 So take my blessing and my wish.
 May what you first begin to do,
 Create such profit and delight,
 That you may do it all day through,
 Nor finish till the depth of night.
 Thank you, she said, and shut the door,
 Turn'd to her work, and thought no more.
 And now the napkin which was spread
 To treat her guest with good brown bread,
 She folded up with nicest care;
 When lo! another napkin there!
 And every folding did beget
 Another and another yet.
 She folds a shift—by strange increase,
 The remnant swells into a piece.
 Her caps, her laces, all the same,
 Till such a quantity of linen,
 From such a very small beginning,
 Flow'd in at once upon the dame,
 Who wonder'd how the deuce it came,
 That with the drap'ry she had got
 Within her little shabby cot,
 She might for all the town provide,
 And break both York-street and Cheapside.
 It happen'd that th' attorney's wife,
 Who, to be sure, took much upon her,
 As being one in higher life,
 Who did the parish mighty honour,
 Sent for the dame, who, poor and willing,
 Would take a job of charring work,
 And sweat and toil like any Turk,
 To earn a sixpence or a shilling.
 She could not come, not she indeed!
 She thank'd her much, but had no need.
 Good news will fly as well as bad,
 So out this wond'rous story came,
 About the pedlar and the dame,
 Which made th' attorney's wife so mad,
 That she resolv'd at any rate,
 Spite of her pride and lady airs,
 To get the pedlar tête-à-tête,
 And make up all the past affairs:
 And though she wish'd him at the devil,
 When he came there the night before,
 Determin'd to be monstrous civil,
 And drop her curtsy at the door.
 Now all was racket, noise and pother,
 Nell running one way, John another,
 And Tom was on the coach-horse sent,
 To learn which way the pedlar went.
 Thomas return'd:—the pedlar brought.
 —What could my dainty madam say,
 For not behaving as she ought,
 And driving honest folks away?

Upon my word, it shocks me much,
 —But there's such thieving here of late—
 Not that I dream'd that you were such,
 When you came knocking at my gate.
 I must confess myself to blame,
 And I'm afraid you lately met
 Sad treatment with that homely dame,
 Who lives on what her hands can get.
 Walk in with me at least to-night,
 And let us set all matters right.
 I know my duty, and indeed
 Would help a friend in time of need.
 Take such refreshment as you find,
 I'm sure I mean it for the best,
 And give it with a willing mind
 To such a grave and sober guest.
 So in they came, and for his picking,
 Behold the table covers spread,
 Instead of Goody's cheese and bread,
 With tarts, and fish, and flesh, and chicken.
 And to appear in greater state,
 The knives and forks with silver handles,
 The candlesticks of bright (French) plate
 To hold her best mould (tallow) candles.
 Were all brought forth to be display'd,
 In female housewifery parade.
 And more the pedlar to regale,
 And make the wond'rous man her friend,
 Decanters foam'd of mantling ale,
 And port and claret without end;
 They hobb'd and nobb'd, and smil'd and laugh'd,
 Touch'd glasses, nam'd their toasts, and quaff'd;
 Talk'd over every friend and foe,
 Till eating, drinking, talking past,
 The kind house-clock struck twelve at last,
 When wishing madam bon repos,
 The pedlar pleaded weary head,
 Made his low bow, and went to bed.
 Wishing him then at perfect ease,
 A good soft bed, a good sound sleep,
 Now, gentle reader, if you please,
 We'll at the lady take a peep.
 She could not rest, but turn'd and toss'd,
 While fancy whisper'd in her brain,
 That what her indiscretion lost,
 Her art and cunning might regain.
 Such linen to so poor a dame!
 For such coarse fare! perplex'd her head;
 Why might not she expect the same,
 So courteous, civil, and well-bred?
 And now she reckon'd up her store
 Of cambrics, hollands, muslins, lawns,
 Free gifts, and purchases, and pawns,
 Resolv'd to multiply them more,
 Till she had got a stock of linen,
 Fit for a dowager to sin in.
 The morning came, when up she got,
 Most ceremoniously inclin'd
 To wind up her sagacious plot,
 With all that civil stuff we find
 'Mongst those who talk a wond'rous deal
 Of what they neither mean nor feel.
 How shall I, ma'm, reply'd the guest,
 Make you a suitable return,

For your attention and concern,
And such civilities exprest
To one, who must be still in debt
For all the kindness he has met?

For this your entertainment's sake,
If ought of good my wish can do,
May what you first shall undertake,
Last without ceasing all day through.

Madam, who kindly understood
His wish effectually good,
Strait dropp'd a curtsy wond'rous low,
For much she wanted him to go,
That she might look up all her store,
And turn it into thousands more.
Now all the maids were sent to look
In every cranny, hole and nook,
For every rag which they could find
Of any size, or any kind.

Draw'rs, boxes, closets, chests, and cases
Were all unlock'd at once to get
Her point, her gauze, her Prussian-net,
With fifty names of fifty kinds,
Which suit variety of minds.

How shall I now thy tale pursue,
So passing strange, so passing true?
When every bit from every horde,
Was brought and laid upon the board,

Lest some more urgent obligation
Might interrupt her pleasing toil,

And marring half her application,
The promis'd hopes of profit spoil,
Before she folds a single rag,

Or takes a cap from board or bag,
That nothing might her work prevent,
(For she was now resolv'd to labour,
With earnest hope and full intent

To get the better of her neighbour)
Into the garden she would go

To do that necessary thing,
Which must by all be done, you know,
By rich and poor, and high and low,

By male and female, queen and king;
She little dream'd a common action,
Practis'd as duly as her pray'rs,

Should prove so tedious a transaction,
Or cost her such a sea of cares.

In short the streams so plenteous flow'd,
That in the dry and dusty weather,

She might have water'd all the road
For ten or twenty miles together.

What could she do? as it began,
Th' involuntary torrent ran.

Instead of folding cap or mob,
So dreadful was this distillation,

That from a simple watering job,
She fear'd a general inundation.

While for her indiscretion's crime,
And coveting too great a store,

She made a river at a time,
Which sure was never done before.

A FAMILIAR LETTER OF RHYMES,

TO A LADY.

YES—I could rifle grove and bow'r
And strip the beds of every flow'r,

And deck them in their fairest hue,
Merely to be out-blush'd by you.

The lily, pale, by my direction,
Should fight the rose for your complexion;

Or I could make up sweetest posies,
Fit fragrance for the ladies' noses,

Which drooping, on your breast reclining,
Should all be withering, dying, pining,

Which every songster can display,
I've more authorities than GAY;

Nay, I could teach the globe its duty
To pay all homage to your beauty,

And, wit's creative pow'r to show,
The very fire should mix with snow;

Your eyes, that brandish burning darts
To scorch and finge our tinder hearts,

Should be the lamps for lover's ruin,
And light them to their own undoing;

While all the snow about your breast
Should leave them hopeless and distressed.

For those who rarely soar above
The art of coupling love and dove,

In their conceits and amorous fictions,
Are mighty fond of contradictions,

Above, in air; in earth, beneath;
And things that do, or do not breathe,

All have their parts, and separate place,
To paint the fair one's various grace.

Her cheek, her eye, her bosom show
The rose, the lily diamond, snow.

Jet, milk, and amber, vales and mountains
Stars, rubies, suns, and mossy fountains,

The poet gives them all a share
In the description of his fair,

She burns, she chills, she pierces hearts
With locks, and bolts, and flames, and darts,

And could we trust th' extravagancy
Of every poet's youthful fancy,

They'd make each nymph they love so well,
As cold as snow, as hot as —

—O gentle lady, spare your fright,
No horrid rhyme shall wound your sight,

I would not for the world be heard,
To utter such unseemly word,

Which the politer parson fears
To mention to politer ears.

But, could a female form be shown,
(The thought, perhaps, is not my own)

Where every circumstance should meet
To make the poet's nymph complete

Form'd to his fancy's utmost pitch,
She'd be as ugly as a witch.

Come then, O muse, of trim conceit,
Muse always fine, but never neat,

Who to the dull unsated ear
Of French or Tuscan SONNETEER,

Tak'st up the same unvaried tone,
Like the Scotch bagpipe's favourite drone,

Squeezing out thoughts in ditties quaint,
To poet's mistress, whore, or saint;

Whether thou'dwell'd on ev'ry grace,
Which lights the world from LAURA's face,

Or amorous praise expatiates wide
On beauties which the nymph must hide;

For wit affected, loves to show
Her every charm from top to toe,

And wanton fancy oft pursues
Minute description from the muse,
Come and pourtray, with pencil fine,
The poet's mortal nymph divine.

Her golden locks of classic hair,
Are nets to catch the wanton air;
Her forehead ivory, and her eyes
Each a bright sun to light the skies,
Orb'd in whose centre Cupid aims
His darts, protect us! tipt with flames;
While the fly god's unerring bow
Is the half circle of her brow.
Each lip a ruby, parting, shows
The precious pearl in even rows,
And all the loves and graces seek
Bathe in the dimples of her cheek.
Her breasts pure snow, or white as milk,
Are ivory apples, smooth as silk,
Or else, as fancy trips on faster,
Fine marble hills or alabaster.

A figure made of wax would please
More than an aggregate of these,
Which though they are of precious worth,
And held in great esteem on earth,
What are they, rightly understood,
Compar'd to real flesh and blood?

And I, who hate to act by rules
Of whining, rhyming, loving fools,
Can never twist my mind about
To find such strange resemblance out,
And simile that's only fit
To show my plenteous lack of wit.
Therefore, omitting flames and darts,
Wounds, sighs and tears, and bleeding hearts,
Obeying, what I here declare,
Makes half my happiness, the fair,
The favourite subject I pursue,
And write, as who would not, for you.

Perhaps my muse, a common curse,
Errs in the manner of her verse,
Which, slouching in the doggrel lay,
Goes tittup all her easy way.
Yes—an acrostic had been better,
Where each good-natured prattling letter,
Though it conceal the writer's aim,
Tells all the world his lady's name.

But all acrostics, it is said,
Show wond'rous pain of empty head,
Where wit is cramp'd in hard confines,
And fancy dare not jump the lines.

I love a fanciful disorder,
And straggling out of rule and order;
Impute not then to vacant head,
Or what I've writ, or what I've said,
Which imputation can't be true,
Where head and heart's so full of you.

Like TRISTRAM SHANDY I could write
From morn to noon, from noon to night,
Sometimes obscure, and sometimes leaning,
A little sideways to a meaning,
And unfatigu'd myself, pursue
The civil mode of teasing you.
For as your folks who love the dwelling
On circumstance in story telling,
And to give each relation grace,
Describe the time, the folks, the place,

And are religiously exact
To point out each unmeaning fact,
Repeat their wonders undressed,
Nor think one hearer can be tired;
So they who take a method worse,
And prose away, like me, in verse,
Worry their mistresses, friends or betters,
With satire, sonnet, ode, or letters,
And think the knack of pleasing follows
Each jingling pupil of Apollo's.
—Yet let it be a venial crime

That I address you thus in rhyme,
Nor think that I am Phœbus'-bit
By the Tarantula of wit,
But as the meanest critic knows
All females have a knack at prose,
And letters are the mode of writing
The ladies take the most delight in;
Bold is the man, whose saucy aim
Leads him to form a rival claim;
A double death the victim dies,
Wounded by wit as well as eyes.

—With mine disgrace a lady's prose,
And put a nettle next a rose?
Who would, so long as taste prevails,
Compare St. James's with Versailles?
The nightingale, as story goes,
Fam'd for the music of his woes,
In vain against the artist try'd,
But strain'd his tuneful throat—and died.

Perhaps I sought the rhyming way,
For reasons which have pow'ful sway.
The swain, no doubt, with pleasure sues
The nymph he's sure will not refuse.
And more compassion may be found
Amongst these goddesses of sound,
Than always happens to the share
Of the more cruel human fair;
Who love to fix their lover's pains,
Pleas'd with the rattling of their chains,
Rejoicing in their servant's grief,
As 'twere a sin to give relief.
They twist each easy fool about,
Nor let them in, nor let them out,
But keep them twirling on the fire
Of apprehension and desire,
As cock-chafers, with corking pin
The school-boy stabs, to make them spin.

For 'tis a maxim in love's school,
To make a man of sense a fool;
I mean the man, who loves indeed,
And hopes and wishes to succeed;
But from his fear and apprehension,
Which always mars his best intention,
Can ne'er address with proper ease
The very person he would please.

Now poets, when these nymphs refuse,
Straight go a courting to the muse.
But still some difference we find
Twixt goddesses and human kind;
The muses' favours are ideal,
The ladies' scarce, but always real.
The poet can, with little pain,
Create a mistress in his brain,
Heap each attraction, every grace
That should adorn the mind or face,

On Delia, Phyllis, with a score
Of Phyllisses and Delias more,
Or as the whim of passion burns,
Can court each frolic cause by turns;
Nor shall one word of blame be said,
Although he take them all to bed.
The muse detests coquetry's guilt,
Nor apes the manners of a jilt.

Jilt! O dishonest hateful name,
Your sex's pride, your sex's shame,
Which often bait their treacherous hook
With smile endearing, winning look,
And wind them in the easy heart
Of man, with most ensuaring art,
Only to torture and betray
The wretch they mean to cast away.
No doubt 'tis charming pleasant angling,
To see the poor fond creatures dangling,
Who rush like gudgeons to the bait,
And gorge the mischief they should hate;
Yet sure such cruelties deface
Your virtues of their fairest grace,
And pity, which in woman's breast
Should swim at top of all the rest,
Must such insidious sport condemn,
Which play to you, is death to them.

So have I often read or heard,
Though both upon a trav'ler's word,
(Authority may pass it down,
So vide TRAVELS, by ED. BROWN)
At METZ a dreadful engine stands,
Form'd like a maid, with folded hands,
Which finely drest, with primmest grace,
Receives the culprit's first embrace;
But at the second (dismal wonder!)
Unfolds, clasps, cuts his heart asunder.

You'll say, perhaps, I love to rail,
We'll end the matter with a tale.

A Robin once, who lov'd to stray,
And hop about from spray to spray,
Familiar as the folks were kind,
Nor thought of mischief in his mind,
Slight favours make the bold presume,
Would flutter round the lady's room,
And careless often take his stand
Upon the lovely Flavia's hand.
The nymph, 'tis said, his freedom sought,
— In short, the trifling fool was caught;
And, happy in the fair one's grace,
Would not accept an eagle's place:
And while the nymph was kind as fair,
Wish'd not to gain his native air,
But thought he bargain'd to his cost,
To gain the liberty he lost.

Till at the last, a fop was seen,
A parrot, dress'd in red and green,
Who could not boast one genuine note,
But chatter'd, swore, and ly'd—by rote.
“Nonsense and noise will oft prevail,
“When honour and affection fail.”
The lady lik'd her foreign guest,
For novelty will please the best;
And whether it is lace or fan,
Or silk, or china, bird, or man,
None sure can think it wrong or strange,
That ladies should admire a change.

The parrot now came into play,
The Robin, he had had his day,
But could not brook the nymph's disdain,
So fled—and ne'er came back again.

THE COBLER OF TISSINGTON'S LETTER,

TO DAVID GARRICK, ESQ. 1761.

My predecessors often use
To coble verse as well as shoes;
As PARTRIDGE (vide SWIFT'S disputes)
Who turn'd BOOTES into boots,
Ah!—PARTRIDGE!—I'll be bold to say
Was a rare scholar in his day;
He'd tell you when it would rain, and when
The weather would be fine again;
Precisely when your bones should ache,
And when grow sound, by th' almanack.
For he knew ev'ry thing, d'ye see,
By, what d'ye call't, astrology,
And skill'd in all the starry system,
Foretold events, and often mist 'em;
And then it griev'd me sore to look
Just at the beel-piece of his book,
Where stood a man, Lord bless my heart!
(No doubt by matthew matlick's art)
Naked, expos'd to public view,
And darts stuck in him through and through,
I warrant him some hardy fool,
Who scorn'd to follow wisdom's rule,
And dar'd blasphemously despise
Our doctor's knowledge in the skies.
Full dearly he abides his laugh,
I'm sure 'tis SWIFT, or BICKERSTAFF.

Excuse this bit of a digression,
A cobbler's is a learn'd profession.
Why may not I too couple rhymes?
My wit will not disgrace the times;
I too, forsooth, among the rest,
Claim one advantage, and the best,
I scarce know writing, have no reading,
Nor any kind of scholar breeding;
And wanting that's the sole foundation
Of half your poets' reputation.
While genius, perfect at its birth,
Springs up, like mushrooms from the earth.

You know they send me to and fro
To carry messages or so;
And though I'm somewhat old and crazy,
I'm still of service to the lazy,
For our good squire has no great notion
Of much alacrity in motion,
And when there's miles betwixt, you know
Would rather send by half than go;
Then I'm dispatch'd to travel hard,
And bear myself by way of card.
I'm a two-legg'd excuse, to show
Why other people cannot go;
And merit sure I must assume,
For once I went in GARRICK'S room.

In my old age, 'twere wond'rous hard
To come to town, as trav'ling card,
Then let the post convey me there,
The clerk's direction tell him where,
For, though I ramble at this rate,
He writes it all, and I dictate;

For I'm resolv'd—by help of neighbour,
(Who keeps a school, and goes to labour),
To tell you all things as they pass;
Cobblers will go beyond their last,
And so I'm told will authors too,
—But that's a point I leave to you;
Cobbling extends a thousand ways,
Some coble shoes, some coble plays;
Some—but this jingle's vastly clever,
It makes a body write for ever.
While with the motion of the pen,
METHOD pops in and out agen.
So, as I said, I thought it better,
To set me down and think a letter,
And without any more ado,
Seal up my mind, and send it you.
You'll ask me, master, why I choose
To plague your worship with my muse?
I'll tell you then—will truth offend?
Though cobbler, yet I love my friend.
Besides, I like you merry folks,
Who make their puns, and crack their jokes;
Your jovial hearts are never wrong,
I love a story, or a song;
But always feel most grievous qualms,
From WESLEY'S hymns, or WISDOM'S psalms*.

My father often told me, one day
Was for religion—that was Sunday,
When I should go to prayers twice,
And hear our parson battle vice;
And dress'd in all my finest clothes,
Twang the psalmody through my nose.
But betwixt churches, for relief,
Eat bak'd plump-pudding and roast-beef;
And cheerful, without sin, regale
With good home-brew'd, and nappy ale,
But not one word of fasting greetings,
And dry religious singing meetings.
But here comes folks a preaching to us
A saving doctrine to undo us,
Whose notions fanciful and scurvy,
Turn old religion topsy turvy.
I'll give my pleasure up for no man,
And an't I right now, Master SHOW-MAN?
You seem'd to me a person civil,
Our parson gives you to the devil;
And says, as how, that after grace
You laugh'd directly in his face;
Ay, laugh'd outright (as I'm a sinner)
I should have lik'd t' have been at dinner,
Not for the sake of master's fare,
But to have seen the doctor stare.
Odzooks, I think he's perfect mad,
Scar'd out of all the wits he had,
For wherefoe'er the doctor comes,
He pulls his wig, and bites his thumbs,
And mutters, in a broken rage,
The MINOR, GARRICK, ROOTE, the STAGE;
(For I must blab it out—but hift,
His reverence is a Methodist)
And preaches like an errant fury,
'Gainst all your show folks about DRURY,

* Robert Wisdom was an early translator of the Psalms. Wood says, "he was a good Latin and English poet of his time." He died 1568.

Says actors all are hellish imps,
And managers the devil's pimps.
He knows not what he sets about;
Puts on his surplice inside out,
Mistakes the lessons in the church,
Or leaves a collect in the lurch;
And th' other day—God help his head,
The gardner's wife being brought to bed,
When sent for to baptize the child
His wig awry, and staring wild,
He laid the prayer-book flat before him,
And read the burial service o'er him.
—The folks must wait without their shoes,
For I must tell you all the news.
For we have had a deal to do,
Our squire's become a show-man too!
And horse and foot arrive in flocks,
To see his worship's famous rocks,
Whilst he, with humorous delight,
Walks all about, and shows the sight,
Points out the place, where trembling you
Had like t' have bid the world adieu;
It bears the sad remembrance still,
And people call it GARRICK'S HILL.
The goats their usual distance keep,
We never have recourse to sheep;
And the whole scene wants nothing now,
Except your ferry-boat and cow.
I had a great deal more to say,
But I am sent express away,
To fetch the 'squire's three children down
To TISSINGTON, from DERBY town;
And ALLEN says he'll mend my rhyme,
Whene'er I write a second time.

THE COBLER OF CRIPPLEGATE'S LETTER,

TO ROBERT LLOYD, A M.

UNUS'D to verse, and tir'd, Heav'n knows,
Of drudging on in heavy prose,
Day after day, year after year,
Which I have sent the GAZETTEER;
Now, for the first time, I essay
To write in your own easy way.
And now, O LLOYD, I wish I had,
To go that road your ambling pad,
While you, with all a poet's pride,
On the great-horse of verse might ride.
You leave the road that's rough and stony,
To pace and whistle with your poney;
Sad proof to us you're lazy grown,
And fear to gall your huckle-bone.
For he who rides a nag so small,
Will soon, we fear, ride none at all.
There are, and nought gives more offence,
Who have some fav'rite excellence,
Which evermore they introduce,
And bring it into constant use.
Thus GARRICK still in ev'ry part
Has pause, and attitude, and start:
The pause, I will allow, is good,
And so, perhaps, the attitude;
The start too's fine: but if not scarce,
The tragedy becomes a farce.

I have too, pardon me, some quarrel
With other branches of your laurel.
I hate the style, that still defends
Yourself, or praises all your friends,
As if the club of wits was met
To make eulogiums on the set;
Say, must the town for ever hear,
And no reviewer dare to sneer,
Of THORNTON'S humour, GARRICK'S nature,
And COLMAN'S wit, and CHURCHILL'S satire?
CHURCHILL, who—let it not offend,
If I make free, though he's your friend,
And sure we cannot want excuse,
When CHURCHILL'S nam'd for smart abuse—
CHURCHILL! who ever loves to raise
On slander's dung his mushroom-bays:
The priest, I grant, has something clever,
A something that will last for ever:
Let him, in part, be made your pattern,
Whose muse, now queen, and now a flatterer,
Trick'd out in ROSCIAD rules the roast,
Turns trapes and trollop in the GHOST,
By turns both tickle us, and warms,
And, drunk or sober, has her charms.

GARRICK, to whom with lath and plaster
You try to raise a fine pilaster,
And found on LEAR and MACBETH,
His monument e'en after death,
GARRICK'S a dealer in grimaces,
A haberdasher of wry faces,
A hypocrite, in all its stages,
Who laughs and cries for hire and wages;
As undertakers men draw grief
From onion in their handkerchief,
Like real mourners cry and sob,
And of their passions make a job.

And COLMAN too, that little sinner,
That essay-weaver, drama-spinner,
Too much the comic sock will use,
For 'tis the law must find him shoes.
And though he thinks on fame's wide ocean
He swims, and has a pretty motion,
Inform him, LLOYD, for all his grin
That HARRY FIELDING holds his chin.

Now higher soar, my muse, and higher,
To BONNEL THORNTON, hight esquire!
The only man to make us laugh,
A very PETER PARAGRAPH;
The grand conductor and adviser
In CHRONICLE and ADVERTISER,
Who still delights to run his rig
On citizen and periwig!
Good sense, I know, though dash'd with oddity,
In THORNTON is no scarce commodity:
Much learning too I can descry,
Beneath his perriwig doth lie.—

— I beg his pardon, I declare,
His grizzle's gone for greasy hair,
Which now the wag with ease can screw,
With dirty ribband in a queue—
But why neglect (his trade forsaking
For scribbling, and for merry-making),
With tie to overshadow that brain,
Which might have shone in WARWICK-LANE?
Why not, with spectacles on nose,
In chariot lazily repose,

A second, pompous, deep physician,
HIMSELF A SIGN-POST EXHIBITION?

But hold, my muse! you run a-head
And where's the clue that shall unthread
The maze, wherein you are entangled?
While out of tune the bells are jangled
Through rhyme's rough road, that serve to deck
My jaded Pegasus his neck.
My muse with LLOYD alone contends:
Why then fall foul upon his friends?
Unless to show, like handy-dandy,
Or CHURCHILL'S GHOST, or TRISTRAM SMYTH,

BY,

Now here, now there, with quick progression,
How smartly you can make digression:
Your rambling spirit now confine,
And speak to LLOYD in ev'ry line.

Tell me then, LLOYD, what is't you mean,
By cobbling up a MAGAZINE?

A MAGAZINE, a wretched olio,
Purloin'd from quarto and from folio,
From pamphlet, newspaper, and book;
Which tost up by a monthly cook,
Borrows fine shapes, and titles new,
Of fricasee and rich ragout,
Which dunces dress, as well as you.

Say, is't for you, your wit to coop,
And tumble through this narrow hoop?
The body thrives, and so the mind,
When both are free and unconfin'd;
But harness'd in like hackney tit,
To run the monthly stage of wit,
The racer stumbles in the shaft,
And shows he was not meant for draft.
Pot-bellied gluttons, slaves of taste,
Who bind in leathern-belt their waist,
Who lick their lips at ham or haunch,
But hate to see the strutting paunch,
Full often rue the pain that's felt
From circumscription of the belt:
Thus women too we idiots call,
Who lace their shapes too close and small.
Tight stays, they find, oft end in humps,
And take, too late, alas! to jumps.
The Chinese ladies cramp their feet,
Which seem, indeed, both small and neat,
While the dear creatures laugh and talk,
And can do ev'ry thing—but walk;
Thus you, "who trip it as you go
On the light fantastic toe,"
And in the Ring are ever seen,
Or Rotten-Row of magazine,
Will cramp your muse in four-foot verse,
And find at last your ease your curse.
CLIO already humbly begs
You'd give her leave to stretch her legs;
For though sometimes she takes a leap,
Yet quadrupeds can only creep.

While namby-pamby thus you scribble,
Your manly genius a mere scribble.
Pinn'd down, and sickly, cannot vapour,
Nor dares to spring, or cut a caper.

Rouse then, for shame, your ancient spirit!
Write a great work! a work of merit!
The conduct of your friend examine,
And give a PROPHECY OF FAMINE;

Or like yourself, in days of yore,
Write ACTORS, as you did before :
Write what may pow'rful friends create you,
And make your present friends all hate you.
Learn not a shuffling, shambling, pace,
But go erect with manly grace ;
For OVID says, and pr'ythee heed it,
Os homini sublime dedit.
But if you still waste all your prime
In spinning Lilliputian rhyme,
Too long your genius will lie fallow,
And ROBERT LLOYD be ROBERT SHALLOW.

ON RHYME.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE TO A FRIEND.

BRING paper, ASH, and let me send
My hearty service to my friend.

How pure the paper looks and white !
What pity 'tis that folks will write,
And on the face of candour scrawl
With desperate ink, and heart of gall !
Yet thus it often fares with those
Who, gay and easy in their prose,
Incur ill-nature's ugly crime,
And lay about 'em in their rhyme.

No man more generous, frank and kind,
Of more ingenuous social mind,
Than CHURCHILL, yet though CHURCHILL here,
I will pronounce him too severe,
For, whether scribbled at or not,
He writes no name without a blot.

Yet let me urge one honest plea ?
Say, is the muse in fault or he ?
The man, whose genius thirsts for praise,
Who boldly plucks, not waits the bays ;
Who drives his rapid car along,
And feels the energy of song ;
Writes, from the impulse of the muse,
What sober reason might refuse.

My Lord, who lives and writes at ease,
(Sure to be pleas'd, as sure to please)
And draws from silver-stand his pen,
To scribble sonnets now and then ;
Who writes not what he truly feels,
But rather what he sily steals,
And patches up in courtly phrase,
The manly sense of better days ;
Whose dainty muse is only kist ;
But as his dainty Lordship list,
Who treats her like a mistress still,
To turn her off, and keep at will ;
Knows not the labour, pains, and strife.
Of him who takes the muse to wife.
For then the poor good-natur'd man
Must bear his burden as he can ;
And if my lady prove a shrew,
What would you have the husband do ?

Say, should he thwart her inclination
To work his own, and her vexation ?
Or giving madam all her rein,
Make marriage but a silken chain ?
Thus we, who lead poetic lives,
The henpeck'd culls of vixen wives,
Receive their orders, and obey,
Like husbands in the common way

VOL. X.

And when we write with too much phlegm,
The fault is not in us, but them :
True servants always at command,
We bold the pen ; they guide the hand.

Why need I urge so plain a fact
To you who catch me in the act ?
And see me (ere I've said my grace,
That is, put SIR in proper place,
Or with epistolary bow,
Have prefac'd, as I scarce know how),
You see me, as I said before,
Run up and down a page or more,
Without one word of tribute due
To friendship's altar, and to you.
Accept, then, in or out of time,
My honest thanks, though writ in rhyme.
And these once paid (to obligations
Repeated thanks grow stale vexations,
And hurt the liberal donor more
Than all his lavish gifts before),
I skip about, as whim prevails,
Like your own frisky goats in WALES,
And follow where the muse shall lead,
O'er hedge and ditch, o'er hill or mead.

Well might the * lordly writer praise
The first inventor of essays,
Where wanton fancy gaily rambles,
Walks, paces, gallops, trots, and ambles ;
And all things may be sung or said,
While drowsy METHOD'S gone to bed.
And blest the poet, or the rhymist,
(For surely none of the sublimest)
Who prancing in his easy mode,
Down this epistolary road,
First taught the muse to play the fool,
A truant from the pedant's school,
And skipping, like a tasteless dunce,
O'er all the UNITIES at once ;
(For so we keep but clink and rhyme,
A fig for ACTION, PLACE, and TIME).

But critics (who still judge by rules,
Transmitted down as guides to fools,
And howsoe'er they prate about 'em,
Drawn from wise folks who writ without em)

Will blame this frolic, wild excursion,
Which fancy takes for her diversion,
As inconsistent with the law,
Which keeps the sober muse in awe,
Who dares not for her life dispense,
With such mechanic chains for sense.

Yet men are often apt to blame
Those errors they'd be proud to claim,
And if their skill, of pigmy size,
To glorious darings cannot rise,
From critic spleen and pedant phlegm,
Would make all genius creep with them

Nay, e'en professors of the art,
To prove their wit betray their heart,
And speak against themselves, to show,
What they would hate the world should know.
As when the measur'd couplets curse,
The manacles of Gothic verse,

* Shafisbury.

E u

While the trim bard in easy strains,
Talks much of fetters, clogs, and chains;
He only aims that you should think,
How charmingly he makes them clink.
So have I seen in tragic stride,
The hero of the Mourning Bride,
Sullen and sulky tread the stage,
Till, fixt attention to engage,
He flings his fetter'd arms about,
That all may find ALPHONSO out.

Oft have I heard it said by those,
Who most should blush to be her foes,
'That rhyme's impertinent vexation,
Shackles the brave imagination,
Which longs with eager zeal to try
Her trackless path above the sky,
But that the clog upon her feet,
Restrains her flight, and damps her heat.

From BOILEAU down to his translators,
Dull paraphrasts, and imitators,
All rail at metre at the time
They write and owe their sense to rhyme.
Had he so maul'd his gentle foe,
But for that lucky word QUINEAUT?
Or had his strokes been half so fine,
Without that closing name COTIN?
Yet dares he on this very theme,
His own APOLLO to blaspheme,
And talk of wars 'twixt rhyme and sense,
And murders which ensu'd from thence,
As if they both resolv'd to meet,
Like Theban sons, in mutual heat,
Forgetful of the ties of brother,
To maim and massacre each other.

'Tis true, sometimes to costive brains,
A couplet costs exceeding pains;
But where the fancy waits the skill
Of fluent easy dress at will,
The thoughts are oft, like colts which stray
From fertile meads, and lose their way,
Clapt up and fasten'd in the pound
Of measur'd rhyme, and barren sound.

—What are these jarring notes I hear,
Grating harsh discord on my ear!
How shrill, how coarse, th' unsettled tone,
Alternate 'twixt a squeak and drone,
Worse than the scrannel pipe of straw,
Or music grinding on a saw!
Will none that horrid fiddle break?
—O spare it for GIARDINI's sake.
'Tis bis, and only errs by chance,
Play'd by the hand of ignorance.

From this allusion I infer,
'Tis not the art, but artists err,
And rhyme's a fiddle, sweet indeed,
When touch'd by those who well can lead,
Whose varied notes harmonious flow,
In tones prolong'd from sweeping bow;
But harsh the sounds to ear and mind,
From the poor fiddler lame and blind,
Who begs in music at your door,
And thrums Jack Latin o'er and o'er.

Some MILTON-mad, (an affectation
Glean'd up from college education)
Approve no verse, but that which flows
In epithetic measur'd prose,

With trim expressions daily dress'd
Stol'n, misapply'd, and not confess'd,
And call it writing in the style
Of that great HOMER of our isle.
Whilom, what time, estfoons and erst,
(So prose is oftentimes beverst)
Sprinkled with quaint fantastic phrase,
Uncouth to ears of modern days,
Make up the metre, which they call
Blank, CLASSIC BLANK, their all in all.

Can only blank admit sublime?
Go read and measure DRYDEN's rhyme.
Admire the magic of his song,
See how his numbers roll along,
With ease and strength and varied pause,
Nor cramp'd by sound, nor metre's laws.

Is harmony the gift of rhyme?
Read, if you can, your MILTON's chime;
Where taste, not wantonly severe,
May find the measure, not the ear.

As rhyme, rich rhyme, was DRYDEN's choice,
And blank has MILTON's nobler voice,
I deem it as the subjects lead,
That either measure will succeed,
That rhyme will readily admit
Of fancy, numbers, force and wit;
But though each couplet has its strength,
It palls in works of epic length.

For who can bear to read or hear,
Though not offensive to the ear,
The mighty BLACKMORE gravely sing
Of ARTHUR PRINCE, and ARTHUR KING,
Heroic poems without number,
Long, lifeless, leaden, lulling lumber;
Nor pity such laborious toil,
And loss of midnight time and oil?
Yet glibly runs each jingling line,
Smoother, perhaps, than yours or mine,
But still (though peace be to the dead),
The dull, dull poems weigh down lead.

So have I seen upon the road,
A waggon of a mountain's load,
Broad-wheel'd and drawn by horses eight,
Pair'd like great folks who strut in state:
While the gay steeds, as proud as strong,
Drag the slow tottering weight along,
Each as the steep ascent he climbs,
Moves to his bells, and walks in chimes.

The muses dwelt at OVID's tongue,
For OVID never said, but sung,
And POPE (for POPE affects the same)
In numbers lisp'd, for numbers came.
Thus, in historic page I've read
Of some queen's daughter, fairy-bred,
Who could not either cough or spit,
Without some precious flow of wit,
While her fair lips were as a spout,
To tumble pearls and diamonds out.

Yet, though dame nature may bestow
This knack of verse, and jingling flow:
(And thousands have that impulse felt,
With whom the muses never dwelt)
Though it may save the lab'ring brain
From many a thought-perplexing pain,
And while the rhyme presents itself,
Leaves BYSSUE untouch'd upon the shelf;

Yet more demands the critic ear,
Than the two catch-words in the rear,
Which stand like watchmen in the close,
To keep the verse from being prose.
But when reflection has refin'd
This boist'rous bias of the mind.
When harmony enriches sense,
And borrows stronger charms from thence,
When genius steers by judgment's laws,
When proper cadence, varied pause,
Show nature's strength combin'd with art,
And through the ear possess the heart;
Then numbers come, and all before
Is bab, dab, scab—mere rhymes—no more.

Some boast, which none could e'er impart,
A secret principle of art,
Which gives a melody to rhyme
Unknown to bards in ancient time.
And BOILEAU leaves it as a rule
To all who enter PHOEBUS' school,
To make the metre strong and fine,
Poets write first your second line.
'Tis folly all—No poet flows
In tuneful verse, who thinks in prose;
And all the mighty secret here
Lies in the niceness of the ear.

E'en in this measure, when the muse,
With genuine ease, her way pursues,
Though she affect to hide her skill,
And walks the town in dishabille,
Something peculiar will be seen
Of air, or grace, in shape or mien,
Which will, though carelessly display'd,
Distinguish MADAM from her maid.

Here, by the way of critic sample,
I give the precept and example.
Four feet, you know, in ev'ry line
Is PRIOR's measure, and is mine;
Yet taste would ne'er forgive the crime
To talk of mine with PRIOR's rhyme.

Yet, take it on a poet's word,
There are who foolishly have err'd,
And marr'd their proper reputation,
By sticking close to imitation.
A double rhyme is often sought
At strange expence of time and thought;
And though sometimes a lucky hit
May give a zest to BUTLER's wit;
Whatever makes the measure halt
Is beauty seldom, oft a fault.
For when we see the wit and pains,
The twisting of the stubborn brains,
To cramp the sense within the bound
Of some queer double treble sound:
Hard is the muse's travail, and 'tis plain
'Tis pinion'd sense, and EASE in PAIN;
'Tis like a foot that's wrapt about
With flannel in the racking gout.
But here, methinks, 'tis more than time
To wave both simile and rhyme;
For while, as pen and muses please,
I talk so much of ease and ease,
Though the word's mention'd o'er and o'er,
I scarce have thought of yours before.

'Tis true, when writing to one's friend,
'Tis a rare science when to end,
As 'tis with wits a common sin
To want th' attention to begin.
So, Sir (at last indeed), adieu,
Believe me, as you'll find me, true;
And if henceforth, at any time,
APOLLO whispers you in rhyme,
Or Lady Fancy should dispose
Your mind to fall out in prose,
I shall receive, with hallow'd awe,
The muse's mail from FLEXNEY's draw.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE.

TO A FRIEND WHO SENT THE AUTHOR A HAMPER OF WINE.

Decipit Exemplar vitii imitabile. HOR.

FOND of the loose familiar vein,
Which neither tires, nor cracks the brain,
The muse is rather truant grown
To buckram works of higher tone;
And though perhaps her pow'rs of rhyme,
Might rise to fancies more sublime,
Prefers this easy down-hill road,
To dangerous leaps at five-barr'd Ode,
Or starting in the classic race
Jack-booted for an EPIC chase.

That bard, as other bards, divine,
Who was a sacris to the nine,
DAN PRIOR I mean, with natural ease,
(For what's not nature cannot please)
Would sometimes make his rhyming bow,
And greet his friend as I do now;
And, howsoe'er the critic train
May hold my judgment rather vain,
Allow me one resemblance true,
I have my friend, a SHEPHERD * too.

You know, dear Sir, the muses nine,
Though sober maids are woo'd in wine,
And therefore, as beyond a doubt,
You've found my dangling foible out,
Send me nectareous inspiration,
Though others read intoxication.
For there are those who vainly use
This grand elixir of the muse,
And fancy in their apish fit,
An idle trick of maudlin wit,
Their genius takes a daring flight,
'Bove PINDUS, or PLINLIMMON's height.
Whilst more of madman than of poet,
They're drunk indeed, and do not know it.

The bard, whose charming measure flows
With all the native ease of prose,
Who, without flashy vain pretence,
Has best adorn'd eternal sense,
And, in his cheerful moral page,
Speaks to mankind in every age;
Tells us, from folks whose situation
Makes them the mark of observation,

* Dr. Richard Shepherd, author of a didactic poem, called The Nuptials.

Example oft gives folly rise,
And imitation clings to vice.

ENNIUS could never write, 'tis said,
Without a bottle in his head;
And your own HORACE quaff'd his wine
In plenteous draughts at BACCHUS' shrine;
Nay, ADDISON would oft unbend,
T' indulge his genius with a friend;
(For fancy, which is often dry,
Must wet her wings, or cannot fly))
What precedents for fools to follow
Are BEN, the DEVIL and APOLLO!
While the great gawky ADMIRATION,
Parent of stupid imitation,
Intrinsic proper worth neglects,
And copies errors and defects.

The man, secure in strength of parts,
Has no recourse to shuffling arts,
Seeks not his nature to disguise,
Nor heeds the people's tongues, or eyes,
His wit, his faults at once displays,
Careless of envy, or of praise;
And foibles, which we often find
Just on the surface of the mind,
Strike common eyes, which can't discern
What to avoid, and what to learn.

Errors in wit conspicuous grow,
To use GAY's words, like specks in snow;
Yet it were kind, at least, to make
Allowance for the merit's fake;
And when such beauties fill the eye,
To let the blemishes go by.
Plague on your philosophic sots!
I'll view the sun without its spots.

Wits are peculiar in their mode;
They cannot bear the hackney road,
And will contract habitual ways,
Which sober people cannot praise,
And fools admire: Such fools I hate;
—Begone ye slaves who imitate.

Poor SPURIUS! eager to destroy
And murder hours he can't enjoy,
The last of wittlings, next to dunce,
Would fain turn genius all at once,
But that the wretch mistakes his aim,
And thinks a libertine the same.
Connected as the hand and glove
Is Madam POETRY and LOVE;
Shall not he then possess his muse,
And fetch CORINNA from the stews,
The burden of his amorous verse,
And charming melter of his purse,
While happy REBUS tells the name
Of his and DRURY's common flame?
How will the wretch at BACCHUS' shrine
Betray the cause of wit and wine,
And waste in bawdy, port, and pun,
In taste a very GOTH or HUN,
Those little hours, of value more
Than all the round of time before;
When fancy brightens with the flask,
And the heart speaks without a mask?

Must THOU, whose genius, dull and cool,
Is muddy as the stagnant pool;
Whose torpid soul, and sluggish brains,
Dullness pervades, and wine disdains;

Must thou to nightly taverns run,
APOLLO's guest, and JONSON's son?
And in thy folly's heastly fit
Attempt the sallies of a wit?
Art thou the child of PHOEBUS' choir?
Think of the adage—Ass and Lyre *.

If thou wouldst really succeed,
And be a mimic wit indeed,
Let DRYDEN lend thee SHEFFIELD's blows,
Or like WILL. DAVENANT lose your nose.

O LUCIAN, sire of ancient wit,
Who, wedding HUMOUR, didst beget
Those doctors in the laughing school,
Those giant sons of RIDICULE,
SWIFT, RAB'LAIS, and † that favourite child,
Who, less eccentrically wild,
Inverts the misanthropic plan,
And, hating vices, hates not man:
How do I love thy gibing vein!
Which glances at the mimic train
Of sots, who proud as modern beaux
Of birth-day suits, and tinsel clothes,
Affecting cynical grimace
With philosophic stupid face,
In dirty hue, with naked feet,
In rags and tatters, stroll the street;
OSTENSIVELY exceeding wise;
But knaves, and fools, and walking lies,
External mimicry their plan,
The monkey's copy after man.

Wits too possess this affectation,
And live a life of imitation,
Are slovens, revellers, and brutes,
Laborious, absent, prattlers, mutes,
From some example handed down
Of some great genius of renown.

If ADDISON, from habit's trick,
Could bite his fingers to the quick,
Shall not I nibble from design,
And be an ADDISON to mine?
If POPE most feelingly complains
Of aching head, and throbbing pains,
My head and arm his posture hit,
And I already ache for wit.
If CHURCHILL, following nature's call,
Has bead that never aches at all,
With burning brow, and heavy eye,
I'll give my looks and pain the lie.

If huge tall words of termination,
Which ask a critic's explanation,
Come rolling out along with thought,
And seem to stand just where they ought;
If language more in grammar drest,
With greater emphasis exprest,
Unstudied, unaffected flows,
In some great wit's conversing prose;
If from the tongue the period round
Fall into style, and swell to sound,
'Tis nature which herself displays,
And JOHNSON speaks a JOHNSON's phrase.

But can you hear, without a smile,
The formal coxcomb ape his style,

* Assinus ad Lyræ.

† The late inimitable Henry Fielding, Esq.

Who, most dogmatically wise,
Attempts to censure and despise,
Affecting what he cannot reach,
A trim propriety of speech?
What though his pompous language wear
The grand decisive solemn air,
Where quaint ANTITHESIS prevails,
And sentences are weigh'd in scales,
Can you bow down with reverend awe
Before this puppet king of straw?
Or, hush'd in mute attention, sit
To hear this CRITIC, POET, WIT,
PHILOSOPHER, all, all at once,
And to complete them all, this—DUNCE?
—All this you'll say is mighty fine,
But what has this to do with wine?

Have patience, and the muse shall tell
What you, my friend, know full as well.
Vices in poets, wits, and kings,
Are catching, imitable things;
And frailties standing out to view
Become the objects fools pursue.
Thus have I pictures often seen
Where features neither speak nor mean,
Yet spite of all the face will strike,
And mads us that it should be like,
When all the near resemblance grows
From scratch or pimple on the nose.

To poets then (I mean not here
The scribbling drudge, or scribbling peer,
Nor those who have the monthly fit,
The lunatics of modern wit)
To POETS wine is inspiration,
Blockheads get drunk in imitation.

As different liquors different ways
Affect the body, sometimes raise
The fancy to an eagle's flight,
And make the heart feel wond'rous light;
At other times the circling mug,
Like LETHE'S draught, or opiate drug,
Will strike the senses on a heap,
When folks talk wise, who talk asleep;
A whimsical imagination
Might form a whimsical relation,
How every Author writes and thinks
Analogous to what he drinks,
While quaint conjecture's lucky hit
Finds out his bev'rage in his wit.

Ye goodly dray-nymph muses, hail!
MUM, PORTER, STINGO, MILD and STALE,]
And chiefly thou of boasted fame,
Of ROMAN and IMPERIAL name;
O Purl! all hail! thy vot'ry steals,
His stockings dangling at his heels,
To where some pendent head invites
The bard to set his own to rights,
Who seeks thy influence divine,
And pours libations on thy shrine,
In wormwood draughts of inspiration,
To whet his soul for defamation.

Hail too, your domes! whose master's skill]
Takes up illustrious folks at will,
And careless of place or name,]
Bebeads and bangs to public fame
Fine garter'd knights, blue, red, or green,
Lords, earls, and dukes, nay king or queen,

And sometimes pairs them both together,
To dangle to the wind and weather;
Or claps some mighty general there,
Who has not any head to spare.
Or if it more his fancy suit,
Pourtrays or fish, or bird, or brute.
And lures the gaping thirsty guest
To SCOTT'S entire, or TRUEMAN'S best.

Ye chequer'd domes, thrice hail! for hence
The fire of wit, the froth of sense,
Here gentle puns, ambiguous joke,
Burst forth oracular in smoke,
And inspiration pottle deep
Forgets her sons, and falls asleep.
Hence issue treatises and rhymes,
The wit and wonder of the times,
Hence scandal, piracies, and lies,
Defensive pamphlets on EXCISE,
The murd'rous articles of news,
And pert THEATRICAL REVIEWS.
Hither, as to their urns, repair,
Bard, publisher, and minor play'r,
And o'er the porter's foaming head
Their venom'd malice nightly shed,
And aim their batteries of dirt
At genius, which they cannot hurt.

Smack not their works, if verse or prose
Offend your eye, or ear, or nose,
So frothy, vapid, stale, hum-drum,
Of STINGO, PORTER, PURL, and MUM?
And when the muse politely jokes,
Cannot you find the lady imokes?
And, spite of all her inspiration,
Betrays her alehouse education?

Alas! how very few are found
Whose style tastes neat, and full, and sound!
In WILMOT'S loose ungovern'd vein
There is, I grant, much burnt CHAMPAIGN,
And DORSET'S lines all palates hit,
The very BURGUNDY of wit.
But when, obedient to the mode
Of panegyric, courtly ode,
The bard bestrides his annual hack,
In vain I taste, and sip, and smack,
I find no flavour of the SACK. }
But while I ramble and refine
On flavour, style, and wit, and wine,
Your claret, which I would not waste,
Recals me to my proper taste;
So ending, as 'tis more than time,
At once my letter, glass, and rhyme,
I take this bumper off to you,
'Tis SHEPHERD'S health---dear friend, adieu.

THE CANDLE AND SNUFFERS.

A FABLE.

"No author ever spar'd a brother:
"Wits are game cocks to one another."
But no antipathy so strong,
Which acts so fiercely, lasts so long
As that which rages in the breast
Of critic, and of wit profess,
When, eager for some bold emprise,
Wi, Titan-like, affects the skies,

U u iii

When, full of energy divine,
The mighty dupe of all the nine,
Bids his kite soar on paper wing,
The critic comes, and cuts the string;
Hence dire contention often grows
'Twixt man of verse, and man of prose;
While prose-man deems the verse-man fool,
And measures wit by line and rule,
And, as he lops off fancy's limb,
'Turns executioner of whim;
While genius, which too oft disdains
To bear e'en honourable chains;
(Such as a sheriff's self might wear
Or grace the wisdom of a may'r)
Turns rebel to dame REASON's throne
And holds no judgment like his own.

Yet while they spatter mutual dirt,
In idle threats that cannot hurt,
Methinks they waste a deal of time,
Both fool in prose, and fool in rhyme:
And when the angry bard exclaims,
And calls a thousand paltry names,
He doth his critic mighty wrong,
And hurts the dignity of song.

The prefatory matter past
The tale, or story, comes at last.

A candle stuck in flaring state
Within the nozzle of French plate,
Tow'ring aloft with smoaky light,
The snuff and flame of wondrous height,
(For, virgin yet of amputation,
No force had check'd its inclination)
Sullen address'd with conscious pride,
The dormant snuffers at its side.

"Mean vulgar tools, whose envious aim
Strikes at the vitals of my flame,
Your rude assaults shall hurt no more,
See how my beams triumphant soar!
See how I gaily blaze alone
With strength, with lustre all my own.
"Lustre, good Sir!" the snuffers cried,
"Alas! how ignorant is pride!
Thy light which wavers round the room,
Shows as the counterfeit of gloom,
Thy snuff which idly tow'rs so high
Will waste thy essence by and by,
Which, as I prize thy lustre dear
I fain would lop to make thee clear.
Boast not, old friend, thy random rays,
Thy wasting strength, and quiv'ring blaze,
You shine but as a beggar's link;
To burn away, and die in sink,
No merit waits unsteady light,
You must burn true as well as bright."

Poets like candles all are puffers,
And critics are the candle snuffers.

THE TEMPLE OF FAVOUR.

TO WILLIAM KENRICK.

THOUGH pilot in the ship no more,
To bring the cargo safe to shore *;

* When this was published in the St. James's Magazine, Mr. Lloyd had relinquished the conduct of that work to Dr. Kenrick.

Permit, as time and place afford,
A passenger to come aboard.

The shepherd who survey'd the deep,
When all its tempests were asleep,
Dream'd not of danger; glad was he
To sell his flock, and put to sea:
The consequence has Æ op. told,
He lost his venture, sheep and gold.
So fares it with us sons of rhyme,
From doggrel wit, to wit sublime;
On ink's calm ocean all seems clear,
No sands affright, no rocks appear;
No lightnings blast, no thunders roar;
No surges lash the peaceful shore;
Till, all too vent'rous from the land,
The tempests dash us on the strand:
Then the low pirate boards the deck,
And sons of theft enjoy the wreck.

The harlot muse so passing gay,
Bewitches only to betray;
Though for a while, with easy air,
She smooths the rugged brow of care,
And laps the mind in flow'ry dreams,
With fancy's transitory gleams.
Fond of the nothings she bestows,
We wake at last to real woes.

Through ev'ry age, in ev'ry place,
Consider well the poet's case;
By turns protected and carest'd,
Defam'd, dependent, and distress'd;
The joke of wits, the bane of slaves,
The curse of fools, the butt of knaves;
Too proud to stoop for servile ends,
To lacquey rogues, or flatter friends;
With prodigality to give,
Too careless of the means to live:
The bubble fame intent to gain,
And yet too lazy to maintain;
He quits the world he never priz'd,
Pitied by few, by more despis'd;
And lost to friends, oppress'd by foes,
Sinks to the nothing whence he rose.

O glorious trade, for wit's a trade,
Where men are ruin'd more than made.
Let crazy LEE, neglected GAY,
The shabby OTWAY, DRYDEN gray,
Those tuneful servants of the nine,
(Not that I blend their name with mine)
Repeat their lives, their works, their fame,
And teach the world some useful shame.
At first the poet idly strays
Along the greenward path of praise,
Till on his journeys up and down,
To see, and to be seen, in town,
What with ill-natur'd flings and rubs
From flippant bucks, and backney scrubs,
His toils through dust, through dirt, through gravel,

Take off his appetite for travel.

Transient is fame's immediate breath,
Though it blows stronger after death;
Own then, with MARTIAL, after fate
If glory comes, she comes too late.
For who'd his time and labour give
For praise, by which he cannot live?

But in APOLLO's court of fame
(In this all courts are much the same),
By FAVOUR folks must make their way,
FAVOUR, which lasts, perhaps, a day,
And when you've twirl'd yourself about
To wriggle in you're wriggled out.

'Tis from the sunshine of her eyes
Each courtly insect lives or dies;
'Tis she dispenses all the graces
Of profits, pensions, honours, places;
And in her light capricious fits
Makes wits of fools, and fools of wits,
Gives vices, folly, dullness, birth,
Nay stamps the currency on worth;
'Tis she that lends the muse a spur,
And even kissing goes by her.

Far in the sea a temple stands
Built by dame ERROR's hasty hands,
Where in her dome of lucid shells
The visionary goddess dwells,
Here o'er her subject sons of earth
Regardless of place, or worth,
She rules triumphant; and supplies
The gaping world with hopes and lies,
Her throne, which weak and tottering seems,
Is built upon the wings of dreams;
The fickle winds her altars bear
Which quiver to the shifting air;
Hither hath REASON seldom brought
The child of VIRTUE or of THOUGHT,
And JUSTICE with her equal face,
Finds this, alas! no throne of grace.

CAPRICE, OPINION, FASHION, wait,
The porters at the temple's gate,
And as the fond adorers press
Pronounce fantastic happiness;
While FAVOUR with a SYREN's smile,
Which might ULYSSES' self beguile,
Presents the sparkling bright libation,
The nectar of intoxication;
And summoning her ev'ry grace
Of winning charms, and cheerful face,
Smiles away reason from his throne,
And makes his votaries her own:
Instant resounds the voice of fame;
Caught with the whistlings of their name,
The fools grow frantic, in their pride
Contemning all the world beside:
Pleas'd with the gewgaw toys of pow'r,
The noisy pageant of an hour,
Struts forth the statesman, haughty, vain,
Amidst a supple servile train,
With shrug, grimace, nod, wink, and stare,
So proud, he almost treads in air;
While levee-fools, who sue for place,
Crouch for employment from his grace,
And ev'n good bishops, taught to trim,
Forfake their God to bow to him.

The poet in that happy hour,
Imagination in his pow'r,
Walks all abroad, and unconfin'd,
Enjoys the liberty of mind:
Dupe to the smoke of flimsy praise,
He vomits forth sonorous lays;
And, in his fine poetic rage,
Planning, poor soul, a deathless page,

Indulges pride's fantastic whim,
And all the WORLD must wake to HIM.

A while from fear, from envy free,
He sleeps on a pacific sea;
Lethargic ERROR for a while
Deceives him with her specious smile,
And flatt'ring dreams delusive shed,
Gay gilded visions round his head.

When, swift as thought, the goddess lewd
Shifts the light gale; and tempests rude,
Such as the northern skies deform,
When fell DESTRUCTION guides the storm,
Transport him to some dreary isle
Where FAVOUR never deign'd to smile,
Where waking, helpless, all alone,
'Midst craggy steep and rocks unknown;
Sad scenes of woe his pride confound,
And DESOLATION stalks around.
Where the dull months no pleasures bring,
And years roll round without a spring;
Where he all hopeless, lost, undone,
Sees cheerless days that know no sun;
Where jibing SCORN her throne maintains,
'Midst mildews, blights, and blasts, and rains.

Let others, with submissive knee,
Capricious goddess! bow to thee;
Let them with fixt incessant aim
Court fickle favour, faithless fame;
Let vanity's fastidious slave
Lose the kind moments nature gave,
In invocations to the shrine
Of Phoebus and the fabled nine,
An author, to his latest days,
From hunger, or from thirst of praise,
Let him through every subject roam
To bring the useful morsel home;
Write upon LIBERTY oppress'd,
On happiness, when most distress'd,
Turn bookseller's obsequious tool,
A monkey's cat, a mere fool's fool;
Let him, unhallow'd wretch! profane
The muse's dignity for gain,
Yield to the dunce his sense contemns,
Cringe to the knave his heart condemns,
And, at a blockhead's bidding, force
Reluctant genius from his course;
Write ode, epistle, essay, libel,
Make notes, or steal them for the Bible;
Or let him, more judicial, sit
The dull Lord Chief, on culprit wit,
With rancour read, with passion blame,
Talk high, yet fear to put his name,
And from the dark, but useful shade,
(Fit place for murd'rous ambushade),
Weak monthly shafts at merit hurl,
The GILDON of some modern CUL.
For me, by adverse fortune plac'd
Far from the colleges of taste,
I jostle no poetic name;
I envy none their proper fame;
And if sometimes an easy vein,
With no design, and little pain,
Form'd into verse, hath pleas'd a while,
And caught the reader's transient smile,
My muse hath answer'd all her ends,
Pleasing herself, while pleas'd her friends

Where CHARITY o'er all presides,
And SENSE approves what VIRTUE guides,
Yet wars and tumults will commence,
For rogues hate virtue, blockheads sense.

Believe me, opposition grows
Not always from our real foes,
But (where it seldom ever ends)
From our more dangerous seeming friends.
I hate not foes, for they declare,
'Tis war for war, and dare who dare;
But your sly, sneaking, worming owls,
Whom FRIENDSHIP scorns and FEAR controuls,
Who praise, support, and help by halves,
Like heifers, neither bulls, nor calves;
Who, in hypocrisy's disguise,
Are truly as the serpent wise,
But cannot ALL the precept love,
And be as harmless as the dove.
Who hold each charitable meeting,
To mean no more than good sound eating,
While each becomes a hearty fellow
According as he waxes mellow,
And kindly helps the main design,
By drinking its success in wine;
And when his feet and senses reel,
Totters with correspondent zeal;
Nay, would appear a patron wife,
But that his wisdom's in disguise,
And would harangue, but that his mouth,
Which ever hates the sin of drowth,
Catching the full perpetual glass,
Cannot afford a word to pass.

Such, who like true churchwardens eat,
Because the parish pays the treat,
And of their bellyful secure,
O'ersee, or over look the poor;
Who would no doubt be wond'rous just,
And faithful guardians of their trust,
But think the deed might run more clever
To them and to their heirs for ever,
That charity, too apt to roam,
Might end, where she begins, at home;
Who made all public good a trade,
Benevolence a mere parade,
And charity a cloak for sin,
To keep it snug and warm within;
Who flatter, only to betray,
Who promise much and never pay,
Who wind themselves about your heart
With hypocritic, knavish art,
Tell you what wond'rous things they're doing,
And undermine you to your ruin;
Such, or of low or high estate,
To speak the honest truth, I hate:
I view their tricks with indignation,
And loath each fulsome protestation,
As I would loath a whore's embrace,
Who smiles, and smirks, and strokes my face,
And all so tender, fond and kind,
As free of body, as of mind,
Affects the softness of the dove,
And p—xes me to show her love.

The maiden wither'd, wrinkled, pale,
Whose charms, though strong, are rather stale,
Will use that weapon call'd a tongue,
To wound the beautous and the young.

—What, DELIA handsome!—well!—I own
I'm either blind or stupid grown.
—The girl is well enough to pass,
A rosy, simple, rustic lass,
—But there's no meaning in her face,
And then her air, so void of grace!
And the world, with half an eye,
May see her shape grows quite awry.
—I speak not from an ill design,
For she's a favourite of mine,
—Though I could wish that she would wear
A more reserv'd becoming air;
Not that I hear of indiscretions,
Such folks, you know, make no confessions,
Though the WORLD says, that parson there,
That smock-fac'd man with darkish hair,
He who wrote verses on her bird,
The simplest things I ever heard,
Makes frequent visits there of late,
And is become exceeding great;
This I myself aver is true,
I saw him lead her to his pew.

Thus scandal, like a false quotation,
Misrepresents in defamation;
And where she happily cannot spy
A loop whereon to hang a lie,
Turns every action wrong side out
To bring her poultry tale about.

Thus excellence of every kind,
Whether of body or of mind,
Is but a mark set up on high,
For knaves to guide their arrows by,
A mere Scotch post for public itch,
Where hog, or man, may scrub his breech.

But thanks to nature, which ordains
A just reward for all our pains,
And makes us stem, with secret pride,
Hoarse DISAPPOINTMENT's rugged tide,
And like a lordly ship, which braves
The roar of winds, and rush of waves,
Weather all storms, which jealous hate
Or frantic malice may create.
'Tis CONSCIENCE, a reward alone,
CONSCIENCE, who plac'd on virtue's throne,
Eyes raging men, or raging seas,
Undaunted, firm, with heart at ease.

From her dark cave, though ENVY rise
With hollow cheeks, and jaundic'd eyes,
Though HATRED league with FOLLY vain,
And SPLEEN and RANCOUR join the train;
Shall VIRTUE shrink, abash'd, afraid,
And tremble at an idle shade?
Fear works upon the fool, or knave,
An honest man is always brave.
While OPPOSITION's fruitless aim
Is as the bellows to the flame,
And, like a Pagan persecution,
Enforces FAITH and RESOLUTION.

Though prejudice in narrow minds,
The mental eye of reason blinds;
Though WIT, which not e'en friends will spare,
Affect the sneering, laughing air,
Though DULLNESS, in her monkish gown,
Display the wisdom of a frown,
Yet TRUTH will force herself, in spite
Of all their efforts, into light.

See bigot monks in Spain prevail,
See GALILEO dragg'd to gaol :
Hear the grave doctors of the schools,
The Golgotha of learned fools,
As damnable and impious brand
That art they cannot understand,
And out of zeal pervert the Bible,
As if it were a standing libel,
On every good and useful plan
That rises in the brain of man.

O BIGOTRY ! whose frantic rage
Has blotted half the classic page,
And in religion's drunken fit,
Murder'd the Greek and Roman wit ;
Who zealous for that faith's increase,
Whose ways are righteousness and peace,
With rods and whips, and sword, and axe,
With prisons, tortures, flames and racks,
With persecution's fiery goad,
Enforcing some new-fangl'd mode,
Wouldst pluck down REASON from her throne
To raise some phantom of thy own ;
Alas ! the fury undiscerning,
Which blasts, and stunts, and hews up learning,
Like an ill-judging zealous friend,
Blasphemes that wisdom you defend.

Go, kick the prostituted whores,
The nine stale virgins out of doors ;
For let the abbess beat her drum,
Eleven thousand troops shall come ;
All female forms, and virgins true,
As ever faint or poet knew.
And glorious be the honour'd name
Of WINIFREDE, of SAINTED fame,
Who to the church like light'ning sped,
And ran three miles without her head ;
(Well might the modest lady run,
Since 'twas to keep her maiden one)
And when before the congregation
The prince fell dead for reparation,
Secure of life as well as honour,
Ran back with both her heads upon her.

No matter of what shape or size,
Gulp down the legendary lies,
Believe, what neither God ordains,
Nor Christ allows, nor sense maintains ;
Make faint of Pope, or saint of Thief,
Believe almost in unbelief ;
Yet with thy solemn priestly air,
By book and bell, and candle swear,
That God has made his own elect
But from your stem and favourite sect ;
That he who made the world, has blest
One part alone, to damn the rest,
As if th' All-merciful and Just,
Who form'd us of one common dust,
Had render'd up his own decree,
And lent his attributes to thee.

Thus his own eyes the bigot blinds,
To shut out light from human minds,
And the clear truth (an emanation
From the great Author of creation,
A beam transmitted from on high,
To bring us nearer to the sky,
While ev'ry path by science trod,
Leads us with wonder up to God),

Is doom'd by ignorance to make
Atonement at the martyr's stake ;
Though, like pure gold, th' illustrious dame,
Comes forth the brighter from the flame.
No persecution will avail ;
No inquisition racks, nor gaol ;
When learning's more enlight'ned ray
Shall drive these sickly fogs away ;
A thankful age shall pay her more,
Than all her troubles hurt before.
See shame and scorn await on those
Who poorly dar'd to be her foes,
But will the grateful voice of fame
Sink truth, and GALILEO's name ?

How wilful, obstinate, and blind,
Are the main herd of human kind !
Well said the wit, who well had tried
That malice which his parts defied ;
When merit's sun begins to break,
The dunces stretch, and strive to wake,
And amity of dunce with dunce,
Fingers out genius all at once.
As you may find the honey out,
By seeing all the flies about.
All ugly women hate a toast ;
The goodliest fruit is pick'd the most ;
The ivy winds about the oak,
And to the fairest comes the smoke.

Escap'd the dangers of the deep,
When GULLIVER fell fast asleep,
Stretch'd on the Lilliputian strand,
A giant in a pigmy land ;
Watchful against impending harms,
All Lilliput cried out, To arms ;
The trumpets echoed all around,
The captain slept exceeding sound,
Though crowds of undistinguish'd size
Assail'd his body, legs, and thighs,
While clouds of arrows flew apace,
And fell like feathers on his face.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. W. WOTTY.

THE praise of genius will offend
A foe no doubt, sometimes a friend ;
But curse on genius, wit, and parts ;
The thirst of science, love of arts,
If inconsistent with the plan
Of social good from man to man.
For me, who will, may wear the bays,
I value not such idle praise :
Let wrangling wits abuse, defame,
And quarrel for an empty name,
What's in this shuffling pace of rhyme,
Or grand pas stride of stiff sublime,
That vanity her trump should blow,
And look with scorn on folks below ?
Are wit and folly close ally'd,
And match'd, like poverty, with pride ?
When rival bards for fame contend,
The poet often spoils the friend ;

The poet often spoils the friend ;
Genius self-center'd feels alone
That merit he esteems his own,
And cold, o'er-jealous, and severe,
Hates, like a Turk, a brother near ;

Malice steps in, good nature flies,
Folly prevails, and friendship dies.
Peace to all such, if peace can dwell
With those who bear about a hell,
Who blast all worth with envy's breath,
By their own feelings stung to death.
None but a weak and brainless fool,
Undisciplin'd in fortune's school,
Can hope for favours from the wit:
He pleads prescription to forget,
Unnotic'd let him live or rot,
And, as forgetful, be forgot,
Most wags, whose pleasure is to smoke,
Would rather lose their friend, than joke;
A man in rags looks something queer,
And there's vast humour in a sneer;
That jest, alike all wittings suits,
Which lies no further than the boots.
Give me the man whose open mind
Means social good to all mankind;
Who when his friend, from fortune's round,
Is toppled headlong to the ground,
Can meet him with a warm embrace,
And wipe the tear from sorrow's face;
Who, not self-taught and proudly wise,
Seeks more to comfort than advise,
Who less intent to shine than please,
Wears his own mirth with native ease,
And is from sense, from nature's plan,
The jovial guest, the honest man;
In short, whose picture, painted true,
In ev'ry point resembles you.

And will my friend for once excuse
This off'ring of a lazy muse?
Most lazy,---lest you think her not,
I'll draw her picture on the spot.
A perfect ease the dame enjoys;
Three chairs her indolence employs:
On one she squats her cushion'd bum,
Which would not rise, though kings should come;
An arm lolls dangling o'er another,
A leg lies couchant on its brother.
To make her look supremely wise,
At least like wisdom in disguise,
The weed, which first by Raleigh brought,
Gives thinking looks instead of thought,
She smokes, and smokes; without all feeling,
Save as the eddies climb the cieling,
And waft about their mild perfume,
She marks their passage round the room.
When pipe forsakes the vacant mouth,
A pot of beer prevents her drowth,
Which with potations pottle deep
Lulls the poor maudlin muse to sleep.
Her books of which sh'as wond'rous need,
But neither pow'r nor will to read,
In scatter'd tomes lie all around
Upon the lowest shelf---the ground.

Such ease no doubt suits easy rhyme;
Folks walk about who write SUBLIME,
While RECITATION's pompous sound
Drawls words sonorous all around,
And ACTION waves her hand and hed,
As those who bread and butter spread.

You bards who feel not fancy's dearth,
Who strike the roof, and kick the earth,

Whose muse superlatively high
Takes lodgings always near the sky
And like the lark with daring flight
Still soars and sings beyond our sight;
May trumpet forth your grand sublime,
And scorn our lazy lounging rhyme.
Yet though the lark in ether floats,
And trills no doubt diviner notes,
Carelessly perch'd on yonder spray,
The linnet sings a pretty lay.

What horrid, what tremendous sight
Shakes all my fabric with affright!
With ARGUS' hundred eyes he marks,
With triple mouth the monster barks;
And while he scatters flaming brands
BRIAREUS lends him all his hands.

Hist! 'tis a CRITIC.---Yes---'tis he
What would your graceless form with me?
Is it t' upbraid me with the crime
Of spinning unlaborious rhyme,
Of stringing various thoughts together
In verse, or prose, or both, or neither?
A vein, which though it must offend
You lofty Sirs who can't descend,
To fame has often made its way
From BUTLER, PRIOR, SWIFT, and GAR---
Is it for this your brow austere
Frowns me to stone for very fear?
Hear my just reason first, and then
Approve me right, or split my pen.

I seek not by more labour'd lays
To catch the slipp'ry tail of praise,
Nor will I run a mad career
'Gainst genius which I most revere;
When Phœbus bursts with genuine fire,
The little stars at once retire;
Who cares a farthing for those lays
Which you can neither blame, nor praise?
I cannot match a CHURCHILL's skill,
But may be LANGHORNE when I will:

Let the mere mimic, for each season bears
Your mimic bards as well as mimic play'rs.
Creep servilely along, and with dull pains
Lash his slow steed, in whose enfeebled veins
The cold blood lags, let him with fruitless aim
By borrow'd plumes assume a borrow'd fame,
With studied forms th' incautious ear beguile,
And ape the numbers of a CHURCHILL's style.
Slaves may some fame from imitation hope;
Who'd be PAUL WHITEHEAD, though he honours POPE?

If clinking couplets in one endless chime
Be the sole beauty, and the praise of rhyme;
If sound alone an easy triumph gains,
While fancy bleeds, and sense is hung in chains,

Ye happy triflers hail the rising mode:
See, all Parnassus is a turnpike road,
Where each may travel in the highway track
On true bred hunter, or on common hack.
For me, who labour with poetic sin,
Who often woo the muse I cannot win,
Whom pleasure first a willing poet made,
And folly spoilt by taking up the trade,
Pleas'd I beheld superior genius shine,
Nor ting'd with envy wish that genius mine.

To CHURCHILL's muse can bow with decent awe,
Admire his mode, nor make that mode my law :
Both may, perhaps, have various pow'rs to please ;
Be his the STRENGTH of NUMBERS, mine the

EASE,

Ease that rejects not, but betrays no care :
Less of the coxcomb than the sloven's air.

Your taste, as mine, all metre must offend
When imitation is its only end.

I could perhaps that servile task pursue,
And copy CHURCHILL as I'd copy you,
But that my flippant muse, too saucy grown,
Prefers that manner she can call her own.

ODE TO GENIUS.

THOU child of nature, genius strong,
Thou master of the poet's song,
Before whose light, art's dim and feeble ray
Gleams like the taper in the blaze of day :
Thou lov'st to steal along the secret shade,
Where fancy, bright ærial maid !
Awaits thee with her thousand charms,
And revels in thy wanton arms ;
She to thy bed, in days of yore,
The sweetly-warbling Shakspeare bore ;
Whom every muse endow'd with every skill,
And dipt him in that sacred rill,
Whose silver streams flow musical along,
Where Phœbus' hallow'd mount resounds with raptur'd song.

Forfake not thou the vocal choir,
Their breasts revisit with thy genial fire,
Else vain the studied sounds of mimic art,
Tickle the ear, but come not near the heart.
Vain every phrase in curious order set,
On each side leaning on the (stop-gap) epithet.
Vain the quick rhyme still tinkling in the close,
While pure description shines in measur'd prose,
Thou bear'st aloof, and look'st with high
disdain,

Upon the dull mechanic train ;
Whose nerveless strains flag on in languid tone,
Lifeless and lumpish as the bagpipe's drowsy drone.

No longer now thy altars blaze,
No poet offers up his lays ;
Inspir'd with energy divine,
To worship at thy sacred shrine.
Since taste *, with absolute domain,
Extending wide her leaden reign,
Kills with her melancholy shade,
The blooming scions of fair fancy's tree ;
Which erst full wantonly have stray'd
In many a wreath of richest poesy.

For when the oak denies her stay,
The creeping ivy winds her humble way ;
No more she twists her branches round,
But drags her feeble stem along the barren
ground.

* By taste, is here meant the modern affectation of it

Where then shall exil'd genius go ?
Since only those the laurel claim,
And boast them of the poet's name,
Whose sober rhymes in even tenour flow ;
Who prey on words, and all their flow'rets
cull,
Coldly correct, and regularly dull.
Why sleep the sons of genius now ?
Why, Wartons, rests the lyre unstrung ?
• And thou, blest bard ! around whose sacred
brow,
Great Pindar's delegated wreath is hung :
Arise, and snatch the majesty of song
From dullness' servile tribe, and art's unhallow'd throng.

PROLOGUE, 1757.

Est schola rhetorices, celebrat quam crebra juventus,
Et tumido inflatos ejicit ore sonos.
Quà quisque assumit tragicas novus histrio partes,
Nec loquitur, verbum quin sapit omne, pathos.
Ingenia hic crescunt, mox successura theatris,
Regis, amatoris, prompta subire vices.
Multus ibi furiis Macbetha agitatus iniquis,
Elusâ telum prendit inane manu.
Multus ibi, infuscat cui vultus suber adustum
Immodicis sævit raucus Othello minis.
Omnia queis tragicis opus est, hic arma parantur ;
Auribus insidiæ sunt, oculisque furæ :
Conatus manuumque, pedumque, orisque rotundi,
Certatim et vultus vis, laterumque labor.
Quam sibi, dum gestu stat fixus quisque silenti,
Quam placet a speculo forma reflexa sui !
Hac studeant, cordi quibus ars et pompa theatri !
Non tamen est nobis inde petendus honor.
Ingenua ut pubes vultum sibi sumat apertum,
Et sensim assuescat fortius ore loqui ;
Ne dubiis tandem verba eluctantia labris
Occludat timidus præpediatque pudor,
Ingredimur scenam ; nec clam vos, docta corona,
Commoda ab hoc tenui quanta labore fluant.
Hinc SAPERE ET FARI discit generosa juvenus,
Dum pavida accendit pectora laudis amor.
Freti his, majorem mox ingrediemur arenam ;
Hic stabilita vigent curia, rostra, forum.

PROLOGUE, 1758.

Hic nihil ad populum—non pompa hic vana
theatri,
Qualem ore attonito plebs inhiare solet :
Non scena hic splendet magicâ variabilis arte,
Et sumit formas prodigiosa novas :
Non hic, labrato subvectus fune per auras,
Mercurius celeres itque reditque vias :
Nec freta cæruleâ turgent undosa papyro,
Nec resinato fulgurat igne polus :
Janua nec cæcos aperit furtiva recessus,
Unde minutatim proferat umbra caput.
Quin valeant levia hæc vulgi crepitacula ! jactant
Et proprium, et simplex, nostra theatra decus.

CARMEN ELEGIACUM,

IN CÆMETERIO RUSTICO COMPOSITUM.

(Gray's Elegy written in a Country Church-Yard.)

AUDISTIN! quam lenta sonans campana per agros,
Ærato occiduam nuntiat ore diem.
Armenta impellunt crebris mugitibus auras,
Lassatusque domum rusticus urget iter.
Solutus ego in tenebris moror, et vestigia solus
Compono tacitâ nocte, vacoque mihi.
Omnia pallescunt jam decedentia visu,
Et terra et cælum, quâ patet, omne filet.
Cuncta silent, nisi musca suam sub vespere sero
Raucisonans pigram quâ rotat orbe fugam;
Cuncta silent, nisi quâ faciles campanula somnos
Allicit, et lento murmure mulcet oves.

Quæque hedera antiquas sociâ complectitur umbrâ
Turres, feralis lugubre cantat avis;
Et strepit ad lunam si quis sub nocte vagetur
Imperium violans, Cynthia Diva, tuum.

Has propter veteres ulmos, taxique sub umbrâ
Qua putris multo cespite turget humus,
Dormit, in æternum dormit, gens prisca colonum,
Quisque suâ angustâ conditus usque domo.

Hoc nec mane novum, Zephyrique fragrantior
aura,

Nec gallus vigili qui vocat ore diem,
Nec circumvolitans quæ stridula garrit hirundo
Stramineumque altâ sub trabe figit opus,
Undique nec cornu vox ingeminata sonantis
Æterno elicient hos, repetentque toro.

Amplius his nunquam conjux bene fida marito
Ingeret ardenti grandia ligna foco;
Nec reditum expectans domini sub vespere sero
Excoquet agrestes officiosa dapes;
Nec curret rapim genitoris ad oscula proles,
Nec reducem agnoscent æmula turba patrem.

Quam sæpe hi rastris glebam fregere feracem?
Sæpe horum cecidit falce resecta seges.
Quam læti egerunt stridentia plaustra per agros,
Et stimulis tardos increpuere boves!
Horum sylva vetus quam concidit iccta bipenni,
Quæque ruit latè vi tremefecit humum!

Ne tamen ambitio risu male læta maligno
Sortemve, aut lusus, aut rude temnat opus!
Nec fronte excipiat ventosa superbia torvâ
Pauperis annales, historiasque breves!

Et generis jactatus honos dominatio regum,
Quicquid opes, quicquid forma dedere boni,
Supremam simul hanc expectant omnia noctem:
Scilicet ad lethum ducit honoris iter.

Nolite hos humiles culpæ insimulare, superbi,
Quod domini ostendant nulla trophæa decus,
Quâ canit amissum longo ordine turba patronum,
Clarosque ingeminant claustra profunda sonos.

An vanis inscripta notis augustior urna,
Phidiacumve loquens nobile marmor opus,
An revocent animam fatali a sede fugacem?
Detque iterum vitâ posse priore frui?
Possit adulantum sermo penetrare sepulchrum?
Evocet aut manes laus et inanis honor?

Forfan in hoc, olim divino semine prægnans
Ingenii, hoc aliquis cespite dormit adhuc.
Neglecto hoc forfan jaceat sub cespite, sceptrâ
Cujus tractarint imperiosa manus.
Vel quales ipso forfan vel Apolline dignæ

Doctrinæ horum oculis antiqua volumina prisce
Nunquam divitias explicuere suas.
Horum autem ingenium torpescere fecit egestas
Aspera et angustæ fors inimica domi.

Et rudis ignotum fert et inane decus.
Plurima neglectos fragrans rosa pat di odores,

Æmulus Hamdeni hic aliquis requiescat agrestis,
 Quem patriæ indignans extimulavit amor;
 Ausus hic exigua est villæ oppugnare tyranno,
 Afferere et forti jura paterna manu.
 Aut mutus forsan, fatoque inglorius alter
 Hæc vel Milto par, requiescat humo.
 Dormiat aut aliquis Cromuelli hic æmulus audax,
 Qui patriam poterit vel jugulasse suam.

Eloquio arrectum prompto mulcere senatum,
 Exilii immoto pectore ferre minas,
 Divitias largâ in patriam diffundere dextrâ,
 Historiam ex populi colligere ore suam.

Illorum vetuit fors improba;—nec tamen arcto
 Tantum ad virtutem limite clausit iter,
 Verum etiam et vitia ulterius transire vetabat,
 Nec dedit his magnum posse patrare scelus.
 Hos vetuit temere per stragem invadere regnum,
 Excipere et surdâ supplicis aure preces.

Sentire ingenuum nec dedidicere ruborem,
 Conscia suffusus quò notat ora pudor.
 Luxuriâ hi nunquam sese immergere superbâ,
 Nec musæ his laudes prostituere suas.

At placidè illorum, procul a certamine turbæ
 Spectabant propriam sobria vota domum;
 Quisque sibi vivens, et sponte inglorius exul,
 Dum tacito elabens vita tenore fluit.

Hæc tamen a damno qui servet tutius ossa,
 En tumulus fragilem præbet amicus opem!
 Et vera agresti eliciunt suspiria corde
 Incultæ effigies, indocilesque modi.

Atque locum suppleant elegorum nomen et anni
 Quæ formâ inscribit rustica musa rudi:
 Multa etiam sacri diffundit commata textûs,
 Queis meditans discat vulgus agreste mori.

Heu! quis enim dubiâ hâc dulcique excedere vitâ
 Jussus, et æternas jam subiturus aquas,
 Descendit nigram ad noctem, cupidusque supremo
 Non saltem occiduam respicit ore diem?

Decedens alicui saltem mens fidit amico
 In cujus blando pectore ponit opem;
 Fletum aliquem exposcunt jam deficientia morte
 Lumina, amicorum qui riget imbre genas;
 Quin etiam ex tumulo, veteris non inscia flammæ,
 Natura exclamat fida, memorque sui.

At tibi, qui tenui hoc deducis carmine sortem,
 Et defunctorum rustica fata gemis,
 Huc olim intentus si quis vestigia flectat
 Et fuerit qualis fors tua forte roget.

EPITAPHIUM.

Cui nunquam favit fama aut fortuna secunda,
 Congesto hoc juvenem cespite servat humus.
 Huic tamen arrisit jucunda scientia vultu,
 Selegitque, habitans pectora, cura sibi.

Largus opum fuit, et sincero pectore fretus,
 Accepit pretium par, tribuente Deo.
 Indoluit miserans inopi, lachrymasque profudit.
 —Scilicet id, miseris quod daret, omne fuit,
 A cælo interea fidum acquisivit amicum,
 Scilicet id, cuperet quod magis, omne fuit.

Ne merita ulterius defuncti exquirere pergas,
 Nec vitia ex sacrâ sede referre petas,
 Utraque ibi trepidâ pariter spe condita restant,
 In gremio Patris scilicet atque Dei.

CARMEN ELEGAN.

Tuque adeo roseas expande volatilis alas,
 Et leviter pectus tange, Cupido, meum.
 Imperiis, pulchelle, tuis ego servulus ultro;
 Naturam ars victrix scilicet usque domat.

Arcades, æterno viridantes flore juventæ,
 Nocte innutantes qualibet inter oves,
 Uspicite, ut sensim languens juvenilior ætas,
 Hæc juxta, hæc, inquam florea saxa perit!

Ante omnes carum sic levit Adonida Cypris,
 Deceptusque Deam tristius urisit amor;
 Hunc, tacitè adrepens per densa silentia noctis
 Incantum sævo dente momordit aper.

Stringe lyram interea pulchrè Prudentia ludens,
 Harmoniæque graves, Cynthia, funde modos!
 Doctæ ambæ vigiles curas sopire canendo,
 Tuque tuum imperti, Præses Apollo, chorum!

Tuque adamanteis, Pluton' armate catenis,
 O tu terrorum rex, metuende Deus,
 Duc me, quâ passim chrysellina flumina currunt,
 Elysiique lavat lucida lympha nemus.

Vos etiam mæsti salices, tristesque cupressi
 Aureliæ æternum ferta dicata meæ;

Audi etiam, Morpheu, divum placidissime Morpheu,
Ut queror, ut penitus maceror igne novo.

Tristè fluens, sed lenè fluens, Mæander, amæno
Murmure qui cursam flexilis orbe rotas!
Margine sæpe etiam quam plurimus errat amator,
Cui tua submittunt florea dona decus.

Sic quando sensim languens Philomela, silentem
Mollior aggreditur, nec sine voce, procum;
Aspice, de cælo interea Junonius ales
Descendens, fato cedit inane Melos.

PART OF HOMER'S

HYMN TO APOLLO.

Translated from the Greek.

GOD of the bow! Apollo, thee I sing;
Thee, as thou draw'st amain the sounding string,
Th' immortal pow'rs revere with homage low,
And ev'ry godhead trembles at thy bow.
All but Latona: she with mighty Jove
Eyes thee with all a tender parent's love;
Closes thy quiver, thy tough bow unbends,
And high amid th' ethereal dome suspends;
Then smiling leads thee, her all-glorious son,
To share the mighty thunderer's awful throne.
Goblets of nectar thy glad fire prepares,
And thee, his fairest, noblest son declares;
While ev'ry god sits rapt, Latona's breast
Beats with superior joy, and hails her son con-
fest.

Thrice blest Latona! from thee, goddess, sprung
Diana chaste, and Phœbus ever-young:

* Her in Ortygia's isle, and him you bore
At Cynthus' hill on Delos' sea-girt shore,
Where the tall palm uprears its lovely head,
And clear Inopus laves the flow'ry mead.

O Phœbus, where shall I begin thy praise?
Well can'st thou rule the poet's artless lays.
Oft on the craggy rock, or mountain hoar,
By river side, or on the sea's hoarse shore,
Wandr'ing well-pleased, with music's magic sound,
And airs divine, thou charm'st the region round.
Say, shall I sing how first on Delos' shore,
Thee, glorious progeny, Latona bore†?
How first, from other isles, beset with grief,
In vain thy tortur'd mother sought relief.
Each to her out-cast woe denied abode,
Nor durst one isle receive the future god.
At length to Delos came the lab'ring fair,
And suppliant thus besought her needful care.

Delos! receive Apollo, and O! raise
A glorious temple to record his praise!
Then shall he govern thee with gentle sway,
And only Phœbus shall thine isle obey.
What though no flocks, nor herds, nor juicy vine,
Nor plants of thousand natures shall be thine,

* Delos and Ortygia are mentioned as different islands in the original.

† Here several verses containing nothing but a mere list of the names of islands are omitted.

VOL. X.

Swift to the temple of the Bowyer-king*,
Oblations rich shall ev'ry nation bring;
For ever from thy altars shall arise
The fragrant incense of burnt-sacrifice.
No longer then regret thy barren soil,
Receive the God, and live by other's toil!

She spake: with inward rapture Delos smil'd,
And forth'd the suppliant pow'r with answer mild.

Latona! mighty Cæus' daughter fair,
Full willingly would Delos ease thy care,
Full willingly behold her barren earth
Witness the glories of Apollo's birth:
The mighty god would raise my lowly name,
And consecrate his native isle to fame.

One fear alone distracts my beating heart;
That fear, O goddess, list while I impart.
Second to none amid th' ethereal skies,
Apollo soon all terrible shall rise:
All nations shall adore the mighty god,
And kings and kingdoms tremble at his nod:
Haply (for ah! dire fears my soul i-fest, And fill with horror my tumultuous breast)
Soon as the glorious godhead shall be born,
My desert region will he view with scorn,
Indignant spurn me, curse my barren soil,
And plunge into the waves my hated isle.

Triumphant then to happier climes remove,
There fix his shrine, plant there his sacred grove,
Whelm'd in the briny main shall Delos lay,
To all the finny brood a wretched prey.
But, O Latona! if, to quell my fear,
You'll deign a solemn sacred oath to swear,
That here the god his glorious seat shall hold,
And here his sapient oracles unfold,
Your sacred burden here, Latona, lay,
Here view the godhead bursting into day.

Thus Delos pray'd, nor was her pray'r denied,
But soon with solemn vows thus ratified:
Witness O heaven and earth! O Stygian lake!
Dire adjuration, that no god my break!
In Delos shall Apollo's shrine be rear'd,
Delos, his best lov'd, most honour'd, most re-
ver'd.

Thus vow'd Latona: Delos hail'd her earth
Blest in the glories of Apollo's birth.
Nine hapless days and nights, with writhing throes,
And all the anguish of a mother's woes,
Latona tortur'd lay; in sorrowing mood,
Around her many a sister-goddess stood.
Aloft in heaven imperial Juno sat,
And view'd relentless her unhappy fate.
Lucina too, the kind assuaging pow'r
That tends the lab'ring mother's child-bed hour,
And mitigates her woes, in golden clouds
High on Olympus' top the goddess shrouds.
Her large full eyes with indignation roll,
And livid envy seiz'd her haughty soul,
That from Latona's loins was doom'd to spring
So great a son, the mighty Bowyer king.
The milder pow'rs, that near the lab'ring fair
View'd all her pangs with unavailing care,

* Bowyer-king, and Bowyer-god, are expressions frequently used by Dryden, in his version of the first Iliad, to signify Apollo.

X x

Fair Iris sent, the many colour'd maid.
To gain with goodly gifts Lucina's aid,
But charg'd her heed, lest Juno should prevent
With prohibition dire their kind intent.
Fleet as the winged winds, the flying fair
With nimble pinion cut the liquid air.
Olympus gain'd, apart she call'd the maid,
Then fought with many a pray'r her needful aid,
And mov'd her soul: when soon with dove-like pace

Swiftly they measur'd back the viewless airy space.

Soon as to Delos' isle Lucina came
The pangs of travail seiz'd Latona's frame.
Her twining arms she threw the palm around,
And prest with deep-indented knee the ground:
Then into day sprung forth the jolly boy,
Earth smil'd beneath, and heaven rang with joy.

The sister pow'rs that round Latona stood
With chaste ablutions cleans'd the infant-god.
His lovely limbs in mantle white they bound,
And gently drew a golden swathe around.
He hung not helpless at his mother's breast,
But Themis fed him with an heavenly feast.
Pleas'd while Latona views the heavenly boy,
And fondly glows with all a mother's joy,
The lusty babe, strong with ambrosial food,
In vain their bonds or golden swathes withstood;
Bonds, swathes, and ligaments with ease he broke,

And thus the wond'ring deities bespoke;

"The lyre, and sounding bow, and to declare

"The thund'rer's counsels, be Apollo's care!"

He spake; and onwards all majestic strode;
The queen of heaven awe-struck view'd the god,
Delos beheld him with a tender smile,
And hail'd, enrich'd with gold, her happy isle;
Her happy isle, Apollo's native seat,
His sacred haunt, his best-belov'd retreat.
Grac'd with Apollo, Delos glorious shines,
As the tall mountain crown'd with stately pines.

Now stony Cynthus would the god ascend,
And now his course to various islands bend.
Full many a fane, and rock, and shady grove,
River, and mountain did Apollo love;
But chiefly Delos: The Ionians there,
With their chaste wives and prattling babes, repair.
There gladly celebrate Apollo's name
With many a solemn rite and sacred game;
The jolly dance and holy hymn prepare,
And with the cæstus urge the manly war.
If, when their sacred feast th' Ionians hold,
Their gallant sports a stranger should behold,
View the strong nerves the brawny chiefs that brace,

Or eye the softer charms of female grace;
Then mark their riches of a thousand kinds,
And their tall ships born swift before the winds,
So goodly to the sight would all appear,
The fair assembly gods he would declare.
There too the Delian virgins, beautiful choir,
Apollo's handmaids, wake the living lyre;
To Phœbus first they consecrate the lays,
Latona then and chaste Diana praise,
Then heroes old, and matrons chaste rehearse,
And sooth the raptur'd heart with sacred verse.

Each voice, the Delian maids, each human sound
With aptest imitation sweet resound:

Their tongue so justly tune with accents new,
That none the false distinguish from the true.

Latona! Phœbus! Dian, lovely fair!
Blest Delian nymphs, Apollo's chiefest care,
All hail! and O with praise your poet crown,
Nor all his labours in oblivion drown!
If haply some poor pilgrim shall inquire,
"O virgins, who most skilful smites the lyre?"
"Whose lofty verse in sweetest descant rolls,
"And charms to extasy the hearers souls?"

O answer, a blind bard in Chios dwells,
In all the arts of verse who far excels.
Then o'er the earth shall spread my glorious fame,
And distant nations shall record my name.
But Phœbus never will I cease to sing,
Latona's noble son, the mighty Bowyer-king.

Thee Lycia and Mæonia, thee, great pow'r,
The blest Miletus' habitants adore;
But thy lov'd haunt is sea-girt Delos' shore.

Now Pytho's stony soil Apollo treads,
And all around ambrosial fragrance sheds,
Then strikes with matchless art the golden strings,
And ev'ry hill with heavenly music rings.

Olympus now and the divine abodes
Glorious he seeks, and mixes with the gods.
Each heavenly bosom pants with fond desire
To hear the lofty verse and golden lyre.
Drawn by the magic sound, the virgin nine
With warblings sweet the sacred minstrel join:
Now with glad heart, loud voice, and jocund lays
Full sweetly carol bounteous heaven's praise;
And now in dirges sad, and numbers slow
Relate the piteous tale of human woe;
Woe, by the gods on wretched mortals cast,
Who vainly shun affliction's win'try blast,
And all in vain attempt with fond delay
Death's certain shaft to ward, or chase old age away.

The graces there, and smiling hours are seen,
And Cytheria, laughter-loving queen,
And harmony, and Hebe, lovely hand,
To sprightliest measures dancing hand in hand.
There, of no common port or vulgar mien,
With heavenly radiance, shines the huntress-queen,
Warbles responsive to the golden lyre,
Tunes her glad notes, and joins the virgin choir.
There Mars and Mercury with awkward play,
And uncouth gambols, waste the live-long day.

There as Apollo moves with graceful pace
A thousand glories play around his face;
In splendour drest he joins the festive band,
And sweeps the golden lyre with magic hand.
Mean while, Latona and imperial Jove
Eye the bright godhead with parental love;
And, as the deities around him play, [vey*,
Well pleas'd his goodly mien and awful port sur-

* The Translator, when he began this piece, had some thoughts of giving a complete English version of all Homer's Hymns, being the only parts of his works never yet translated; but (to say nothing of his opinion of this specimen of his translation) fearing that this species of poetry, though it has its beauties, and does not want admirers among the learned, would appear far less a

FROM CATULLUS.

CHLOE, that dear bewitching prude,
Still calls me saucy, pert, and rude,
And sometimes almost strikes me;
And yet, I swear, I can't tell how,
Spite of the knitting of her brow,
I'm very sure she likes me.

Ask you me, why I fancy thus?
Why, I have call'd her jilt and puss,
And thought myself above her;
And yet I feel it, to my cost,
That when I rail against her most,
I'm very sure I love her.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE HENRIADE.

Translated from the French of M. de Voltaire.

THY chieftain, France, of try'd illustrious worth,
By right of conquest, king, by right of birth,
I sing. Who, tutor'd in misfortune's school,
There learnt the noblest science, how to rule;
Bad faction's furious discord cease to rave,
Valiant to conquer, merciful to save;
Baffled the daring league's rebellious schemes,
MAYENNE's proud hopes, and Spain's ambitious dreams:

With civil prudence blest, with martial fire,
A nation's conqueror, and a nation's fire (height
Truth, heavenly maid, from th' Empyrean
Descend, and with thy strong and purest light
My verse illumine! and O, let mortals hear
Thy sacred word, and awfully revere!
Be thou my guide! thy sage experience brings
Unerring maxims to the ear of kings.

'Tis thine, blest maid, and only thine, to show
What most befits the regal pow'r to know.
Purge thou the film from off a nation's eyes,
And show what ills from civil discord rise!
Nor spare, with decent boldness to disclose
The prince's errors, and the people's woes:
And O! if fable e'er, in times of yore,
Mix'd her soft accents with thy sterner lore,
If e'er her hand adorn'd thy tow'ring head,
And o'er thy front her milder graces spread;
If e'er her shades, which lovingly unite,
Bad thy fair form spring stronger into light,
With me, permit her all thy steps to trace,
Not to conceal thy beauties, but to grace!

Still VALOIS reign'd, and sunk in pleasure's bow'r,
O'er a mad state held loose the reins of pow'r:
The trampled law had lost its ancient force,
And right confounded, miss'd her even course.
'Twas thus when VALOIS France's sceptre bore,
Scepter'd indeed, but now a king no more;
Not glory's minion now, the voice of fame,
Swell'd the loud trumpet to the hero's name;

*greeable to the mere English reader, be desisted. They, who would form the justest idea of this sort of composition
among the ancients, may be better informed, by perusing
Dr. Akenfide's most classical hymn to the Naiads, than from any translation of Homer or Callimachus.*

His laurels wither'd, and all blasted now,
Which conquest hung upon his infant brow;
Whose progress Europe mark'd with conscious fear,
Whose loss provok'd his country's common tear,
When, the long train of all his virtues known,
The north admiring call'd him to the throne.
In second rank, the light which strikes the eyes,
Rais'd to the first, grows dim, and feebly dies.
From war's stern soldier, active, firm, and brave,
He sunk a monarch, pleasure's abject slave.
Lull'd with soft ease, forgetful all of state,
His weakness totter'd with a kingdom's weight;
Whilst lost in sloth, and dead to glorious fame,
The sons of riot govern'd in his name.

QUELUS, ST. MAIGRIN, death-cemented pair,
JOYEUSE the gay, and D'ESPERON the fair.
The careless king in pleasure plung'd with these,
In lust intemperate, and lethargic ease.

Meantime the GUISES, fortunate and brave,
Catch'd the fair moment which his weakness gave.
Then rose the fatal league in evil hour,
That dreadful rival of his waning pow'r.
The people blind, their sacred monarch brav'd,
Led by those tyrants, who their rights enslav'd.
His friends forsook him, helpless and alone,
His servants chas'd him from his royal throne;
Revolted Paris, deaf to kingly awe,
Within her gates the crowding stranger saw.
Through all the city burst rebellion's flame;
And all was lost, when virtuous BOURBON came;
Came, full of warlike ardour, to restore
That light his prince, deluded, had no more.
His active presence breath'd an instant flame;
No longer now the sluggish sons of shame,
Onward they press, where glory calls, to arms,
And spring to war from pleasure's silken charms:
To Paris' gates both kings advance amain,
Rome felt th' alarm, and trembled haughty Spain:
While Europe, watching where the tempest falls,
With anxious eyes beheld th' unhappy walls.

Within was DISCORD, with her hell-born train,
Stirring to war the league, and haughty MAYNE,
The people, and the church: and from on high
Call'd out to Spain, rebellion's prompt ally.
DISCORD, dread monster, deaf to human woe,
To her own subjects an avengeful foe,
Bloody, impetuous, eager to destroy,
In man's misfortune finds her hateful joy;
To neither party ought of mercy shown,
Well pleas'd the stabs the dagger in her own;
Dwells a fierce tyrant in the breast she fires,
And smiles to punish what herself inspires.

West of the city, near those borders gay,
Where Seine obliquely winds her sloping way, (Scenes now, where pleasure's soft retreats are
found,
Where triumphs art, and nature smiles around,
Then, by the will of fate, the bloody stage
For war's stern combat and relentless rage)
Th' unhappy VALOIS bade his troops advance,
There rush'd at once the generous strength of France.
A thousand heroes, eager for the fight,
By sects divided, from revenge unite.
These virtuous BOURBON leads, their chosen guide,
Their cause confederate, and their hearts allied.

It seem'd the army felt one common flame,
 Their zeal, religion, cause, and chief the same.
 The sacred LOUIS, fire of BOURBON'S race,
 From azure skies, beside the throne of grace,
 With holy joy beheld his future heir,
 And ey'd the hero with paternal care;
 With such as prophets feel, a blest presage,
 He saw the virtues of his ripening age:
 Saw glory round him all her laurels deal,
 Yet wail'd his errors, though he lov'd his zeal;
 With eye prophetic he beheld, e'en now,
 The crown of France adorn his royal brow;
 He knew the wreath was destin'd which they gave,
 More will'd the saint, the light which shines to save.

Still HENRY'S steps mov'd onward to the throne,
 By secret ways, e'en to himself unknown;
 His help from Heaven the holy prophet sent,
 But hid the arm his wife indulgence lent:
 Left sure of conquest, he had slack'd his flame,
 Nor grappled danger for the meed of fame.

Already MARS had donn'd his coat of mail,
 And doubtful conquest held her even scale;
 Carnage with blood had mark'd his purple way,
 And slaughter'd heaps in wild confusion lay,
 When VALOIS thus his part'ner king address'd,
 The sigh deep-heaving from his anxious breast.

" You see what fate, what humbling fate is mine,
 " Nor yet alone—the injury is thine.
 " The dauntless league, by hardy chieftains led,
 " Which hisses faction with her hydra head,
 " Boldly confederate by a desperate oath,
 " Aims not at me alone, but strikes at both.
 " Though I long since the regal circle wear,
 " Though thou by rank succeed my rightful heir,
 " Paris disowns us, nor will homage bring
 " To me their present, you their future king.
 " Thine, well they know the next illustrious claim.
 " From law, from birth, and deeds of loudest
 " fame;

" Yet from that throne's hereditary right
 " Where I but totter, would exclude thee quite.
 " Religion hurls her furious bolts on thee,
 " And holy councils join her firm decree:
 " ROME, though she raise no soldier's martial band,
 " Yet kindles war through every awe-struck
 " land;
 " Beneath her banners bids each host repair,
 " And trusts her thunder to the Spaniard's care,
 " Far from my hopes each summer friend is flown,
 " No subjects hail me on my sacred throne;
 " No kindred now the kind affection shows,
 " All fly their king, abandon, or oppose:
 " Rich in my spoils, with greedy treacherous haste,
 " While the base Spaniard lays my country waste.
 " 'Midst foes like these, abandon'd, and betray'd,
 " France in her turn shall seek a foreign aid:
 " Shall Britain's court by secret methods try,
 " And win ELIZA for a firm ally.
 " Of old I know between each pow'rful state,
 " Subsists a jealous and immortal hate;
 " That London lifts its tow'ring front on high,
 " And looks on Paris with a rival eye;
 " But I, the monarch of each pageant throne,
 " Have now no subjects, and no country own:

" Vengeance alone my stern resolves avow,
 " Who gives me that, to me is Frenchman now.
 " The snail-pac'd agents, whose deliberate way
 " Creeps on in trammels of prescrib'd delay,
 " Such fit not now; 'tis you, great prince, alone
 " Must haste a suppliant to ELIZA'S throne.
 " Your voice alone shall needful succours bring,
 " And arm Britannia for an injur'd king.
 " To Albion hence, and let thy happier name
 " Plead the king's cause, and raise their generous
 " flame!
 " My foes' defeat upon thy arm depends,
 " But from thy virtue I must hope for friends."
 Thus spoke the king, while HENRY'S looks con-
 fest

The jealous ardour which inflam'd his breast,
 Left others' arms might urge their glorious claim,
 And ravish from him half the meed of fame.
 With deep regret the hero number'd o'er
 The wreaths of glory he had won before;
 When, without succours, without skill's intrigue,
 Himself with CONDE shook the trembling league,
 When those command, who holds the regal sway.
 It is a subject's virtue to obey.

Resolv'd to follow what the king commands,
 The blows, suspended, fell not from his hands;
 He rein'd the ardour of his noble mind,
 And, parting, left the gather'd wreaths behind.
 Th' astonish'd army felt a deep concern,
 Fate seem'd depending on the chief's return.
 His absence still unknown, the pent-up foe
 In dire expectation dread the sudden blow;
 While VALOIS' troops still feel their hero's flame,
 And virtue triumphs in her HENRY'S name.

Of all his fav'rites, none their chief attend,
 Save MORNAY brave, his soul's familiar friend.
 MORNAY of steady faith, and manners plain,
 And truth, untainted with the flatt'ers strain;
 Rich in desert, of valour rarely tried,
 A virtuous champion, though on error's side;
 With signal prudence blest, with patriot zeal
 Firm to his church, and to the public weal;
 Censor of courtiers, but by courts belov'd,
 Rome's fierce assailant, and by Rome approv'd.

Across two rocks, where with tremendous roar
 The foaming ocean lashes either shore,
 To Dieppe's strong port the hero's steps repair,
 The ready sailors ply their busy care.
 The tow'ring ships, old ocean's lordly kings,
 Aloft in air display their canvas wings;
 Not swell'd by Boreas now, the glassy seas
 Flow'd calmly on, with zephyr's gentle breeze.
 Now, anchor weigh'd, they quit the friendly
 shore,

And land receding greets their eyes no more.
 Jocund they sail'd, and Albion's chalky height
 At distance rose full fairly to the sight.
 When rumbling thunders rend th' affrighted pole,
 Loud roar the winds, and seas tempestuous roll;
 The livid lightnings cleave the darken'd air,
 And all around reigns horror and despair.
 No partial fear the hero's bosom knows,
 Which only trembled for his country's woes,
 It seem'd his looks tow'rd her in silence bent,
 Accus'd the winds, which cross'd his great intent.

So CÆSAR, striving for a conquer'd world,
Near Epire's banks, with adverse tempest hurl'd,
Trusting, undaunted, and securely brave,
Rome's and the world's fate to the swelling wave.
Though leagu'd with POMPEY NEPTUNE's self engage,

Oppos'd his fortune to dull ocean's rage.
Meantime that God, whose power the tempest binds,

Who rides triumphant on the wings of winds,
That God, whose wisdom, which presides o'er all,
Can raise, protect, or crush this earthly ball,
From his bright throne, beyond the starry skies,
Beheld the hero with considering eyes,
God was his guide, and 'mid the tempest's rear
The tossing vessel reach'd the neighbouring shore;
Where Jersey rises from the ocean's bed,
There, heaven-conducted, was the hero led.

At a small distance from the shore there stood,
The growth of many years, a shadowy wood.
A neighbouring rock the calm retirement saves
From the rude blasts, and hoarse resounding waves.
A grotto stands behind, whose structure knows
The simple grace which nature's hand bestows.
Here, far from court remov'd, a holy sage
Spent the mild evening of declining age.
While free from worldly toils, and worldly woe,
His only study was himself to know:
Here mus'd, regretting on his mispent days,
Or lost in love, or pleasure's flow'ry maze.
No gusts of folly swell the dangerous tide,
While all his passions to a calm subside;
The bubble life he held an empty dream,
His food the simple herb, his drink the stream;
Tranquil and calm he drew his aged breath,
And look'd with patience tow'rd the port of
death,

When the pure soul to blissful realms shall soar,
And join with God himself to part no more.
The God he worshipp'd ey'd the zealous sage,
And bless'd with wisdom's lore his silver'd age:
Gave him the skill of prophecy to know,
And from fate's volume read events below.

The sage with conscious joy the prince address'd,
And spread the table for his royal guest;
The prompt repast, which simple nature suits,
The stream's fresh water, and the forest's roots.
Not unaccustom'd to the homely fare,
The warrior sat; for oft from busy care,
From court retir'd, and pomp's fastidious pride,
The hero dar'd to throw the king aside;
And in the rustic cot well-pleas'd partook
Of labour's mean repast, and cheerful look;
Found in himself the joys to kings unknown,
And self-depos'd forgot the lordly throne.

The world's contention to their minds supplies
Much converse, wholesome to the good and wise.
Much did they talk of woes in human life,
Of Christian kingdoms torn with jarring strife.
The zeal of MORNAY, like a stubborn fort,
Attach'd to Calvin stood his firm support.

HENRY, still doubting, sought th' indulgent skies,
That light's clear ray might burst upon his eyes,
"Must then, said he, the truth be always found,
"To mortals weak with mists encompass'd round?"

"Must I still err? my way in darkness trod,
"Nor know the path which leads me to my God?
"If all alike he will'd us to obey,
"The God who will'd it had prescrib'd the way."

"Let us not vainly God's designs explore!
"(The sage reply'd) be humble, and adore!
"Arraign not madly Heav'n's unerring laws
"For faults, where mortals are themselves the
"These aged eyes beheld in days of yore, [cause.
"When Calvin's doctrine reach'd the Gallic shore,
"Then, though with blood it now distains the earth,

"Creeping in shade, and humble in the birth,
"I saw it banish'd by religion's laws,
"Without one friend to combat in the cause.
"Through ways oblique I saw the phantom tread,
"Slow winding, and asham'd to rear her head,
"Till at the last, upheld by pow'rful arms,
"Midst cannons thunder, and 'mid war's alarms,
"Burst forth the monster in the glare of light,
"With tow'ring front full dreadful to the sight;
"To scowl at mortals from her tyrant seat,
"And spurn our altars at her impious feet.

"Far then from courts, beneath this peaceful cot,
"I wail'd religion's and my country's lot;
"Yet here, to comfort my declining days,
"Some dawn of hope presents its cheerful rays.
"So new a worship cannot long survive,
"Which man's caprice alone has kept alive.
"With that it rose, with that shall die away,
"Man's works and man are bubbles of a day.
"The God, who reigns for ever and the same,
"At pleasure blasts a world's presumptuous aim.
"Vain is our malice, vain our strength display'd,
"To sap the city his right hand hath made;
"Himself hath fix'd the strong foundations low,
"Which brave the wreck of time, and hell's inveterate blow:

"The Lord of Lords shall bless thy purged sight
"With bright effulgence of diviner light;
"On thee, great prince, his mercies he'll bestow,
"And shed that truth thy bosom pants to know.
"THAT God hath chose thee, and his hand alone
"Safe through the war shall lead thee to a throne.
"Conquest already (for his voice is fate)
"For thee bids glory ope her golden gate.
"If on thy sight the truth unnotic'd falls,
"Hope not admission in thy Paris' walls,
"Though splendid ease invite thee to her arms,
"O shun, great prince, the syren's poison'd
charms!

"O'er thy strong passions hold a glorious reign,
"Fly love's soft lap, break pleasure's silken chain!
"And when, with efforts strong, all foes o'er-thrown, [your own,
"A league's great conqueror, and, what's more,
"When, with united hearts, and triumph's voice,
"Thy people hail thee with one common choice,
"From a dread siege, to fame for ever known,
"To mount with glory thy paternal throne,
"That time, affliction shall lay by her rod,
"And thy glad eyes shall seek thy father's God:
"Then shalt thou see from whence thy arms prevail. [ver fail."

"Go, prince—WHO TRUSTS IN GOD—can ne-

Each word the sage's holy lips impart
Falls like a flame on Henry's generous heart.
The hero stood transported in his mind
To times when God held converse with mankind,
When simple virtue taught her heav'n-born lore,
And truth commanding bade e'en kings adore.
His eager arms the reverend sage embrace,
And the warm tear fast trickled down his face.
Untouch'd, yet lost a while in deep surprise,
Stood MORNAY brave; for still on MORNAY'S
eyes

Hung error's mist, and God's high will conceal'd
The gifts from him to HENRY'S breast reveal'd.
His wisdom idly would the world prefer,
Whose lot, though rich in virtues, was to err.
While the rapt sage, fulfilling God's behest,
Spoke inspiration to the prince's breast,
Hush'd were the winds, within their caverns bound,

Smooth flow'd the seas, and nature smil'd around,
The sage his guide, the hero sought his way
Where the tall vessels safe at anchor lay:
The ready sailors quit the friendly strand,
Hoist the glad sails, and make for Albion's land.

While o'er her coast his eyes admiring range,
He prais'd in silence Britain's happier change:
Where laws, abus'd by foul intestine foes,
Had erst entail'd a heap of dreadful woes
On prince and people; on that bloody stage,
Where slaughter'd heroes bled for civil rage;
On that bright throne, from whence descended
springs

Th' illustrious lineage of a hundred kings,
Like HENRY, long in adverse fortune school'd,
O'er willing English hearts a WOMAN rul'd:
And, rich in manly courage, female grace,
Clos'd the long lustre of her crowded race.
ELIZA then, in Britain's happiest hour,
Held the just balance of contending pow'r;
Made English subjects bow the willing knee,
Who will not serve, and are not happy free.
Beneath her sacred reign the nation knows
No sad remembrance of its former woes;
Their flocks securely graz'd the fertile plain,
Their garners bursting with their golden grain.
The stately ships, their swelling sails unfurl'd,
Brought wealth and homage from the distant
world:

All Europe watch'd Britannia's bold decree,
Dreaded by land, and monarch of the sea.
Wide o'er the waves her fleet exulting rode,
And fortune triumph'd over ocean's God.
Proud London now, no more of barbarous fame,
To arms and commerce urg'd her blended claim.
Her pow'rs, in union leagu'd, together sat,
King, Lords, and Commons, in their threefold
state.

Though separate each their several interest draw,
Yet all united form the steadfast law.

All three, one body's members, firm and fit,
Make but one pow'r in strong conjunction knit;
Pow'r to itself of danger often found,
But spreading terror to its neighbours round.
Blest, when the people duty's homage show,
And pay their king the tribute which they owe!

More blest when kings, for milder virtues known,
Protect their people's freedom from the throne!

"Ah when, cry'd BOURBON, shall our discord cease,

"Our glory, Albion, rise, like thine, in peace?

"Blush, blush, ye kings, ye lords of jarring states,

"A woman bids, and war hath clos'd its gates:

"Your countries bleed with factious rage oppress'd,

"While SHE reigns happy o'er a people blest."

Mean time the hero reach'd the sea-girt isle,
Where freedom bids eternal plenty smile;

Not far from William's tow'r at distance seen,
Stood the fam'd palace of the virgin queen.

Hither, the faithful MORNAY at his side,

Without the noise and pageant pomp of pride,

The toys of grandeur which the vain pursue,

But glare unheeded to the hero's view,

The prince arriv'd: with bold and manly sense

He spoke; his frankness all his eloquence;

Told his sad tale, and bow'd his lofty heart,

For France's woes, to act submission's part;

For needful aids the British queen address'd,

While, in the suppliant throne, the king confess'd.

"Com'st thou," reply'd the queen, with strange surprise,

"Com'st thou from VALOIS for the wish'd allies?

"Ask'st thou protection for a tyrant foe,

"Whose deadly hate work'd all thy fortune's woe?

"Far as the golden sun begins to rise,

"To where he drives adown the western skies,

"His strife and thine to all the world is known:

"Stand'st thou for him a friend at Britain's throne?

"And is that hand, which VALOIS oft hath
"fear'd,

"Arm'd in his cause, and for his vengeance rear'd?"

When thus the Prince: "A monarch's adverse
"fate

"Wipes all remembrance out of former hate.

"VALOIS was then a slave, his passion's slave,

"But now himself a monarch firm and brave;

"He bursts at once the ignominious chain,

"Resumes the hero, and asserts his reign,

"Blest, if of nature more assur'd and free,

"He'd sought no aid but from himself and me!

"But, led by fraud, and arts, all insincere,

"He was my foe from weakness and from fear.

"His faults die with me, when his woes I view,

"I've gain'd the conquest—grant me vengeance,
"You

"For know the work is thine, illustrious dame,

"To deck thy Albion's brows with worthiest
"fame,

"Let thy protection spread her ready wings,

"And fight with me the injur'd cause of kings!"

ELIZA then, for much she wish'd to know

The various turns of France's long-felt woe,

Whence rising first the civil discord came,

And Paris kindled to rebellion's flame---

"To me, great prince, thy griefs are not unknown,

"Though brought imperfect and by fame alone;

"Whose rapid wing too indiscreetly flies,

"And spreads abroad her indigested lies.

"Deaf to her tales, from thee, illustrious youth,

"From thee alone ELIZA seeks the truth,

" Tell me, for you have witness'd all the woe,
 " VALOIS' brave friend, or VALOIS' conquering
 " foe,
 " Say, whence this friendship, this alliance grew,
 " Which knits the happy bond 'twixt him and you;
 " Explain this wond'rous change, 'tis you alone
 " Can paint the virtues which yourself hath shown.
 " Teach me thy woes, for know thy story brings
 " A moral lesson to the pride of kings."
 " And must my memory then, illustrious queen,
 " Recal the horrors of each dreadful scene?
 " O had it pleas'd th' Almighty Pow'r (which " knows,
 " How my heart bleeds o'er all my country's woes)
 " Oblivion then had snatch'd them from the
 " light,
 " And hid them buried in eternal night.
 " Nearest of blood must I aloud proclaim,
 " The princes' madness, and expose their shame?
 " Reflection shakes my mind with wild dismay---
 " But 'tis ELIZA's will, and I obey.
 " Others, in speaking, from their smooth address,
 " Might make their weakness or their crimes
 " seem less,
 " The flow'ry art was never made for me,
 " I speak a soldier's language, plain and free."

AN IMITATION FROM THE SPECTATOR.

A MONTH hath roll'd its lazy hours away,
 Since Delia's presence blest'd her longing swain:
 How could he brook the sluggish time's delay,
 What charm could soften such an age of pain.
 One fond reflection still his bosom cheer'd,
 And sooth'd the torments of a lover's care,
 'Twas that for Delia's self the bow'r he rear'd,
 And fancy plac'd the nymph already there.
 O come, dear maid, and with a gentle smile,
 Such as lights up my lovely fair one's face,
 Survey the product of thy shepherd's toil,
 Nor rob the villa of the villa's grace.
 Whate'er improvements strike thy curious sight,
 Thy taste hath form'd---let me not call it mine,
 Since when I muse on thee, and feed delight,
 I form no thought that is not wholly thine.
 Th' apartments destin'd for my charmer's use,
 (For love in trifles is conspicuous shown)
 Can scarce an object to thy view produce,
 But bears the dear resemblance of thine own.
 And trust me, love, I could almost believe,
 This little spot the mansion of my fair;
 But that awak'd from fancy's dreams I grieve,
 To find its proper owner is not there.
 Oh! I could doat upon the rural scene,
 Its prospect o'er hill and champaign wide,
 But that it marks the tedious way between,
 That parts thy Damon from his promis'd bride.
 The gardens now put forth their blossoms sweet,
 In nature's flow'ry mantle gaily drest,
 The close-trimm'd hedge, and circling border neat,
 All ask my Delia for their dearest guest.

The lily pale, the purple-blushing rose,
 In this fair spot their mingled beauties join;
 The woodbine here its curling tendrils throws,
 In wreaths fantastic round the mantling vine.
 The branching arbour here for lovers made,
 For dalliance met, or song, or amorous tale,
 Shall oft protect us with its cooling shade,
 When sultry Phoebus burns the lovely vale.
 'Tis all another Paradise around,
 And, trust me, so it would appear to me,
 Like the first man were I not lonely found,
 And but half blest, my Delia, wanting thee.
 For two, but two, I've form'd a lovely walk,
 And I have call'd it by my fair one's name;
 Here blest with thee, t' enjoy thy pleasing talk,
 While fools and madmen bow the knee to fame.
 The rustic path already have I try'd,
 Oft at the sinking of the setting day;
 And while, my love, I thought thee by my side,
 With careful steps have worn its edge away.
 With thee I've held discourse, how passing sweet!
 While fancy brought thee to my raptur'd dream,
 With thee have prattled in my lone retreat,
 And talk'd down suns, on love's delicious theme.
 Oft as I wander through the rustic crowd,
 Musing with downcast look, and folded arms,
 They stare with wonder, when I rave aloud,
 And dwell with rapture on thy artless charms.
 They call me mad, and oft with finger rude,
 Point at me leering, as I heedless pass;
 Yet Colin knows the cause, for love is shrewd,
 And the young shepherd courts the farmer's lass.
 Among the fruits that grace this little seat,
 And all around their clust'ring foliage spread,
 Here may'st thou cull the peach, or nest'rue sweet,
 And pluck the strawberry from its native bed.
 And all along the river's verdant side,
 I've planted elms, which rise in even row;
 And fling their leafy branches far and wide,
 Which float reflected in the lake below.
 Since I've been absent from my lovely fair,
 Imagination forms a thousand schemes,
 For O! my Delia, thou art all my care,
 And all with me is love and golden dreams.
 O flatt'ring promise of secure delight;
 When will the lazy-pacing hours be o'er?
 That I may fly with rapture to thy sight,
 And we shall meet again to part no more.

A BALLAD.

Ye shepherds so careless and gay,
 Who sport with the nymphs of the plain,
 Take heed lest you frolic away
 The peace you can never regain.
 Let not folly your bosoms annoy;
 And of love, the dear mischief, beware.
 You may think 'tis all sunshine and joy,
 ---I know 'tis o'ershadow'd with care.

Love's morning how blithsome it shines,
 With an aspect deceitfully fair;
 Its day oft in sorrow declines,
 And it sets in the night of despair.
 Hope paints the gay scene to the sight,
 While fancy her visions bestows,
 And gilds ev'ry dream with delight,
 But to wake us to sensible woes.

How hard is my lot to complain
 Of a nymph whom I yet must adore,
 Though she love not her shepherd again,
 Her DAMON must love her the more.
 For it was not the pride of her sex,
 That treated his vows with disdain,
 For it was not the pleasure to vex,
 That made her delude her fond swain.

'Twas his, the fair nymph to behold,
 He hop'd—and he rashly believ'd.
 'Twas her's to be fatally cold;
 —He lov'd—and was fondly deceiv'd;
 For such is of lovers the doom,
 While passions their reason beguile,
 'Tis warrant enough to presume,
 If they catch but a look or a smile.

Yet surely my PHYLLIS would seem
 To prize me most shepherds above;
 But that might be only esteem,
 While I foolishly constru'd it love.

Yet others, like DAMON, believ'd
 The nymph might have favour'd her swain,
 And others, like him, were deceiv'd,
 Like him, though they cannot complain.

Of PHYLLIS was always my song,
 For she was my pride and my care;
 And the folks, as we wander'd along,
 Would call us the conjugal pair.
 They mark'd how I walk'd at her side,
 How her hand to my bosom I prest,
 Each tender endearment I try'd,
 And I thought none was ever so blest.

But now the delusion is o'er,
 These day-dreams of pleasure are fled,
 Now her DAMON is pleasing no more,
 And the hopes of her shepherd are dead.
 May he that my fair shall obtain,
 May he, as thy DAMON, be true;
 Or haply thou'lt think of that swain,
 Who bids thee, dear maiden, adieu.

TO CHLOE.

If CHLOE seek one verse of mine
 I call not on the tuneful nine
 With useless invocation;
 Enough for me that she should ask;
 I fly with pleasure to the task,
 And her's the inspiration.

When poets sung in ancient days,
 The muses that inspir'd their lays,
 Of whom there such paradeis
 Their deities, let pride confess,
 Were nothing more, and nothing less,
 Than earth-born mortal ladies.

Did any nymph her subject choose?
 She strait commenc'd inspiring Muse;
 And every maid, of lovely face,
 That struck the heart of wounded swain,
 Exalted to yon starry plain,
 Was register'd a GRACE.

These were the compliments of old,
 While nymphs, among the gods enroll'd,
 Claim'd love's obsequious duty;
 Thus, while each bard had favourite views,
 Each nymph became a GRACE, or MUSE,
 A VENUS every beauty.

Say, in these latter days of ours,
 When love exerts his usual powers,
 What difference lies between us?
 In CHLOE's self at once I boast,
 What bards of every age might boast,
 A MUSE, a GRACE, a VENUS.

In CHLOE are a thousand charms,
 Though envy call her sex to arms,
 And giggling girls may flout her
 The MUSE inhabits in her mind,
 A VENUS in her form we find,
 The GRACES all about her.

TO THE MOON.

Att! hail majestic queen of night, [brings
 Bright Cynthia! sweetest nymph, whose presence
 The pensive pleasures, calm delight,
 While contemplation smooths her ruffled wings,
 Which folly's vain tumultuous joys,
 Or business, care, and buzz of lusty day
 Have all too ruffled.—Hence, away
 Stale jest, and flippant mirth, and strife-engend'ring noise.

When evening dons her mantle gray,
 I'll wind my solitary way,
 And hie me to some lonely grove
 (The haunt of fancy and of love)
 Whose social branches, far outspread,
 Possess the mind with pleasing dread.
 While Cynthia quivers through the trees
 That wanton with the summer breeze,
 And the clear brook, or dimpled stream,
 Reflects oblique her dancing beam.
 How often, by thy silver light,
 Here lovers' tongues beguil'd the night?
 When forth the happy pair have stray'd,
 The amorous swain and tender maid,
 And as they walk'd the groves along,
 Cheer'd the still eve with various song.
 While every artful strain confess'd
 The mutual passion in their breast.
 The lovers' hours fly swift away,
 And night reluctant yields to day.

Thrice happy nymph, thrice happy youth,
 When beauty is the meed of truth!
 Yet not the happy loves alone,
 Has thy celestial presence known.
 To thee complains the nymph forlorn,
 Of broken faith, and vows forsworn;
 And the dull swain, with folded arms,
 Still musing on his false one's charms,

Frames many a sonnet to her name,
(As lovers use to express their flame)
Or pining wan with thoughtful care,
In downcast silence feeds despair;
Or when the air dead stillness keeps,
And Cynthia on the water sleeps;
Charms the dull ear of sober night,
With love-born music's sweet delight.

Oft as thy orb performs its round,
Thou list'nest to the various sound
Of shepherds' hopes and maidens' fears
(Those conscious Cynthia silent hears
While echo which still loves to mock,
Bears them about from rock to rock.)

But shift we now the pensive scene,
Where Cynthia silvers o'er the green.
Mark yonder spot, whose equal rim
Forms the green circle quaint and trim;
Hither the fairies blithe advance,
And lightly trip in mazy dance;
Beating the pansie-paven ground
In frolic measures round and round;
These Cynthia's revels gaily keep,
While lazy mortals snore asleep;
Whom oft they visit in the night,
Not visible to human sight;
And as old prattling wives relate,
Though now the fashion's out of date,
Drop sixpence in the housewife's shoe,
And pinch the flattern black and blue.
They fill the mind with airy schemes,
And bring the ladies pleasant dreams.

Who knows not Mab, whose chariot glides,
And athwart men's noses rides?
While OBERON, blithe fairy, trips,
And hovers o'er the ladies lips;
And when he steals ambrosial bliss,
And soft imprints the charming kiss,
In dreams the nymph her swain pursues,
Nor thinks 'ts OBERON that woos.

Yet sportive youth, and lovely fair,
From hence, my lesson read, beware,
While innocence and mirth preside,
We are not where the fairies glide;
And OBERON will never miss
To greet his fav'rites with a kiss;
Nor ever more ambrosia sips,
Than when he visits ———'s lips,

When all things else in silence sleep,
The blithsome elfs their vigils keep;
And always hover round about,
To find our worth or frailties out,
Receive with joy these elfin sparks,
Their kisses leave no tell-tale marks,
But breathe fresh beauty o'er the face,
Where all is virtue, all is grace.

Not only elfin fays delight
To hail the sober queen of night,
But that sweet bird, whose gurgling throat
Warbles the thick melodious note,
Duly as evening shades prevail,
Renews her soothing love-lorn tale.
And as the lover pensive goes,
Chaunts out her symphony of woes,
Which in poor nature's wilder tone,
Beggar-ounds which arts has known,

But hilt — the melancholy bird
Among the groves no more is heard;
And Cynthia pales her silver ray
Before th' approach of golden day,
Which on yon mountain's misty height,
Stands tiptoe with his gladsome light.
Now the shrill lark in ether floats,
And carols wild her liquid notes;
While Phœbus, in his lusty pride,
His flaming beams flings far and wide.
Cynthia farewell — the pensive muse,
No more her feeble flight pursues,
But all unwilling takes her way,
And mixes with the buzz of day.

S O N G.

THE beauty which the gods bestow,
Did they but give it for a show?
No — 'twas lent thee from above,
To shed its lustre o'er thy face,
And with its pure and native grace
To charm the soul to love.

The flaunting sun, whose western beams,
This evening drink of ocean's streams,
To-morrow springs to light.
But when thy beauty sets, my fair,
No morrow shall its beam repair,
'Tis all eternal night.

See too, my love, the virgin rose,
How sweet, how bashfully it blows
Beneath the vernal skies!
How soon it blooms in full display,
Its bosom opening to the day,
Then withers, shrinks, and dies.

Of mortal life's declining hour,
Such is the leaf, the bud, the flow'r;
Then crop the rose in time.
Be blest and blest, and kind impart
The just return of heart for heart,
Ere love becomes a crime.

To pleasure then, my charmer, haste,
And ere thy youth begins to waste,
Ere beauty dims its ray,
The proffer'd gift of love employ,
Improve each moment into joy,
Be happy whilst you may.

TO THE REV. MR. HANBURY,

Of Church-Langton, Leicestershire,

ON HIS PLANTATIONS.

WHILE vain pursuits a trifling race engage,
And virtue flumbers in a thriftless age,
Thy glorious plan, on deep foundations laid,
Which aiding nature, nature's bound to aid,
The wise man's study, though the blockhead's
scorn.
Shall speak for ages to a world unborn.
Though fools deride, for censure's still at hand
To damn the work she cannot understand,

* See Mr. Hanbury's Essay on Planting.

Pursue thy project with an ardour fit;
Fools are but whetstones to a man of wit.

Like puling infants seem'd thy rising plan,
Now knit in strength, it speaks an active man.
So the broad oak, which from thy grand design
Shall spread aloft, and tell the world 'twas thine,
A strip'ling first, just peep'd above the ground,
Which, ages hence, shall fling its shade around.

SENT TO A LADY, WITH A SEAL.

Th' impression which this seal shall make,
The rougher hand of force may break;
Or jealous time, with slow decay,
May all its traces wear away;
But neither time nor force combin'd,
Shall tear thy image from my mind;
Nor shall the sweet impression fade
While CHLOE's thousand charms have made;
For spite of time, or force, or art,
'Tis seal'd for ever on my heart.

A BALLAD.

HARK, hark, 'tis a voice from the tomb,
Come, LUCY, it cries, come away,
The grave of thy COLIN has room
To rest thee beside his cold clay.
I come, my dear shepherd, I come,
Ye friends and companions, adieu:
I haste to my COLIN's dark home,
To die on his bosom so true.

All mournful the midnight bell rung,
When LUCY, sad LUCY, arose;
And forth to the green turf she sprung,
Where COLIN's pale ashes repose.
All wet with the night's chilling dew,
Her bosom embrac'd the cold ground,
While stormy winds over her blew,
And night ravens croak'd all around.

"How long, my lov'd COLIN," she cry'd,
"How long must thy LUCY complain?"
"How long shall the grave my love hide?"
"How long ere it join us again?"
"For thee thy fond shepherdess liv'd,
"With thee o'er the world would she fly;
"For thee has she sorrow'd and griev'd;
"For thee would she lie down and die.

"Alas! what avails it how dear
"Thy LUCY was once to her swain!
"Her face like the lily so fair,
"And eyes that gave light to the plain.
"The shepherd that lov'd her is gone;
"That face and those eyes charm no more;
"And LUCY forgot, and alone,
"To death shall her COLIN deplore."

While thus she lay sunk in despair,
And mourn'd to the echoes around,
Inflam'd all at once grew the air,
And thunder shook dreadful the ground.
"I hear the kind call, and obey,
"Oh, COLIN receive me," she cried,
Then breathing a groan o'er his clay,
She hung on his tomb-stone, and died.

EPISTLE TO A FRIEND.

"Do, study more—discard that fire, ease,
"Whose fatal charms are murd'rous while they
"please.

"Wit's scanty streams will fret their channel dry,
"If learning's spring withhold the fresh supply.

"Turn leaf by leaf gigantic volumes o'er,
"Nor blush to know what ancients wrote before.

"Why not, sometimes, regale admiring friends
"With Greek and Latin sprinklings, odds and "ends?

"Exert your talents; read, and read to write!
"As Horace says, mix profit with delight."

'Tis rare advice: but I am slow to mend,
Though ever thankful to my partial friend:

Full of strange fears—for hopes are banish'd all—
I list' no more to Phœbus' sacred call,

Smit with the muse, 'tis true, I sought her charms;
But came no champion, clad in cumb'rous arms,

To pull each rival monarch from his throne,
And swear no lady Clio like my own.

All unambitious of superior praise,
My fond amusement ask'd a sprig of bays,

Some little fame for stringing harmless verse,
And e'en that little fame has prov'd a curse;

Hitch'd into rhyme, and dragg'd through muddy prose,

By butcher critics, worth's confed'rate foes.
If then the muse no more shall strive to please,

Lull'd in the happy lethargy of ease;
If, unadvent'rous, she forbear to sing,

Nor take one thought to plume her ruffled wing;
'Tis that she hates, howe'er by nature vain,

The scurril nonsense of a venal train.
When desp'rate robbers, issuing from the waste,

Make such rude inroads on the land of taste,
Genius grows sick beneath the Gothic rage,

Or seeks her laurels from some worthier age.
As for myself, I own the present charge;

Lazy and lounging, I confess at large;
Yet ease, perhaps, may loose her silken chains,

And the next hour become an hour of pains.
We write, we read, we act, we think, by fits,

And follow all things as the humour hits;
For of all pleasures, which the world can bring,

Variety---O! dear variety's the thing!
Our learned Coke, from whom we scribblers draw

All the wise dictums of poetic law, [follows,
Lays down this truth, from whence my maxim

(See Horace, Ode Dec. Sext.---the case Apollo's)
"The god of verse disclaims a plodding wretch,

"Nor keeps his bow for ever on the stretch."
However great my thirst of honest fame,

I bow with rev'rence to each letter'd name;
To worth, where'er it be, with joy submit,

But own no curst monopolies of wit.
Nor think, my friend, if I but rarely quote,

And little reading shines through what I've wrote,
That I bid peace to ev'ry learned shelf,

Because I dare form judgments for myself.
---Oh! were it mine, with happy skill to look

Up to the ONE, the UNIVERSAL BOOK!
Open to all---to him, to me, to you,
---For NATURE's open to the general view---

Then would I scorn the ancients' vaunted store,
And boast my thefts, where they but robb'd before.

Meanwhile with them, while Grecian sounds impart
Th' eternal passions of the human heart,
Bursting the bonds of ease and lazy rest,
I feel the flame mount active in my breast;
Or when, with joy, I turn the Roman page,
I live, in fancy, in th' AUGUSTAN age!
Till some dull Bavius' or a Mævius' name,
Damn'd by the muse to everlasting fame,
Forbids the mind in foreign climes to roam,
And brings me back to our own fools at home.

SONGS IN THE CAPRICIOUS LOVERS.

AIR I.

WHILE the cool and gentle breeze
Whispers fragrance through the trees,
Nature walking o'er the scene
Clad in robes of lively green,
From the sweetness of the place
Labour wears a cheerful face.
Sure I taste of joys sincere,
Faithful COLIN ever near;
When with ceaseless toil oppress'd,
Wearied nature sinks to rest,
All my labours to beguile,
Love shall wake me with a smile.

AIR II.

THOUGH my features I'm told
Are grown wrinkled and old,
Dull wisdom I hate and detest,
Not a wrinkle is there
Which is furrow'd by care,
And my heart is as light as the best.
When I look on my boys
They renew all joys,
Myself in my children I see;
While the comforts I find
In the kingdom my mind,
Pronounce that my kingdom is free.

In the days I was young,
O! I caper'd and sung;
The lasses came flocking apace.
But now turn'd of threescore
I can do so no more,
—Why then let my boy take my place,
Of our pleasures we crack,
For we still love the smack
And chuckle o'er what we have been;
Yet why should we repine,
You've had yours, I've had mine,
And now let your children begin.

AIR III.

'Tis thus in those toys
Invented for boys
To show how the weather will prove.

The woman and man
On a different plan
Are always directed to move.

One goes out to roam
While t'other keeps home,
Inspid, and dull as a drone,
Though near to each other
As sister and brother,
They both take their airing alone.

AIR IV.

WHEN the head of poor TUMMAS was broke
By ROGER, who play'd at the wake,
And KATE was alarm'd at the stroke,
And wept for poor TUMMAS's sake;
When his worship gave noggins of ale,
And the liquor was charming and stout,
O those were the times to regale,
And we footed it rarely about.

Then our partners were buxom as does,
And we all were happy as kings,
Each lad in his holiday clothes,
And the lasses in all their best things.
What merriment all the day long!
May the feast of our COLIN prove such.
Odzoeks, but I'll join in the song,
And I'll hobble about with my crutch.

AIR V.

WHEN vapours o'er the meadow die,
And morning streaks the purple sky,
I wake to love with jocund glee
To think on him who doats on me.

When eve embrowns the verdant grove
And PHILOMEL laments her love,
Each sigh I breathe, my love reveals
And tells the pangs my bosom feels.

With secret pleasure I survey
The frolic birds in amorous play,
While fondest cares my heart employ
Which flutters, leaps, and beats for joy.

AIR VI.

Yes that's * a magazine of arms
To triumph over time;
Whence beauty borrows half her charms
And always keeps her prime.

At that the prude, coquette, and saint,
Industrious sets her face,
While powder, patch, and wash, and paint,
Repair or give a grace.

To arch the brow there lies the brush,
The comb to tinge the hair,
The Spanish wool to give the blush,
The pearl to dye them fair.

Hence rise the wrinkled, old, and gray,
In freshest beauty strong,
As VENUS fair, as FLORA gay,
As HEBE ever young.

* The toilette.

AIR VII.

Go! seek some nymph of humbler lot,
To share thy board, and deck thy cot,
With joy I fly the simple youth
Who holds me light, or doubts my truth.

Thy breast for love too wanton grown,
Shall mourn its peace and pleasure flown,
Nor shall my faith reward a swain,
Who doubts my love, or thinks me vain.

AIR VIII.

Thus laugh'd at, jilted, and betray'd,
I stamp, I tear, I rave;
Capricious, light, injurious maid,
I'll be no more thy slave.

I'll rend thy image from my heart,
Thy charms no more engage;
My soul shall take the juster part,
And love shall yield to rage.

AIR IX.

Thank you, ladies, for your care,
But I pray you both forbear,
Sure I am all over scratches!
That your curious hands must place,
Such odd spots upon my face
With your pencils, paint, and patches.

How I totter in my gait,
From a dress of so much weight,
With my robe too dangling after;
Could my COLIN now but see
What a thing they've made of me,
Oh he'd split his sides with laughter.

AIR X.

The flowers which grace their native beds,
Awhile put forth their blushing heads,
But ere the close of parting day
They wither, shrink, and die away.

But these which mimic skill hath made,
Nor scorch'd by suns, nor kill'd by shade,
Shall blush with less inconstant hue,
Which art at pleasure can renew.

AIR XI.

When late a simple rustic lass,
I rovd without restraint,
A stream was all my looking-glass,
And health my only paint.

The charms I boast, (alas! how few!)
I gave to nature's care,
As vice ne'er spoilt their native hue,
They could not want repair.

AIR XII.

How strange the mode which truth neglects,
And rests all beauty in defects!
But we by homely nature taught,
Though rude in speech are plain in thought.

AIR XIII.

For various purpose serves the fan,
As thus — a decent blind,
Between the sticks to peep at man,
Nor yet betray your mind.

Each action has a meaning plain,
Resentment's in the snap,
A firt expresses strong disdain,
Consent a gentle tap.

All passions will the fair disclose,
All modes of female art,
And to advantage sweetly shows
The hand, if not the heart.

'Tis folly's sceptre first design'd
By love's capricious boy,
Who knows how lightly all mankind
Are govern'd by a toy.

AIR XIV.

If tyrant love with cruel dart
Transfix the maiden's tender heart,
Of easy faith and fond belief,
She hugs the dart, and aids the thief.

Till, left her helpless state to mourn,
Neglected, loving, and forlorn;
She finds, while grief her bosom stings,
As well as darts the god has wings.

AIR XV.

Along your verdant lowly vale
Calm zephyr breathes a gentle gale,
But rustling through the lofty trees
It swells beyond the peaceful breeze.

Thus free from envy's poison'd dart,
You boast a pure unruffled heart.
While jarring thoughts our peace deform,
And swell our passions to a storm.

AIR XVI.

Though my dress, as my manners, is simple and plain,
A rascal I hate, and a knave I disdain;
My dealings are just, and my conscience is clear,
And I'm richer than those who have thousands a-year.

Though bent down with age, and for sporting un-
couth,
I feel no remorse from the follies of youth;
I still tell my tale, and rejoice in my song,
And my boys think my life not a moment too long.

Let the courtiers, those dealers in grin and grimace,
Creep under, dance over, for title or place;
Above all the titles that flow from a throne,
That of honest I prize, and that title's my own.

AIR XVI.

FROM flow'r to flow'r the butterfly,
O'er fields or gardens ranging,
Sips sweets from each, and flutters by,
And all his life is changing.

Thus roving man new objects sway,
By various charms delighted,
While she who pleases most to-day
To-morrow shall be flighted.

AIR XVII.

WHEN far from fashion's gilded scene
I breath'd my native air,
My thoughts were calm, my mind serene,
No doubtings harbour'd there.

But now no more myself I find.
Distraction rends my breast;
Whilst hopes and fears disturb my mind,
And murder all my rest.

AIR XVIII.

FLATTERING hopes the mind deceiving
Easy faith too often cheat,
Woman, fond and all believing
Loves and hugs the dear deceit.

Noisy show of pomp and riches,
Cupid's trick to catch the fair,
Lowly maids too oft bewitches,
Flattery is the beauty's snare.

AIR XIX.

WHAT's all the pomp of gaudy courts,
But vain delights and jingling toys,
While pleasure crowns your rural sports
With calm content, and tranquil joys.

AIR XX.

RETURN, sweet lass, to flocks and swains,
Where simple nature mildly reigns;
Where love is every shepherd's care,
And every nymph is kind as fair.

The court has only tinsel toys,
Insipid mirth and idle noise;
But rural joys are ever new,
While nymphs are kind, and shepherds true.

AIR XXI.

AGAIN in rustic weeds array'd,
A simple swain, a simple maid,
O'er rural scenes with joy we'll rove,
By dimpling brook, or cooling grove.

The birds shall strain their little throats,
And warble wild their merry notes;
Whilst we converse beneath the shade,
A happy swain, and happy maid.

Thy hands shall pluck, to grace my bow'r,
The luscious fruit, the fragrant flow'r,
Whilst joys shall bless, for ever new,
Thy PHOEBE kind, my COLIN true.

AIR XXII.

WHY should I now, my love, complain,
That toil awaits thy cheerful swain,
Since labour oft a sweet bestows
Which lazy splendour never knows?

Hence springs the purple tide of health,
The rich man's wish, the poor man's wealth,
And spreads those blushes o'er the face,
Which come and go with native grace.

The pride of dress, the pomp of show,
Are trappings oft to cover woe;
But we, whose wishes never roam,
Shall taste of real joys at home.

AIR XXIII.

No doubt but your fool's-cap has known
His highness obligingly kind,
—Odzooks I could knock the fool down,
Was e'er such a cuckoldy hind?

To be sure, like a good-natur'd spouse,
You've lent him a part of your bed;
He has fitted the horns to your brows,
And I see them sprout out of your head.

To keep your wife virtuous and chaste
The court is a wonderful school,
---My lord you've an excellent taste,
---And, son, you're a cuckoldy fool.

If your lady should bring you an heir,
The blood will flow rich in his veins,
Many thanks to my lord for his care---
---You dog, I could knock out your brains.

AIR XXI

AGAIN in this we are told,
 O'er our hearts with love we have
 By singing sweetly, and
 The birds that sing their notes
 And warble with their voices
 While we converse beneath the shade
 A happy love, and happy band
 Thy hands shall guide, to grace my bow,
 The bow that from the heart of love
 Which joy shall bring for ever new
 Thy hand shall lead my love to you

AIR XXII

What should I now, my love, complain
 That still awaits thy coming again
 Since thou art a sweet presence
 Which thy presence never knows
 Henceforth the simple life of health
 The rich man's wish, the poor man's wealth
 And peace shall be thy lot, the late
 Which come and go with native grace
 The guide of duty, the young of love
 An offspring of the heart of love
 But we, whose hearts are never true
 Shall taste of real joy at home

AIR XXIII

No doubt, as you are told, my love
 His heart is only in love
 —O'erlook I could know the soul down
 Was a true love, a true love
 To be true, love is good, and good
 You've been a part of your love
 He has been the heart of your love
 And I see then, from out of your love
 To keep your love, my love, and mine
 The heart is a wonderful thing
 —My love, you are an excellent thing
 —And, love, you are a wonderful thing
 If your love should ever be as true
 The heart will love in a true
 Many thanks to my love, for his love
 —You say, I could know your love

AIR XXIV

From flow'r to flow'r, the beauty
 O'er fields of garden's beauty
 Gipsy twine from each, and beauty
 And all his life is changing
 Thus loving man and woman
 By various changes brighten
 While the who pleasure find to-day
 To-morrow shall be brighten

AIR XXV

We are far from fashion, gilded scene
 I breathe of my native air
 My thoughts were calm, my mind serene
 No doubting heart, no doubt
 But now no more my heart is true
 Distraction runs my heart
 While hopes and fears disturb my mind
 And murder all my rest

AIR XXVI

Platonic hopes the heart deceiving
 My heart is only in love
 Woman, love and all beloved
 Love and hope the heart deceiving
 Not flow of love and hope
 Cupid's trick to love the late
 Lowly maid, too of beauty
 Flattery is the beauty's fate

AIR XXVII

We are all the heart of love
 The heart is only in love
 With pleasure crown your heart
 With calm contentment, and joy

AIR XXVIII

Every heart is to love and love
 Where simple nature finds its love
 Where love is every heart's love
 And every heart is to love and love
 The heart has only one love
 In love and all love
 The heart is to love and love
 While nature is to love and love

To him every passion was known
That throb'd in the breast with desire;
Each gentle affection was shown
In the soft sighing songs of his lyre.
Like the carolling thrush on the spray,
In music soft warbling and wild,
To love was devoted each lay,
In accents pathetic and mild.
To many a fanciful spring
His lyre was melodiously strung;
While Fairies and Fawns in a ring
Have applauded the swain as he sung.

THE LIFE OF CUNNINGHAM.

JOHN CUNNINGHAM was born at Dublin in 1729. His father was a wine-cooper in moderate circumstances, who having obtained a prize in the lottery, commenced wine-merchant, and in a short time became a bankrupt. Both his parents were of Scottish extraction.

He received his education at the grammar school of Drogheda, under Mr. Clark, and early began to exhibit specimens of his poetical powers.

On the failure of his father, he was recalled to Dublin, where, having no certain employment, he became attached to the theatre.

In 1747, before he was seventeen years old, he produced a drama, intituled Love in a Mist, which was performed several nights at the theatre in Smock Alley.

By means of this performance, he had free access to the theatre, which had a very pernicious effect upon him. It created a disgust at the life of a tradesman, and excited a desire to appear on the stage as a performer, though he scarce possessed a single requisite for such a profession.

His passion for the stage had obtained so strong a power over him, that, against the wishes of his friends, and without any communication of his intentions to them, he was secretly prevailed on to engage with an itinerant manager, with whom he came to England; and in this profession he continued, with little variation, until his death.

As an actor he obtained little reputation. His figure was totally against him, either for tragedy, or genteel comedy. His diffidence was too great ever to be overcome, and his voice was dissonant and offensive to the ear. He is said, however, to have shewn in general, a good conception of his author; and as the representative of a mock French character, was not wholly undeserving of praise.

He soon became sensible of his imprudence, but pride prevented his return to his parents: and before he had time to work himself into a resolution of obeying the calls of duty, he received intelligence of his father's death.

An asylum, however, was still open to him in the house of an affectionate brother, Mr. P. Cunningham, one of the best statuaries in Ireland, who repeatedly urged him to return; but the idea of a state of dependence was of all others the most repugnant to him.

The profession which he had originally adopted from choice, he now found himself obliged to persist in from necessity. After having experienced various vicissitudes, at York, Newcastle, Sunderland, Alnwick, and other places in the north of England, he engaged as a performer under Mr. Love, manager of the theatre in the Canongate, Edinburgh, in 1761. Here he began to emerge from obscurity as a poet, and wrote some of his best pieces.

In 1762, he published An Elegy on a Pile of Ruins, 4to; which was read with pleasure after Gray's "Elegy in a Country Church-Yard," of which it is an obvious imitation. The subject is Roslin Abbey, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh.

The following year he published The Contemplatist, A Night Piece, 4to; which, notwithstanding some instances of quaintness and affectation, evinced considerable powers of description, and increased his reputation as a moral and descriptive poet.

It was followed, in 1764, by Fortune, an Apologue, 4to; in which, though the philosophy may be exceptionable, he avoided in a great measure the affected prettiness observable in his former pieces.

By these performances he acquired reputation enough to receive an invitation from a bookseller in London, who proposed to employ him in some works of literature, by which he might obtain a livelihood in a manner more easy and honourable, than that in which he had been hitherto engaged.

Convinced of the propriety of acceding to this proposal, he repaired from Edinburgh to London;

but had hardly set foot in the capital, before he was satisfied of the impracticability of the scheme. The bookseller by whom he was to have been employed stopped payment, and the attention of the public was so entirely engrossed by scandal and political altercation, that he left the town with precipitation, after a short and disagreeable stay in it, and once more rejoined his friends in Edinburgh.

This was the only effort he ever made to emerge from the abject situation in which youthful imprudence had originally placed him: But with this state he appeared by no means dissatisfied. Competence and obscurity were all he desired. He had no views of ambition; and indolence had possessed him so entirely, that he never made a second attempt. In a letter to a friend, he describes himself in these terms: "You may remember my last expedition to London. I think I may be convinced by it that I am not calculated for the business you mention. Though I scribble (but a little neither) to amuse myself, the moment I considered it as my duty, it would cease to be an amusement, and I should of consequence grow weary of it. I am not enterprising, and tolerably happy in my present situation."

At this time Mr. Digges was manager of the Edinburgh play-house, and treated Cunningham with uncommon respect and kindness, which he returned by writing occasional Prologues and Epilogues spoken by him and his favourite Mrs. Bellamy; whose beauty he celebrated in a Fragment written at Dublin, and in a pastoral ballad, called Phyllis.

He continued under Mr. Digges's management, till he quitted Scotland. He then returned to Newcastle, a place which, as it had been his residence for many years, he had originally quitted with regret, and which to his last breath he used emphatically to call his home.

At Newcastle, and in the neighbouring towns, he earned a scanty, but to him a sufficient subsistence, by his theatrical exertions.

Though the profession of an itinerant player was precarious, and rather disreputable, it became much less so, from the estimation he was held in by the most respectable characters in the country, who afforded him their support and protection.

His amiable worth and poetical talents particularly endeared him to the inhabitants of Alnwick; where the present writer has often heard him mentioned with fondness and regret, by his worthy relations, the late John Grey, Esq. and Dr. Henry Richardson, and his respectable friends and neighbours, Captain George Farquhar, Thomas Foster, Esq. Miss Grey, and Miss Taylor.

In 1766, he collected his pieces that had appeared in detached pamphlets, which, with a variety of little pieces never before printed, he published by subscription in one volume 8vo, under the title of Poems, chiefly Pastoral, with a dedication to Garrick. The subscription was numerous and respectable. From a subscription copy now lying before the present writer, which belonged to his brother-in-law, James Grey, Esq. it appears that Mrs. Bellamy took 20 copies.

The remainder of his life passed in one uniform train. Being passionately fond of retirement, and happy in the society of a little circle of rural friends, he rejected every solicitation to try his fortune once more in London, declaring it to be his wish, that as he had lived, so he might die among his friends in Northumberland; nor was that wish denied.

A few months before his death, being incapable of any theatrical exertion, he was removed to the house of his friend Mr. Thomas Slack, printer of the "Newcastle Chronicle," who, with great kindness, received him under his roof, and paid every attention to him which his state required. His grateful sense of the benevolence which served to lessen the wants, and to soothe the severity of his last illness, is expressed in his Verses to a Friend, written about three weeks before his death, which are more valuable for the light they reflect on his calamitous circumstances, than the intrinsic merit of the poetry.

The drama and I have shook hands,

We've parted no more to engage;

Submissive I met her commands,

For nothing can cure me of age.

My sunshine of youth is no more,

My mornings of pleasure are fled;

'Tis painful my fate to endure
 A pension supplies me with bread ;
 Dependent at length on the man
 Whose fortunes I struggled to raise,
 I conquer my pride as I can,
 His charity merits my praise.
 His bounty proceeds from his heart,
 'Tis principle prompts the supply,
 His friendship exceeds my desert,
 And often suppresses a sigh.

After lingering some time under a nervous disorder, during which he burnt all his papers, he died the 18th of September 1773, in the 44th year of his age, and was buried in St. John's church-yard, Newcastle, where, on a tombstone erected to his memory, is the following inscription :

Here lie the Remains of
 JOHN CUNNINGHAM.
 Of his Excellence
 As a Pastoral Poet
 His Works will remain a Monument
 For Ages,
 After this Temporary Tribute of Esteem
 Is in Dust forgotten.
 He died in Newcastle, Sept. 18. 1773.
 Aged 44.

His Poems have been frequently reprinted ; and, with several additions, were received into the edition of the " English Poets 1790." A Poem to his Memory, written by Fergusson, the last of his productions, and printed at Edinburgh, in 4to, 1773, for the benefit of the unfortunate author, then verging towards that state of deplorable insanity, in which he died in the mad-house, about six weeks after its publication, is inserted in the present edition.

Cunningham was an amiable and worthy man, and an ingenious and elegant, though not a first rate poet. His principal merit seems to lie in the easy and humble, yet pleasing walks of the pastoral muse. When he attempts ethics or philosophy, he sinks under the weight of his themes, and his efforts are delicate and quaint, or feeble and uncouth. His compositions exhibit ample proofs of elegance, tenderness, and simplicity ; but they are deficient in strength, animation, and enthusiasm. He had a lively imagination and a feeling heart ; but his judgment was not equal to his fancy ; and his most finished productions discover an incorrectness of taste. They are the native efforts of true genius ; but the sentiments and images they exhibit, are not always attended with an elegant simplicity of expression. He sometimes affects the formality of exhibiting trite and insipid trifles in the garb of an insignificant delicacy, and mistakes quaintness for elegance, prettiness for beauty, and childishness for simplicity.

His Elegy on a Pile of Ruins, is an imitation of Gray ; but written with more spirit and real poetry than are commonly to be found in imitations. There is in general an elegant simplicity of thought and expression in this performance ; but his admiration of the " Church-yard Elegy," has led him in some places to an affectation of descriptive and alliterative epithets, which wear the uneasy garb of labour and imitation. The epithets vernal-coated, time-corroded, saint-encypher'd, brown-brow'd, time-unlettered, and silver-working, have a harshness unsuitable to the language of elegy, which, provided it is not mean, can never be too simple. In the opening of the poem he has given a very lively picture of the romantic ruins of the Abbey and Castle of Roslin ; but perhaps the two last lines in the second stanza have a kind of anti-climax ; And many a cherub, &c. It does not seem at all strange that the little ornamental parts of a roof or portico should descend into dust, when the urn and the obelisk are overthrown by time. The five stanzas following,

Where the mild sun, through saint-encyphyr'd glafs,
 Illum'd with mellow light that brown-brow'd aisle, are beautifully descriptive ; but perhaps these two lines, as well as some others, are too elaborate. By endeavouring to crowd too many ideas upon the reader, he does not give him time to observe that beautiful one of the aisle illum'd with the mellow light of the mild sun through the painted glafs.

The Contemplatist has some good description; the sentiments are moral and pathetic; the language simple, solemn, and chaste, excepting a few quaint, unauthorized words, admitted, perhaps, for the sake of the metre. His Fortune, an Apologue, is more chaste and correct; but the moral he deduces from it, that does not appear to be generally true. With regard to moral evil, indeed, the different agency of wisdom and folly may have considerable influence; but natural and accidental evils, which we undergo independent of our own powers, are perhaps the heaviest objects of complaint. Were these altogether out of the world, wisdom might with greater truth be deemed the source of happiness; but not even then the certain source. That enlargement of the intellectual faculties, which is always connected with the idea of wisdom, lays open many avenues to mortification, disgust and discontent, and the more clearly we behold the imbecility of our nature, the more powerfully we feel its effects. The conduct of the Apologue is not less exceptionable than the conclusion. An Ass complains to Jupiter of the comparative hardships of his condition. Moved by the complaint, Jupiter summons Fortune to answer the charge brought against her. After a long search she is found, and urges in her defence, that the plaintiff's hardships were no greater than, for his stupidity, he deserved, and that he had no merit to entitle him to a better fate. This reply of Fortune is pronounced to be sage. Upon this the doctrine of the Apologue is founded. The sentence is equally unjust and cruel; but the sentiments ascribed to Jupiter and Fortune, are neither unnatural nor extraordinary. The conduct of his Jupiter is founded upon the general practice of mankind. The god acquiesces in that contempt which is thrown upon the Ass, for not having attained those dignities which he had neither the power nor the capacity of attaining; and there is no instance of human weakness so universally prevalent as that of despising others for the want of what they were never able to acquire. He has certainly a claim to much indulgence on the same account. The best part of his Apologue is the description of the domestic attendants of Avarice. The picture of Care is finished with equal happiness and skill.

Wisdom's of happiness the certain source,
And folly the original of ill,

His Day, a pastoral, is a series of unconnected descriptions, referring to Morning, Noon, and Evening. It has some particular and picturesque images; but they are seldom original; and the form of his stanza is but little calculated to exhibit them to advantage. The Landscape contains some pretty rural description. Nothing can be more pleasing and natural than the pastoral intitled Content. It has a peculiar sweetness and elegance. The Violet, Corydon, Phyllis, On the Approach of May, Stanzas on the forwardness of Spring, Melody, Damon and Phoebe, Pomona, The Miller, Delia, May Eve, The Sycamore Shade, Kitty Fell, A Man to my Mind, Tbyrsis, Holyday Gown, The Warning, and The Hazethorn Bower, will ever be perused with delight, from the numberless strokes of nature and passion with which they abound, and the agreeable familiarity of the language. His Odes discover few marks of lyric spirit and enthusiasm. His Prologues, &c. are fuller of delicate sentiment than of wit and humour. His Epigrams, Anacreontics, &c. are sometimes elegant and sprightly, and sometimes puerile and trifling.

"Cunningham," says Mr. Ritson in his "Historical View of the Progress of English Song," "though not equal to his countryman Goldsmith in native genius, and still less so in learned application, possesses a pleasing simplicity which cannot fail to recommend him to a reader of unadulterated taste. This simplicity may, perhaps, in some of his compositions, be thought too great; but when it is known that they were necessarily adapted to the intellects of a country theatre, little censure can be justly incurred by the poet."

A CARD FROM THE AUTHOR, TO DAVID GARRICK, ESQ.

RE MOTENESS of situation, and some other circumstances, have hitherto deprived the author of that happiness he might receive from seeing Mr. Garrick.

It is the universal regard his character commands, occasions this address.

It may be thought by many (at a visit so abrupt as this is), that something highly complimentary should be said on the part of the intruder; but according to the ideas the author has conceived of Mr. Garrick's delicacy and good sense, a single period in the garb of flattery would certainly offend him.

He therefore takes his leave;---and after having slept (perhaps a little too forward) to offer his tribute of esteem, respectfully retires.

Newcastle, Aug. 1771.

DAY:

A PASTORAL.

"—— Carpe diem." HOR.

MORNING.

IN the barn the tenant cock,
Close to Partlet perch'd on high,
Briskly crows, the shepherd's clock!)!
Jocund that the morning's nigh.

Swiftly from the mountain's brow,
Shadows, nurs'd by night, retire:
And the peeping sun-beam, now,
Paints with gold the village spire.

Philomel forsakes the thorn,
Plaintive where she prates at night;
And the lark, to meet the morn,
Soars beyond the shepherd's sight.

From the low-roof'd cottage ridge,
See the chatt'ring swallow spring;
Darting through the one-arch'd bridge,
Quick she dips her dappled wing.

Now the pine-trees waving top
Gently greets the morning gale:
Kidlings, now, begin to crop
Daisies, in the dewy dale.

From the balmy sweets, uncloy'd,
(Restless till her task be done)

Now the busy bee's employ'd
Sipping dew before the sun.

Trickling through the crevic'd rock,
Where the limpid stream distills,
Sweet refreshment waits the flock
When 'tis sun-drove from the hills.

Colin, for the promis'd corn
(Ere the harvest hopes are ripe)
Anxious, hears the huntsman's horn,
Boldly sounding, drown his pipe.

Sweet,—O sweet, the warbling throng,
On the white emblossom'd spray!
Nature's universal song
Echoes to the rising day.

NOON.

FERVID on the glitt'ring flood,
Now the noon-tide radiance glows;
Dropping o'er its infant bud,
Not a dew-drop's left the rose.

By the brook the shepherd dines;
From the fierce meridian heat
Shelter'd, by the branching pines,
Pendent o'er his grassy seat.

Now the flock forsakes the glade,
Where, uncheck'd, the sun-beams fall;
Sure to find a pleasing shade
By the ivy'd abby wall.

Y y iij

Echo in her airy round,
O'er the river, rock and hill,
Cannot catch a single sound,
Save the clack of yonder mill.

Cattle court the zephyrs bland,
Where the streamlet wanders cool;
Or with languid silence stand
Midway in the marshy pool.

But from mountain, dell, or stream,
Not a flutt'ring zephyr springs;
Fearful lest the noon-tide beam
Scorch its soft, its silken wings.

Not a leaf has leave to stir,
Nature's lull'd—serene—and still!
Quiet e'en the shepherd's cur,
Sleeping on the heath-clad hill.

Languid is the landscape round,
Till the fresh descending shower,
Grateful to the thirsty ground,
Raises ev'ry fainting flower.

Now the hill—the hedge—is green,
Now the warblers' throats in tune!
Blithsome is the verdant scene,
Brighten'd by the beams of noon!

EVENING.

O'er the heath the heifer strays
Free;—(the furrow'd task is done)
Now the village windows blaze,
Burnish'd by the setting sun.

Now he hides behind the hill,
Sinking from a golden sky:
Can the pencil's mimic skill,
Copy the refulgent dye?

Trudging as the ploughmen go,
(To the smoking hamlet bound)
Giant-like their shadows grow,
Lengthen'd o'er the level ground.

Where the rising forest spreads,
Shelter for the lordly dome!
To their high-built airy beds,
See the rooks returning home!

As the lark with vary'd tune,
Carols to the evening loud;
Mark the mild resplendent moon,
Breaking through a parted cloud!

Now the hermit howlet peeps
From the barn, or twisted brake:
And the blue mist slowly creeps,
Curling on the silver lake.

As the trout in speckled pride,
Playful from its bosom springs;
To the banks, a ruffled tide
Verges in successive rings.

Tripping through the silken grass,
O'er the path-divided dale,
Mark the rose complexion'd lass,
With her well-pois'd milking pail.

Linnets, with unnumber'd notes,
And the cuckoo bird with two,
Tuning sweet their mellow throats,
Bid the setting sun adieu.

THE CONTEMPLATIST:

A NIGHT PIECE.

"Nox erat——"

"Cum tacet omnis ager, pecudes, pictaque ve-
"lucres."

THE queen of Contemplation, night,
Begins her balmy reign;
Advancing in their varied light
Her silver-vested train.

'Tis strange, the many marshall'd stars,
That ride yon sacred round,
Should keep, among their rapid cars,
A silence so profound!

A kind, a philosophic calm,
The cool creation wears!
And what day drank of dewy balm,
The gentle night repairs.

Behind their leafy curtains hid,
The feather'd race how still!
How quiet now the gamesome kid,
That gambol'd round the hill!

The sweets, that bending o'er their banks,
From sultry day declin'd,
Revive in little velvet ranks,
And scent the western wind.

The moon, preceded by the breeze
That bade the clouds retire,
Appears amongst the tufted trees,
A Phoenix nest on fire.

But soft—the golden glow subsides!
Her chariot mounts on high!
And now, in silver'd pomp, she rides
Pale regent of the sky!

Where time, upon the wither'd tree
Hath carv'd the moral chair,
I sit, from busy passions free,
And breathe the placid air.

The wither'd tree was once in prime;
Its branches brav'd the sky!
Thus, at the touch of ruthless time,
Shall youth and vigour die.

I'm lifted to the blue expanse:
It glows serenely gay!
Come, science, by my side advance,
We'll search the milky way.

Let us descend—The daring flight
Fatigues my feeble mind;
And science, in the maze of light,
Is impotent and blind.

What are those wild, those wand'ring fires,
That o'er the moorland ran?
Vapours.—How like the vague desires
That cheat the heart of man!

But there's a friendly guide!—a flame,
That lambient o'er its bed,
Enlivens, with a gladsome beam,
The hermit's offer shed.

Among the russet shades of night
It glances from afar!
And darts along the dark; so bright,
It seems a silver star!

In coverts (where the few frequent)
If virtue deigns to dwell,
'Tis thus, the little lamp, content,
Gives lustre to her cell.

How smooth that rapid river slides
Progressive to the deep!
The poppies, pendent o'er its sides,
Have charm'd the waves to sleep.

Pleasure's intoxicated sons!
Ye indolent! ye gay!
Reflect—for, as the river runs,
Life wings its trackless way.

That branching grove of dusky green
Conceals the azure sky,
Save where a starry space between
Relieves the darken'd eye.

Old error thus with shades impure
Throws sacred truth behind:
Yet sometimes, through the deep obscure,
She bursts upon the mind.

Sleep and her sister silence reign,
They lock the shepherd's fold!
But hark—I hear a lamb complain,
'Tis lost upon the wold!

To savage herds, that hunt for prey,
An unresisting prize!
For having trod a devious way,
The little rambler dies.

As luckless is the virgin's lot
Whom pleasure once misguides;
When hurried from the halcyon cot,
Where innocence presides—

The passions, a relentless train!
To tear the victim ran:
She seeks the paths of peace in vain,
Is conquer'd—and undone.

How bright the little insects blaze,
Where willows shade the way;
As proud as if their painted rays
Could emulate the day!

'Tis thus the pigmy sons of pow'r
Advance their vain parade!
Thus glitter in the darken'd hour
And like the glow-worms fade!

The soft serenity of night
Ungentle clouds deform!
The silver host that shone so bright
Is hid behind a storm!

The angry elements engage!
An oak (an ivied bower!)

Repels the rough wind's noisy rage,
And shields me from the shower.

The rancour thus of rushing fate
I've learnt to render vain:
For whilst integrity's her feat,
The soul will sit serene.

A raven, from some greedy vault,
Amidst that cloister'd gloom,
Bids me, and 'tis a solemn thought!
Reflect upon the tomb.

The tomb!—The consecrated dome!
The temple rais'd to peace!
The port that to its friendly home
Compels the human race!

Yon village, to the moral mind,
A solemn aspect wears;
Where sleep hath lull'd the labour'd hind,
And kill'd his daily cares:

'Tis but the church-yard of the night;
An emblematic bed!
That offers to the mental sight
The temporary dead.

From hence I'll penetrate in thought
The grave's unmeasur'd deep;
And tutor'd, hence be timely taught
To meet my final sleep.

'Tis peace—(The little chaos pass!)
The gracious moon restor'd!
A breeze succeeds the frightful blast,
That through the forest roar'd!

The nightingale, a welcome guest!
Renews her gentle strains;
And hope (just wand'ring from my breast)
Her wonted seat regains.

Yes—When yon lucid orb is dark,
And darting from on high;
My soul, a more celestial spark,
Shall keep her native sky.

Fann'd by the light—the lenient breeze,
My limbs refreshment find;
And moral rhapsodies like these
Give vigour to the mind.

THE THRUSH AND PIE.

A TALE.

CONCEAL'D within an hawthorn bush,
We're told that an experienc'd thrush
Instructed, in the prime of spring,
Many a neighbouring bird to sing,
She caroll'd; and her various song
Gave lessons to the list'ning throng:
But (the entangling boughs between)
'Twas her delight to teach unseen.
At length, the little wond'ring race
Would see their fav'rite face to face;
They thought it hard to be deny'd,
And begg'd that she'd no longer hide.
O'er-modest, worth's peculiar fault,
Another shade the tut'refs sought;

And loth to be too much admir'd,
In secret from the bush retir'd.

An impudent, presuming pie,
Malicious, ignorant, and sly,
Stole to the matron's vacant seat,
And, in her arrogance elate,
Rush'd forward—with—"My friends, you see
"The mistress of the choir in me:
"Here be your due devotion paid,
"I am the songstress of the shade."

A linnnet, that sat list'ning high,
Made the impostor this reply:—"The tomb!
"I fancy, friend, that vulgar throats
"Were never form'd for warbling notes:
"But if these lessons came from you,
"Repeat them in the public view;
"That your assertions may be clear,
"Let us behold as well as hear."

The length'ning song, the soft'ning strain,
Our chatt'ring pie attempts in vain;
For, to the fool's eternal shame,
All she could compass was a scream.

The birds enrag'd, around her fly,
Nor shelter nor defence is nigh.

The caitiff wretch, distress'd—forlorn!
On every side is peck'd and torn!
Till, for her vile atrocious lies,
Under their angry beaks she dies.

Such be his fate, whose scoundrel claim
Obtrudes upon a neighbour's fame.

Friend E——n*, the tale apply,
You are—yourself—the chatt'ring pie:
Repent, and, with a conscious blush,
Go make atonement to the thrush†.

PALEMON.

A PASTORAL.

PALEMON, seated by his fav'rite maid,
The sylvan scenes with ecstasy survey'd;
Nothing could make the fond Alexis gay,
For Daphne had been absent half the day:
Dar'd by Palemon for a pastoral prize,
Reluctant, in his turn, Alexis tries.

Palemon.

This breeze by the river how charming and soft!
How smooth the grass carpet! How green!
Sweet, sweet sings the lark! as he carols aloft,
His music enlivens the scene!
A thousand fresh flow'rets unusually gay
The fields and the forests adorn;
I pluck'd me some roses, the children of May,
And could not find one with a thorn.

Alexis.

The skies are quite clouded, too bold is the breeze,
Dull vapours descend on the plain;
The verdure's all blasted that cover'd yon trees,
The birds cannot compass a strain:
In search for a chaplet my temples to bind,
All day as I silently rove,

* A Y—shire bookseller, who pirated an edition of the Pleasing Instructor.

† The compiler and reputed authorefs of the original essays in that book.

I can't find a flow'ret (not one to my mind)
In meadow, in garden, or grove.

Palemon.

I ne'er saw the hedge in such excellent bloom,
The lambkins so wantonly gay;
My cows seem to breathe a more pleasing perfume,
And brighter than common the day:
If any dull shepherd should foolishly ask,
So rich why the landscapes appear?
To give a right answer, how easy my task!
Because my sweet Phillida's here.

Alexis.

The stream that so muddy moves slowly along,
Once roll'd in a beautiful tide;
It seem'd o'er the pebbles to murmur a song,
But Daphne sat then by my side.
See, see the lov'd maid, o'er the meadows she hies,
Quite alter'd already the scene!
How limpid the stream is! how gay the blue skies!
The hills and the hedges how green!

THE HAWTHORN BOWER.

PALEMON, in the hawthorn bower,
With fond impatience lay;
He counted every anxious hour
That stretch'd the tedious day.
The rosy dawn Pastora nam'd,
And vow'd that she'd be kind;
But ah! the setting sun proclaim'd
That women's vows are—wind.

The fickle sex the boy defy'd;
And swore, in terms profane,
That beauty in her greatest pride
Might sue to him in vain.

When Delia from the neighb'ring glade
Appear'd in all her charms,
Each angry vow Palemon made
Was lost in Delia's arms.

The lovers had not long reclin'd
Before Pastora came:
Inconstancy, she cry'd, I find
In every heart's the same;
For young Alexis sigh'd and prest,
With such bewitching power,
I quite forgot the wishing guest
That waited in the bower.

THE ANT AND CATERPILLAR:

A FABLE.

As an ant, of his talents superiorly vain,
Was trotting, with consequence, over the plain,
A worm, in his progress remarkably slow,
Cry'd—"Bless your good worship wherever
"you go;

"I hope your great mightiness won't take it ill,
"I pay my respects with an hearty good will."
With a look of contempt, and impertinent pride,
"Begone, you vile reptile," (his antship replied);
"Go—go and lament your contemptible state,
"But first—look at me—see my limbs how
"complete;

" I guide all my motions with freedom and ease,
 " Run backward and forward, and turn when I
 " please:
 " Of nature (grown weary) you shocking essay!
 " I spurn you thus from me—crawl out of my
 " way."

The reptile insulted, and vext to the soul,
 Crept onwards, and hid himself close in his hole;
 But nature, determin'd to end his distress,
 Soon sent him abroad in a butterfly's dress.

Ere long the proud ant, as repassing the road
 (Fatigu'd from the harvest, and tugging his load),
 The beau on a violet bank he beheld,
 Whose vesture, in glory, a monarch's excell'd;
 His plumage expanded—'twas rare to behold
 So lovely a mixture of purple and gold.

The ant quite amaz'd at a figure so gay,
 Bow'd low with respect, and was trudging away.
 " Stop, friend," says the butterfly—"don't be " surpriz'd

" I once was the reptile you spurn'd and despis'd;
 " But now I can mount, in the sun-beams I play,
 " While you must, for ever, drudge on in your
 " way."

MORAL.

A wretch, though to-day he's o'erloaded with for-row,

May soar above those that oppress'd him—to mor-

PHILLIS:

A PASTORAL BALLAD.

I SAID—on the banks by the stream,
 I've pip'd for the shepherds too long:
 Oh grant me, ye muses, a theme,
 Where glory may brighten my song!
 But Pan * bade me stick to my strain,
 Nor lessons too lofty rehearse;
 Ambition befits not a swain,
 And Phillis loves pastoral verse.

The rose, though a beautiful red,
 Looks faded to Phillis's bloom;
 And the breeze from the bean-flower bed
 To her breath's but a feeble perfume:
 The dew-drop so limpid and gay,
 That loose on the violet lies,
 Though brighten'd by Phœbus's ray,
 Wants lustre, compar'd to her eyes.

A lily I pluck'd in full pride,
 In freshness with her's to compare;
 And foolishly thought (till I try'd)
 The flow'ret was equally fair.
 How, Corydon, could you mistake?
 Your fault be with sorrow confest,
 You said the white swans on the lake
 For softness might rival her breast.

While thus I went on in her praise,
 My Phillis pass'd sportive along:
 Ye poets, I covet no bays.
 She smil'd—a reward for my song!

* The author intends the character of Pan for the late Mr. Shenstone, who favoured him with a letter or two, advising him to proceed in the pastoral manner.

I find the god Pan's in the right,
 No fame's like the fair one's applause!
 And Cupid must crown with delight
 The shepherd that sings in his cause.

POMONA:

A PASTORAL.

On the Cyder Bill being passed.

FROM orchards of ample extent,
 Pomona's compell'd to depart;
 And thus, as in anguish she went,
 The goddess unburden'd her heart:

" To flourish where liberty reigns,
 " Was all my fond wishes requir'd;
 " And here I agreed with the swains
 " To live till their freedom expir'd.

" Of late you have number'd my trees,
 " And threaten'd to limit my store:
 " Alas!—from such maxims as these,
 " I fear that your freedom's no more.

" My flight will be fatal to May:
 " For how can her gardens be fine:
 " The blossoms are doom'd to decay,
 " (The blossoms, I mean, that were mine).

" Rich autumn remembers me well:
 " My fruitage was fair to behold!
 " My pears—how I ripen'd their swell!
 " My pippins!—were pippins of gold!

" Let Ceres drudge on with her ploughs!
 " She droops as she furrows the soil;
 " A nectar I shake from my boughs,
 " A nectar that softens my toil.

" When Bacchus began to repine,
 " With patience I bore his abuse;
 " He said that I plunder'd the vine,
 " He said that I pilfer'd his juice.

" I know the proud drunkard denies
 " That trees of my culture should grow:
 " But let not the traitor advise;
 " He comes from the climes of your foe.

" Alas! in your silence I read
 " The sentence I'm doom'd to deplore:
 " 'Tis plain the great Pan has decreed,
 " My orchard shall flourish no more."

The goddess flew off in despair;
 As all her sweet honours declin'd;
 And plenty and pleasure declare,
 They'll loiter no longer behind.

MAY-EVE:

OR, KATE OF ABERDEEN.

THE silver moon's enamour'd beam,
 Steals softly through the night,
 To wanton with the winding stream,
 And kiss reflected light.
 To beds of state go balmy sleep,
 ('Tis where you've seldom been)
 May's vigil while the shepherd's keep
 With Kate of Aberdeen.

Upon the green the virgins wait,
In rosy chaplets gay,
Till morn unbar her golden gate,
And give the promis'd May.
Methinks I hear the maids declare,
The promis'd May, when seen,
Not half so fragrant, half so fair,
As Kate of Aberdeen.

Strike up the tabor's boldest notes,
We'll rouse the nodding grove;
The nested birds shall raise their throats,
And hail the maid I love:
And see—the matin lark mistakes,
He quits the tufted green:
Fond bird! 'tis not the morning breaks,
'Tis Kate of Aberdeen.

Now lightsome o'er the level mead,
Where midnight fairies rove,
Like them, the jocund dance we'll lead,
Or tune the reed to love:
For see the rosy May draws nigh;
She claims a virgin queen;
And hark, the happy shepherds cry
'Tis Kate of Aberdeen.

KITTY FELL.

The courtly bard, in verse sublime,
May praise the toasted belle;
A country maid (in careless rhyme)
I sing—my Kitty Fell!

When larks forsake the flow'ry plain,
And love's sweet numbers swell,
My pipe shall join the morning strain,
In praise of Kitty Fell.

Where woodbines twist their fragrant shade,
And noontide beams repel,
I'll rest me on the tufted mead,
And sing of Kitty Fell.

When moon-beams dance among the boughs
That lodge sweet Philomel,
I'll pour with her my tuneful vows,
And pant for Kitty Fell.

The pale-faced pedant burns his books;
The sage forsakes his cell:
The soldier smooths his martial looks,
And sighs for Kitty Fell.

Were mine, ye great, your envy'd lot,
In gilded courts to dwell;
I'd leave them for a lonely cot
With love and Kitty Fell.

THYRSIS.

The pendent forest seem'd to nod,
In drowsy fetters bound;
And fairy elves in circles trod
The daisy-painted ground:
When Thyrsis sought the conscious grove,
Of slighted vows to tell,
And thus (to sooth neglected love)
Invok'd sad Philomel:

"The stars their silver radiance shed,
"And silence charms the plain;
"But where's my Philomela fled,
"To sing her love-lorn strain?
"Hither, ah, gentle bird, in haste
"Direct thy hov'ring wing:
"The vernal green's a dreary waste,
"Till you vouchsafe to sing,

"So thrilling sweet thy numbers flow,
"(Thy warbling song dost tell!)
"The tear that tells the lover's woe
"Falls cold upon my breast.
"To hear sad Philomel complain,
"Will soften my despair;
"Then quickly swell the melting strain,
"And sooth a lover's care.

Give up all hopes, unhappy swain,
A list'ning sage reply'd,
For what can constancy obtain,
From unrelenting pride?
The shepherd droop'd—the tyrant death,
Had seiz'd his trembling frame;
He bow'd, and with departing breath
Pronounc'd Zaphira's name.

CLARINDA.

CLARINDA's lips I fondly press'd;
While rapture fill'd each vein;
And as I touch'd her downy breast,
Its tenant slept serene.

So soft a calm, in such a part,
Betrays a peaceful mind;
Whilst my uneasy, flutt'ring heart,
Would scarcely be confin'd.

A stubborn oak the shepherd fees,
Unmov'd, when storms descend;
But, ah! to ev'ry sporting breeze,
The myrtle bough must bend.

FANNY OF THE DALE.

LET the declining damask rose
With envious grief look pale;
The summer bloom more freely glows
In Fanny of the Dale.

Is there a sweet that decks the field,
Or scents the morning gale;
Can such a vernal fragrance yield,
As Fanny of the Dale?

The painted belles, at court rever'd,
Look lifeless, cold, and stale:
How faint their beauties, when compar'd
With Fanny of the Dale!

The willows bind Pastora's brows,
Her fond advances fail:
For Damon pays his warmest vows
To Fanny of the Dale.

Might honest truth, at last, succeed,
And artless love prevail;
Thrice happy cou'd he tune his reed,
With Fanny of the Dale.

A SONG.

SENT TO CHLOE WITH A ROSE.

Tune—Lass of Patie's Mill.

Yes, every flower that blows,
I pass'd unheeded by,
Till this enchanting rose
Had fix'd my wand'ring eye.
It scented every breeze,
That wanton'd o'er the stream,
Or trembled through the trees,
To meet the morning beam.

To deck that beauteous maid,
Its fragrance can't excel,
From some celestial shade
The damask charmer fell:
And as her balmy sweets,
On Chloe's breast she pours,
The queen of beauty greets
The gentle queen of flowers.

STANZAS ON THE FORWARDNESS OF
— SPRING.

"———tibi, flores, plenis

"Ecce ferunt nymphæ calathis." VIRG.

O'er nature's fresh bosom, by verdure unbound,
Bleak winter blooms lovely as spring:
Rich flow'rets (how fragrant!) rise wantonly
round,

And summer's wing'd choristers sing!

To greet the young monarch of Britain's blest isle,
The groves with gay blossoms are grac'd!
The primrose peeps forth with an innocent smile,
And cowslips crowd forward in haste!

Dispatch, gentle Flora, the nymphs of your train
Through woodlands, to gather each sweet:
Go——rob, of young roses, the dew-spangled plain,
And strew the gay spoils at his feet.

Two chaplets of laurel, in verdure the same,
For George, oh ye virgins, entwine! [came,
From conquest's own temples these ever greens
And those from the brows of the nine!

What honours, ye Britons! (one emblem implies)
What glory to George shall belong!
What Miltons (the other), what Addisons rise,
To make him immortal in song!

To a wreath of fresh oak, England's emblem of power!

Whose honours with time shall increase!
Add a fair olive sprig, just unfolding its flow'r,
Rich token of concord and peace!

Next give him young myrtles, by beauty's bright queen

Collected—the pride of the grove!
How fragrant their odour! their foliage how green!
Sweet promise of conjugal love!

Let Gaul's captive lilies, cropt close to the ground,
As trophies of conquest be ty'd:

The virgins all cry, "There's not one to be found?
"Out-bloom'd by his roses—they dy'd."

Ye foes of old England, such fate shall ye share,
With George, as our glories advance—
Through envy you'll sicken,—you'll droop,—you'll despair,
And die—like the lilies of France.

ON THE APPROACH OF MAY.

The virgin, when soften'd by May,
Attends to the villager's vows;
The birds sweetly bill on the spray,
And poplars embrace with their boughs:
On Ida bright Venus may reign,
Ador'd for her beauty above!
We shepherds that dwell on the plain,
Hail May as the mother of love.

From the west as it wantonly blows,
Fond zephyr caresses the vine;
The bee steals a kiss from the rose,
And willows and woodbines entwining
The pinks by the rivulet side,
That border the vernal alcove,
Bend downward to kiss the soft tide:
For May is the mother of love.

May tinges the butterfly's wing,
He flutters in bridal array!
And if the wing'd forresters sing,
Their music is taught them by May.
The stock-dove, recluse with her mate,
Conceals her fond bliss in the grove,
And murmuring seems to repeat
That May is the mother of love.

The goddess will visit you soon,
Ye virgins be sportive and gay:
Get your pipes, oh ye shepherds in tune:
For music must welcome the May.
Would Damon have Phillis prove kind
And all his keen anguish remove,
Let him tell her soft tales, and he'll find
The May is the mother of love.

THE VIOLET.

SHELTER'D from the blight ambition,
Fatal to the pride of rank,
See me in my low condition,
Laughing on the tufted bank
On my robes (for emulation)
No variety's impress;
Suited to an humble station,
Mine's an unembroider'd vest.

Modest though the maids declare me,
May in her fantastic train,
When Pastora deigns to wear me,
Ha'n't a flow'ret half so vain.

THE NARCISSUS.

As pendent o'er the limpid stream
I bow'd my snowy pride,

And languish'd in a fruitless flame,
For what the fates deny'd;
The fair Pastora chanc'd to pass,
With such an angel air,
I saw her in the wat'ry glass,
And lov'd the rival fair.

Ye fates, no longer let me pine,
A self-admiring sweet,
Permit me, by your grace divine,
To kiss the fair-one's feet:
That if by chance the gentle maid
My fragrance should admire,
I may,—upon her bosom laid,
In sister sweets expire.

THE MILLER.

A BALLED.

In a plain pleasant cottage, conveniently neat,
With a mill and some meadows—a freehold estate,
A well-meaning miller, by labour supplies,
Those blessings that grandeur to great ones denies:
No passions to plague him, no cares to torment,
His constant companions are health and content;
Their lordships in lace may remark, if they will,
He's honest, though daub'd with the dust of his mill.

Ere the lark's early carols salute the new day,
He springs from his cottage as jocund as May;
He cheerfully whistles, regardless of care,
Or sings the last ballad he bought at the fair:
While courtiers are toil'd in the cobwebs of state,
Or bribing elections, in hopes to be great,
No fraud or ambition his bosom e'er fill,
Contented he works, if there's grist for his mill.

On Sunday bedeck'd in his homespun array,
At church he's the loudest to chaunt or to pray;
He sits to a dinner of plain English food,
Though simple the pudding, his appetite's good.
At night, when the priest and excisemen are gone,
He quaffs at the alehouse with Roger and John,
Then reels to his pillow, and dreams of no ill;
No monarch more blest than the man of the mill.

A LANDSCAPE.

"Rura mihi & irrigui placeant in vallibus amnes."
VIRG.

Now that summer's ripen'd bloom
Frolics where the winter frown'd,
Stretch'd upon these banks of broom,
We command the landscape round.

Nature in the prospect yields
Humble dales, and mountains bold,
Meadows, woodlands, heaths,—and fields
Yellow'd o'er with waving gold.

Goats upon that frowning steep,
Fearless, with their kiddings brouse!
Here a flock of snowy sheep!
There an herd of motely cows!

On the uplands, every glade
Brightens in the blaze of day;

O'er the vales, the sober shade
Softens to an evening gray.

Where the rill, by slow degrees,
Swells into a crystal pool,
Shaggy rocks and shelving trees
Shoot to keep the waters cool.

Shiver'd by a thunder-stroke,
From the mountain's misty ridge,
O'er the brook a ruin'd oak,
Near the farm-house, forms a bridge.

On her breast the sunny beam
Glitters in meridian pride;
Yonder as the virgin stream
Hastens to the restless tide:—

Where the ships by wanton gales
Wasted, o'er the green waves run,
Sweet to see their swelling sails
Whiten'd by the laughing sun!

High upon the daisied hill,
Rising from the slope of trees,
How the wings of yonder mill
Labour in the busy breeze!—

Cheerful as a summer's morn,
(Bouncing from her loaded pad)
Where the maid presents her corn,
Smirking, to the miller's lad.

O'er the green a festal throng
Gambols, in fantastic trim!
As the full cart moves along,
Hearken—'tis their harvest hymn!

Linnets on the crowded sprays
Chorus,—and the wood-larks rise,
Soaring with a song of praise,
'Till the sweet notes reach the skies.

Torrents in extended sheets
Down the cliffs, dividing, break:
'Twixt the hills the water meets,
Settling in a silver lake!

From his languid flocks, the swain,
By the sunbeams sore oppress'd,
Plunging on the wat'ry plain,
Plows it with his glowing breast.

Where the mantling willows nod,
From the green bank's slopy side,
Patient, with his well-thrown rod,
Many an angler breaks the tide!

On the isles, with osiers drest,
Many a fair-plum'd halcyon breeds!
Many a wild bird hides her nest,
Cover'd in yon crackling reeds.

Fork-tail'd pratlers as they pass
To their nestlings in the rock,
Daring on the liquid glass,
Seem to kiss the mimic'd flock.

Where the stone cross lifts its head,
Many a saint and pilgrim hoar,
Up the hill was wont to tread,
Barefoot, in the days of yore.

Guardian of a sacred well,
Arch'd beneath yon reverend shades,
Whilome, in that shatter'd cell,
Many an hermit told his beads.

Sultry mists surround the heath
Where the Gothic dome appears,
O'er the trembling groves beneath,
Tott'ring with a load of years.

Turn to the contrasted scene,
Where, beyond these hoary piles,
Gay, upon the rising green,
Many an attic building smiles!

Painted gardens—grots—and groves,
Intermingling shade and light!
Lengthen'd vistas, green alcoves,
Join to give the eye delight.

Hamlets—villages, and spires,
Scatter'd on the landscape lie,
'Till the distant view retires,
Closing in an azure sky.

MELODY.

LIGHTSOME as convey'd by sparrows,
Love and beauty cross'd the plains,
Flights of little pointed arrows
Love dispatch'd among the swains:

But so much our shepherds dread him,
(Spoiler of their peace profound)
Swift as scudding fawns they fled him,
Frighted, though they felt no wound.

Now the wanton god grown slier,
And for each fond mischief ripe,
Comes disguis'd in Pan's attire,
Tuning sweet an oaten pipe:

Echo, by the winding river,
Doubles his delusive strains;
While the boy conceals his quiver,
From the flow returning swains.

As Palemon, unsuspecting,
Prais'd the fly musician's art,
Love, his light disguise rejecting,
Lodg'd an arrow in his heart:

Cupid will enforce your duty,
Shepherds, and would have you taught,
Those who timid fly from beauty,
May by melody be caught.

DELIA:

A PASTORAL.

THE gentle swan with graceful pride
Her glossy plumage laves,
And sailing down the silver tide,
Divides the whisp'ring waves:
The silver tide, that wand'ring flows,
Sweet to the bird must be:
But not so sweet—blithe Cupid knows,
As Delia is to me.

A parent bird, in plaintive mood,
On yonder fruit-tree sung,

And still the pendent nest she view'd,
That held her callow young:
Dear to the mother's flutt'ring heart
The genial brood must be;
But not so dear (the thousandth part)!
As Delia is to me.

The roses that my brow surround
Were natives of the dale;
Scarce pluck'd, and in a garland bound,
Before their sweets grew pale!
My vital bloom would thus be froze,
If luckless torn from thee
For what the root is to the rose,
My Delia is to me.

Two doves I found, like new-fall'n snow,
So white the beauteous pair!
The birds to Delia I'll bestow,
They're like her bosom fair!
When, in their chaste connubial love,
My secret with she'll see:
Such mutual bliss as turtles prove,
May Delia share with me.

THE SYCAMORE SHADE:

A BALLAD.

T'OTHER day as I sat in the sycamore shade,
Young Damon came whistling along,
I trembled—I blush'd—a poor innocent maid!
And my heart caper'd up to my tongue:
Silly heart, I cry'd, fie! What a flutter is here!
Young Damon designs you no ill;
The shepherd's so civil, you've nothing to fear,
Then prythee, fond urchin, lie still.

Sly Damon drew near, and knelt down at my feet,
One kiss he demanded—No more!
But urg'd the soft pressure with ardour so sweet,
I could not begrudge him a score:
My lambkins I've kiss'd, and no change ever found,
Many times as we play'd on the hill;
But Damon's dear lips made my heart gallop
round,
Nor would the fond urchin lie still.

When the sun blazes fierce, to the sycamore shade
For shelter, I'm sure to repair;
And, virgins, in faith, I'm no longer afraid,
Although the dear shepherd be there:
At ev'ry fond kiss that with freedom he takes,
My heart may rebound if it will;
There's something so sweet in the bustle it makes,
I'll die ere I bid it lie still.

DAMON AND PHILLIS:

A PASTORAL DIALOGUE.

"Donec gratus eram," &c. HOR.

Damon.

WHEN Phillis was faithful, and fond as she's fair,
I twist'd young roses in wreaths for my hair;
But ah! the sad willow's a shade for my brows,
For Phillis no longer remembers her vows!

To the groves with young Colin the shepherdess flies, [sighs.
While Damon disturbs the still plains with his Phillis.

Bethink you, false Damon, before you upbraid,
When Phœbe's fair lambkin had yesterday stray'd,
Through the woodlands you wander'd, poor Phil-
lis forgot!

And drove the gay rambler quite home to her cot;
A swain so deceitful no damsel can prize;
'Tis Phœbe, not Phillis, lays claim to your sighs.

Damon.

Like summer's full season young Phœbe is kind,
Her manners are graceful, untainted her mind!
The sweets of contentment her cottage adorn,
She's fair as the rose-bud, and fresh as the morn!
She smiles like Pomona—These smiles I'd resign,
If Phillis were faithful and deign'd to be mine.

Phillis.

On the tabor young Colin so prettily plays,
He sings me sweet sonnets, and writes in my praise!
He chose me his true-love last Valentine-day,
When birds sat like bridegrooms all pair'd on the spray; [mind,
Yet I'd drive the gay shepherd far, far from my
If Damon, the rover, were constant and kind.

Damon.

Fine folks, my sweet Phillis, may revel and range, [change!
But fleeting's the pleasure that's founded on
In the villager's cottage such constancy springs,
That peasants with pity may look down on kings.
To the church then let's hasten, our transports to bind,
And Damon will always prove faithful and kind.

Phillis.

To the church then let's hasten, our transports
to bind,
And Phillis will always prove faithful and kind.

THE WARNING.

YOUNG Colin once courted Myrtilla the prude,
If he sigh'd or look'd tender, she cry'd he was rude;
Though he begg'd with devotion, some ease for his pain,
The shepherd got nothing but frowns and disdain,
Fatigu'd with her folly, his suit he gave o'er,
And vow'd that no female should fetter him more.

He strove with all caution to 'scape from the net,
But Chloe soon caught him,—a finish'd coquette!
She glanc'd to his glances, she sigh'd to his sighs,
And flatter'd his hopes—in the language of eyes.
Alas for poor Colin! when put to the test,
Himself and his passion prov'd both but her jest.

By the critical third he was fix'd in the snare;
By Fanny—gay, young, unaffected, and fair;
When she found he had merit, and love took his part,
She dally'd no longer—but yielded her heart.
With joy they submitted to Hymen's decree,
And now are as happy—as happy can be.

As the rosebud of beauty soon sickens and fades,
The prude and coquette are two slighted old maids;

Now their sweets are all wasted,—too late they repent,

For transports untasted, for moments mispent!
Ye virgins take warning, improve by my plan,
And fix the fond youth when you prudently can.

HOLIDAY GOWN.

In holiday gown, and my new fangled hat,
Last Monday I tript to the fair;
I held up my head, and I'll tell you for what,
Brisk Roger I guess'd wou'd be there:
He woos me to marry whenever we meet,
There's honey sure dwells on his tongue!
He hugs me so close, and he kisses so sweet,
I'd wed—if I were not too young.

Fond Sue, I'll assure you, laid hold on the boy,
(The vixen wou'd fain be his bride)
Some token she claim'd, either ribbon or toy,
And swore that she'd not be deny'd:
A top-knot he bought her, and garters of green,
Pert Susan was cruelly stung;
I hate her so much, that, to kill her with spleen,
I'd wed—if I were not too young.

He whisper'd such soft pretty things in mine ear!
He flatter'd, he promis'd, and swore!
Such trinkets he gave me, such laces and geer,
That trust me,—my pockets ran o'er:
Some ballads he bought me, the best he cou'd find,
And sweetly their burthen he sung;
Good faith he's so handsome, so witty, and kind,
I'd wed—if I were not too young.

The sun was just setting, 'twas time to retire,
(Our cottage was distant a mile)
I rose to be gone—Roger bow'd like a squire,
And handed me over the stile: [eye,
His arms he threw round me—love laugh'd in his
He led me the meadows among,
There prest me so close, I agreed, with a sigh,
To wed—for I was not too young.

DAPHNE:

A SONG.

No longer, Daphne, I admire
The graces in thine eyes;
Continu'd coyness kills desire,
And famish'd passion dies.
Three tedious years I've sigh'd in vain,
Nor could my vows prevail;
With all the rigours of disdain,
You scorn'd my amorous tale.

When Celia cry'd, how senseless she,
That has such vows refus'd;
Had Damon giv'n his heart to me,
It had been kinder us'd.
The man's a fool that pines and dies;
Because a woman's coy;
The gentle bliss that one denies,
A thousand will enjoy,

Such charming words, so void of art,
Surprising rapture gave;

And though the maid subdu'd my heart,
It ceas'd to be a slave :
A wretch condemn'd, shall Daphne prove ;
While blest without restraint,
In the sweet calendar of love
My Celia stands—a saint.

CORYDON :

A PASTORAL.

To the Memory of William Shenstone, Esq.

COME, shepherds, we'll follow the hearse,
We'll see our lov'd Corydon laid :
Though sorrow may blemish the verse,
Yet let a sad tribute be paid.
They call'd him the pride of the plain ;
In sooth he was gentle and kind !
He mark'd on his elegant strain
The graces that glow'd in his mind.

On purpose he planted yon trees,
That birds in the covert might dwell ;
He cultur'd his thyme for the bees,
But never wou'd rifle their cell.
Ye lambkins that play'd at his feet,
Go bleat—and your master bemoan ;
His music was artless and sweet,
His manners as mild as your own.

No verdure shall cover the vale,
No bloom on the blossoms appear ;
The sweets of the forest shall fail,
And winter discolour the year.
No birds in our hedges shall sing,
(Our hedges so vocal before)
Since he that should welcome the spring,
Salutes the gay season no more.

His Phillis was fond of his praise,
And poets came round in a throng ;
They listen'd—they envy'd his lays,
But which of them equal'd his song ?
Ye shepherds, henceforward be mute,
For lost is the pastoral strain ;
So give me my Corydon's flute,
And thus—let me break it in twain.

DAMON AND PHOEBE.

WHEN the sweet rosy morning first peep'd from the skies,
A loud singing lark bade the villagers rise ;
The cowslips were lively—the primroses gay,
And shed their best perfumes to welcome the
May : [green,
The swains and their sweethearts all rang'd on the
Did homage to Phœbe---and hail'd her their queen.

Young Damon step'd forward : he sung in her
praise,
And Phœbe bestow'd him a garland of bays :
May this wreath, said the fair one, dear lord of my vows,
A crown for true merit, bloom long on thy brows :
The swains and their sweethearts that danc'd on the green,
Approv'd the fond present of Phœbe their queen.

'Mongst lords and fine ladies, we shepherds are told,
The dearest affections are barter'd for gold ;
That discord in wedlock is often their lot,
While Cupid and Hymen shake hands in a cot :
At the church with fair Phœbe since Damon has been,
He's rich as a monarch---she's blest as a queen.

A PASTORAL HYMN TO JANUS.

ON THE BIRTH OF THE QUEEN.

“ Te primum pia thura rogent---te vota salutent,
“ --- te colat omnis honos.”

MART. ad Janum.

To Janus, gentle shepherds ! raise a shrine :
His honours be divine !

And as to mighty Pan with homage bow :
To him, the virgin troop shall tribute bring ;
Let him be hail'd like the green-liveried spring,
Spite of the wint'ry storms that stain his brow.

The pride, the glowing pageantry of May,
Glides wantonly away :

But January, in his rough-spun vest,
Boasts the full blessings that can never fade,
He that gave birth to the illustrious maid,
Whose beauties make the British monarch blest !

Could the soft spring with all her sunny showers,
The frolic nurse of flowers !

Or flaunting summer, flush'd in ripen'd pride,
Could they produce a finish'd sweet so rare :
Or from his golden stores, a gift so fair,
Say, has the fertile autumn e'er supply'd ?

Henceforward let the hoary month be gay
As the white-hawthorn'd May !

The laughing goddess of the spring disown'd,
Her rosy wreath shall on his brows appear,
Old Janus as he leads, shall fill the year,
And the less fruitful autumn be dethron'd.

Above the other months supremely blest,
Glad Janus stands confest !

He can behold with retrospective face
The mighty blessings of the year gone by :
Where, to connect a monarch's nuptial tie,
Assembled ev'ry glory, ev'ry grace !

When he looks forward on the flatt'ring year,
The golden hours appear :

As in the sacred reign of Saturn, fair :
Britain shall prove from this propitious date,
Her honours perfect, victories complete,
And boast the brightest hopes, a British heir *.

AN INSCRIPTION

On the House at Mavis-Bank, near Edinburgh, situated in a Grove.

PARVA domus ! nemerosa quies !
Sis tu, quoque nostris
Hospitium, laribus, subsidiumque diu !

* The above little poem was written on supposition that her Majesty's birth-day was really in the month of January.

Flora tuas ornet postes, Pomona que menfas!
 Conferat ut varias fertilis hortus opes!
 Et volucres pictæ cingentes voce canora,
 Retia sola canent quæ sibi tendit amor!
 Floriferi colles, dulces mihi sæpe recessus
 Dent, atque hospitibus gaudia plena meis!
 Concedatque Deus nunquam, vel sero senescas,
 Seroque terrenas experiare vices!
 Integra reddantur quæ plurima sæcula rodant
 Detur, et ut senio pulchrior eniteas.

THE INSCRIPTION IMITATED.

PEACE has explor'd this sylvan scene,
 She courts your calm retreat,
 Ye groves of variegated green,
 That grace my genial seat!
 Here, in the lap of lenient ease,
 (Remote from mad'ning noise)
 Let me delude a length of days,
 In dear domestic joys!
 Long may the parent queen of flow'rs
 Her fragrance here display!
 Long may she paint my mantling bow'rs,
 And make my portals gay!
 Nor you—my yellow gardens, fail
 To swell Pomona's hoard!
 So shall the plenteous, rich regale—
 Replenish, long, my board!
 Pour through the groves your carols clear,
 Ye birds, nor bondage dread:
 If any toils entangle here,
 'Tis those which love hath spread.
 Where the green hill so gradual flants,
 Or flowery glade extends,
 Long may these fair, these fav'rite haunts
 Prove social to my friends!
 May you preserve perpetual bloom,
 My happy halcyon seat!
 Or if fell time denounce thy doom,
 Far distant be its date!
 And when he makes, with iron rage,
 Thy youthful pride his prey,
 Long may the honours of thy age
 Be reverenc'd in decay!

ANOTHER INSCRIPTION

ON THE SAME HOUSE.

Hanc in gremio resonantis sylvæ
 Aquis, hortis, aviumque garritu,
 Cæterisque ruris honoribus,
 Undique residentem villam,
 Non magnificam—non superbam;
 At qualen vides,
 Commodam, mundam, genialem
 Naturæ parem, socias artem.
 Sibi, suisque
 Ad vitam placide,
 Et tranquille agendum
 Designavit, instruxitque.

IMITATED.

In the deep bosom of my grove
 A sweet recess survey!
 Where birds, with elegies of love,
 Make vocal every spray.
 A sylvan spot, with woods—with waters crown'd,
 With all the rural honours blooming round!

This little, but commodious seat
 (Where nature weds with art)
 A'nt to the eye superbly great,
 Its beauties charm the heart.
 Here, may the happy founder and his race
 Pass their full days in harmony and peace!

A PASTORAL.

O'er moorlands and mountains, rude, barren,
 and bare,
 As wilder'd and weary'd I roam,
 A gentle young shepherdess sees my despair,
 And leads me—o'er lawns—to her home:
 Yellow sheaves from rich Ceres her cottage had
 crown'd,
 Green rushes were strew'd on her floor,
 Her casement, sweet woodbines crept wantonly
 round,
 And deck'd the sod seats at her door.
 We sat ourselves down to a cooling repast,
 Fresh fruits! and she cull'd me the best; [cast,
 While thrown from my guard by some glances she
 Love slyly stole into my breast!
 I told my soft wishes; she sweetly reply'd,
 (Ye virgins, her voice was divine)!
 I've rich ones rejected, and great ones deny'd,
 But take me, fond shepherd—I'm thine.
 Her air was so modest, her aspect so meek!
 So simple, yet sweet, were her charms!
 I kiss'd the ripe roses that glow'd on her cheek,
 And lock'd the dear maid in my arms.
 Now jocund together we tend a few sheep,
 And if, by yon prattle, the stream,
 Reclin'd on her bosom, I sink into sleep,
 Her image still softens my dream.

Together we range o'er the flow rising hills,
 Delighted with pastoral views,
 Or rest on the rock whence the streamlet distils,
 And point out new themes for my muse.
 To pomp or proud titles she ne'er did aspire,
 The damsel's of humble descent;
 The cottager, peace, is well known for her fire,
 And shepherds have nam'd her content.

CORYDON AND PHILLIS.

A PASTORAL.

Her sheep had in clusters crept close by the grove,
 To hide from the rigours of day;
 And Phillis herself, in a woodbine alcove,
 Among the fresh violets lay:

A youngling, it seems, had been stole from its dam
(Twixt Cupid and Hymen a plot).
That Corydon might, as he search'd for his lamb,
Arrive at this critical spot.

As through the gay hedge for his lambkin he peeps,

He saw the sweet maid with surprise;

"Ye gods, if so killing," he cry'd, "when she sleeps,

"I'm lost when she opens her eyes!

"To tarry much longer would hazard my heart,

"I'll onwards, my lambkin to trace:"

In vain honest Corydon strove to depart,

For love had him nail'd to the place.

"Hush, hush'd be these birds, what a bawling they keep!"

He cry'd, "you're too loud on the spray,

"Don't you see, foolish lark, that the charmer's asleep;

"You'll wake her as sure as 'tis day: [maid!

"How dare that fond butterfly touch the sweet

"Her cheek he mistakes for the rose;

"I'd pat him to death, if I was not afraid

"My boldness would break her repose."

Young Phillis look'd up with a languishing smile,

"Kind, shepherd," she said, "you mistake;

"I laid myself down just to rest me a while,

"But trust me, have still been awake:"

The shepherd took courage, advanc'd with a bow,

He plac'd himself close by her side,

And manag'd the matter, I cannot tell how,

But yesterday made her his bride.

AN ELEGY ON A PILE OF RUINS.

"Aspice murorum moles, praeuptaque saxa!"

JANUS VITALIS.

"Omnia, tempus edax depascitur, omnia car-pit."

SENECA.

In the full prospect yonder hill commands,

O'er barren heaths, and cultivated plains;

The vestige of an ancient abbey stands,

Close by a ruin'd castle's rude remains.

Half buried, there, lie many a broken bust,

And obelisk, and urn, o'erthrown by time;

And many a cherub, there, descends in dust

From the rent roof, and portico sublime.

The rivulets, oft frightened at the sound [high,

Of fragments, tumb'ling from the tow'rs on

Plunge to their source in secret caves profound,

Leaving their banks and pebbly bottoms dry.

Where rev'rend shrines in Gothic grandeur stood,

The nettle, or the noxious nightshade spreads;

And ashlings, wafted from the neighb'ring wood,

Through the worn turrets wave their trembling heads.

There contemplation, to the crowd unknown,

Her attitude compos'd, and aspect sweet!

Sits musing on a monumental stone,

And points to the memento at her feet.

VOL. X.

Soon as sage ev'ning check'd day's sunny pride,
I left the mantling shade in moral mood;
And seated by the maid's sequester'd side,
Sigh'd, as the mould'ring monuments I view'd.

Inexorably calm, with silent pace

Here time has pass'd—what ruin marks his way!

This pile, now crumbling o'er its hallow'd base,

Turn'd not his step, nor could his course delay.

Religion rais'd her supplicating eyes

In vain; and melody her song sublime:

In vain philosophy, with maxims wise,

Would touch the cold unfeeling heart of time.

Yet the hoar tyrant, though not mov'd to spare,

Relented when he struck its finish'd pride;

And partly the rude ravage to repair,

The tott'ring tow'rs with twisted ivy ty'd.

How solemn is the cell o'ergrown with moss,

That terminates the view, yon cloister'd way!

In the crush'd wall, a time-corroded cross,

Religion like, stands mould'ring in decay!

Where the mild sun, through saint-encypher'd glass,

Illum'd with mellow light yon dusky isle,

Many rapt hours might meditation pass,

Slow moving 'twixt the pillars of the pile!

And piety, with mystic meaning beads,

Bowing to saints on every side inurn'd,

Trod oft the solitary path that leads

Where now the sacred altar lies o'erturn'd!

Through the gray grove, between those with'ring
trees,

'Mongst a rude group of monuments, appears

A marble-imag'd matron on her knees,

Half wasted, like a Niobe in tears:

Low levell'd in the dust her darling's laid!

Death pitied not the pride of youthful bloom;

Nor could maternal piety dissuade,

Or soften the fell tyrant of the tomb.

The relics of a mitred saint may rest,

Where, mould'ring in the niche, his statue stands;

Now nameless as the crowd that kiss'd his vest,

And crav'd the benediction of his hands.

Near the brown arch, redoubling yonder gloom,

The bones of an illustrious chieftan lie;

As trac'd among the fragments of his tomb,

The trophies of a broken fame imply.

Ah! what avails, that o'er the vassal plain,

His rights and rich demesnes extended wide!

That honour and her knights compos'd his train,

And chivalry stood marshall'd by his side!

Though to the clouds his castle seem'd to climb,

And frown'd defiance on the desperate foe;

Though deem'd invincible, the conqueror time

Levell'd the fabric, as the founder, low.

Where the light lyre gave many a soft'ning sound,

Ravens and rooks, the birds of discord, dwell;

And where society sat sweetly crown'd,

Eternal solitude has fix'd her cell.

Z z

The lizard, and the lazy lurking bat,
 Inhabit now, perhaps, the painted room.
 Where the sage matron, and her maidens sat,
 Sweet singing at the silver-working loom.

The traveller's bewilder'd on a waste;
 And the rude winds incessant seem to roar,
 Where, in his groves with arching arbores grac'd,
 Young lovers often sigh'd in days of yore.

His aqueducts, that led the limpid tide
 To pure canals, a crystal coal supply!
 In the deep dust their barren beauties hide: [dry!
 Time's thirst, unquenchable, has drain'd them

Though his rich hours in revelry were spent,
 With Comus, and the laughter loving crew;
 And the sweet brow of beauty still unbent
 Brighten'd his fleecy moments as they flew:

Fleet are the fleecy moments! fly they must;
 Not to be stay'd by mask or midnight roar!
 Nor shall a pulse among that mould'ring dust
 Beat wanton at the smiles of beauty more.

Can the deep statesman, skill'd in great design,
 Protract, but for a day, precarious breath?
 Or the tun'd follower of the sacred nine
 Sooth, with his melody, insatiate death!

No—though the palace bar her golden gate,
 Or monarchs plant ten thousand guards around;
 Unerring, and unseen, the shaft of fate
 Strikes the devoted victim to the ground!

What then avails ambition's wide stretch'd wing,
 The schoolman's page, or pride of beauty's bloom,
 The crape-clad hermit, and the rich-rob'd king?
 Levell'd, lie mix'd promiscuous in the tomb.

The Macedonian monarch, wife and good,
 Bade, when the morning's rosy reign began,
 Courtiers should call, as round his couch they stood,
 "Philip! remember, thou'rt no more than man.

" Though glory spread thy name from pole to " pole: [just;
 " Though thou art merciful, and brave, and
 " Philip, reflect, thou'rt posting to the goal,
 " Where mortals mix in undistinguish'd dust!"

So Saladin, for arts and arms renown'd
 (Egypt and Syria's wide domains subdu'd)
 Returning with imperial triumphs crown'd,
 Sigh'd, when the perishable pomp he view'd:

And as he rode, high in his regal car,
 In all the purple pride of conquest dress'd;
 Conspicuous, o'er the trophies gain'd in war,
 Plac'd, pendent on a spear, his burial vest:

While thus the herald cry'd—"This son of pow'r,
 " This Saladin, to whom the nations bow'd,
 " May, in the space of one revolving hour,
 " Boast of no other spoil but yonder shroud!"

Search where ambition rag'd, with rigour steel'd,
 Where slaughter, like the rapid lightning, ran;
 And say, while memory weeps the blood-stain'd field, [man?
 Where lies the chief, and where the common

Vain then are pyramids, and motto'd stones,
 And monumental trophies rais'd on high!
 For time confounds them with the crumbling
 bones,
 That mix'd in hasty graves unnotic'd lie.

Rests not beneath the turf the peasant's head,
 Soft as the lord's, beneath the labour'd tomb?
 Or sleeps one colder, in his close clay-bed,
 Than t'other in the wide vault's dreary womb?

Hither let luxury lead her loose-rob'd train;
 Here flutter pride, on purple-painted wings:
 And from the moral prospect learn—how vain
 The wish, that sighs for sublunary things!

A SONG.

He that love hath never try'd,
 Nor had Cupid for his guide,
 Cannot hit the passage right
 To the palace of delight.

What are honours, regal wealth,
 Florid youth, and rosy health?
 Without love his tribute brings,
 Impotent, unmeaning things:

Gentle shepherds persevere,
 Still be tender, still sincere;
 Love and time, united, do
 Wonders, if the heart be true.

SAPPHO'S HYMN TO VENUS.

IMITATED.

HAIL! (with eternal beauty blest!
 O'er heav'n and earth ador'd!)
 Hail, Venus! 'Tis thy slave's request,
 Her peace may be restor'd:
 Break the fond bonds, remove the rankling smart,
 And bid thy tyrant son from Sappho's soul depart.

Once you descended, queen of love,
 At Sappho's bold desire,
 From the high roofs of sacred Jove,
 Thy ever glorious fire!
 I saw thy dusky pinion'd sparrows bear
 Thy chariot, rolling, light, through the rejoicing
 air.

No transient visit you design'd,
 Your wanton birds depart;
 And with a look, divinely kind,
 That sooth'd my flutt'ring heart: [rest?
 "Sappho," say you, "What sorrow breaks thy
 "How can I give relief to thy conflicting breast?"

"Is there a youth severely coy.
 "My fav'rite would subdue?
 "Or has she lost some wand'ring boy,
 "To plighted vows untrue?"

"Spread thy soft nets, the rambler shall return,
 "And with new lighted flames, more fond, more
 "fiercely burn.

"Thy proffer'd gifts though he deride,
 "And scorn thy glowing charms,
 "Soon shall his every art be try'd
 "To win thee to his arms;

" Though he be now as cold as virgin snow,
" The victim, in his turn, shall like rous'd Ætna
" glow."

Thee, goddess, I again invoke,
These mad desires remove!
Again I've felt the furious stroke
Of irresistible love:
Bid gentle peace to Sappho's breast return,
Or make the youth the loves with mutual ardour
burn.

ANACREON.

ODE LVIII. IMITATED.

As I wove with wanton care,
Fillets for a virgin's hair,
Culling for my fond design,
What the fields had fresh and fine:
Cupid,—and I mark'd him well,
Hid him in a cowslip bell;
While he plumb'd a pointed dart,
Fated to inflame the heart.

Glowing with malicious joy,
Sudden I secur'd the boy;
And, regardless of his cries,
Bore the little frightened prize
Where the mighty goblet stood,
Teeming with a rosy flood.

Urchin, in my rage I cry'd,
What avails thy faucy pride?
From thy busy vengeance free,
Triumph now belongs to me!
Thus—I drown thee in my cup;
Thus—in wine I drink thee up.

Fatal was the nectar'd draught
That to murder love I quaff'd,
O'er my bosom's fond domains,
Now the cruel tyrant reigns:
On my heart's most tender strings,
Striking with his wanton wings,
I'm for ever doom'd to prove
All the insolence of love.

ANACREON.

ODE IX. IMITATED.

The Dove.

TELL me, said I, my beauteous dove,
(If an ambassadress from love)
Tell me, on what soft errand sent,
Thy gentle flight is this way bent?

Ambrosial sweets thy pinions shed
As in the quivering breeze they spread!

A message, says the bird, I bear
From fond Anacreon to the fair;
A virgin of celestial grace!
The Venus of the human race!
Me, for an hymn, or amorous ode,
The Paphian Venus once bestow'd
To the sweet bard; for whom I'd fly
Unwearied to the farthest sky.

Through the soft air he bade me glide,
(See, to my wing his billet's ty'd),
And told me, 'twas his kind decree,
When I return'd, to set me free.

'Twould prove me but a simple bird
To take Anacreon at his word;
Why should I hide me in the wood,
Or search for my precarious food,
When I've my master's leave to stand
Cooing upon his friendly hand;
When I can be profusely fed
With crumbs of his ambrosial bread,
And welcom'd to his nectar bowl,
Sip the rich drops that fire the soul;
'Till in fantastic rounds I spread
My fluttering pinions o'er his head;

Or if he strike the trembling wire,
I perch upon my fav'rite lyre;
'Till lull'd into luxuriant rest,
Sleep steals upon my raptur'd breast.

Go, stranger—to your business—go,
I've told you all you wish'd to know:
Go, stranger,—and I think you'll say,
This prattling dove's an arrant jay.

THE DANCE.

ANACREONTIC.

HARK! the speaking strings invite,
Music calls us to delight;
See the maids in measures move,
Winding like the maze of love.
As they mingle, madly gay,
Sporting Hebe leads the way.

On each glowing cheek is spread,
Rosy Cupid's native red;
And from ev'ry sparkling eye,
Pointed darts at random fly.
Love, and active youth, advance
Foremost in the sprightly dance.

As the magic numbers rise,
Through my veins the poison flies;
Raptures, not to be express'd,
Revel in my throbbing breast.
Jocund as we beat the ground,
Love and harmony go round.

Every maid (to crown his bliss)
Gives her youth a rosy kiss;
Such a kiss as might inspire
Thrilling raptures—soft desire:
Such Adonis might receive,
Such the queen of beauty gave,
When the conquer'd goddess strove
(In the conscious myrtle grove)
To inflame the boy with love.

Let not pride our sports restrain,
Banish hence the prude, disdain!
Think—ye virgins, if you're coy,
Think—ye rob yourselves of joy;
Every moment you refuse,
So much ecstasy you lose:
Think—how fast these moments fly:
If you should too long deny,
Love and beauty both will die.

ANACREON.

ODE XIV. IMITATED.

Why did I with love engage!
Why provoke his mighty rage!

True it is the wand'ring child,
Met me with an aspect mild,
And besought me like a friend.
At his gentle shrine to bend.
True, from my mistaken pride,
Due devotion was deny'd,
'Till (because I would not yield)
Cupid dar'd me to the field.

Now I'm in my armour clasp'd,
Now the mighty lance is grasp'd,
But an Achileian spear
Would be ineffectual here,
While the poison'd arrows fly
Hot as lightning from the sky.

Wounded, through the woods I run,
Follow'd still by beauty's son,
Arrows in malignant showers,
Still the angry urchin pours;
'Till exhausting all his store,
(When the quiver yields no more)
See the god—a living dart,
Shoots himself into my heart.

Freedom I must now resign,
Victory, oh love, is thine!
What can outward actions win
When the battle burns within!

IMITATION FROM ANACREON.

FILL me that capacious cup,
Fill it to the margin up;
From my veins the thirsty day
Quaffs the vital strength away.

Let a wreath my temples shield,
Fresh from the enamel'd field;
'These declining roses bow,
Blasted by my sultry bow.

Flowrets, by their friendly aid,
From the sunbeams form a shade:
Let me from my heart require,
(Glowing with intense desire).

Is there, in the deepest grove,
Shelter from the beams of love?

ANACREON.

ODE XXXIII. IMITATED.

To the Swallow.

Soon as summer glads the sky,
Hither, gentle bird, you fly;
And with golden sunshine blest,
Build your pretty plaster'd nest.

When the seasons cease to smile,
(Wing'd for Memphis or the Nile)
Charming bird, you disappear
'Till the kind succeeding year.

Like the swallow, love, depart!
Respite for a while my heart.

No, he'll never leave his nest,
Tyrant tenant of my breast!
There a thousand wishes try
On their callow wings to fly;
There you may a thousand tell,
Pertly peeping through a shell:

In a state unfinish'd, rise
Thousands of a smaller size.

'Till their noisy chirpings cease,
Never shall my heart have peace.

Feather'd ones the younglings feed,
'Till mature they're fit to breed;
Then, to swell the crowded store,
They produce their thousands more
Nor can mighty numbers count
In my breast their vast amount.

THE PICTURE:

A TALE.

A PORTRAIT, at my lord's command,
Completed by a curious hand:

For dabblers in the nice Vertù
His lordship set the piece to view,
Bidding their connoisseurships tell,
Whether the work was finish'd well,
Why—says the loudest, on my word,

'Tis not a likeness, good my lord;
Nor, to be plain, for speak I must,
Can I pronounce one feature just,

Another effort strait was made,
Another portraiture essay'd;
The judges were again besought,
Each to deliver what he thought.

Worse than the first—the critics bawl;
O what a mouth! how monstrous small!

Look at the cheeks—how lank and thin!
See, what a most prepost'rous chin!

After remonstrance made in vain,
I'll, says the painter, once again,
(If my good lord vouchsafes to sit)

Try for a more successful hit:

If you'll to-morrow deign to call,
We'll have a piece to please you all.

To-morrow comes—a picture's plac'd
Before those spurious sons of taste—

In their opinions all agree,
This is the vilest of the three.

"Know—to confute your envious pride,
(His lordship from the canvas cry'd)

"Know—that it is my real face,

"Where you could no resemblance trace:

"I've try'd you by a lucky trick,

"And prov'd your genius to the quick.

"Void of all judgment—justice—sense,

"Out—ye pretending varlets—hence."

The connoisseurs depart in haste,
Despis'd—detected—and disgrac'd.

THE WITCH.

A TALE.

A WITCH, that from her ebon chair,
Could hurl destruction through the air,

Or, at her all commanding will,
Make the tumultuous ocean still:

Once, by an incantation fell,
(As the recording druids tell)

Pluck'd the round moon, whose radiant light

Silver'd the sober noon of night,

From the domain she held above,

Down to a dark, infernal grove.

Give me, the goddess cry'd, a cause,
Why you disturb my sacred laws?
Look at my train,—yon wand'ring host!
See how the trembling stars are lost!
Through the celestial regions wide,
Why do they range without a guide!
Chaos, from our confusion, may
Hope for his old detested sway.

I'm, says the witch, severely cross'd,
Know that my fav'rite squirrel's lost,
Search—for I'll have creation torn,
If he's not found before the morn.

Soon as the impious charge was giv'n—
From the tremendous stores of heav'n,
Jove with a bolt—revengeful!—red!
Struck the detested monster dead.

If there are slaves to pity blind,
With power enough to plague mankind,
That for their own nefarious ends,
Tread upon freedom and her friends,
Let 'em beware the witch's fate!
When their presumption's at the height,
Jove will his angry powers assume,
And the curs'd miscreants meet their doom.

REPUTATION.

AN ALLEGORY.

To travel far as the wide world extends,
Seeking for objects that deserv'd their care,
Virtue set forth, with two selected friends,
Talent refin'd, and Reputation fair.

As they went on in their intended round,
Talent spoke first, "My gentle comrades, say
"Where each of you may probably be found,
"Should accident divide us on the way.
"If torn (she added) from my lov'd allies,
"A friendly patronage I hope to find,
"Where the fine arts from cultivation rise,
"And the sweet muse hath harmonized man-
"kind."

Says Virtue, "Did sincerity appear,
"Or meek-ey'd charity among the great;
"Could I find courtiers from corruption clear,
" 'Tis among these I'd seek for my retreat.
"Could I find patriots, for the public weal
"Affiduous, and without their selfish views;
"Could I find priests of undissembled zeal,
" 'Tis among those my residence I'd choose.
"In glitt'ring domes let luxury reside;
"I must be found in some sequester'd cell,
"Far from the paths of avarice or pride, [dwell."
"Where home-bred happiness delights to
"Ye may be trac'd, my gentle friends, 'tis true,
"But who (says Reputation) can explore
"My slipp'ry steps?—Keep, keep me in your
"view,
"If I'm once lost, you'll never find me more."

THE ROSE AND BUTTERFLY.

A FABLE.

At day's early dawn a gay butterfly spied
A budding young rose, and he wish'd her his bride:

She blush'd when she heard him his passion declare
And tenderly told him—he need not despair.
Their faith was soon plighted, as lovers will do,
He swore to be constant she vow'd to be true.
It had not been prudent to deal with delay,
The bloom of a rose passes quickly away,
And the pride of a butterfly dies in a day. }
When wedded, away the wing'd gentleman hies,
From flow'ret to flow'ret he wantonly flies;
Nor did he revisit his bride, 'till the sun
Had less than one fourth of his journey to run.
The rose thus reproach'd him—'Already so cold!
'How feign'd, O you false one, the passion you
'told! [hours;
' 'Tis an age since you left me:' she meant a few
But such we'll suppose the fond language of flowers:
'I saw when you gave the base violet a kiss:
'How—how could you stoop to a meanness like
'this?
'Shall a low, little wretch, whom we roses despise,
'Find favour, O love! in my butterfly's eyes?
'On a tulip, quite tawdry, I saw your fond rape,
'Nor yet could the pitiful primrose escape:
'Dull daffodils too, were with ardour address'd,
'And poppies ill-scented, you kindly caress'd.
The coxcomb was piqu'd, and reply'd with a sneer,
'That you're first to complain, I commend you,
'my dear!
'But know, from your conduct my maxims I drew,
'And if I'm inconstant, I copy from you.
'I saw the boy zephyrus rifle your charms,
'I saw how you simper'd and smil'd in his arms;
'The honey-bee kiss'd you, you cannot disown,
'You favour'd besides—O dishonour—a drone;
'Yet worse—'tis a crime that you must not deny,
'Your sweets were made common, false rose, to
'a fly.'

MORAL.

This law, long ago, did love's providence make,
That ev'ry coquette should be curs'd with a rake.

THE SHEEP AND THE BRAMBLE-BUSH.

A FABLE.

A THICK-TWISTED brake, in the time of a storm,
Seem'd kindly to cover a sheep:
So snug, for a while, he lay shelter'd and warm,
It quietly sooth'd him asleep.

The clouds are now scatter'd—the winds are at peace;

The sheep to his pasture inclin'd:
But ah! the fell thicket lays hold of his fleece,
His coat is left forfeit behind.

My friend, who the thicket of law never try'd,
Consider before you get in; [slide,
Though judgment and sentence are pass'd on your
By Jove you'll be fleec'd to the skin.

THE FOX AND THE CAT.

A FABLE.

The fox and the cat, as they travell'd one day,
With moral discourses cut shorter the way:

'Tis great (says the fox) to make justice our guide!

'How godlike is mercy!' Grimalkin reply'd.
Whilst thus they proceeded,--a wolf from the wood,

Impatient of hunger, and thirsting for blood,
Rush'd forth--as he saw the dull shepherd asleep,
And seiz'd for his supper an innocent sheep.

'In vain, wretched victim, for mercy you bleat,
'When mutton's at hand (says the wolf), I must eat.'

Grimalkin's astonish'd,--the fox stood aghast,
To see the fell beast at his bloody repast.

'What a wretch (says the cat)---'tis the vilest of brutes:

Does he feed upon flesh, when there's herbage,
'---and roots?' [good,

Cries the fox--'While our oaks give us acorns so
'What a tyrant is this, to spill innocent blood?'

Well, onward they march'd, and they moraliz'd still, [a mill;

Till they came where some poultry pick'd chaff by
Sly Reynard sarvey'd them with gluttonous eyes,
And made (spite of morals) a pullet his prize.

A mouse too, that chanc'd from her covert to
The greedy Grimalkin secur'd as her prey. [stray,

A spider that sat in her web on the wall,
Perceiv'd the poor victims, and pity'd their fall;
She cry'd---'Of such murders how guiltless am I!
So ran to regale on a new taken fly.

MORAL.

The faults of our neighbours with freedom we blame,

But tax not ourselves, though we practise the same.

HYMEN.

WHEN Chloe, with a blush comply'd,
To be the fond Nicander's bride,
His wild imagination ran
On raptures never known by man.
How high the tides of fancy swell,
Expression must despair to tell.

A painter call'd,--Nicander cries,
'Descending from the radiant skies,
'Draw me a bright, a beauteous boy,
'The herald of connubial joy!
'Draw him with all peculiar care,
'Make him beyond Adonis fair;
'Give to his cheeks a roseate hue,
'Let him have eyes of heav'nly blue,
'Lips soft'ning in nectarious dew;
'A lustre o'er his charms display,
'More glorious than the beams of day.
'Expect, Sir, if you can succeed,
'A premium for a prince indeed.'

His talents streight the painter try'd,
And ere the nuptial knot was ty'd,
A picture in the noblest taste
Before the fond Nicander plac'd.

The lover thus arraign'd his skill,
'Your execution's monstrous ill!
'A different form my fancy made;
'You're quite a bungler at the trade.
'Where is the robe's luxuriant flow?
'Where is the cheek's celestial glow?

'Where are the looks so fond and free?

'Tis not an Hymen, Sir, for me.'

The painter bow'd--with this reply,

'My colours an't, your honour, dry;

'When time has mellow'd ev'ry tint,

'I'll please you--or the deuce is in't:

'I'll watch the happy change, and then

'Attend you with my piece again.'

In a few months the painter came

With a performance--(still the same):

'Take it away,'--the husband cry'd,

'I have repeated cause to chide:

'Sir, you should all excesses shun;

'This is a picture overdone!

'There's too much ardour in that eye,

'The tincture on the cheeks too high!

'The robes have a lascivious play,

'The attitude's too loosely gay.

'Friend, on the whole, this piece, for me,

'Is too luxuriant--far too free.'

The painter thus--'The faults you find

'Are form'd in your capricious mind;

'To passion a devoted slave,

'The first directions, Sir, you gave;

'Possession has repell'd the flame,

'Nor left a sentiment the same.

'My picture is design'd to prove

'The changes of precarious love.

'On the next stair-case rais'd on high,

'Regard it with a curious eye;

'As to the first steps you proceed,

'Tis an accomplish'd piece indeed!

'But as you mount some paces higher,

'Is there a grace that don't expire?'

So various is the human mind,

Such are the frailties of mankind,

What at a distance charm'd our eyes,

After attainment--droops--and dies.

FORTUNE.

AN APOLOGUE.

Fabula Narratur.

JOVE and his senators, in sage debate
For man's felicity, were settling laws,
When a rude roar that shook the sacred gate,
Turn'd their attention to inquire the cause.

A long ear'd wretch, the loudest of his race,

In the rough garniture of grief array'd,

Came brawling to the high imperial place,

'Let me have justice, Jupiter!'--he bray'd.

'I am an ass, of innocence allow'd

'The type, yet fortune persecutes me still:

'While foxes, wolves, and all the murr'd ring

'crowd,

'Beneath her patronage can rob and kill,

'The pamper'd horse (he never toil'd so hard!)

'Favour and friendship from his owner finds;

'For endless diligence--(a rough reward!)

'I'm cudgel'd by a race of paltry hinds.

'On wretched provender compell'd to feed!

'The rugged pavement ev'ry night my bed!

'For me, dame fortune never yet decreed

'The gracious comforts of a well-thatch'd shed.

"Rough and unseemly's my irreverent hide!
 "Where can I visit, thus uncouthly drest?
 "That outside elegance the dame deny'd,
 "For which her fav'rites are too oft carels'd.
 "To suff'ring virtue, sacred Jove, be kind!
 "From fortune's tyranny pronounce me free!
 "She's a deceiver if she says she's blind,
 "She sees, propitiously fees all—but me."
 The plaintiff could articulate no more:
 His bosom heav'd a most tremendous groan!
 The race of long ear'd wretches join'd the roar,
 'Till Jove seem'd tott'ring on his high-built throne.
 The monarch, with an all-commanding sound,
 (Deepen'd like thunder through the rounds of space)
 Gave order,—That dame fortune should be found,
 To answer, as she might, the plaintiff's case.
 Soldiers and citizens, a scanty train!
 And lawyers and physicians, fought her cell:
 With many a schoolman—But their search was vain:
 Few can the residence of fortune tell.
 Where the wretch avarice was wont to hide
 His gold, his emeralds, and rubies rare;
 'Twas rumur'd that dame fortune did reside,
 And Jove's ambassadors were posted there.
 Meagre and wan, in tatter'd garments drest,
 A feeble porter at the gate they found:
 Doubled with wretchedness—with age distress'd,
 And on his wrinkled forehead famine frown'd.
 "Mortals avaunt (the trembling spectre cries),
 "Ere you invade those sacred haunts, beware!
 "To guard lord avarice from rude surprise,
 "I am the centinel—my name is care.
 "Doubts, disappointments, anarchy of mind,
 "These are the soldiers that surround his hall:
 "And ev'ry fury that can lash mankind,
 "Rage, rancour, and revenge attend his call.
 "Fortune's gone forth, you seek a wand'ring dame,
 "A settled residence the harlot scorns:
 "Curse on such visitants, she never came,
 "But with a cruel hand she scatter'd thorns!
 "To the green vale, yon sheltring hills sur-
 "round,
 "Go forward, you'll arrive at wisdom's cell:
 "Would you be taught where fortune may be
 "found,
 "None can direct your anxious search so well."
 Forward they went, o'er many a dreary spot:
 (Rough was the road, as if untrod before)
 'Till from the casement of a low-roof'd cot
 Wisdom perceiv'd them, and unbarr'd her door.
 Wisdom, (she knew of fortune but the name)
 Gave to their questions a serene reply:
 "Hither (she said), if e'er that goddess came,
 "I saw her not—she pass'd unnoticed by.
 "Abroad with contemplation oft I roam,
 "And leave to poverty my humble cell:

"She's my domestic, never stirs from home,
 "If fortune has been here, 'tis she can tell.
 "The matron eyes us from yon mantling shade,
 "And see her sober footsteps this way bent!
 "Mark by her side a little rose-lipp'd maid,
 "'Tis my young daughter, and her name's
 "content."
 As poverty advanc'd with lenient grace,
 "Fortune (she cry'd) hath never yet been here;
 "But hope, a gentle neighbour of this place,
 "Tells me, her highness may, in time, appear.
 "Felicity no doubt adorns their lot,
 "On whom her golden bounty beams divine!
 "Yet though she never reach our rustic cot,
 "Patience will visit us—we sha'n't repine."
 After a vast (but unavailing) round,
 The messengers returning in despair,
 On an high hill a fairy mansion found,
 And hop'd the goddess, fortune, might be there.
 The dome, so glitt'ring, it amaz'd the sight,
 ('Twas adamant, with gems encrust'd o'er)
 Had not a casement to admit the light,
 Nor could Jove's deputies descry the door.
 But eager to conclude a tedious chase,
 And anxious to return from whence they came,
 Thrice they invoc'd the genius of the place,
 Thrice utter'd, awfully, Jove's sacred name.
 As echo from the hill announc'd high Jove,
 Illusion and her fairy dome withdrew:
 (Like the light mists by early sunbeams drove)
 And fortune stood reveal'd to public view.
 Oft for that happiness high courts deny'd,
 To this receptacle dame fortune ran:
 When harass'd, it was here she us'd to hide,
 From the wild suits of discontented man.
 Prostrate, the delegates their charge declare,
 (Happy the courtier that salutes her feet!)
 Fortune receiv'd them with a flutt'ring air,
 And join'd them 'till they reach'd Jove's judgment seat.
 Men of all ranks at that illustrious place
 Were gather'd, though different motives keen:
 Many—to see dame fortune's radiant face,
 Many—by radiant fortune to be seen.
 Jove smil'd, as on a fav'rite he esteems,
 He gave her, near his own, a golden seat:
 Fair fortune's an adventurer, it seems,
 The deities themselves are glad to greet.
 "Daughter (says Jupiter), you're sore accus'd!
 "Clamour incessantly reviles your name!
 "If by the rancour of that wretch abus'd,
 "Be confident, and vindicate your fame.
 "Though pester'd daily with complaints from man,
 "Through this conviction I record them not—
 "Let my kind Providence do all it can,
 "None of that species ever lik'd his lot.
 "But the poor quadruped that now appeals!
 "Can wanton cruelty the weak pursue!

' Large is the catalogue of woes he feels,
 " And all his wretchedness he lays to you."
 " Ask him, high Jupiter---(reply'd the dame)
 " In what he has excell'd his long-ear'd clafs?
 " Is fortune (a divinity) to blame
 " That she descends not to regard---an ass?"
 Fame enter'd in her rolls the sage reply;
 The dame, defendant, was discharg'd with grace!
 " Go---(to the plaintiff, said the fire) and try
 " By merit to surmount your low-born race.
 " Learn from the lion to be just and brave,
 " Take from the elephant instruction wise;
 " With gracious breeding like the horse behave,
 " Nor the sagacity of hounds despise.
 " These useful qualities with care imbibe,
 " For which some quadrupeds are justly priz'd:
 " Attain these talents that adorn each tribe,
 " And you'll no longer be a wretch despis'd."

A MAN TO MY MIND.

(WROTE AT THE REQUEST OF A LADY.)

SINCE wedlock's in vogue, and stale virgins de-spis'd, [mis'd;
 To all bachelors greeting, these lines are present a maid that would marry, but where shall I find
 (I wish not for fortune) a man to my mind?

Not the fair-weather fop, fond of fashion and lace;
 Not the 'squire, that can wake to no joys but the chase; [bind:
 Not the free-thinking rake, whom no morals can Neither this---that---nor t'other's the man to my mind.

Not the ruby-fac'd sot, that topos world without end; [friend;
 Not the drone, who can't relish his bottle and Not the fool, that's too fond; nor the churl that's unkind: [mind.
 Neither this---that---nor t'other's the man to my

Not the wretch with full bags, without breeding or merit;
 Not the flash, that's all fury without any spirit;
 Not the fine master fribble, the scorn of mankind:
 Neither this---that---nor t'other's the man to my mind.

But the youth in whom merit and sense may con-
 spire, [admire:
 Whom the brave must esteem, and the fair should
 In whose heart love and truth are with honour
 combin'd:
 'This---this---and no other's the man to my mind.

WITH A PRESENT.

LET not the hand of Amity be nice!
 Nor the poor tribute from the heart disclaim;
 A trifle shall become a pledge of price,
 If friendship stamps it with her sacred name.
 The little rose that laughs upon its stem,
 One of the sweets with which the gardens teem,

In value soars above an eastern gem,
 If tender'd as the token of esteem.
 Had I vast hoards of massy wealth to send,
 Such as your merits might demand---their due!
 Then should the golden tribute of your friend
 Rival the treasures of the rich Peru.

FANCY.

A Song in a Pantomime Entertainment.

FANCY leads the fetter'd senses
 Captives to her fond controul;
 Merit may have rich pretences,
 But 'tis fancy fires the soul.

Far beyond the bounds of meaning
 Fancy flies, a fairy queen?
 Fancy, wit and worth disdaining,
 Gives the prize to harlequin.

If the virgin's false, forgive her,
 Fancy was your only foe:
 Cupid claims the dart and quiver,
 But 'tis fancy twangs the bow.

LOVE AND CHASTITY:

A CANTATA.

RECITATIVE.

FROM the high mount *, whence sacred groves depend,
 Diana and her virgin troop descend;
 And while the buskin'd maids with active care,
 The business of the daily chase prepare,
 A favourite nymph steps forward from the throng,
 And thus, exulting, swells the jovial song.

AIR.

Jolly health springs aloft at the loud sounding horn,
 Unlock'd from soft slumber's embrace;
 And joy sings an hymn to salute the sweet morn,
 That smiles on the nymphs of the chase:
 The rage of fell Cupid no bosom profanes,
 No rancour disturbs our delight,
 All the day with fresh vigour we sweep o'er the plains,
 And sleep with contentment all night.

RECITATIVE.

Their clamour rous'd the slighted god of love:
 He flies, indignant, to the sacred grove:
 Immortal myrtles wreath his golden hair,
 His rosy wings perfume the wanton air;
 Two quivers fill'd with darts his fell designs declare.

A crimson blush o'erspread Diana's face,
 A frown succeeds---She stops the springing chase,
 And thus, forbids the boy the consecrated place.

AIR.

Fond disturber of the heart,
 From these sacred shades depart:
 Here's a blooming troop disdains
 Love, and his fantastic chains.

* Mount Latmos.

Sisters of the silver bow,
Pure and chaste as virgin snow,
Melt not at thy feeble fires,
Wanton god of wild desires!

RECITATIVE.

Rage and revenge divide love's little breast,
Whilst thus the angry goddess he address:

AIR.

Virgin snow does oft remain
Long unmelted on the plain,
Till the glorious god of day
Smiles, and wastes its pride away.
What is Sol's meridian fire
To the darts of strong desire!
Love can light a raging flame
Hotter than his noontide beam.

RECITATIVE.

Now, through the forest's brown embower'd
ways,

With careless steps the young Endymion strays:
His form erect!—loose flows his lovely hair,
His glowing cheeks like youthful Hebe's fair!
His graceful limbs with ease and vigour move,
His eyes—his ev'ry feature form'd for love:
Around the list'ning woods attentive hung,
Whilst thus, invoking sleep, the shepherd sung:

AIR.

Where the pebbled streamlet glides
Near the wood nymph's rustic grot,
If the god of sleep resides,
Or in Pan's sequester'd cot:
Hither if he'll lightly tread,
Follow'd by a gentle dream,
We'll enjoy this grassy bed,
On the bank beside the stream.

RECITATIVE.

As on the painted turf the shepherd lies,
Sleep's downy curtain shades his lovely eyes;
And now a sporting breeze his bosom shows,
As marble smooth, and white as Alpine snows:
The goddess gaz'd, in magic softness bound;
Her silver bow falls useless to the ground!
Love laugh'd, and, sure of conquest, wing'd a dart
Unerring, to her undefended heart.
She feels in ev'ry vein the fatal fire,
And thus persuades her virgins to retire:

AIR.

Ye tender maids be timely wise!
Love's wanton fury shun!
In flight alone your safety lies,
The daring are undone!

Do blue-ey'd doves, serenely mild,
With vultures, fell, engage!
Do lambs provoke the lion wild,
Or tempt the tyger's rage!

No, no, like fawns, ye virgins fly,
To secret cells remove;
Nor dare the doubtful combat try
'Twixt chastity and love.

AMPHITRION.

RECITATIVE.

AMPHITRION and his bride, a godlike pair!
He brave as Mars, and she as Venus fair;

On thrones of gold in purple triumph plac'd,
With matchless splendour held the nuptial feast:
Whilst the high roof with loud applauses rung,
Enraptur'd, thus, the happy hero sung:

AIR.

Was mighty Jove descending,
In all his wrath divine,
Enrag'd at my pretending
To call this charmer mine:
His shafts of bolted thunder
With boldness I'd deride;
Not heav'n itself can sunder
The hearts that love has ty'd.

RECITATIVE.

The thunderer heard,—he look'd with vengeance down
Till beauty's glance disarm'd his awful frown.
The magic impulse of Alcmena's eyes
Compell'd the conquer'd god to quit his skies;
He feign'd the husband's form, possess'd her
charms,
And punish'd his presumption in her arms.

AIR.

He deserves sublimest pleasure,
Who reveals it not, when won:
Beauty's like the miser's treasure;
Boast it—and the fool's undone!
Learn by this, unguarded lover,
When your secret sighs prevail,
Not to let your tongue discover
Raptures that you should conceal.

ANACREON.

ODE XIX. IMITATED.

OLD earth, when in a tipling vein,
Drinks torrents of ambrosial rain,
Which the tall trees, by heat oppress'd,
Drink from her kind maternal breast:

Lest angry ocean should be dry,
The river gods their stores supply:
The monarch of the glowing day
Drinks large potations from the sea:
And the pale empress of the night
Drinks from his orb propitious light:
All—all things drink—abstemious sage!
Why should not we our thirst assuage?

NEWCASTLE BEER.

WHEN fame brought the news of Great-Britain's success,

And told at Olympus each Gallic defeat;
Glad Mars sent by Mercury orders express,
To summon the deities all to a treat:

Blithe Comus was plac'd
To guide the gay feast,
And freely declar'd there was choice of good cheer;
Yet vow'd to his thinking,
For exquisite drinking,
Their nectar was nothing to Newcastle beer.

The great god of war, to encourage the fun,
And humour the taste of his whimsical guest,

Sent a message that moment to Moor's* for a tun
Of stingo, the stoutest, the brightest, and best :
No gods—they all swore,
Regal'd so before,

With liquor so lively, so potent, and clear :
And each deified fellow
Got jovially mellow,

In honour, brave boys, of our Newcastle beer.

Apollo perceiv'ing his talents refine,
Repents he drank Helicon water so long :
He bow'd, being ask'd by the musical nine,
And gave the gay board an extempore song :

But ere he began,

He tof'd off his can :

There's nought like good liquor the fancy to clear :

Then sang with great merit,

The flavour and spirit

His godship had found in our Newcastle beer.

'Twas stingo like this made Alcides so bold,

It brac'd up his nerves, and enliven'd his pow'rs ;

And his mystical club, that did wonders of old,

Was nothing, my lads, but such liquor as ours.

The horrible crew

That Hercules slew,

Were poverty, calumny, trouble, and fear :

Such a club would you borrow,

To drive away sorrow,

Apply for a jorum of Newcastle beer.

Ye youngsters, so diffident, languid, and pale,

Whom love, like the cholic, so rudely infests ;

Take a cordial of this, 'twill probatum prevail,

And drive the cur Cupid away from your breasts :

Dull whining despise,

Grow rosy and wise,

Nor longer the jest of good fellows appear ;

Bid adieu to your folly,

Get drunk, and be jolly,

And smoke o'er a tankard of Newcastle beer.

Ye fanciful folk, for whom physic prescribes,

Who bolus and potion have harass'd to death !

Ye wretches, whom law and her ill-looking tribes

Have hunted about till you're quite out of breath !

Here's shelter and ease,

No craving for fees,

No danger, no doctor, no bailiff is near !

Your spirits this raises,

It cures your diseases,

There's freedom and health in our Newcastle beer.

THE TOAST.

A CATCH.

GIVE the toast—my good fellow, be jovial and gay,
And let the brisk moments pass jocund away !

Here's the king—take your bumpers, my brave
British souls,

Who guards your fair freedom should crown your full bowls, [down,

Let him live—long and happy, see Lewis brought

And taste all the comforts, no cares of a crown.

* Moor's, at the sign of the Sun, Newcastle.

A THREE-PART CATCH.

'Tis in view—(the rich blessing kind nature beflow'd,

To conquer our sorrows, or lighten the load)

A full flask!—the rich nectar this bottle contains

In a flood of fresh rapture shall roll through our veins.

Let it bleed—and carousing this liquor divine,

Sing an hymn to the god that first cultur'd the vine.

ON SIR W—B—T'S BIRTH-DAY.

Does true felicity on grandeur wait ?

Delights she in the pageantry of show ?

Say, can the glitt'ring gewgaws of the great

An hour of inborn happiness bestow ?

He that is just, benevolent, humane,

In conscious rectitude supremely blest,

O'er the glad hearts of multitudes shall reign,

Though the gay star ne'er blaz'd upon his breast.

Ye happy children of the hoary north,

Hail the glad day that saw your patron born ;

Whose private virtues, and whose public worth,

Might the rich seats of royalty adorn.

STANZAS

Spoken at a Play at the Theatre in Sunderland, for the benefit of the Corsicans.

Who can behold with an unpitying eye

The glorious few (with patriotic fire)

Distrest, invaded, and resolv'd to die,

Or keep their independant rights entire ?

Shackled themselves, the servile Gauls would bind,

In their ignoble fetters, half mankind.

The gentle homage that, to-night, you've paid

To freedom, and her ever sacred laws,

The humble off'ring at her altar made,

Prove that your hearts beat nobly in her cause.

All-gracious freedom, O vouchsafe to smile,

Through future ages, on this favourite isle !

Far may the boughs of liberty expand,

For ever cultur'd by the brave and free !

For ever blasted be that impious hand,

That lops one branch from this illustrious tree !

Britons!—'tis yours to make her verdure thrive,

And keep the roots of liberty alive.

O may her rich, her ripening fruits of gold,

Britannia, bloom perpetually for thee !

May you ne'er want a dragon, as we're told

Defended once the fam'd Hesperian tree !

A dragon fix'd, for your imperial sake,

With anxious eyes, eternally awake.

THE RESPITE :

A PASTORAL.

Ah, what is't to me that the grasshopper sings !

Or what, that the meadows are fair !

That (like little flow'rets, if mounted on wings)

The butterflies flaunt it in air !

Ye birds, I'll no longer attend to a lay;
Your haunts in the forest resign!
Shall you, with your true loves, be happy all day,
Whilst I am divided from mine?

Where woodbines and willows inclin'd to unite,
We twist'd a blooming alcove;
And oft has my Damon, with smiles of delight,
Declar'd it the mantle of love.
The roses that crept to our mutual recess,
And rested among the sweet boughs,
Are faded—they droop—and they cannot do less,
For Damon is false to his vows.

This oak has for ages the tempest defy'd,
We call it—the king of the grove;
He swore, a light breeze should its centre divide,
When he was not true to his love:
Come, come, gentle zephyr, in justice descend,
His falsehood you're bound to display;
This oak and its honours you'll easily rend,
For Damon has left me—a day.

The shepherd rush'd forth from behind the thick tree,
Prepar'd to make Phillida blest,
And clasping the maid, from an heart full of glee,
The cause of his absence confess:
High raptures, 'twas told him by masters in love,
Too often repeated, would cloy; [prove,
And respites—he found were the means to im-
And lengthen the moments of joy.

AN IRREGULAR ODE ON MUSIC.

CEASE, gentle sounds, nor kill me quite
With such excess of sweet delight!
Each trembling note invades my heart,
And thrills through ev'ry vital part;
A soft, a pleasing pain
Pursues my heated blood through ev'ry vein;
What, what does the enchantment mean?
Ah, give the charming magic o'er.
My beating heart can bear no more!

Now wild with fierce desire,
My breast is all on fire!
In soften'd raptures now I die!
Can empty sound such joys impart!
Can music thus transport the heart,
With melting ecstacy!
O art divine! exalted blessing!
Each celestial charm expressing!
Kindest gift the gods bestow!
Sweetest good that mortals know!
When seated in a verdant shade
(Like tuneful Thyrsis) Orpheus play'd;
The distant trees forsake the wood,
The list'ning beasts neglect their food,
To hear the heav'nly sound;
The dryads leave the mountains,
The naiades quit the fountains,
And in a sprightly chorus dance around.
To raise the stately walls of ancient Troy,
Sweet Phœbus did his tuneful harp employ;
See what soft harmony can do!
The moving rocks the sound pursue,
Till in a large collected mass they grew:

Had Thyrsis liv'd in these remoter days,
His were the chaplet of immortal bays!
Apollo's harp unknown!
The shepherd had remain'd of song
The deity alone.

FROM A TRUANT TO HIS FRIENDS.

'Tis not in cells, or a sequester'd cot,
The mind and morals properly expand;
Let youth step forward to a busier spot,
Led by discretion's cool, conducting hand.

To learn some lessons from the schools of man,
(Forgive me)! I forsook my darling home;
Not from a light, an undigested plan,
Nor from a youthful appetite to roam.

In your affections—(let resentment fly)!
Restore me to my long-accustom'd place;
Receive me with a kind, forgiving eye,
And press me in the parent's fond embrace.

TO THE AUTHOR OF POEMS,

WRITTEN BY NOBODY*.

ADVANCE to fame—advance reveal'd!
Let conscious worth be bold:
Why have you lain so long conceal'd,
And hid Peruvian gold?

Dan Phœbus did with joy discern
Your genius brought to light:
And many a Somebody should learn,
From Nobody to write.

A BIRTH-DAY ODE:

PERFORMED AT THE CASTLE OF DUBLIN.

RECITATIVE.

HARK! how the soul of music reigns,
As when the first great birth of nature sprung,
When chaos burst his massy chains,
'Twas thus the cherubs sung:

AIR.

Hail, hail, from this auspicious morn
Shall British glories rise!
Now are the mighty treasures born,
That shall Britannia's fame adorn,
And lift her to the skies.

RECITATIVE.

Let George's mighty banners spread,
His lofty clarions roar;
Till warlike echo fills with dread
The hostile Gallic shore.

AIR.

Mark, how his name with terror fills!
The magic sound rebellion kills,
And brightens all the northern hills,
Where pallid treasons dwell;
The monster shall no more arise,
Upon the ground she panting lies!
Beneath his William's foot she dies,
And now she sinks to hell.

* J. Robertson, an actor belonging to the York Company.

RECITATIVE.

Haste—let Ierne's harp be newly strung,
And after mighty George be William sung.

AIR.

Talk no more of Grecian glory,
William stands the first in story:
He, with British ardour glows!
See, the pride of Gallia fading!
See, the youthful warrior leading
Britons, vengeful, to their foes!

RECITATIVE.

Fair is the olive branch Hibernia boasts,
Nor shall the din of war disturb her coasts;
While Stanhope smiles, her sons are blest,
In native loyalty confest!

AIR.

See—O see, thrice happy isle!
See what gracious George bestow'd;
Twice * have you seen a Stanhope smile,
These are gifts become a God!

How the grateful island glows!
Stanhope's name shall be rever'd:
Whilst by subjects, and by foes,
Sacred George is lov'd and fear'd.

CHORUS.

Like Persians to the rising sun,
Respectful homage pay;
At George's birth our joys begun:
Salute the glorious day!

THE BROKEN CHINA.

Soon as the sun began to peep,
And gild the morning skies,
Young Chloe from disorder'd sleep
Unveil'd her radiant eyes.

A guardian sylph, the wanton sprite
That waited on her still,
Had teaz'd her all the tedious night
With visionary ill.

Some shock of fate is surely nigh,
Exclaim'd the tim'rous maid:
What do these horrid dreams imply!
My Cupid can't be dead!

She call'd her Cupid by his name,
In dread of some mishap;
Wagging his tail, her Cupid came,
And jump'd into her lap.

And now the best of brittle ware,
Her sumptuous table grac'd!
The gentle emblems of the fair,
In beauteous order plac'd!

The kettle boil'd, and all prepar'd
To give the morning treat,
When Dick, the country beau appear'd,
And bowing, took his seat.

Well—chatting on, of that and this,
The maid revers'd her cup;
And tempted by the forfeit kiss,
The bumpkin turn'd it up.

* Earl of Chesterfield, and Earl of Harrington, both successively Lords Lieutenants of Ireland.

With transport he demands the prize;
Right fairly it was won!
With many a frown the fair denies:
Fond baits to draw him on!

A man must prove himself polite,
In such a case as this;
So Richard strives with all his might
To force the forfeit kiss.

But as he strove—O dire to tell!
(And yet with grief I must)
The table turn'd—the china fell,
A heap of painted dust!

O fatal purport of my dream!
The fair afflicted, cry'd,
Occasion'd (I confess my shame)
By childishness and pride!

For in a kiss, or two, or three,
No mischief could be found!
Then had I been more frank and free,
My china had been found.

TO MR. ———.

Yes, Colin, 'tis granted, you flutter in lace,
You whisper and dance with the fair;
But merit advances, 'tis yours to give place;
Stand off, and at distance revere:
Nor tease the sweet maid with your jargon of chat,
By her side as you saunter along;
Your taste—your complexion—your this—and your that,
Nor lisp out the end of your song.

For folly and fashion you barter good sense,
(If sense ever fell to your share)
'Tis enough you could pert petit maitre commence,
Laugh—loiter—and lie with an air.
No end you can answer, affections you've none,
Made only for prattle and play;
Like a butterfly, bask'd for a while in the sun,
You'll die undistinguish'd away.

ON THE LATE ABSENCE OF MAY.

Written in the Year 1771.

THE rooks in the neighbouring grove
For shelter cry all the long day;
Their huts in the branches above
Are cover'd no longer by May:
The birds, that so cheerfully sung,
Are silent, or plaintive each tone!
And, as they chirp, low, to their young,
I he want of their goddess bemoan.

No daisies, on carpets of green,
O'er nature's cold bosom are spread!
Not a sweet-briar sprig can be seen,
To finish this wreath for my head:
Some flow'rets, indeed may be found,
But these neither blooming nor gay;
The fairest still sleep in the ground,
And wait for the coming of May.

December, perhaps, has purloin'd
Her rich, though fantastical geer;
With envy the months may have join'd,
And jostled her out of the year:

Some shepherds, 'tis true, may repine,
To see their lov'd gardens undrest,
But I—whilst my Philida's mine,
Shall always have May in my breast.

AN EULOGIUM ON MASONRY.

SPOKE BY MR. DIGGS, AT EDINBURGH.

SAY, can the garter, or the star of state,
That on the vain, or on the vicious wait,
Such emblems, with such emphasis impart,
As an insignium near the Mason's heart?
Hail sacred Masonry, of source divine,
Unerring mistress of the faultless line,
Whose plumb of truth, with never-failing sway,
Makes the join'd parts of symmetry obey!
Hail to the craft, at whose serene command
The gentle arts in glad obedience stand;
Whose magic stroke bids fell confusion cease,
And to the finish'd orders yield its place;
Who calls creation from the womb of earth,
And gives imperial cities glorious birth.
To works of art her merit's not confin'd,
She regulates the morals, squares the mind;
Corrects with care the tempest-working soul,
And points the tide of passions where to roll;
On virtue's tablets marks each sacred rule,
And forms her lodge an universal school;
Where nature's mystic laws unfolded stand,
And sense and science, join'd, go hand in hand.
O! may her social rules instructive spread,
Till truth erect her long-neglected head;
Till, through deceitful night she dart her ray,
And beam, full glorious, in the blaze of day!
Till man by virtuous maxims learn to move;
Till all the peopled world her laws approve,
And the whole human race be bound in brother's love.

A PROLOGUE,

Spoke at the opening of the Theatre at York, after it was elegantly enlarged.

ONCE on a time his earthly rounds patrolling,
(Your heathen gods were always fond of strolling)
Jove rambled near the cot of kind Philemon,
When night, attended by a tempest, came on;
And as the rain fell pattering, helter skelter,
The deity implor'd the hind for shelter.
Philemon plac'd his godship close beside him,
While goody Baucis made the fire that dry'd him;
With more benevolence than one that's richer,
He spread the board, he fill'd the friendly pitcher;
And, fond to give his guest a meal of pleasure,
Sung a rough song, in his rude country measure.
Jove was so pleas'd with these good-natur'd fallies,
Philemon's cot he conjur'd to a palace.
Taste, like great Jupiter, came here to try us,
(Oft from the boxes we perceiv'd her spy us)
Whether she lik'd us and our warm endeavours,
Whether she found that we deserv'd her favours,
I know not: But 'tis certain she commanded
Our humble theatre should be expanded.

The orders she pronounc'd were scarcely ended,
But, like Philemon's house, the stage extended:
And thus the friendly goddess bids me greet ye;
'Tis in that circle [pointing to the boxes] she designs
to meet ye:
Pedants would fix her residence with heathens,
But she prefers old York to Rome or Athens.

A PROLOGUE,

Spoke at the opening an elegant Little Theatre at Whitby.

FROM Shakspeare---Johnson---Congreve---Rowe
---and others---

The laurel'd list, the true Parnassian brothers!
Hither we're sent, by their supreme direction,
To court your favour, and to claim protection.
Our hopes are flatter'd with the fair's compliance;
Beauty and wit were always in alliance!
Their mutual sway reforms the rude creation,
And taste's determin'd by their approbation.
The tragic muse presents a stately mirror,
Where vice surveys her ugly form with terror:
And as the fiend departs---abash'd---discarded---
Imperial virtue's with the palm rewarded.
The comic glass, from modern groupes collected,
Shows fops and fools of every class---dissected:
It marks the fair coquette's unfaithful dealings,
And proves that haughty prudes may have their failings.
For faults that flow from habit more than nature,
We'll blend, with honest mirth, some wholesome satire.
Now for our bark---the vessel's tight and able!
New built---new rigg'd!--- [Pointing to the scenes]
with canvas---mast---and cable!
Let her not sink,---or be unkindly stranded,
Before the moral freight be fairly landed!
For though with heart and hand we heave together,
[ther:]
'Tis your kind plaudit must command the wea-
Nor halcyon seas,---nor gentle gales attend us,
'Till this fair circle with their smiles befriend us.

A PROLOGUE,

On opening the Theatre at Whitby the ensuing Season.

O'ER the wild waves, unwilling more to roam,
And by his kind affections call'd for home;
When the bold youth that ev'ry climate tries
'Twixt the blue bosoms---'Twixt the seas and skies---
When he beholds his native Albion near,
And the glad gale gives wings to his career,
What glowing ecstasies, by fancy drest,
What filial sentiments expand his breast!
In the full happiness he forms on shore,
Doubts---dangers---and fatigues are felt no more.
Such are the joys that in our bosoms burn!
Such the glad hopes that glow at our return!
With such warm ardours you behold us meet,
To lay, once more, our labours at your feet.
(Not without hopes your patronage will last)
We bend with gratitude for favours past.

That our light bark defy'd the rage of winter,
Rode ev'ry gale---nor started ev'n a splinter;
We bow to beauty---('twas those smiles secur'd her)

And thank our patrons who so kindly moor'd her.
Still---still---extend your gentle cares to save her,
That she may anchor long in Whitby's---favour.

A PROLOGUE,

*Spoke in the character of a Sailor, on opening the New

[Without.]
HOLLO! my masters, where d'ye mean to stow us?
We're come to see what pastime ye can show us;
Sal, step aloft---you shan't be long without me,
I'll walk their quarter deck and look about me.

[Enters.]
Tom and Dick Topfail are above---I hear 'em,
Tell 'em to keep a birth, and Sal---sit near 'em:
Sal's a smart lass---I'd hold a but of stingo
In three weeks' time she'd learn the playhouse
lingo:

She loves your plays, she understands their mean-
She calls 'em---moral rules made entertaining:
Your Shakspeare books, she knows 'em to a tittle;
And I, myself (at sea) have read---a little.

At London, Sirs, when Sal and I were courting,
I tow'd her ev'ry night a playhouse sporting:
Mafs! I could like 'em and their whole 'paratus,
But for their fiddlers and their damn'd sonatas;
Give me the merry sons of guts and rosin, I'll
That play---God save the King, and Nancy Dawson.

[Looking about.]
Well---though the frigate's not so much bedoyzen'd,

'Tis snug enough!---'Tis clever for the size on't:
And they can treat with all that's worth regarding

On board the Drury-Lane or Common-Garden.

[Bell rings.]
Avast!---A signal for the launch, I fancy:
* What say you Sam, and Dick, and Doll, and Nancy,

Since they have trimm'd the pleasure-barge so tightly,

[ly]
Shan't you, and I, and Sal, come see them night-
The jolly crew will do their best endeavours,
They'll grudge no labour to deserve your favours.
A luckier fate they swear can ne'er behap 'em
Than to behold you pleas'd, and hear you---clap
'em.

AN EPILOGUE,

Spoke at Norwich, in the character of Mrs. Deborah Woodcock, in Love in a Village.

AFTER the dangers of a long probation,
When Sybil like, she's skill'd in penetration;
When she has conquer'd each unruly passion,
And rides above the rocks that others dash on;
When deeply mellow'd with reserve and rigour;
When decent gravity adorns her figure,

* To the gallery.

Why an old maid, I wish the wife would tell us,
Should be the standing jest of flirts and fellows!

In maxims sage! in eloquence how clever!
Without a subject she can talk---for ever!

Rich in old saws can bring a sentence pat in,
And quote upon occasion, lawyer's Latin.

Set up that toast, that culprit, nobis corum,
'Tis done---and she's demolish'd in turrorum.

If an old maid's a dragons on duty,
To guard the golden fruit of ripening beauty;
'Tis right, for fear the giddy sex should wander,
To keep them in restraint by decent slander.

When slips are made, 'tis easy sure to find 'em;
We can detect before the fair design'd them.

As for the men, whose satire oft hath stung us,
Many there are that may be rank'd among us.
Law, with long suits and busy mischiefs laden,
In rancour far exceeds the ancient maiden.

'Tis undeny'd, and the assertion's common,
That modern physie is a mere old woman.

The puny sop that simpers o'er his tea dish,
And cries---indeed---Miss Deb'rah's---quite old maidish!

Of doubtful sex, of undetermin'd nature,
In all respects is but a virgin cvetur.

Jesting apart, and moral truths adjusting!
There's nothing in the state itself disgusting;

Old maids, as well as matrons bound in marriage,
Are valu'd from propriety of carriage:

If gentle sense, if sweet discretion guide 'em,
If matters not though coxcombs may deride 'em;

And virtue's virtue, be she maid or wedded,
A certain truth! say---Deb'rah Woodcock said it.

A PROLOGUE,

TO THE MUSE OF OSSIAN.

A little piece adapted to the Stage, by D. E. Baker, from the celebrated Poem of Ossian, the Son of Fingal.

To form a little work of nervous merit,

To give the sleepy stage a nobler spirit;

To touch a sacred muse, and not defile her,

This was the plan propos'd by our compiler.

Though caution told him---the presumption's glaring!

Dauntless, he cry'd, "It is but nobly daring!"

Can we peruse a pathos more than Attic,

Nor with the golden measure stamp'd dramatic!

Here are no lines---in measur'd pace that trip it,

No modern scene---so lifeless! so insipid!

Wrought by a muse---(no sacred fire debarr'd her)

'Tis nervous! noble! 'tis true northern ardour!

"Methinks I hear the Grecian bards exclaim-
ing,

(The Grecian bards no longer worth the naming)

In song, the northern tribes so far surpass us,

One of their Highland hills they'll call Parnassus;

And from the sacred mount decrees should follow,

That Ossian was himself---the true Apollo."

Spite of this flash---this high poetic fury,

He trembles for the verdict of his jury:

As from his text he ne'er presum'd to wander,

But gives the native Ossian to your candour,

To an impartial judgment we submit him,

Condemn---or rather (if you can) acquit him.

AN EPILOGUE.

TO THE MUSE OF OSSIAN.

In fond romance let fancy reign creative!
 Valour among the northern hills is native;
 The northern hills, 'tis prov'd by Ossian's story,
 Gave early birth to Caledonian glory;
 Nor could the stormy clime, with all its rigour
 Repel, in love or war, the hero's vigour.

When honour call'd, the youth disdain'd to ponder,
 And as he fought, the fav'rite maid grew fonder.
 The brave, by beauty were rejected never,
 For girls are gracious when the lads are clever.

If the bold youth was in the field vindictive,
 The bard, at home, had ev'ry power descriptive;
 He swell'd the sacred song, enhance'd the story,
 And rais'd the warrior to the skies of glory.

That northern lads are still unconquer'd fellows,
 The foes of Britain to their cost can tell us;
 The sway of northern beauty, if disputed,
 Look round, ye infidels, and stand confuted:
 And for your bards, the letter'd world have known
 'em.

They're such---The sacred Ossian can't disown 'em.
 To prove a partial judgment does not wrong
 you,

And that your usual candour reigns among you,
 Look with indulgence on this crude endeavour,
 And stamp it with the sanction of your favour.

AN EPILOGUE.

Spoke in the Character of Lady Torenley, in the Provoked Husband.

At lady--let me recollect--whose night is't?
 No matter--at a circle the politest;
 Taste summons all the satire she is able,
 And canvasses my conduct to the table.

"A wife reclaim'd, and by an husband's rigour!

A wife with all her appetites in vigour!
 Lard! she must make a lamentable figure!

"Where was her pride! of ev'ry spark divested!

To mend, because a prudish husband press'd it!

What! to prefer his dull domestic quiet,

To the dear scenes of hurricane and riot!

Parties disclaim'd, the happy rout rejected!

Because at ten she's by her spouse expected!

Oh hideous! how immensely out of nature!

Don't you, my dears, despise the servile creature?

"Prudence, although the company be good,

Is often heard, and sometimes understood.

Suppose, to justify my reformation,

She'd give the circle this concise oration.

"Ye giddy groupe of fashionable wives,

That in continued riot waste your lives;

Did ye but see the demons that descend,

The cares convulsive that on cards attend;

The midnight spectres that surround your chairs,

(Rage reddens here---there avarice despairs)

You'd rush for shelter where contentment lies,

To the domestic blessings you despise.

"Or if you've no regard to moral duty,
 ('Tis trite but true)---Quadrille will murder beauty."

Taste is abash'd, (the culprit) I'm acquitted,
 They praise the character they lately pity'd;
 They promise to reform---relinquish play,
 So break the tables up at---break of day.

AN EPILOGUE.

Spoke at Edinburgh, in the Character of Lady Fanciful.

FANCY, we're told, of parentage Italic,
 And folly, whose original is Gallic,
 Set up to sale their vast mishapen daughter,
 And Britain, by a large subscription, bought her.

The fertile soil grew fond of this exotic,
 And nurs'd her, till her pow'r became despotic;
 Till ev'ry would-be beauty in the nation
 Did homage at the shrine of affectation.

But common sense will certainly dethrone her,
 And (like the fair ones of this place) disown her.
 If she attempts the dimpled smile delightful!

The dimpled smile of affectation's frightful:
 Mark but her bagatelles---her whine---her whimper---

Her loll---her lisp---her saunter, stare---her simper;
 All outres, all---no native charm about her,
 And ridicule would soon expire without her.

Look for a grace, and affectation hides it;
 If beauty aims an arrow, she misguides it:
 So awkwardly she mends unmeaning faces,
 To insipidity she gives---grimaces.

Without her dear coquettish arts to aid 'em,
 Fine ladies would be just as nature made 'em,
 Such sensible---sincere---domestic creatures,
 The jest of modern belles, and petit maitres.

Safe with good sense, this circle's not in danger
 But as the foreign phantom's---here a stranger,
 I gave her portrait, that the fair may know her,
 And if they meet, be ready to forego her;
 For trust me, ladies, she'd deform your faces,
 And with a single glance destroy the graces.

AN EULOGIUM ON CHARITY.

Spoke at Alnwick, in Northumberland, at a Charitable Benefit Play, 1765.

To bid the rancour of ill-fortune cease,
 To tell anxiety---I give thee peace,
 To quell adversity---or turn her darts,
 To stamp fraternity on gen'rous hearts:
 For these high motives---these illustrious ends,
 Celestial charity to-night descends.

Soft are the graces that adorn the maid,
 Softer than dew-drops to the sun-burnt glade!
 She's gracious as an unpolluted stream,
 And tender as a fond young lover's dream!
 Pity and peace precede her as she flies,
 And mercy beams benignant in her eyes!
 From her high residence, from realms above,
 She comes, sweet harbinger of heavenly love!

* Her sister's charms are more than doubly bright,
From the kind cause that call'd her here to-night.
An artless grace the conscious heart bestows
And on the generous cheek a tincture glows,
More lovely than the bloom that paints the vernal rose.

The lofty pyramid shall cease to live!
Fleeting the praise such monuments can give!
But charity, by tyrant time rever'd,
Sweet charity, amidst his ruins spar'd,
Secures her votaries unblasted fame,
And in celestial annals saves their name.

AN EPILOGUE,

Designed to be spoke at Alnwick, on resigning the Play-house to a party detached from the Edinburgh Theatre.

To Alnwick's lofty seat, a sylvan scene!
To rising hills from distance doubly green,
Go—says the god of wit, my standard bear,
These are the mansions of the great † and fair,
'Tis my Olympus now, go spread my banners
there.

Led by fond hope, the pointed path we trace,
And thank'd our patron for the flowery place;
Here—we behold a gentle waving wood!
There—we can gaze upon a wand'ring flood!
The landscape smiles!—the fields gay fragrance wear!

Soft scenes are all around—refreshful air!
Slender repast indeed, and but cameleon fare!

A troop, at certain times compell'd to shift,
And from their northern mountains turn'd adrift;
By tyrant managers a while consign'd,
To fatten on what forage they can find;
With lawless force our liberty invades,
And fain would thrust us from these fav'rite shades;
But we (since prejudice erects her scale,
And puffs and petty artifice prevail)
To stronger holds with cool discretion run,
And leave the conquerors to be—undone.

With gratitude, still we'll acknowledge the favours
So kindly indulg'd to our simple endeavours;
To the great and the fair we rest thankfully debtors, [betters.
And wish we could say, we gave place to our

A PROLOGUE,

TO LOVE AND FAME.

Spoke at Scarborough.Entering.

WHERE is this author?—Bid the wretch appear,
Let him come in, and wait for judgment—here.
'This awful jury, all impatient, wait;
Let him come in, I say, and meet his fate!

* The Countess of Northumberland, who honoured the charity with her presence.

† The Earl and Countess of Northumberland, Lord and Lady Warkworth, &c.

Strange, very strange, if such a piece succeeds!
(Punish the culprit for his vile misdeeds)
Know ye to-night, that his presumptuous works,
Have turn'd good Christians into—Heathen
Turks?

And if the genius an't corrected soon,
In his next trip, he'll mount us to the moon.

Methinks I hear him say—"For mercy's sake Hold your rash tongue—my love and fame's at stake;

When you behold me—diffident—distrest!

'Tis cruelty to make my woes a jest:

Well—if you will—but why should I distrust?

My judges are as merciful as just;

I know them well, have oft their friendship try'd,
And their protection is my boast—my pride."

Hoping to please, he form'd this bustling plan;
Hoping to please! 'tis all the moderns can:

Faith! let him 'scape, let love and fame survive,

With your kind sanction keep his scenes alive;

Try to approve (applaud we will exempt)

Nor crush the bardling in this hard attempt.

Could he write up to an illustrious theme,

There's mark'd upon the register of fame

A subject—but beyond the warmest lays!

Wonder must paint, when 'tis a G—nby's praise.

A PROLOGUE TO RULE A WIFE.

SPOKEN AT EDINBURGH.

'Tis an odd portrait that the poet drew!

A strange irregular he sets in view!

'Mongst us—thank heaven—the character's un-
known,

(Bards have creative faculties we own)

And this appears a picture from his brain,

'Till we reflect the lady liv'd in Spain.

Should we the portrait with the sex compare,

'Twould add new honours to the modern fair;

Their merit, by the foil, conspicuous made,

And they seem'd brighter from contrasting shade.

Rude were the rules our fathers form'd of old,

Nor should such antiquated maxims hold;

Shall subject man assert superior sway,

And dare to bid the angel sex obey!

Or if permitted to partake the throne,

Despotic, call the reins of power his own!

Forbid it, all that's gracious—that's polite!

(The fair to liberty have equal right)

Nor urge the tenet, though from Fletcher's school,

That every husband has a right to rule.

A matrimonial medium may be hit,

Where neither governs, but where both submit.

The nuptial torch with decent brightness burns,

Where male and female condescend by turns;

Change then the phrase, the horrid text amend,

And let the word obey,—be condescend.

A PROLOGUE,

On reviving the Merchant of Venice, at the time the Bill had passed for naturalizing the Jews.

'TWIXT the sons of the stage, without pensions or places,

And the vagabond Jews, are some similar cases;

Since time out of mind, or they're wrong'd much
by slander,

Both lawless, alike, have been sentenc'd to wander;
Then faith 'tis full time we appeal to the nation,
To be join'd in this bill for na-tu-ra-li-za-ti-on;
Lard, that word's so uncouth!---'tis so irksome to speak it! [take it.

But 'tis Hebrew, I believe, and that's taste, as I
Well---now to the point---I'm sent here with commission.

To present this fair circle our humble petition:
But conscious what hopes we should have of succeeding,

Without (as they phrase it) sufficiently bleeding:
And convinc'd we've no funds, nor old gold we can rake up,

Like our good fathers--- Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob;
We must frankly confess we have nought to present ye, [ye.

But Shakspeare's old sterling--- pray let it content
This Shylock, the Jew, whom we mean to restore ye,

Was naturaliz'd oft by your fathers before ye;
Then take him to-night to your kindest compassion,

For to countenance Jews is the pink of the fashion.

A PROLOGUE,

For some Country Lads, performing the Devil of a Wife, in the Christmas Holidays.

In days of yore, when round the jovial board,
With harmless mirth, and social plenty stor'd,
Our parent Britons quaff'd their nut-brown ale,
And carols sung, or told their Christmas tale;
In struts St. George, old England's champion knight,

With hasty steps, impatient to recite
"How he had kill'd the dragon, once in fight."
From ev'ry side---from Troy---from ancient Greece,

Princes pour in to swell the motley piece;
And while their deeds of prowess they rehearse,
The flowing bowl rewards their hobbling verse.

Intent to raise this evening's cordial mirth,
Like theirs, our simple stage play comes to birth.
Our want of art we candidly confess,
But give you nature in her homespun dress;
No heroes here---no martial men of might!
A cobbler is the champion of to-night;
His strap, more fam'd than George's lance of old,
For it can tame that dragoness, a scold:
Indulgent, then, support the cobbler's cause;
And though he may not deserve it, smile applause.

A PROLOGUE,

ON OPENING THE NEW THEATRE IN NEWCASTLE,
1766.

If to correct the follies of mankind,
To mend the morals---to enlarge the mind,
To strip the self-deceiving passions bare,
With honest mirth to kill an evening's care;
If these kind motives can command applause,
For these the motley stage her curtain draws.

VOL. X.

Does not the poet, that exists by praise,
Like to be told that he has reach'd the bays?
Is not the wretch (still trembling for his store)
Pleas'd when he grasps a glitt'ring thousand more?
Cheers not the mariner propitious seas?
Likes not the lawyer to be handling fees?
Lives not the lover but in hopes of bliss?
To ev'ry question we'll reply with---yes.

Suppose them gratified---their full delight
Falls short of ours on this auspicious night;
When rich in happiness---in hopes elate,
Taste has receiv'd us to our fav'rite seat.

O that the soul of action were but ours,
And the vast energy of vocal powers!
That we might make a grateful off'ring, fit
For these kind judges that in candour sit

Before such judges, we confess, with dread,
These new dominions we presume to tread;
Yet if you smile, we'll boldly do our best,
And leave your favours to supply the rest.

AN INTRODUCTION,

Spoke at the Theatre in Sunderland, to a Play performed there for the Benefit of the Widows and Orphans of that place.

ON widows---orphans---left, alas! forlorn,
(From the rack'd heart its every comfort torn)
Humanity, to-night, confers relief,
And softens, though she can't remove their grief:
Blasted her hopes, her expectations kill'd,
The sons of sympathy (with sorrow chill'd)
Behold the wretched matron---madly weep,
And hear her cry---"My joys are in the deep!"
To the tremendous Power that rules mankind,
Lord of the seas---the calm and boist'rous wind,
We bow, obedient, and with awe resign'd,
His ways, inscrutable, we can't explore,
No---we may wonder, but we must adore.
Happy, for ever, be the generous breast,
That feels compassion for the poor distress'd;
Happy the hand that stops the sufferer's tear!
Such hands there are, and such we find, are here.

AN ELEGIAC ODE

ON THE DEATH OF HIS LATE MAJESTY.

"Pallida mos æquo pulsat pede pauperum ta-bernas,
"Regumque turres."

HOR.

ENGLAND! thy genius vested like despair,
With loud distress alarms the chalky shore:
Britons! he cries, and rends his hoary hair,
Britons! your much-lov'd monarch is no more!
The sea-gods from their pearl-embroider'd beds,
Who to great George the green dominion
gave,
No longer list their coral-crowned heads,
But dive distress'd beneath the trembling wave.
Hark, how the winds, erst bounteous to his will,
That bore his thund'ring fleets to Gallia's shore,
Pause,---for a while, pathetically still,
Then let their sorrows burst in pealy roar.

3 A

The nymphs that in the sacred groves preside,
Where Britain's conqu'ring oaks eternal spring,
In their embrown'd retreats their sorrows hide,
And silent mourn the venerable king.

Tenants of liberty, on Britain's plain,
With flocks enrich'd, a vast unnumber'd store!
'Tis gone, the mighty George's golden reign;
Your Pan, your great protector is no more!

The British swains, e'er whiles a blithesome throng,
No more in laughter's band, to revel seen!
No more the shepherd tunes his cheerful song,
Or dances sportful on the dew-dress'd green.

Beauty, no more the toy of fashion wears,
(So late by love's designful labour dress'd);
But from her brow the luster'd diamond tears,
And with the fable cypress veils her breast.

Religion, lodg'd high on her pious pile,
Laments the fading state of crowns below;
While melancholy fills the vaulted isle,
With the slow music of heart-wounding woe.

See the detestful owl, ill-omen'd, rise!
Dragg'd, by despair, from her sequester'd cell;
And, by the discord of shrill shrieking cries,
Doubling the horrors of the deep-ton'd bell.

The choral muses droop! their harps unstrung,
The lutes and laurel wreaths neglected fall!
Commerce--bestill'd her many nation'd tongue,
Whilom so busy in her bustling hall*!

Behold the virtues rang'd, a sorrowing band!
They mourn their king with grief dejected eyes,
See art and sister science, weeping stand!
For ah! their patron, their defender dies;

On conquest's cheek, see how the roses fail!
Grief makes, alas! the fairest blossoms bow!
And honour's fire ethereal burns but pale,
The erst beam'd glorious on our George's brow.

The dreary paths of unrelenting fate, [try!
Must monarchs, mix'd with common mortals,
Is there no refuge for the good and great?
And must the gracious and the godlike die?

Must gilded courts be chang'd for horror's cave!
And scepter'd kings, who keep the world in awe,
Conquer'd by time, and the unpitied grave,
Scarce sav'd their laurels from its rig'rous law!

Search where fell carnage rag'd with rigour steel'd,
Where slaughter, like the rapid lightning, ran;
And say, when you've bewept the blood stain'd
field, [man?

"Philip, reflect thou'st passing to the goal,
"Where mortals mix in undistinguish'd dust."

What then avails ambition's wide-stretch'd wing!
The schoolman's page, or pride of beauty's
bloom!

The crape-clad hermit, and the rich-rob'd king,
Mingle promiscuous in the levelling tomb.

So Saladin*, for arts and arms renown'd,
The Syrians and Egyptians both subdu'd;
Returning, with imperial triumphs crown'd,
Sigh'd, when the perishable pomp he view'd.

And as he rode, high on his regal car,
In all the purple pride of conquest dress'd,
Conspicuous o'er the trophies gain'd in war,
Plac'd on a pendant spear his burial vest.

While thus the herald cry'd, "This son of pow'r,
"This Saladin, to whom the nations bow'd,
"May, in the space of a revolving hour,
"Boast of no other spoil but yonder shroud."

Can the deep statesmen, skill'd in great design,
Save, for the smallest space, precarious breath?
Or the tun'd follower of the sacred nine,
Sooth, with his melody, the tyrant death?

No! though the palace bar her golden gate,
Or monarchs plant ten thousand guards around,
Unerring; and unseen, the shaft of fate,
Strikes the devoted victim to the ground.

If in the tent retir'd, or battle's rage,
Britannia's sighs shall reach great Fred'ric's† ear;

He'll drop the sword, or shut the sophic page,
And pensive pay the tributary tear.

Then shall the monarch weigh the moral thought,
(As he laments the parent, friend, ally),
The solemn truth, by sage reflection taught,
That spite of glory, Fred'ric's self must die.

Crowns, like the glow-worm's scarce distinguish'd
light,

For a short moment glance their twinkling fires,
But there's a deathless wreath, divinely bright,
Whose more than diamond lustre, ne'er expires.

Such is the starry meed that virtue ty'd
With her own hands on George's gracious brow;
Eternal shall its golden beams abide,
Though the bright sun should from its orbit
bow.

Nor is the sacred gift to kings confin'd,
The wretch, to fortune, friends, and fame un-
known,

Shall, if sweet piety adorn his mind,
Mount to the highest step of glory's throne.

* Saladin, a famous eastern Emperor, in his triumphant return from the most remarkable conquests, had a shroud carried before him, while proclamation was made, that the victor, after all his glory, could lay real claim to nothing but that wretched linen to wrap his body in for the tomb.

† Frederic, King of Prussia.

The parent's face Apelles * prudent hides,
While death devours the darling of his age:
Nature the pencil'd stroke of art derides,
When grief distracts with agonizing rage.

Then let the muse her sablest curtain spread,
By sorrow taught her nerveless pow'r to know:
When nations cry, their king, their parent's dead,
The rest is dumb, unutterable woe.

Mercy, copartner of great George's throne,
Through the embrighted air ascendant flies,
Duteous, the peace bestowing maid is flown
To smooth his halcyon progress to the skies.

But see a sacred radiance beams around!
That with returning hope a people cheers!
Behold yon youth, with grace imperial crown'd,
How awful! yet how lovely in his tears!

Mark how his bosom heaves the filial sigh!
He droops distress'd like a fair frost-chill'd flower,
Till glory from her radiant sphere on high,
Hails him to hold the reins of regal power.

The faintest fire to realms of bliss remov'd,
Like the fam'd phoenix from his pyre shall spring,
Another George as gracious, as lov'd,
As good, and glorious, as the parent king.

HORACE,

ODE X. BOOK IV. IMITATED.

CHLOE, my most tender care,
Always coy, and always fair,
Should unwish'd for languor spread
O'er that beauteous white and red;
Should these locks that sweetly play
Down these shoulders, fall away,
And that lovely bloom that glows,
Fairer than the fairest rose;
Should it fade, and leave thy face
Spoil'd of every killing grace;
Should your glass the charge betray,
Thus, my fair, you'd weeping say,
'Cruel gods! does beauty fade?
'Now warm desires my breast invade;
'And why, while blooming youth did glow,
'Was this heart as cold as snow?'

SENT TO MISS BELL H—,

WITH A PAIR OF BUCKLES.

HAPPY trifles, can ye bear
Sighs of fondness to the fair;
If your pointed tongues can tell,
How I love my charming Bell:
Fondly take a lover's part,
Plead the anguish of my heart.
Go—ye trifles—gladly fly,
(Gracious in my fair one's eye)

* Apelles finding it impossible to express with his pencil, the distress of Agamemnon, while his daughter Iphigenia was offered as a sacrifice, painted him with a veil spread over his face.

Fly—your envy'd bliss to meet;
Fly, and kiss the charmer's feet.
Happy there, with waggish play,
Though you revel day by day,
Like the donor, ev'ry night,
(Robb'd of his supreme delight)
To subdue your wanton pride,
Useless, you'll be thrown aside.

TO CHLOE,

ON A CHARGE OF INCONSTANCY.

How can Chloe think it strange,
Time should make a lover change?
Time brings all things to an end,
Courage can't the blow defend.
See, the proud aspiring oak
Falls beneath the fatal stroke:
If on beauty's cheek he preys,
Straight the rosy bloom decays:
Joy puts out his lambent fires,
And at time's approach—expires.
How can Chloe think it strange,
Time should make a lover change?

INCANTATION.

Performed at the Theatre in Sunderland, in a New Pantomime.

RECITATIVE.

Hecate.

From the dark, tremendous cell,
Where the fiends of magic dwell,
Now the sun hath left the skies,
Daughters of enchantment, rise.

AIR.

[The Witches appear.]

Welcome from the shades beneath!
Welcome to the blasted heath!
Where the spectre and the sprite
Glide along the glooms of night.
Beldams!—with attention keen,
Wait the wish of Harlequin:
Many a wonder must be done
For my first, my fav'rite son.

CHORUS OF WITCHES.

Many a wonder shall be done,
Hecate, for your fav'rite son.

FORTUNE TO HARLEQUIN.

IN A PANTOMIME.

From my favour, sense rejected,
Fools by fortune are protected:
Fortune, Harlequin, hath found you,
Happiness will hence surround you.

Quick contrivance this * bestows you!
Valour makes the fair adore you;
This † shall drive your foes before you.

O-n my life, says dame Venus, I'll not thus be put

ON THE DEATH OF MRS. SLEIGH,

OF STOCKTON.

MUCH lov'd, much honour'd, much lamented
Sleigh!

The kindred virtues had expir'd with thee,
Were it ordain'd the daughters of the sky,
Like the frail offspring of the earth, could die;
Trembling they stand at thy too early doom,
And mingling tears to consecrate thy tomb.

ACROSTIC.

W-HERE no ripen'd summer glows,
I-n the lap of northern snows;
D-eserts gloomy, cold, and drear,
(O-nly let the nymph be there)
W-reaths of budding sweets would wear.

M-ay would every fragrance bring,
A-ll the vernal bloom of spring:
D-ryads, deck'd with myrtles green,
D-ancing, would attend their queen:
E-very flower that nature spreads,
R-ising where the charmer treads!

ON THE DEATH OF LORD GRANBY.

For private loss the lenient tear may flow,
And give a short (perhaps), a quick relief;
While the full heart, o'ercharg'd with public woe,
Must labour through a long, protracted grief.

This sudden stroke ('twas like the lightning's blast)

The sons of Albion can't enough deplore;
Think, Britons, think on all his triumphs past,
And weep—your warrior is—alas! no
more.

Blight, we are told, respects the conqu'ror's tree,
And through the laurel grove with caution
flies;

Vague---and how vain must that assertion be,
Cover'd with laurels when a Granby dies!

ON THE DEATH OF MR. ———,

OF SUNDERLAND.

Go, breath of sorrow,—go attending sighs,
Acquaint the natives of the northern shore,
The man they lov'd, the man they honour'd, dies,
And charity's first steward—is no more.

Where shall the poor a friendly patron find?
Who shall relieve them from their loads of pain?
Say, has he left a feeling heart behind,
So gracious—good—so tenderly humane?

Yes---there survives his darling offspring---young,
Yet in the paths of virtue, steady---sure!
'Twas the last lesson from his parent's tongue,
* Think (O remember), think upon my poor.'

A PETITION

To the Worshipful Free-masons, delivered from the Stage, by a Lady, at a Comedy countenanced by that Fraternity.

BROTHERS!---'tis bold to interrupt your meeting.
But from the female world I wait you---greeting.
[Curtsey.

The ladies can advance a thousand reasons,
That make them hope to be received as masons:
To keep a secret,—not one hint expressing, [sing!
To rein the tongue,—O husbands, there's a blef-
As virtue seems the mason's sole foundation,
Why should the fair be barr'd from---Installation?
If you suppose us weak, indeed you wrong us;
Historians, Sapphos too, you'll find among us;
Think---brothers---think, and graciously admit us;
Doubt it not, Sirs, we'll gloriously acquit us:
How to be wiser, and more cautious, teach us,
Indeed 'tis time that your instructions reach us:
The faults of late, and every foul miscarriage,
Committed in the sphere of modern marriage,
Were caus'd (if I've a grain of penetration)
From each great lady's not being made a mason.
Accept us then, to brotherhood receive us,
And virtue, we're convinc'd, will never leave us.

AN ODE

FOR THE BIRTH OF THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

"Arma, Virumque, cano." VIRG.

RECITATIVE.

MORE glorious than the comet's blaze,
That through the starry region strays:
From Zembla to the torrid zone,
The mighty name of Prussia's known.

AIR.

Be banish'd from the books of fame,
Ye deeds in distant ages done;
Lost and inglorious is the name
Of Hannibal, or Philip's son:
Could Greece, or conquering Carthage sing
A hero great as Prussia's king!

Where restless envy can't explore,
Or flatter'd hope presume to fly;
Fate bade victorious Fred'rick soar,
For laurels that can never die.
Could Greece, &c.

His rapid boles tremendous break,
Through nations arm'd in dread array,
Swift as the furious blasts that shake
The bosom of the frighted sea.
Could Greece, &c.

In vain, to shake the throne of Jove,
With impious rage, the giants try'd;
'Gainst Fred'rick's force the nations strove
In vain—their haughty legions dy'd.
Could Greece, &c.

While prudence guides his chariot wheels,
Through virtue's sacred paths they roll;
Immortal truth his bosom steels,
And guards him glorious to the goal.
Could Greece, &c.

The vengeful lance Britannia wields,
In consort with her brave ally,
Saves her fair roses in the fields,
Where Gaul's detested lilies die.
Wreaths of eternal friendship spring,
'Twixt mighty George and Prussia's king.

The jocund bowl let Britons raise,
And crown the jovial board with mirth;
Fill—to great Frederick's length of days,
And hail the hero's glorious birth—
Could Greece, or conquering Carthage sing
A chieftan fam'd like Prussia's king!

AN ODE,

Composed for the Birth day of the late General Lord Blakeney.

THE muses harps, by concord strung!
Loud let them strike the festal lay,
Wak'd by Britannia's grateful tongue,
To hail her hero's natal day.

Arise, paternal glory rise,
And lift your Blakeney to the skies!

Behold his warlike banners wave!

Like Britain's oak the hero stands:
The shield—the shelter of the brave!
The guardian o'er the British bands!

Arise, paternal, &c.

He wrests the wreath from Richlieu's* brows,
Which fraud or faction planted there;

France to the gallant hero bows,
And Europe's chiefs his name revere.

Arise, paternal, &c.

With partial conquest on their side!

The sons of Gaul—a pageant crew!

Rank, but inglorious in their pride,

To Blakeney, and his vanquish'd few.

Arise, paternal, &c.

* Richlieu, commander of the expedition against Port-Mahon.

Hibernia†, with maternal care,
His labour'd statue lifts on high:
Be partial, time!—the trophy spare,
That Blakeney's name may never die!
Arise, paternal glory, rise!
And lift your Blakeney to the skies.

ON A VERY YOUNG LADY.

SEE how the buds and blossoms shoot:
How sweet will be the summer fruit!
Let us behold the infant rose;
How fragrant when its beauty blows!
The morning smiles, serenely gay;
How bright will be the promis'd day!
Contemplate next the charming maid,
In early innocence array'd!
If, in the morning of her years,
A lustre so intense appears,
When time shall point her noon-tide rays,
When her meridian charms shall blaze,
None but the eagle-ey'd must gaze.

A SONNET:

ADDRESSED TO MISS S——.

WHEN Flora decks the mantling bowers,
In elegant array,
And scatters all her opening flowers,
A compliment to May!

With glowing joy my bosom beats;
I gaze delighted round,
And wish to see the various sweets
In one rich nosegay bound.

'Tis granted—and their bloom display'd,
To bless my wond'ring view;
I see them all—my beauteous maid,
I see them all in—you.

ANACREON:

ODE V. IMITATED.

THE ROSE.

SHED roses in the sprightly juice,
Prepar'd for ev'ry social use!

So shall the earthly nectar prove

A draught for all-imperial Jove.

Ourselves, with rosy chaplets bound,

Shall sing, and set the goblet round.

Thee, ever gentle rose, we greet,

We worship thee, delicious sweet!

For though by mighty gods caress'd,

You deign to make us mortals blest.

The Cupids, and the graces fair,

With myrtle sprigs adorn their hair;

And nimbly strike celestial ground,

Eternal roses blooming round.

Bring us more sweets, ere these expire,

And reach me that harmonious lyre:

Gay Bacchus, Jove's convivial son,

Shall lead us to his fav'rite ton:

† A statue was erected in Dublin to the memory of General Blakeney, who was a native of Ireland.

Among the sporting youths and maids,
Beneath the vine's auspicious shades,
For ever young—for ever gay,
We'll dance the jovial hours away.

MOSCHUS,

IDYLLIUM VII*.

(As translated by Dr. Broome.)

TO THE EVENING STAR.

HAIL, golden star, of ray serene!
Thou fav'rite of the Cyprian queen!
O Hesper! glory of the night,
Diffusing through the gloom, delight!
Whose beams all other stars outshine,
As much as silver Cynthia thine:
O guide me, speeding o'er the plain,
To him I love, my shepherd swain!
He keeps the mirthful feast, and soon
Dark shades will cloud the splendid moon.
Of lambs I never robb'd the fold,
Nor the lone traveller of gold;
Love is my crime: O lend thy ray
To guide a lover on her way.
May the bright star of Venus prove
The gentle harbinger of love!

A PASTORAL.

WHERE the fond zephyr through the woodbine
plays, [bow'r,
And wakes sweet fragrance in the mantling
Near to that grove my lovely bridegroom stays
Impatient—for 'tis past—the promis'd hour!
Lend me thy light, O ever-sparkling star!
Bright Hesper! in thy glowing pomp array'd,
Look down, look down, from thy all-glorious car,
And beam protection on a wand'ring maid.
'Tis to escape the penetrating spy,
And pass, unnotic'd, from malignant sight,
This dreary waste, full resolute, I try,
And trust my footsteps to the shades of night.
The moon has slipp'd behind an envious cloud,
Her smiles, so gracious, I no longer view;
Let her remain behind that envious shroud,
My hopes, bright Hesperus, depend on you.
No rancour ever reach'd my harmless breast;
I hurt no birds, nor rob the bustling bee:
Hear, then, what love and innocence request,
And shed your kindest influence on me.
Thee---Venus loves---first twinkler of the sky,
Thou art her star---in golden radiance gay!
On my distresses cast a pitying eye,
Assist me---for, alas! I've lost my way.
I see the darling of my soul---my love!
Expressions can't the mighty rapture tell:
He leads me to the bosom of the grove:
Thanks, gentle star---kind Hesperus, farewell!

TO CHLOE, IN AN ILL HUMOUR.

CONSIDER, sweet maid, and endeavour
To conquer that pride in thy breast;

* To this Idyllium (translated by Dr. Broome) the author owns himself indebted for a hint, from which the following pastoral proceeds.

It is not a haughty behaviour
Will set off thy charms to the best.

The ocean, when calm, may delight you,
But should a bold tempest arise,
The billow enrag'd would affright you:
Loud objects of awful surprise!
'Tis thus, when good humour diffuses
Its beams o'er the face of a fair;
With rapture his heart a man loses,
While frowns turn love to despair.

VERSES BY THE AUTHOR,

Written about three Weeks before his Death.

DEAR lad, as you run o'er my rhyme,
And see my long name at the end,
You'll cry---“ And has Cunningham time
“ To give so much verse to his friend?”

'Tis true, the reproof (though severe)
Is just from the letters I owe;
But blameless I still may appear,
For nonsense is all I bestow.

However, for better for worse,
As Damons their Chloes receive,
Ev'n take the dull lines I rehearse—
They're all a poor friend has to give.

The drama and I have shook hands,
We've parted, no more to engage;
Submissive I met her commands---
For nothing can cure me of age.

My sunshine of youth is no more!
My mornings of pleasure are fled!
'Tis painful my fate to endure---
A pension supplies me with bread!

Dependant at length on the man
Whose fortunes I struggled to raise!
I conquer my pride as I can---
His charity merits my praise!

His bounty proceeds from his heart;
'Tis principle prompts the supply---

His kindness exceeds my desert,
And often suppresses a sigh.

But like the old horse in the song,
I'm turn'd on the common to graze---

To fortune these changes belong,
And contented I yield to her ways!

She ne'er was my friend: through the day
Her smiles were the smiles of deceit---

At noon she'd her favours display,
And at night let me pine at her feet.

No longer her presence I court,
No longer I shrink at her frowns!

Her whimsies supply me with sport---
And her smiles I resign to the clowns!

Thus lost to each worldly desire,
And scorning all riches---all fame,

I quietly hope to retire
When time shall the summons proclaim.

I've nothing to weep for behind!
To part with my friends is the worst!
Their numbers, I grant, are confin'd;
But you are, still, one of the first.

A POEM

To the Memory of

JOHN CUNNINGHAM.

BY ROBERT FERGUSON.

YE mournful meanders and groves,
Delight of the muse and her song;
Ye grottos and dripping alcoves,
No strangers to CORYDON's tongue.

Let each sylvan and dryad declare
His themes and his music how dear,
Their plaints and their dirges prepare,
Attendant on CORYDON's bier.

The echo that join'd in the lay,
So amorous, sprightly, and free,
Shall send forth the sounds of dismay,
And sigh with sad pity for thee.

Wild wander his flocks with the breeze;
His reed can no longer controul;
His numbers no longer can please,
Or send kind relief to the soul.

But long may they wander and bleat,
To hills tell the tale of their woe;
The woodlands the tale shall repeat,
And the waters shall mournfully flow.

For these were the haunts of his love,
The sacred retreats of his ease,
Where favourite fancy would rove,
As wanton, as light as the breeze.

Her zone will discolour'd appear,
With fanciful ringlets unbound,
A face pale and languid she'll wear,
A heart fraught with sorrow profound.

The reed of each shepherd will mourn;
The shades of Parnassus decay:
The muses will dry their sad urn,
Since 'rest of young CORYDON's lay.

To him every passion was known
That throb'd in the breast with desire;
Each gentle affection was shown
In the soft sighing songs of his lyre.

Like the carolling thrush on the spray
In music soft warbling and wild,
To love was devoted each lay,
In accents pathetic and mild.

Let beauty and virtue revere,
And the songs of the shepherd approve,
Who felt, who lamented the snare,
When repining at pityless love.

The summer but languidly gleams,
Pomona no comfort can bring,
Nor vallies, nor grottos, nor streams,
Nor the May-born flowrets of spring.

They have fled all with CORYDON's muse,
For his brows to form chaplets of woe,
Whose reed oft awaken'd their boughs
As the whispering breezes that blow.

To many a fanciful spring
His lyre was melodiously strung;
While fairies and fawns in a ring
Have applauded the swain as he sung.

To the cheerful he usher'd his smiles,
To the woeful his sigh and his tear;

A condoler with want and her toils,
When the voice of oppression was near.

Though titles and wealth were his due,
Though fortune denied the reward;
Yet truth and sincerity knew
What the goddess would never regard.

Avails ought the generous heart,
Which nature to goodness design'd,
If fortune denies to impart
Her kindly relief to the mind?

'Twas but faint the relief to dismay,
The cells of the wretched among;
Though sympathy sung in the lay,
Though melody fell from his tongue.

Let the favour'd of fortune attend
To the ails of the wretched and poor:
Though CORYDON's lays could befriend,
'Tis riches alone that can cure.

But they to compassion are dumb,
To pity their voices unknown;
Near sorrow they never can come,
'Till misfortune has mark'd them her own.

Now the shades of the evening depend;
Each warbler is lull'd on the spray;
The cypress doth ruefully bend
Where the corpse of cold CORYDON stay.

Adieu then the songs of the swain,
Let peace still attend on his shade;
And his pipe that is dumb to his strain,
In the grave be with CORYDON laid.

THE LIFE OF GREEN.

Of the personal history of GREEN, very few particulars are known; and for those few, the world is chiefly obliged to the editor of "Doddsley's Collection, 1783, and an anonymous writer in the "European Magazine," 1785.

Mathew Green was born in 1696. He was of a family of good repute among the Dissenters, and had his education in that sect. He was a man of approved probity, and sweetness of temper and manners. His wit abounded in conversation, and was never known to give the least offence. He had a post in the Custom-house, and discharged the duty there with the utmost diligence and ability. He died in 1737, at the age of forty-one years, at lodgings in Nag's-head Court, Gracechurch Street.

To the above account, in "Doddsley's Collection," which was furnished by his friend Glover, the celebrated author of "Leonidas," it may be added, that he was nephew to Mr. Tanner, clerk of Fishmonger's-hall. He had not much learning; but knew a little Latin.

He was very subject to the hyp; had some free notions in religious subjects; and though bred among the Quakers, grew disgusted at the preciseness and formality of the sect.

The following anecdotes are related in the "European Magazine," 1785, upon the authority of Glover.

Mr. Sylvanus Bevan, a Quaker, and a friend of Green, was mentioning at Button's Coffee-house, that while he was bathing in the river, a waterman saluted him with the usual compliment of the lower class of people, by calling "a Quaker, a Quaker, quirl." He at the same time expressed his wonder, how his profession could be known while he was without his clothes. Green immediately replied, that the waterman might discover him by his swimming against the stream.

The department in the Custom-house to which Green belonged, was under the controul of the Duke of Manchester, who used to treat those immediately under him once a-year. After one of those entertainments, Green seeing a range of servants in the hall, said to the first of them, "Pray, Sir, do you give tickets at your turnpike?"

In a reform which took place in the Custom-house, among other articles, a few pence paid weekly, for providing the cats with milk, were ordered to be struck off. On this occasion, Green wrote a humorous petition, as from the cats, which prevented the regulation, in that particular form, from taking place.

Green's conversation was as novel as his writings; which occasioned one of the Commissioners of the Customs, a very dull man, to observe, that he did not know how it was, but Green always expressed himself in a different manner from other people.

This very original poet published nothing in his lifetime. In 1732, he printed, and gave away, a few copies of The Grotto, written in the character of a Fisherman, since inserted in "Doddsley's Collection;" but for reasons which cannot readily be guessed at, the following introductory lines are omitted.

We had a water-poet once,
Nor was he register'd a dunce:
I'll lay awhile my writing by,
And hang abroad my nets to dry,

And stow my apostolic boat,
And try to raise a swan-like note;
For fishing oft in Twick'nam reach,
I've heard fine strains along the beach,
That tempt to sing a cave's renown,
And fetch from thence an ivy crown.

Again, after the line,

That tells, unask'd, th' injurious tale,
Of treaty of intriguing kind,
With secret article here sign'd;
And beds conceal'd with bushy trees,
Planted with Juno's lettuces.

After the line

We best what is true nature find,

these two lines should follow :

Chemists and laws their process suit,
They metals, these the mind transmute.

His poem, intituled The Spleen, An Epistle to Mr. C. Jackson, was written piecemeal, and would never have been completed, had he not been pressed to it by his friend Glover; who committed it to the press soon after his death, in 1737. It was afterwards reprinted with the Grotto, in "Doddley's Collection;" and received, with The Seeker, verses on Barclay's Apology for the Quakers, and three lighter pieces, into the edition of the "English Poets," 1790.

Many of his unpublished manuscripts were in the possession of Glover at the time of his death, in 1785; which, it is hoped, have been preserved by his family, and will be published, with the dramatic pieces he left behind him.

Considered as a poet, Green ranks with Butler and Prior; neither of whom, however, he professedly imitates. He has originality in many parts.

His thoughts are unborrowed and unexpected, and the strain of his diction original and peculiar. He has Butler's exuberance of matter, and variety of illustration; and Prior's polished wit, and easy versification.

The Grotto is written with great elegance and great sprightliness; the language is neat and easy, and the numbers smooth, without the appearance of care.

Gray has not disdained to borrow hints from this performance; as every reader of his beautiful "Ode to Spring," and the following exquisite lines, will readily perceive.

Four chiefs adorn the modest stone,
For virtue, as for learning known:
The thinking sculpture helps to raise
Deep thoughts, the genii of the place;
To the mind's ear, and inward sight,
Their silence speaks, and shade gives light;
While insects from the threshold preach,
And minds, dispos'd to musing, teach;
Proud of strong limbs, and painted hues,
They perish by the slightest bruise;
Or maladies begun within,
Destroy more slow life's frail machine;
From maggot youth, through change of state,
They feel like us the turns of fate;
Some born to creep, have liv'd to fly,
And change earth's cells for dwellings high;
And some that did their six wings keep,
Before they died, been forc'd to creep;
They politics like ours profess,
The greater prey upon the less;
Some strain on foot, huge loads to bring,
Some tire incessant on the wing;
And in their different ways explore,
With sense of want, by future store;
Nor from their vig'rous schemes desist,
Till death, and then are never miss'd;

Some frolic, toil, marry, increase,
Are sick and well, have war and peace;
And, broke with age, in half a day
Yield to successors, and away.

The lines, beginning, O Delia! when I touch this string, are written with equal vigour and elegance.

The Spleen, his greatest work, has many admirers. It is written in that beautiful energetic style, which characterises this poet; and pleases by the justness of the sentiments, and the novelty and variety of the illustrations. The diction is concise, nervous, and simple, and pleases by its perspicuity and freedom from ambitious ornament. The original idea seems to have been taken from Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy;" a book to which a mind of the greatest powers may be indebted without disgrace. His design, as he tells his friend Mr. Jackson, is not

To write a treatise on the spleen;
Nor to prescribe when nerves convulse;
Nor mend th' alarum watch, your pulse.
If I am right, your question lay,
What course I take to drive away
The day-mare spleen, by whose false pleas
Men prove mere suicides in ease;
And how I do myself demean,
In stormy world to live serene.

In describing his peculiar habits, opinions, and amusements, he appears to have proposed to himself no particular method; but to have written the casual dictates of the present moment. The descriptions are unconnected, and the reflections independent on one another; but whatever topic employs his mind, he shows himself qualified to expand and illustrate it with all the accessaries that wit, learning, and observation, can furnish. His verses are not tissues of common thoughts, or light images, that may be traced in books. He displays, on every subject, a wonderful compass of comprehension, and activity of fancy.

No poet, except Butler, has ever brought so many remote images so happily together. It is scarcely possible to peruse a single couplet, without finding some association of images that was never found before.

His verses On Barclay's Apology, are characterised by the same originality of thought, simplicity of language, and facility of expression. The Sparrow and the Dove, displays considerable invention, and no small portion of ease, vivacity, and humour. The mythological story of Jove and Semele, though not over decent, is written with great familiarity, and great sprightliness.

"Of Mr. Matthew Green, of the Custom-house," says Mr. Duncombe, "Gentleman's Magazine," vol. L. p. 122, "I know no more than that Pope, on reading this excellent poem The Spleen, said, 'there was a great deal of originality in it.'"

"In this poem," says Mr. Melmoth, "Fitzosborne's Letters," p. 114, "there are more original thoughts thrown together, than I have ever read in the same compass of lines."

Good frolic, toil, merriment, interest;
 Are back and well, I say, and peace;
 And broke with me in all a day
 Yield to success, and away.

The lines beginning, O father, when I look at thee, are written with equal vigour and ease.

Mr. Green, his greatest work, has many admirers. It is written in that beautiful English style, which characterises his poet; and places by the side of the most perfect and the most perfect of the illustrations. The edition is correct, and the paper and the binding are of the highest quality. The original idea of the book is to give a full and complete history of the life of the poet, and to show the influence of the poet on the life of the nation. The book is a masterpiece of the art of writing, and it is a book to which a mind of the greatest powers may be indebted with great advantage. The edition, as he tells his friend Mr. Jackson, is not

To write a treatise on the poet;
 Nor to produce a work of art;
 But to show the poet as he is,
 In all his life and all his art;
 To show the poet as he is,
 In all his life and all his art;
 To show the poet as he is,
 In all his life and all his art;

in detailing his peculiar habits, opinions, and amusements, he appears to have produced a work, which is not only a masterpiece of the art of writing, but also a masterpiece of the art of life. The poet, in his life, is a man of great power, and of great influence. He is a man who has lived a life of great interest, and of great achievement. He is a man who has been a great friend to the nation, and a great enemy to the world. He is a man who has been a great teacher, and a great leader. He is a man who has been a great friend to the poor, and a great enemy to the rich. He is a man who has been a great friend to the weak, and a great enemy to the strong. He is a man who has been a great friend to the life, and a great enemy to the death. He is a man who has been a great friend to the truth, and a great enemy to the lie. He is a man who has been a great friend to the good, and a great enemy to the evil. He is a man who has been a great friend to the just, and a great enemy to the unjust. He is a man who has been a great friend to the brave, and a great enemy to the coward. He is a man who has been a great friend to the noble, and a great enemy to the base. He is a man who has been a great friend to the wise, and a great enemy to the foolish. He is a man who has been a great friend to the virtuous, and a great enemy to the wicked. He is a man who has been a great friend to the good, and a great enemy to the evil. He is a man who has been a great friend to the just, and a great enemy to the unjust. THE WORKS OF GREEN.

THE SPLEEN.

An Epistle to Mr. Cuthbert Jackson.

This motley piece to you I send,
Who always were a faithful friend;
Who, if disputes should happen hence,
Can best explain the author's sense;
And, anxious for the public weal,
Do, what I sing, so often feel.

The want of method pray excuse,
Allowing for a vapour'd muse;
Nor to a narrow path confin'd,
Hedge in by rules a roving mind.

The child is genuine; you may trace
Throughout the fire's transmitted face,
Nothing is stol'n: my muse, though mean,
Draws from the spring she finds within;
Nor vainly buys what * Gildon sells,
Poetic buckets for dry wells

School-helps I want, to climb on high,
Where all the ancient treasures lie,
And there, unseen commit a theft
On wealth in Greek exchequers left.
Then where? from whom? what can I steal,
Who only with the moderns deal?
This were attempting to put on
Raiment from naked bodies won †:
They safely sing before a thief,
They cannot give who want relief;
Some few excepted, names well known,
And justly laurell'd with renown,
Whose stamp of genius marks their ware,
And theft detects of theft beware;
From More ‡ so lash'd, example fit,
Shun petty larceny in wit.

First know, my friend, I do not mean
To write a treatise on the spleen;
Nor to prescribe when nerves convulse;
Nor mend the alarum watch, your pulse.
If I am right, your question lay,
What course I take to drive away

* Gildon's Art of Poetry.

Which from a naked Piet his grandfire
won."

‡ James More Smith, Esq. See Dunciad, B. ii. l. 50. and the notes, where the circumstances of the transaction here alluded to are very fully explained.

The day-mare spleen, by whose false pleas
Men prove mere suicides in ease;
And how I do myself demean
In stormy world to live serene.

When by its magic lantern spleen
With frightful figures spreads life's scene,
And threat'ning prospects urg'd my fears,
A stranger to the luck of heirs;
Reason, some quiet to restore,
Show'd part was substance, shadow more;
With spleen's dead weight though heavy grown,
In life's rough tide I sunk not down,
But swam, till fortune threw a rope,
Buoyant on bladders fill'd with hope.

I always choose the plainest food
To mend viscosity of blood.
Hail! water-gruel, healing power,
Of easy access to the poor;
Thy help love's confessors implore,
And doctors secretly adore;
To thee, I fly, by thee dilute---
Through veins my blood doth quicker shoot,
And by swift current throws off clean
Prolific particles of spleen.

I never sick by drinking grow,
Nor keep myself a cup too low,
And seldom Cloe's lodgings haunt,
Thrifty of spirits, which I want.

Hunting I reckon very good
To brace the nerves, and stir the blood:
But after no field-honours itch,
Atchiev'd by leaping hedge and ditch.
While spleen lies soft relax'd in bed,
Or o'er coal fires inclines the head,
Hygeia's sons with hound and horn,
And jovial cry awake the morn.
These see her from the dusky plight,
Smear'd by th' embraces of the night,
With rosal wash redeem her face,
And prove herself of Titan's race,
And, mounting in loose robes the skies,
Shed light and fragrance as she flies.
Then horse and hound fierce joy display,
Exulting at the hark-away,

And in pursuit o'er tainted grounds
From lungs robust field-notes resound,
Then, as St. George the dragon slew,
Spleen pierc'd, trod down, and dying view;
While all their spirits are on wing,
And woods, and hills, and vallies ring.

To cure the mind's wrong bias, spleen;
Some recommend the bowling green;

Some, hilly walks; all, exercise;
Fling but a stone, the giant dies;
Laugh and be well. Monkeys have been
Extreme good doctors for the spleen;
And kitten, if the humour hit,
Has harlequin'd away the fit.

Since mirth is good in this behalf;
At some partic'lers let us laugh:
Witlings, brisk fools, curs'd with half sense,
That stimulates their impotence;
Who buz in rhyme, and, like blind flies,
Err with their wings for want of eyes.
Poor authors worshipping a calf,
Deep tragedies that make us laugh,
A strict dissenter, saying grace,
A lect'rer preaching for a place,
Folks, things prophetic to dispense,
Making the past the future tense,
The popish dubbing of a priest,
Fine epitaphs on knaves deceas'd,
Green-apron'd Pythonissa's rage,
Great Æsculapius on his stage,
A miser starving to be rich,
The prior of Newgate's dying speech,
A jointur'd widow's ritual state,
Two Jews disputing tête-à-tête,
New almanacks compos'd by seers,
Experiments on felons ears,
Disdainful prudes, who ceaseless ply
The superb muscle of the eye,
A coquette's April-weather face,
A Queenb'rough mayor behind his mace,
And fops in military show,
Are sov'reign for the case in view.

If spleen-fogs rise at close of day,
I clear my ev'ning with a play,
Or to some concert take my way.
The company, the shine of lights,
The scenes of humour, music's flights,
Adjust and set the soul to rights.

Life's moving pictures, well-wrought plays,
To others' grief attention raise:
Here, while the tragic fictions glow,
We borrow joy by pitying woe;
There gaily comic scenes delight,
And hold true mirrors to our sight.
Virtue, in charming dress array'd,
Calling the passions to her aid,
When moral scenes just actions join,
Takes shape, and shows her face divine.

Music has charms, we all may find,
Ingratiate deeply with the mind.
When art does sound's high pow'r advance,
To music's pipe the passion's dance;
Motions unwill'd its pow'rs have shown,
Tarantulated by a tune.
Many have held the soul to be
Nearly ally'd to harmony.
Her have I known indulging grief,
And shunning company's relief,
Unveil her face, and looking round,
Own, by neglecting sorrow's wound,
The consanguinity of sound.

In rainy days keep double guard,
Or spleen will surely be too hard;

Which, like those fish by sailors met,
Fly highest, while their wings are wet.
In such dull weather, so unfit
To enterprise a work of wit,
When clouds one yard of azure sky,
That's fit for simile, deny,

I dress my face with studious looks,
And shorten tedious hours with books.
But if dull fogs invade the head,
That mem'ry minds not what is read,
I sit in window dry as ark,
And on the drowning world remark:
Or to some coffeehouse I stray
For news, the manna of a day,
And from the hipp'd discourses gather,
That politics go by the weather:
Then seek good-humour'd tavern chums,
And play at cards but for small sums;
Or with the merry fellows quaff,
And laugh aloud with them that laugh;
Or drink a joco-serious cup
With souls who've took their freedom up,
And let my mind, beguil'd by talk,
In Epicurus' garden walk,
Who thought it heav'n to be serene;
Pain, hell, and purgatory, spleen.

Sometimes I dress, with women fit,
And chat away the gloomy fit;
Quit the stiff garb of serious sense,
And wear a gay impertinence,
Nor think nor speak with any pains,
But lay on fancy's neck the reins;
Talk of unusual swell of waist
In maid of honour loosely lac'd,
And beauty bor'ring Spanish red,
And loving pair with sep'rate bed,
And jewels pawn'd for loss of game,
And then redeem'd by loss of fame;
Of Kitty (aunt left in the lurch
By grave pretence to go to church)
Perceiv'd in hack with lover fine,
Like Will and Mary on the coin:
And thus in modish manner we,
In aid of sugar, sweeten tea.

Permit, ye fair, your idol form,
Which e'en the coldest heart can warm,
May with its beauties grace my line,
While I bow down before its shrine,
And your throng'd altars with my lays
Perfume, and get by giving praise.
With speech so sweet, so sweet a mien
You excommunicate the spleen,
Which, fiend-like, flies the magic ring
You form with sound, when pleas'd to sing;
Whate'er you say, howe'er you move,
We look, we listen, and approve.
Your touch, which gives to feeling bliss,
Our nerves officious throng to kiss;
By Celia's pat, on their report,
The grave-air'd soul, inclin'd to sport,
Renounces wisdom's fullen pomp,
And loves the floral game, to romp.
But who can view the pointed rays,
That from black eyes scintillant blaze?
Love on his throne of glory seems
Encompass'd with satellite beams.

But when blue eyes, more softly bright,
Diffuse benignly humid light,
We gaze, and see the smiling loves,
And Cytherea's gentle doves,
And raptur'd fix in such a face,
Love's mercy-seat, and throne of grace,
Shine but on age, you melt its snow;
Again fires long-extinguish'd glow,
And, charm'd by witchery of eyes,
Blood long congealed liquefies!
True miracle, and fairly done
By heads which are ador'd while on.

But oh, what pity 'tis to find
Such beauties both of form and mind;
By modern breeding much debas'd,
In half the female world at least!
Hence I with care such lott'ries shun,
Where, a prize miss'd, I'm quite undone;
And han't, by vent'ring on a wife,
Yet run the greatest risk in life.

Mothers, and guardian aunts, forbear
Your impious pains to form the fair;
Nor lay out so much cost and art,
But to deflow'r the virgin heart;
Of every folly-fost'ring bed
By quick'ning heat of custom bred,
Rather than by your culture spoil'd,
Desist, and give us nature wild,
Delighted with a hoyden soul,
Which truth and innocence controul.
Coquettes, leave off affected arts,
Gay fowlers at a flock of hearts;
Woodcocks to shun your snares have skill,
You show so plain, you strive to kill.
In love the artless catch the game,
And they scarce miss who never aim.

The world's great Author did create
The sex to fit the nuptial state,
And meant a blessing in a wife
To solace the fatigues of life;
And old inspired times display,
How wives could love, and yet obey.
Then truth, and patience of controul,
And house-wife arts adorn'd the soul;
And charms, the gift of nature, shone;
And jealousy, a thing unknown:
Veils were the only masks they wore;
Novels (receipts to make a whore)
Nor ombre, nor quadrille they knew,
Nor Pam's puissance felt at loo.
Wise men did not to be thought gay,
Then compliment their pow'r away:
But lest, by frail desires misled,
The girls forbidden paths should tread,
Of ign'rance rais'd the safe high wall:
We sink haw-haws, that show them all.
Thus we at once solicit sense,
And charge them not to break the fence.

Now, if untir'd, consider friend,
What I avoid to gain my end.

I never am at meeting seen,
Meeting, that region of the spleen;
The broken heart, the busy fiend,
The inward call on spleen depend.

Law, licens'd breaking of the peace.
To which vacation is disease:

VOL. X.

A gipsy diction scarce known well
By th' magi, who law fortunes tell,
I shun; nor let it breed within
Anxiety, and that the spleen;
Law, grown a forest, where perplex
The mazes, and the brambles vex;
Where its twelve verd'ers every day
Are changing still the public way:
Yet if we miss our path and err,
We grievous penalties incur;
And wand'ers tire, and tear their skin,
And then get out where they went in.

I never game, and rarely bet,
Am loth to lend, or run in debt.
No compter-writs me agitate;
Who moralizing pass the gate,
And there mine eyes on spendthrifts turn,
Who vainly o'er their bondage mourn.
Wisdom, before beneath their care,
Pays her upbraiding visits there,
And forces folly through the grate,
Her panegyric to repeat.

This view, profusely when inclin'd,
Enters a caveat in the mind:
Experience join'd with common sense,
To mortals is a providence,
Passion, as frequently is seen,
Subsiding settles into spleen.
Hence, as the plague of happy life,
I run away from party strife.
A prince's cause, a church's claim,
I've known to raise a mighty flame,
And priest, as stoker, very free
To throw in peace and charity.

That tribe, whose practicals decree
Small beer the deadliest heresy;
Who, fond of pedigree, derive
From the most noted whore alive;
Who own wine's old prophetic aid,
And love the mitre Bacchus made,
Forbid the faithful to depend
On half-pint drinkers for a friend,
And in whose gay red-letter'd face
We read good-living more than grace:
Nor they so pure, and so precise,
Immac'late as their white of eyes,
Who for the spirit hug the spleen,
Phylacter'd throughout all their mien,
Who their ill-tasted home-brew'd pray'r
To the state's mellow forms prefer;
Who doctrines, as infectious, fear,
Which are not steep'd in vinegar,
And samples of heart-chested grace
Expose in show-glass of the face,
Did never me as yet provoke
Either to honour band and cloak,
Or deck my hat with leaves of oak.

I rail not with mock-patriot grace
At folks, because they are in place;
Nor, hir'd to praise with stallion pen,
Serve the ear-lechery of men;
But to avoid religious jars,
The laws are my expositors,
Which in my doubting mind create
Conformity to church and state.

I go, pursuant to my plan,
To Mecca with the caravan.
And think it right in common sense
Both for diversion and defence.

Reforming schemes are none of mine;
To mend the world's a vast design:
Like theirs, who tug in little boat,
To pull to them the ship afloat,
While to defeat their labour'd end,
At once both wind and stream contend:
Success herein is seldom seen,
And zeal, when baffled, turns to spleen.

Happy the man, who innocent,
Grieves not at ills he can't prevent;
His skiff does with the current glide,
Not puffing pull'd against the tide.
He, paddling by the scuffling crowd,
Sees unconcern'd life's wager row'd,
And when he can't prevent foul play,
Enjoys the folly of the fray.

By these reflections I repeal
Each hasty promise made in zeal.
When gospel propagators say,
We're bound our great light to display,
And Indian darkness drive away,
Yet none but drunken watchmen send,
And scoundrel link boys for that end;
When they cry up this holy war,
Which every Christian should be for,
Yet such as owe the law their ears,
We find employed as engineers:
This view my forward zeal so shocks,
In vain they hold the money-box.
At such a conduct, which intends
By vicious means such virtuous ends,
I laugh off spleen, and keep my pence
From spoiling Indian innocence.

Yet philosophic love of ease
I suffer not to prove disease,
But rise up in the virtuous cause
Of a free press, and equal laws.
The press restrain'd! nefarious thought!
In vain our sires have nobly fought:
While free from force the press remains,
Virtue and freedom cheer our plains,
And learning largesses bestows,
And keeps uncensur'd open house.
We to the nation's public mart
Our works of wit, and schemes of art,
And philosophic goods this way,
Like water-carriage, cheap convey.
This tree, which knowledge so affords,
Inquisitors with flaming swords
From lay approach with zeal defend,
Lest their own paradise should end.
The press from her fecundous womb
Brought forth the arts of Greece and Rome;
Her offspring, skill'd in logic war,
Truth's banner wav'd in open air;
The monster superstition fled,
And hid in shades its Gorgon head;
And lawless pow'r, the long-kept field,
By reason quell'd, was forc'd to yield.
This nurse of arts, and freedom's fence
To chain, is treason against sense;

And, liberty, thy thousand tongues
None silence, who design no wrongs;
For those, who use the gag's restraint,
First rob, before they stop complaint.

Since disappointment gauls within,
And subjugates the soul to spleen,
Most schemes, as money-snare, I hate,
And bite not at projector's bait.
Sufficient wrecks appear each day,
And yet fresh fools are cast away.
Ere well the bubbled can turn round,
Their painted vessel runs aground;
Or in deep seas it oversets
By a fierce hurricane of debts;
Or helm directors in one trip,
Freight first embezzled, sink the ship.
Such was of late a corporation*,
The brazen serpent of the nation,
Which, when hard accidents distress'd,
The poor must look at to be blest,
And thence expect, with paper seal'd
By fraud and us'ry, to be heal'd.

I in no soul-consumption wait
Whole years at levees of the great,
And hungry hopes regale the while
On the spare diet of a smile.
There you may see the idol stand
With mirror in his wanton hand;
Above, below, now here, now there,
He throws about the sunny glare.
Crowds pant, and press to seize the prize,
The gay delusion of their eyes.

When fancy tries her limning skill
To draw and colour at her will,
And raise and round the figure well,
And show her talent to excel,
I guard my heart, lest it should woo
Unreal beauties fancy drew,
And disappointed, feel despair
At loss of things, that never were.

When I lean politicians mark
Grazing on ether in the park;
Whoe'er on wing with open throats
Fly at debates, expresses, votes,
Just in the manner swallows use,
Catching their airy food of news;
Whose latrant stomachs oft molest
The deep-laid plans their dreams suggest;
Or see some poet pensive sit,
Fondly mistaking spleen for wit:
Who, though short-winded, still will aim
To sound the epic trump of fame;
Who still on Phœbus' smiles will doat,
Nor learn conviction from his coat;

* The Charitable Corporation, instituted for the relief of the industrious poor, by assisting them with small sums upon pledges at legal interest. By the villany of those who had the management of this scheme, the proprietors were defrauded of very considerable sums of money. In 1732, the conduct of the directors of this body became the subject of a parliamentary inquiry, and some of them who were members of the House of Commons, were expelled for their concern in this iniquitous transaction.

I bless my stars, I never knew
Whimfies, which close pursu'd, undo,
And have from old experience been
Both parent and the child of spleen.
These subjects of Apollo's state,
Who from false fire derive their fate,
With airy purchases undone
Of lands, which none lend money on,
Born dull, had follow'd thriving ways,
Nor lost one hour to gather bays.
Their fancies first delirious grew,
And scenes ideal took for true.
Fine to the sight Parnassus lies,
And with false prospects cheats their eyes;
The fabled gods the poets sing,
A season of perpetual spring,
Brooks, flow'ry fields, and groves of trees,
Affording sweets and families,
Gay dreams inspir'd in myrtle bow'rs,
And wreaths of undecaying flow'rs,
Apollo's harp with airs divine,
The sacred music of the nine,
Views of the temple rais'd to fame,
And for a vacant niche proud aim,
Ravish their souls, and plainly show
What fancy's sketching power can do.
They will attempt the mountain steep,
Where on the top, like dreams in sleep,
The muse's revelations show,
That find men crack'd, or make them so.

You, friend, like me, the trade of rhyme
Avoid, elab'rate waste of time,
Nor are content to be undone,
To pass for Phœbus' crazy son.
Poems, the hop-grounds of the brain,
Afford the most uncertain gain:
And lott'ries never tempt the wise
With blanks so many to a prize.
I only transient visits pay,
Meeting the muses in my way.
Scarce known to the fastidious dames,
Nor skill'd to call them by their names,
Nor can their passports in these days,
Your profit warrant, or your praise.
On poems by their dictates writ
Critics, as sworn appraisers, sit,
And mere upholst'ers in a trice
On gems and paintings set a price.
These tail'ring artists for our lays
Invent cramp'd rules, and with strait stays
Striving free nature's shape to hit,
Emaciate sense, before they fit.

A common place, and many friends,
Can serve the plagiary's ends,
Whose easy vamping talent lies,
First wit to pilfer, then disguise.
Thus some devoid of art and skill
To search the mine on Pindus' hill,
Proud to aspire and workmen grow,
By genius doom'd to stay below,
For their own digging show the town
Wit's treasure brought by others down.
Some wanting, if they find a mine,
An artist's judgment to refine,
On fame precipitately fix'd,
The ore with baser metals mix'd

Melt down, impatient of delay,
And call the vicious mass a play.
All these engage to serve their ends,
A band select of trusty friends,
Who, lesson'd right, extol the thing,
As Psapho* taught his birds to sing;
Then to the ladies they submit,
Returning officers on wit:
A crowded house their presence draws,
And on the beaux imposes laws,
A judgment in its favour ends,
When all the pannel are its friends:
Their natures merciful and mild
Have from mere pity sav'd the child;
In bulrush ark the bantling found
Helpless, and ready to be drown'd,
They have preserv'd by kind support,
And brought the baby-muse to court.
But there's a youth† that you can name,
Who needs no leading-strings to fame,
Whose quick maturity of brain
The birth of Pallas may explain;
Dreaming of whose depending fate,
I heard Melpomene debate,
This, this is he, that was foretold
Should emulate our Greeks of old,
Inspir'd by me with sacred art,
He sings, and rules the varied heart;
If Jove's dread anger he rehearse,
We hear the thunder in his verse;
If he describes love turn'd to rage,
The furies riot in his page.
If he fair liberty and law
By ruffian pow'r expiring draw,
The keener passions then engage
Aright, and sanctify their rage;
If he attempt disastrous love,
We hear those plaints that wound the grove,
Within the kinder passions glow,
And tears distill'd from pity flow.

From the bright vision I descend,
And my deserted theme attend.

Me never did ambition seize,
Strange fever most inflam'd by ease:
The active lunacy of pride,
That courts jilt fortune for a bride,
This par'dise-tree, so fair and high,
I view with no aspiring eye:
Like aspen shake the restless leaves,
And Sodom-fruit our pains deceives,
Whence frequent falls give no surprise,
But fits of spleen, call'd growing wise.
Greatness in glitt'ring forms display'd
Affects weak eyes much us'd to shade,
And by its falsely-envy'd scene
Gives self-debasing fits of spleen.

* Psapho was a Libyan, who desiring to be accounted a god, effected it by this means: He took young birds and taught them to sing, Psapho is a great god. When they were perfect in their lesson, he let them fly: and other birds learning the same ditty, repeated it in the woods; on which his countrymen offered sacrifice to him, and considered him as a deity.

† Mr. Glover, the excellent author of Leonidas, Boadicea, Medea, &c.

We should be pleas'd that things are so,
Who do for nothing see the show,
And, middle siz'd, can pass between
Life's hubbub safe, because unseen,
And 'midst the glare of greatness trace
A wat'ry sun-shine in the face,
And pleasures fled to, to redress
The sad fatigue of idleness.

Contentment, parent of delight,
So much a stranger to our sight,
Say, goddess, in what happy place
Mortals behold thy blooming face;
Thy gracious auspices impart,
And for thy temple choose my heart.
They, whom thou deignest to inspire,
Thy science learn, to bound desire;
By happy alchymy of mind
They turn to pleasure all they find;
They both disdain in outward mien
The grave and solemn garb of spleen,
And meretricious arts of dress,
To feign a joy, and hide distress;
Unmov'd when the rude tempest blows,
Without an opiate they repose;
And cover'd by your shield, defy
The whizzing shafts, that round them fly;
Nor meddling with the god's affairs,
Concern themselves with distant cares;
But place their bliss in mental rest,
And feast upon the good possess'd.

Forc'd by soft violence of pray'r,
The blithsome goddess sooths my care,
I feel the deity inspire,
And thus she models my desire.
Two hundred pounds half-yearly paid,
Annuity securely made,
A farm some twenty miles from town,
Small, tight, salubrious, and my own;
Two maids, that never saw the town,
A serving-man, not quite a clown,
A boy to help to tread the mow,
And drive, while t'other holds the plough;
A chief, of temper form'd to please,
Fit to converse, and keep the keys;
And better to preserve the peace,
Commission'd by the name of niece;
With understandings of a size
To think their master very wise.
May Heav'n (it's all I wish for) send
One genial room to treat a friend,
Where decent cup-board, little plate,
Display benevolence, not state.
And may my humble dwelling stand
Upon some chosen spot of land:
A pond before full to the brim,
Where cows may cool, and geese may swim;
Behind, a green like velvet neat,
Soft to the eye, and to the feet;
Where od'rous plants in evening fair
Breathe all around ambrosial air;
From Eurus, foe to kitchen ground,
Fenc'd by a slope with bushes crown'd,
Fit dwelling for the feather'd throng,
Who pay their quit-rents with a song;
With op'ning views of hill and dale,
Which sense and fancy too regale,

Where the half-cirque, which vision bounds,
Like amphitheatre surrounds;
And woods impervious to the breeze,
Thick phalanx of embodied trees,
From hills through plains in dusk array
Extended far, repel the day.
Here stillness, height, and solemn shade
Invite, and contemplation aid:
Here nymphs from hollow oaks relate
The dark decrees and will of fate,
And dreams beneath the spreading beech
Inspire, and docile fancy teach,
While soft as breezy breath of wind,
Impulses rustle through the mind,
Here Dryads, scorning Phæbus' ray,
While Pan melodious pipes away,
In measur'd motions frisk about,
'Till old Silenus puts them out.

There see the clover, pea, and bean,
Vie in variety of green;
Fresh pastures speckled o'er with sheep,
Brown fields their fallow Sabbaths keep,
Plump Ceres golden tresses wear,
And poppy top-knots deck her hair,
And silver streams through meadows stray,
Naiads on the margin play,
And lesser nymphs on side of hills
From play-things urns pour down the rills.

Thus shelter'd, free from care and strife,
May I enjoy a calm through life;
See faction, safe in low degree,
As men at land see storms at sea,
And laugh at miserable elves
Not kind, so much as to themselves,
Curs'd with such souls of base alloy,
As can possess, but not enjoy;
Debar'd the pleasure to impart
By av'rice, sphinxer of the heart,
Who wealth, hard earn'd by guilty cares,
Bequeath untouch'd to thankless heirs.
May I, with look ungloom'd by guile,
And wearing virtue's liv'ry smile,
Prone the distressed to relieve,
And little trespasses forgive,
With income not in fortune's pow'r,
And skill to make a busy hour,
With trips to town-life to amuse,
To purchase books and hear the news,
To see old friends, brush off the clown,
And quicken taste at coming down,
Unhurt by sickness' blasting rage,
And slowly mellowing in age,
When fate extends its gathering gripe,
Fall off like fruit grown fully ripe,
Quit a worn being without pain,
Perhaps to blossom soon again.

But now more serious see me grow,
And what I think, my Memnius, know.

Th' enthusiast's hope, and raptures wild,
Have never yet my reason foil'd.
His springy soul dilates like air,
When free from weight of ambient care,
And, hush'd in meditation deep,
Slides into dreams, as when asleep;
Then, fond of new discoveries grown,
Proves a Columbus of her own,

Disdains the narrow bounds of place,
And through the wilds of endless space,
Borne up on metaphysic wings,
Chafes light forms and shadowy things,
And in the vague excursion caught,
Brings home some rare exotic thought.
The melancholy man such dreams,
As brightest evidence, esteems;
Fain would he see some distant scene
Suggested by his restless spleen,
And fancy's telescope supplies
With tinctur'd glass to cheat his eyes.
Such thoughts, as love the gloom of night,
I close examine by the light;
For who, though brib'd by gain to lie,
Dare sun-beam-written truths deny,
And execute plain common sense
On faith's mere heresay evidence?

That superstition mayn't create,
And clubs its ills with those of fate,
I many a notion take to task,
Made dreadful by its visor mask.
Thus scruple, spasm of the mind,
Is cur'd, and certainty I find,
Since optic reason shows me plain,
I dreaded spectres of the brain,
And legendary fears are gone,
Though in tenacious childhood frown.
Thus in opinions I commence
Freeholder in the proper sense,
And neither suit nor service do,
Nor homage to pretenders show,
Who boast themselves by spurious roll
Lords of the manor of the soul;
Preferring sense, from chin that's bare,
'To nonsense thron'd in whisker'd hair.

To thee, Creator uncreate,
O Entium Ens! divinely great! —
Hold, muse, nor melting pinions try,
Nor near the blazing glory fly,
Nor straining break thy feeble bow,
Unfeather'd arrows far to throw:
'Through fields unknown nor madly stray,
Where no ideas mark the way.
With tender eyes and colours faint,
And trembling hands forbear to paint,
Who features veil'd by light can hit?
Where can, what has no outline fit?
My soul, the vain attempt forego,
Thyself, the fitter subject, know.
He wisely shuns the bold extreme,
Who soon lays by th' unequal theme,
Nor runs, with wisdom's tyrens caught,
On quicksands swell'wing shepwreck'd thought;
But, conscious of his distance gives
Mute praise, and humble negatives.
In one, no object of our sight,
Immutable and infinite,
Who can't be cruel or unjust,
Calm and resign'd, I fix my trust;
To him my past and present state
I owe, and must my future fate.
A stranger into life I'm come,
Dying may be our going home,
Transported here by angry fate,
The convicts of a prior state.

Hence I no anxious thoughts bestow
On matters I can never know;
Through life's foul way, like vagrant pass'd,
He'll grant a settlement at last,
And with sweet ease the wearied crown,
By leave to lay his being down.
If doom'd to dance th' eternal round
Of life no sooner lost but found,
And dissolution soon to come,
Like sponge, wipes out life's present sum,
But can't our state of pow'r bereave
An endless series to receive;
Then, if hard dealt with here by fate,
We balance in another state,
And consciousness must go along,
And sign th' acquittance for the wrong.
He for his creatures must decree
More happiness than misery,
Or be supposed to create,
Curious to try, what 'tis to hate;
And do an act, which rage infers,
'Cause lameness halts, or blindness errs.

Thus, thus I steer my bark, and sail
On even keel with gentle gale;
At helm I make my reason sit,
My crew of passions all submit.
If dark and blust'ring prove some nights,
Philosophy puts forth her lights;
Experience holds the cautious glass,
To shun the breakers, as I pass,
And frequent throws the wary lead,
To see what dangers may be hid;
And once in seven years I'm seen
At Bath or Tunbridge to careen.
Though pleas'd to see the dolphins play,
I mind my compass and my way,
With store sufficient for relief,
And wisely still prepar'd to reef,
Nor wanting the dispersive bowl
Of cloudy weather in the soul,
I make (may Heav'n propitious send Such wind and weather to the end)
Neither becalm'd, nor overblown,
Life's voyage to the world unknown.

AN EPIGRAM,

On the Reverend Mr. Lawrence Echard's and Bishop Gilbert Burnet's Histories.

GIL's history appears to me
Political anatomy,
A case of skeletons well done,
And malefactors every one.
His sharp and strong incision pen
Historically cuts up men,
And does with lucid skill impart
Their inward ails of head and heart.
Laurence proceeds another way,
And well-dress'd figures doth display;
His characters are all in flesh,
Their hands are fair, their faces fresh;
And from his sweet'ning art derive
A better scent than when alive.
He wax-work made to please the sons,
Whose fathers were Gil's skeleton's.

THE SPARROW AND DIAMOND.

A SONG.

I LATELY saw, what now I sing,
Fair Lucia's hand display'd;
This finger grac'd a diamond ring,
On that a sparrow play'd.

The feather'd plaything she caress'd;
She stroak'd its head and wings;
And while it nestled on her breast,
She lisp'd the dearest things.

With chizzled bill a spark ill-set
He loosen'd from the rest,
And swallow'd down to grind his meat,
The easier to digest.

She seiz'd his bill with wild affright,
Her diamond to descry:
'Twas gone! she sicken'd at the sight,
Moaning her bird would die.

The tongue-ty'd knocker none might use,
The curtains none undraw,
The footmen went without their shoes,
The street was laid with straw.

The doctor us'd his oily art
Of strong emetic kind,
Th' apothecary play'd his part,
And engineer'd behind.

When physic ceas'd to spend its store,
To bring away the stone,
Dicky, like people given o'er,
Picks up, when let alone.

His eyes dispell'd their sickly dews,
He peck'd behind his wing;
Lucia, recovering at the news,
Relapses for the ring.

Meanwhile within her beauteous breast
Two different passions strove;
When av'rice ended the contest,
And triumph'd over love.

Poor little, pretty, fluttering thing,
Thy pains the sex display,
Who, only to repair a ring,
Could take thy life away.

Drive av'rice from your breasts, ye fair,
Monster of foulest mien:
Ye would not let it harbour there,
Could but its form be seen.

It made a virgin put on guile,
Truth's image break her word,
A Lucia's face forbear to smile,
A Venus kill her bird.

JOVE AND SEMELE.

Occasioned by a Lady's saying. That none of the ancient poetical stories reflected so much on the vanity of women, as that of Phaëton does on the ambition of men.

JOVE for amusement quitted oft his skies,
To visit earth, contracted to our size;

And lov'd (however things in heav'n might go)
Exceedingly a game of romps below.

Miss Semele he pick'd up, as he went,
And thought he pleas'd her to her heart's content.

But minds aspiring ne'er can be at ease;
Once known a god, as man he ceas'd to please.
In tenderest time, which women know, 'tis said,
Thus she bespake the loving god in bed.

Thou, who gav'st Dædalus his mazy art,
And knowest all things but a woman's heart,
Hear my request for something yet untry'd,
And swear by Styx, I shall not be deny'd.

Fond Jove, like men, the better to succeed,
Took any oath; then bade the girl proceed.
In human guise, great Jove, leave off to rove,
Deceiving womankind, and pilf'ring love:
What are those joys, which as a man you give,
To what a god of thunder can atchieve?
Such weight of love and might of limbs employ,
As give immortal madams heav'nly joy.

Jove came array'd, as bound by cruel fate,
And Semele enjoy'd the god in state:
When flaming splendours round his beamy head
Divinely shone, and struck the mortal dead.

Faint from the course though we a while retreat,
To cool and breathe before another heat,
The gods can't know, fresh with eternal prime,
Love's stinted pause, nor want recruits from time;
But must with unabating ardours kiss,
And bear down nature with excess of bliss.

Learn hence, each fair one, whom like beauties grace,
Possess'd of lawless empire by your face,
Not to do what you list, because you may,
Let cool discretion warm desires allay;
And itching curiosity believe,
A lurking taint deriv'd from mother Eve.
Spare then the men, ye fair, and frankly own,
Your sex, like ours, has had its Phaëton.

THE SEEKER.

WHEN I first came to London, I rambled about
From sermon to sermon, took a slice and went out.

Then on me, in divinity batchelor, try'd
Many priests to obtrude a Levitical bride;
And urging their various opinions, intended
To make me wed systems, which they recommended.

Said a lech'rous old fri'r, skulking near Lincoln's-Inn, (Whose trade's to absolve, but whose pastime's to
Who, spider-like, seizes weak Protestant flies,
Which hung in his sophistry cobweb he spies);
Ah, pity your soul' for without our church pale,
If you happen to die, to be damn'd you can't fail;
The Bible, you boast is a wild revelation;
Hear a church that can't err, if you hope for salvation.

Said a formal non-con (whose rich stock of grace
Lies forward expos'd in shop window of face),
Ah, pity your soul: come, be of our sect;
For then you are safe, and may plead you're elect.

As it stands in the Acts, we can prove ourselves saints, [against.
 Being Christ's little flock every where spoke
 Said a jolly church parson (devoted to ease,
 While penal law dragons guard his golden fleece),
 If you pity your soul, I pray listen to neither;
 The first is in error, the last a deceiver:
 That ours' is the true church, the sense of our tribe is,
 And surely in medio tutissimus ibis. [band
 Said a yea and a nay friend, with a stiff hat and (Who, while he talk'd gravely, would hold forth his hand),
 Dominion and wealth are the aim of all three,
 Though about ways and means they may all disagree;
 Then pr'ythee be wise, go the Quaker's by-way,
 'Tis plain, without turnpikes, so nothing to pay.

ON BARCLAY'S APOLOGY FOR THE QUAKERS*.

THESE sheets primeval doctrines yield,
 Where revelation is reveal'd;
 Soul-phlegm from literal feeding bred,
 Systems lethargic to the head
 They purge, and yield a diet thin,
 That turns to gospel-chyle within.
 Truth sublimate may here be seen,
 Extracted from the parts terrene.
 In these is shown, how men obtain
 What of Prometheus poets feign:
 To Scripture plainness dress is brought,
 And speech, apparel to the thought.
 They hiss, from instinct, at red coats,
 And war, whose work is cutting throats,
 Forbid, and press the law of love:
 Breathing the spirit of the dove.
 Lucrative doctrines they detest,
 As manufactur'd by the priest;
 And throw down turnpikes, where we pay
 For stuff, which never mends the way;
 And tythes, a Jewish tax, reduce,
 And frank the gospel for our use.
 They fable standing armies break;
 But the militia useful make:
 Since all unhir'd may preach and pray,
 Taught by these rules as well as they;
 Rules which, when truths themselves reveal,
 Bid us to follow what we feel.
 The world can't hear the small still voice,
 Such is its bustle and its noise;

* This celebrated book was written by its author, both in Latin and English, and was afterwards translated into High Dutch, Low Dutch, French, and Spanish, and probably into other languages. It has always been esteemed a very ingenious defence of the principles of Quakerism, even by those who deny the doctrines which it endeavours to establish. The author was born at Edinburgh, in 1648, and received part of his education at the Scots College in Paris, where his uncle was principal. His father became one of the earliest converts to the new sect; and, from his example, the son seems to have been induced to tread in his steps. He died on the 3d of October, 1690, in the 42d year of his age.

Reason the proclamation reads,
 But not one riot passion heeds.
 Wealth, honour, power, the graces are,
 Which here below our homage share:
 They, if one votary they find
 To mistress more divine inclin'd,
 In truth's pursuit, to cause delay,
 Throw golden apples in his way.
 Place me, O Heav'n! in some retreat;
 There let the serious death-watch beat,
 There let me self in silence shun,
 To feel thy will, which should be done.
 Then comes the Spirit to our hut,
 When fast the senses' doors are shut;
 For so divine and pure a guest
 The emptiest rooms are furnish'd best.
 O contemplation! air serene!
 From damps of sense, and fogs of spleen!
 Pure mount of thought! thrice holy ground,
 Where grace, when waited for, is found.
 Here 'tis the soul feels sudden youth,
 And meets, exulting, virgin truth;
 Here, like a breeze of gentlest kind,
 Impulses rustle through the mind;
 Here shines that light with glowing face,
 The fuse divine, that kindles grace;
 Which, if we trim our lamps, will last,
 Till darkness be by dying past.
 And then goes out at end of night,
 Extinguish'd by superior light.
 Ah me! the heats and colds of life,
 Pleasure's and pain's eternal strife,
 Breed stormy passions, which confin'd,
 Shake, like th' Æolian cave, the mind,
 And raise despair; my lamp can last,
 Plac'd where they drive the furious blast.
 False eloquence! big empty sound!
 Like showers that rush upon the ground!
 Little beneath the surface goes,
 All streams along, and muddy flows.
 This sinks, and swells the buried grain,
 And fructifies like southern rain.
 His art, well hid in mild discourse,
 Exerts persuasion's winning force,
 And nervates so the good design,
 That King Agrippa's case is mine.
 Well-natur'd, happy shade, forgive
 Like you I think, but cannot live.
 Thy scheme requires the world's contempt,
 That from dependence life exempt;
 And constitution fram'd so strong,
 This world's worst climate cannot wrong,
 Not such my lot, not fortune's brat,
 I live by pulling off the hat;
 Compell'd by station every hour
 To bow to images of power;
 And in life's busy scenes immers'd,
 See better things, and do the worst.
 Eloquent want, whose reasons sway,
 And make ten thousand truths give way,
 While I your scheme with pleasure trace,
 Draws near, and stares me in the face.
 Consider well your state, she cries,
 Like others kneel, that you may rise;
 Hold doctrines, by no scruples vex'd,
 To which preferment is annex'd;

Nor madly prove, where all depends,
 Idolatry upon your friends.
 See, how you like my rueful face,
 Such you must wear, if out of place.
 Crack'd is your brain to turn recluse,
 Without one farthing out at use.
 They, who have lands, and safe bank stock,
 With faith so founded on a rock,
 May give a rich invention ease,
 And construe Scripture how they please.

The honour'd prophet, that of old
 Us'd Heav'n's high counsels to unfold,
 Did, more than courier angels, greet
 The crows, that brought him bread and meat.

THE GROTTO *.

Written under the Name of Peter Drake, a Fisherman of Brentford.

Printed in the Year 1732, but not published.

"Scilicet hic possis curvo dignoscere rectum,
 "Atque inter silvas Academi quærere verum."

HOR.

Our wits Apollo's influence beg,
 The Grotto makes them all with egg:
 Finding this chalk-stone in my nest,
 I strain, and lay among the rest.

ADIEU a while, forsaken flood,
 To ramble in the Delian wood,
 And pray the god my well-meant song
 May not my subject's merit wrong.

Say, father Thames, whose gentle pace
 Gives leave to view what beauties grace
 Your flow'ry banks, if you have seen
 The much-sung grotto of the queen.
 Contemplative, forget a while
 Oxonian towers, and Windsor's pile,
 And Wolfey's † pride (his greatest guilt)
 And what great William since has built;
 And flowing fast by Richmond scenes,
 ‡ (Honour'd retreat of two great queens)
 From || Sion-House, whose proud survey
 Browbeats your flood, look cross the way,
 And view, from highest swell of tide,
 The milder scenes of Surry-side.

Though yet no palace grace the shore,
 To lodge that pair you should adore;
 Nor abbies, great in ruin, rise,
 Royal equivalents for vice;
 Behold a grott, in Delphic grove,
 The graces' and the muses' love.
 (O, might our laureat study here,
 How would he hail his new-born year)!

* A building in Richmond-Gardens, erected by Queen Caroline, and committed to the custody of Stephen Duck. At the time this poem was written, many other verses appeared on the same subject.

† Hampton-Court, begun by Cardinal Wolfey, and improved by King William III.

‡ Queen Anne, consort of King Richard II. and Queen Elizabeth, both died at Richmond.

|| Sion-House is now a seat belonging to the Duke of Northumberland.

A temple from vain glories free,
 Whose goddess is philosophy,
 Whose sides such licens'd idols crown
 As superstition would pull down;
 The only pilgrimage I know,
 That men of sense would choose to go:
 Which sweet abode, her wisest choice,
 Urania cheers with heavenly voice,
 While all the virtues gather round,
 To see her consecrate the ground.
 If thou, the god with winged feet,
 In council talk of this retreat,
 And jealous gods resentment show
 At altars rais'd to men below;
 Tell those proud lords of heaven, 'tis fit
 Their house our heroes should admit;
 While each exists, as poets sing,
 A lazy lewd immortal thing,
 They must (or grow in disrepute)
 With earth's first commoners recruit.

Needless it is in terms unskill'd
 To praise whatever Boyle * shall build;
 Needless it is the bulks to name
 Of men, monopolists of fame;
 Four chiefs adorn the modest stone †,
 For virtue as for learning known;
 The thinking sculpture helps to raise
 Deep thoughts, the genii of the place:
 To the mind's ear, and inward sight,
 Their silence speaks, and shade gives light:
 While insects from the threshold preach,
 And minds dispos'd to musing teach:
 Proud of strong limbs and painted hues,
 They perish by the slightest bruise;
 Or maladies, begun within,
 Destroy more slow life's frail machine;
 From maggot-youth through change of state,
 They feel like us the turns of fate;
 Some born to creep have liv'd to fly,
 And change earth-cells for dwellings high;
 And some that did their six wings keep,
 Before they dy'd been forc'd to creep,
 They politics like ours profess,
 The greater prey upon the less:
 Some strain on foot huge loads to bring;
 Some toil incessant on the wing;
 And in their different ways explore
 Wise sense of want by future store;
 Nor from their vigorous schemes desist
 'Till death, and then are never miss'd.
 Some frolic, toil, marry, increase,
 Are sick and well, have war and peace,
 And, broke with age, in half a day
 Yield to successors, and away.

Let not profane this sacred place,
 Hypocrisy with Janus' face;

* Richard Boyle, Earl of Burlington, a nobleman remarkable for his fine taste in architecture. "Never was protection and great wealth more generously and judiciously diffused than by this great person, who had every quality of a genius and artist, except envy." He died December 4. 1753.

† The author should have said five; there being the boys of Newton, Locke, Wollaston, Clarke, and Boyle.

Or pomp, mixt state of pride and care;
 Court kindness, falsehood's polish'd ware;
 Scandal disguis'd in friendship's veil,
 That tells, unask'd, th' injurious tale;
 Or art politic, which allows
 The Jesuit-remedy for vows:
 Or priest, perfuming crowned head,
 'Till in a swoon truth lies for dead;
 Or tawdry critic, who perceives
 No grace, which plain proportion gives,
 And more than lineaments divine
 Admires the gilding of the shrine;
 Or that self-haunting spectre spleen,
 In thickest fog the clearest seen;
 Or prophecy, which dreams a lie,
 That fools believe and knaves apply;
 Or frolic mirth, profanely loud,
 And happy only in a crowd;
 Or melancholy's pensive gloom,
 Proxy in contemplation's room.

O Delia! when I touch this string,
 To thee my muse directs her wing.
 Unspotted fair! with downcast look
 Mind not so much the murmur'ing brook;
 Nor fixt in thought, with footsteps slow
 Through cypress alleys cherish woe:
 I see the soul in pensive fit,
 And moping like sick linnet sit.
 With dewy eye, and moulting wing,
 Unperch'd, averse to fly or sing;
 I see the favourite curls begin
 (Disus'd to toilet discipline)
 To quit their post, lose their smart air,
 And grow again like common hair;
 And tears, which frequent kerchiefs dry,
 Raise a red circle round the eye;
 And by this bur about the moon,
 Conjecture more ill weather soon.
 Love not so much the doleful knell:
 And news the boding night-birds tell;
 Nor watch the wainscot's hollow blow;
 And hens portentous when they crow;
 Nor sleepless mind the death-watch beat;
 In taper find no winding-sheet:
 Nor in burnt coal a coffin see,
 Though thrown at others, meant for thee:
 Or when the corruscation gleams,
 Find out not first the bloody streams;
 Nor in impress remembrance keep
 Grim tap'stry figures wrought in sleep;
 Nor rise to see in antique hall
 The moon-light monsters on the wall,
 And shadowy spectres darkly pass
 Trailing their fables o'er the grass.
 Let vice and guilt act how they please
 In souls, their conquer'd provinces;
 By Heaven's just charter it appears,
 Virtue's exempt from quartering fears,
 Shall then arm'd fancies fiercely drest,
 Live at discretion in your breast?
 Be wise, and panic fright disdain,
 As notions, meteors of the brain;
 And fights perform'd, illusive scene!
 By magic lanthorn of the spleen.
 Come here, from baleful cares releas'd,
 With virtue's ticket, to a feast,

Where decent mirth and wisdom join'd
 In stewardship, regale the mind.
 Calls back the Cupids to your eyes,
 I see the godlings with surprise.
 Not knowing home in such a plight,
 Fly to and fro, afraid to light---

Far from my theme, from method far,
 Convey'd in Venus' flying car,
 I go compell'd by feather'd steeds,
 That scorn the rein when Delia leads.

No daub of elegiac strain
 These holy wars shall ever stain;
 As spiders Irish wainscot flee,
 Falsehood with them shall disagree:
 This floor let not the vulgar tread,
 Who worship only what they dread:
 Nor bigots who but one way see
 Through blinkers of authority;
 Nor they who its four saints defame
 By making virtue but a name;
 Nor abstract wit (painful regale
 To hunt the pig with slippery tail)!
 Artists, who richly chase their thought,
 Gaudy without, but hollow wrought;
 And beat too thin, and tool'd too much
 To bear the proof and standard touch:
 Nor fops to guard this sylvan ark
 With necklace bells in treble bark:
 Nor cynics growl and fiercely paw,
 The mastiffs of the moral law.
 Come, nymph, with rural honours drest,
 Virtue's exterior form confess,
 With charms untarnish'd, innocence
 Display, and Eden shall commence;
 When thus you come in sober fit,
 And wisdom is preferr'd to wit;
 And looks diviner graces tell,
 Which don't with giggling muscles dwell;
 And beauty like the ray-clipt sun,
 With bolder eye we look upon;
 Learning shall with obsequious mien
 Tell all the wonders she has seen;
 Reason her logic armour quit,
 And proof to mild persuasion fit;
 Religion with free thought dispense,
 And cease crusading against sense;
 Philosophy and she embrace,
 And their first league again take place;
 And morals pure, in duty bound,
 Nymph-like the sisters chief surround;
 Nature shall smile, and round this cell
 The turf to your light pressure swell,
 And knowing beauty by her shoe,
 Well air its carpet from the dew.
 The oak, while you his umbrage deck,
 Lets fall his acorns in your neck;
 Zephyr his civil kisses gives,
 And plays with curls instead of leaves:
 Birds, seeing you, believe it spring,
 And during their vacation sing;
 And flow'rs lean forward from their seats
 To traffic in exchange of sweets;
 And angels bearing wreaths descend,
 Preferr'd as vergers to attend
 This fane, whose deity entreats
 The fair to grace its upper seats.

O kindly view our letter'd strife,
And guard us through polemic life;
From poison vehicled in praise,
For satire's shots but slightly graze;
We claim your zeal, and find within,
Philosophy and you are kin.

What virtue is we judge by you;
For actions right are beauteous too;
By tracing the sole female mind,
We best what is true nature find:
Your vapours bred from fumes declare,
How steams create tempestuous air,
'Till gushing tears and hasty rain
Make heaven and you serene again:
Our travels through the starry skies
Were first suggested by your eyes;
We, by the interposing fan,
Learn how eclipses first began;
The vast ellipse from Scarbro's home,
Describes how blazing comets roam:

The glowing colours of the cheek
Their origin from Phœbus speak;
Our watch how Luna strays above
Feels like the care of jealous love;
And all things we in science know
From your known love for riddles flow.

Father! forgive, thus far I stray,
Drawn by attraction from my way.
Mark next with awe, the soundress well
Who on these banks delights to dwell;
You on the terrace see her plain,
Move like Diana with her train.
If you then fairly speak your mind,
In wedlock since with Isis join'd,
You'll own, you never yet did see,
At least in such a high degree,
Greatness delighted to undress;
Science a scepter'd hand caress;
A queen the friends of freedom prize;
A woman wise men canonize.

THE LIFE OF COOPER.

JOHN GILBERT COOPER, "the English Anacreon," was the son of ——— Gilbert Cooper, Esq. of Thurgarton Priory in Nottinghamshire, and was born in 1723. The family estate which he inherited was granted at the dissolution of the religious houses by King Henry VIII. to William Cooper, one of his ancestors. His father served the office of High Sheriff of the county, in 1739.

He received his education at Westminster School, under Dr. Nicholls; and had for his school-fellows Lord Albemarle, Lord Buckinghamshire, Major Johnson, Mr. George Ashby, and other eminent and ingenious men.

In 1743, he became a Fellow Commoner of Trinity College, Cambridge, and resided there two or three years; but quitted the University on his marriage with Susanna, the daughter of William Wright, Esq. son to Lord Keeper Wright, and Recorder of Leicester, 1729-1763, and settled at his family seat.

In 1745, he published, without his name, The Power of Harmony, a poem in two books, 4to; and in 1746 and 1747, he produced several essays and poems under the signature of Pbilalethes, in a periodical work, called "The Museum," published by Doddsley. On his eldest son, who was born July 25, 1749, and died the next day, he wrote a Latin Epitaph, which is placed in the chancel of St. Margaret's Church, Leicester, and of which a burlesque poetical translation is printed in "Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. XLVIII. p. 487.

The same year, he published the work by which he is chiefly known, intitled, The Life of Socrates, collected from the Memorabilia of Xenophon and the Dialogues of Plato, and illustrated farther by Aristotle, Diodorus Siculus, Cicero, Proclus, Apuleius, Maximus Tyrius, Boethius, Diogenes Laertius, Aulus Gellius, and others, 8vo. with a head of Socrates and emblematical vignettes, by Boitard.

In this work, which received much assistance from his friend, the Rev. John Jackson of Leicester, who communicated several learned notes, he gave evident marks of superior genius, warm, impetuous, and impatient of restraint. In the text, but particularly in the notes, he sometimes displayed the inordinate vanity and self-sufficiency of a young author, in speaking without due deference of preceding writers; whom, not content with confuting, he treats like a merciless exulting conqueror, thoughtless of the vicissitudes of war, and regardless how soon it might be his fortune to fall under the lash of critics as severe as himself.

Speaking of his own style, he says, "It is such in every place as the subject seems to require; concise, though circumstantial; in the historical parts, diffused and declamatory in the recapitulation, and close and unaffected in the occasional reflections."

As to his freedom with other authors, "some expressions," says he, "may appear too harsh, and others too ludicrous; but all weapons are not to be used alike; for, as the ancient warlike Scythians found, in the servile war, that whips more intimidated the army of slaves that marched amongst them than the sword, which had so often corrected the pride of nations; so, contumely and ridicule will avail against those who are lost to good manners, candour, and good sense, when the nobler methods of humanity, reason, and learning, would prove ineffectual. The sentiments of others who write like men, are examined in the same spirit; and, where the author is obliged to oppose their opinions, he does it with a proper respect due to their character, always distinguishing between the designing deceptions of the heart, and the involuntary errors of a misled understanding."

"He entered on the work," he adds, "with no small application, for his own instruction and amusement; and, after being carefully revised, it is now communicated with the honest design of making others partake in the same satisfaction this inquiry has afforded him. If this desirable end cannot be obtained, he thinks it is paying a greater respect to mankind to confess that the failure proceeds from deficiency of abilities, and not from the want of laudable endeavours. Whatever failings the learned may observe, the author has reason to expect, since all he advances is intended for the promotion of good manners, morality, and true religion, that they would, with the good-nature becoming such, candidly impute them to error, insisting strongly on the merit of his design, however little he may have in the execution of it."

The most formidable antagonist which he provoked was Warburton, who then figured high in the first ranks of learning; "a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which had not oppressed his imagination, nor clouded his perspicacity."

In a note on Pope's "Essay on Criticism," he thus takes occasion to introduce Cooper. "As ignorance, when joined with humility, produces stupid admiration, on which account it is so commonly observed to be the mother of devotion and blind homage; so, when joined with vanity (as it always is in bad critics), it gives birth to every iniquity of impudent abuse and slander. See an example (for want of a better) in a late worthless and now forgotten thing, called The Life of Socrates; where the head of the author (as a man of wit observed on reading the book) has just made a shift to do the office of a camera obscura, and represent things in an inverted order, himself above, and Sprat, Rollin, Voltaire, and every other author of reputation, below."

This severe attack produced Curfory Remarks on Mr. Warburton's new edition of Mr. Pope's Works, in a Letter to a Friend, 1751; in which he appeals to the impartial reader, "whether there is the least reflection through the whole Life of Socrates, or the notes upon Mr. W's morals, and whether he has not confined his criticism to Mr. W's practice as an author," and declares the epithet bestowed upon him by Mr. W. to be "a downright slander."

"I have undergone," says he, "young as I am, too many disappointments in life to wonder much at many things which the mob of mankind call extraordinary, otherwise I might be surprised that almost a total retirement from the world would not shelter me from the injuries of it, especially too at an age when few have had any concerns with it. I thought I might have enjoyed an unenvied obscurity in the most undisturbed peace and tranquillity, and that calumny was too busy about the names of those who were candidates for fame, to find time to visit the recesses of one whose contempt of every advantage of life but what conduced to quiet, should, it was hoped, protect him from the poisonous breath of that daughter of envy. But I was greatly mistaken, it seems, in my humble expectations; for I had scarcely begun to feel the calm comforts which the absence of contention yields to a thinking creature, before I was informed, by letters from some of my friends in town, that Mr. Warburton had, with his usual humanity and good-nature, very compendiously answered the Life of Socrates in the tail of one note, by the free use of those appellations he has indiscriminately thrown out upon not only all those who have ever had any controversy with him, but upon all others too whom he ever suspected to have the rashness to contradict any of his opinions. Howsoever this would have alarmed me heretofore as an author, from the pen of any other person, it had no effect upon me from the writer it came from; and I sat down contemptuously contented, without so much as being solicitous to know what abuse he had conferred upon my writings. I say abuse, for he never spoke of an opponent without it. But as indifferent as I was about my character as a writer, I can't say I was quite so easy when I was afterwards told that he had attacked it as a man. Upon this, I wrote to him that I thought he had used me very ill, and should take proper notice of him for it in public. In answer to which, he tells a friend of mine "that he was surprised I should think myself ill used, for that he had never mentioned my name or writings in public or in conversation but with honour, till I had wrote a book wherein I had treated him through the whole with a scurrility worse than Billinggate, and that he had now taken no other revenge than the casual mention of the Life of Socrates (without the mention of my name) with a slight joke." I will ask any impartial reader if there is the least reflection through the whole Life of Socrates, or the notes upon Mr. W's morals? whether I have not confined my criticism to his practice as an author? and whether every thing therein advanced cannot be proved over and over again by citations from the "Divine Legation" and his other tracts? At the same time, I desire one part of the dispute betwixt us may be finished by an answer to these questions: Is not calling a guiltless man an impudent slanderer, calumny, and quite a different revenge than a slight joke? and has not Mr. W. done that in the note in question?"

According to this account of the quarrel, it appears that Cooper was the aggressor, in consequence, it would seem, of Warburton's attack on the first Academics, and many of the more humane Stoics, among the ancients; Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Geddes, Hutcheson, and Akenfide, among the moderns, of whom he was a most zealous admirer and imitator.

"I have great reason," says he, "to believe, from his treatment of others, that, considering the favourable though undeserved reception the Life of Socrates met with from the public, I should not have escaped his good-natured notice, even if I had never in the course of my argument called his opinions professedly in question; for how could a living advocate for benevolence, and the dignity of human nature, hope to escape the rage of one who had so far declared a Quixotic war with both, as impiously to rush into the tombs of the dead, and to deliver up the ashes of those to defamation who had been most glorious ornaments of our species."

In 1754, he published his Letters on Taste, 8vo, an elegant little volume, on which no small share of his reputation is founded; and in 1755, The Tomb of Shakspeare, a Vision, 4to, a performance in which there is more of wit and application than of nature or genius.

In 1756, he assisted Moore, by writing some numbers of The World; and attempted to rouse the indignation of his countrymen against the Hessians, at that time brought over to defend the nation, in an iambic ode, intituled, The Genius of Great Britain, with a poetical dedication to Mr. Pitt.

In 1758, he published Epistles to the Great, from Aristippus in Retirement, 4to; and The Call of Aristippus, Epistle IV. to Mark Akenfide, M. D. 4to, written in imitation of some fashionable French writers, Chapelle, Chaulieu, la Fare, Madame Deshoulières, and particularly of Gresset.

The same year, he published A Father's Advice to his Son, 4to; and in the "Annual Register" for that year is his translation of An Epistle from the King of Prussia to M. Voltaire.

In 1759, he published Ver-Vert, or the Nunnery Parrot, an Heroic Poem, in two Cantos, inscribed to the Abbess of D, translated from the French of M. Gresset, reprinted in the first volume of Dilly's "Repository," 1777, and in 1783.

In 1763, he served the office of High Sheriff of the county of Nottingham, was in the Commission of the Peace, and about this time a constant attendant and a frequent speaker at the society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, and was for a little while one of the chairmen of the Committee of Polite Arts. It was an object of ambition with him to be chosen a Vice-President of that most respectable and useful society; but not being elected, his dissatisfaction was so great, that he discontinued his attendance.

In 1764, he published an ingenious Project for raising an Hospital for Decayed Authors, 8vo, reprinted in the second volume of Doddsley's "Fugitive Pieces."

The same year, he published Poems on Several Subjects, by the Author of the Life of Socrates, 12mo, including all the pieces he had published separately except Ver-Vert, with a prefatory advertisement by Doddsley; in which his declaration to him that "he was very little solicitous what would be the fate of them," was probably the result of affectation or disgust.

"The following poems having been very favourably received by the public when they first appeared in detached pieces, the author has been prevailed upon to permit me to collect them into this small volume. When I requested him to give me a preface, he replied, "That to those to whom such trifles afforded pleasure, a formal introduction would be unnecessary; that he wrote most of them when he was very young, for his own amusement, and published them afterwards for my profit; and as they had once answered both these ends, he was very little solicitous what would be the fate of them for the future."

He died at his father's house in May-Fair, after a long and excruciating illness, arising from the stone, April 14. 1769, in the 46th year of his age.

Cooper was a man of an agreeable appearance, of polite address, and accomplished manners. He was an active and useful magistrate; and his abilities were considerable enough to entitle him to the distinction of a polite and ingenious, though not a first rate writer. He belonged to a particular school of literature, that of his namesake Anthony Ashley Cooper, third Earl of Shaftsbury, as is apparent from his works in general, and is acknowledged in several particular passages. He was likewise devoted to other writers who embraced the sentimental philosophy, and especially to Hutcheson and Akenfide.

The Life of Socrates, his first production, by which he acquired a temporary celebrity, is not now held in much estimation. His Letters on Taste, the most popular of his prose works, have gone through four editions. In the first edition, he carried his applause of Akenfide to a ridiculous height of extravagance. To the two last editions are added nine Essays on various subjects. Perhaps he is not very accurate in his definition of Taste; and the justness of his criticisms may sometimes be disputed; but the work is an agreeable one upon the whole, and will be read with pleasure by the lovers of polite literature.

On the first appearance of the Letters on Taste, it was acutely observed by Dr. Johnson, "Literary Magazine" 1757, "that Cooper's genius seemed to shine more in description than in definition; that he had more of imagery than of speculation; that his imagination was the strongest talent of his mind; and that if he had not attempted to offer any thing new on the subject of Taste, he was always so entertaining, spirited, and splendid, in his diction, that the reader who is not instructed by him cannot fail of being pleased and diverted."

No edition of his Poems on Several Subjects has been called for since his death; but most of his pieces published separately have been reprinted in the Miscellanies. They are now, with Ver-Vert and the Song to Winifreda, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

As a poet, the compositions of Cooper are characterised by ease, elegance, and spriteliness. He is not destitute of enthusiasm and of fancy; but his fancy is not always under proper regulation; and he sometimes fails in the precision of his ideas. His sentiments, though seldom new, are generally liberal and just; his diction, with some exceptions, proper and easy; and his versification sweetly modulated and harmonious. His chief defect is a superabundance of prosopopeias, which is one of the tricks of modern poetry.

His Epistles to his Friends in Town, from Arisippus in Retirement, are the most pleasing of his poetical compositions. To the original edition is prefixed a frontispiece, which may be considered as the argument and scope of the Epistles. Arisippus, that tasteful ancient, who, according to Horace, became every situation, and adapted himself properly to all circumstances, makes the principal figure in the piece. He is seated conspicuously, crowned with roses by the groves of Epicurus or Academus, with the Loves hovering above him, and appears dismissing his attendant satyr among the high-born and high-stationed group of mortals in different professions, who are figuring it much beneath him in attitudes sufficiently poignant and ludicrous. The Epistles exhibit the first example in our language of a successful imitation of Gresset, and other French writers, in the arbitrary disposition of the rhyme, and the easy lightness and variety of the numbers. In the first epistle, intituled, The Retreat of Arisippus, he expatiates on the exquisite taste and mental elegance in which he lives and converses, surrounded with wit and science, the pleasures, graces, &c. His particular purpose is to convince the nameless Peer, to whom it is addressed, of his philosophical superiority to courts and courtiers, and even the ribboned and gartered peerage; to whom, with their levees, at the conclusion, he contrasts himself and his own. His second epistle, intituled, The Temper of Arisippus, addressed to a lady, by the poetical name of Melissa, has many beauties. In the following passage, in which he describes his own temper of mind, the principal image of Philomela, and those which accompany it, are agreeably expressed, and in numbers very pleasingly modulated.

When, in the silent midnight grove,
Sweet Philomela swells her throat
With tremulous and plaintive note,
Expressive of disast'rous love,
I with the pensive pleasures dwell,
And, in their calm sequester'd cell,
Listen with rapturous delight
To the soft songster of the night,

Here Echo, in her mossy cave,
Symphonious to the love lorn song,
Warbles the vocal rocks among.
Whilst gently-trickling waters lave
The oak-fring'd mountain's hoary brow,
Whose streams, united in the vale,
O'er pebbled beds loquacious flow,
Tun'd to the sad melodious tale
In numbers querulously flow.

His third epistle, intituled, The Apology of Arisippus, is addressed to a friend; to whom he apologises for his writing verses, when the supercilious censors may object such an employment to him at the decline of his youth. He characterises his own poetry in the following beautiful lines.

But should you ask me why I choose
Of all the laurel'd filterhood
Th' inhabitants of Pindus' wood,
The least considerable muse,
The v'lets round the mountain's feet,
Whose humble gems unheeded blow,
Are to the shepherd's smell more sweet
Than lofty cedars on its brow,
Let the loud Epic sound th' alarms
Of dreadful war, and heroes sprung
From some immortal ancestry,
Clad in impenetrable arms
By Vulcan forg'd, my lyre is strung
With softer chords, my muse more free
Wanders through Pindus' humbler ways
In amiable simplicity:
Unstudy'd are her artless lays;
She asks no laurel for her brows;
Careless of censure or of praise,
She haunts where tender myrtle grows;
Fonder of happiness than fame,
To the proud bay prefers the rose,
Nor barter pleasure for a name.
On nature's lap reclin'd at ease,
I listen to her heav'nly tongue,
From her derive the pow'r to please,
From her receive th' harmonious time,
And what the goddess makes my song
In unpremeditated rhyme
Mellifluous flows, whilst young Desire,
Cull'd from th' Elysian bloom of spring,
Strews flow'rs immortal round my lyre,
And fancy's sportive children bring,
From blossom'd grove and lillied mead,
Fresh fragrant chaplets for my head.
The most, though softest of the nine,
Euterpe, muse of gaiety,
Queen of heart-soft'ning melody,
Allures my ear with notes divine.
In my retreat Euterpe plays,
Where science, garlanded with flow'rs,
Enraptur'd listens to her lays
Beneath the shade of myrtle bow'rs.

His fourth epistle, intituled, The Call of Arisippus, is addressed to Akenfide, in a strain of exalted panegyric; and contains some beautiful passages pregnant with the genuine spirit of poetical enthusiasm. In describing his poetical inauguration, in imitation of Horace, the lyric muse warbles with all her native wildness and freedom. The doves covered Horace, as he tells us, with fresh leaves, when he was a child, and had sported himself asleep near a wood. The Call of Arisippus is not so simple. The elves and fairies danced about him as he slumbered under a blooming hawthorn; the nightingale neglected her singing to make him a flowery couch; the red-breast rose at day-break to furnish him with a pillow of wild roses; while the bees, without disturbing him, filled his little lips with May honey.

In these Epistles, Cooper is continually varying his numbers, and combining them in the manner that is most agreeable to the ear. But this airy melody is only calculated for light subjects, and would be ridiculous if employed to express the grave or the sublime.

The Power of Harmony, his next principal poetical work, is evidently composed in imitation of "Akenfide's Pleasures of Imagination," without rising to the same degree of merit. It abounds with the sentiments of Shaftsbury, not very perspicuously expressed. His Vision of Shakspeare is a performance of considerable excellence. The scene of the vision is supposed on the banks of the Avon, where Shakspeare is interred. Fancy, who is employed in decking his grave with flowers, while she laments his death, raises up the imaginary beings introduced by Shakspeare in his dramas; as Ariel, Prospero, Caliban, the fairies, witches, and ghosts; after which, the sun banishing Morpheus and his dreams, he concludes the poem with an address apparently improper, to the "dear enchantress of the brain," to give wealth, honour, and renown, to others, but to give him content with such innocence as is attainable by man, and to teach him self-knowledge. It is written in alternate rhyme, like the "Elegy in a Country Church-yard," which probably excited his emulation, and tinged his fancy a little, though the particular quality of the subject has prevented any remarkable imitation of it. The introductory stanzas, among many others, are beautifully descriptive; the expression is apt and elegant, and the versification throughout flows with an agreeable lulling melody.

The admirers of simple and elegant poetry are obliged to Cooper for bringing them acquainted with the Song to Winifreda, inserted in his Letters on Taste. The Father's Advice to his Son is a fine imitation of it, and is perhaps the most popular of his performances. His Genius of Great Britain breathes the genuine spirit of liberty and poetry. His Songs are sprightly and elegant.

His version of the Ver-Vert of his favourite Gresset has the elegance, delicate raillery, playfulness, and grace, of the original in a high degree. This poem has been long admired amongst the most elegant of the mock heroics. It has not the dignity and strong satire of the "Lutrin," nor the rich invention of the "Rape of the Lock," but is distinguished by its lightness, gaiety, and ease. Gresset was bred a Jesuit; but his wit procured his dismissal from the society. His Ver-Vert could expect no pardon from the convent, being a satire against nunneries. The story of the poem is briefly this: Ver-Vert was a parrot belonging to the nuns of the visitation at Nevers, and a great favourite with the whole sisterhood. The young novices treated him with sugar plums and bonbons; the mothers taught him Ave Marias and Pater Nosters; from which he profited so well, that his fame spread to a sisterhood at Nantes, the nuns of which sent an earnest request that this edifying bird might be permitted to pay them a visit. He is accordingly sent to them by the Loire; but during the voyage, having for his fellow passengers two or three dragoons and other company of that stamp, he unfortunately forgets all the pious aspirations of the convent, and learns the reprobate language of his new companions; in which, to their infinite surprise and disappointment, he accosts the nuns of Nantes, who are struck with horror at his graceless conversation, so different from what they were taught to expect, and send him back in disgrace to Nevers, where the change in his manners excites equal astonishment. Poor Ver-Vert is condemned to a penitentiary cell and bread and water, till his fault is supposed to be expiated; but, on the day appointed for his restoration to favour, the joy and affection of the younger nuns lead them to feast him so profusely with sweetmeats and other good things, that he is literally killed with kindness.

Such is the outline of the tale, to which Gresset has given infinite spirit, by having thrown so much of character into the portrait of his hero, who appears in the first part a novice, innocent, and demure, and, after his transformation, a lively rake, and petite maitre. Perhaps he would have told his story more neatly, had he concluded it with the arrival of his hero at Nantes.

Another version of Ver-Vert, in heroic verse, was printed in 1793, 4to, the production of the learned and ingenious Dr. Geddes, who knew not that it had been previously translated by Cooper, in the agreeable and easy manner of the original. The features of the poem are faithfully rendered by Dr. Geddes; but the verse is not finished with sufficient care, and we miss in it the charm which engaged us in reading Gresset and Cooper.

"I am glad," says Gray, "in one of his letters to Dr. Wharton, "you have had any pleasure in Gresset; he seems to me a truly elegant and charming writer. The "Mechant" is the best comedy I ever read; his "Edward" I could scarce get through; it is puerile, though there are good lines. However, you are to consider this is a collection made up by the Dutch booksellers; many things unfinished or written in his youth, or designed not for the world, but to make his friends laugh, as the "Lutrin Vivant," &c; but then there are the Ver-Vert, the "Epistle to P. Bougeant, the Chartreuse," that to his sister, an "Ode on his Country," another on "Mediocrity," and the "Sidnei," another comedy, all which have great beauties."

In estimating the peculiar merit of Cooper as an imitator of Gresset, &c. it may be reasonably doubted whether it be eligible to imitate the French in an arbitrary disposition of rhyme, to which the unsuitness of their language for better poetry seems to have reduced them, when that is not the case in ours. Imitation seems scarcely to merit attention for its own sake, but for the contingency of some improvement that may result from it. And if those modes of rhyme adapted to sportive and familiar subjects, and long established by the use of good writers in our own language, shall be at least full as applicable to every purpose for which this freedom of rhyme and diction is designed, the introduction of it will be useless at the best, though it should not strictly subject the introducer to Quintilian's imputation of the frivola in parvis jaclantia. Butler, Prior, and Green, have abundantly demonstrated our short measures of eight syllables in single, and of nine in double rhymes, (besides the English Anacreontic of Seven) to be well adapted to subjects of humour and pleasantry, and to be capable of comprising much wit, and many beauties, in diction of equal ease and vivacity. Indeed, as Cooper has infused an equal proportion of wit and of original conceptions, in equally happy expression, into his Epistles, &c. it may serve in some measure to reconcile us to the arbitrary return and frequent sameness of many of his rhymes, which read too prosaically, and rather like parentheses. But where such species of novelty is predicated, as the principal recommendation of a work, its applause will probably be limited to the admirers of that easy French poetry, which has been thought by some of our best critics too frothy and spiritless.

rendered by Dr. Geddes; but the style is not finished with a like care, and we must in it the charm which engaged us in reading Geddes and Cooper.

"I am glad," says Gray, "in one of his lectures to Mr. W. Burton, 'you have had any pleasure in Geddes; he seems to me a truly elegant and charming writer.' The 'Mistress' is the best comedy I ever read; his 'Rivals' I could leave yet to be read. However you are to consider this is a collection made up by the French book-sellers; many things omitted or written in the French or changed not for the words, but to make the friends laugh at the 'Lamp of Liberty,' etc.; but that there are the 'Lamp of Liberty,' 'Rivals to P. Beaumont,' the 'Charade,' that to his list as 'One on his Country,' another on 'Mistress,' and the 'Sister,' another comedy, all which have great beauties."

In estimating the peculiar merit of Cooper as an imitator of Geddes, &c. it may be reasonably doubted whether it be capable to imitate the French in an artistic or original manner, to which the imitations of their language for better quality seems to have a decided objection, when that is not the case in our own. Imitation seems to be an artistic imitation for its own sake, but for the contingency of some improvement, that may result from it. And if these modes of artistic adaptation to poetry and familiar subjects, and long what is said by the use of good writers in our own language, shall be at least full as applicable to every purpose for which this freedom of rhyme and diction is designed, the introduction of it will be useful at the best, though it should not strictly follow the introduction to Guinean's imitation of the French in Parisian. Butler, Prior, and Gray, have abundantly demonstrated our great imitators of every style in rhyme, and of none in rhyming poetry, (besides the English Anaesthesia of Boone) to be well adapted to the style of humor and plain language, and to be capable of comparing much wit and many beauties in diction of equal ease and vivacity. Indeed, as Cooper has imitated an equal proportion of wit and of original contents, in equally happy expression, into his Leatherstocking, &c. it may have in some measure of resemblance to the arbitrary terms and figures of many of his rhymes, which read too prosaically, and rather like parentheses. But whatever defects of manner is indicated, as the principal recommendation of a work, its applicability will probably be limited to the manner of that early French poetry, which has been thought by some of our best critics too frothy and fanciful.

THE WORKS OF COOPER.

EPISTLES TO HIS FRIENDS IN TOWN,

FROM ARISTIPPUS IN RETIREMENT.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE species of poetry, in which the following epistles are written, has been used with great success among the French, by Châpelle, Chaulieu, La Fare, Gresset, Madame Deshoulières, and others; but I do not remember to have seen it before in the English language. The unconfined return of the rhymes, and easiness of the diction, seem peculiarly adapted to epistolary compositions. The author professedly imitates the general manner of the abovementioned writers, but he is more particularly obliged to Gresset, for two or three hints in his performance, which he has acknowledged in the marginal notes. The reader will not forget, that these four epistles were written originally under a fictitious character.

EPISTLE I.

THE RETREAT OF ARISTIPPUS.

*To his Grace the Duke of *****.*

Je vous livre mes rêveries
Que quelques verités hardies,
Viennet librement mêlanger. GRESSET.

SEIZ'D with the rage of being great
In courts, my lord, let others lead
(Exchanging happiness for state),
The crowd of tinsel'd slaves, who tread
The miry ministerial road
To modern honour's dark abode,
Where dwell th' high vulgar of the town,
Which England's common courtesy,
To make bad fellowship go down,
Politely calls good company.
Remote from politics and strife,
From the dull sons of bus'ness free,
Unfetter'd by domestic life,
To letter'd ease a votary,
I spend alternately my hours
'Twixt Epicurus' myrtle bow'rs
And Academus' palmy grove,
Happy, from Seine's meandering shores,
Where polish'd pleasures ever rove,
The first to bring the Thespian maids,
To play to science and to love
On Cyprian pipes in British shades.
No levees here attend his grace,
My lording ev'ry morn an ass,

Nor office-clerks with busy face,
To make fools wonder as they pass,
Whisper dull nothings in his ear,
'Bout some rogue borough-monger there.
The well-bred insipidity
Of town assemblies ne'er is heard,
And candidates for prelacy,
That fable, supple, bowing herd,
This silent territory fly;
For bishoprics are seldom found
In realms of scientific ground.
No doctor's medicinal wig,
No titled beggar's suppliant knee,
No alderman with knighthood big
And newly purchas'd pedigree,
No vultures of the human race
From Temple or from Lincoln's-Inn,
No pseudo-patriot out of place,
Nor venal senator that's in,
Disturb this amiable retreat;
Only a muse, a love, or grace,
In this calm senate have a seat.
Such representatives are free.
No muse has lately been at court,
Nor are the graces better for't;
Nor have the love's septennially,
A borough-int'rest to support,
Mortgag'd their healths or property.

Led by unerring nature's voice,
I haunt retirement's silent shade,
Contentment's humble lot and choice,
Where on the mossy sofa laid,

I see, through contemplation's eye,
The white-wing'd cherub innocence;
Each blessing of her native sky
To sympathetic hearts dispense.
Here, undebauch'd by spurious art,
Great nature reigns in ev'ry part,
Both when refulgent Titan's beam
In high meridian splendour glows,
And when pale Cynthia's maiden gleam
O'er night a silver mantle throws.
The natives of the neighb'ring grove
Their nuptials chaunt on vernal sprays;
Untaught by Ovid how to love,
True passion modulates their lays.
From no Propertius' polish'd strain,
The linnet forms her temp'rate note;
From no Tibullus learns to plain
The widow'd turtle's faithful throat.
Each feather'd libertine of air,
Gay as Catullus, loves and sings;
Free as the Teian sage from care,
The goldfinch claps his gilded wings,
And woos his female to repair
To shady groves and crystal springs.
Here blest'd with freedom and content,
Untaught by devious thought to stray
Through fancy's visionary way,
These sylvan bards of sentiment
Warble the dictates of the heart
Uninterrupted as they flow,
Unmeasur'd by the rules of art,
Now strongly high now sweetly low.

Such scenes the good have ever lov'd,
The great have sought, the wise approv'd.
Here legislators plann'd of old
The pandects of immortal laws;
And mighty chiefs and heroes bold,
Withdrawn from popular applause,
First having left their countries free
From savage and from human pests,
Gain'd a more glorious victory
O'er the fierce tyrants of their breasts.

Methinks, I hear some courtier say,
"Such charms ideal ill agree
"With moderniz'd gentility;
"For now the witty, great, and gay,
"Think what so charms your rural sense,
"Only a clown's fit residence.
"In former days a country life,
"For so time-honour'd poets sing,
"Free from anxiety and strife,
"Was blandish'd by perpetual spring.
"There the sweet graces kept their court,
"The nymphs, the fauns, and dryads play'd,
"Thither the muses would resort,
"Apollo lov'd the sylvan shade.
"The gods and heroes own'd a passion
"For wives and daughters of the swains,
"And heroines, whilst 'twas the fashion,
"Ridotto'd on the rural plains.
"The 'squires were then of heav'nly race,
"The parsons fashionable too,
"Young Hermes had at court a place,
"Venus and Mars were folks one knew.
"But long long since those times are o'er,
"No goddess trips it o'er the lea,

"The gods and heroes are no more,
"Who danc'd to rural minstrelsy,
"Detested are these sad abodes
"By modern dames of mortal make,
"And peers, who rank not with such gods,
"Their solitary seats forsake.
"For now 'tis quite another case,
"The country wears a diff'rent face.
"When sometimes, (oh! the cruel Lent) !
"Thither her ladyship is sent,
"As Sol through Taurus mounts the sky,
"Or George prorogues his parliament,
"Her beauteous bosom heaves a sigh,
"Five months in rustic banishment.
"Thither, alas! no Viscounts rove,
"Nor heart-bewitching col'nels come,
"Dull is the music of the grove,
"Unheeded fades the meadow's bloom.
"The verdant copse may take the birds,
"The breath of morn and evening's dew
"To bleating flocks and lowing herds
"Be pleasant and be wholesome too;
"But how can these ('tis out of nature)
"Have charms for any human creature!"
Such are the sentiments, I own,
Of all that lazy loitering race;
From daily ushers to his grace,
Who never leave the guilty town;
But in the purlieus of the court,
By knaves are spaniel'd up and down,
To fetch and carry each report.

Far other images arise
To those who inward turn their eyes
To view th' inhabitants of mind;
Where solitude's calm vot'ries find
Of knowledge th' inexhausted prize;
And truth, immortal truth bestows,
Clad in ethereal robes of light,
Pure as the flakes of falling snows,
Unenvied unprov'd delight.

On me, my lord, on humble me
The intellectual train attends;
Science oft seeks my company,
And fancy's children are my friends.
Here blest'd with independent ease,
I look with pity on the great,
For who, that with enjoyment sees
The laughs and graces at his gate,
And little loves attending nigh,
Or fondly hov'ring o'er his head,
To wing his orders through the sky,
Whilst warbling muses round him shed
Sweet flow'rs, which on Parnassus blow,
Would wish these thorny paths to tread,
Which slaves and courtiers only know.

Thanks to my ancestors and Heav'n,
To me the happier lot is giv'n,
In calm retreat my time to spend
With far far better company,
Than those who on the court attend
In honourable drudgery.
Warriors and statesmen of old Rome
Duly observe my levee day,
And wits from polish'd Athens come,
Occasional devoirs to pay.

With me great Plato often holds
Discourse upon immortal pow'rs,
And Attic Xenophon unfolds
Rich honey from Lycéum's flow'rs;
Cæsar and Tully often dine,
Anacreon rambles in my grove,
Sweet Horace drinks Falernian wine,
Catullus makes on haycocks love.
With these, and some akin to these,
The living few who grace our days,
I live in literary ease,
My chief delight their taste to please
With soft and unaffected lays.
Thus, to each vot'ry's wish, kind fate
Divides the world with equal line,
She bids ambition, care, and state,
Be the high portion of the great,
Peace, friendship, love, and bliss be mine.

EPISTLE II.

THE TEMPER OF ARISTIPPUS.

TO LADY *****.

Quo me cunque rapit Tempestas deferor hospes.

HORAT.

I've oft, Melissa, heard you say,
"The world observes I never wear
"An aspect gloomy or severe,
"That, constitutionally gay,
"Whether dark clouds obscure the sky,
"Or Phœbus gilds the face of day,
"In pleasure's true philosophy
"I pass the winged years away."
In most, 'tis true, the human sense
Is subjected to smiles, or tears,
To swelling pride, or trembling fears,
"By ev'ry skyey influence."
Cameleon-like their souls agree
With all they hear and all they see,
Or, as one instrument resounds,
Another's unison of sounds,
Their mutable complexions carry
The looks of anger, hope, and joy;
Just as the scenes around 'em vary,
Pleasures delight, or pains annoy.
But I, by philosophic mood,
Let the wise call it happy folly,
Educe from ev'ry evil good,
And rapture e'en from melancholy.
When in the silent midnight grove,
Sweet Philomela swells her throat
With tremulous and plaintive note,
Expressive of disast'rous love,
I with the pensive pleasures dwell,
And in their calm sequester'd cell,
Listen with rapturous delight
To the soft songster of the night.
Here Echo, in her mossy cave,
Symphonious to the love-lorn song,
Warbles the vocal rocks among,
Whilst gently-trickling waters lave
The oak-fring'd mountain's hoary brow,
Whose streams, united in the vale,

O'er pebbled beds loquacious flow,
Tun'd to the sad melodious tale
In murmurs querulously slow.
And, whilst immers'd in thought I lie,
From ages past and realms unseen,
There moves before the mental eye
The pleasing melancholy scene
Of nymphs and youths unfortunate,
Whose fame shall spread from shore to shore,
Preserv'd by bards from death and fate,
Till time itself shall be no more.

Thus, not by black misanthropy
Impell'd, to caves or rocks I fly;
But when, by chance or humour led,
My wand'ring feet those regions tread,
Taught by philosophy so sweet
To shun the fellowship of care,
Far from the world I go to meet
Such pleasures as inhabit there.

With rebel-will I ne'er oppose
The current of my destiny,
But, pliant as the torrent flows,
Receive my course implicitly.
As, from some shaded river's side
If chance a tender * osier's blown,
Subject to the controuling tide,
Th' obedient shrub is carried down,
Awhile it floats upon the streams,
By whirlpools now is forc'd below,
Then mounts again where Titan's beams
Upon the shining waters glow.
Sweet flow'ry vales it passes by,
Cities, and solitudes by turns.
Or where a dreary desert burns
In sorrowful obscurity.
For many a league the wand'rer's borne,
By forest, wood, mead, mountain, plain,
'Till, carried never to return,
'Tis buried in the boundless main.
Thus Aristippus forms his plan;
To ev'ry change of times and fates
His temper he accommodates;
Not where he will, but where he can,
A daily bliss he celebrates.
An osier on the stream of time,
This philosophic wanderer
Floating through ev'ry place and clime,
Finds some peculiar blessing there.
Where e'er the winding current strays
By prosp'rous mount or adverse plain,
He'll sport, till all his jocund days
Are lost in life's eternal main.

Let worldlings hunt for happiness
With pain, anxiety and strife,
Through ev'ry thorny path of life,
And ne'er th' ideal fair possess!
For who, alas! their passions send
The fleeting image to pursue,
Themselves their own designs undo,
And in the means destroy the end!

* See the Chartreuse of Gresset from whence this passage is imitated, but the subsequent particular application to Aristippus is this author's.

But I a surer clue have found,
To guide me o'er the mazy ground;
For knowing that this deity
Must ever rove at liberty
Through fancy's visionary road,
I never wisdom's schemes employ
To find her in one fix'd abode,
But where I meet her I enjoy;
And being free from strife and care,
Am sure to meet her ev'ry where.

EPISTLE III.

THE APOLOGY OF ARISTIPPUS.

To  Esq.

D'autres font des vers par etude
J'en fais pour me defennuyer. GRESSET.

SHOULD supercilious censors say
"His youth is waining, 'tis not time
"For Aristippus now with rhyme
"To while the useless hours away,"
I might reply, I do no more
Than what my betters did before;
That what at first my fancy led
This idle business to pursue,
Still makes me prosecute the trade,
Because I've nothing else to do;
But to the candid, Tom, and you,
A better reason I could give,
To whom a better reason's due,
That in these measures I convey
My gentle precepts, how to live,
Clearer than any other way.
For in the pow'rs of poetry,
Wit, truth, and pleasure blended lie.
As, in Italia's fertile vales,
On the same tree, whilst blossoms blow,
The ripen'd fruits nectareous grow,
Fed by warm suns and fresh'ning gales.
Divinest art to mortals giv'n!
By thee, the brave, the good, the wise,
The fair, the learn'd, and witty, rise
From earth's dull sod, and people heav'n.
Nor be't to thee imputed blame,
That ever-barking calumny,
And filthy-mouth'd obscenity,
Have oft usurp'd thy injur'd name!
Alas! the drops which morning sheds
With dewy fingers on the meads,
The pink's and vi'let's tubes to fill,
Alike the noxious juices feed
Of deadly hemlock's pois'nous weed,
And give 'em fatal pow'r to kill!

Imagination loves to trace
Reason's immortal lineaments
In fiction's necromantic face,
When probability assents.
The fairest features fiction wears,
When most like truth th' inchantress looks,
As sweet Narcissa's shade appears,
In silent lakes and crystal brooks,
So like the life, we scarcely know
Where last to fix our wav'ring love,
Whether upon the form below,
Or on the real nymph above.

In each we see an angel's face,
Though for the substance breathe our sighs,
Whilst we the shadowy image trace
In the clear wave with longing eyes.

But should you ask me, why I choose,
Of all the laurel'd sisterhood
Th' inhabitants of Pindus' wood,
The least considerable muse.

The vi'lets round the mountain's feet,
Whose humble gems unheeded blow,
Are to the shepherd's smell more sweet
Than lofty cedars on its brow.

Let the loud epic sound th' alarms
Of dreadful war, and heroes sprung
From some immortal ancestry,
Clad in impenetrable arms

By Vulcan forg'd, my lyre is strung
With softer chords, my muse more free
Wanders through Pindus' humbler ways
In amiable simplicity:

Unstudy'd are her artless lays,
She asks no laurel for her brows;
Careless of censure or of praise,
She haunts where tender myrtle grows;

Fonder of happiness than fame
To the proud bay prefers the rose,
Nor barter pleasure for a name.
On nature's lap reclin'd at ease,

I listen to her heav'nly tongue,
From her derive the pow'r to please,
From her receive th' harmonious time,
And what the goddess makes my long

In unpremeditated rhyme
Mellifluous flows, whilst young desire,
Cull'd from th' Elysian bloom of spring,
Strews flow'rs immortal round my lyre,

And fancy's sportive children bring,
From blossom'd grove and lily mead,
Fresh fragrant chaplets for my head.
The most, though softest of the nine,

Euterpe, muse of gaiety,
Queen of heart-soft'ning melody,
Allures my ear with notes divine.
In my retreat Euterpe plays,

Where science, garlanded with flow'rs,
Enraptur'd listens to her lays
Beneath the shade of myrtle bow'rs.

This pleasing territory lies
Unvisited by common eyes,
Far from the prude's affected spleen,
Or bigot's surly godliness,

Where no coquettes, no jilts are seen,
Nor folly-setter'd fops of dress;
Far from the vulgar, high, and low,
The pension'd great man's littleness;

Or those who, prone to slav'ry, grow
Fit tools of others tyranny,
And, with a blind devotion, bow
To wooden blocks of quality;

Far from the land of argument,
Where, deep within their murky cells,
Figures and blotted tropes are pent,
And three-legg'd syllogism dwells;

• See Les Ombres of Gresset.

Far from the bubble-blowing race,
The schoolmen subtle and refin'd,
Who fill the thick skull's brainless space
With puffs of theologic wind;
And all the grave pedantic train,
Which fairy genius longs to bind
Hard with a comment's iron chain.
But, whilst such drones are driv'n away,
In my belov'd retreat remain
The fair, the witty, and the gay.

Here the soft patriarch of the loves,
Honey'd Anacreon, with the doves
Of Venus flutt'ring o'er his head
(Whilst ivy-crowned hours around
The laughter-loving graces lead
In sportive ringlets to the sound
Of Paphian flutes), the muse invites
To festive days and am'rous nights.
Here tender Moschus loves to rove
Along the meadow's daisy'd side,
Under a cool and silent grove,
Where brooks of dimpling waters glide.
Rapt in celestial ecstacy
Sappho, whom all the nine inspire,
Varies her am'rous melody,
The chords of whose Idalian lyre,
As changeful passions ebb or flow,
Struck with bold hand, now vibrate high,
Now, modulated to a sigh,
'Tremble most languishingly low.

Horace, mild sage, refin'd with ease,
Whose precepts, whilst they counsel, please,
Without the jargon of the schools,
And fur-gown'd pedant's bookish rules,
Here keeps his lov'd academy;
His art so nicely he conceals,
That wisdom on the bosom steals,
And men grow good insensibly.
From cool Valclufa's lili'd meads
Soft Petrarch, and his Laura come,
And e'en great Tasso sometimes treads
These flow'ry walks, and culls the bloom
Of rural groves, where heretofore
Each muse, each grace, beneath the shade
Of myrtle bow'rs, in secret play'd
With an Idalian paramour.
From silver Seine's transparent streams,
With roses and with lilies crown'd,
Breathing the same heart-easing themes,
And tun'd in amicable sound,
Sweet bards, of kindred spirit, blow
Soft Lydian notes on Gallic reeds,
Whose songs instruct us how to know
Truth's flow'rs from affectation's weeds.
Chapelle leads up the festive band;
La Farre and Chaulieu, hand in hand,
Close follow their poetic fire,
Hot with the Teian grape and fire.
But hark! as sweet as western wind
Breathes from the vi'let's fragrant beds,
When balmy dews Aurora sheds,
Gresset's clear pipe, distinct behind,
Symphoniously combines in one,
Each former bard's mellifluent tone.
Gresset! in whose harmonious verse

The Indian bird shall never die,
Though death may perch on Ver-Vert's hearse,
Fame's tongue immortal shall rehearse
His variable loquacity.

Nor wanting are there bards of Thames,
On rural reed young Surry plays,
And Waller woos the courtly dames
With gay and unaffected lays,
His careless limbs supinely laid
Beneath the plantain's leafy shade.
Prior his easy pipe applies
To sooth his jealous Cloe's breast,
And even Sacharissa's eyes
To brighter Cloe's yield the prize
Of Venus' soul-bewitching cest.
Than these much greater bards, I ween,
Whenever they will condescend
Th' inferior muses to attend,
Immortalize this humble scene:
Shakspeare's and Drayton's fairy crews
In midnight revels gambol round,
And Pope's light sylphids sprinkle dews
Refreshing on the magic ground.
Nor 'sdains the dryad train of yore,
And green-hair'd naiads of the flood,
To join with fancy's younger brood,
Which brood the sweet enchantress bore
To British bards in after times,
Whose fame shall bloom in deathless rhymes,
When Greece and Britain are no more.

Whilst such the feasts of fancy give,
Careless of what dull sages know,
Amidst their banquets I will live,
And, pitying, look on pow'r below.
If still the Cynic censor says,
That Aristippus' useless days
Pass in melodious foolery,
This is my last apology:

"Whatever has the pow'r to bless,
"By living having learnt to prize,
"Since wisdom will afford me less
"Than what from harmless follies rise,
"I cannot spare from happiness
"A single moment to be wise."

EPISTLE IV.

THE CALL OF ARISTIPPUS.

To Mark Akenfide, M. D.

ΑΧΑΡΙΣ ΔΕ ΤΙΣ ΠΕΦΥΚΩΣ
ΜΕΘΕΤΩ ΠΟΙΗΜΑ

Ode Henr. Stephens.

O THOU, for whom the British bays
Bloom in these unpoetic days,
Whose early genius glow'd to follow
The arts through nature's ancient ways,
Twofold disciple of Apollo!
Shall Aristippus' easy lays,
Trifles of philosophic pleasure
Compos'd in literary leisure,
Aspire to gain thy deathless praise?
If thy nice ear attends the strains,
This careless bard of nature breathes
On Cyprian flute in Albion's plains;

By future poets myrtle wreaths
Shall long be scatter'd o'er his urn
In annual solemnity,
And marble Cupids, as they mourn,
Point where his kindred ashes lie.

Whilst through the track of endless day
Thy muse shall, like the bird of Jove,
Wing to the source of light her way,
And bring from cloudless realms above,
Where truth's seraphic daughters glow,
Another Promethean ray
To this benighted globe below,
Mine, like soft Cytherea's dove,
Contented with her native grove,
Shall fondly sooth th' attentive ears
Of life's way-wearied travellers,
And, from the paths of fancied woes,
Lead 'em to the serene abode,
Where real bliss and real good
In sweet security repose;
Or, as the lark with matin notes,
To youth's new voyagers, in spring,
As over head in air she floats,
Attendant on unruffled wing,
Warbles inartificial joy,
My muse in tender strains shall sing
The feats of Venus' winged boy,
Or how the nimble-footed hours,
With the three graces knit in dance,
Follow the goddess Elegance
To Hebe's court in Paphian bow'rs.

Nor let the supercilious wife,
And gloomy sons of melancholy,
These unaffected lays despise,
As day-dreams of melodious folly.
Reason a lovelier aspect wears
The smiles and muses when between,
Than in the Stoic's rigid mien
With beard philosophiz'd by years;
And virtue moaps not in the cell
Where cloister'd pride and penance dwell,
But, in the chariot of the loves,
She triumphs innocently gay,
Drawn by the yok'd Idalian doves,
Whilst young affections lead the way
To the warm regions of the heart,
Whence selfish fiends of vice depart,
Like spectres at th' approach of day.

Should any infidel demand,
Who sneers at our poetic heav'n,
Whether from ordination given
By prelates of the Thespian land,
Or inspiration from above
(As modern Methodists derive Their light from no divine alive),
I hold the great prerogative
T' interpret sage Anacreon's writ,
Or gloss upon Catullus' wit,
Prophets that heretofore were sent,
And finally require to see
Credentials of my embassy,
Before his faith could yield consent,
Convincing reasons I would give
From a short tale scarce credible,
But yet as true and plausible

As some which Catholics believe,
That I was call'd by Jove's behest
A Paphian and a Delphian priest.

Once, when by Trent's pellucid streams,
In days of prattling infancy,
Led by young wond'ring ecstasy,
To view the sun's refulgent beams,
As on the sportive waves they play'd,
Too far I negligently stray'd,
The god of day his lamp withdrew,
Evening her dusky mantle spread,
And from her moist'ned tresses shed
Refreshing drops of pearly dew.
Close by the borders of a wood,
Where an old ruin'd abbey stood,
Far from a fondling mother's sight,
With toil of childish sport oppress'd,
My tender limbs sunk down to rest
'Midst the dark horrors of the night.
As Horace erst by fabled doves
With spring's first leaves was mantled o'er
A wand'rer from his native groves,
A like regard the British Loves
To me their future poet bore,
Nor left me guardianless alone,
For though no nymph or faun appear'd,
Nor piping satyr was there heard,
And here the dryads are unknown;
Yet, natives true of English ground,
Sweet elves and fays in mantles green,
By shepherds oft in moonlight seen,
And dapper fairies danc'd around.
The nightingale, her love-lorn lay
Neglecting on the neighb'ring spray,
Strew'd with fresh flow'rs my turfy bed,
And, at the first approach of morn,
The red-breast stript the fragrant thorn
On roses wild to lay my head.
Thus, as the wond'ring rustics stay,
In smiling sleep they found me laid
Beneath a blossom'd hawthorn's shade,
Whilst sportive bees, in mystic play,
With honey fill'd my little lips
Blent with each sweet that zephyr sips
From flow'ry cups in balmy May.

From that blest'd hour my bosom glow'd
Ere vanity or fame inspir'd,
With unaffected transports fir'd,
And from my tongue untutor'd flow'd,
In childhood's inattentive days,
The lisping notes of artless lays.
Nor have these dear enchantments ceas'd,
For what in innocence began
Still with increasing years increas'd,
And youth's warm joys now charm the man.
Perhaps this fondly foster'd flame,
E'en when in dust my body's laid,
Will o'er the tomb preserve its fame,
And glow within my future shade,
If thus, as poets have agreed,
The soul, when from the body freed,
In t'other world confines her bliss
To the same joys she lov'd in this.
Thine, when she's pass'd the Stygian flood,
Shall, 'midst the patriot chiefs of old,

The wise, the valiant, and the good,
 (Great names in deathless archives roll'd):
 Strike with a master's mighty hand
 Thy golden lyre's profoundest chords,
 And fascinate the kindred band
 With magic of poetic words.
 Ravish'd with thy mellifluous lay
 Plato and Virgil shall entwine
 Of olive and the Mantuan bay
 A never-fading crown for thee,
 And learn'd Lucretius shall resign,
 Among the foll'wers of the nine,
 His philosophic dignity.
 For though his faithful pencil drew
 Nature's external symmetry,
 Yet to the mind's capacious view,
 That unconfin'd expatiates
 O'er mighty Nature's wond'rous whole,
 Thy nicer stroke delineates
 The finer features of the soul,
 And, whilst the Theban bard to thee
 Shall yield the heart-elating lyre,
 Horace shall hear attentively
 Thy finger touch his softer wire
 To more familiar harmony.
 Mean while thy Aristippus' shade
 Shall seek where sweet Anacreon plays,
 Where Chappelle spends his festive days,
 Where lies the vine-impurpled glade
 By tuneful Chalcieu vocal made,
 Or where our Shenstone's mossy cell,
 Or where the fair Deshoulières strays,
 Or Hammond and Pavillon dwell,
 And Gresset's gentle spirit roves
 Surrounded by a group of loves
 With roses crown'd and asphodel.

Let the furr'd pedants of the schools,
 In learning's formidable show,
 Full of wise saws and bookish rules,
 The meagre dupes of misery grow,
 A lovelier doctrine I profess
 Than their dull science can avow;
 All that belongs to happiness
 Their heads are welcome still to know,
 My heart's contented to possess.
 For in soft elegance and ease,
 Secure of living whilst I live,
 Each momentary bliss I seize,
 Ere these warm faculties decay,
 The fleeting moments to deceive
 Of human life's allotted day.
 And when th' invidious hand of time
 By stealth shall silver o'er my head,
 Still pleasure's rosy walks I'll tread,
 Still with the jocund muses rhyme,
 And haunt the green Idalian bow'rs,
 Whilst wanton boys of Paphos' court
 In myrtles hide my staff for sport,
 And coif me, where I'm bald, with flow'rs.

Thus to each happy habit true,
 Preferring happiness to pow'r,
 Will Aristippus e'en pursue
 Life's comforts to the latest hour,
 Till age (the only malady
 Which thou and med'cine cannot cure,
 Yet what all covet to endure)

This innocent voluptu'ry
 Shall, from the laughs and graces here,
 With late and lenient change remove,
 To regions of Elysian air,
 Where shades of mortal pleasures rove,
 Destin'd, without alloy, to share
 Eternal joys of mutual love,
 Which transitory were above.

A SONG.

DEAR Chloe what means this disdain,
 Which blasts each endeavour to please?
 Though forty, I'm free from all pain,
 Save love, I'm free from disease.

No graces my mansion have fled,
 No muses have broken my lyre;
 The loves frolic still round my bed,
 And laughter is cheer'd at my fire.

To none have I ever been cold,
 All beauties in vogue I'm among;
 I've appetite e'en for the old,
 And spirit enough for the young.

Believe me, sweet girl, I speak true,
 Or else put my love to the test;
 Some others have doubted like you,
 Like them do you bless and be blest.

AN EPISTLE

FROM THE KING OF PRUSSIA TO MONSIEUR
 VOLTAIRE. 1757.

Translated from the French.

VOLTAIRE, believe me, were I now
 In private life's calm station plac'd,
 Let heav'n for nature's wants allow,
 With cold indiff'rence would I view
 Departing fortune's winged haste,
 And laugh at her caprice like you.
 Th' insipid farce of tedious state,
 Imperial duty's real weight,
 The faithless courtier's supple bow,
 The fickle multitude's cares,
 And the great vulgar's littleness,
 By long experience well I know;
 And, though a prince and poet born,
 Vain blandishments of glory scorn.
 For when the ruthless shears of fate
 Have cut my life's precarious thread,
 And rank'd me with th' unconscious dead,
 What wilt avail that I was great,
 Or that th' uncertain tongue of fame
 In mem'ry's temple chaunts my name?
 One blissful moment whilst we live
 Weighs more than ages of renown;
 What then do potentates receive
 Of good, peculiar to their own?
 Sweet ease and unaffected joy,
 Domestic peace, and sportive pleasure,
 The regal throne and palace fly,
 And, born for liberty, prefer
 Soft silent scenes of lovely leisure,
 To what we monarchs buy so dear,
 The thorny pomp of scepter'd care.

My pain or bliss shall ne'er depend
On fickle fortune's casual flight,
For, whether she's my foe or friend,
In calm repose I'll pass the night;
And ne'er by watchful homage own
I court her smile, or fear her frown.
But from our stations we derive
Unerring precepts how to live,
And certain deeds each rank calls forth,
By which is measur'd human worth.
Voltaire, within his private cell,
In realms where ancient honesty
Is patrimonial property,
And sacred freedom loves to dwell,
May give up all his peaceful mind,
Guided by Plato's deathless page,
In silent solitude resign'd
To the mild virtues of a sage;
But I, 'gainst whom wild whirlwinds wage
Fierce war with wreck-denouncing wing,
Must be, to face the tempest's rage,
In thought, in life, in death, a king.

A HYMN TO HEALTH.

WRITTEN IN SICKNESS.

SWEET as the fragrant breath of genial May,
Come, fair Hygeia, goddess heav'nly born,
More lovely than the sun's returning ray,
To northern regions, at the half year's morn.
Where shall I seek thee? in the wholesome grot,
Where temperance her scanty meal enjoys?
Or peace contented with her humble lot,
Beneath her thatch th' inclement blast defies?
Swept from each flow'r that tips the morning
dew,
Thy wing besprinkles all the scenes around;
Where'er thou fly'st the blossoms blush anew,
And purple vi'lets paint the hallow'd ground.
Thy presence renovated nature shows,
By thee each shrub with varied hue is dy'd,
Each tulip with redoubled lustre glows,
And all creation smiles with flow'ry pride.
But in thy absence joy is felt no more,
The landscape wither'd e'en in spring appears,
The morn low'rs om'rons o'er the dusky shore,
And evening suns set half extinct in tears.
Ruthless disease ascends, when thou art gone
From the dark regions of th' abyss below,
With pestilence, the guardian of her throne,
Breathing contagion from the realms of woe.
In vain her citron groves Italia boasts,
Or Po the balsam of his weeping trees;
In vain Arabia's aromatic coasts
Tincture the opinions of the passing breeze.
No wholesome scents impregn the western gale,
But noxious stench exhal'd by scorching heat,
Where gasping swains the pois'nous air inhale
That once diffus'd a medicinal sweet.

Me, abject me, with pale disease oppress'd,
Heal with the balm of thy prolific breath,
Rekindle life within my clay-cold breast,
And shield my youth from canker-worms of death.

Then on the verdant turf, thy fav'rite shrine,
Restor'd to thee a votary I'll come,
Grateful to offer to thy pow'r divine,
Each herb that grows round Æsculapius' tomb.

A SONG.

THE nymph that I lov'd was as cheerful as day,
And as sweet as the blossoming hawthorn in May,
Her temper was smooth as the down on the dove,
And her face was as fair as the mother's of love.

Though mild as the pleasantest zephyr that sheds,
And receives gentle odours from violet beds,
Yet warm in affection as Phœbus at noon,
And as chaste as the silver-white beams of the moon.

Her mind was unfullied as new fallen-snow,
Yet as lively as tints of young Iris's bow,
As firm as the rock, and as calm as the flood,
Where the peace-loving halcyon deposits her brood.

The sweets that each virtue or grace had in store,
She cull'd as the bee would the bloom of each
flow'r;
Which treasur'd for me, O! how happy was I,
For though her's to collect, it was mine to enjoy.

THE GENIUS OF BRITAIN.

AN IAMBIC ODE.

Written in the Year 1756.

Αποπον γὰρ ἦν τὴν μὲν τῶν ἀπέναντον εὐαγγελίαν τε τοῖς ἐπι-τρέπειν, ὑπὲρ δὲ ἀγωνισθῆναι μηδὲν αὐτοῖς ὑπάρχειν κατὰ τὴν χώραν σπουδῆς ἄξιον.

Diodor. Sicul. Histor. Lib. I.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE.

WILLIAM PITT, ESQ.

O THOU ordain'd at length by pitying fate
To save from ruin a declining state;
Adorn'd with all the scientific store
Which bloom'd on Roman or Athenian shore;
At whose command our passions fall or rise,
Breathe anger's menaces, or pity's sighs,
Whose breast (O never let the flame expire)!
Glow ardent with the patriot's sacred fire;
Attend the bard, who scorns the venal lays,
Which servile flatt'ry spurious greatness pays:
Whose British spirit emulating thine,
Could ne'er burn incense at corruption's shrine;
Who far from courts maintains superior state,
And thinks that to be free is to be great;
Careless of pride's imperial smile or frown,
A friend to all mankind, but slave to none;

Above temptation, and unaw'd by pow'r,
Pleas'd with his present lot, nor wishes more,
Save that kind heaven would one bless'd boon be-flow, [know,
Which monarchs cannot grant, or courtiers
From each low view of selfish factions free,
To think, to speak, to live, O Pitt, like thee.

As late o'er Britain's chalky coasts
The genius of the island flew,
The venal swarm of foreign hosts *
Inglorious basking in his view,
Deep in his breast he felt the new disgrace,
And honest blushes warm'd his godlike face.

Quick flash'd the light'ning of his spear
Which blasted France on Cressy's field,
He wheel'd the blazing sword in air,
And on his shoulders spread the shield,
As when o'er Agincourt's blood-purple'd lands,
Pale terror stalk'd through all the Gallic bands.

Soon as he cast his eyes below,
Deep heav'd the sympathetic sigh,
Sudden the tears of anguish flow,
For sore he felt th' indignity;
Discordant passions shook his heav'nly frame,
Now horror's damp, now indignation's flame.

Ah! what avails, he cry'd, the blood
Shed by each patriot band of yore,
When freedom's unpaid legions stood
Protectors of this sea-girt shore,
When ancient wisdom deem'd each British sword
From hostile pow'r could guard its valiant lord.

What though the Danish raven spread
Awhile his wings o'er English ground,
The bird of prey funereal fled
When Alfred call'd his peers around,
Whose fleets triumphant riding on the flood,
Deep stain'd each chalky cliff with Denmark's blood.

Alfred on natives could depend,
And scorn'd a foreign force t' employ,
He thought, who dar'd not to defend
Were never worthy to enjoy; [one.
The realm's and monarch's int'rest deem'd but
And arm'd his subjects to maintain their own.

What though weak John's divided reign
The Gallic legions tempted o'er,
When Henry's barons join'd again,
Those feather'd warriors left the shore;
Learn, Britons, hence, you want no foreign friends,
The lion's safety on himself depends.

Reflect on Edward's glorious name;
On my fifth Henry's martial deeds;
Think on those peers of deathless fame
Who met their king on Thames's meads,
When sov'reign might acknowledg'd reason's plea,
That Heav'n created man for liberty.

* Six thousand Hessians imported to protect this island!!!

Though Rome's fell star malignant shone,
When great Eliza rul'd this state,
On English hearts she plac'd her throne,
And in their happiness her fate,
While blacker than the tempests of the north,
The Papal tyrant sent his curses forth.

Lo! where my Thames's waters glide
At great Augusta's regal feet,
Bearing on each returning tide
From distant realms a golden fleet,
Which homeward wafts the fruits of ev'ry zone,
And makes the wealth of all the world your own.
Shall on his silver waves be borne
Of armed slaves a venal crew?
Lo! the old god denotes his scorn,
And shudders at th' unusual view,
Down to his deepest cave retires to mourn,
And tears indignant bathe his crystal urn.

O! how can vassals born to bear
The galling weight of slav'ry's chain,
A patriot's noble ardour share,
Or freedom's sacred cause maintain?
Britons exert your own unconquer'd might,
A freeman best defends a freeman's right.

Look back on every deathless deed
For which your fires recorded stand;
To battle let your nobles lead
The sons of toil, a hardy band;
The sword on each rough peasant's thigh be worn,
And war's green wreaths the shepherd's front adorn.

But see, upon his utmost shores
America's sad genius lies,
Each wasted province he deplores,
And casts on me his languid eyes,
Bless'd with Heav'n's fav'rite ordinance I fly,
To raise th' oppress'd, and humble tyranny.

This said, the vision westward fled,
His wrinkled brow denouncing war;
The way fire-mantled vengeance led,
And justice drove his airy car;
Behind firm-footed peace her olive bore,
And plenty's horn pour'd blessings on the shore.

THEAGENES TO SYLVIA.

THE ARGUMENT.

Theagenes, son of Hieron, the priest of Pan, having fallen in love, at an annual festival in the temple of that god, with Sylvia, a votress to Diana, finds means to seduce her. After some time, the nymph being struck with horror at her guilt, in the utmost despair and contrition, makes a vow that she would endeavour to expiate her offence by a life of religious solitude: Upon which occasion Theagenes writes the following epistle.

N. B. Several hints in the following epistle were taken from the celebrated Lord Gray's Love Letters.

SAY, dearest object of my broken heart,
Must we, for e'er, like soul and body part?

Must I be doom'd whole ages to deplore,
And think of transports I must taste no more?
O dreadful thought! whose endless view contains
Grief foll'wing grief, and pains succeeding pains!
Each joy is blasted, and each comfort fled!
Ye dreary sisters, cut the fatal thread!

Ah! whither fly'st thou? to some dreary plain,
Where frozen chastity and horror reign;
And melancholy, daughter of despair,
With pale contrition, and with gloomy care;
To spend thy youth in superstitious fears,
In needless penance, penitence, and tears!
Let those dwell there whose bosoms guilt reprove,
But thou hast none, if 'tis no sin to love.
For what is deem'd a half extorted vow,
Too dull for lovers, and forgotten now?
Religious cheat! impos'd by fear or man,
And priests continue what the fool began.

O stay, for absence never can destroy,
No distance quell my visionary joy;
In vain you still endeavour to remove
The beauteous cause of my unhappy love:
Imagination foll'wing close behind,
Presents afresh past pleasures to my mind;
The rebel mind forbidden passion knows,
With welcome flames the guilty bosom glows,
Again th' ecstatic soul dissolves away,
In brightest visions of eternal day;
There sees thy fatal form, or seems to see,
For Heav'n it loses when it loses thee.

Worn by my sorrows, see this wretched frame,
Innocent object of thy fatal flame!
See! round my lips a deadly paleness spread;
Where roses bloom'd, the canker grief has fed;
From my cold cheeks the with'ring lily flies,
And light extinguish'd leaves my weeping eyes.

O count again the pleasures we have prov'd,
Promoting mutual what the other lov'd;
Recall in thought each am'rous moment gone,
Think each soft circumstance, and still think on;
But chief that day destructive to my rest,
For ever fatal, yet for ever blest,
When I, assisted at the sacred shrine,
My aged father in the rites divine,
Beheld thee first, celestial as thou art,
And felt thy image sink into my heart;
Ere I could think I found myself undone,
For but to see thee and to love are one.
No more the pomp and solemn splendour pleas'd,
Devotion's flames within my bosom ceas'd;
Thy fairer form expell'd the deity,
And all the mighty space was fill'd with thee.

I fear'd 'twas error, and to wisdom fled
To call her rigid doctrine to my aid:
But such the passion, wisdom must approve,
She saw the object, and she bade me love.

The pleasing paths of Venus I retr'd;
No more a mortal, but an am'rous god.
O pow'ful weakness of th' ecstatic mind!
Celestial gleams to human failings join'd!
Love wafts our thoughts when fancy spreads her
fails,

To lands of paradise with gentle gales,
Love makes the sifter soul for ever even;
Love can do all, for love itself is heav'n.

The tedious business of the day was done;
Our off'rings ended with the parting sun;
The night advanc'd, the shepherds homeward sped
To the sweet comforts of the nuptial bed;
But me, alas! far other cares employ,
To reap the harvest of unlawful joy;
Pensive I wander'd on the lonely shore,
Where breaking billows at a distance roar;
The sighs that issued from my lab'ring breast,
Woke Echo from her inmost cave of rest.
On thee I thought, on thee I call'd alone,
The soften'd rocks re-echo'd to my moan,
The sympathizing streams ran mournful by,
And tun'd their plaintive bubblings to my cry.

Thrice had the moon her silver mantle spread,
As oft I wander'd from my sleepless bed;
As oft I travers'd o'er the neighb'ring plain,
As oft I sought thee, but I sought in vain;
At last arriv'd the long-expected hour,
I found thee musing in a lonely bow'r;
The time and place invited to impart
The faithful language of my love-sick heart.
With agonizing sighs I gain'd belief,
And each pathetic circumstance of grief;
A war unequal in thy breast ensu'd,
Stern duty fail'd, and gentle pity woo'd,
Pity admitted all disdain remov'd,
And soon what mercy spar'd the woman lov'd.
A crimson blush o'er all thy face was spread,
Then lilies pale, and all the roses fled;
Each look more faithful, to thy heart reveal'd
The fatal secret that thy tongue conceal'd.
The happy omen of success I view'd,
Embrac'd th' advantage, and th' attack pursu'd.
Honour's first guard of wakeful scruples o'er,
Love found a breach, and tears contend no more;
Each others arms each others body prest,
We spoke much pleasure, and we felt the rest;
The rest, which only can the faithful feel,
The rest, which none had ever pow'r to tell;
The rest, which feels unutterably sweet,
In the first intercourse when lovers meet.
The modest diffidence, and bold desires,
Soft thrilling cold, and quick-returning fires,
The glowing blushes and the joyful tears,
The flatt'ring wishes, and th' alarming fears,
The gentle breathings and the mutual sighs,
And all the silent eloquence of eyes.

Pleas'd with the first delight, my raptures
rove
To seize at once the last recess of love;
Till flying swiftly on from joy to joy,
I sunk at last in heav'nly ecstasy.

The secret progress thus we first began,
Then soon round pleasure's flow'ry circle ran;
How oft we met, dull reason frown'd in vain,
How oft we parted but to meet again!
O blessed moments, and divinest dreams!
Enchanting transports, and celestial gleams!
Fly quick, my fancy, bring 'em back to view,
In retrospection let me love anew.
And once in thought enjoy the bliss again,
Even cheaply purchas'd by an age of pain.

O sacred queen of silent night, advance,
And cast thy sable mantle o'er th' expanse.

Come, gentle sleep, and close my wearied eyes,
 Give to my arms what hateful day denies,
 For vain, alas! those dulcet wishes roll,
 When sov'reign reason awes the wakeful soul;
 Sleep sets it free to all its native fires,
 And gives a grateful loose to soft desires.
 At that calm hour, when peace her requiem sings,
 And pleasing slumbers spread their airy wings;
 Thy beauteous image comes before my sight:
 (My theme by day, my constant dream by night);
 Fancy not fairer paints those Heav'n-born maids,
 In fair Elysium under myrtle shades,
 Who ever blooming, ever young appear,
 To drive from happy shades intruding fear.
 My ravish'd thoughts on plumes angelic soar,
 And feel within a heav'n, or somewhat more.
 Straight on thy oft-repeated name I call,
 Then wake, and sigh, and find it vanish all.
 'Thus erst when Orpheus from the Stygian shore
 Had won his youthful bride by music's pow'r,
 Impatient to behold her, ere he past
 The pool of Cocytus, and th' infernal waste,
 Heedless he cast forbidden looks behind;
 The fleeting shadow vanish'd like the wind,
 And all his joys wing'd their eternal flight
 With her, like frightened doves, to realms of night.

Again I close my sleep-deluded eyes,
 Around my soul black swarms of demons rise,
 Pale spectres grin, and angry furies howl,
 Quick lightnings flash, and horrid thunders roll;
 Again the frightened wand'rer hastes away
 Back to the living horrors of the day,
 There counts the visionary misery o'er,
 And realizes what was dreamt before.

Ye dreary pow'rs that hover o'er the plains
 Where sorrows reign, and everlasting pains,
 Bear me to places suited to my woe,
 Where noxious herbs and deadly poisons grow,
 Whilst wintry winds howl fiercely round my head,

The flint my pillow, sharpen'd rocks my bed;
 And ghosts of wretches once who dy'd for love,
 Round their unburied bodies nightly rove,
 Which hang half moulder'd on some blasted tree,

And by their sad example counsel me.

What now avail the joyous moments past,
 Or what will all the wretched few that last?
 In them I dying will our loves proclaim,
 With fault'ring accents call upon thy name,
 And whilst I bless thee with my parting breath,
 Enjoy the raptures of my life in death.
 Then spare thy curses, and forget th' offence
 Of him who robb'd thee of thy innocence;
 Or if not quite forget, forgive at least,
 And soothe the dying penitent to rest.

Oh! may to thee the pitying gods bestow
 Eternal peace and happiness below;
 Yet when thy mortal frame, as once it must,
 Returns and mingles with its native dust;
 May the same urn our mingled ashes have,
 And find a lasting union in the grave!

If you ere long my bleeding corse should see
 Beneath the covert of yon conscious tree,
 This last request I make for all my fears,

For all my sleepless minutes spent in tears,
 For all those struggles of my parting breath,
 And all the agonies in one, my death;
 Think on the raptures which we ravish'd there,
 Then breathe a sigh, and drop th' indebted tear.
 This empty tribute's to the mem'ry due,
 Of one who liv'd and dy'd in love of you.
 My ghost, thus sooth'd, shall seek the Stygian
 shore,
 Mix with the happy crowd, and grieve no more,
 But eager wait till thou at last art giv'n,
 To raise each blessing of th' Elysian heav'n,
 Where uncontroul'd in amorous sports we'll play,
 And love a whole eternity away.

THE POWER OF HARMONY.

IN TWO BOOKS.

THE DESIGN.

It is observeable, that whatever is true, just, and harmonious, whether in nature or morals, gives an instantaneous pleasure to the mind, exclusive of reflection. For the great Creator of all things, infinitely wise and good, ordained a perpetual agreement between the faculties of moral perfection, the powers of fancy, and the organs of bodily sensation, when they are free and undistemp'ed. From hence is deducible the most comfortable, as well as the most true philosophy that ever adorned the world; namely a constant admiration of the beauty of the creation, terminating in the adoration of the First Cause, which naturally leads mankind cheerfully to co-operate with his grand design for the promotion of universal happiness.

From hence our author was led to draw that analogy between natural and moral beauty; since the same faculties, which render us susceptible of pleasure from the perfection of the creation, and the excellence of the arts, afford us delight in the contemplation of dignity and justice in characters and manners. For what is virtue, but a just regulation of our affections and appetites, to make them correspond to the peace and welfare of society? so that good and beauty are inseparable.

From this true relish of the soul, this harmonious association of ideas, the ancient philosophers, and their disciples among the moderns, have enlivened their imaginations and writings in this amicable intercourse of adding moral epithets to natural objects, and illustrating their observations upon the conduct of life, by metaphors drawn from the external scenes of the world. So we know, that by a beautiful action, or consonant behaviour, is meant the generous resignation of private advantage by some individual, to submit and adapt his single being to the whole community, or some part of it. And in like manner, when we read of a solemn grove, where horror and melancholy reign, we entertain an idea of a place that create such thoughts in the mind, by reason of its solitary situation, want of light, or any other circumstances analogous to those dispositions, so termed, in human nature.

This, then, is the design of the poem, to show that a constant attention to what is perfect and beautiful in nature, will by degrees harmonize the soul to a responsive regularity and sympathetic order.

From what has been premised, it would be needless to explain the comprehensive meaning of the word Harmony. For an explanation or a proof of the relation of the imitative arts to moral philosophy, the reader is referred to the dialogues of Plato, and the other philosophers of the academic school; to Lord Shaftsbury and Hutcheson, their great disciples among the moderns.

THE ARGUMENT.

The subject proposed. Invocation to Venus allegorically. Invocation to quit superstition, and adore the Creator of all things. Chaos originally reduced to harmony. A fictitious account of the music of the spheres. The notes of music taken from the number of planets. Its effect on the mind in despair—in sorrow—in rage—on disordered bodies—on brutes and irrational beings. The seat of art described, and her attendants: to what end are her labours: either to excite voluptuousness, or the contrary, just as made use of. Commendation of the use of art to raise in us sentiments of justice and temperance. The excellence of art as great in representing monstrous objects as the most regular, as far as relates to imitation. Why a just resemblance gives us pleasure. Passions may be represented by outward forms, but moral beauty can never be full enough expressed by them: that province belongs to the muse. The conclusion of the first book.

THE HARMONY OF MUSIC, POETRY, AND THE IMITATIVE ARTS.

Of Harmony, and her celestial pow'r
O'er the responsive soul, and whence arise
Those sweet sensations, whether from the lays
Of melting music, and impassion'd verse,
From mimic scenes of emulative art,
Or nature's beauteous objects, which affect
The moral pow'rs with sympathetic charms,
The muse congenial sings.—Descend, ye nine,
Who guard th' Aonian mount, whilst I unfold
The deep recesses of your tuneful haunts,
And from your inmost bow'rs select a bay
To deck the fav'rite theme. Do thou attend,
Thou, whom Lucretius to his great design
Invok'd; and with thee bring thy darling son,
Who tun'd Anacreon's lyre, to guide my hand,
Advent'rous rais'd to sweep harmonious chords.

Come all ye sons of liberty, who wake
From dreams of superstition, where the soul
Through mists of forc'd belief, but dimly views
Its own great Maker; come, and I will guide,
Uninterrupted by the jargon shrill
Of peevish priests, your footsteps to the throne
Where pleasure reigns with reason, to behold
His Majesty celestial, and adore
Him through each object of proportion fair,

The source of virtue, harmony, and bliss!

Ere this delightful face of things adorn'd
The great expanse of day, dark chaos reign'd,
And elemental discord; in the womb
Of ancient night, the war of atoms rag'd
Incessant: anarchy, confusion wild,
Harsh dissonance, and uproar fill'd the whole;
Till that Eternal One, who from the first
Existed, sent his plattic word abroad
Throughout the vast abyis: created worlds
Felt the sweet impulse, and obedient fled
To stations ascertain'd; there to perform
Their various motions, corresponding all
To one harmonious plan, which fables feign
The mystic music of the distant spheres.

* All this the Samian sage had seen at large,
From Ida's cloud-topt summit, or the cave
With Epimenides, where he survey'd,
Higher on wings of contemplation borne,
The mighty maze of nature; where he learnt,
† From that celestial number, how to form
The lyre heart-melting, and the vocal shell.

Thus all the pow'r of music from the spheres
Descends to wake the tardy soul of man
From dreams terrestrial ever to its charms
Obsequious, ever by its dulcet strains
Smooth'd from the passions of tempestuous life,
And taught to pre-enjoy its native heav'n.

Whilst through this vale of error we pursue
Ideal joys, where fancy leads us on Through scenes of paradise in fairy forms
Of ease, of pleasure, or extensive pow'r;
And when we think full fairly we possess
The promis'd heav'n, disease, or wrinkled care,
Fill with their loth'd embrace our eager grasp,
And leave us in a wilderness of woe
To weep at large; where shall we seek relief,
Where ease th' oppressive anguish of the mind,
When retrospection glows with conscious shame
By gray experience in the wholesome school
Of sorrow tutor'd? Whither shall we fly?
To wilds and woods, and leave the busy world
For solitude? Ah! thither still pursue
Th' intruding fiends, attend our evening walk,
Breathe in each breeze, and murmur in each rill;
Where peace, protected by the turtle wing
Of innocence, expands the lovely bloom
Of gay content, no more to be enjoy'd,

* It is very evident that Pythagoras, who is justly esteemed in one respect the inventor of music, had a clear notion of the present astronomical system though the honour of the discovery was reserved for Copernicus so many ages after. Nor was this sentiment of his unknown to the rest of the philosophers: for the Stagyrice, in the 13th chapter of the 2d book περί Ουρανοῦ, speaks of it in these terms: "Those philosophers, who are called Pythagoreans, affirm, that the sun is in the middle and that the earth, like the rest of the planets, rolls round it upon its own axis, and so forms the day and night."

But lost for ever! Yet benignant Heav'n,
Correcting with parental pity, sent
This friendly syren from the groves of joy,
To temper with mellifluous strains the voice
Of mental anguish, and attune the groans
Of young impatience, to the softer sound
Of grateful Pæans to its Maker's praise.

Alike, if ill's external, made our own,
Mix in the cup of life the bitter drop
Of sorrow; when the childless father sighs
From the remembrance of his dying son;
When death has sever'd, with a long farewell,
The lover from the object of desire,
In the full bloom of youth, and leaves the wretch,
To sooth affliction in the well-known scenes
Of blameless rapture once; uncouth advice
In vain intrudes with sacerdotal frown,
And superstition's jargon, to expel
The sweet distress; the gen'rous soul disdains,
Deaf to such monkish precepts, all constraint,
And gives a loose to grief; but strait apply
The lenient force of numbers, they'll assuage
By calm degrees the sympathetic pain,
Till lull'd at length, the intellectual pow'rs
Sink to divine repose, and rage no more.
So when descended rains from Alpine rocks
Burst forth in diff'rent torrents, down the rush
Precipitate, and o'er the craggy steep
Hoarse roaring bear the parted soil away;
Anon, collected on the smoother plains,
Glide to the channel of some ancient flood,
And flow one silent stream. This oft I felt,
When, wand'ring through the unfrequented woods,
Mourning for poor Ardelia's hapless fate,
Thee, my belov'd Melodius, I have heard
In silent rapture all the live-long day.
Though black despair fate brooding o'er my thoughts

Pregnant with horror, thy Platonic lay
Dispell'd th' unmanly sorrows, and again
Led forth my vagrant fancy through the plan
Of nature, studious to explore with thee
Each beauteous scene of musical delight,
Which bears fraternal likeness to the soul.

* Is there a passion, whose impetuous force
Disturbs the human breast, and breaking forth
With sad eruption, deals destruction round,
Like flames convulsive from th' Ætnean mole,
But by the magic strains of some soft air
Is harmoniz'd to peace? As tempests cease
Their elemental fury, when the queen
Of heav'n, descending on a zephyr's plume,
Smiles on th' enamell'd landscape of the spring.
Say, at that solemn hour, the noon of night,
When nought but plaintive Philomela wakes,
Say, whilst she warbles forth her tragic tale,
Whilst grief melodious charms the Sylvan pow'rs,
And echo from her inmost cave of rest
Joins in her wailing, dost thou not partake
A melancholy pleasure? And though rage
Did lead thee forth beneath the silent gloom

Vol. X.

To meditate on horror and revenge,
Thy soften'd soul is gently sooth'd within,
And, humaniz'd again by pity's voice,
Becomes as tender as the gall-less dove

Nor is the tuneful blessing here confin'd
To cure distemper'd passions, and allay
By its persuasive notes convulsive throbs
Of soul alone; but (strange)! with subtle pow'r
Acts on the grosser matter of the frame
By riot shatter'd, or the casual lot
Of sickness wither'd. When th' harmonious plan
Of inward beauty ceases, oft the lute,
By soft vibrations on responsive nerves,
Has reconcil'd, by medicinal sounds,
Corporeal Chaos to its pristine form.
Such is the fabled charm Italians boast
To cure that insect's venom, which benumbs
By fatal touch the frozen veins, and lulls
The senses in oblivion: when the harp,
Sonorous, through the patient's bosom pours
Its antidotal notes, the flood of life,
Loos'd at its source by tepefying strains,
Flows like some frozen silver stream unthaw'd
At a warm zephyr of the genial spring.

Doubt you those charms of music o'er the soul
Of man? Behold! e'en brute creation feels
Its pow'r divine! For when the liquid flute
Breathes am'rous airs, touch'd by the love-sick
swain,

Mute is each hill and dale; the list'ning herds†
Express their joy irrational (as erst
When fauns and dryads follow'd ancient Pan
In festive dance). Ask you, from whence arise
These grateful signs of pleasure in the gaze
Of list'ning flocks at music's dulcet lore?
From whence, but from responsive notes within
Of harmony celestial, which inspires
Each animal, through all the spacious tracts
Of earth, and air, and water, from the large
Unwieldy elephant, to th' unseen mote,
That flutters in the sun's meridian beam. [fume
See! round that fragrant rose, whose sweets per-
The tinctur'd pinions of the passing breeze,
How bees laborious gather! from each hive
The dusky myriads swarm, to taste the dew,
Just sprinkled from Aurora's golden plumes,
Ambrosializ'd within its dulcet leaves,
And sweets distilling like Arabian gums
From medicinal groves—homeward they bear
The liquid spoil, exulting, all intent
To enrich the waxen empire; till anon
Luxurious plenty sows the fatal seed
Of dire dissention; sudden rage ensues,
And fight domestic; to the fields of air
The winged hosts resort; the signals sound,
And civil slaughter strews the plains below
With many a little corpse. But e'en amidst
The thickest war, let but the tuneful rod

On brazen cymbal strike, the lenient strains,
Quick undulating through the silent air,
Recal harmonious love and gentle peace
Back to their ancient seats; the friendly swarms
Sudden in reunited clusters join,
Pendent on neighb'ring fallows; nought is heard
But notes reciprocal of bliss sincere,
Soft-breathing through each amicable hive.

Now to the muse sublimer objects turn,
For mind alone can feel th' effect divine
Of emulative art, where human skill
Steals with a Promothéan hand the fire
Of heav'n, to imitate celestial pow'r.

Deep in the vale of solitude, where peace
Breathes o'er the soul diviner airs than those
By Grecian fablers sung, which from the banks
Of fam'd Elysium waft on happy shades
Their grateful influence, in sequester'd bow'rs
The pow'r of art resides: Reflection firm,
And vagrant fancy at her sov'reign nod
Attendant wait; behind th' ideal train
Of memory, with retrospective eye
Supports her throne, whilst contemplation guides
Her trophied car. Through nature's various paths,
Alike, where glows the blossom'd pride of May,
Or where bleak winter from the widow'd shrubs
Strips the gay verdure, and invests the boughs
With snowy horror; where delicious streams
Through flow'ry meadows seek their wanton
course;

Or where on Afric's unfrequented coasts
The dreary desert burns; where'er the ray
Of beauty gilds the scene, or where the cloud
Or horror casts its shade; she unrestrain'd
Explores, and in her faithful mirror bears
The sweet resemblance, to revive the soul,
When absence from the sight for ever tears
The source of rapture. Hence the tablet glows
With charms exotic; hence the sculptur'd bust,
As o'er the rock the plastic chisel moves,
Breathes by degrees, till freight returns afresh
The lov'd idea to the ravish'd eye,
And calls up ev'ry passion from its source.

Is love the object of thy glowing thoughts?
Or dream'st thou of a bliss exceeding far
Elysian pleasures? Would'st thou taste again
The heart-enslaving transports, when the soul,
Big with celestial triumph, through the vales
Of am'rous fancy led the sportive hours
To soft Idalian airs, whilst wanton loves
Strew'd round thee roses of eternal bloom,
And fann'd the sultry breeze with golden plumes?
See! where, beneath a myrtle bow'r reclin'd,
Which on the canvass casts its cooling shade,
Encircled in each other's arms, yon beauteous pair
In dulcet dalliance lie; the rigid frown
Of care ne'er low'rs, but ever cheerful smiles
Effuse, like vernal suns, their genial beams [sighs,
To warm their mutual hearts; whilst rapt'rous
Sweeter than aromatic winds which blow
O'er spicy groves in intermingled gales,
Are wafted to th' impending queen of love.

But burns thy heart with more refin'd delight?
And would'st thou through the faithful colours
view

Calm chastity and justice blend their charms
Like gleams of opening heav'n? Yon radiant
throne

Presents great Cyrus, as the Magi feign'd
The snowy-vested Mithres, from the east
Descending in effulgent rays of light,
To guide the virtuous to th' etherial plains,
Where joy for ever dwells. Before him stands
A trembling captive, with dejected looks,
As conscious of her form: upon her cheeks
The rose of beauty fades, with paler hue
The lily sickens, and each flow'r declines
Its drooping head. But see! how he revives
With unexpected hopes her tortur'd breast,
And joy's soft blush appears! So the bless'd wings
Of western zephyr's, o'er Arabian coasts
Sprinkle their heav'nly dew; the wither'd plants
Incline their sun-parch'd bosoms to imbibe
The renovating moisture, till anon
The pristine bloom through vegetative pores
Returning, smiles in ev'ry flow'ry vale, [pride,
And decks the neighb'ring hills with verdant

Such groups as these instruct th' unbiass'd mind
With real wisdom, when with beauty's garb
Virtue invested, and ne'er fading charms,
Fills with desire the soul; here art employs
To worthy ends her pencil as of old,
And calls the hero to receive the wreath
Of public honour, whilst his sacred bust
Is still preserv'd for nations yet unborn
To view with adoration; ev'ry breast
Feels emulative spirits burn within,
And longs to join the honour'd list of fame.

Yet still her influence is not less confess'd
In other forms, to raise abhorrence fierce,
To paint in hideous shapes the crew of vice,
And all her train of sure-attending woes.
These objects have their diff'rent graces too,
And glow, if faithful, through the mimic scenes
With charms peculiar. For perfection suits*,
As the known imitation shall succeed,
With equal lustre on a tyrant's frown,
As on the dimple of Pancaeste's cheek,
Or Delia's iv'ry neck: The melting tear
Drops from th' afflicted parent's joyless eye,
Not less delightful to th' attentive gaze
Of fix'd examination, than the smiles
Of infant Cupids sporting through the groves,
Where Venus sleeping lies. From nature form'd,
The just resemblance from consenting thought
Applause demands; and fancy's ravish'd eye
Sports o'er the painted surge, whose billows roll
Tempestuous to the sky, with equal bliss,
As o'er the marble surface of the deep,
Whom mild Favonius from the western isles,
With youthful spring flies glad some o'er the main,
To seek his gentle May; while Proteus rests
Deep in his oozy bed, and halcyons call,
Secure of peace, their new-fledg'd young abroad.

* See the reason in Aristotle assigned, why the mind is as much delighted with aptness of description to excite the image, as with the image in description. *Arist.
de Poet. cap. 4.* So Plutarch de Aud. Poet. See his Symp. lib. 5.

External matter thus by art is wrought,
 Or with the pencil or the chissel's touch,
 To give us back the image of the mind,
 Which smiles to find its own conceptions there.
 But can she draw the tenderness of thought?
 Can she depict the beauty of the soul,
 And all th' internal train of sweet distress,
 When friendship o'er the recent grave declines
 Its sick'ning head, as ev'ry action dear,
 And ev'ry circumstance of mutual love
 Returns afresh; while from the streaming eyes
 Bursts forth a flood of unavailing tears,
 Of parting tears, ere yet they close the tomb?
 Or, can she from the colours that adorn
 The wat'ry bow; from all the splendid store,
 That Flora lavishes in vernal hours
 On wanton zephyr; from the blazing mine
 Where Plutus reigns; can she select a bloom
 To emulate the patriot's bosom, when the wealth
 Of nations, all imperial pomp is scorn'd,
 And tyrants frown in vain, yet to the last
 He breathes the social sigh, and even in death
 With blessing on his native country calls!—
 That only to the muse belongs, to show
 How charms each moral beauty, how the scene
 Of goodness pleases the responsive soul,
 And soothes within the intellectual pow'rs
 With sympathetic order. For at first,
 This emanation of the source of life
 Unfaded glows, till o'er th' etherial rays
 Opinion casts a tincture, and infects
 The mental optics with a jaundice hue;
 Then, like the domes beneath a wizard's wand,
 Each object, as the hellish artist wills,
 A shape fallacious wears.—O throng, ye youth,
 Around the poet's song, whose sacred lays,
 Breathe no infectious vapours from the coasts,
 Where indolence supinely nods at ease,
 And offers to the passing crowd her couch
 Of down, whilst infant vices lull the mind
 To fatal slumbers; other themes invite
 My faithful hand to strike the votive lyre.
 Lo! virtue comes in more effulgent pomp,
 Than what the great impostor promis'd oft
 To cheated crowds of Mussulmen, beside
 The winy rivers and refreshing shades
 Of Paradise; and lo! the dastard train
 Of pleasure disappears. So fleet the shades,
 That wander in the dreary gloom of night,
 When from the eastern hills Aurora pours
 Her flood of glory, and relumes the world.
 Be she my great protectress, she my guide
 Through lofty Pindus, and the laurel grove,
 Whilst I through unfrequented paths pursue
 The steps of Grecian sages, and display
 The just similitude of moral charms,
 Of harmony and joy, with this fair frame
 Of outward things, which through untainted sense
 With a fraternal goodness fires the soul.

BOOK II.

ARGUMENT.

Invocation to the moral train of harmony: External objects analogous to them. The seats of rural beauty. Every kind of beauty charms, exclusive of any secondary motive. The annual renovation of nature. The complicated charms of various objects. The great, the wonderful, the fair: The contrast to the same harmonious, when united to the universal plan of nature. Abstracted objects, how they work upon the mind:—with gaiety:—with horror: with sorrow, admiration, &c. Moral beauty superior to natural, a view of the universe: The harmony of the whole: What to be deduced from it. Contemplation on beauty and proportion in external objects, harmonizes the soul to a sympathetic order. The conclusion.

THE HARMONY OF NATURE.

Come all ye moral genii, who attend
 The train of rural beauty, bring your gifts,
 Your fragrant chaplets, and your purple wreaths,
 To crown your poet's brow; come all ye pow'rs,
 Who haunt the sylvan shades, where solitude
 Nurses sweet contemplation; come ye band
 Of graces, gentle peace, contentment fair,
 Sweet innocence, and snowy-winged hope,
 Who sport with young simplicity beneath
 Her mossy roof; around my faithful lays
 Lead forth in festive pomp your paramours
 Of nature*, deck'd in spring's Elysian bloom,
 Or autumn's purple robes; whilst I relate
 In sounds congenial your untainted bliss,
 And their unfading lustre. Nor be thou
 Far from my lyre, O liberty! sweet nymph,
 Who roam'st at large through unfrequented
 groves,
 Swift as the mountain hind; or eastern winds
 O'er Asia's kingdoms.—To each nat'ral scene
 A moral pow'r belongs; as erst the woods,
 Inspir'd by dryads, wav'd their awful heads,
 With sacred horror, and the crystal streams
 Flow'd unpolluted by revering swains
 From urns celestial, whilst the mystic sounds
 Of sportive nymphs were heard in bubbling
 springs.

Ye fields and woods, and silver winding streams,
 Ye lilled vallies, and resounding rocks,
 Where faithful echo dwells; ye mansions blest
 Where nature reigns throughout the wide ex-
 panse,
 In majesty serene of opening heav'n;
 Or, humbler seated, in the blushing rose,
 The virgin violet, or the creeping moss,
 Or winding round the mould'ring ruin's top,
 With no unpleasing horror sit array'd
 In venerable ivy: Hail, thrice hail,
 Ye solitary feasts, where wisdom seeks
 Beauty and good, th' inseparable pair,
 Sweet offspring of the sky, those emblems fair
 Of the celestial cause, whose tuneful word
 From discord and from Chaos rais'd this globe,
 And all the wide effulgence of the day.

From him begins this beam of gay delight,
 When aught harmonious strikes th' attentive
 mind;

* Natural objects, which produce in the mind such images.

In him shall end ; for he attun'd the frame
Of passive organs with internal sense,
To feel an instantaneous glow of joy,
When beauty from her native seat of heav'n,
Cloth'd in ethereal mildness, on our plains
Descends, ere reason with her tardy eye
Can view the form divine; and through the world
The heav'nly boon to ev'ry being flows.
Why, when the genial spring with chaplets
crown'd

Of daisies, pinks, and vi'lets, wakes the morn
With placid whispers, do the turtles coo,
And call their consorts from the neighb'ring
groves

With softer music? why exalts the lark
His matin warbling with redoubled lays?
Why stand th' admiring herds with joyful gaze
Facing the dawn of day, or frisking bound
O'er the soft surface of the verdant meads
With unaccustom'd transport? 'Tis the ray
Of beauty, beaming its benignant warmth
Through all the brute creation: hence arise
Spontaneous off'rings of unfeigned love
In silent praises. And shall man alone,
Shall man with blind ingratitude neglect
His Maker's bounty? Shall the lap of sloth,
With soft insensibility compose
His useless soul, whilst unregarded blooms
The renovated lustre of the world?

See! how eternal Hebe onward leads
The blushing morn, and o'er the smiling globe,
With Flora join'd, flies glad some to the bow'r,
Where, with the graces, and Idalian loves,
Her sister beauty dwells. The glades expand
The blossom'd fragrance of their new-blown pride,
With gay profusion; and the flow'ry lawns
Breathe forth ambrosial odours; whilst behind,
The muse in never-dying hymns of praise
Pursues the triumph, and responsive airs
Symphonious warble through the vocal groves,
Till playful echo, in each hill and dale,
Joins the glad chorus, and improves the lay.

First o'er yon complicated landscape cast
Th' enraptur'd eye, where, through the subject
plains,

Slow with majestic pride a spacious flood
Devolves his lordly stream; with many a turn
Seeking along his serpentizing way,
And in the grateful intricacies feeds
With fruitful waves those ever-smiling shores,
Which in the floating mirror view their charms
With conscious glory; from the neighb'ring urns
Th' inferior rivers swell his regal pomp
With tributary off'rings. Some afar
Through silent osiers, and the sullen green
Of mournful willows, melancholy flow:

* Whatever is true, just, and harmonious, whether in nature or morals, gives an immediate pleasure, exclusive of reflection: nor, as beauty is not vague and unsettled, but fixt to a proper criterion, are we left indifferent; but led naturally to embrace it, by that propensity the divine Author of all things implanted in us. See the Characteristics, and An Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue.

Some o'er the rattling pebbles, to the sun
Obvious, with colour'd rays refracted, shine
Like gems which sparkle on th' exalted crowns
Of kings barbaric: Others headlong fall
From a high precipice, whose awful brow,
Fring'd with a sable wood, nods dreadful o'er
The deep below, which spreads its wat'ry lap
To catch the gushing homage, then proceeds
With richer waves than those Pactolus erst
Pour'd o'er his golden sands; or yellow Po,
Ting'd with the tears of aromatic trees.
Then at a distance, through the parted cliffs
In unconfin'd perspective send thy gaze,
Disdaining limit, o'er the green expanse
Of ocean, swelling his cerulean tide,
Whilst on th' unruffled bosom of the deep
A halcyon stillness reigns; the boist'rous winds,
Hush'd in Æolian caves, are lull'd to rest,
And leave the placid main without a wave.
E'en western zephyrs, like unfrighted doves,
Skim gently o'er with reverential awe,
Nor move their silent plumes. At such a time
Sweet Amphitrite, with her azure train
Of marine nymphs, emerging from the flood,
Whilst ev'ry Triton tun'd his vocal shell
To Hymeneal sounds, from Nereus' court
Came to espouse the monarch of the main,
In nuptial pomp attir'd.—Now change the scene,
Nor less admire those things, which view'd apart
Uncouth appear, or horrid; ridges black
Of shagg'd rocks, which hang tremendous o'er
Some barren heath; the congregated clouds
Which spread their sable skirts, and wait the wind
To burst th' embosom'd storm; a leafless wood,
A mould'ring ruin, light'ning-blasted fields,
Nay e'en the seat where desolation reigns
In brownest horror, by familiar thought
Connected to this universal frame,
With equal beauty charms the tasteful soul,
As the gold landscapes of the happy isles
Crown'd with Hesperian fruit: for nature form'd
One plan entire, and made each sep'rate scene
Co-op'rate with the gen'ral force of all
In that harmonious contrast. Hence the fair,
The wonderful, the great, from diff'rent forms
Owe their superior excellence. The light,
Not intermingled with opposing shades,
Had shone unworshipp'd by the Persian priest
With undistinguish'd rays——Yet still the hue
Of separated objects tinge the sight
With their own likeness; the responsive soul,
Cameleon like, a just resemblance bears,
And faithful, as the silent mirror, shows
In its true bosom, whether from without
A blooming paradise smiles round the land,
Or Stygian darkness blots the realms of day.
Say, when the smiling face of youthful May
Invites soft zephyr to her fragrant lap,
And Phœbus wantons on the glitt'ring streams,
Glow's not thy blood with unaccustom'd joy,
And love unfelt before? Methinks the train
Of fair Euphrosyné, heart-easing smiles,
Hope, and her brother love, and young delight,
Come to invite me to ambrosial feasts,
Where youth administers the sprightly bowl

Of care-beguiling mirth; and hark! the sound
Of sportive laughter, to the native home
Of silent night, with all her meagre crew
Chafes abhorred grief. Prepare the songs
Of mental triumph; let the jocund harp
In correspondent notes deceive the hours,
And merriment with love shall sport around.

But what perceive we in those dusky groves,
Where cypress with funereal horror shades
Some ruin'd tomb; where deadly hemlock chills
Th' unfruitful glebe, and sweating yews distill
Immedicable poison? In those plains,
Black melancholy dwells with silent fear,
And superstition fierce, the foulest fiend
That ever sullied light. Here frantic woe
Tears her dishevell'd hair; her pale disease
Hangs down her sickly head; and death behind,
With sable curtains of eternal night,
Closes the ghastly prospect.—From the good
Far be this horrid group! the foot of peace
And innocence should tread the bless'd retreat
Of pleasant Tempe, or the flow'ry field
Of Enna, glowing with unfading bloom,
Responsive to the moral charms within.
Those horrid realms let guilty villains haunt,
Who rob the orphan, or the sacred trust
Of friendship break; the wretch who never felt
Stream from his eye the comfortable balm,
Which social sorrow mixes with her tears;
Such suit their minds. There let the tyrant howl,
And hierarchy, mistress abhorr'd
Of pow'r illicit, bound with iron chains
She made for liberty and justice, gnash
Her foaming teeth, and bite the scourge in vain.
——Or when the stillness of the gray-ey'd eve,
Brok'n only by the beetle's drowsy hum,
Invites us forth to solitary vales,
Where awful ruins on their mossy roofs
Denote the flight of time; the pausing eye
Slow round the gloomy regions casts its glance,
Whilst from within the intellectual pow'rs,
With melancholy pleasure on the brow
Of thoughtful admiration fix the sign
Of guiltless transport; not with frantic noise,
Nor the rude laughter of an idiot's joy;
But with the smiles that wisdom, temp'ring oft
With sweet content, effuses. Here the mind,
Lull'd by the sacred silence of the place,
Dreams with enchanted rapture of the groves

* The ancients, who had always this analogy between natural and moral objects in view, imagined every gloomy place like this to be inhabited by such personages. Greon, in the OEdipus of Seneca, after he has described —“procul ab urbe locus illicibus niger,” goes on to relate what he saw there by the power of necromancy.

——cæcus furor

Horrorque, et una quidquid æternæ orant
Celantque tenebræ; luctus evellens comam,
Ægreque lassum sustinens morbus caput,
Gravis senectus sibimet, & pendens metus.

And to objects of a different nature, we give the moral epithets of gay, lively, cheerful, &c. because the mind is so affected.

Of Academus, and the solemn walks,
As erst frequented by the godlike band
Of Grecian sages; to the list'ning ear
Socratic sounds are heard, and Plato's self
Seems half emerging from his olive bow'r
To gather round him all th' Athenian sons
Of wisdom.—Hither throng, ye studious youth;
Here through the mental eye enamour'd view
The charms of moral beauty, to the soul
More grateful, than when Titan's golden beam
First dawns upon the new-recover'd sight
Of one long-fated to the dreary gloom
Of darkness. How, to undistemper'd thought,
Does virtue in mild modesty appear
Delightful, when the sympathetic heart
Feels for another's woe! Was any scene
So beauteous, in the wide-extended pomp
And golden splendour of the Persian camp,
When all the riches of the east were spread
Beneath the tyrant's feet; * did aught appear
So lovely and so great, as when the call
Of curs'd ambition ceas'd in Xerxes' breast,
And from the social eye compassion pour'd
The tender flood of heart-ennobling tears?

Thus the chief scenes of nature view'd apart,
Which with a just similitude affect
Th' attentive mind, now through the tuneful whole

Let the swift wing of fancy bear us on
Beyond the ken of knowledge, where, unseen
To us inhabitants of this small spot,
Ten thousand worlds in regions unconfin'd,
Progressive and obedient to the source
Of light eternal, gild the vast expanse:
Or, should we stop th' aspiring flight to view,
Led by the hand of science and of truth,
Where in the midst the glorious sun expands
His flame, and with perennial beams supplies
The distant planets as they roll around;
What harmony divine for ever reigns!
† How these in tuneful order through the void
Their diff'rent stations keep, their pow'rs distinct
Observe, and in each others friendly sphere
Their kindest influence blend, till all unite
To form the plan of the all-ruling Mind,
And, through the whole celestial bliss diffuse!

Hence let the worse than atheist, the fond fool
Who safely doats in superstition's gloom,
And blindfold led by easy faith, denies
The guide of reason, obstinately bent
To seek the cause of universal good,
And source of beauty in the demon's cave,
And, shudd'ring, fancies he at distance hears
The howls of ghosts, created to endure
Eternal torments. Let this impious wretch
Look round this fair creation, where, impell'd
By that great Author, every atom tends

* The superiority of moral beauty to natural, has been universally allowed by all authors, both ancient and modern. And that sentence of Seneca's may be understood figuratively: “Nullum ornamentum principis fastigio dignius pulchriusque est, quam illa corona quæ civis servatos.” SENEC. de Clem. lib. i.

What though from fortune's lavish bounty,
No mighty treasures we possess,
We'll find within our pittance plenty,
And be content without excess.

Still shall each kind returning season,
Sufficient for our wishes give;
For we will live a life of reason,
And that's the only life to live.

Our name while virtue thus we tender,
Shall sweetly sound where'er 'tis spoke;
And all the great ones much shall wonder,
How they admire such little folk.

Through youth and age in love excelling,
We'll hand in hand together tread,
Sweet smiling peace shall crown our dwelling,
And babes, sweet smiling babes, our bed.

How should I love the pretty creatures,
Whilst round my knees they fondly clung,
To see them look their mother's features,
To hear them lip their mother's tongue.

And when with envy time transported,
Shall think to rob us of our joys,
You'll in your girls again be courted,
And I go wooing in my boys.

A FATHER'S ADVICE TO HIS SON.

AN ELEGY.

In Imitation of the old Song to Winifreda.

Written in the year 1758.

— "aspice vultus
" Ecce meos: utinamque oculos in pectore posses
" Inferere, et patrias intus dependere curas."
OVID. MET.

DEEP in a grove by cypress shaded,
Where mid-day sun had seldom shone,
Or noise the solemn scene invaded,
Save some afflicted muse's moan.

A swain t'wards full-ag'd manhood wending
Sate sorrowing at the close of day,
At whose fond side a boy attending
Lisp'd half his father's cares away.

The father's eyes no object wrested,
But on the smiling prattler hung,
Till, what his throbbing heart suggested,
These accents trembled from his tongue.

" My youth's first hope, my manhood's treasure,
" My prattling innocent attend,
" Nor fear rebuke or sour displeasure,
" A father's loveliest name is friend.

" Some truths, from long experience flowing,
" Worth more than royal grants receive,
" For truths are wealth of Heav'n's bestowing,
" Which kings have seldom power to give.

" Since from an ancient race descended
" You boast an unattainted blood,
" By yours be their fair fame attended,
" And claim by birth-right to be good.

" In love for ev'ry fellow creature
" Superior rise above the crowd,
" What most ennobles human nature
" Was ne'er the portion of the proud.

" Be thine the gen'rous heart that borrows
" From others' joys a friendly glow,
" And for each hapless neighbour's sorrows
" Throbs with a sympathetic woe.

" This is the temper most endearing;
" Though wide proud pomp her banners spreads,
" An heav'nlier pow'r good nature bearing
" Each heart in willing thraldom leads.

" Taste not from fame's uncertain fountain
" The peace-destroying streams that flow,
" Nor from ambition's dang'rous mountain
" Look down upon the world below.

" The princely pine on hills exalted,
" Whose lofty branches cleave the sky,
" By winds, long brav'd, at last assaulted,
" Is headlong whirl'd in dust to lie;

" Whilst the mild rose more safely growing
" Low in its un aspiring vale,
" Amidst retirement's shelter blowing
" Exchanges sweets with ev'ry gale.

" Wish not for beauty's darling features
" Moulded by nature's fondling pow'r,
" For fairest forms 'mong human creatures
" Shine but the pageants of an hour.

" I saw, the pride of all the meadow,
" At noon, a gay Narcissus blow
" Upon a river's bank, whose shadow
" Bloom'd in the silver waves below;

" By noon-tide's heat its youth was wasted,
" The waters, as they pass'd, complain'd,
" At eve its glories all were blasted,
" And not one former tint remain'd.

" Nor let vain wit's deceitful glory
" Lead you from wisdom's path astray;
" What genius lives renown'd in story
" To happiness who found the way?

" In yonder mead behold that vapour
" Whose vivid beams illusive play,
" Far off it seems a friendly taper
" To guide the traveller on his way;

" But should some hapless wretch pursuing
" Tread where the treach'rous meteors glow,
" He'd find, too late his rashness rueing,
" That fatal quicksands lurk below.

" In life such bubbles naught admiring
" Gilt with false light and fill'd with air,
" Do you, from pageant crowds retiring,
" To peace in virtue's cot repair;

" There seek the never-wasted treasure,
" Which mutual love and friendship give,
" Domestic comfort, spotless pleasure,
" And bless'd and blessing you will live.

" If Heav'n with children crowns your dwelling,
 " As mine its bounty does with you,
 " In fondness fatherly excelling
 " Th' example you have felt pursue."

He paus'd—for tenderly careſſing
 The darling of his wounded heart,
 Looks had means only of expreſſing
 Thoughts language never could impart.

Now night her mournful mantle ſpreading
 Had rob'd with black th' horizon round,
 And dank dews from her trefſes ſhedding
 With genial moiſture bath'd the ground;

When back to city follies flying
 'Midſt cuſtom's ſlaves he liv'd reſign'd,
 His face, array'd in ſmiles, denying
 The true complection of his mind;

For ſeriously around ſurveying
 Each character, in youth and age,
 Of fools betray'd, and knaves betraying,
 That play'd upon this human ſtage.

(Peaceful himſelf and undeſigning)
 He loath'd the ſcenes of guile and ſtrife,
 And felt each ſecret wiſh inclining
 To leave this fretful farce of life.

Yet to whate'er above was fated
 Obediently he bow'd his ſoul,
 For, what all-bounteous Heav'n created,
 He thought Heav'n only ſhould controul.

THE TOMB OF SHAKSPEARE.

A VISION.

WHAT time the jocund roſy-boſom'd hours
 Led forth the train of Phoebus and the ſpring,
 And zephyr mild profuſely ſcatter'd flowers
 On earth's green mantle from his muſky wing.

The morn unbarr'd th' ambroſial gates of light,
 Weſtward the raven-pinion'd darkneſs flew,
 The landſcape ſmil'd in vernal beauty bright,
 And to their graves the fallen ghoſts withdrew.

The nightingale no longer ſwell'd her throat
 With love-lorn plainings tremulous and ſlow,
 And on the wings of ſilence ceas'd to float
 The gurgling notes of her melodious woe:

The god of ſleep myſterious viſions led
 In gay proceſſion 'fore the mental eye,
 And my free'd ſoul awhile her manſion fled,
 To try her plumes for immortality.

Through fields of air, methought I took my flight,
 Through ev'ry clime o'er ev'ry region paſs'd,
 No paradise or ruin ſcap'd my ſight,
 Heſperian garden, or Cimmerian waſte.

On Avon's banks I lit, whoſe ſtreams appear
 To wind with eddies fond round Shakspeare's tomb,

The year's firſt feath'ry ſongſters warble near,
 And vi'lets breathe, and earlieſt roſes bloom.

Here fancy ſat (her dewy fingers cold
 Decking with flow'rets freſh th' unſullied ſod),
 And bath'd with tears the ſad ſepulchral mold,
 Her fav'rite offspring's long and laſt abode.

Ah! what avails, ſhe cry'd, a poet's name?
 Ah! what avails th' immortalizing breath
 To ſnatch from dumb oblivion others' fame?
 My darling child here lies a prey to death!

Let gentle Otway, white-rob'd pity's prieſt,
 From grief domeſtic teach the tears to flow,
 Or Southern captivate th' impaſſion'd breaſt
 With heart-felt ſighs and ſympathy of woe.

For not to theſe his genius was confin'd,
 Nature and I each tuneful pow'r had given,
 Poetic tranſports of the madding mind,
 And the wing'd words that waſt the ſoul to heaven

The fiery glance of th' intellectual eye,
 Piercing all objects of creation's ſtore,
 Which on this world's extended ſurface lie,
 And platiſtic thought that ſtill created more.

O grant, with eager rapture I reply'd,
 Grant me, great goddeſs of the changeful eye,
 To view each being in poetic pride,
 To whom thy ſon gave immortality.

Sweet fancy ſmil'd, and wav'd her myſtic rod,
 When ſtrait theſe viſions felt her pow'rful arm,
 And one by one ſucceeded at her nod,
 As vaſſal ſprites obey the wizard's charm.

Fiſt a celeftial form * (of azure hue
 Whoſe mantle, bound with brede etherial, flow'd
 To each ſoft breeze its balmy breath that drew)
 Swift down the ſun-beams of the noon-tide rode.

Obedient to the necromantic ſway
 Of an old ſage to ſolitude reſign'd,
 With fenny vapours he obſcur'd the day,
 Launch'd the long lightning, and let looſe the wind.

He whirl'd the tempeſt through the howling air,
 Rattled the dreadful thunderclap on high,
 And rais'd a roaring elemental war
 Betwixt the ſea green waves and azure ſky.

Then like Heav'n's mild ambaffador of love
 To man repentant, bade the tumult ceaſe,
 Smooth'd the blue boſom of the realms above,
 And huſh'd the rebel elements to peace.

Unlike to this in ſpirit or in mien
 Another form † ſucceeded to my view;
 A two-legg'd brute, which nature made in ſpleen,
 Or from the loathing womb unfiniſh'd drew.

Scarce could he ſyllable the curſe he thought,
 Prone were his eyes to earth, his mind to evil,
 A carnal fiend to imperfection wrought,
 The mongrel offspring of a witch and devil.

* Ariel in the Tempeſt. † Caliban in the Tempeſt.

Next bloom'd, upon an ancient forest's bound,
The flow'ry margin * of a silent stream,
O'er-arch'd by oaks with ivy mantled round,
And gilt by silver Cynthia's maiden beam.

On the green carpet of th' unbended grass,
A dapper train of female fairies play'd,
And ey'd their gambols in the wat'ry glass,
That smoothly stole along the shad'wy glade.

Through these the queen Titania pass'd ador'd,
Mounted aloft in her imperial car,
Journeying to see great Oberon her lord
Wage the mock battles of a sportive war.

Arm'd cap-a-pee forth march'd the fairy king,
A stouter warrior never took the field,
His threat'ning lance a hornet's horrid sting,
The sharded beetle's scale his sable shield.

Around their chief the elfin host appear'd,
Each little helmet sparkling like a star,
And their sharp spears a pierceless phalanx rear'd,
A grove of thistles glittering in the air.

The scene then chang'd from this romantic land
To a bleak waste by bound'ry unconfin'd,
Where three swart sisters † of the weird band
Were mutt'ring curses to the troublous wind.

Pale want had wither'd every furrow'd face,
Bow'd was each carcase with the weight of
years,
And each sunk eye-ball from its hollow case
Distill'd cold rheum's involuntary tears.

Hors'd on three staves they posted to the bourn
Of a drear island, where the pendent brow
Of a rough rock, shagg'd horribly with thorn,
Frown'd on the boist'rous waves which rag'd below.

Deep in a gloomy grot, remote from day,
Where smiling comfort never show'd her face,
Where light ne'er enter'd, save one rueful ray
Discov'ring all the terrors of the place,

They held damn'd myst'ries with infernal state,
Whilst ghastly goblins glided slowly by,
The screech-owl scream'd the dying call of fate,
And ravens croak'd their horrid augury.

No human footstep cheer'd the dread abode,
Nor sign of living creature could be seen,
Save where the reptile snake, or sullen toad,
The murky floor had soil'd with venom green.

Sudden I heard the whirlwind's hollow sound,
Each weird sister vanish'd into smoke.
Now a dire yell of spirits ‡ under ground
Through troubled earth's wide yawning surface broke;

When, lo! each injur'd apparition rose;
Aghast the murd'rer started from his bed;

* Fairy-land, from the Midsummer-Night's Dream.

† The Witches in Macbeth.

‡ Ghosts in Macbeth, Richard III. &c.

Guilt's trembling breath his heart's red current froze,
And horror's dew-drops bath'd his frantic head.

More had I seen—but now the god of day
O'er earth's broad breast his flood of light had spread,
When Morpheus call'd his fickle train away,
And on their wings each bright illusion fled.

Yet still the dear enchantress of the brain
My wakeful eyes with wishful wand'rings sought,
Whose magic will controuls th' ideal train,
The ever-restless progeny of thought.

Sweet pow'r, said I, for others gild the ray
Of wealth, or honour's folly-feather'd crown,
Or lead the madding multitude astray
To grasp at air-blown bubbles of renown.

Me (humbler lot!) let blameless bliss engage,
Free from the noble mob's ambitious strife,
Free from the muck-worm miser's lucrous rage,
In calm contentment's cottag'd vale of life.

If frailties there (for who from them is free?)
Through error's maze my devious footsteps
lead,
Let them be frailties of humanity,
And my heart plead the pardon of my head.

Let not my reason impiously require,
What Heav'n has plac'd beyond its narrow span,
But teach me to subdue each fierce desire
Which wars within this little empire, man.

Teach me, what all believe, but few possess,
That life's best science is ourselves to know,
The first of human blessings is to bless,
And happiest he who feels another's woe.

Thus cheaply wise, and innocently great,
While time's smooth sand shall regularly pass,
Each destin'd atom's quiet course I'll wait,
Nor rashly break, nor wish to stop the glass.

And when in death my peaceful ashes lie,
If e'er some tongue congenial speaks my name,
Friendship shall never blush to breathe a sigh,
And great ones envy such an honest fame.

VER-VERT: OR THE NUNNERY PARROT.

AN HEROIC POEM IN FOUR CANTOS.

Inscribed to the Abbess of D.*

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MONSIEUR
G ESSET.

CANTO I.

O you, round whom, at virtue's shrine,
The solitary graces shine,
With native charms all hearts engage,
And reign without religious rage;
You, whose congenial soul by heaven
A pleasing guide to truth was given,

Uniting, with the family
Of rigid duties, harmless mirth,
Daughter of social liberty,
Twin-born with humour at a birth,
And every other power to please,
Taste, fancy, elegance, and ease;
O! since you bid your bard relate
A noble bird's disastrous fate,
In notes of sympathetic woe,
Be you my muse, my soul inspire,
And teach my numbers how to flow
Like those which trembled from your lyre
In soft and sorrow-soothing sound,
Whilst listening Cupids wept around,
When dear * Sultana's spirit fled,
In youthful vigour's vernal bloom,
'To the dark mansions of the dead:
Then for my hero's hapless doom
Such tears might once again be shed.

One might, upon his virtues cross'd
By adverse fortune's envious rage,
And wanderings over many a coast,
Swell out the soporific page,
And other odysseys compose
To lull the reader to repose:
One might the gods and devils raise
Of superannuated lies,
Spin out the deeds of forty days
To volumes of dull histories,
And with a pompous tediousness
Sublimely heavy moralize
Upon a bird, in epic dress,
Who as Æneas' self was great,
As famous too for godliness
And each way more unfortunate;
But folios are, in verse, excess,
Which the sweet muses must abhor,
For they are sportive bees of spring,
Who dwell not long on any bower,
But, lightly wandering on the wing,
Collect the bloom from flower to flower,
And, when one fragrant blossom's dry,
To other sweets unrifled fly.
This truth my observation drew
From faultless nature and from you;
And may these lines, I copy, prove
I'm govern'd by the laws I love!
Should I, too faithfully portraying
Some cloyster'd characters, reveal
The convent arts themselves, arraying
In pomp, with hieroglyphic skill,
Each weighty bus'ness of the grate,
Each serious nothing's mystic face,
Each trifle swell'd with holy state;
Your native humour, whilst I trace
The comic semblance, will forbear
To blame the strokes you cannot fear;
You may despise, from folly free,
What dullness is oblig'd to wear,
The formal mask of gravity.
Illusion's meteors never shine
To lead astray such souls as thine.
All holy arts heaven values less

* A Lap-dog.

Than amiable cheerfulness.
Should virtue her own image shew
To ravish'd mortals here below,
With features fierce she'd not appear
Nor superstition's holy leer,
But, like the graces, or like you,
She'd come to claim her altar's due.
In many an author of renown
I've read this curious observation,
That, by much wandering up and down,
Men catch the faults of every nation
And lose the virtues of their own.
'Tis better, e'en where scanty fare is,
Our homely hearths and honours watching,
Under protection of our lares,
A calm domestic life to wed,
Than run about infection catching
Where-ever chance and error tread:
The youth too soon who goes abroad
Will half a foreigner become,
And bring his wondering friends a load
Of strange exotic vices home.

This truth the hero of my tale
Exemplifies in tarnish'd glory;
Should sceptic wits the truth assail,
I call for witness to my story
Each cloister'd echo now that dwells
In Nevers' consecrated cells.

At Nevers, but few years ago,
Among the nuns o' th' visitation,
There dwelt a parrot, though a beau,
For sense of wond'rous reputation;
Whose virtues, and genteel address,
Whose figure, and whose noble soul,
Would have secur'd him from distress
Could wit and beauty fate controul.
Ver-Vert (for so the nuns agreed
To call this noble personage)
The hopes of an illustrious breed,
To India ow'd his parentage,
By an old missionary sent
To this said convent for his good,
He yet was young and innocent,
And nothing worldly understood.
Beauteous he was, and debonnaire,
Light, spruce, inconstant, gay, and free,
And unreserv'd, as youngsters are,
'Ere age brings on hypocrisy.
In short, a bird, from prattling merit,
Worthy a convent to inherit.

The tender cares I need not tell
Of all the sisterhood devout,
Nothing, 'tis said, each lov'd so well,
Leave but her ghostly father out,
Nay in some hearts, not void of grace,
One plain historian makes no doubt
The parrot of the priest took place.
He shar'd in this serene abode
Whate'er was lov'd by the profession;
On him such dainties were bestow'd
As nuns prepare against confession,
And for the sacred entrails hoard
Of holy fathers in the Lord.
Sole licens'd male to be belov'd,
Ver-Vert was bless'd without controul,

Careless and caress'd he rov'd
Of all the monastery the soul,
Except some antiquated dames,
Whose hearts to pleasure callous grown
Remark'd with jealous eyes the flames
Of bosoms younger than their own,
At years of reason not arriv'd
A life of privilege he liv'd,
He said and did what'er he would,
And what he said or did was good.
He'd peck the nuns in wanton play
To wile their plain-work hours away;
No party ever was approv'd
Without his favourite company;
In him they found what females lov'd,
That life of bliss variety:
He'd strut a beau in sportive rings
Uttering pert sentences by rote,
Mimic the butterfly's light wings
Or nightingale's complaining note;
He'd laugh, sing, whistle, joke, and leser,
And frolic, but discreetly so,
With a prudential cautious fear,
As nuns probationary do.
Question'd at once by many a tongue
Incessantly inquisitive,
He could, discordant sounds among,
To each a proper answer give;
This power from Cæsar's nothing varies,
Who did at once great plans conceive
And dictate to four secretaries.

If chronicles may be believ'd,
So lov'd the pamper'd gallant liv'd,
That with the nuns he always din'd
On rarities of every kind;
Then hoards, occasionally varied,
Of biscuits, sweet meats, nuts, and fruit,
Each sister in her pocket carried,
Subordinately to recruit,
At leisure times, when not at table,
His stomach indefatigable.
The little cares with tender faces
And fond attentions, as they say,
Are natives of these holy places,
As Ver-Vert witness'd every day.
No human parrot of the court
Was fondled half so much as he;
In indolence genteel, and sport,
His hours roll'd on delightfully:
Each chamber that he fancied best
Was his the dormitory round,
And, where at eve he chose to rest,
Honour'd, thrice honour'd, was the ground,
And much the lucky nun was blest'd!
But nights he very seldom pass'd
With those whom years and prudence blest'd,
The plain neat room was more his taste
Of some young damsel not profess'd;
This nicety at board and bed
Show'd he was nobly born and bred.
When the young female anchorite,
Whom all the rest with envy view'd,
Had fix'd him for the coming night,
Perch'd on her Agnus box he stood,
Silent in undisturb'd repose
Till Venus' warning star arose:

And when at morn the pious maid
Her toilette's mysteries display'd
He freely saw what'er was done;
I say the toilette, for I've read,
But speak it in a lower tone,
That virgins, in a cloister bred,
Their looks and languishings review
In mirrors to their eyes as true
As those, that serve to show the faces
Of dames who flaunt in gems and laces,
For, as in city or at court
Some certain taste or mode prevails,
There is among the godly sort
A taste in putting on their vails;
There is an art to fold with grace,
Round a young, vestal's blooming face,
Plain crape, or other simple stuff,
With happy negligence enough.
Often the sportive loves in swarms,
Which to the monasteries repair,
Spread o'er the holy fillets charms
And tie them with a killing air;
In short, the nuns are never seen
In parlour or at grate below,
'Ere at the looking-glass they've been
To steal a decent glance or so.
This softly whisper'd friends between,
Farther digression we adjourn,
And to our hero now return.
Safe in this unmolested scene
Ver-Vert, amidst a life of bliss,
Unrivall'd reign'd on every part;
Her slighted sparrows took amiss
This change in sister Thecla's heart;
Four finches through mere rage expir'd
At his advancement mortified,
And two grimalkins late admir'd,
With envy languish'd, droop'd, and died.
In days like these of joy and love,
Who would have thought such tender cares
To form his youthful mind, should prove,
Through fortune's spite, destructive snares?
Or that an adverse time should come
When this same idol of their hearts
Should stand the mark, by cruel doom,
Of horror's most envenom'd darts?
But stop, my muse, forbid to flow
The tears arising from the sight
Of such an unexpected woe,
Too bitter fruit, alas! to grow
From the soft root of dear delight!

CANTO II.

In such a school, a bird of sense
Would soon acquire, it is confess'd,
The gift of copious eloquence;
For, save his meals and hours of rest,
His tongue was always occupied:
And no good treatise could excel,
In phrases ready cut and dried,
His doctrines about living well.
He was not like those parrots rude
Whom dangling in a public cage
The common manners of the age

Have render'd conversably lewd;
 Who, doctor'd by the worldly tribe,
 With frail concupiscence endued,
 Each human vanity describe.
 Our Ver-Vert was a saint in grain,
 A soul with innocence fraught,
 Who never utter'd word profane,
 Who never had immodest thought.
 But in the room of ribbald wit
 Each mystic colloquy he knew,
 And many a text in holy writ
 With prayers and collects not a few;
 Could psalms and canticles repeat
 And benedicite complete;
 He could petition heaven for grace
 With sanctimonious voice and eyes,
 And at a proper time and place
 Religiously soliloquize.
 Each help he had in this learn'd college
 That could conduce to sacred knowledge.
 For many virgins had retreated
 Through grace to this religious fold,
 Who, word for word, by rote repeated
 Each Christmas carol, new and old.
 From frequent lessons every day
 The scholar grew as learn'd as they;
 Their very tone of speaking too
 In pious drawlings he express'd,
 The same religious sighs he drew
 Deep heaving from the godly breast,
 And languid notes in which these doves
 Mournfully chaunt their mystic loves.
 In short, the bird perform'd his part
 In all the psalmodizing art.

Such merit could not be confin'd
 Within a cloister's narrow bound,
 But flew, for fame is swift as wind,
 The neighbouring territories round;
 Through Nevers' town from morn to night,
 Scarce any other talk was heard,
 But of discourses exquisite
 Betwixt the nuns and Indian bird:
 And ev'n from Moulins numbers came
 To witness to the truth of fame.
 Ver-Vert, the parlor's boasted glory,
 Whilst all that came were told his story,
 Perch'd proud upon his favourite stand
 Sister Melania's ivory hand,
 Who pointed out each excellence
 Of mind or body he possess'd,
 His sweet mild temper, polish'd sense,
 And various colours on his breast,
 When his engaging aspect won
 Each visiter he look'd upon;
 But beauty the most exquisite
 Was, in our tender proselyte,
 The least his qualities among,
 For all forgot his feathery pride
 And every outward charm beside
 The moment that they heard his tongue.
 With various righteous graces fill'd,
 By the good sisterhood instill'd,
 Th' illustrious bird his speech began,
 At every turn allusions new,
 Conceptions fine, and doctrines true,

In streams of honey'd language ran;
 But what was singularly new,
 In this uncommon gift of speech,
 And scarce will be reputed true,
 Not any whilst they heard him preach,
 Did ever feel (his powers were such)
 Ecclesiastic lethargy,
 From soporific sanctity;
 What orator can boast as much?
 Much was he prais'd and much carress'd,
 Whilst he, familiariz'd to fame,
 Convinc'd 'twas only a mere name.
 His head on his projected breast
 With priestly gentleness reclin'd,
 And always modestly express'd
 The inward triumph of his mind.
 When he had utter'd to the crowd
 His treasur'd scientific store,
 He mutter'd something not aloud,
 And sunk in cadence more and more,
 Till, with an aspect sanctified,
 At last in silence down he sat,
 And left his audience edified
 On what had pass'd to ruminate.
 These eloquent harangues would flow
 With choice of sweetest phrases fraught
 Except a trifling word or so,
 Which accidentally he caught,
 Of scandal, at the grate below,
 Or some small syllable of haste,
 Which gentle nuns will, by the bye,
 At one another sometimes cast,
 When none but holy ears are nigh.

Thus liv'd in this delightful cage,
 As saint, as master, or as sage,
 Good father Ver-Vert, dear to more
 Than of vail'd Hebes half a score,
 As any cloister'd monk as fat,
 As reverend too in holy state,
 Learn'd as an abbe town approv'd,
 And fair as youths by brides carress'd,
 For lovely he was always lov'd,
 Perfum'd, well-bred, in fashion dress'd;
 In short, had he not hapless rov'd
 To see the world, completely bless'd.

But soon the fatal moments came
 Of ever-mournful memory,
 Destructive to our hero's fame.
 Voyage of crimes and misery,
 Of sad remorse and endless shame!
 Would foresight in a former age
 Had torn it from th' historic page!
 Ah! what a dangerous good at best
 Is the possession of renown!
 Obscurity is sooner blest,
 From his sad fate it will be shewn;
 Too much success and brilliant parts
 Have often ruin'd virtuous hearts.

Thy talents, Ver-Vert, and thy name,
 To these lone walls were not confin'd;
 As far as Nants the voice of fame
 Proclaim'd th' endowments of thy mind.
 At Nants, 'tis known, the visitation
 Of reverend sisters has a fold,
 Who there, as elsewhere through the nation,

Know first whate'er by fame is told.
 With other news, each holy dame,
 This parrot's merit having heard,
 Had longings to behold the bird.
 A lay-maid's wish is like a flame;
 But, when a nun has such desire,
 'Tis fifty times a fiercer fire.
 Their curious hearts already burn'd,
 Their thoughts to distant Nevers flew,
 And many a holy head was turn'd,
 The feather'd prodigy to view.
 Immediately upon the spot
 To the good abbess of the place
 A female secretary wrote,
 Beseeching her to have the grace
 To Nants, by water down the Loire,
 To send the bird so fam'd for sense,
 That all the female Nantine choir
 Might hear and see his excellence.

The letter goes: all question, when
 The bearer will return again?
 'Twill be eleven days at least,
 An age to any female breast!
 They send each day fresh invitation,
 Depriv'd of sleep through expectation.

Howe'er at length to Nevers came
 This letter of importance great.
 At once the convent's in a flame
 And the whole chapter's summon'd strait.
 "Lose Ver-Vert! heaven! send rather death!"
 "What comfort will with us be left,
 "These solitary towers beneath,
 "When of the darling bird bereft?"
 Thus spoke the nuns of blooming years,
 Whose hearts, fatigued with holy leisure,
 Preferr'd to penance and to tears
 Soft sentiments of harmless pleasure.
 In truth, a holy flock, at least,
 So close confin'd, might fairly claim
 To be by one poor bird carcass'd,
 Since there no other parrot came
 Fledg'd or unfledg'd to cheer their nest.
 Yet 'twas the opinion of the dames
 Who, by their age superior, sat
 Rulers in senatorial state,
 Whose hearts resisted passion's flames,
 That, for a fortnight's space or so,
 Their dear disciple strait should go;
 For, prudence overweighing love,
 'Th' infatuated state decreed
 A stubborn negative might prove
 The cause of mutual hate, and breed
 For ever after much bad blood
 'Twixt theirs and Nants's sisterhood.

Soon as the ladies, in conclusion,
 O' th' upper house the bill had pass'd,
 The commons were in great confusion;
 Young Seraphina cry'd in haste,
 "Ah! what a sacrifice they make!"
 "And is it true consent they give?"
 "Fate from us nothing more can take!"
 "How, Ver-Vert leave us, and we live!"
 Another, though reputed sage,
 Grew pale at what she heard them say;
 No council could her grief assuage.

She trembled, wept, and swoon'd away.
 All mourn'd departing Ver-Vert's fate,
 Prefaging, from I know not what,
 This tour would prove unfortunate.
 In horrid dreams the night they spent,
 The morn redoubled horrors sent.
 Too vain regret! the mournful hour
 Already's come, within their view
 The boat is waiting at the shore,
 The fates command to bid adieu,
 And to his absence, for a while,
 Their throbbing bosoms reconcile.
 Already every sister pin'd
 Like the soft turtle of the grove,
 To grief before-hand self-resign'd
 For the lone hours of widow'd love.
 What tender kisses were bestow'd
 On Ver-Vert leaving this abode!
 What briny streams of sorrow flow'd!
 The nearer his departure drew
 They doated on him more and more,
 And found each moment genius new
 And beauties never seen before.
 At length he leaves their wishful eyes,
 Love with him from the convent flies.
 "Ah! go, my child; my dearest, haste,
 "Where honour calls thee from my arms;
 "But, O! return, thy exile past,
 "For ever true, and full of charms!
 "May zephyrs with their airy plumes
 "Waft thee securely on thy way!
 "Whilst I, amidst these dreary tombs
 "In anguish waste the tardy day.
 "And sadly solitary mourn
 "Uncomforted till thy return.
 "O Ver-Vert, dearest soul! adieu;
 "And, whilst thy journey happy proves,
 "May all, thy beauteous form who view,
 "Think thee the eldest of the loves!"
 Such were the words and parting scene
 Of one young lately vailed fair,
 Who oft, to dissipate chagrin,
 In bed made many a fervent prayer,
 Learnt from the manual of Racine;
 And who with all her heart, no doubt,
 Would, for sweet Ver-Vert's company,
 Have left the holy monastery,
 A follow'd him the world throughout.
 But now the droll is put on board,
 At present virtuous and sincere,
 And modest too in deed and word:
 O! may his bosom every where,
 By prudence guarded, still retain
 That worth, and bring it home again!
 Be that however as it may,
 The boat's already on its way;
 The noise of waves beneath the prow
 Re-echoes in the air above;
 The zephyrs favourably blow,
 And Nevers backwards seems to move.

CANTO III.

In the same passage-boat, that bore
 This bird of holiness from shore,

There happen'd the same time to fail
 Two nymphs of constitution frail,
 A nurse loquacious, two Gascoons,
 A vagrant monk, and three dragoons,
 Which, for a youth of piety,
 Was worshipful society!
 Ver-Vert, unpractis'd in their ways,
 As folks in foreign countries do,
 Stood silently in fix'd amaze;
 Their thoughts and language both were new,
 The style he did not understand;
 It was not, like the scriptures, phras'd
 In dialect of holy land,
 With sacred eastern figures rais'd;
 Nor that, in which the vestal band
 Of nuns their Maker pray'd and prais'd;
 But full of, what the bird surpris'd,
 Big words not over Christianiz'd;
 For the dragoons, a wordy race
 Not burden'd with religious grace,
 Spoke fluently the sutler's tongue,
 Saint Bacchus only they ador'd,
 To whom libations oft they pour'd
 For pastime as they sail'd along;
 The Gascoons and the female three
 Convers'd in idioms which belong
 To Venus's great mystery;
 On t'other hand the sailors swore,
 Curs'd, and blasphem'd each heavenly power,
 Whose voices, not in flowers of speech,
 But words sonorous us'd to deal,
 Roundly articulated each,
 Nor lost the smallest, syllable.
 In this variety of sound
 And unintelligible prate,
 Ver-Vert, surpris'd at all around,
 Sad, silent, and embarrass'd sat;
 He fear'd his ignorance to betray,
 And knew not what to think or say.

The monk, to satisfy the crowd
 Who long'd to hear his thoughts aloud,
 To talk the pensive stranger press'd;
 The girls in words too debonnaire,
 Unus'd at penance, or in prayer,
 The melancholy bird carefs'd:
 Here by the sex he lov'd address'd
 The parrot (whilst his look benign
 With usual light religious glisters)
 In sacred sighs and nunnery whine
 Answers, God save you, holy sisters!
 At this God save you, we'll suppose,
 An universal laugh arose:
 In ridicule the words aloud
 Were echo'd through the noisy crowd.
 Thus mock'd, abash'd the novice stood,
 And inly chew'd, the mental cud.
 He found what he had said was wrong,
 And saw 'twas needful to endeavour
 To speak the language of the throng,
 If e'er he hop'd to gain their favour!
 His heart, by nature fond of praise,
 Which had been nourish'd all his days,
 Till then, with flattery's incense full,
 Now could, alas! sustain no more
 Of constancy the modest power

Against th' assaults of ridicule;
 Here first, by sour impatience cross'd
 Ver-Vert his innocency lost.
 From thence he pour'd ungrateful curses
 Against the nuns his former nurses,
 Who never had adorn'd his mind,
 Careless of literary merit,
 With language copious and refin'd,
 Replete with elegance and spirit.
 T' acquire this great accomplishment
 Each earnest faculty he bent,
 And though his prudent tongue lay still,
 His soul of thinking had its fill.
 But first the bird resolv'd, in pet,
 All the old gew-gaws to forget
 Which hitherto compos'd his creed,
 That new ideas might succeed.
 In two days, by strict computation,
 All former knowledge he expell'd;
 So much the present conversation
 The convent dialect excell'd.
 This first step made, within a trice,
 The truly docile animal
 (Young minds too soon are skill'd in vice)!
 In ribaldry was clerical,
 And quickly learnt to curse and swear,
 As fast as an old devil would chatter,
 Bound down by chains of mystic prayer,
 Beneath a pot of holy water.
 His practice contradicted plain
 A maxim which old books maintain,
 That none to heinous crimes can leap
 At first, but progress step by step;
 For he at once without degree
 Was doctor in iniquity.
 He learnt by heart the alphabet
 Of watermen, the Loire along,
 And when, in any stormy fit,
 And oath escap'd a sailor's tongue;
 Ver-Vert, emphatically plain,
 Re-echo'd damn you back again.
 On this, applauded by the crew,
 Proudly content with what had pass'd,
 Solicitous he daily grew,
 The shameful honour to pursue
 Of pleasing their corrupted taste;
 And, soon degrading to their bent
 His generous organ of discourse,
 Became profanely eloquent.
 Ah! why should bad examples force
 A youthful heart, born free from evils,
 From heaven's allegiance to the devil's.
 Ye nymphs of Nevers' convent chaste,
 What did you in your cloister'd cells,
 Where pensive melancholy dwells,
 Whilst these unlucky moments pass'd?
 In that sad interval, no doubt,
 Nine days you spent in prayers devout,
 Petitioning kind Heaven to give
 A happy journey home again
 To the most thankless soul alive,
 Who, quite regardless of your pain,
 Abroad engag'd in pleasures new,
 Spent not a single thought on you,
 The yawning band of tediousness

The convent round besieg'd each gate;
 And spleen, in fanciful distress,
 Sat sullen at the gloomy grate;
 Nay, what the sex shuns every where,
 Silence herself came almost there.
 Ah! cease your vows, for Ver-Vert's grown
 Unworthy of your lavish loves;
 Ver-Vert no longer will be known
 By heart as spotless as the dove's,
 By temper softer than the down,
 By fervency of soul in prayer;
 Oh! must the muse the truth declare?
 A very wretched profligate,
 A scoffer of his ancient home,
 Blasphemer of your holy state,
 And loose apostate he's become;
 What you such care and labour cost,
 Among the winds and waves is lost.
 Then, fair ones, fondly boast no more
 His science and his docile soul,
 Genius is vain, and learning's store,
 If virtue governs not the whole.
 Forget him quite; the shameful wretch
 His heart has tainted with pollution,
 And given up all those powers of speech
 And mighty parts to prostitution.

But now to Nants, the boat's last station,
 Our hero and his friends draw nigh,
 Where through impatient expectation
 The holy sisters almost die:
 For their desires the rising sun
 Begins his daily course too late;
 Too slow his fiery couriers run,
 To gain at eve the western gate.
 The flatterer hope, in this suspense,
 For ever artful to deceive,
 Promis'd a prodigy to give
 Of genius, dignity, and sense;
 A parrot highly-born and bred,
 Possess'd of noble sentiments,
 Persuasive tongue, discerning head;
 In short, with all accomplishments:
 But O! I mention it with pain,
 These expectations all were vain!

At length the vessel reaches land,
 Where an old solemn sister sat,
 Commission'd by the sacred band
 Th' arrival of the bird to wait;
 Who, on that errand daily sent,
 E'er since the first epistle went,
 At first approach of rising day
 Her wandering eyes impatient cast,
 Which seem'd, along the watery waste,
 To waft our hero on his way.
 The fly bird had no sooner seen
 The nun, near whom he disembark'd,
 But strait he knew her by the mien
 And eyes with holy prudery mark'd,
 By the white gloves and languid tone,
 The vail, and linsley-woolsey vest,
 And, what would have suffic'd alone,
 The little cross upon her breast.
 He shudder'd at th' approaching evil,
 And soldier-like, we may conclude,
 Sincerely wish'd her at the devil;

Preferring much the brotherhood
 Of the dragoons, who spoke out plain,
 Whose dialect he understood,
 Than to return to learn again
 Prayers stuff'd with many a holy notion,
 And ceremonials of devotion:
 But the vex'd droll, by force, was fated
 To be conducted where he hated.
 The careful carrier held her prize
 In spite of all his rueful cries;
 Though much he bit her, by the way,
 Upon her arms, her neck, and face,
 And in his anger, as they say,
 Would not have scrupled any place.
 At last, howe'er, with much ado,
 She brought him safe to sacred ground;
 Ver-Vert's announc'd: the rumour flew
 Swift as the wind the convent round.
 The bell proclaims the welcome morn:
 Strait from the choir each sister springs,
 And to the common parlour's borne
 On expectation's eager wings.
 All crowd this wonder to behold
 With longings truly female fir'd;
 Nay ev'n the feeble and the old
 With youth's warm thoughts are reinspir'd;
 Whilst each, regardless of her years,
 For speed forgets the load she bears;
 And mother Agnes, near fourscore,
 Now runs, who never ran before

CANTO IV.

At length expos'd to public view,
 His figure was by all admir'd;
 Charm'd with a sight so fair and new,
 Their eager eyes were never tir'd:
 Their taste beyond dispute was true;
 For though the rogue had swerv'd from duty,
 He had not lost one jot of beauty,
 And the camp mien and rakish stare
 Improv'd it with an easy air.
 Why, heaven, should charms attractive glow,
 Brilliant around a son of sin?
 Rather deformity should show
 The badness of the heart within.
 To praise his looks and lovely feather
 Our sisters babbled so together,
 Unheard, it would have been no wonder,
 If Heaven had roll'd its loudest thunder:
 Meanwhile unmov'd th' apostate bird
 Deign'd not to speak one pious word,
 But like a lusty Carmelite,
 Roll'd his lascivious eyes about.
 This gave offence: so lewd a sight
 Was shocking to the band devout.
 Next, when the mother abbess came,
 With an authoritative look,
 The feather'd libertine to blame,
 Contemptuously his tail he shook;
 And, not maturely having weigh'd
 The horror of the words he said,
 Replied, in military phrase,
 "What damu'd fools nuns are now-a-days!"
 Our history notes, that on the way,
 These words he'd heard the sailors say.

At this, with looks demure, another
The holy sisterhood among,
(Willing to make him hold his tongue)
Cry'd, "Fie! for shame my dearest brother!
For thanks this dearest brother swore,
And us'd sagaciously enough,
One syllable that rhymes to more,
"Gainst which few female ears are proof.
"Jesu! good mother, she exclaim'd,
"This is some wicked witch, 'tis clear;
"And not the bird of Nevers fam'd,
"To friends of our religion dear!"
Here, sutler-like, he cry'd aloud
"The devil seize this noisy crowd!
By turns each sister did essay
To curb the feather'd grenadier;
And each as fast was sent away
With something buzzing in her ear;
For, laughing at the younger tribe,
He mimick'd their loquacious rage;
And, still more freely to describe
The dull grimace of scolding age,
He ridicul'd the dying closes
Of precepts snuffled through their noses.
But, what was worse than all the rest,
By these dull sermons much oppress'd,
And with unvented choler swelling,
He thunder'd out each horrid word,
The very tars in noise excelling,
Which on the river he had heard;
Cursing and swearing all along,
Invoking every pow'r of hell,
Whilst B's redundant from his tongue,
And F's emphatically fell.
The sense of what they heard him speak
The younger sisters could not tell;
For they believ'd his language Greek.
Next he came out with, blood! and zounds!
Damnation,—brimstone,—fire,—and thunder!
The grate, at these terrific sounds
Trembling, is almost split asunder;
And the good nuns in speechless fright,
Crossing their throbbing bosoms, fly
Each to her cell remote from light,
Thinking the day of judgment nigh.
Wide opening her sepulchral jaws,
One ancient sister whines, "What evil
"Have we design'd, good Heaven, that draws
"Upon us this incarnate devil?
"By what incentive is he mov'd
"So like the damn'd below to swear?
"Is this that Ver-Vert so approv'd?
"Are these his faculties so rare?
"But let us without farther pain
"Send back the profligate again."
"Mother of God!" another cries,
"What horrors are before our eyes!
"In Never's consecrated dome
"Is this the language vestals speak?
"Is all their youth taught thus at home?
"Home with the hateful heretic!
"For, if he enters, we shall dwell
"In league with all the fiends of hell."
In fine, his freedom Ver-Vert lost;
And 'twas resolv'd, without delay,
To send the wretch cag'd-up away.

This end our pilgrim wish'd the most;
Howe'er, in form, he's cited first,
Arraign'd, detestable declar'd,
Convicted by the court, accurs'd,
And from each charity debarr'd,
For having wickedly assail'd
The virtue of the sisters veil'd.
All sign the sentence, yet bemoan
The object it's inflicted on;
For pity 'tis, ere full age blooms,
To find depravity so foul,
Or that, beneath such beauteous plumes,
A debauchee's corrupted soul,
The Pagan manners of a Turk,
And tongue of Infidel, should lurk.
In short, his old conductress bore
The banish'd culprit to the port;
But in returning, as before,
He never bit our sister for't;
For joyfully he left the shore,
And in a tilt-boat home return'd,
Where Nevers' nuns his absence mourn'd.
Such was the Iliad of his woes!
But ah! what unexpected mourning,
What clamour and despair arose,
When, to his former friends returning,
He shock'd them with a repetition
Of his late verbal acquisition!
What could th' afflicted sisters do?
With eyes in tears, and hearts in trouble,
Nine venerable nuns, for woe
Each in a vail funereal double,
Into the seat of judgment go,
Who, in their wrinkled fronts, resembled
Nine ages in a court assembled.
There, without hopes of happy ending,
Depriv'd of all to plead his cause
On whom there was the least depending,
Poor Ver-Vert sat, unskill'd in laws,
Chain'd to his cage, in open court,
And stript of glory and support.
To condemnation they proceed;
Two Sibyls sentence him to bleed;
'Twas voted by two sisters more;
Not so religiously inhuman,
To send him to that Indian shore,
Unknown to any Christian woman,
That conscience might his bosom gore,
And yield him up a prey to death,
Where first, with Brachmen, he drew breath,
But the five others all according
In lesser punishments awarding,
For penance, two long months conclude
That he should pass in abstinence,
Three more in dismal solitude,
And four in speechless penitence;
During which season they preclude
Biscuits and fruits, the toilette's treasures:
Alcoves and walks, those convent pleasures,
Nor was this all; for, to complete
His miserable situation,
They gave him, in his sad retreat,
For jailer, guard, and conversation,
A stale lay-sister, or much rather
An old vail'd ape, all skin and bone,
Or, cover'd o'er with wrinkled leather,

A walking female skeleton;
 An object proper, to fall'n glory,
 To cry aloud, memento mori.
 Spite of this dragon's watchful soul,
 The younger nuns would often go,
 With looks of pity to condole;
 Which ev'n in exile soften'd woe.
 Nay some, from morning prayers returning,
 With nuts and candied almonds came;
 But to a wretch in prison mourning
 Weeds and ambrosia were the same.
 Taught by misfortune's sound tuition,
 Cloth'd with disgrace, and stung with pain,
 Or sick of that old scare-crow vision,
 The bird became in pure contrition
 Acquainted with himself again:
 Forgetting his belov'd dragoons,
 And quite according with the nuns
 In one continued unison
 Of air, of manners, and of tone;
 No sleek prebendal priest could be
 More thoroughly devout than he.
 When this conversion was related,
 The gray divan at once awarded
 His banishment should be abated,
 And farther vengeance quite discarded.
 There the blest day of his recal
 Is annually a festival,
 Whose silken moments white and even,
 Spun by the hands of smiling love,
 Whilst all th' attendant fates approve,
 To soft delights are ever given.

How short's the date of human pleasure!
 How false of happiness the measure!
 The dormitory, strew'd with flowers,
 Short prayer, rejoicing, song, and feast,
 Sweet tumult, freedom, thoughtless hours,
 Their amiable zeal express'd,
 And not a single sign of sorrow
 The woes predicted of to-morrow.
 But, O! what favours misapplied
 Our holy sisterhood bestow'd!
 From abstinence's shallow tide
 Into a stream that overflow'd
 With sweets, so long debarr'd from tasting,
 Poor Ver-Vert too abruptly hasting,
 (His skin with sugar being waded,
 With liquid fires his entrails burn'd)
 Beheld at once his roses faded
 And to funereal cypress turn'd.
 The nuns endeavour'd, but in vain,
 His fleeting spirit to detain;
 But sweet excess had hasten'd fate;
 And, whilst around the fair-ones cry'd,
 Of love a victim fortunate
 In pleasure's downy breast he died.
 His dying words their bosoms fir'd,
 And will for ever be admir'd.

VOL. X.

Venus herself his eye-lids clos'd,
 And in Elysium plac'd his shade,
 Where hero-parrots safe repos'd
 In almond groves that never fade,
 Near him, whose fate and fluent tongue,
 Corinna's lover wept and sung.

What tongue sufficiently can tell
 How much bemoan'd our hero fell!
 The nun, whose office 'twas, invited
 The bearers to th' illustrious dead;
 And letters circular indited,
 In which this mournful tale I read.
 But, to transmit his image down
 To generations yet unknown,
 A painter, who each beauty knew,
 His portraiture from nature drew;
 And many a hand, guided by love,
 O'er the stretch'd sampler's canvas plain,
 In broidery's various colours strove
 To raise his form to life again;
 Whilst grief, t' assist each artist, came
 And painted tears around the frame.
 All rites funereal they bestow'd,
 Which erst to birds of high renown
 The band of Helicon allow'd,
 When from the body life was flown,
 Beneath a verdant myrtle's shade,
 Which o'er the mausoleum spread,
 A small sarcophagus was laid,
 To keep the ashes of the dead.
 On porphyry grav'd in characters
 Of gold, with sculptur'd garlands grac'd,
 These lines, exciting pity's tears,
 Our convent Artemisias plac'd.

"Ye novice nuns, who to this grove repair,
 "To chat by stealth, unaw'd by age's frown;
 "Your tongues one moment, if you can, for-
 "bear,
 "Till the sad tale of our affliction's known.
 "If 'tis too much that organ to restrain,
 "Use it to speak what anguish death im-
 "parts:
 "One line this cause for sorrow will explain;
 "Here VER-VERT lies; and here lie all our "hearts."

'Tis said however (to pursue
 My story but a word or two)
 The soul of Ver-Vert is not pent
 Within th' aforesaid monument,
 But, by permission of the fates,
 Some holy sister animates;
 And will, in transmigration, run
 From time to time, from nun to nun,
 Transmitting to all ages hence
 In them his deathless eloquence.

Adieu, sweet bard! to each fine feelings true,
Thy virtues many, and thy foibles few;
Those form'd to charm ev'n vicious minds—and these
With harmless mirth the social soul to please.
Another's woe thy heart could always melt;
None gave more free—for none more deeply felt.
Sweet bard, adieu! thy own harmonious lays
Have sculptur'd out thy monument of praise:
Yes, these survive to time's remotest day;
While drops the bust, and boastful tombs decay.
Reader, if number'd in the muse's train,
Go, tune the lyre, and imitate his strain:
But, if no poet thou, reverse the plan;
Depart in peace, and imitate the man.

Adieu, sweet land! to each last fondling eye
The vernal sun, and the last smile
Thou part'st to cheer ev' a widow's sigh—
Woe cannot melt the fondling's love
Another's woe thy heart could never feel

THE LIFE OF GOLDSMITH.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH was the third son of the Rev. Charles Goldsmith, and was born at Elphin, in the county of Roscommon, (according to his epitaph in Westminster-Abbey, at Pallas, in the county of Longford) in Ireland, in 1729. He was instructed in classical learning at the school of Mr. Hughes, from whence he was removed to Trinity-College, Dublin, where he was admitted an usher the 11th of June 1744. At the University, he exhibited no specimen of that genius which distinguished him in his maturer years. On the 27th of February 1749, O. S. two years after the regular time, he obtained the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Intending to devote himself to the study of physic, he left Dublin, and proceeded to Edinburgh, in 1751, where he continued till the beginning of the 1754, when, having imprudently engaged to pay a considerable sum of money for a fellow-student, he was obliged precipitately to quit the place. He made his escape as far as Sunderland; but there was overtaken by the emissaries of the law, and arrested. From this situation, he was released by the friendship of Mr. Laughlin Maclane and Dr. Sleight, who were then in the College. On his being set at liberty, he took his passage on board a Dutch ship for Rotterdam; from whence, after a short stay, he proceeded to Brussels. He then visited great part of Flanders; and, after passing some time at Strasbourg and Louvain, where he obtained the degree of Bachelor in Physic, he accompanied an English gentleman to Geneva.

This tour was made for the most part on foot. He had left England with little money, and being of a thoughtless disposition, and at that time possessing a body capable of sustaining any fatigue, he proceeded resolutely in gratifying his curiosity, by the sight of different countries.

He had some knowledge of the French language and of music; he played tolerably well on the German flute, which now at times became the means of his subsistence. His learning procured him an hospitable reception at most of the religious houses that he visited, and his music made him welcome to the peasants of Flanders and Germany.

"Whenever I approached a peasant's house towards night-fall," he used to say, "I played one of my merriest tunes, and that generally procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day; but in truth (his constant expression), I must own, whenever I attempted to entertain persons of a higher rank, they always thought my performance odious, and never made me any return for my endeavours to please them."

On his arrival at Geneva, he was recommended as a proper person for a travelling tutor to a young gentleman, who had been unexpectedly left a considerable fortune by the death of his uncle.

This connection lasted but a short time; they disagreed in the south of France, and parted. Friendless and destitute, he was again left exposed to all the miseries of indigence in a foreign country. He, however, bore them with great fortitude; and having by this time satisfied his curiosity abroad, he bent his course towards England, and arrived at Dover, the beginning of the year 1758.

On his return he found himself so poor, that it was with difficulty he was enabled to reach London with a few halfpence only in his pocket. He was an entire stranger, and without any recommendation. He offered himself to several apothecaries, in the character of a journeyman, but had the mortification to find every application without success.

At length he was admitted into the house of a chemist near Fish-Street-Hill, and was employed in his laboratory, until he discovered the residence of his friend Dr. Sleigh, who patronised and supported him.

"It was Sunday," said Goldsmith, "when I paid him a visit, and it is to be supposed, in my best clothes. Sleigh scarcely knew me.—Such is the tax the unfortunate pay to poverty. However, when he did recollect me, I found his heart as warm as ever; and he shared his purse and his friendship with me, during his continuance in London."

Dr. Sleigh afterwards settled as a physician at Cork, his native city, and was rising rapidly into eminence, when he was cut off, in the flower of his age, by an inflammatory fever, which at once deprived the world of a fine scholar, a skilful physician, and an honest man.

By the recommendation of the chemist, who saw in Goldsmith talents above his condition, he soon after became an assistant to Dr. Milner, who kept an academy at Peckham. He remained not long in this situation; but being introduced to some booksellers, he returned to London, took a lodging in Green-Arbour-Court, near the Old Bailey, and commenced author.

Mr. Griffiths, the proprietor of the "Monthly Review," gave him a department in his Journal, and Mr. Newbery, the philanthropic bookseller in St. Paul's Church-Yard, gave him a department in the "Public Ledger," where he wrote those periodical papers, called Chinese Letters, which now appear in his works, under the title of the Citizen of the World.

His first works were The Bee, a weekly pamphlet, and An Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, published before the close of the year 1759.

Soon after his acquaintance with Mr. Newbery, for whom he held the "pen of a ready writer," he removed to lodgings in Wine-Office-Court, Fleetstreet, where he finished the Vicar of Wakefield, which by the friendly interference of Dr. Johnson, was sold for sixty pounds, to discharge his rent. "A sufficient price when it was sold," as he informed Mr. Boswell; for then the fame of Goldsmith had not been elevated, as it afterwards was by his Traveller; and the bookseller had so faint hopes of profit by his bargain, that he kept the manuscript by him a long time, and did not publish it till after The Traveller had appeared. Then to be sure, it was accidentally worth more money."

In 1765, he published The Traveller; or, a Prospect of Society, 4to, of which Dr. Johnson said, "There has not been so fine a poem since Pope's time." Part of his poem, as he says in his dedication to his brother, the Rev. Henry Goldsmith, was formerly written to him from Switzerland, and contained about two hundred lines. The manuscript lay by him some years without any determined idea of publishing, till persuaded to it by Dr. Johnson, who gave him some general hints towards enlarging it; and in particular, as Mr. Boswell informs us, furnished line 240, and the concluding ten lines, except the last couplet but one.

To stop too fearful, and too faint to go.

The lifted ax, the agonizing wheel,
Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel.

Luke, in the last line, is mentioned by mistake for George. In the Respublica Hungarica, there is an account of a desperate rebellion in 1514, headed by two brothers of the name of Zeck, George and Luke. When it was quelled, George, not Luke was punished, by his head being encircled with a red hot iron, corona candescens ferrea coronatur.

This poem established his reputation among the booksellers, and introduced him to the acquaintance of several men of rank and abilities, Lord Nugent, Mr. Burke, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Nugent, Topham Beauclerc, Mr. Dyer, &c. who took pleasure in his conversation, and by turns laughed at his blunders, and admired the simplicity of the man, and the elegance of his poetical talents.

The same year he published a collection of Essays, which had been printed in the newspapers, magazines, and other periodical publications.

He now made his appearance in a professional manner, in a scarlet great coat, buttoned close under the chin, a physical wig and cane, as was the fashion of the times, and declined visiting many of those public places, which formerly were so convenient to him in point of expence, and which contributed so much to his amusement. "In truth," said he, "one sacrifices something for the sake of good company; for here I am shut out of several places where I used to play the fool very agreeably."

In 1766, the Vicar of Wakefield appeared, and completely established his literary reputation.

Soon after the publication of The Traveller, he removed from Wine-Office-Court to the Library Staircase, Inner-Temple, and at the same time took a country house, in conjunction with Mr. Bot, an intimate literary friend, on the Edgware Road, at the back of Cannons. This place he jocularly called the Shoemaker's Paradise, being originally built, in a fantastic taste, by one of the craft.

Here he wrote his History of England, in a series of letters from a nobleman to his son, 2 vols. 12mo, a work generally attributed to Lyttleton, and, which is rather singular, never contradicted either directly or indirectly by that nobleman or any of his friends. This book had a very rapid sale, and continues to be esteemed one of the most useful introductions of that sort to the study of our history.

His manner of compiling this history is thus described by an intelligent writer, who lived in the closest habits of intimacy with him for the last ten years of his life, in the "European Magazine for 1793."

"He first read in a morning from Hume, Rapin, and sometimes Kennet, as much as he designed for one letter, marking down the passages referred to on a sheet of paper, with remarks. He then rode or walked out with a friend or two, who he had constantly with him, returned to dinner, spent the day generally convivially, without much drinking (which he never was in the habit of); and when he went up to bed, took up his books and papers with him, where he generally wrote the chapter, or the best part of it, before he went to rest. This latter exercise cost him very little trouble, he said; for, having all his materials ready for him, he wrote it with as much facility as a common letter."

"Of all his compilations," he used to say, his "Selection of English Poetry," showed more 'the art of profession.' Here he did nothing but mark the particular passages with a red lead pencil, and for this he got two hundred pounds; but then he used to add, "a man shows his judgment in these selections, and he may be often twenty years of his life in cultivating that judgment."

In 1768, he brought on the stage at Covent Garden his Good-natured Man, a comedy; which, though evidently written by a scholar and a man of observation, did not please equal to its merits. Many parts of it exhibit the strongest indications of his comic talents. There is, perhaps, no character on the stage more happily imagined and more highly finished than Croaker's. His reading of the incendiary letter in the fourth act, was received with a roar of approbation. Goldsmith himself was so charmed with the performance of Shuter in that character, that he thanked him before all the performers, telling him, "he had exceeded his own idea of the character, and that the fine comic richness of his colouring made it almost appear as new to him as to any other person in the house." The prologue was furnished by Dr. Johnson.

The unjustifiable severity with which this play was treated by the town, irritated his feelings much, and what added to the irritation, was the very great success of Kelly's "Falſe Delicacy," which appeared at the other house, just at the same time.

Such was the taste of the town for sentimental writing, in which this comedy abounds, that it was played every night to crowded audiences; ten thousand copies of the play were sold that season, and the booksellers concerned in the profits of it, not only presented Kelly with a piece of plate, value 20 l., but gave him a public breakfast at the Chapter coffeehouse.

The success of "Falſe Delicacy" dissolved the intimacy between Kelly and Goldsmith; who, though the type of his own Good-natured Man, in every other respect, yet in point of authorship, and particularly in poetry,

Could bear no rival near his throne.

Had Kelly been content to keep in the back ground, Goldsmith would have shared his last guinea with him, and in doing it would have felt all the fine influences of his good-nature; but to contend for the bow of Ulysses, "this was a fault; that way envy lay."

Goldsmith cannot be acquitted of all manner of blame in his enmity to Kelly, who was a very deserving man, and, by the publication of his "Thespis," "Babbler," some novels, and "False Delicacy," had raised himself much into public notice; and what justly increased it, was the consideration of his doing all this from an humble beginning, and a very narrow education. He had a growing family too, which he supported with decency and reputation.

Though the fame of his Good-natured Man did not bear him triumphantly through; yet, by the profits of his nine nights, and the sale of the copy, he cleared five hundred pounds. With this, and the savings made by his compilations of a Roman History, in 2 vols. 8vo, and a History of England, in 4 vols. 8vo, which he used to call "building a book," he descended from his attic story in the Staircase, Inner-Temple, and purchased chambers in Brooke-Court, Middle-Temple, for which he gave four hundred pounds. There he furnished rather in an elegant manner, fitted up and enlarged his library, and commenced quite a man of "lettered ease" and consequence.

About this time he was concerned in a fortnightly publication, called The Gentleman's Journal, in conjunction with Dr. Kenrick, Bickerstaff, &c. which was soon discontinued. When a friend was observing what an extraordinary sudden death it had, "Not at all, Sir," says Goldsmith, "a very common case, it died of too many doctors."

His next original publication was The Deserted Village, which came out in the spring of 1770, and had a very rapid sale. He received a hundred pounds for the copy from Mr. Griffin his bookseller, which he returned, under an idea of its being too much; and his way of computation was this: "That it was near five shillings a couplet, which was more than any bookseller could afford, or indeed more than any modern poetry was worth." He, however, lost nothing by his generosity, as the bookseller paid him the hundred pounds, which the rapid sale of the poem soon enabled him to do. He was, by his own confession, four or five years collecting materials in all his country excursions for this poem, and was actually engaged in the construction of it above two years. Dr. Johnson furnished the four last lines.

The year following, he prefixed a Life of Parnell, to a new edition of his "Poems on Several Occasions," by T. Davies, 8vo.; a performance worthy of Parnell's genius and amiable disposition.

His next original work was his comedy of She Stoops to Conquer; or, the Mistakes of a Night, which was acted at Covent Garden, in 1772; and, notwithstanding the opinion of Mr. Colman and some others, that there were parts in it too farcical, it met with great success, and restored the public taste to his good opinion. One of the most ludicrous circumstances it contains, that of the robbery, is borrowed from "Albumazar." The first night of its performance, instead of being at the theatre, he was found sauntering between seven and eight o'clock in St. James's Park; and it was on the remonstrance of a friend, who told him how "useful his presence might be in making some sudden alterations which might be found necessary in the piece," that he was prevailed upon to go to the theatre. He entered the stage-door, just in the middle of the 5th act, when there was a hiss at the improbability of Mrs. Hardcastle supposing herself fifty miles off, though in her own ground, and near her own house. "What's that?" says he, terrified at the sound. "Pshaw, Doctor," says Colman, who was standing by the side of the scene, "don't be fearful of squibs, when we have been sitting almost these two hours upon a barrel of gunpowder." He never forgave Colman this reply to the last hour of his life.

He cleared eight hundred pounds by this comedy; but though this year was very successful to him, by the History of Greece, 2 vols, the Life of Belsham, prefixed to a new edition of the "Patriot King," and other publications; what with his liberality to poor authors, Purdon, Jack Pilkington, Dr. Hissernan, &c. and a ridiculous habit of gaming, he found himself, at the end of it, considerably in debt. This he lamented in secret, but took no effectual means for the cure of it.

This period is farther remarkable for his dismissing the title of Doctor from his address, and calling himself Mr. Goldsmith. Whether he had only then decided never to practise the profession he was bred to, or that he thought Mr. a more familiar manner of launching himself into the fashionable world, which he was then vain enough to affect to be fond of, is not ascertained; this, however, was the fact, that the world would not let him lose his degree, but called him Doctor (though he was only Bachelor of Physic) to the end of his life.

Besides his Histories of England, of Greece, and of Rome, he submitted to the drudgery of compiling An History of the Earth and Animated Nature, 3 vols, 8vo, 1774, which procured for him more money than fame. Just before his death, he had formed a design for executing An Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences; a plan which met with no encouragement.

The poem of Retaliation was his last performance, which he did not live to finish. It was written in answer to certain illiberal attacks, which had been made on his person, writings, and dialect, in a club of literary friends, where wit is said to have sometimes sparkled at the expence of good-nature. When he had gone as far as the character of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he read it in full club, where, though some praised it, and others seemed highly delighted with it, they still thought the publication of it not altogether so proper. He now found that a little sparkling of jeer was not altogether an unnecessary ingredient in the friendship of the world, and though he meant not immediately, at least, to publish Retaliation, he kept it, as he expressed himself to a friend, "as a rod in pickle upon any future occasion;" but this occasion never presented itself: A more awful period was now approaching, "when kings as well as poets cease from their labours."

He had been for some years afflicted with a strangury, which, with the derangement of his worldly affairs, brought on a kind of habitual despondency, in which he used to express "his great indifference about life." At length, in March 1774, being seized with a nervous fever, he, against the advice of his physician, took so large a portion of James's powder, that it was supposed to have contributed to his dissolution, on the 4th of April 1774, after an illness of ten days, in the 45th year of his age. He was buried in the Temple Church-yard, the 9th of the same month. A pompous funeral was intended; but most of his friends sent excuses, and a few coffeehouse acquaintances, rather suddenly collected together, attended his remains to the grave. A monument has since been erected to his memory, in Westminster Abbey, at the expence of the literary club to which he belonged, with the following epitaph, written by Dr. Johnson:

"Of poor dear Dr. Goldsmith," Dr. Johnson writes Mr. Boswell, July 4. 1774, "there is little to be told, more than the papers have made public. He died of a fever, made, I am afraid, more violent by uneasiness of mind. His debts began to be heavy, and all his resources were exhausted. Sir Joshua [Reynolds] is of opinion, that he owed no less than two thousand pounds. Was ever poet so trusted before?"

His Miscellaneous Essays in prose and verse were collected into one volume, 8vo, 1775. His Poetical and Dramatic Works were collected, and printed in 2 vols. 8vo, 1780. An edition of his Miscellaneous Works was printed at Perth, 3 vols, 8vo, 1793. His Traveller and Deserted Village have been frequently reprinted, and with his Retaliation and other pieces, were received into the edition of the "English Poets," 1790.

With some awkward impediments and peculiarities in his address, person, and temper, Goldsmith attained a share of literary eminence and emolument, which, with common prudence, might have protected the remainder of his life from the irritating uncertainties of want. In the course of fourteen years, the produce of his pen is said to have amounted to more than eight thousand pounds. But all this was rendered useless by an improvident liberality, which prevented him from distinguishing properly the objects of his generosity, and an unhappy attachment to gaming, with the arts of which he was very little acquainted. He was so humane in his disposition, that his last guinea was the general boundary of his munificence. He had two or three poor authors always as pensioners, besides several widows and poor housekeepers; and when he had no money to give the latter, he always sent them away with shirts or old clothes, and sometimes with the whole contents of his breakfast-table, saying, with a smile of satisfaction, after they were gone, "Now let me suppose, I have ate a heartier breakfast than usual, and am nothing out of pocket." He was always very ready to do service to his friends and acquaintance, by recommendations, &c.; and as he lived latterly much with the great world, and was much respected, he very often succeeded, and felt his best reward, in the gratification of doing good. Dr. Johnson knew him early, and always spoke as respectfully of his heart as of his talents. Goldsmith, in some respect, conciliated his good opinion, by almost never contradicting him; and Dr. Johnson, in return, laughed at his oddities, which only served as little foils to his talents and moral character.

"His person," says Mr. Boswell, in his "Life of Dr. Johnson," "was short, his countenance coarse and vulgar, his deportment that of a scholar, awkwardly affecting the complete gentleman. No man had the art of displaying with more advantage as a writer, whatever literary acquisitions he made. His mind resembled a fertile but thin soil; there was a quick, but not a strong vegetation of whatever chanced to be thrown upon it. No deep root could be struck. The oak of the forest did not grow there; but the elegant shrubbery, and the fragrant parterre appeared in gay succession. It has been generally circulated and believed, that he was a mere fool in conversation. In allusion to this, Mr. Horace Walpole, who admired his writings, said, he was "an inspired idiot;" and Garrick described him as one

——— for shortness call'd Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, and talk'd like poor Poll.

But in truth this has been greatly exaggerated. He had, no doubt, a more than common share of that hurry of ideas, which we often find in his countrymen, and which sometimes produces a laughable confusion in expressing them. He was very much what the French call un etourdie; and from vanity, and an eager desire of being conspicuous wherever he was, he frequently talked carelessly, without any knowledge of the subject, or even without thought. Those who were in any way distinguished, excited envy in him to so ridiculous an excess, that the instances of it are hardly credible. He, I am told, had no settled system of any sort, so that his conduct must not be too strictly criticised; but his affections were social and generous, and when he had money, he gave it away liberally. His desire of imaginary consequence predominated over his attention to truth."

As a prose writer, Goldsmith must be allowed to have rivalled, and even exceeded Dr. Johnson, and his imitator, Dr. Hawkesworth, the most celebrated professional prose writer of his time. His prose may be regarded as the model of perfection, and the standard of our language; to equal which, the efforts of most would be vain, and to exceed it, every expectation, folly.

"Goldsmith," says Dr. Johnson, "was a man of such variety of powers, and such felicity of performance, that he always seemed to do best what he was doing; a man who had the art of being minute without tediousness, and general without confusion; whose language was copious without exuberance, exact without constraint, and easy without weakness."

Of his prose writings, his Vicar of Wakefield, Essays, History of England, Letters from a Nobleman to his Son, Life of Parnell, and Natural History, have obtained most distinction. His Vicar of Wakefield ranks in the first class of English novels. The language which "angels might have heard, and virgins told," deserves the highest praise. If we do not always admire his knowledge or extensive philosophy, we feel the benevolence of his heart, and are charmed with the purity of its principles. If we do not follow with awful reverence the majesty of his reason, or the dignity of the long-extended period, we at least catch a pleasing sentiment, in a natural and unaffected style.

His Essays, originally written for newspapers, cannot be read without lamenting his fate (the fate of hapless genius!) while some venal and ignorant Procrustes of the house of literature, stood over him to extend or contract his elegance, till it just filled the destined space.

"It is the great excellence of a writer," says Dr. Johnson, "to put into his book as much as it will hold. Goldsmith has done this in his History. Goldsmith tells you shortly all you wish to know. His plain narrative will please again and again. He has the art of compiling, and saying every thing he has to say in a plain manner. He is now writing a Natural History, and will make it as entertaining as a "Persian tale."

His Natural History is a compilation of unequal merit. He has adopted no methodical arrangement worthy of notice; and his descriptions, negligent of those distinguishing peculiarities of structure, which enables us to discover the name and species of each individual, are almost wholly employed upon their more amusing properties and relations. The second, third, and fourth volumes, comprehending the natural history of mankind and of quadrupeds, are chiefly borrowed from Buffon's diffusive writings, from which he has transcribed many errors. The four last volumes, comprehending the history of birds, fishes, insects, &c. are particularly defective, probably because in composing them, he no longer derived any assistance from Buffon, whose volumes on birds he does not appear to have seen. The manner and style in which it is written, are generally pleasing, and the entertainment which it affords, is occasionally increased by the interposition of pertinent speculative reflections.

As a poet, he is characterised by elegance, tenderness, and simplicity. He is of the school of Dryden and Pope, rather than that of Spenser or Milton. In sweetness and harmony, he rivals every writer of verse since the death of Pope. It is to be regretted, that his poetical performances are not more numerous. Though he wrote prose with great facility, he was rather slow in his poetry, not from the tardiness of fancy, but the time he took in pointing the sentiment, and polishing the versification. His manner of writing poetry, it is said, was this: he first sketched a part of his design in prose, in which he threw out his ideas as they occurred to him; he then sat carefully down to versify them, correct them, and add such other ideas as he thought better fitted to the subject. He sometimes would exceed his prose design, by writing several verses impromptu; but these he would take uncommon pains afterwards to revise, lest they should be unconnected with his main design.

His Traveller, Deserted Village, Hermit, and Retaliation, are the chief foundation of his fame. The Traveller is one of those delightful poems, that allure by the beauty of their scenery, a refined elegance of sentiment, and a correspondent happiness of expression. In the address to his brother, to whom the poem is inscribed, it is impossible not to be pleased with the untraveller's heart, and the happy image of the lengthening chain. The simile of the rainbow, is equally just and magnificent; and is one of those real beauties in imagery, which have the power of pleasing universally, by being at once obvious to the mind, and at the same time possessing native dignity enough to secure them from that indifference, with which things frequently contemplated are beheld.

The Traveller sits him down (as he expresses it) on an eminence of the Alps, and from thence takes a view of the several kingdoms that lie around him, not with the contracted eye of a recluse, but with the liberal spirit of a man who rightly considers and embraces the general blessings of Providence.

For me your tributary stores combine,
Creation's tenant, all the world is mine.

He then inquires, whether superior happiness be the lot of any particular country, but concludes, that, though every man thinks most favourably of his own, nature has, in general, observed an equality in the distribution of her bounties. The description of the people of Italy is not less just, than that of their country is picturesque and harmonious: but the moralist may object to the conclusion, as unfavourable to the interests of virtue.

Each nobler aim repress'd by long controul,
Now sinks at last, or feebly mans the soul;
While low delights succeeding fast behind,
In happier meanness occupies the mind.

The beauties of the description of the Swiss are so natural and obvious, that no eye can overlook them. Whether the severity of a Helvetian winter chills the lap of May, when no zephyr soothes the breast of the mountain; whether the hardy Swiss sees his little lot, the lot of all; breaths the keen air, and carols as he goes, drives his ploughshares to the sleep, or drags the struggling savage into day; the whole is beautiful. Whether he sits down the monarch of a shed, and surveys his children's looks, that brighten at the blaze, or entertains the pilgrim, whose tale repays the nightly bed, the whole is still beautiful; but the simile of the babe is something more; there is a grandeur as well as beauty in the application of it.

But having found that the rural life of a Swiss has its evils as well as comforts, he turns to France, and describes a people almost of a different species. He next makes a transition to Holland, and from thence proceeds to Britain. The characteristics of the different nations, are just and ingenious; but the descriptions are neither full nor perfect. He has contented himself with exhibiting them in those points of view in which they are generally beheld; but the lights are much strengthened by the powers of poetic genius.

The Deserted Village, is a performance of distinguished merit. The general idea it inculcates is this, that commerce, by an enormous introduction of wealth, has augmented the number of the rich, who, by exhausting the provision of the poor, reduce them to the necessity of emigration. The poem opens with an apostrophe to its subject, with which the imagination may be pleased, but which will not fully satisfy the judgment. The village diversions are perhaps insisted on with too much prolixity and amplification. But we are recompensed for this generality and redundancy, by the classical and beautiful particularity and conciseness of the context, the dancing pair, the swain mistrustful of his smutted face, the bashful virgin, &c. The paragraph in general has much inaccuracy, especially a disgusting identity of diction; the word bowers occurs twice, the word sweet thrice, and charms and sport, singular or plural, four times. We have also toil remitting, and toil taught to please, succeeding sports, and sports with sweet succession. The paragraph beginning, Ill fares the land, &c. has great merit; the sentiment is noble, and the expression little inferior. The following one asserts what has been repeatedly denied, that there was a time in England, when every rood of ground maintained its man. Wherever there is property, there must of necessity be poverty and riches. The apostrophe to Retirement is beautiful, but fanciful; for him who retires into the country to crown a youth of labour with an age of ease, the mine must be explored, the deep tempted, and

The pale artist ply the sickly trade.

The paragraph beginning, Sweet was the sound, &c. has uncommon merit. The circumstances it describes are obvious in nature, but never in poetry; and they are described with great force and elegance. The particulars are most happily selected; and they bear one uniform consistent character, that of a sober or serene cheerfulness. The Matron gathering water cresses, is a fine picture. When Auburn is described as flourishing, the village preacher is very properly introduced and characterised in a manner which seems almost unexceptionable, both for sentiment and expression. His contentment, hospitality and piety, are pointed out with sufficient particularity, yet without confusion or redundancy. The copse, the torn shrubs, and the garden flower that grows wild, are fine natural strokes. The good man, attended by his venerating parishioners, and with a kind of dignified complacency, even permitting the familiarities of their children, is strongly and distinctly represented. The similes of a bird teaching her young to fly, and the mountain that rises above the storm, are not easily to be paralleled. The last has been much admired; and is indeed a happy illustration, so far as immaterial objects can be illustrated by material.

The schoolmaster, though a secondary character, is described with great force and precision. The description of the village ale-house, is drawn with admirable propriety and force. The fine poetical inventory of the furniture, is fully equalled by the character of the guests, and the details of their amusements. It is not poetical fiction, but historical truth. But though nothing is invented, something is suppressed. The rustic's hour of relaxation is too rarely so innocent; it is too often contaminated with extravagance, anger, and profanity; describing vice and folly, however, will not prevent their existing; and, it is agreeable to forget for a moment, the reality of their existence. The rest of the poem consists of a descant on the misapplication of wealth, luxury, and the variety of artificial pleasures, and the miseries of those, who, for want of employment at home, are driven to settle new colonies abroad. Tumultuous grandeur, and her rattling chariots, glaring torches, &c. are finely contrasted with the distressful situation of a poor prostitute. There is beauty in the simile of the primrose, and pathos in the mention of the unhappy girl laying her head at the door of her betrayer. The detail of the emigration, beginning, Do thine sweet Auburn, &c. is animated, and in general correctly drawn. The paragraph, Good Heaven what sorrow, &c. has many beauties. The heart must be insensible, indeed, which does not feel the force of pathos, in the circumstances of the daughter relinquishing her lover, in order to attend her father; and the mother clasping her thoughtless babes with additional tenderness. Having enumerated the domestic virtues which are leaving the country, with the inhabitants of Auburn, he concludes the poem, with an address to Poetry, in a strain of noble enthusiasm, which would have done honour to any poet of any age.

Of the Hermit, which first appeared in the Vicar of Wakefield, the public has long since judged. It is universally allowed to rank with the most beautiful ballads in our language. A remarkable instance of his imitation of Young occurs in the following lines:

Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long.

Man wants but little, nor that little long.

Night IV.

The poem of Retaliation abounds with wit, free from even the slightest tincture of ill-nature; and the characteristics of all the parties are equally pointed and just. His epitaph on Mr. Burke is remarkable, and proves him intimately acquainted with the character of that celebrated orator and statesman. The description of Mr. Burke's brother is humorous, and, at the time of its composition, was truly characteristic and appropriate. The lines on Cumberland convey much useful satire. After an epitaph on Dr. Douglas, the present Bishop of Salisbury, whom he justly calls, The Scourge of Impostors, the Terror of Quacks, he proceeds to Garrick, who had been particularly severe on Goldsmith; but is said never to have forgiven this repique, which is perhaps the most masterly part of this very agreeable fragment. Garrick retaliated upon him in a fable, intituled Jupiter and Mercury, which is preserved in this collection. His small pieces require no distinct consideration or particular criticism.

"What Goldsmith," says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, "commonly says of himself is very true; he always gets the better when he argues alone, meaning that he is master of a subject in his study, and can write well upon it, but when he comes into company grows confused, and unable to talk. Take him as a poet, his Traveller is a very fine performance; and so is his Deserted Village, were it not sometimes too much the echo of his Traveller. Whether indeed we take him as a poet, as a comic writer, or as an historian, he stands in the first class."

The two following portraits of him (one in verse and the other in prose) were written by an intimate friend immediately after his death, and were both esteemed faithful likenesses:

"Here rests, from the cares of the world, and his pen,
A poet whose like we shall scarce meet again;
Who, though form'd in an age when corruptions ran high,
And folly alone seem'd with folly to vie,
When genius with traffic too commonly train'd,
Recounted her merits by what she had gain'd,
Yet spurn'd at those walks of debasement and pelf,
And in poverty's spite dar'd think for himself.
Thus free'd from those fetters the muses oft bind,
He wrote from the heart to the hearts of mankind;
And such was the prevalent force of his song,
Sex, ages, and parties, he drew in a throng.

The lovers---'twas their's to esteem and commend,
For his Hermit had prov'd him their tutor and friend.

The statesman, his politic passions on fire,
 Acknowledg'd repose from the charms of his lyre.
 The moralist too had a feel for his rhymes,
 For his Essays were curbs on the rage of the times,
 Nay, the critic, all school'd in grammatical sense,
 Who look'd in the glow of description for sense,
 Reform'd as he read, fell a dupe to his art,
 And confess'd by his eyes what he felt at his heart,
 Yet bless'd with original powers like these,
 His principal force was on paper to please;
 Like a fleet-footed hunter, though first in the chase,
 On the road of plain sense he oft slacken'd his pace,
 Whilst dullness and cunning, by whipping and goading,
 Their hard-footed hackneys paraded before him,
 Compounded likewise of such primitive parts,
 That his manners alone would have gain'd him our hearts.
 So simple in truth, so ingenuously kind,
 So ready to feel for the wants of mankind;
 Yet praise but an author of popular quill,
 This flux of philanthropy quickly stood still;
 Transform'd from himself, he grew meanly severe,
 And rail'd at those talents he ought not to fear.
 Such then were his foibles; but though they were such,
 As shadow'd the picture a little too much,
 The style was all graceful, expressive, and grand,
 And the whole the result of a masterly hand."

The following was written impromptu on the evening of his death :

" In an age when genius and learning are too generally sacrificed to the purposes of ambition and avarice, it is the consolation of virtue, as well as of its friends, that they can commemorate the name of Goldsmith as a shining example to the contrary.

" Early compelled (like many of our greatest men) into the service of the muses, he never once permitted his necessities to have the least improper influence on his conduct, but knowing and respecting the honourable line of his profession, he made no farther use of fiction, than to set off the dignity of truth; and in this he succeeded so happily, that his writings stamp him, no less the man of genius, than the universal friend of mankind.

" Such is the short outline of his poetical character, which, perhaps, will be remembered whilst the first-rate poets of this country have any monuments left them. But, alas! his noble and immortal part, the good man, is only consigned to the short-lived memory of those who are left to lament his death.

" Having naturally a powerful bias on his mind to the cause of virtue, he was cheerful and indefatigable in every pursuit of it. Warm in his friendships, gentle in his manners, and in every act of charity and benevolence, "the very milk of human nature." Nay, even his foibles and little weaknesses of temper, may be said rather to simplify than degrade his understanding; for though there may be many instances adduced to prove he was no man of the world, most of those instances would attest the unadulterated purity of his heart.—One who esteemed the kindness and friendship of such a man, as forming a principal part of the happiness of his life, pays this last, sincere, and grateful tribute to his memory."

EXTRACT FROM A POEM WRITTEN BY MR. PRATT,

ON THE DEATH OF EMINENT ENGLISH POETS.

THE TEARS OF GENIUS.

THE village bell tolls out the tone of death,
And through the echoing air, the length'ning
 found,

With dreadful pause, reverberating deep,
Spreads the sad tidings o'er fair Auburn's vale.
There, to enjoy the scenes her bard had prais'd
In all the sweet simplicity of song,
Genius, in pilgrim garb, sequester'd sat,
And herded jocund with the harmless swains :
But when she heard the fate-forboding knell,
With started step, precipitate and swift,
And look pathetic, full of dire presage, [green,
The church-way walk, beside the neighb'ring
Sorrowing she sought ; and there, in black array,
Borne on the shoulders of the swains he lov'd,
She saw the boast of Auburn mov'd along.
Touch'd at the view, her pensive breast she struck,
And to the cypress, which incumbent hangs
With leaning slope, and branch irregular,
O'er the moss'd pillars of the sacred fane, [gloom,
The briar-bound graves shadowing with funeral
Forlorn she hied ; and there the crowding woe
(Swell'd by the parent) press'd on bleeding thought,
Big ran the drops from her maternal eye,
Fast broke the bosom-sorrow from her heart,
And pale distress sat sickly on her cheek,
As thus her plaintive elegy began.

And must my children all expire ?
Shall none be left to strike the lyre ?
Courts death alone a learned prize ?
Falls his shafts only on the wife ?
Can no fit marks on earth be found,
From useless thousands swarming round ?
What crowding cyphers cram the land !
What hosts of victims, at command !
Yet shall th' ingenious drop alone ?
Shall science grace the tyrant's throne ?
Thou murd'rer of the tuneful train !
I charge thee, with my children slain !

Scarce has the sun thrice urg'd his annual tour,
Since half my race have felt thy barbarous pow'r ;

Sore hast thou thinn'd each pleasing art,
And struck a muse with every dart :

Bard after bard obey'd thy slaughtering call,
Till scarce a poet lives to sing a brother's fall.

Then let a widow'd mother pay
The tribute of a parting lay.

Tearful, inscribe the monumental strain,
And speak aloud her feelings and her pain !

And first, farewell to thee, my son, she cried,
Thou pride of Auburn's dale—sweet bard, farewell.

Long for thy sake, the peasants tear shall flow,
And many a virgin-bosom heave with woe,
For thee shall sorrow sadden all the scene,
And every pastime perish on the green ;
The sturdy farmer shall suspend his tale,
The woodman's ballad shall no more regale,
No more shall mirth, each rustic sport inspire,
But every frolic, every feat shall tire.
No more the evening gambol shall delight,
Nor moonshine revels crown the vacant night,
But groups of villagers (each joy forgot)
Shall form a sad assembly round the cot.
Sweet bard, farewell—and farewell Auburn's bliss,
The bashful lover, and the yielded kiss ;
The evening warble Philomela made,
The echoing forest, and the whispering shade,
The winding brook, the bleat of brute content,
And the blithe voice that “ whistled as it went.”
These shall no longer charm the ploughman's care,
But sighs shall fill the pauses of despair.

Goldsmith adieu ! the “ book-learn'd priest” for thee

Shall now in vain possess his festive glee,
The oft-heard jest in vain he shall reveal,
For now, alas ! the jest he cannot feel.
But ruddy damsels o'er thy tomb shall bend,
And conscious weep for their and virtue's friend :
The milk-maid shall reject the shepherd's song,
And cease to carol as she toils along ;
All Auburn shall bewail the fatal day, [away ;
When from her fields their pride was snatch'd
And even the matron of the creddy lake,
In piteous plight, her palsied head shall shake,
While all adown the furrows of her face
Slow shall the lingering tears each other trace.

And Oh, my child ! severer woes remain
To all the houseless and unshelter'd train :
Thy fate shall sadden many an humble guest,
And heap fresh anguish on the beggar's breast.

For dear wert thou to all the sons of pain;
 To all that wander, sorrow, or complain.
 Dear to the learned, to the simple dear,
 For daily blessings mark'd thy virtuous year;
 The rich receiv'd a moral from thy head,
 And from thy heart the stranger found a bed.
 Distress came always smiling from thy door;
 For God had made thee agent to the poor;
 Had form'd thy feelings on the noblest plan,
 To grace at once the poet and the man.

EXTRACT FROM A MONODY,

ON THE DEATH OF DR. OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

DARK as the night, which now in dunest robe,
 Ascends her zenith o'er the silent globe;
 Sad melancholy wakes, a while to tread,
 With solemn step, the mansions of the dead:
 Led by her hand, o'er this yet recent shrine
 I sorrowing bend; and here essay to twine
 The tributary wreath of laureat bloom,
 With artless hands to deck a poet's tomb;
 The tomb where Goldsmith sleeps. Fond hopes, adieu!

No more your airy dreams shall mock my view:
 Here will I learn ambition to controul,
 And each aspiring passion of the soul:
 E'en now, methinks, his well-known voice I hear,
 When late he meditated flight from care,
 When as imagination fondly hied

To scenes of sweet retirement, thus he cried.

"Ye splendid fabrics, palaces, and towers,
 "Where dissipation leads the giddy hours,
 "Where pomp, disease, and knavery, reside,
 "And folly bends the knee to wealthy pride;
 "Where luxury's purveyors learn to rise,
 "And worth, to want a prey, unfriended dies;
 "Where warbling eunuchs glitter in brocade,
 "And hapless poets toil for scanty bread:
 "Farewell! to other scenes I turn my eyes,
 "Embosom'd in the vale where Auburn lies,
 "Deserted Auburn, those now ruin'd glades,
 "Forlorn, yet ever dear and honour'd shades.
 "There, though the Hamlet boasts no smiling
 "train,

"Nor sportful pastime circling on the plain;
 "No needy villains prowl around for prey,
 "No slanderers, no sycophants betray;
 "No gaudy foplings scornfully deride
 "The swain, whose humble pipe is all his pride.
 "There will I fly to seek that soft repose,
 "Which solitude contemplative bestows:
 "Yet oh, fond hope! perchance there still re-
 "mains

"One lingering friend behind, to bless the plains;
 "Some hermit of the dale, enshrin'd in ease,
 "Long lost companion of my youthful days;
 "With whose sweet converse in his social bower,
 "I oft may chide away some vacant hour;
 "To whose pure sympathy I may impart
 "Each latent grief that labours at my heart,
 "Whate'er I felt, and what I saw, relate,
 "The shoals of luxury, the wrecks of state;
 "Those busy scenes, where science wakes in vain,
 "In which I shar'd, ah! ne'er to share again.

"But whence that pang? does nature now rebell?
 "Why falters out my tongue the word farewell?
 "Ye friends! who long have witness'd to my toil,
 "And seen me ploughing in a thankless soil,
 "Whose partial tenderness hush'd every pain,
 "Whose approbation made my bosom vain:
 "'Tis you, to whom my soul divided, hies
 "With fond regret, and half unwilling flies;
 "Sighs forth her parting wishes to the wind,
 "And lingering leaves her better half behind.
 "Can I forget the intercourse I shar'd,
 "What friendship cherish'd, and what zeal en-
 "dear'd?

"Alas! remembrance still must turn to you,
 "And to my latest hour protract the long adieu.
 "Amid the woodlands, wheresoe'er I rove,
 "The plain, or secret covert of the grove,
 "Imagination shall supply her store
 "Of painful bliss, and what she can restore;
 "Shall strew each lonely path with flowrets gay,
 "And, wide as is her boundless empire, stray.
 "On eagle pinions traverse earth and skies,
 "And bid the lost and distant objects rise.
 "Here, where encircled o'er the sloping land
 "Woods rise on woods, shall Aristotle stand;
 "Lyceum round the godlike man rejoice,
 "And bow with reverence to wisdom's voice.
 "There, spreading oaks shall arch the vaulted "dome,

"The champion, there, of liberty and Rome,
 "In attic eloquence shall thunder laws,
 "And uncorrupted senates shout applause.
 "Not more ecstatic visions rapt the soul
 "Of Numa, when to midnight grots he stole—
 "And learnt his lore, from virtue's mouth refin'd,
 "To fetter vice, and harmonize mankind.
 "Now stretch'd at ease beside some fav'rite stream,
 "Of beauty and enchantment will I dream;
 "Elysium, seats of art, and laurels won,
 "The graces three, and * Japhet's fabled son:
 "Whilst Angelo shall wave the mystic rod,
 "And see a new creation wait his nod; [er,
 "Prescribe his bounds to time's remorseless pow-
 "And, to my arms, my absent friends restore,
 "Place me amidst the group, each well-known
 "face,

"The sons of science, lords of human race;
 "And as oblivion sinks at his command,
 "Nature shall rise more finish'd from his hand,
 "Thus some magician fraught with potent skill,
 "Transforms, and moulds each varied mass at
 "will;

"Calls animated forms of wondrous birth,
 "Cadmean offspring, from the teeming earth,
 "Uncears the ponderous tombs, the realms of
 "night,

"And calls their cold inhabitants to light;
 "Or, as he traverses a dreary scene,
 "Bids every sweet of nature there convene,
 "Huge mountains skirted round with wavy woods,
 "The shrub-deckt lawns, and silver sprinkled
 "floods,

"Whilst flowrets spring around the smiling land,
 "And follow on the traces of his wand.

* Prometheus.

" Such prospects, lovely Auburn, then be thine!
 " And what thou canst of bliss impart be mine;
 " Amid thy humble shades, in tranquil ease,
 " Grant me to pass the remnant of my days.
 " Unfetter'd from the toil of wretched gain,
 " My raptur'd muse shall pour her noblest strain,
 " Within her native bowers the notes prolong,
 " And, grateful, meditate her latest song.
 " Thus, as adown the slope of life I bend,
 " And move, resign'd, to meet my latter end,
 " Each worldly wish, each worldly care, repress,
 " A self-approving heart alone possess,
 " Content, to bounteous Heaven I'll leave the " rest."

Thus, spoke the bard: but not one friendly
 power,

With nod assentive crown'd the parting hour;
 No eastern meteor glar'd beneath the sky,
 No dextral omen; nature heav'd a sigh
 Prophetic of the dire impending blow,
 The preface of her loss, and Britain's woe.
 Already portion'd, unrelenting fate
 Had made a pause upon the number'd date;
 Behind, stood death, too horrible for sight,
 In darkness clad, expectant, prun'd for flight;
 Pleas'd at the word, the shapeless monster sped,
 On eager message to the humble shed,
 Where wrapt by soft poetic visions round,
 Sweet slumbering, fancy's darling son he found,
 At his approach the silken pinion'd train
 Affrighted, mount aloft, and quit the brain;
 Which late they fann'd: now other scenes than dales

Of woody pride, succeed, or flow'ry vales:
 As when a sudden tempest veils the sky,
 Before serene, and streaming lightnings fly;
 The prospect shifts, and pitchy volumes roll,
 Along the drear expanse, from pole to pole;
 Terrific horrors all the void invest,
 Whilst the archspectre issues forth confest.
 The bard beholds him beckon to the tomb
 Of yawning night, eternity's dread womb;
 In vain attempts to fly, the impassive air
 Retards his steps, and yields him to despair;
 He feels a gripe that thrills through every vein,
 And panting struggles in the fatal chain.
 Here paus'd the fell-destroyer to survey
 The pride, the boast of man, his destin'd prey,

Prepar'd to strike, he pois'd aloft the dart,
 And plung'd the steel in virtue's bleeding heart;
 Abhorrent, back the springs of life rebound,
 And leave on nature's face a grisly wound,
 A wound enroll'd among Britannia's woes,
 That ages yet to follow, cannot close.

Oh, Goldsmith! how shall sorrow now essay
 To murmur out her flow incondite lay?
 In what sad accents mourn the luckless hour,
 That yielded thee to unrelenting power;
 Thee, the proud boast, of all the tuneful train
 That sweep the lyre, or swell the polish'd strain?
 Much honour'd bard! if my untutor'd verse
 Could pay a tribute, worthy of thy herse,
 With fearless hands I'd build the fane of praise,
 And boldly strew the never fading bays.
 But, ah! with thee my guardian genius fled,
 And pillow'd in thy tomb his silent head:
 Pain'd memory alone behind remains,
 And pensive stalks the solitary plains,
 Rich in her sorrows, honours without art,
 She pays in tears, redundant from the heart.
 And say, what boots it o'er thy hallow'd dust
 To heap the graven pile, or laurell'd bust;
 Since by thy hands already rais'd on high,
 We see a fabric tow'ring to the sky;
 Where hand and hand with time, the sacred lore
 Shall travel on, till nature is no more?

ON THE DEATH OF DR. GOLDSMITH.

BY W. WOTY.

ADIEU, sweet bard! to each fine feeling true,
 Thy virtues many, and thy foibles few;
 Those form'd to charm e'en vicious minds,—and these

With harmless mirth the social soul to please.
 Another's woe thy heart could always melt;
 None gave more free,—for none more deeply felt.
 Sweet bard, adieu! thy own harmonious lays
 Have sculptur'd out thy monument of praise:
 Yes, these survive to time's remotest day;
 While drops the bust, and boastful tombs decay.
 Reader, if number'd in the muse's train,
 Go, tune the lyre, and imitate his strain;
 But, if no poet thou, reverse the plan,
 Depart in peace, and imitate the man.

A PROLOGUE,

Written and spoken by the Poet Laberius, a Roman Knight, whom Cæsar forced upon the Stage.

PRESERVED BY MACROBIUS*.

WHAT! no way left to shun th' inglorious stage,
 And save from infamy my sinking age!

* This translation was first printed in one of Gold-smith's earliest works, "The Present State of Learning in Europe," 12mo. 1759.

VOL. X.

Scarce half alive, oppress'd with many a year,
 What in the name of dotage drives me here?
 A time there was, when glory was my guide,
 Nor force nor fraud could turn my steps aside;
 Unaw'd by power, and unappall'd by fear,
 With honest thrift I held my honour dear:
 But this vile hour disperses all my store,
 And all my hoard of honour is no more;
 For ah! too partial to my life's decline,
 Cæsar persuades, submission must be mine;
 Him I obey, whom Heaven itself obeys,
 Hopeless of pleasing, yet inclin'd to please.

Here then at once I welcome every shame,
And cancel at threescore a life of fame;
No more my titles shall my children tell,
The old buffoon will fit my name as well;
This day beyond its term my fate extends,
For life is ended when our honour ends.

THE DOUBLE TRANSFORMATION.

A TALE.

SECLUDED from domestic strife,
Jack Book-worm led a college life;
A fellowship at twenty-five,
Made him the happiest man alive;
He drank his glass, and crack'd his joke,
And freshmen wonder'd as he spoke.

Such pleasures, unallay'd with care,
Could any accident impair?
Could Cupid's shaft at length transfix
Our swain arriv'd at thirty-six?
O had the archer ne'er come down
To ravage in a country town!
Or Flavia been content to stop
At triumphs in a Fleet-street shop.
O had her eyes forgot to blaze!
Or Jack had wanted eyes to gaze,
O!—But let exclamation cease,
Her presence banish'd all his peace.
So with decorum all things carry'd;
Miss frown'd, and blush'd, and then was—married.

Need we expose to vulgar sight
The raptures of the bridal night?
Need we intrude on hallow'd ground,
Or draw the curtains clos'd around?
Let it suffice, that each had charms;
He clasp'd a goddess in his arms;
And, though she felt his usage rough,
Yet in a man 'twas well enough.

The honey-moon like lightning flew,
The second brought its transports too,
A third, a fourth, were not amiss,
The fifth was friendship mix'd with bliss:
But, when a twelvemonth pass'd away,
Jack found his goddess made of clay;
Found half the charms that deck'd her face
Arose from powder, shreds, or lace;
But still the worst remain'd behind,
That very face had robb'd her mind.

Skill'd in no other arts was she,
But dressing, patching, repartee;
And, just as humour rose or fell,
By turns a flattern or a belle;
'Tis true she dress'd with modern grace,
Half naked at a ball or race;
But when at home, at board or bed,
Five greasy night-caps wrapp'd her head.
Could so much beauty condescend,
To be a dull domestic friend?
Could any curtain lectures bring
To decency so fine a thing?
In short, by night, 'twas fits or fretting;
By day, 'twas gadding or coquetting.
Fond to be seen, she kept a bevy
Of powder'd coxcombs at her levy;

The 'squire and captain took their stations,
And twenty other near relations;
Jack suck'd his pipe, and often broke
A sigh in suffocating smoke;
While all their hours were pass'd between
Insulting repartee or spleen.

Thus as her faults each day were known,
He thinks her features coarser grown;
He fancies every vice she shows,
Or thins her lip, or points her nose:
Whenever rage or envy rise,
How wide her mouth, how wild her eyes!
He knows not how, but so it is,
Her face is grown a knowing phyzz;
And, though her sops are wond'rous civil,
He thinks her ugly as the devil.

Now, to perplex the ravell'd nooze,
As each a different way pursues,
While fullen or loquacious strife
Promised to hold them on for life,
That dire disease, whose ruthless power
Withers the beauty's transient flower:
Lo! the small-pox, whose horrid glare
Levell'd its terrors at the fair;
And, rifling every youthful grace,
Left but the remnant of a face.

The glass, grown hateful to her sight,
Reflected now a perfect fright:
Each former art she vainly tries
To bring back lustre to her eyes.
In vain she tries her paste and creams,
To smooth her skin, or hide its seams;
Her country beaux and city cousins,
Lovers no more, flew off by dozens:
The 'squire himself was seen to yield,
And ev'n the captain quit the field.

Poor madam now condemn'd to hack
The rest of life with anxious Jack,
Perceiving others fairly flown,
Attempted pleasing him alone.
Jack soon was dazzled to behold
Her present face surpass the old;
With modesty her cheeks are dy'd,
Humility displaces pride;
For taudry finery is seen
A person ever neatly clean:
No more presuming on her sway,
She learns good-nature every day;
Serenely gay, and strict in duty,
Jack finds his wife a perfect beauty.

A NEW SIMILE,

IN THE MANNER OF SWIFT.

LONG had I sought in vain to find
A likeness for the scribbling kind;
The modern scribbling kind, who write,
In wit, and sense, and nature's spite:
'Till reading, I forget what day on,
A chapter out of Tooke's Pantheon,
I think I met with something there,
To suit my purpose to a hair;
But let us not proceed too furious,
First please to turn to God Mercurius;
You'll find him pictur'd at full length
In book the second, page the tenth:

The stress of all my proofs on him I lay,
And now proceed we to our simile.

Imprimis, pray observe his hat,
Wings upon either side—mark that.
Well! what is it from thence we gather?
Why these denote a brain of feather.

A brain of feather! very right,
With wit that's flighty, learning light;
Such as to modern bards decreed;
A just comparison.—proceed.

In the next place, his feet peruse,
Wings grow again from both his shoes;
Design'd, no doubt, their part to bear,
And waft his godship through the air;
And here my simile unites,
For in modern poet's flights,
I'm sure it may be justly said,
His feet are useful as his head.

Lastly, vouchsafe t' observe his hand,
Fill'd with a snake-encircled wand;
By classic authors, term'd caduceus,
And highly fam'd for several uses.
To wit—most wond'rously endu'd,
No poppy water half so good;
For let folks only get a touch,
Its soporific virtue's such,
Though ne'er so much awake before,
That quickly they begin to snore.
Add too, what certain writers tell,
With this he drives mens souls to hell.

Now to apply, begin we then;
His wand's a modern author's pen;
The serpents round about it twin'd,
Denote him of the reptile kind;
Denote the rage with which he writes,
His frothy flaver, venom'd bites;
An equal semblance still to keep,
Alike too both conduce to sleep.
This difference only as the God
Drove souls to Tart'rus with his rod,
With his goosequill the scribbling elf,
Instead of other-, damns himself.

And here my simile almost tript,
Yet grant a word by way of postscript.
Moreover, mercy had a failing:
Well! what of that? out with it—stealing;
In which all modern bards agree,
Being each as great a thief as he;
But ev'n this deity's existence
Shall lend my simile assistance.
Our modern bards! why what a pox
Are they but senseless stones and blocks?

A DESCRIPTION OF AN AUTHOR'S BED-CHAMBER.

WHERE the Red Lion staring o'er the way,
Invites each passing stranger that can pay;
Where Ca vert's butt, and Parson's black cham-
paign,
Regale the drabs and bloods of Drury-lane;
There in a lonely room, from bailiffs snug,
The mule found Scroggen stretch'd beneath a rug;
A window patch'd with paper, lent a ray,
That dimly show'd the state in which he lay;

The sanded floor that grits beneath the tread;
The humid wall with paltry pictures spread:
The royal game of goose was there in view,
And the twelve rules the royal martyr drew;
The seasons, fram'd with lifting, found a place,
And brave prince William show'd his lamp-black
face:

The morn was cold, he views with keen desire
The rusty grate unconscious of a fire:
With beer and milk arrears, the frieze was scor'd,
And five crack'd tea-cups dress'd the chimney
board;
A night-cap deck'd his brows instead of bay,
A cap by night—a stocking all the day!

THE HERMIT.

A BALLAD. 1765.

The following letter, addressed to the printer of the St. James's Chronicle, appeared in that paper, in June 1767.

SIR,

As there is nothing I dislike so much as newspaper controversy, particularly upon trifles, permit me to be as concise as possible in informing a correspondent of yours, that I recommended Blainville's Travels, because I thought the book was a good one; and I think so still. I said, I was told by the bookseller that it was then first published; but in that, it seems, I was mis-informed, and my reading was not extensive enough to set me right.

Another correspondent of yours accuses me of having taken a ballad, I published some time ago, from one * by the ingenious Mr. Percy. I do not think there is any great resemblance between the two pieces in question. If there be any, his ballad is taken from mine. I read it to Mr. Percy some years ago; and he (as we both considered these things as trifles at best) told me with his usual good humour, the next time I saw him, that he had taken my plan to form the fragments of Shakspeare into a ballad of his own. He then read me his little Cento, if I may so call it, and I highly approved it. Such petty anecdotes as these are scarce worth printing: and were it not for the busy disposition of some of your correspondents, the public should never have known that he owes me the hint of his ballad, or that I am obliged to his friendship and learning for communications of a much more important nature.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

" Turn, gentle hermit of the dale,
" And guide my lonely way.
" To where yon taper cheers the vale
" With hospitable ray.

" For here forlorn and lost I tread,
" With fainting steps and slow;
" Where wilds, immeasurably spread,
" Seem length'ning as I go."

* The Friar of Orders Gray. " Reliques of Ancient Poetry," Vol. II. p. 243.

" Forbear, my son," the hermit cries,
 " To tempt the dangerous gloom;
 " For yonder faithless phantom flies
 " To lure thee to thy doom.
 " Here to the houseless child of want
 " My door is open still;
 " And though my portion is but scant,
 " I give it with good will.
 " Then turn to-night, and freely share
 " Whate'er my cell bestows;
 " My rushy couch and frugal fare,
 " My blessing and repose.
 " No flocks that range the valley free,
 " To slaughter I condemn:
 " Taught by that power pities me,
 " I learn to pity them:
 " But from the mountain's grassy side
 " A guiltless feast I bring;
 " A scrip with herbs and fruits supply'd,
 " And water from the spring.
 " Then, pilgrim, turn, thy cares forego;
 " All earth-born cares are wrong:
 " Man wants but little here below,
 " Nor wants that little long."
 Soft as the dew from heaven descends,
 His gentle accents fell!
 The modest stranger lowly bends,
 And follows to the cell.
 Far in a wilderness obscure
 The lonely mansion lay;
 A refuge to the neighb'ring poor,
 And strangers led astray.
 No stores beneath its humble thatch
 Requir'd a master's care;
 The wicket op'ning with a latch,
 Receiv'd the harmless pair.
 And now, when busy crowds retire
 To take their evening rest,
 The hermit trimm'd his little fire,
 And cheer'd his pensive guest!
 And spread his vegetable store,
 And gaily prest, and smil'd;
 And, skill'd in legendary lore,
 The lingering hours beguil'd.
 Around in sympathetic mirth
 Its tricks the kitten tries;
 The cricket chirrups in the hearth;
 The crackling faggot flies.
 But nothing could a charm impart
 To sooth a stranger's woe;
 For grief was heavy at his heart,
 And tears began to flow.
 His rising cares the hermit spy'd,
 With answering care oppress'd:
 " And whence, unhappy youth," he cry'd,
 " The sorrows of thy breast?"
 " From better habitations spurn'd,
 " Reluctant dost thou rove:

" Or grieve for friendship unreturn'd,
 " Or unregarded love?
 " Alas! the joys that fortune brings,
 " Are trifling, and decay;
 " And those who prize the paltry things,
 " More trifling still than they.
 " And what is friendship but a name,
 " A charm that lulls to sleep;
 " A shade that follows wealth or fame,
 " And leaves the wretch to weep?
 " And love is still an emptier sound,
 " The modern fair-one's jest:
 " On earth unseen, or only found
 " To warm the turtle's nest.
 " For shame, fond youth, thy sorrows hush,
 " And spurn the sex," he said:
 But while he spoke, a rising blush
 His love-lorn guest betray'd.
 Surpris'd he sees new beauties rise,
 Swift mantling to the view;
 Like colours o'er the morning skies,
 As bright, as transient too.
 The bashful look, the rising breast,
 Alternate spread alarms:
 The lovely stranger stands confest
 A maid in all her charms.
 " And, ah, forgive a stranger rude,
 " A wretch forlorn," she cry'd;
 " Whose feet unhallow'd thus intrude
 " Where heaven and you reside.
 " But let a maid thy pity share,
 " Whom love has taught to stray;
 " Who seeks for rest, but finds despair
 " Companion of her way.
 " My father liv'd beside the Tyne,
 " A wealthy lord was he;
 " And all his wealth was mark'd as mine,
 " He had but only me.
 " To win me from his tender arms,
 " Unnumber'd suitors came;
 " Who prais'd me for imputed charms,
 " And felt, or feign'd a flame.
 " Each hour a mercenary crowd
 " With richest proffers strove:
 " Among the rest young Edwin bow'd,
 " But never talk'd of love.
 " In humble, simplest habit clad,
 " No wealth or power had he;
 " Wisdom and worth were all he had,
 " But these were all to me.
 " The blossom opening to the day,
 " The dew of heaven refin'd,
 " Could nought of purity display,
 " To emulate his mind.
 " The dew, the blossoms of the tree,
 " With charms inconstant shine;
 " Their charms were his, but woe to me,
 " Their constancy was mine.

" For still I try'd each fickle art,
 " Importunate and vain
 " And while his passion touch'd my heart,
 " I triumph'd in his pain.
 " Till quite dejected with my scorn,
 " He left me to my pride;
 " And fought a solitude forlorn
 " In secret, where he dy'd.
 " But mine the sorrow, mine the fault,
 " And well my life shall pay;
 " I'll seek the solitude he sought,
 " And stretch me where he lay.
 " And there forlorn, despairing hid,
 " I'll lay me down and die;
 " 'Twas so for me that Edwin did,
 " And so for him will I."
 " Forbid it, heaven!" the hermit cry'd,
 And clasp'd her to his breast:
 The wondering fair-one turn'd to chide,
 'Twas Edwin's self that prest.
 " Turn, Angelina, ever dear,
 " My charmer, turn to see
 " Thy own, thy long-lost Edwin here,
 " Restor'd to love and thee.
 " Thus let me hold thee to my heart,
 " And ev'ry care resign:
 " And shall we never, never part,
 " My life—my all that's mine.
 " No, never, from this hour to part,
 " We'll live and love so true,
 " The sigh that rends thy constant heart,
 " Shall break thy Edwin's too."

AN ELEGY.

ON THE DEATH OF A MAD DOG.

Good people all, of every sort,
 Give ear unto my song;
 And if you find it wonderful short,
 It cannot hold you long.
 In Islington there was a man,
 Of whom the world might say,
 That still a godly race he ran,
 Whene'er he went to pray.
 A kind and gentle heart he had,
 To comfort friends and foes;
 The naked every day he clad,
 When he put on his clothes.
 And in that town a dog was found,
 As many dogs there be,
 Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
 And curs of low degree.
 This dog and man at first were friends;
 But when a pique began,
 The dog, to gain his private ends,
 Went mad, and bit the man.
 Around from all the neighbouring streets,
 The wondering neighbours ran,

And swore the dog had lost his wits,
 To bite so good a man.

The wound it seem'd both sore and sad
 To every Christian eye;
 And while they swore the dog was mad,
 They swore the man would die.

But soon a wonder came to light,
 That show'd the rogues they ly'd,
 The man recover'd of the bite,
 The dog it was that dy'd.

STANZAS ON WOMAN.

WHEN lovely woman stoops to folly,
 And finds too late that men betray,
 What charms can sooth her melancholy,
 What art can wash her guilt away?

The only art her guilt to cover,
 To hide her shame from every eye,
 To give repentance to her lover,
 And wring his bosom—is, to die.

THE TRAVELLER*;

OR, A PROSPECT OF SOCIETY. 1765.

To the Rev. Henry Goldsmith.

DEAR SIR,

I AM sensible that the friendship between us can acquire no new force from the ceremonies of a dedication; and, perhaps, it demands an excuse thus to prefix your name to my attempts, which you decline giving with your own. But as a part of this poem was formerly written to you from Switzerland, the whole can now, with propriety, be only inscribed to you. It will also throw a light upon many parts of it, when the reader understands, that it is addressed to a man, who, despising fame and fortune, has retired early to happiness and obscurity, with an income of forty pounds a-year.

I now perceive, my dear brother, the wisdom of your humble choice. You have entered upon a sacred office, where the harvest is great, and the labourers are but few; while you have left the field of ambition, where the labourers are many, and the harvest not worth carrying away. But of all kinds of ambition, what from the refinement of the times, from different systems of criticism, and from the divisions of party, that which pursues poetical fame is the wildest.

Poetry makes a principal amusement among unpolished nations; but in a country verging to the extremes of refinement, painting and music come in for a share. As these offer the feeble mind a less laborious entertainment, they at first rival poetry, and at length supplant her; they engross all that favour once shown to her, and, though but younger sisters, seize upon the elder's birthright.

Yet, however this art may be neglected by the powerful, it is still in greater danger from the mistaken efforts of the learned to improve it. What criticisms have we not heard of late in favour of blank verse and Pindaric odes, chorusses, anapests and iambics, alliterative care and happy negligence! Every absurdity has now a champion to defend it; and as he is generally much in the wrong, so he has always much to say; for error is ever talkative.

But there is an enemy to this art still more dangerous, I mean party. Party entirely distorts the judgment, and destroys the taste. When the mind is once infected with this disease, it can only find pleasure in what contributes to increase the distemper. Like the tyger, that seldom desists from pursuing man, after having once preyed upon human flesh, the reader, who has once gratified his appetite with calumny, makes, ever after, the most agreeable feast upon murdered reputation. Such readers generally admire some half-witted thing, who wants to be thought a bold man, having lost the character of a wise one. Him they dignify with the name of poet: his tawdry lampoons are called satires: his turbulence is said to be force, and his frenzy fire.

What reception a poem may find, which has neither abuse, party, nor blank verse to support it, I cannot tell, nor am I solicitous to know. My aims are right. Without espousing the cause of any party, I have attempted to moderate the rage of all. I have endeavoured to show, that there may be equal happiness in states, that are differently governed from our own; that every state has a particular principle of happiness, and that this principle in each may be carried to a mischievous excess. There are few can judge, better than yourself, how far these positions are illustrated in this poem. I am,

Dear Sir,

Your most affectionate brother,

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

REMOTE, unfriended, melancholy, flow,
Or by the lazy Scheld, or wandering Po;
Or onward, where the rude Corinthian boor
Against the houseless stranger shuts the door;
Or where Campania's plain forsaken lies,
A weary waste expanding to the skies;
Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart untravell'd fondly turns to thee:
Still to my brother turns with ceaseless pain,
And drags at each remove a lengthening chain.

Eternal blessings crown my earliest friend,
And round his dwelling guardian saints attend;
Blest be that spot, where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire;
Blest that abode, where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair;
Blest be those feasts with simple plenty crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around

Laugh at the jests or pranks that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale;
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good.

But me, not destin'd such delights to share,
My prime of life in wandering spent and care:
Impell'd, with steps unceasing, to pursue
Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the view;
That, like the circle bounding earth and skies,
Allures from far, yet, as I follow flies;
My fortune leads to traverse realms alone,
And find no spot of all the world my own.

Ev'n now, where Alpine solitudes ascend,
I sit me down a pensive hour to spend;
And, plac'd on high above the storm's career,
Look downward where an hundred realms appear:

Lakes, forests, cities, plains extending wide,
The pomp of kings, the shepherd's humbler pride.

When thus creation's charms around combine,
Amidst the store, should thankless pride repine?
Say, should the philosophic mind disdain
That good which makes each humbler bosom vain?

Let school-taught pride dissemble all it can,
These little things are great to little man;
And wiser he, whose sympathetic mind
Exults in all the good of all mankind.
Ye glittering towns, with wealth and splendour crown'd;

Ye fields, where summer spreads profusion round;
Ye lakes, whose vessels catch the busy gale;
Ye bending swains, that dress the flowery vale;
For me your tributary stores combine:
Creation's heir, the world, the world is mine.

As some lone miser, visiting his store,
Bends at his treasure, counts, recounts it o'er;
Hoards after hoards his rising raptures fill,
Yet still he sighs, for hoards are wanting still:
Thus to my breast alternate passions rise,
Pleas'd with each good that Heav'n to man supplies;

Yet oft a sigh prevails, and sorrows fall,
To see the hoard of human bliss so small;
And oft I wish, amidst the scene, to find
Some spot to real happiness consign'd,
Where my worn soul, each wandering hope at rest

May gather bliss to see my fellows blest.

But where to find that happiest spot below,
Who can direct, when all pretend to know?
The shudd'ring tenant of the frigid zone
Boldly proclaims that happiest spot his own
Extols the treasures of his stormy seas,
And his long nights of revelry and ease;
The naked negro, panting at the line,
Boasts of his golden sands and palmy wine,
Basks in the glare, or stems the tepid wave,
And thanks his gods for all the good they gave.
Such is the patriot's boast, where'er we roam,
His first best country, ever is at home,
And yet, perhaps, if countries we compare,
And estimate the blessings which they share,
Though patriots flatter, still shall wisdom find
An equal portion dealt to all mankind;

As different good, by art or nature given,
To different nations makes their blessings even.

Nature, a mother kind alike to all,
Still grants her bliss at labour's earnest call;
With food as well the peasant is supply'd
On Idra's cliffs as Arno's shelvy side;
And though the rocky crested summits frown,
These rocks, by custom, turn to beds of down.
From art more various are the blessings sent;
Wealth, commerce, honour, liberty, content.
Yet these each other's power so strong contest,
That either seems destructive of the rest.
Where wealth and freedom reign, contentment
fails;

And honour sinks where commerce long prevails.
Hence every state to one lov'd blessing prone,
Conforms and models life to that alone.
Each to the fav'rite happiness attends,
And spurns the plan that aims at other ends;
Till carried to excess in each domain,
This fav'rite good begets peculiar pain.

But let us try these truths with closer eyes,
And trace them through the prospect as it lies:
Here for a while my proper cares resign'd,
Here let me sit in sorrow for mankind;
Like yon neglected shrub at random cast,
That shades the steep, and sighs at every blast.

Far to the right where Appennine ascends,
Bright as the summer, Italy extends;
Its uplands sloping deck the mountain's side,
Woods over woods in gay theatric pride;
While oft some temple's mould'ring tops between
With venerable grandeur mark the scene.

Could nature's bounty satisfy the breast,
The sons of Italy were surely blest.
Whatever fruits in different climes were found,
That proudly rise, or humbly court the ground;
Whatever blooms in torrid tracts appear,
Whose bright succession decks the varied year;
Whatever sweets salute the northern sky
With vernal lives, that blossom but to die;
These here disporting own the kindred soil,
Nor ask luxuriance from the planter's toil;
While sea-born gales their gelid wings expand
To winnow fragrance round the smiling land.

But small the bliss that sense alone bestows,
And sensual bliss is all the nation knows.
In florid beauty groves and fields appear,
Man seems the only growth that dwindles here.
Contrasted faults through all his manners reign:
Though poor, luxurious; though submissive,
vain;

Though grave, yet trifling; zealous, yet untrue;
And even in penance planning sins anew.
All evils here contaminate the mind,
That opulence departed leaves behind;
For wealth was theirs, not far remov'd the date,
When commerce proudly flourish'd through the state;

At her command the palace learn'd to rise,
Again the long-fall'n column sought the skies;
The canvas glow'd beyond ev'n nature warm,
The pregnant quarry teem'd with human form.
Till, more unsteady than the southern gale,
Commerce on other shores display'd her sail;

While nought remain'd of all that riches gave,
But towns unmann'd, and lords without a slave:
And late the nation found with fruitless skill
Its former strength was but plethoric ill.

Yet, still the loss of wealth is here supplied
By arts, the splendid wrecks of former pride;
From these the feeble heart and long-fallen mind
An easy compensation seem to find.
Here may be seen, in bloodless pomp array'd,
There paste-board triumph and the cavalcade;
Processions form'd for piety and love,
A mistress or a saint in every grove.
By sports like these are all their cares beguil'd,
The sports of children satisfy the child;
Each nobler aim, repress'd by long controul,
Now sinks at last, or feebly mans the soul;
While low delights, succeeding fast behind,
In happier meanness occupy the mind:
As in those domes, where Cæsars once bore sway,
Defac'd by time and tott'ring in decay,
There in the ruin, heedless of the dead,
The shelter-seeking peasant builds his shed;
And, wondering man could want the larger pile,
Exults, and owns his cottage with a smile.

My soul turn from them, turn we to survey
Where rougher climes a nobler race display,
Where the bleak Swifts their stormy mansion
tread,

And force a churlish soil for scanty bread;
No product here the barren hills afford,
But man and steel, the soldier and his sword.
No vernal blooms their torpid rocks array,
But winter lingering chills the lap of May;
No zephyr fondly sues the mountain's breast,
But meteors glare, and stormy glooms invest.

Yet still, even here, content can spread a charm,
Redress the clime, and all its rage disarm.
Though poor the peasant's hut, his feasts though small.

He sees his little lot the lot of all;
Sees no contiguous palace rear its head
To shame the meanness of his humble shed;
No costly lord the sumptuous banquet deal
To make him loath his vegetable meal;
But calm, and bred in ignorance and toil,
Each wish contracting, fits him to the soil.
Cheerful at morn, he wakes from short repose,
Breathes the keen air, and carols as he goes;
With patient angle trolls the finny deep,
Or drives his vent'rous ploughshare to the steep;
Or seeks the den where snow-tracks mark the
way,

And drags the struggling savage into day.
At night returning, every labour sped,
He sits him down the monarch of a shed;
Smiles by his cheerful fire, and round surveys
His children's looks, that brighten at the blaze;
While his lov'd partner, boastful of her hoard,
Displays her cleanly platter on the board;
And haply too some pilgrim, thither led,
With many a tale repays the nightly bed.

Thus every good his native wilds impart,
Imprints the patriot passion on his heart;
And even those ills, that round his mansion rise,
Enhance the bliss his scanty fund supplies.

Dear is that shed to which his soul conforms,
And dear that hill which lifts him to the storms;
And as a child, when scaring sounds molest,
Clings close and closer to the mother's breast,
So the loud torrent, and the whirlwind's roar,
But bind him to his native mountains more.

Such are the charms to barren states assign'd;
Their wants but few, their wishes all confin'd.
Yet let them only share the praises due,
If few their wants, their pleasures are but few;
For every want that stimulates the breast,
Becomes a source of pleasure when redrest.
Whence from such lands each pleasing science flies,
That first excites desire, and then supplies;
Unknown to them, when sensual pleasures cloy,
To fill the languid pause with finer joy;
Unknown those powers that raise the soul to flame,
Catch every nerve, and vibrate through the frame.
Their level life is but a mouldering fire,
Unquench'd by want, unfaun'd by strong desire;
Unfit for raptures, or, if raptures cheer
On some high festival of once a year.
In wild excess the vulgar breast takes fire,
Till, buried in debauch, the bliss expire.

But not their joys alone thus coarsely flow:
Their morals, like their pleasures, are but low,
For, as refinement stops, from fire to son
Unalter'd, unimprov'd the manners run;
And love's and friendship's finely pointed dart
Fall blunted from each indurated heart,
Some sterner virtues o'er the mountain's breast
May sit, like falcons cowering on the nest;
But all the gentler morals, such as play
Through life's more cultur'd walks, and charm
the way,

These far dispers'd, on timorous pinions fly,
To sport and flutter in a kinder sky.

To kinder skies, where gentler manners reign,
I turn; and France displays her bright domain.
Gay sprightly land of mirth and social ease,
Pleas'd with thyself, whom all the world can please,
How often have I led thy sportive choir,
With tuneless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire?
Where shading elms along the margin grew,
And freshen'd from the wave the zephyr flew;
And haply, though my harsh touch fault'ring still,
But mock'd all tune, and marr'd the dancer's skill;
Yet would the village praise my wondrous power.
And dance forgetful of the noon-tide hour.
Alike all ages. Dames of ancient days
Have led their children through the mirthful maze,
And the gay grandfire, skill'd in gestic lore,
Has frisk'd beneath the burden of threescore.

So blest a life these thoughtless realms display,
Thus idly busy rolls their world away:
Theirs are those arts that mind to mind endear,
For honour forms the social temper here.
Honour, that praise which real merit gains,
Or even imaginary worth obtains,
Here passes current; paid from hand to hand,
It shifts in splendid traffic round the land:
From courts, to camps, to cottages it strays,
And all are taught an avarice of praise;
They please, are pleas'd, they give to get esteem,
Till, seeming blest, they grow to what they seem.

But while this softer art their bliss supplies,
It gives their follies also room to rise;
For praise too dearly lov'd, or warmly sought,
Enfeebles all internal strength of thought.
And the weak soul, within itself unblest,
Leans for all pleasure on another's breast.
Hence ostentation here, with tawdry art,
Pants for the vulgar praise which fools impart;
Here vanity assumes her pert grimace,
And trims her robe of frize with copper lace;
Here beggar pride defrauds her daily cheer,
To boast one splendid banquet once a year;
The mind still turns where shifting fashion draws,
Nor weighs the solid worth of self-applause.

To men of other minds my fancy flies,
Embosom'd in the deep where Holland lies.
Methinks her patient sons before me stand,
Where the broad ocean leans against the land,
And, sedulous to stop the coming tide,
Lift the tall rampire's artificial pride.
Onward methinks, and diligently flow,
The firm connected bulwark seems to grow;
Spreads its long arms amidst the watery roar,
Scoops out an empire, and usurps the shore.
While the pent ocean rising o'er the pile,
Sees an amphibious world beneath him smile;
The flow canal, the yellow blossom'd vale,
The willow tufted bank, the gliding sail,
The crowded mart, the cultivated plain,
A new creation rescu'd from his reign.

Thus, while around the wave-subjected soil
Impels the native to repeated toil,
Industrious habits in each bosom reign,
And industry begets a love of gain.
Hence all the good from opulence that springs,
With all those ills superfluous treasure brings,
Are here display'd. Their much-lov'd wealth imparts

Convenience, plenty, elegance, and arts;
But view them closer, craft and fraud appear,
Even liberty itself is barter'd here.
At gold's superior charms all freedom flies,
The needy sell it, and the rich man buys;
A land of tyrants, and a den of slaves,
Here wretches seek dishonourable graves,
And calmly bent, to servitude conform,
Dull as their lakes that slumber in the storm,

Heavens! how unlike their Belgic fires of old!
Rough, poor, content, ungovernably bold;
War in each breast, and freedom on each brow;
How much unlike the sons of Britain now!

Fir'd at the sound, my genius spreads her wing,
And flies where Britain courts the western spring;
Where lawns extend that scorn Arcadian pride,
And brighter streams than fam'd Hydaspi's glide,
There all around the gentlest breezes stray
There gentle music melts on every spray;
Creation's mildest charms are there combin'd,
Extremes are only in the master's mind!
Stern o'er each bosom reason holds her state,
With daring aims irregularly great;
Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of human kind pass by;
Intent on high designs, a thoughtful band,
By forms unfashion'd fresh from nature's hand;

Fierce in their native hardiness of soul,
True to imagin'd right above controul,
While even the peasant boasts these rights to scan,
And learns to venerate himself as man.

Thine, freedom, thine the blessings pictur'd here,
Thine are those charms that dazzle and endear ;
Too blest indeed, were such without alloy ;
But foster'd even by freedom ills annoy ;
That independence Britons prize too high,
Keeps man from man, and breaks the social tie ;
The self-dependent lordling stand alone,
All claims that bind and sweeten life unknown ;
Here by the bonds of nature feebly held,
Minds combat minds, repelling and repell'd.
Ferments arise, imprison'd factions roar,
Repress'd ambition struggles round her shore,
Till over-wrought, the general system feels
Its motion stop, or frenzy fire the wheels.

Nor this the worst. As nature's ties decay,
As duty, love, and honour fail to sway,
Fictitious bonds, the bonds of wealth and law,
Still gather strength, and force unwilling awe.
Hence all obedience bows to these alone,
And talent sinks, and merit weeps unknown ;
Till time may come, when, stript of all her
 charms,

The land of scholars, and the nurse of arms,
Where noble stems transmit the patriot flame,
Where kings have toil'd, and poets wrote for fame,
One sink of level avarice shall lie,
And scholars, soldiers, kings, unhonour'd die.

Yet think not, thus when freedom's ills I state,
I mean to flatter kings, or court the great;
Ye powers of truth, that bid my soul aspire,
Far from my bosom drive the low desire;
And thou, fair freedom, taught alike to feel
The rabble's rage, and tyrant's angry steel;
Thou transitory flower, alike undone
By proud contempt, or favour's fostering sun,
Still may thy blooms the changeful clime endure,
I only would repress them to secure;
For just experience tells, in every soil,
That those who think must govern those that toil;
And all that freedom's highest aims can reach,
Is but to lay proportion'd loads on each.
Hence, should one order disproportion'd grow,
Its double weight must ruin all below.

O then how blind to all that truth requires,
Who think it freedom when a pert aspires !
Calm is my soul, nor apt to rise in arms,
Except when fast approaching danger warms :
But when contending chiefs blockade the throne,
Contracting regal power to stretch their own,
When I behold a factious band agree
To call it freedom when themselves are free ;
Each wanton judge new penal statutes draw,
Laws grind the poor, and rich men rule the law ;
The wealth of climes, where savage nations roam,
Pillag'd from slaves to purchase slaves at home ;
Fear, pity, justice, indignation start,
Tear off reserve, and bare my swelling heart ;
Till half a patriot, half a coward grown,
I fly from petty tyrants to the throne.

Yes, brother, curse with me that baleful hour,
When first ambition struck at regal power ;

And thus polluting honour in its source,
Gave wealth to sway the mind with double force,
Have we not seen, round Britain's peopled shore,
Her useful sons exchang'd for useless ore?
Seen all her triumphs but destruction haste,
Like flaming tapers bright'ning as they waste;
Seen opulence, her grandeur to maintain,
Lead stern depopulation in her train,
And over fields where scatter'd hamlets rose,
In barren solitary pomp repose?
Have we not seen at pleasure's lordly call,
The smiling long-frequented village fall?
Beheld the duteous son, the fire decay'd,
The modest matron, and the blushing maid,
Forc'd from their homes, a melancholy train,
To traverse climes beyond the western main;
Where wild Oswego spreads her swamps around,
And Niagara stuns with thund'ring sound?

Even now, perhaps, as there some pilgrim strays
Through tangled forests, and through dangerous
ways;

Where beasts with man divided empire claim,
And the brown Indian marks with murd'rous aim;
There, while above the giddy tempest flies,
And all around distressfull yells arise,
The pensive exile, bending with his woe,
To stop too fearful, and too faint to go,
Casts a long look where England's glories shine,
And bids his bosom sympathize with mine.

Vain, very vain, my weary search to find
That bliss which only centres in the mind :
Why have I stray'd, from pleasure and repose,
To seek a good each government bestows ?
In every government, though terrors reign,
Though tyrant kings, or tyrant laws restrain,
How small of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure.
Still to ourselves in every place consign'd,
Our own felicity we make or find :
With secret course, which no loud storms annoy,
Glides the smooth current of domestic joy.
The lifted ax, the agonizing wheel,
Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel,
To men remote from power but rarely known,
Leave reason, faith, and conscience, all our own.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE.

FIRST PRINTED IN 1769.

To Sir Joshua Reynolds.

DEAR SIR,

I CAN have no expectations in an address of this kind, either to add to your reputation, or to establish my own. You can gain nothing from my admiration, as I am ignorant of that art in which you are said to excel; and I may lose much by the severity of your judgment, as few have a juster taste in poetry than you. Setting interest therefore aside, to which I never paid much attention, I must be indulged at present in following my affections. The only dedication I ever made was to my brother, because I loved him better than most other men. He is since dead. Permit me to inscribe this poem to you.

How far you may be pleased with the versification and mere mechanical parts of this attempt, I do not pretend to inquire; but I know you will object (and indeed several of our best and wisest friends concur in the opinion) that the depopulation it deplures is nowhere to be seen, and the disorders it laments are only to be found in the poet's own imagination. To this I can scarce make any other answer than that I sincerely believe what I have written; that I have taken all possible pains, in my country excursions, for these four or five years past, to be certain of what I allege, and that all my views and inquiries have led me to believe those miseries real which I here attempt to display. But this is not the place to enter into an inquiry whether the country be depopulating or not; the discussion would take up much room, and I should prove myself, at best, an indifferent politician, to tire the reader with a long preface, when I want his unfatigued attention to a long poem.

In regretting the depopulation of the country, I inveigh against the increase of our luxuries; and here also I expect the shout of modern politicians against me. For twenty or thirty years past, it has been the fashion to consider luxury as one of the greatest national advantages, and all the wisdom of antiquity in that particular as erroneous. Still, however, I must remain a professed ancient on that head, and continue to think those luxuries prejudicial to states, by which so many vices are introduced, and so many kingdoms have been undone. Indeed, so much has been poured out of late on the other side of the question, that, merely for the sake of novelty and variety, one would sometimes wish to be in the right. I am,

Dear Sir,
Your sincere friend,
and ardent admirer,
OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

SWEET Auburn! loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheer'd the labouring swain,
Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's ling'ring blooms delay'd.
Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, when every sport could please,
How often have I loiter'd o'er thy green,
Where humble happiness endear'd each scene!
How often have I paus'd on every charm,
The shelter'd cot, the cultivated farm,
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topt the neighb'ring hill,
The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whisp'ring lovers made!
How often have I blest the coming day,
When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
And all the village train, from labour free,
Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree,
While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending as the old survey'd;
And many a gambol frolick'd o'er the ground,
And sleights of art and feats of strength went round.

And still as each repeated pleasure tir'd,
Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspir'd;
The dancing pair that simply fought renown,
By holding out, to tire each other down;
The swain mistrustless of his smutt'd face,
While secret laughter titter'd round the place;
The bashful virgin's side-long looks of love,
The matron's glance that would those looks reprove.

[these,
These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like
With sweet succession, taught ev'n toil to please;
These round thy bowers their cheerful influence shed, [fled.

These were thy charms—But all these charms are Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;
Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green:

One only master grasps the whole domain,
And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain;
No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
But, chok'd with sedges, works its weedy way;
Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
The hollow sounding bittern guards its nest;
Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies,
And tires their echoes with unvar'd cries.
Sunk are thy bowers in shapeless ruin all,
And the long grass o'ertops the mould'ring wall,
And, trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's hand,
Far, far away thy children leave the land.

Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroy'd, can never be supply'd.

A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood of ground maintain'd its man;
For him light labour spread her wholesome store,
Just gave what life requir'd, but gave no more:
His best companions, innocence and health,
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.

But times are alter'd; trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land, and dispossess the swain;
Along the lawn, where scatter'd hamlets rose,
Unwieldy wealth and cumb'rous pomp repose;
And every want to luxury ally'd,
And every pang that folly pays to pride.
Those gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
Those calm desires that ask'd but little room,
Those healthful sports that grac'd the peaceful
scene,

Liv'd in each look, and brighten'd all the green;
These, far departing, seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.

Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour,
Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
Here, as I take my solitary rounds,
Amidst thy tangling walks, and ruin'd grounds,
And, many a year elaps'd, return to view
Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn grew,
Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.

In all my wand'rings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has giv'n my share—

I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose:
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as an hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first he flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return—and die at home at last.

O blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
Retreats from care that never must be mine,
How blest is he who crowns in shades like these,
A youth of labour with an age of ease;
Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!
For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
Explore the mine, or tempt the dang'rous deep;
No surly porter stands in guilty state,
To spurn imploring famine from the gate;
But on he moves to meet his latter end,
Angels around befriending virtue's friend;
Sinks to the grave with unperceiv'd decay,
While resignation gently slopes the way;
And, all his prospects bright'ning to the last,
His heaven commences ere the world be past!

Sweet was the sound, when, oft at ev'ning's close,

Up yonder hill the village murmur rose:
There, as I pass'd with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came soften'd from below;
The swain responsive as the milk-maid sung,
The sober herd that low'd to meet their young,
The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school,
The watch-dog's voice that bay'd the whisp'ring
wind,

And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind;
These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,
And fill'd each pause the nightingale had made.
But now the sounds of population fail,
No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,
No busy steps the grass-grown foot-way tread,
But all the bloomy flush of life is fled.

All but yon widow'd, solitary thing,
That feebly bends beside the plashy spring;
She, wretched matron, forc'd, in age, for bread,
To strip the brook with mantling cresses spread,
To pick her wint'ry faggot from the thorn,
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;
She only left of all the harmless train,

The sad historian of the pensive plain. [smil'd,
Near yonder copse, where once the garden
And still where many a garden flower grows wild;
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose.

A man he was, to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a-year;
Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e'er had chang'd, nor wish'd to change his
place;

Unskilful he to fawn, or seek for power,
By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;

Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize,
More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.
His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wand'rings, but reliev'd their pain;
The long-remember'd beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The ruin'd spendthrift, now no longer proud,
Claim'd kindred there, and had his claims allow'd;
The broken soldier, kindly bid to stay,
Sat by his fire, and talk'd the night away;
Wept o'er his wounds, or, tales of sorrow done,
Shoulder'd his crutch, and show'd how fields were won.

[glow,
Pleas'd with his guests, the good man learn'd to
And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And even his failings lean'd to virtue's side;
But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all.
And, as a bird each fond endearment tries,
To tempt its new-fledg'd offspring to the skies,
He try'd each art, reprov'd each dull delay,
Allur'd to brighter worlds, and led the way,

Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismay'd,
The rev'rend champion stood. At his controul
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,

And his last fault'ring accents whisper'd praise.

At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray.
The service past, around the pious man,
With ready zeal, each honest rustic ran;
Even children follow'd with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile.

His ready smile a parent's warmth express'd,
Their welfare pleas'd him, and their cares distress'd;
To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in heaven.
As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are
Eternal sunshine settles on its head. [spread,

Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way,
With blossom'd furze unprofitably gay
There, in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule,
The village master taught his little school;
A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew;
Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face;
Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper circling round,
Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd;
Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was in fault;
The village all declar'd how much he knew;
'Twas certain he could write, and cypher too;

Lands he could measure, terms and tides presage,
And even the story ran that he could gauge:
In arguing too, the parson own'd his skill,
For even though vanquish'd, he could argue still;
While words of learned length, and thund'ring

found,
Amaz'd the gazing rustics rang'd around,
And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew.

But past is all his fame. The very spot
Where many a time he triumph'd, is forgot.
Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
Where once the sign-post caught the passing eye,
Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts

inspir'd,
Where gray-beard mirth, and smiling toil retir'd,
Where village statesmen talk'd with looks pro-
found,

And news much older than their ale went round.

Imagination fondly stoops to trace
The parlour splendors of that festive place;

The white-wash'd wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnish'd clock that click'd behind the door;

The chest contriv'd a double debt to pay,

A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day;

The pictures plac'd for ornament and use,

The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose;

The hearth, except when winter chill'd the day,

With aspen boughs, and flowers and fennel gay,

While broken tea-cups, wisely kept for show,

Rang'd o'er the chimney, glisten'd in a row.

Vain transitory splendour! could not all

Reprieve the tott'ring mansion from its fall!

Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart

An hour's importance to the poor man's heart;

Thither no more the peasant shall repair,

To sweet oblivion of his daily care;

No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,

No more the wood-man's ballad shall prevail;

No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,

Relax his pond'rous strength, and lean to hear;

The host himself no longer shall be found

Careful to see the mantling blifs go round;

Nor the coy maid, half willing to be prest,

Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest.

Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,

These simple blessings of the lowly train,

To me more dear, congenial to my heart,

One native charm, than all the gloss of art;

Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play,

The soul adopts, and owns their first-born sway:

Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,

Unenvy'd, unmolested, unconfin'd.

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,

With all the freaks of wanton wealth array'd,

In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain,

The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;

And, even while fashion's brightest arts decoy,

The heart distrustful asks, if this be joy?

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who survey

The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,

'Tis yours to judge, how wide the limits stand

Between a splendid and an happy land.

Froud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,

And shouting folly hails them from her shore;

Hoards, even beyond the miser's wish abound,
And rich men flock from all the world around.

Yet count our gains. This wealth is but a name

That leaves our useful product still the same.

Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride,

Takes up a space that many poor supply'd;

Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,

Space for his horses, equipage and bounds;

The robe that wraps his limbs in silken floth,

Has robb'd the neighbouring fields of half their growth;

His seat, where solitary sports are seen,

Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;

Around the world each needful product flies,

For all the luxuries the world supplies.

While thus the land adorn'd for pleasure all

In barren splendour feebly waits the fall.

As some fair female unadorn'd and plain,

Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,

Slights every borrow'd charm that dress supplies,

Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes:

But when those charms are past, for charms are frail,

When time advances, and when lovers fail,

She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,

In all the glaring impotence of dress.

Thus fares the land, by luxury betray'd,

In nature's simplest charms at first array'd,

But verging to decline, its splendours rise,

Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;

While, scourg'd by famine from the smiling land,

The mournful peasant leads his humble band;

And while he sinks, without one arm to save,

The country blooms—a garden, and a grave.

Where then, ah! where shall poverty reside,

To 'scape the pressure of contiguous pride?

If to some common's fenceless limits stray'd,

He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,

Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,

And even the bare-worn common is deny'd.

If to the city sped—What waits him there?

To see profusion that he must not share;

To see ten thousand baneful arts combin'd

To pamper luxury, and thin mankind;

To see each joy the sons of pleasure know,

Extorted from his fellow-creature's woe.

Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade,

There the pale artist plies the sickly trade;

Here, while the proud their long-drawn pomps

display,

There the black gibbet glooms beside the way.

The dome where pleasure holds her midnight

reign,

Here, richly deckt, admits the gorgeous train;

Tumultuous grandeur crowds the blazing square,

The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.

Sure scenes like these no troubles ere annoy!

Sure these denote one universal joy!

Are these thy serious thoughts—Ah, turn thine

eyes

Where the poor houseless shiv'ring female lies.

She once, perhaps, in village plenty blest,

Has wept at tales of innocence distressed;

Her modest looks the cottage might adorn,

Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;

Now lost to all; her friends, her virtue fled,
Near her betrayer's door she lays her head,
And, pinch'd with cold, and shrinking from the shower,

With heavy heart deplores that luckless hour,
When idly first, ambitious of the town,
She left her wheel and robes of country brown.

Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest
Do thy fair tribes participate her pain? [train,
Even now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
At proud mens doors they ask a little bread!

Ah, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
Where half the convex world intrudes between,
Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
Where wild Altama murmurs to their woe.

Far different there from all that charm'd before,
The various terrors of that horrid shore;
Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
And fiercely shed intolerable day;

Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling;
Those pois'nous fields with rank luxuriance
crown'd,

Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;
Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;

Where crouching tigers wait their hapless prey,
And savage men more murd'rous still than they;
While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
Mingling the ravag'd landscape with the skies.

Far different these from every former scene,
The cooling brook, the grassy vested green,
The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
That only shelter'd thefts of harmless love.

Good Heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,
That call'd them from their native walks away;

When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
Hung round the bowers, and fondly look their last,
And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain
For seats like these beyond the western main;

And shudd'ring still to face the distant deep,
Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep.
The good old sire, the first prepar'd to go
To new-found worlds, and wept for other's woe;

But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
He only wish'd for worlds beyond the grave.
His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears,
The fond companion of his helpless years,

Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
And left a lover's for a father's arms.
With louder plaints the mother spoke her woes,
And blest the cot where every pleasure rose;

And kist her thoughtless babes with many a tear,
And claspt them close, in sorrow doubly dear;
Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
In all the silent manliness of grief.

O, luxury! thou curst by Heaven's decree,
How ill exchang'd are things like these for thee!
How do thy potions with insidious joy,
Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!

Kingdoms by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
Boast of a floral vigour not their own.
At every draught more large and large they grow,
A bloated mass of rank unwieldy woe;

Till sapp'd their strength, and every part unsound,
Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.

Even now the devastation is begun,
And half the business of destruction done;
Even now, methinks, as pond'ring here I stand,
I see the rural virtues leave the land.

Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail
That idly waiting flaps with every gale,
Downward they move, a melancholy band,
Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand,

Contented toil, and hospitable care,
And kind connubial tenderness, are there;
And piety with wishes plac'd above,
And steady loyalty, and faithful love.

And thou, sweet poetry, thou loveliest maid,
Still first to fly where sensual joys invade;
Unfit in these degen'rate times of shame,
To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame;

Dear charming nymph, neglected and decry'd,
My shame in crowds, my solitary pride.
Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
That found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so;

Thou guide, by which the nobler arts excel,
Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well,
Farewell, and O! where'er thy voice be try'd,
On Torno's cliffs, or Pambamarca's side,

Whether where equinoctial fervours glow,
Or winter wraps the polar world in snow,
Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
Redress the rigours of th' inclement clime;

Aid slighted truth, with thy persuasive strain;
Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
Teach him, that states of native strength possess,
Though very poor, may still be very blest;

That trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
As ocean sweeps the labour'd mole away;
While self-dependent power can time defy,
As rocks resist the billows and the sky.

THE GIFT TO IRIS:

IN BOW-STREET, COVENT-GARDEN.

SAY, cruel Iris, pretty rake,
Dear mercenary beauty,
What annual off'ring shall I make
Expressive of my duty?

My heart, a victim to thine eyes,
Should I at once deliver,
Say, would the angry fair-one prize
The gift, who flights the giver?

A bill, a jewel, watch, or toy,
My rivals give—and let 'em.
If gems, or gold, import a joy,
I'll give them—when I get 'em.

I'll give—but not the full-blown rose,
Or rose-bud more in fashion;
Such short-liv'd off'rings but disclose
A transitory passion.

I'll give thee something yet unpaid,
Not less sincere, than civil:
I'll give thee—ah! too charming maid,
I'll give thee—to the devil.

EPITAPH ON DR. PARNELL.

THIS tomb inscribed to gentle Parnell's name,
May speak our gratitude, but not his fame.
What heart but feels his sweetly-moral lay,
That leads to truth through pleasure's flowery way?

Celestial themes confess'd his tuneful aid;
And Heaven, that lent him genius, was repaid.
Needless to him the tribute we bestow,
The transitory breath of fame below:
More lasting rapture from his works shall rise,
While converts thank their poet in the skies.

EPILOGUE TO THE COMEDY OF THE SISTERS.

WHAT? five long acts—and all to make us wiser!
Our authoress sure has wanted an adviser.
Had she consulted me, she should have made
Her moral play a speaking masquerade;
Warm'd up each bustling scene, and in her rage
Have emptied all the green-room on the stage.
My life on't, this had kept her play from sinking;
Have pleas'd our eyes, and sav'd the pain of thinking.

Well, since she thus has shown her want of skill,
What if I give a masquerade?—I will.
But how? ay, there's the rub! [pausing—I've got my queue:

The world's a masquerade! the masquers, you
you, you. [To boxes, pit, and gallery.

Lud! what a group the motley scene discloses!
False wits, false wives, false virgins, and false spouses?

Statesmen with bridles on; and, close beside 'em,
Patriots in party-colour'd suits that ride 'em.
There Hebes, turn'd of fifty, try once more
To raise a flame in Cupids of threescore.

These in their turn, with appetites as keen,
Deserting fifty, fasten on fifteen.

Miss, not yet full fifteen, with fire uncommon,
Flings down her sampler, and takes up the woman:
The little urchin smiles, and spreads her lure,
And tries to kill, ere she's got power to cure,
Thus 'tis with all—their chief and constant care
Is to seem every thing—but what they are.

Yon broad, bold, angry spark, I fix my eye on,
Who seems t' have robb'd his vizor from the lion;
Who frowns, and talks, and swears, with round parade,

Looking, as who should say, dam'me! who's afraid? [Mimicking.

Strip but this vizor off, and sure I am
You'll find his lionship a very lamb.

Yon politician, famous in debate,
Perhaps, to vulgar eyes, bestrides the state;
Yet, when he deigns his real shape t' assume,
He turns old woman, and bestrides a broom.

Yon patriot, too, who presses on your sight,
And seems to every gazer all in white,
If with a bribe his candour you attack, [black!

He bows, turns round, and whip—the man is
Yon critic, too—but whither do I run?

If I proceed, our bard will be undone!

Well then a truce, since she requests it too:
Do you spare her, and I'll, for once, spare you.

THE HAUNCH OF VENISON.

A POETICAL EPISTLE TO LORD CLARE. 1765.

THANKS, my lord, for your venison, for finer or fatter

Never rang'd in a forest, or smok'd in a platter;
The haunch was a picture for painters to study,
The fat was so white, and the lean was so ruddy;
Though my stomach was sharp, I could scarce
help regretting

To spoil such a delicate picture by eating;
I had thoughts, in my chambers, to place it in view,
To be shown to my friends as a piece of virtu;
As in some Irish houses, where things are so so,
One gammon of bacon hangs up for a show:
But, for eating a rasher of what they take pride in,
They'd as soon think of eating the pan it is fry'd
in. [nounce,

But hold—let me pause—don't I hear you pro-
This tale of the bacon's a damnable bounce;
Well, suppose it a bounce—sure a poet may try,
By a bounce now and then, to get courage to fly.

But, my lord, it's no bounce: I protest in my turn,

It's a truth—and your lordship may ask Mr. Burn*.
To go on with my tale—as I gaz'd on the haunch,
I thought of a friend that was trusty and staunch,
So I cut it, and sent it to Reynolds undrest,

To paint it, or eat it, just as he lik'd best.
Of the neck and the breast I had next to dispose;
'Twas a neck and a breast that might rival Mon-
roe's:

But in parting with these I was puzzled again,
With the how, and the who, and the where, and the when.

There's H—d, and C—y, and H—rth, and H—ff,
I think they love venison—I know they love beef.
There's my countryman Higgins—Oh! let him alone,

For making a blunder, or picking a bone.
But hang it—to poets who seldom can eat,
Your very good mutton's a very good treat;
Such dainties to them their health it might hurt,
It's like sending them ruffles, when wanting a shirt.

While thus I debated, in reverie center'd,
An acquaintance, a friend as he call'd himself,
enter'd;

An under-bred, fine-spoken fellow was he,
And he smil'd as he look'd at the venison and me.
“What have we got here?—why, this is good eating!

Your own I suppose—or is it in waiting?”
“Why, whose should it be?” cried I with a founce,

“I get these things often; but that was a bounce:
Some lords, my acquaintance, that settle the nation,

Are pleas'd to be kind, but I hate ostentation.”

* Lord Clare's nephew.

"If that be the case then," cried he, very gay,
I'm glad I have taken this house in my way.
To-morrow you take a poor dinner with me;
No words—I insist on't—precisely at three:
We'll have Johnson, and Burke; all the wits will be there;
My acquaintance is slight, or I'd ask my Lord
Clare.

And, now that I think on't, as I am a finner,
We wanted this venison to make out the dinner!
What say you—a pasty, it shall and it must,
And my wife, little Kitty, is famous for crust.
Here, porter—this venison with me to Mile-end;
No stirring, I beg, my dear friend, my dear friend!" [wind,
Thus snatching his hat, he brush'd off like the
And the porter and eatables follow'd behind.

Left alone to reflect, having emptied my shelf,
And "nobody with me at sea but myself*";
Though I could not help thinking my gentleman
hasty,

Yet Johnson, and Burke, and a good venison pasty,
Were things that I never dislik'd in my life, [wife.
Though clogg'd with a coxcomb, and Kitty his
So next day in due splendour to make my approach,
I drove to his door in my own hackney coach.

When come to the place where we all were to dine

(A chair-lumber'd closet just twelve feet by nine),
My friend bade me welcome, but struck me quite dumb, [come;

With tidings that Johnson and Burke would not
"For I knew it," he cried, "both eternally fail,
The one with his speeches, and t' other with Thrale; [ty,

But no matter, I'll warrant we'll make up the par-
With two full as clever, and ten times as hearty.

The one is a Scotsman, the other a Jew,
They both of them merry, and authors like you;
The one writes the Snarler, the other the Scourge;
Some thinks he writes Cinna—he owns to Pa-
nurge." [name,

While thus he described them by trade and by
They enter'd, and dinner was serv'd as they came.

At the top a fried liver, and bacon were seen,
At the bottom was tripe, in a swinging tureen;
At the sides there was spinnage and pudding made hot;

In the middle a place where the pasty—was not.
Now, my lord, as for tripe it's my utter aversion,
And your bacon I hate like a Turk or a Persian,
So there I sat stuck, like a horse in a pound,
While the bacon and liver went merrily round:
But what vex'd me most, was that d—m'd Scottish rogue, [brogue,

With his long-winded speeches, his smiles and his
And, "madam," quoth he, "may this bit be my poison,

A prettier dinner I never set eyes on;
Pray a slice of your liver though may I be curst,
But I've eat of your tripe, till I'm ready to burst."

* See the letters that passed between his Royal Highness Henry Duke of Cumberland, and Lady Grosvenor, 12mo, 1769.

"The tripe," quoth the Jew, "with his chocolate cheek,

I could dine on this tripe seven days in the week:
I like these here dinners so pretty and small; [all."
But your friend there, the doctor, eats nothing at
"O—Oh!" quoth my friend, "he'll come on in a trice,

He's keeping a corner for something that's nice:
There's a pasty"—"A pasty!" repeated the Jew;
I don't care, if I keep a corner for't too." [Scot;
"What the de'il, mon, a pasty!" re-echo'd the Though splitting, I'll still keep a corner for that."

"We'll all keep a corner," the lady cried out;
"We'll all keep a corner," was echo'd about.

While thus we resolv'd, and the pasty delay'd,
With looks that quite petrified, enter'd the maid:
A visage so sad, and so pale with affright,

Wak'd Priam in drawing his curtains by night.
But we quickly found out, for who could mistake
her? [baker:

That she came with some terrible news from the
And so it fell out, for that negligent sloven
Had shut out the pasty on shutting his oven.

Sad Philomel thus—but let similes drop—
And now that I think on't, the story may stop.

To be plain, my good lord, it's but labour mis-
plac'd,

To send such good verses to one of your taste;
You've got an odd something—a kind of discerning—

A relish—a taste—sicken'd over by learning;
At least, it's your temper, as very well known,
That you think very slightly of all that's your own:
So, perhaps, in your habits of thinking amiss,
You may make a mistake, and think slightly of this.

FROM THE ORATORIO OF THE CAP- TIVITY.

SONG.

THE wretch condemn'd with life to part,
Still, still on hope relies;
And ev'ry pang that rends the heart,
Bids expectation rise.

Hope, like the glimm'ring taper's light,
Adorns and cheers the way;
And still, as darker grows the night,
Emits a brighter ray.

SONG.

O MEMORY! thou fond deceiver,
Still importunate and vain,
To former joys recurring ever,
And turning all the past to pain;

Thou, like the world, the oppress'd oppressing,
Thy smiles increase the wretch's woe;
And he who wants each other blessing,
In thee must ever find a foe.

EPITAPH ON EDWARD PURDON *.

HERE lies poor Ned Purdon, from misery freed,
Who long was a bookseller's hack;
He led such a damnable life in this world—
I don't think he'll wish to come back.

AN ELEGY,

ON THE GLORY OF HER SEX, MRS. MARY BLAIZE.

Good people all, with one accord,
Lament for Madam Blaize,
Who never wanted a good word—
From those who spoke her praise.

The needy seldom pass'd her door,
And always found her kind;
She freely lent to all the poor—
Who left a pledge behind.

She strove the neighbourhood to please,
With manners wond'rous winning;
And never follow'd wicked ways,
Unless when she was sinning.

At church, in silks and satins new,
With hoop of monstrous size;
She never slumber'd in her pew—
But when she shut her eyes.

Her love was sought, I do aver,
By twenty beaux and more;
The king himself has follow'd her—
When she has walk'd before.

But now her wealth and finery fled,
Her hangers-on cut short all;
The doctors found, when she was dead—
Her last disorder mortal.

Let us lament, in sorrow sore,
For Kent-street well may say,
That had she liv'd a twelvemonth more—
She had not dy'd to-day.

RETALIATION†.

Of old, when Scarron his companions invited,
Each guest brought his dish, and the feast was united,

* This gentleman was educated at Trinity-College, Dublin; but having wasted his patrimony, he enlisted as a foot-soldier. Growing tired of that employment, he obtained his discharge, and became a scribbler in the newspapers. He translated Voltaire's Henriade.

† First printed in 1774, after the author's death. Dr. Goldsmith, and some of his friends, occasionally dined at the St. James's Coffee-House.—One day it was proposed to write epitaphs on him. His country, dialect, and person, furnished subjects of witticism. He was called on for Retaliation, and, at the next meeting, produced the following poem.

If our * landlord supplies us with beef and with fish,
Let each guest bring himself, and he brings the best dish:

Our † dean shall be venison, just fresh from the plains;

Our ‡ Burke shall be tongue, with a garnish of brains;

Our § Will shall be wild fowl, of excellent flavour,

And ¶ Dick with his pepper shall heighten their flavour:

Our  Cumberland's sweetbread its place shall obtain,

And †† Douglas is pudding, substantial and plain:

Our ‡‡ Garrick's a salad; for in him we see

Oil, vinegar, sugar, and saltnefs agree:

To make out the dinner, full certain I am,

That || Ridge is anchovy, and §§ Reynolds is lamb;

That ¶¶ Hickey's a capon, and, by the same rule,
Magnanimous Goldsmith a gooseberry fool.

At a dinner so various, at such a repast,

Who'd not be a glutton, and stick to the last?

Here, waiter, more wine, let me sit while I'm able,

Till all my companions sink under the table;

Than, with chaos and blunders encircling my head,

Let me ponder, and tell what I think of the dead.

Here lies the good dean, re-united to earth,

Who mixt reason with pleasure, and wisdom with mirth:

If he had any faults, he has left us in doubt,

At least, in six weeks, I could not find 'em out;

Yet some have declar'd, and it can't be denied 'em,

That fly-boots was cursedly cunning to hide 'em.

Here lies our good Edmund, whose genius was such,

We scarcely can praise it, or blame it too much;

Who, born for the universe, narrow'd his mind,

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.

Though fraught with all learning, yet straining his throat,

To persuade  Tommy Townshend to lend him
a vote;

* The master of the St. James's Coffee-House, where the Doctor, and the friends he has characterised in this poem, occasionally dined.

† Doctor Barnard, Dean of Derry in Ireland.

‡ Mr. Edmund Burke.

§ Mr. William Burke, late secretary to General Conway, and member for Bedwin.

¶ Mr. Richard Burke, collector for Granada.

 Mr. Richard Cumberland, author of the West-Indian, Fashionable Lover, the Brothers, and other dramatic pieces.

†† Doctor Douglas, canon of Windsor, an ingenious Scots gentleman, who has no less distinguished himself as a citizen of the world, than a sound critic, in detecting several literary mistakes (or rather forgeries) of his countrymen; particularly Lauder on Milton, and Bowser's History of the Popes.

‡‡ David Garrick, Esq.

|| Counsellor John Ridge, a gentleman belonging to the Irish bar.

§§ Sir Joshua Reynolds.

¶¶ An eminent attorney.

 Mr. T. Townshend, member for Whitechurch.

Who, too deep for his hearers, still went on refining,
And thought of convincing, while they thought of dining;

Though equal to all things, for all things unfit,
Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit:
For a patriot too cool; for a drudge, disobedient;
And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient.
In short, 'twas his fate, unemploy'd, or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.

Here lies honest William, whose heart was a mint,
While the owner ne'er knew half the good that was in't;

The pupil of impulse, it forc'd him along,
His conduct still right, with his argument wrong;
Still aiming at honour, yet fearing to roam,
The coachman was tipsy, the chariot drove home;
Would you ask for his merits? alas! he had none;
What was good was spontaneous, his faults were his own.

Here lies honest Richard, whose fate I must sigh at;

Alas, that such frolic should now be so quiet!
What spirits were his! what wit and what whim!
Now breaking a jest, and now breaking a limb!
Now wrangling and grumbling to keep up the ball!

Now teasing and vexing, yet laughing at all!
In short, so provoking a devil was Dick, [nick;
That we wish'd him full ten times a day at old
But, missing his mirth and agreeable vein,
As often we wish'd to have Dick back again.

Here Cumberland lies, having acted his parts,
The Terence of England, the mender of hearts;
A flattering painter, who made it his care
To draw men as they ought to be, not as they are.
His gallants are all faultless, his women divine,
And comedy wonders at being so fine;

Like a tragedy queen he has dizen'd her out,
Or rather like tragedy giving a rout.
His fools have their follies so lost in a crowd
Of virtues and feelings, that folly grows proud,
And coxcombs alike in their failings alone,
Adopting his portraits are pleas'd with their own

Say, where has our poet this malady caught?
Or, wherefore his characters thus without fault?
Say, was it that vainly directing his view
To find out men's virtues, and finding them few,
Quite sick of pursuing each troublesome elf,
He grew lazy at last, and drew from himself?

Here Douglas retires from his toils to relax,
The scourge of impostors, the terror of quacks:
Come, all ye quack bards, and ye quacking di-
vines,

Come, and dance on the spot where your tyrant
reclines:

When satire and censure encircled his throne,
I fear'd for your safety, I fear'd for my own;

* Mr. Richard Burke. This gentleman having slightly fractured one of his arms and legs, at different times, the doctor has rallied him on those accidents, as a kind of retributive justice for breaking his jests upon other people.

VOL. X

But now he is gone, and we want a detector,
Our * Dodds shall be pious, our † Kenricks shall lecture;

‡ Macpherson write bombast, and call it a style;
Our Townshend make speeches, and I shall compile;

[over,
New Lauders and Bowers the Tweed shall cross
No countryman living their tricks to discover;
Detection her taper shall quench to a spark,
And Scotchman meet Scotchman and cheat in the dark.

Here lies David Garrick, describe me who can,
An abridgment of all that was pleasant in man;
As an actor, confest without rival to shine;
As a wit, if not first, in the very first line:
Yet, with talents like these, and an excellent heart,
The man had his failings, a dupe to his art.
Like an ill-judging beauty, his colours he spread;
And beplaster'd with rouge, his own natural red.
On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting;
'Twas only that, when he was off, he was acting.
With no reason on earth to go out of his way,
He turn'd and he varied full ten times a day:
Though secure of our hearts, yet confoundedly sick,
If they were not his own by finessing and trick:
He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew when he pleas'd he could whistle
them back.

Of praise a mere glutton, he swallow'd what came,
And the puff of a dunce, he mistook it for fame;
Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease,
Who pepper'd the highest, was surest to please.
But let us be candid, and speak out our mind,
If dunces applauded, he paid them in kind.
Ye Kenricks, ye || Kellys, and § Woodfalls so grave,

[you gave?
What a commerce was yours, while you got and How did Grub-street re-echo the shouts that you rais'd,

[prais'd?
While he was be-Roscious'd, and you were be-
But peace to his spirit, wherever it flies,
To act as an angel, and mix with the skies:
Those poets, who owe their best fame to his skill,
Shall still be his flatterers, go where he will.
Old Shakspeare, receive him, with praise and with love,

And Beaumonts and Bens be his Kellys above.

Here Hickey reclines, a most blunt, pleasant creature,

And slander itself must allow him good-nature:
He cherish'd his friend, and he relish'd a bumper;
Yet one fault he had, and that one was a thumper.
Perhaps you may ask if the man was a miser:
I answer, no, no, for he always was wiser:

* The Rev. Dr. Dodds.

† Dr. Kenrick, who read lectures at the Devil tavern, under the title of "The School of Shakspeare."

‡ James Macpherson, Esq, who lately, from the mere force of his style, wrote down the first poet of all antiquity.

|| Mr. Hugh Kelly, author of False Delicacy, Word to the Wife, Clementina, School for Wives, &c. &c.

§ Mr. William Woodfall, printer of the Morning Chronicle.

80

Too courteous, perhaps, or obligingly flat?
His very worst foe can't accuse him of that:
Perhaps he confided in men as they go,
And so was too foolishly honest? ah no!
Then what was his failing? come tell it, and burn ye,—

He was, could he help it? a special attorney.

Here Reynolds is laid, and, to tell you my mind,
He has not left a wiser or better behind;
His pencil was striking, resistless and grand;
His manners were gentle, complying and bland;
Still born to improve us in every part,
His pencil our faces, his manners our heart:
To coxcombs averse, yet most civilly steering,
When they judg'd without skill he was still hard
of hearing: [stiff,
When they talk'd of their Raphaels, Corregios and
He shifted his * trumpet, and only took snuff.

POSTSCRIPT.

After the fourth edition of this poem was printed, the publisher received the following epitaph on † Mr. Whitefoord, from a friend of Goldsmith's.

HERE Whitefoord reclines, and deny it who can,
Though he merrily lived, he is now a ‡ grave man:
Rare compound of oddity, frolic and fun!
Who relish'd a joke, and rejoic'd in a pun;
Whose temper was generous, open, sincere;
A stranger to flatt'ry, a stranger to fear;
Who scatter'd around wit and humour at will;
Whose daily bons mots half a column might fill:
A Scotchman, from pride and from prejudice free;
A scholar, yet surely no pedant was he.

What pity, alas! that so lib'ral a mind
Should so long be to newspaper essays confin'd!
Who perhaps to the summit of science could soar,
Yet content "if the table he set in a roar;"
Whose talents to fill any station was fit,
Yet happy if Woodfall || confess'd him a wit.

Ye newspaper wittings! ye pert scribbling folks!
Who copied his squibs, and re-echoed his jokes;
Ye tame imitators, ye servile herd, come,
Still follow your master, and visit his tomb:
To deck it, bring with you festoons of the vine,
And copious libations bestow on his shrine;
Then strew all around it (you can do no less)

§ Cross-readings, ship-news, and mistakes of the press.

Merry Whitefoord, farewell! for thy sake I admit [wit:

That a Scot may have humour, I had almost said

* Sir Joshua Reynolds is so remarkably deaf as to be under the necessity of using an ear-trumpet in company.

† Mr. Caleb Whitefoord, author of many humorous essays.

‡ Mr. W. was so notorious a punster, that Goldsmith used to say it was impossible to keep him company, without being infected with the itch of punning.

|| Mr. H. S. Woodfall, printer of the Public Advertiser.

§ Mr. Whitefoord has frequently indulged the town with humorous pieces under those titles in the Public Advertiser.

This debt to thy memory I cannot refuse,
"Thou best humour'd man with the worst humour'd muse."

SONG.

Intended to have been Sung in the Comedy of "She Stoops to Conquer."

Ah, me! when shall I marry me?
Lovers are plenty; but fail to relieve me.
He, fond youth, that could carry me,
Offers to love, but means to deceive me.
But I will rally and combat the ruiner:
Not a look, not a smile shall my passion discover.
She that gives all to the false one pursuing her,
Makes but a penitent, and loses a lover.

PROLOGUE TO ZOBEIDE:

A TRAGEDY.

WRITTEN BY JOSEPH CRADOCK, ESQ.

Acted at the Theatre-Royal, Covent-Garden, 1772.

SPOKEN BY MR. QUICK.

IN these bold times, when learning's sons explore
The distant climates, and the savage shore;
When wise astronomers to India steer,
And quit for Venus many a brighter here;
While botanists, all cold to smiles and dimpling,
Forsoke the fair, and patiently—go simpling.
Our bard into the general spirit enters,
And fits his little frigate for adventures.
With Scythian stores, and trinkets deeply laden,
He this way steers his course, in hopes of trading—
Yet ere he lands he 'as order'd me before,
To make an observation on the shore.
Where are we driven? our reckoning sure is lost!
This seems a rocky and a dangerous coast.
Lord, what a sultry climate am I under!

Yon ill-foreboding cloud seems big with thunder:

(Upper gallery.)

There mangroves spread, and larger than I've seen 'em—

(Pit.)

Here trees of stately size—and billing turtles in
'em—

(Balconies.)

Here ill conditioned oranges abound—

(Stage.)

And apples, bitter apples strew the ground:

[Tasting them.]

The inhabitants are cannibals I fear:

I heard a hissing—there are serpents here!

O, there the people are—best keep my distance;

Our captain (gentle natives) craves assistance;

Our ship's well stor'd—in yonder creek we've laid her,

His honour is no mercenary trader.

This is his first adventure, lend him aid,

And we may chance to drive a thriving trade.

His goods, he hopes, are prime, and brought from far,

Equally fit for gallantry and war.

What, no reply to promises so ample?

—I'd best step back—and order up a sample.

EPILOGUE,

SPOKEN BY MR. LEE LEWES,

In the Character of Harlequin, at his Benefit.

HOLD! Prompter, hold! a word before your nonsense;

I'd speak a word or two, to ease my conscience.

My pride forbids it ever should be said,

My heels eclips'd the honours of my head;

That I found humour in a pycball vest,

Or ever thought that jumping was a jest.

[Takes off his mask.]

Whence, and what art thou, visionary birth?

Nature disowns, and reason scorns thy mirth,

In thy black aspect every passion sleeps,

The joy that dimples, and the woe that weeps.

How hast thou fill'd the scene with all thy brood,

Of fools pursuing, and of fools pursu'd?

Whose ins and outs no ray of sense discloses,

Whose only plot it is to break our noses;

Whilst from below the trap-door demons rise,

And from above the dangling deities;

And shall I mix in this unhallow'd crew?

May rosin'd lightning blast me, if I do!

No—I will act, I'll vindicate the stage:

Shakspeare shall feel my tragic rage.

Off! off! vile trappings! a new passion reigns!

The madd'ning monarch revels in my veins.

Oh! for a Richard's voice to catch the theme:

Give me another horse! bind up my wounds!—

Soft!—'twas but a dream. [treating:]

Aye, 'twas but a dream, for now there's no relief I cease Harlequin, I cease from eating.

'Twas thus that Æsop's stag, a creature blameless,

Yet something vain, like one that shall be nameless,

Once on the margin of a fountain stood,

And cavill'd at his image in the flood.

"The deuce confound," he cries, "these drum-

stick thanks,

"They never have my gratitude nor thanks;

"They're perfectly disgraceful! strike me dead!

"But for a head, yes, yes, I have a head.

"How piercing is that eye! how sleek that brow!

"My horns! I'm told horns are the fashion now."

Whilst thus he spoke, astonish'd! to his view,

Near, and more near, the hounds and huntsmen

drew. [behind,

Hoicks! hark forward! came thundering from

He bounds aloft, outstrips the fleeting wind:

He quits the woods, and tries the beaten ways;

He starts, he pants, he takes the circling maze.

At length his silly head, so priz'd before,

Is taught his former folly to deplore;

Whilst his strong limbs conspire to set him free,

And at one bound he saves himself, like me.

[Taking a jump through the stage door.]

THE LOGICIANS REFUTED.

IN IMITATION OF DEAN SWIFT *.

LOGICIANS have but ill defin'd

As rational the human mind;

* This Imitation having originally been adopted by
Mr. Faulkner, as a genuine poem by Swift, it has been Reason, they say, belongs to man,

But let them prove it if they can.

Wise Aristotle and Smiglelius,

By Ratiocinations specious,

Have strove to prove with great precision,

With definition and division,

Homo est ratione peditum;

But for my soul I cannot credit 'em.

And must in spite of them maintain,

That man and all his ways are vain;

And that this boasted lord of nature,

Is both a weak and erring creature.

That instinct is a surer guide,

Than reason-boasting mortals pride;

And that brute beasts are far before 'em,

Deus est anima brutorum.

Whoever knew an honest brute,

At law his neighbour prosecute,

Bring action for assault and battery,

Or friend beguile with lies and flattery,

O'er plains they ramble unconfin'd,

No politics disturb their mind;

They eat their meals, and take their sport,

Nor know who's in or out at court;

They never to the levee go

To treat as dearest friend a foe;

They never importune his grace,

Nor ever cringe to men in place;

Nor undertake a dirty job,

Nor draw the quill to write for Bob,

Fraught with invective they ne'er go

To folks at Pater-noster Row:

No judges, fidlers, dancing-masters,

No pick-pockets, or poetasters,

Are known to honest quadrupeds,

No single brute his fellows leads.

Brutes never meet in bloody fray,

Nor cut each others throat for pay.

Of beasts, it is confess'd, the ape

Comes nearest us in human shape,

Like man he imitates each fashion,

And malice is his ruling passion:

But both in malice and grimaces

A courtier any ape surpasses.

Behold him humbly cringing wait

Upon the minister of state:

View him soon after to inferiors

Aping the conduct of superiors:

He promises with equal air,

And to perform takes equal care.

He in his turn finds imitators,

At court, the porters, lacquies, waiters,

Their master's manners still contract,

And footmen, lords, and dukes, can act.

Thus at the court, both great and small,

Behave alike, for all ape all.

STANZAS

ON THE TAKING OF QUEBEC.

AMIDST the clamour of exulting joys,

Which triumph forces from the patriot heart,

reprinted in every subsequent edition of the Dean's Poems; and was not discovered till it was too late to take it out of the present edition.

Grief dares to mingle her soul-piercing voice,
And quells the raptures which from pleasures start.

O Wolfe, to thee a streaming flood of woe
Sighing we pay, and think e'en conquest dear!
Quebec in vain shall teach our breast to glow,
Whilst thy sad fate extorts the heart-wrung
tear.

Alive the foe thy dreadful vigour fled,
And saw thee fall with joy-pronouncing eyes:
Yet they shall know thou conquerest, though dead!
Since from thy tomb a thousand heroes rise.

ON A BEAUTIFUL YOUTH STRUCK BLIND BY LIGHTNING.

IMITATED FROM THE SPANISH.

SURE 'twas by Providence design'd,
Rather in pity than in hate,
That he should be like Cupid blind,
To save him from Narcissus' fate,

A SONNET.

WEeping, murmuring, complaining,
Lost to every gay delight;
Myra, too sincere for feigning,
Fears th' approaching bridal night.

Yet why impair thy bright perfection?
Or dim thy beauty with a tear?
Had Myra follow'd my direction,
She long had wanted cause of fear.

THE LIFE OF P. WHITEHEAD.

PAUL WHITEHEAD was the youngest son of Mr. Edmund Whitehead, a tradesman, said to have been a tailor in Castle-Yard, Holborn; and was born in 1710, on St. Paul's day, from which circumstance he obtained his Christian name.

He received his education from a clergyman, at Hitchin, in Bedfordshire. Being intended for trade, he was placed an apprentice to a mercer in London; but, disliking his situation, he soon quitted it, and entered himself of the Temple, in order to study the law.

During his apprenticeship, he contracted an intimacy with Mr. Lowth, his fellow apprentice, the friend and executor of the celebrated tragedian Quin, through whom he became acquainted with Mr. Fleetwood, the manager of Drury-Lane Theatre, an acquaintance which proved fatal to his affairs in the early part of his life.

Mr. Fleetwood, it seems, had influence enough over him to prevail upon him to enter into a joint security with him for the payment of three thousand pounds; "not," says Fleetwood, "that the obligation will be binding upon you at all; but another name is wanting as a matter of course."

Mr. Fleetwood's failure to discharge the obligation, subjected Whitehead to the penalty of the bond; and he was accordingly arrested and confined for several years within the walls of the Fleet prison.

Some years before, he had distinguished himself in the career of politics and poetry, by his conversation and writings. It was principally to Whitehead, in conjunction with the well-known Mr. Carey, the town was indebted for the amusement of the Mock Procession of the Free Masons, whose just and timely ridicule put the anniversary parade so much out of countenance, that it has ever since been discontinued.

His first poetical performance was, The State Dances, inscribed to Pope, in 1733; and in 1738, he published Manners, a satire, in which some noblemen having been treated with very little respect, a complaint was made to the House of Lords, and on the 12th February 1738-9, it was voted to be scandalous; and Doddsley, the publisher of it, was taken into custody of the Black Rod, and confined a week. On this occasion, Whitehead withdrew till the storm was over.

In the famous contested election between Trentham and Vandeput, for Westminster, Whitehead exerted all his activity, frequently heading numerous bodies of the electors in person, and supplying the press with daily advertisements and electioneering squibs, in favour of Sir George Vandeput.

His next performance was the Gymnasiad, published in 1744; and that was succeeded by Honour, a satire, in 1747.

When the Prince of Wales commenced his opposition to the Court, Whitehead connected himself with that party, and was the author of the celebrated pamphlet, called, The Case of the Honourable Alexander Murray, Esq. which fell under the censure of the House of Commons, who procured Mr. Owen, the publisher, to be prosecuted for vending it. In 1755, he published his Epistle to Dr. Thompson.

He had in 1735, married Miss Dyer, only daughter of Sir Swinnerton Dyer, of Spainshall, in Essex, with whom he is said to have received 10,000*l.*

She died young; and Whitehead, after his release from Fleetwood's debt, lived in a sort of independence, if not affluence.

He was particularly attached to Sir Francis Dashwood, afterwards Lord le Despenser, at whose house he almost constantly resided, and by whom he was held in an equal degree of estimation. When his Lordship came into office with Lord Bute's party, he procured a patent place of 800*l.* for his friend, which he enjoyed to his death.

Thus provided against the reverses of fortune, he retired to spend the evening of his days in an agreeable and convenient retreat on Twickenham Common, where he frequently entertained his friends with that species of humour which was peculiar to him, and a conviviality of disposition for which his company was ever agreeable to his acquaintance.

The ease, if not affluence, of his circumstances, in this situation, is thus poetically described by himself in his Epistle to Dr. Thompson.

E'er wants my table the health-cheering meal,
With Banstead mutton crown'd, or Essex veal
Smokes not, from Lincoln meads the stately loin,
Or rosy gammon of Hantonian swine.
From Dorking's roasts the feather'd victims bleed,
And Thames still wafts me ocean's scaly breed;
Though Gallia's vines their costly juice deny,
Still Tajo's banks the jocund glass supply;
Still distant worlds nectareous treasures roll,
And either India sparkles in my bowl.
Of Devon's boughs or Dorset's bearded fields,
To Britons arms a British beverage yields.

Nor do the pleasures of the table, and the exhilarating conveniencies of good cheer, appear to have been superior to the complacency and tranquillity of mind, with which he spent the latter part of his days, as he has described it at the close of the same epistle, in a translation of King's "Apology," which he poetically applies to himself,

My ease and freedom, if for aught I vend,
Would not you cry—to Bedlam—Bedlam, friend;
But to speak out—shall what would ne'er engage
My frailer youth, now captivate my age.
What cares can vex, what terrors frightful be,
To him whose shield is hoary sixty-three.
When life itself so little worth appears,
The ministers can give no hopes, or fears!
Although grown gray within my humble gate,
I ne'er kiss'd hands, ne'er trod the rooms of state;
Yet, not unhonour'd have I liv'd, and blest
With rich convenience, careless of the rest.
What boon more grateful can the gods bestow
On those avow'd their fav'rite sons below?

For some time before his death, he lingered under a severe illness, during which he employed himself in burning his manuscripts. Though his disorder was such as no medicine could reach, he bore the excruciating pains which he suffered with great resignation, and died December 30. 1774, in the 64th year of his age. He bestowed, among other bequests, the very singular one, of his heart, on his noble friend and patron Lord le Despenser, who deposited it with great pomp and ceremony, on the 13th of August 1775 in a mausoleum, erected for that purpose in his garden, at High Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire, as a memorial due to so acceptable a present, as that of the heart of an honest man.

His Poems and Miscellaneous compositions, which he never could be prevailed on to collect and republish in his lifetime were collected and reprinted, with explanatory notes, and his Life, by Captain Edward Thompson, with the approbation and communications of his friends and relations. The Poems were received into the edition of the "English Poets" 1790.

Whitehead was a facetious companion, and possessed the qualities of ingenious and ingenuous to their utmost extent. He belonged for some years to that jovial association of choice spirits, called the Beef Steak Club, held in Covent-Garden Theatre, and consisting of an heterogeneous mixture of peers, poets, and players. As to his political principles, if we may judge of them by his writings, he appears to have been animated with that laudable zeal for liberty, which usually displays its greatest warmth in the breasts of men of genius. His apostrophe to the Patriot, on this subject, in his Manners, is animated and beautiful.

Thrice happy patriot ! whom no courts debase,
No titles lessen, and no stars disgrace.
Still nod the plumage o'er the brainless head ;
Still o'er the faithless heart the ribband spread.
Such toys may serve to signalize the tool,
To gild the knave, or garnish out the fool ;
While you, with Roman virtue arm'd, disdain
The tinsel trappings and the glitt'ring chain :
Fond of your freedom, spurn the venal fee,
And prove he's only great—who dares be free.

It may be doubted, however, whether in his attachment to parties in particular, he either acted or wrote from any other principle than personal views or attachments ; motives that have actuated political partizans from the days of Sallust to the present. Bonum publicum sic certabat. He was, indeed, generally supposed to be a Tory, with a strong tincture of the Jacobite ; for which supposition, he gave no little reason by his frequent sneers at the House of Hanover. But, if we pay any regard to the warmth which he breathes, the spirit of independence, the enthusiasm with which he speaks of public virtue, and the severity with which he lashes private vice, we may justly call in question his having any attachment to a race of tyrants from principle.

The passage in his Manners, beginning, I cannot truckle to a slave in state, &c. and that in his Honour, beginning, Great in her laurell'd sages, Athens, &c. are inconsistent with a grounded partiality to the line of the Stuarts. The truth, perhaps, is, that the party he first embraced, and to which he afterwards adhered, was as much an object of accident as choice. His disposition, indeed, appears to have had an original turn to sarcasm and satire ; but he came into life, at a time when the reputation and success of Pope had raised the character of a satirist much beyond its true standard. Pope, therefore, was chosen as the model, of which he gloried in the imitation. It must be confessed, however, that he followed him, baud passibus æquis, at least in his poetical career, and the success attending it, of which he pathetically complains in his Manners.

Pope writes unhurt—but know, 'tis diff'rent quite
To beard the lion, and to crush the mite.
Safe may he dash the statesman in each line ;
Those dread his satire, who dare punish mine.

The great and particular courtiers are always the object of the spirited satirist. Hence, as the persons then in power were Whigs, he, of course, took the side of the Tories. Hence, also, his terrible aversion, at that time, to courts and drawing-rooms. And yet, when the patrons to whom a congeniality of sentiment had recommended him, had, by a similar congeniality, recommended themselves to royal patronage, it was not found that either the secondary patron, or the poet, entertained any such antipathy to courts and courtiers any longer.

His principal poems, are, Manners, a satire ; The State Dunces, a satire ; Honour, a satire ; The Gymnasium, a mock heroic poem ; and the Epistle to Dr. Thompson ; which sufficiently show, that he possessed a manly strength of expression, and a flowing vein of poetry. His lesser pieces have their brighter passages ; but require no distinct consideration.

THE WORKS OF P. WHITEHEAD.

THE STATE DUNCES :

A SATIRE.

Inscribed to Mr. Pope, 1733.

"I from my soul sincerely hate
Both kings and ministers of state."

SWIFT.

WHILE cringing crowds at faithless levees wait,
Fond to be fools of fame, or slaves of state;
And others, studious to increase their store,
Plough the rough ocean for Peruvian ore;
How blest thy fate, whom calmer hours attend,
Peace thy companion, fame thy faithful friend!
While in thy Twick'nham bow'rs, devoid of care,
You feast the fancy, and enchant the ear;
Thames gently rolls her silver tide along,
And the charm'd Naiads listen to thy song.

Here peaceful pass the gentle hours away,
While tuneful science measures out the day!
Here, happy bard, as various fancies lead,
You paint the blooming maid, or flow'ry mead!
Sound the rough clangor of tumultuous war*,
Or sing the raviſh'd tendrils of the fair†!
Now melting move the tender tear to flow,
And wake our sighs with Eloisa's woe‡.
But chief, to dullness ever foe decreed,
The apes of science with thy satire bleed§;
Peers, poets, pandars, mingle in the throng,
Smart with thy touch, and tremble at thy song||.

Yet vain, O Pope! is all thy sharpest rage,
Still starv'ling dunces persecute the age;
Faithful to folly, or enrag'd with spite,
Still tasteless Timons build, and Tibbalds write;
Still Welſted¶ tunes his beer-inspired lays,
And Ralph, in metre, holds forth Stanhope's praise.
Ah! hapless victim to the poet's flame,
While his eulogiums crucify thy fame.

Shall embryo wits thy studious hours engage,
Live in thy labours, and profane thy page;
While virtue, ever-lov'd, demands thy lays,
And claims the tuneful tribute of thy praise?
Can Pope be silent, and not grateful lend
One strain to sing the patriot and the friend,

* Homer. † Rape of the Lock.

‡ Eloisa to Abelard. § Dunciad. || Epistles.

¶ Two authors, remarkable for nothing so much as the figure they make in the Dunciad.

Who, nobly anxious in his country's cause,
Maintains her honours, and defends her laws?
Could I, my bard, but equal numbers raise,
Then would I sing—for, oh! I burst to praise—
Sing how a Pult'ney* charms the list'ning throng,
While senates hang enraptur'd on his tongue;
With Tully's fire how each oration glows,
In Tully's music how each period flows;
Instruct each babe to list the patriot's name,
Who in each bosom breathes a Roman flame.

So, when the genius of the Roman rage
Stemm'd the strong torrent of tyrannic age,
In freedom's cause each glowing breast he warm'd,
And, like a Pult'ney, then a Brutus charm'd.

How blest, while we a British Brutus see,
And all the Roman stands confest in thee!
Equal thy worth, but equal were thy doom,
To save Britannia, as he rescu'd Rome:
He from a Tarquin snatch'd the destin'd prey;
Britannia still laments a Walpole's sway.

Arise, my tuneful bard, nor thus in vain
Let thy Britannia, whom thou lov'st, complain:
If thou in moanful lays relate her woe,
Each heart shall bleed, each eye with pity flow:
If to revenge you swell the sounding strain,
Revenge and fury fire each British swain:
Obsequious to thy verse each breast shall move,
Or burn with rage, or soften into love.

O let Britannia be her poet's care!
And lash the spoiler, while you save the fair.
Lo! where he stands, amidst the servile crew,
Nor blushes stain his cheek with crimson hue;
While dire corruption all around he spreads,
And ev'ry ductile conscience captive leads:
Brib'd by his boons, behold the venal band
Worship the idol they could once command!
So Britain's now, as Judah's sons before,
First raise a golden calf, and then adore.

Let dull Parnassian sons of rhyme no more
Provoke thy satire, and employ thy pow'r;
New objects rise to share an equal fate,
The big, rich, mighty, dunces of the state.
Shall Ralph, Cooke, Welſted, then engross thy
rage,

While courts afford a Hervey, York, or Gage?
Dullness no more roosts only near the sky,
But senates, drawing-rooms, with garrets vie;
Plump peers, and breadless bards, alike are dull;
St. James's and Rag-fair club fool for fool,

* Afterwards Earl of Bath.

Amidst the mighty dull, behold how great
An Appius swells the Tibbald of the state!
Long had he strove to spread his lawless sway
O'er Britain's sons, and force them to obey;
But, blasted all his blooming hopes, he flies
To vent his woe, and mourn his lost excise.

Pensive he sat, and sigh'd, while round him lay
Loads of dull lumber, all inspir'd by pay:
Here, puny pamphlets, spun from prelates' brains;
There, the smooth jingle of Cooke's lighter strains;
Here, Walsingham's * soft lulling opiates spread;
There, gloomy Osborn's * quintessence of lead:
With these the statesman strove to ease his care,
To sooth his sorrows, and divert despair:
But long his grief sleep's gentle aid denies;
At length a slumb'rous Briton clos'd his eyes.

Yet vain the healing balm of downy rest,
To chase his woe, or ease his lab'ring breast:
Now frightful forms rise hideous to his view,
More, Stafford, Laud, and all the headless crew;
Daggers and halters boding terror breeds,
And here a Dudley swings, there Villiers bleeds.

Now goddesses dullness, watchful o'er his fate,
And ever anxious for her child of state,
From couch of down flow rais'd her drowsy head
Forsook her slumbers, and to Appius sped.

Awake, my son, awake, the goddesses cries,
Nor longer mourn thy darling lost excise;
(Here the sad sound unseal'd the statesman's eyes)

Why slumbers thus my son, oppress'd with care?
While dullness rules, say, shall her sons despair?
O'er all I spread my universal sway;
Kings, prelates, peers, and rulers, all obey:
Lo! in the church my mighty pow'r I shew,
In pulpit preach, and slumber in the pew:
The bench and bar alike my influence owns;
Here prate my magpies, and there doze my drones.
In the grave dons, how formal is my mien,
Who rule the gallipots of Warwick-lane!
At court behold me strut in purple pride,
At Hockley roar, and in Crane-court preside.
But chief in thee my mighty pow'r is seen;
'Tis I inspire thy mind, and fill thy mien;
On thee, my child, my duller blessings shed,
And pour my opium o'er thy fav'rite head;
Rais'd thee a ruler of Britannia's fate,
And led thee blund'ring to the helm of state.

Here bow'd the statesman low, and thus address'd:
O goddesses, sole inspirer of my breast!
To gall the British neck with Gallic chain,
Long have I strove, but long have strove in vain;
While Caleb †, rebel to thy sacred pow'r,
Unveils those eyes which thou hast curtain'd o'er;
Makes Britain's sons my dark designs foresee,
Blast all my schemes, and struggle to be free.
O, had my projects met a milder fate,
How had I reign'd a bashaw of the state!
How o'er Britannia spread imperial sway!
How taught each free-born Briton to obey!

* Names assumed by writers of two ministerial papers.

† Caleb d' Anvers, the name assumed by the writers of the Craftsman.

No smiling freedom then had cheer'd her swains²
But Asia's deserts vy'd with Albion's plains:
Turks, Vandals, Britain! then compar'd with thee,
Had hugg'd their chains, and joy'd that they were free;

While wond'ring nations all around had seen
Me rise a great Mogul, or Mazarin:
Then had I taught Britannia to adore,
Then led her captive to my lawless pow'r.
Methinks I view her now no more appear
First in the train, and fairest 'midst the fair:
Joyless I see the lovely mourner lie,
Nor glow her cheek, nor sparkle now her eye;
Faded each grace, no smiling feature warm;
Torn all her tresses, blighted ev'ry charm:
Nor teeming plenty now each valley crowns;
Slaves are her sons, and tradeless all her towns.
For this, behold yon peaceful army fed;
For this, on senates see my bounty shed;
For this, what wonders, goddesses, have I wrought!
How bully'd, begg'd, how treated, and how fought!
What wand'ring maze of error blunder'd through,
And how repair'd old blunders still by new!
Hence the long train of never-ending jars,
Of warful peaces, and of peaceful wars,
Each mystic treaty of the mighty store,
Which to explain demands ten treaties more:
Hence scarecrow navies, floating raree-shows;
And hence Iberia's pride, and Britain's woes.
These wond'rous works, O goddesses! have I done,
Works ever worthy dullness' fav'rite son.

Lo! on thy sons alone my favours show'r;
None share my bounty that disdain thy pow'r:
Yon feathers, ribbons, titles light as air,
Behold, thy choicest children only share:
Each views the pageant with admiring eyes,
And fondly grasps the visionary prize;
Now proudly spreads his leading-string of state,
And thinks—to be a wretch, is to be great.

But turn, O goddesses! turn thine eyes, and view
The darling leaders of thy gloomy crew.

Full open-mouth'd Newcastle there behold,
Aping a Tully, swell into a scold,
Grievous to mortal ear.—As at the place
Where loud-tongu'd virgins vend the scaly race,
Harsh peals of vocal thunder fill the skies,
And stunning sounds in hideous discord rise;
So, when he tries the wond'rous power of noise,
Each hapless ear's a victim to his voice. [mend

How blest, O Cheselden *! whose art can
Those ears Newcastle was ordain'd to rend,

See Harrington secure in silence sit;
No empty words betray his want of wit:
If sense in hiding folly is express'd,
O Harrington! thy wisdom stands confess'd.

To dullness sacred cause for ever true,
Thy darling Caledonian, goddesses, view;
The pride and glory of thy Scotia's plains,
And faithful leader of her venal swains:
Loaded he moves beneath a servile weight,
The dull laborious packhorse of the state;
Drudges through tracks of infamy for pay,
And hackneys out his conscience by the day:

* William Cheselden, an eminent surgeon.

Yonder behold the busy peerless peer,
With aspect meagre and important air;
His form how Gothic, and his looks how sage!
He seems the living Plato of the age.

Blest form! in which alone thy merit's seen,
Since all thy wisdom centers in thy mien!

Here Egmont, Albemarle (for senates fit),
And W——by the wife, in council sit:
Here looby G——n, Gr——m ever dull,
By birth a senator, by fate a fool.

While these, Britannia, watchful o'er thy state,
Maintain thine honours, and direct thy fate,
How shall admiring nations round adore,
Behold thy greatness, tremble at thy pow'r;
New Shebas come, invited by thy fame,
Revere thy wisdom, and extol thy name!

Lo! to yon bench now, goddess, turn thine eyes,
And view thy sons in solemn dullness rise;
All doating, wrinkled, grave, and gloomy, see
Each form confess thy dull divinity;
True to thy cause behold each trencher'd sage
Increas'd in folly as advanc'd in age:
Here Ch——r, learn'd in mystic prophecy,
Confuting Collins, makes each prophet lie:
Poor Woolston by thy Smallbrook there assail'd;
Gaols sure convinc'd him, though the prelate fail'd.

But chief Pastorius, ever grave and dull,
Devoid of sense, of zeal divinely full,
Retail his squibs of science o'er the town,
While charges, past'rals, through each street re-
sound;

These teach a heav'nly Jesus to obey,
While those maintain an earthly Appius' sway.

Thy gospel truth, Pastorius, crost we see,
While God and Mammon's serv'd at once by thee. [pawn,

Who would not trim, speak, vote, or conscience
To lord it o'er a fee, and swell in lawn?
If arts like those, O Sherlock, honours claim,
Than thee none merits more the prelate's name:
Wond'ring behold him faithful to his fee,
Prove parliaments dependent to be free;
In senates blunder, flounder, and dispute,
For ever reas'ning, never to confute.
Since courts for this their fated gifts decree,
Say, what is reputation to a fee?

Lo! o'er yon flood Hare casts his low'ring eyes,
And wishful sees the rev'rend turrets rise.
While Lambeth opens to thy longing view,
Hapless! the mitre ne'er can bind thy brow:
Though courts should deign the gift, how wond'rous hard

By thy own doctrines still to be debarr'd!
For, if from change * such mighty evil springs,
Translations sure, O Hare! are sinful things.

These rulers see, and nameless numbers more,
O goddess, of thy train the choicest store,
Who ignorance in gravity entrench,
And grace alike the pulpit and the bench.

Full plac'd and pension'd, see! Horatio stands;
Begrin'd his face, unpurify'd his hands:

* A noted sermon preached on the 30th of January, on this text, "Woe be unto them that are given to change," &c.

To decency he scorns all nice pretence,
And reigns firm foe to cleanliness and sense.
How did Horatio Britain's cause advance!
How shine the sloven and buffoon of France!
In senates now, how scold, how rave, how roar,
Of treaties run the tedious train-trow o'er!
How blunder out whate'er should be conceal'd,
And how keep secret what should be reveal'd!
True child of dullness! see him, goddess, claim
Pow'r next myself, as next in birth and fame.

Silence! ye senates, while enribbon'd Young
Pours forth melodious nothings from his tongue!
How sweet the accents play around the ear,
Form'd of smooth periods, and of well-tun'd air!
Leave, gentle Young, the senate's dry debate,
Nor labour 'midst the labyrinths of state;
Suit thy soft genius to more tender themes,
And sing of cooling shades, and purling streams;
With modern sing song murder ancient plays*,
Or warble in sweet ode a Brunswick's praise:
So shall thy strains in purer dullness flow,
And laurels wither on a Cibber's brow.
Say, can the statesman wield the poet's quill,
And quit the senate for Parnassus' hill?
Since there no venal vote a pension shares,
Nor wants Apollo lords commissioners.

There W—— and P——, goddess, view,
Firm in thy cause, and to thy Appius true!
Lo! from their labours what reward betides!
One pays my army, one my navy guides.

To dance, dress, sing, and serenade the fair,
"Conduct a singer, or reclaim a hair,"
O'er baleful tea with females taught to blame,
And spread a slander o'er a virgin's fame;
Form'd for these softer arts shall Hervey strain
With stubborn politics his tender brain!
For ministers laborious pamphlets write,
In senates prattle, and with patriots fight!
Thy fond ambition, pretty youth, give o'er,
Preside at balls, old fashions lost restore;
So shall each toilette in thy cause engage,
And H——ey shine a P——re of the age.

Behold a star emblazon C——n's coat!
Not that the knight has merit, but a vote.
And here, O goddess, num'rous wrongheads trace,
Lur'd by a pension, ribband, or a place.

To murder science, and my cause defend,
Now shoals of Grub-street garretteers descend;
From schools and desks the writing insects crawl,
Unlade their dullness, and for Appius bawl.

Lo! to thy darling Osborne turn thine eyes,
See him o'er politics superior rise;
While Caleb feels the venom of his quill,
And wond'ring ministers reward his skill:
Unlearn'd in logic, yet he writes by rule,
And proves himself in syllogism—a fool;

* This gentleman, with the assistance of Roome, Concanen, and several others, committed a barbarous murder on the body of an old comedy, by turning it into a modern ballad opera; which was scarce exhibited on the stage, before it was thought necessary to be contracted into one act. As this is the only living instance of the surprising genius and abilities of these wits, I could not forbear mentioning it.

Now flies obedient, war with sense to wage,
And drags th' idea through the painful page;
Unread, unanswer'd, still he writes again,
Still spins the endless cobweb of his brain;
Charm'd with each line, reviewing what he writ,
Blesses his stars, and wonders at his wit.

Nor less, O Walsingham, thy worth appears!
Alike in merit, though unlike in years:
Ill-fated youth! what stars malignant shed
Their baneful influence o'er thy brainless head,
Doom'd to be ever writing, never read!
For bread to libel liberty and sense,
And damn thy patron weekly with defence.
Drench'd in the fable flood, O hadst thou still O'er skins of parchment drove thy venal quill,
At Temple ale-house told an idle tale,
And pawn'd thy credit for a mug of ale;
Unknown to Appius then had been thy name,
Unlac'd thy coat, unsacrific'd his fame;
Nor vast unvend'd reams would Peele deplore,
As victims destin'd to the common-shore.

As dunce to dunce in endless numbers breed,
So to Concanen see a Ralph succeed;
A tiny witling of these writing days, [plays.
Full-fam'd for tuneless rhymes, and short-liv'd
Write on, my luckless bard, still unasham'd,
Though burnt thy journals, and thy dramas
damn'd;

'Tis bread inspires thy politics and lays,
Not thirst of immortality or praise.

These, goddess, view, the choicest of the train,
While yet unnumber'd dunces still remain;
Deans, critics, lawyers, bards, a motley crew,
To dullness faithful, as to Appius true.

Enough, the goddess cries, enough I've seen;
While these support, secure my son shall reign;
Still shalt thou blund'ring rule Britannia's fate,
Still Grub-street hail thee minister of state.

MANNERS:

A SATIRE, 1738.

"Paulus vel Cossus vel Drusus moribus esto."
JUVENAL.

"WELL—of all plagues which make mankind
"their sport, [—a court.
"Guard me, ye Heav'ns! from that worst plague
"Midst the mad mansions of Moorfields, I'd be
"A straw-crown'd monarch, in mock majesty,
"Rather than sovereign rule Britannia's fate,
"Curs'd with the follies and the farce of state.
"Rather in Newgate walls, O! let me dwell,
"A doleful tenant of the darkling cell,
"Than swell, in palaces, the mighty store
"Of fortune's fools, and parasites of pow'r.
"Than crowns, ye gods! be any state my doom,
"Or any dungeon, but—a drawing-room.
"Thrice happy patriot! whom no courts de-
"base,
"No titles lessen, and no stars disgrace.
"Still nod the plumage o'er the brainless head;
"Still o'er the faithless heart the ribband spread.
"Such toys may serve to signalize the tool,
"To gild the knave, or garnish out the fool;

"While, you, with Roman virtue arm'd, disdain
"The tinsel trappings and the glitt'ring chain:
"Fond of your freedom spurn the venal fee,
"And prove he's only great—who dares be free."
Thus sung Philemon in his calm retreat,
Too wise for pow'r, too virtuous to be great.

But whence this rage at courts? reply'd his
grace,

Say, is the mighty crime, to be in place?
Is that the deadly sin, mark'd out by Heav'n,
For which no mortal e'er can be forgiv'n?
Must all, all suffer, who in courts engage,
Down from lord steward, to the puny page?
Can courts and places be such sinful things,
The sacred gifts and palaces of kings?

A place may claim our rev'rence, Sir, I own;
But then the man its dignity must crown:
'Tis not the truncheon, or the ermine's pride,
Can screen the coward, or the knave can hide.
Let Stair and  † head our arms and law,
The judge and gen'ral must be view'd with
awe:

The villain then would shudder at the bar;
And Spain grow humble at the sound of war.

What courts are sacred, when I tell your grace,
Manners alone must sanctify the place?
Hence only each its proper name receives;
Haywood's a brothel; White's ‡ a den of thieves:
Bring whores and thieves to court, you change
the scene,

St. James's turns the brothel, and the den.

Who would the courtly chapel holy call,
Though the whole bench should consecrate the wall?

While the trim chaplain, conscious of a fee,
Cries out, "My king, I have no God but thee;"
Lifts to the royal seat the asking eye,
And pays to George the tribute of the sky;
Proves sin alone from humble roofs must spring;
Nor can one earthly failing stain a king.

Bishops and kings may consecrate, 'tis true;
Manners alone claim homage as their due.
Without, the court and church are both profane,
Whatever prelate preach, or monarch reign;
Religion's rostrum virtue's scaffold grows,
And crowns and mitres are mere raree-shows.

In vain, behold yon rev'rend turrets rise,
And Sarum's sacred spire salute the skies!
If the lawn'd Levite's earthly vote be sold,
And God's free gift retail'd for Mammon gold;
No rev'rence can the proud cathedral claim,
But Henley's shop, and Sherlock's, are the same.

Whence have St. Stephen's walls so hallow'd
been?

Whence? from the virtue of his sons within.

† It is to be lamented that the barrenness of the present times obliges the author to trust to posterity, for the supply of a proper character in this place.

‡ Dr. Swift says, "That the late Earl of Oxford,
"in the time of his ministry, never passed by White's
"chocolate-house (the common rendezvous of infamous
"sweepers and noble cullies) without bestowing a curse
"upon that famous academy, as the bane of half the
"English nobility."

But should some guileful serpent void of grace,
Glide in its bounds, and poison all the place;
Should e'er the sacred voice be set to sale,
And o'er the heart the golden fruit prevail;
The place is alter'd, Sir; nor think it strange
To see the senate sink into a change.

Or court, or church, or senate-house, or hall,
Manners alone beam dignity on all.
Without their influence, palaces are cells;
Crane-court*, a magazine of cockle-shells;
The solemn bench no bosom strikes with awe,
But Westminster's a warehouse of the law.

These honest truths, my lord, deny you can;
Since all allow that 'Manners make the man.'
Hence only glories to the great belong,
Or peers must mingle with the peasant throng.

Though strung with ribbands, yet behold his grace

Shines but a lacquey in a higher place!
Strip the gay liv'ry from the courtier's back,
What marks the difference 'twixt my lord and jack?
The same mean, supple, mercenary knave,
The tool of power, and of state the slave:
Alike the vassal heart in each prevails,
And all his lordship boasts is larger vales.

Wealth, manors, titles, may descend, 'tis true;
But ev'ry heir must merit's claim renew.

Who blushes not to see a C—— heir
Turn slave to sound, and languish for a play'r †?
What piping, fidling, squeaking, quav'ring, bawl-
ing!

What sing-long riot, and what eunuch-squawling!
C——, thy worth all Italy shall own,
A statesman fit, where Nero ‡ fill'd the throne.

See poor Lævinus, anxious for renown,
Through the long gallery trace his lineage down,
And claim each hero's visage for his own. }
What though in each the self-same features shine,
Unless some lineal virtue marks the line,
In vain, alas! he boasts his grandfire's name,
Or hopes to borrow lustre from his fame.
Who but must smile, to see the tim'rous peer
Point 'mong his race our bulwark in the war?
Or in sad English tell how senates hung
On the sweet music of his father's tongue?
Unconscious, though his fires were wise and brave,
Their virtues only find in him a grave.

Not so with Stanhope ||; see by him sustain'd
Each hoary honour which his fires had gain'd.
To him the virtues of his race appear
The precious portion of five hundred year;
Descended down, by him to be enjoy'd,
Yet holds the talent lost, if unemploy'd.
From hence behold his gen'rous ardour rise,
To swell the sacred stream with fresh supplies:

Abroad, the guardian of his country's cause;
At home, a Tully to defend her laws.

And bold corruption almost drops the bribe.
Thus added worth to worth, and grace to grace,
He beams new glories back upon his race.

Ask ye, what's honour? I'll the truth impart.
Know, honour, then, is honesty of heart.
To the sweet scenes of social Stow* repair,
And search the master's breast,—You'll find it
there.

Too proud to grace the sycophant or slave,
It only harbours with the wise and brave;
Ungain'd by titles, places, wealth, or birth;
Learn this, and learn to blush, ye sons of earth!
Blush to behold this ray of nature made
The victim of a ribband, or cockade.

Ask the proud peer, what's honour? he displays
A purchas'd patent, or the herald's blaze;
Or, if the royal smile his hopes has blest,
Points to the glitt'ring glory on his breast:
Yet, if beneath no real virtue reign,
On the gay coat the star is but a stain:
For I could whisper in his lordship's ear,
Worth only beams true radiance on the star.

Hence see the garter'd glory dart its rays,
And shine round E—— with redoubled blaze:
Ask ye from whence this flood of lustre's seen?
Why E—— whispers, votes, and saw Turin.

Long Milo reign'd the minion of renown;
Loud his eulogiums echo'd through the town:
Where'er he went, still crowds around him throng,

And hail'd the patriot as he pass'd along.
See the lost peer, unhonour'd now by all,
Steal through the street, or skulk along the mall;
Applauding sounds no more salute his ear,
But the loud Pæan's sunk into a sneer.

Whence, you'll inquire, could spring a change
so sad?

Why, the poor man ran military mad;
By this mistaken maxim still misled,
That men of honour must be cloth'd in red.
My grandfire wore it, Milo cries—'tis good:
But know, the grandfire stain'd it red with blood.
First 'midst the deathful dangers of the field,
He shone his country's guardian, and its shield;
Taught Danube's stream with Gallic gore to
flow;

Hence bloom'd the laurel on the grandfire's brow
But shall the son expect the wreath to wear,
For the mock triumphs of an Hyde-Park war?
Sooner shall Bunhill, Blenheim's glories claim,
Or Biller's rival brave Eugene in fame;
Sooner a like reward their labours crown,
Who storm a dunghill, and who sack a town.

Mark our bright youths, how gallant and how
gay,

Fresh plum'd and powder'd in review array.
Unspoil'd each feature by the martial scarf,
Lo! A—— assumes the god of war:
Yet vain, while prompt to arms by plume and pay,
He claims the foldier's name from foldier's play.

This truth, my warrior, treasure in thy breast,

There are who say, "You lash the sins of men!
"Leave, leave to Pope the poignance of the pen;
"Hope not the bays shall wreath around thy
"head;

"Fannius may write, but Flaccus will be read."
Shall only one have privilege to blame!
What then, are vice and folly royal game?
Must all be poachers who attempt to kill?
All, but the mighty sovereign of the quill?
Shall Pope, alone, the plenteous harvest have,
And I not glean one straggling fool, or knave?
Praise, 'tis allow'd, is free to all mankind;
Say, why should honest satire be confin'd?
Though, like th' immortal bard's, my feeble dart
Stains not its feather in the culprit heart;
Yet know, the smallest insect of the wing
The horse may teaze, or elephant can sting;
Ev'n I, by chance, some lucky darts may show'r,
And gall some great leviathans of pow'r.

I name not Walpole; you the reason guess;
Mark yon fell harpy hov'ring o'er the press.

Or special juries, judges of his wit?

To beard the lion, and to crush the mite.
Safe may he dash the statesman in each line;
Those dread his satire, who dare punish mine.

Turn, turn your satire then, you cry, to praise,
Why, praise is satire, in these sinful days.
Say, should I make a patriot of Sir Bill,
Or swear that G——'s Duke has wit at will;
From the gull'd knight could I expect a place,
Or hope to lie a dinner from his grace,
Though a reward be graciously bestow'd
On the soft satire of each birth-day ode?

The good and bad alike with praise are blest;
Yet those who merit most, still want it least:
But conscious vice still courts the cheering ray,
While virtue shines, nor asks the glare of day.
Need I to any, Pult'ney's worth declare?
Or tell him Carteret charms, who has an ear?
Or, Pitt, can thy example be unknown,
While each fond father marks it to his son?

I cannot truckle to a slave in state,
And praise a blockhead's wit, because he's great:
Down, down, ye hungry garretteers, descend,

Behold the genial ray of gold appear,
And rouse, ye swarms of Grub-street and Rag-
fair.

THE GYMNASIAD: OR, BOXING-MATCH,

A very short, but very curious Epic Poem. With the Prolegmena of Scriblerus Tertius, and Notes variorum.

"— Nos hæc novimus esse nihil." MART.

TO THE MOST PUISSANT AND INVINCIBLE
MR. JOHN BROUGHTON.

HAD this dedication been addressed to some reverend prelate, or female court-favourite, to some blundering statesman, or apostate patriot, I should doubtless have launched into the highest encomiums on public spirit, policy, virtue, piety, &c.
and, like the rest of my brother dedicators, had most successfully imposed on their vanity, by ascribing to them qualities they were utterly unacquainted with, by which means I had prudently reaped the reward of a panegyrist from my patron, and, at the same time, secured the reputation of a satirist with the public.

But scorning these base arts, I present the following poem to you, unswayed by either flattery or interest; since your modesty would defend you against the poison of the one, and your known economy prevent an author's expectations of the other. I shall therefore only tell you what you really are, and leave those (whose patrons are of the higher class) to tell them what they really are not. But such is the depravity of human nature, that every compliment we bestow on another, is too apt to be deemed a satire on ourselves: yet, surely, while I am praising the strength of your arm, no politician can think it meant as a reflection on the weakness of his head; or, while I am justifying your title to the character of a man, will any modern petit maître think it an impeachment of his affinity to that of its mimic counterfeit, a monkey?

Were I to attempt a description of your qualifications, I might justly have recourse to the majesty of Agamemnon, the courage of Achilles, the strength of Ajax, and the wisdom of Ulysses; but,
as your own heroic actions afford us the best mirror of your merits, I shall leave the reader to view in that the amazing lustre of a character, a few traits of which only the following poem was intended to display; and in which, had the ability of the poet equalled the magnanimity of his hero,
I doubt not but the Gymnasiad had, like the immortal Iliad, been handed down to the admiration of all posterity.

As your superior merits contributed towards raising you to the dignities you now enjoy, and placed you even as the safeguard of royalty itself,
so I cannot help thinking it happy for the prince, that he is now able to boast one real champion in his service: and what Frenchman would not tremble more at the puissant arm of a Broughton, than at the ceremonious gauntlet of a Dimmock?

I am, with the most profound respect to your heroic virtues, your most devoted, and most humble servant.

SCRIBLERUS TERTIUS OF THE POEM.

It is an old saying, that necessity is the mother of invention: it should seem then that poetry, which is a species of invention, must naturally derive its being from the same origin; hence it will be easy to account for the many flimsy ghost-like apparitions that every day make their appearance among us; for if it be true, as naturalists observe, that the health and vigour of the mother is necessary to produce the like qualities in the child, what issue can be expected from the womb of so meagre
a parent?

But there is another species of poetry, which,
instead of owing its birth to the belly, like Minerva, springs at once from the head: of this kind are those productions of wit, sense, and spirit, which once born, like the goddess herself, immediately become immortal. It is true, these are a sort of miraculous births, and therefore it is no wonder they should be found so rare among us.—As glory is the noble inspirer of the latter, so hunger is the natural incentive of the former: thus fame and food are the spurs with which every poet mounts his Pegasus; but, as the impetus of the belly is apt to be more cogent than that of the head, so you will ever see the one pricking and goading a tired jade to a hobbling trot, while the other only incites the foaming steed to a majestic capriol.

The gentle reader, it is apprehended, will not long be at a loss to determine, which species the following production ought to be ranked under;
but as the parent most unnaturally cast it out as the spurious issue of his brain, and even cruelly denies it the common privilege of his name; struck with the delectable beauty of its features, I could not avoid adopting the little poetic orphan, and by dressing it up with a few notes, &c. present it to the public as perfect as possible.

Had I, in imitation of other great authors, only consulted my interest in the publication of this inimitable piece (which doubtless will undergo numerous impressions), I might first have sent it into the world naked, then, by the addition of a commentary, notes variorum, prolegomena, and all that, levied a new tax upon the public, and, after all, by a sort of modern poetical legerdemain, changing the name of the principal hero, and in-serting a few hypercriticisms of a flattering friend's, have rendered the former editions incorrect, and cozened the curious reader out of a treble confi-deration for the same work; but however this may suit the tricking arts of a bookseller, it is certainly much below the sublime genius of an author.—I know it will be said, that a man has an equal right to make as much as he can of his wit, as well as of his money: but then it ought to be considered, whether there may not be such a

* The father of George the Third.

thing as usury in both; and the law having only provided against it in one instance, is, I apprehend, no very moral plea for the practice of it in the other.

The judicious reader will easily perceive, that the following poem, in all its properties, partakes of the epic; such as fighting, speaking, bullying, ranting, &c. (to say nothing of the moral); and, as many thousand verses are thought necessary to the construction of this kind of poem, it may be objected, that this is too short to be ranked under that class: to which I shall only answer, that as conciseness is the last fault a writer is apt to commit, so it is generally the first a reader is willing to forgive; and though it may not be altogether so long, yet I dare say, it will not be found less replete with the true vis poetica, than (not to mention the Iliad, Æneid, &c.) even Leonidas itself.

It may farther be objected, that the characters of our principal heroes are too humble for the grandeur of the epic fable; but the candid reader will be pleased to observe, that they are not here celebrated in their mechanic, but in their heroic capacities, as boxers, who, by the ancients themselves, have ever been esteemed worthy to be immortalized in the noblest works of this nature; of which the Epæus and Euryalus of Homer, and the Entellus and Dares of Virgil, are incontestable authorities. And as those authors were ever careful, that their principal personages (however mean in themselves) should derive their pedigree from some deity, or illustrious hero, so our author has, with equal propriety, made his spring from Phæton and Neptune; under which characters he beautifully allegorizes their different occupations of waterman and coachman.—But, for my own part, I cannot conceive that the dignity of the hero's profession is anywise essential to that of the action; for, if the greatest persons are guilty of the meanest actions, why may not the greatest actions be ascribed to the meanest persons?

As the main action of this poem is entirely supported by the principal heroes themselves, it has been maliciously insinuated to be designed, as an unmannerly reflection on a late glorious victory, where, it is pretended, the whole action was achieved without the interposition of the principal heroes at all.—But as the most innocent meanings

* As this may be thought to be particularly aimed at an author who was lately reported to be dead, and whose loss all lovers of the muses would have the greatest reason to lament: it may not be improper to assure the reader, that it was written, and intended to have been published, before that report, and was only meant as an attack upon the general abuse of this kind.—As to our author himself, he has frequently given public testimonies of his veneration for that great man's genius; nor may it be unentertaining to the reader, to acquaint him with one private instance: Immediately on hearing the report of Mr. Pope's death, he was heard to break forth in the following exclamation.

Pope dead!—Hush, hush, report, the scandalous
lye;

Fame says he lives—immortals never die.

may, by ill minds, be wrested to the most wicked purposes, if any such construction should be made, I will venture to affirm, that it must proceed from the factious venom of the reader, and not from any disloyal malignity in our author, who is too well acquainted with the power, ever to arraign the purity of government: besides, the poignance of the sword is too prevalent for that of the pen; and who, when there are at present so many thousand unanswerable standing arguments ready to defend, would ever be Quixote enough to attack, either the omnipotence of a prince, or the omniscience of his ministers?

Were I to attempt an analysis of this poem, I could demonstrate that it contains (as much as a piece of so sublime a nature will admit of) all those true standards of wit, humour, raillery, satire, and ridicule, which a late writer has so marvelously discovered, and might, on the part of our author, say with that profound critic—Facta est Alea: but as the obscurity of a beauty too strongly argues the want of one, so an endeavour to elucidate the merits of the following performance, might be apt to give the reader a disadvantageous impression against it, as it might tacitly imply they were too mysterious to come within the compass of his comprehension. I shall therefore leave them to his more curious observation, and bid him heartily farewell—Legere et delectare.

SCRIBLERUS TERTIUS.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE invocation, the proposition, the night before the battle described; the morning opens, and discovers the multitude hastening to the place of action; their various professions, dignities, &c. illustrated; the spectators being seated, the youthful combatants are first introduced; their manner of fighting displayed; to these succeed the champions of a higher degree; their superior abilities marked, some of the most eminent particularly celebrated; meanwhile, the principal heroes are represented sitting, and ruminating on the approaching combat, when the herald summons them to the lists.

SING, sing, O muse! the dire contested fray,
And bloody honours of that dreadful day;
When Phæton's bold son (tremendous name)!
Dar'd Neptune's offspring to the lists of fame.

Ver. 3, 4. It is usual for poets to call the sons after the names of their fathers; as Agamemnon the son of Atreus, and Achilles the son of Peleus, are frequently termed Pelides and Atreides. Our author would doubtless have followed this laudable example, but he found Broughtonides and Stephenonides, or their contractions, too unmusical for metre, and therefore, with wonderful art, adopts two poetical parents; which obviates the difficulty, and, at the same time, heightens the dignity of his heroes.

Bentleides.

What fury fraught thee with ambition's fire,
Ambition, equal foe to son and fire?
One, hapless fell by Jove's ethereal arms,
And one, the triton's mighty pow'r disarms.
Now all lay hush'd within the folds of night,
And saw, in painted dreams, th' important fight;
While hopes and fears alternate turn the scales, I
And now this hero, and now that prevails;
Blows, and imaginary blood survey,
Then waking, watch the flow approach of day;
When, lo! Aurora in her saffron vest
Darts a glad ray, and gilds the ruddy east.

Forth issuing now all ardent seek the place
Sacred to fame, and the Athletic race.
As from their hive the clust'ring squadrons pour
O'er fragrant meads, to sip the vernal flow'r; 20
So from each inn the legal swarms impel,
Of banded seers, and pupils of the quill.
Senates and shambles pour forth all their store,
Mindful of mutton, and of laws no more;
E'en money-bills, uncourtly, now must wait,
And the fat lamb has one more day to bleat.
The highway-knight now draws his pistol's load,
Rests his faint steed, and this day franks the road.

Ver. 6. It has been maintained by some philosophers, that the passions of the mind are in some measure hereditary, as well as the features of the body. According to this doctrine, our author very beautifully represents the frailty of ambition descending from father to son;—and as original sin may in some sort be accounted for on this system, it is very probable our author had a theological, as well as physical and moral meaning in this verse.

[For the latter part of this note, we are obliged to an eminent divine.]

Ver. 21. An ingenious critic of my acquaintance objected to this simile, and would by no means admit the comparison between bees and lawyers to be just: one, he said, was an industrious, harmless, and useful species, none of which properties could be affirmed of the other; and therefore he thought the drone, that lives on the plunder of the hive, a more proper archetype. I must confess myself in some measure inclined to subscribe my friend's opinion; but then we must consider, that our author did not intend to describe their qualities, but their number; and in this respect no one, I think, can have any objection to the propriety of the comparison.

Ver. 24. The original MS. has it bribes; but, as this might seem to cast an invidious aspersions on a certain assembly, remarkable for their abhorrence of venality; and, at the same time, might subject our publisher to some little inconveniences; I thought it prudent to soften the expression: besides, I think this reading renders our author's thought more natural; for, though we see the most trifling avocations are able to draw off their attention from the public utility, yet nothing is sufficient to divert a steady pursuit of their private emolument.

Ver. 28. Our poet here artfully insinuates the dignity of the combat he is about to celebrate, by its being able to prevail on a highwayman to lay

Bailiffs, in crowds, neglect the dormant writ,
And give another Sunday to the wit: 30
He, too, would hie, but ah, his fortunes frown!
Alas, the fatal passport's—half-a-crown
Shoals press on shoals, from palace and from cell;
Lords yield the court, and butchers Clerkenwell.
St. Giles's natives, never known to fail,
All who have haply 'scap'd th' obdurate jail;
There many a martial son of Tott'nham lies,
Bound in Deceilian bands, a sacrifice
To angry justice, nor must view the prize.

Assembled myriads crowd the circling seats, 40
High for the combat every bosom beats,
Each bosom partial for its hero bold,
Partial through friendship—or depending gold.
But first, the infant progeny of Mars
Join in the lists, and wage their pigmy wars;
Train'd to the manual fight, and bruiseful toil,
The stop defensive, and gymnastic foil,
With nimble fists their early prowess show,
And mark the future hero in each blow.

To these the hardy iron-race succeed, 50
All sons of Hockley and fierce Brick-street breed:
Mature in valour, and inur'd to blood,
Dauntless each foe in form terrific stood!
Their callous bodies, frequent in the fray,
Mock'd the fell stroke, nor to its force gave way.
'Mongst these Gloverius, not the last in fame,
And he whose clog delights the beautiful dame;

aside his business, to become a spectator of it—and as, on this occasion, he makes him forsake his daily bread, while the senator only neglects the business of the nation, it may be observed, how satirically he gives the preference, in point of disinterestedness, to the highwayman.

Ver. 37. The unwary reader may, from this passage, be apt to conclude, that an amphitheatre is little better than a nursery for the gallows, and that there is a sort of physical connection between boxing and thieving; but although boxing may be a useful ingredient in a thief, yet it does not necessarily make him one. Boxing is the effect, not the cause; and men are not thieves because they are boxers, but boxers because they are thieves. Thus tricking, lying, evasion, with several other such like cardinal virtues, are a sort of properties pertaining to the practice of the law, as well as to the mercurial profession. But would any one therefore infer, that every lawyer must be a thief?

Scholias.

Ver. 44. Our author, in this description, alludes to the Lusus Trojæ of Virgil, “Incedunt Paeri ——— “———Trojæ Juventus

“———Pugnæque ciunt simulachra sub armis.”

Ver. 51. Two famous athletic seminaries.

Ver. 57. Here we are presented with a laudable imitation of the ancient simplicity of manners; for, as Cincinnatus disdained not the homely employment of a ploughman, so we see our hero condescending to the humble occupation of a clogmaker; and this is the more to be admired, as it is one characteristic of modern heroism, to be either above or below any occupation at all,

Nor least thy praise, whose artificial light
In Dian's absence gilds the clouds of night.

While these the combat's direful arts display,
And share the bloody fortunes of the day, 61
Each hero sat, revolving in his soul
The various means that might his foe controul;
Conquest and glory each proud bosom warms,
When, lo! the herald summons them to arms.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

STEPHENSON enters the lists; a description of his figure; an encomium on his abilities, with respect to the character of coachman. Broughton advances; his reverend form described; his superior skill in the management of the lighter and wherry displayed; his triumph of the badge celebrated; his speech; his former victories recounted; the preparation for the combat, and the horror of the spectators *.

FIRST to the fight advanc'd the charioteer:
High hopes of glory on his brow appear,
Terror vindictive flashes from his eye
(To one the fates the visual ray deny);
Fierce glow'd his looks, which spoke his inward
rage;

He leaps the bar, and bounds upon the stage.
The roofs re-echo with exulting cries,
And all behold him with admiring eyes.
Ill-fated youth! what rash desires could warm
Thy manly heart, to dare the Triton's arm? 10
Ah! too unequal to these martial deeds,
Though none more skill'd to rule the foaming
floods.

The courfers, still obedient to thy rein,
Now urge their flight, or now their flight restrain.
Had mighty Diomed provok'd the race,
Thou far hadst left the Grecian in disgrace.

Ver. 58. Various and violent have been the controversies, whether our author here intended to celebrate a lamp-lighter or a link-boy; but as there are heroes of both capacities at present in the school of honour, it is difficult to determine whether the poet alludes to a Wells or a Buck-horse.

* It was doubtless in obedience to custom, and the example of other great poets, that our author has thought proper to prefix an argument to each book, being minded that nothing should be wanting in the usual paraphernalia of works of this kind.—For my own part, I am at a loss to account for the use of them, unless it be to swell a volume, or, like bills of fare, to advertise the reader what he is to expect; that, if it contains nothing likely to suit his taste, he may preserve his appetite for the next course.

Ver. 6, 7. See the descriptions of Dares in Virgil.

"Nec mora, continuo vastis cum viribus effort
"Ora Dares, magnoque virum se murmure tollit."

Where'er you drove, each inn confess'd your sway,
Maids brought the dram, and ostlers flew with hay.

But know, though skill'd to guide the rapid car,
None wages like thy foe the manual war. 20

Now Neptune's offspring dreadfully serene,
Of size gigantic, and tremendous mien,
Steps forth, and 'midst the fated lists appears;
Rev'rend his form, but yet not worn with years.
To him none equal, in his youthful day,
With feather'd oar to skim the liquid way; [ear,
Or through those streights whose waters stun the
The loaded lighter's bulky weight to steer.

Soon as the ring their ancient warrior view'd,
Joy fill'd their hearts, and thund'ring shouts en-
su'd; 30

Loud as when o'er Thamesis' gentle flood,
Superior with the Triton youths he row'd;
While far a-head his winged wherry flew, [due.
Touch'd the glad shore, and claim'd the badge its

Then thus indignant he accosts the foe,
(While high disdain sat prideful on his brow):
Long has the laurel-wreath victorious spread
Its sacred honours round this hoary head;
The prize of conquest in each doubtful fray,
And dear reward of many a dire-fought day. 40
Now youth's cold wane the vig'rous pulse has chas'd,

Froze all my blood, and ev'ry nerve unbrac'd;
Now, from these temples shall the spoils be torn,
In scornful triumph by my foe be worn?
What then avail my various deeds in arms,
If this proud crest thy feeble force disarms?
Lost be my glories to recording fame,
When, foil'd by thee, the coward blasts my name!
I who, e'er manhood my young joints had knit,
First taught the fierce Grettonius to submit; 50

Ver. 19. Here our author inculcates a fine moral, by showing how apt men are to mistake their talents; but were men only to act in their proper spheres, how often should we see the parson in the pew of the peasant, the author in the character of his hawker, or a beau in the livery of his footman! &c.

Ver. 34. A prize given by Mr. Dogget, to be annually contested on the first of August.—As, among the ancients, games and sports were celebrated on mournful as well as joyful events, there has been some controversy, whether our loyal comedian meant the compliment to the setting or rising monarch of that day; but, as the plate has a horse for its device, I am induced to impute it to the latter; and, doubtless, he prudently considered, that, as a living dog is better than a dead lion, the living horse had at least an equal title to the same preference.

Ver. 42. See Virgil.

"—Sed enim gelidus tardante senecta
"Sanguis hebet, frigentque effœta in corpore vires."

Ver. 50. Gretton, the most famous Athleta in his days, over whom our hero obtained his maiden prize.

While, drench'd in blood, he prostrate press'd the floor,

And inly groan'd the fatal words—no more.

Allenius too, who ev'ry heart dismay'd, [head;

Whose blows, like hail, flew rattling round the

Him oft the ring beheld with weeping eyes,

Stretch'd on the ground, reluctant yield the prize.

Then fell the swain, with whom none e'er could vie.

Where Harrow's steeple darts into the sky.

Next the bold youth a bleeding victim lay,

Whose waving curls the barber's art display. 60

You too this arm's tremendous prowess know;

Rash man, to make this arm again thy foe!

This said—the heroes for the fight prepare,

Brace their big limbs, and brawny bodies bare.

The sturdy sinews all aghast behold,

And ample shoulders of Atlean mould;

Like Titan's offspring, who 'gainst heaven strove,

So each, though mortal, seem'd a match for Jove.

Now round the ring a silent horror reigns,

Speechless each tongue, and bloodless all their

veins; 70

When, lo! the champions give the dreadful sign,

And hand in hand in friendly token join;

Those iron hands, which soon upon the foe

With giant force must deal the deathful blow.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

A DESCRIPTION of the battle; Stephenson is vanquished; the manner of his body being carried off by his friends; Broughton claims the prize, and takes his final leave of the stage.

FULL in the centre now they fix in form,
Eye meeting eye, and arm oppos'd to arm;

Ver. 53. Vulgarly known by the Plebeian name of Pipes, which a learned critic will have to be derived from the art and mystery of pipe-making, in which it is affirmed this hero was an adept.—As he was the delicium pugnacis generis, our author, with marvellous judgment, represents the ring weeping at his defeat.

Ver. 54. Virgil.

“ ——— quam multa grandine nimbi
“ Culminibus crepitant.” ———

Ver. 57. Jeoffrey Birch, who in several encounters served only to augment the number of our hero's triumphs.

Ver. 59. As this champion is still living, and even disputes the palm of manhood with our hero himself, I shall leave him to be the subject of immortality in some future Gymnasiad, should the superiority of his prowess ever justify his title to the corona pugnea.

Ver. 63. Virgil.

“ Hæc fatus, duplicem ex humeris rejecit amictum;
“ Et magnos membrorum artus, magna ossa lacer-“ tofque
“ Exuit.”

With wily feints each other now provoke,
And cautious meditate th' impending stroke.

Th' impatient youth, inspir'd by hopes of fame,

First sped his arm, unfaithful to its aim;

The wary warrior, watchful of his foe,

Bends back, and 'scapes the death-designing blow;

With erring glance it sounded by his ear,

And whizzing, spent its idle force in air. 10

Then quick advancing on th' unguarded head,

A dreadful show'r of thunderbolts he shed:

As when a whirlwind, from some cavern broke,

With furious blasts assaults the monarch oak,

This way and that its lofty top it bends,

And the fierce storm the crackling branches rends;

So wav'd the head, and now to left and right

Rebounding flies, and crash'd beneath the weight.

Like the young lion wounded by a dart,

Whose fury kindles at the galling smart; 20

The hero rouses with redoubled rage,

Flies on the foe, and foams upon the stage,

Now grappling, both in close contention join,

Legs lock in legs, and arms in arms entwine:

They sweat, they heave, each tugging nerve they

strain;

Both, fix'd as oaks, their sturdy trunks sustain.

At length the chief his wily art display'd,

Poiz'd on his hip the hapless youth he laid;

Aloft in air his quiv'ring limbs he throw'd,

Then on the ground down dash'd the pond'rous

load. 30

So some vast ruin on a mountain's brow,

Which tott'ring hangs, and dreadful nods below,

When the fierce tempest the foundation rends,

Whirl'd through the air with horrid crush descends.

Bold and undaunted up the hero rose,

Fiercer his bosom for the combat glows;

Shame stung his manly heart, and fiery rage

New steel'd each nerve, redoubled war to wage.

Ver. 7, 8. Virgil.

“ ——— ille ictum venientem a vertice velox
“ Prævidit, celerique elapsus corpore cessit.”

Ver. 10. Idem.

“ ——— vires in ventum effudit.” ———

Ver. 19. It may be observed, that our author has treated the reader but with one simile throughout the two foregoing books; but, in order to make him ample amends, has given him no less than six in this. Doubtless this was in imitation of Homer, and artfully intended to heighten the dignity of the main action, as well as our admiration, towards the conclusion of his work.—Finis coronat opus.

Ver. 24. Virgil.

“ Immiscentque manus manibus, pugnamque la-“ cessunt.”

Ver. 35. Virgil.

“ At non tardatus casu, neque territus heros,

“ Acrior ad pugnam redit, et vim suscitât ira

“ Tum pudor incendit vires ———.”

Swift to revenge the dire disgrace he flies,
 Again suspended on the hip he lies; 49
 Dash'd on the ground, again had fatal fell,
 Haply the barrier caught his flying heel;
 There fast it hung, th' imprison'd head gave way,
 And the strong arm defrauded of its prey.
 Vain strove the chief to whirl the mountain o'er;
 It slipt—he headlong rattles on the floor.
 Around the ring loud peals of thunder rise,
 And shouts exultant echo to the skies.

Uplifted now inanimate he seems,
 Forth from his nostrils gush the purple streams;
 Gasping for breath, and impotent of hand, 51
 The youth beheld his rival flagg'ring stand:
 But he, alas! had felt th' unnerving blow,
 And gaz'd, unable to assault the foe.
 As when two monarchs of the brindled breed
 Dispute the proud dominion of the mead,
 They fight, they foam, then weary'd in the fray,
 Aloof retreat, and low'ring stand at bay;
 So stood the heroes, and indignant-glar'd,
 While grim with blood their rueful fronts were smear'd; 60
 Till with returning strength new rage returns,
 Again their arms are steel'd, again each bosom
 burns.

Incessant now their hollow sides they pound,
 Loud on each breast the bounding bangs resound;
 Their flying fists around the temples glow,
 And the jaws crackle with the massy blow.

Ver. 42. Our author, like Homer himself, is no less to be admired in the character of an historian than in that of a poet: we see him here faithfully reciting the most minute incidents of the battle, and informing us, that the youthful hero, being on the lock, must again inevitably have come to the ground, had not his heel catch'd the bar; and that his antagonist, by the violence of his straining, slipt his arm over his head, and by that means received the fall he intended the enemy.—I thought it incumbent on me as a commentator to say thus much, to illustrate the meaning of our author, which might seem a little obscure to those who are unacquainted with conflicts of this kind.

Ver. 48. Virgil.

"It clamor cœlo——."

The learned reader will perceive our author's frequent allusions to Virgil; and whether he intended them as translations or imitations of the Roman poet, must give us pause: but as, in our modern productions, we find imitations are generally nothing more than bad translations, and translations nothing more than bad imitations; it would equally, I suppose, satisfy the gall of the critic, should these unluckily fall within either description.

Ver. 63. Virgil.

"Multa viri nequicquam inter se vulnera jactant:
 "Multa cavo lateri ingeminant, et pectore vastos
 "Dant sonitus, erratque aures et tempora circum
 "Crebra manus: duro crepitant sub vulnere
 "malæ."

The raging combat ev'ry eye appals,
 Strokes following strokes, and falls succeeding falls.
 Now droop'd the youth, yet, urging all his might,
 With feeble arm still vindicates the fight, 70
 Till on the part where heav'd the panting breath,
 A fatal blow impress'd the seal of death.
 Down dropt the hero, welt'ring in his gore,
 And his stretch'd limbs lay quiv'ring on the floor.
 So, when a falcon skims the airy way,
 Stoops from the clouds, and pounces on his prey,
 Dash'd on the earth the feather'd victim lies,
 Expands its feeble wings, and, flutt'ring, dies.
 His faithful friends their dying hero rear'd, 79
 O'er his broad shoulders dangling hung his head;
 Dragging its limbs, they bear the body forth,
 Mash'd teeth and clotted blood came issuing from his mouth.

Thus then the victor—O celestial pow'r!
 Who gave this arm to boast one triumph more;
 Now grey in glory, let my labours cease,
 My blood-stain'd laurel wed the branch of peace;
 Lur'd by the lustre of the golden prize,
 No more in combat this proud crest shall rise;
 To future heroes future deeds belong, 89
 Be mine the theme of some immortal song. [ring,
 This said—he seiz'd the prize, while round the High soar'd applause on acclamation's wing.

HONOUR.

A SATIRE, 1747.

"Primores populi arripuit populumque tributim;
 "Scilicet uni æquus virtuti atque ejus amicis." HOR.

"LOAD, load the pallet, boy!" hark! Hogarth
 "cries,

"Fast as I paint, fresh swarms of fools arise!

"Groups rise on groups, and mock the pencil's
 "pow'r,

"To catch each new-blown folly of the hour."

While hum'rous Hogarth paints each folly
 dead,

Shall vice triumphant rear its hydra head?

At satire's sov'reign nod disdain to shrink?

New reams of paper, and fresh floods of ink!

On then, my muse! Herculean labours dare,

And wage with virtue's foes eternal war;

Range through the town in search of ev'ry ill,

And cleanse th' Augean stable with thy quill.

"But what avails the poignance of the song,

"Since all, you cry, still persevere in wrong?

"Would courtly crimes to Mulgrave's muse
 "submit?

"Or blush'd the monarch though a Wilmot† writ?

Ver. 79. Virgil.

"Ast illum sidi æquales, genua ægra trahentem,

"Jactantemque utroque caput, crassumque cruorem

"Ore rejectantem, mistosque in sanguine dentes,

"Ducunt ad naves."——

Ver. 88. Idem.

"—— hic victor cæstus, artemque repono."

* Translator of Horace's Art of Poetry, and afterwards Duke of Buckingham.

† Earl of Rochester.

" Still pandar peers disgrac'd the rooms of state,
 " Still Cæsar's bed sustain'd a foreign weight;
 " Slaves worshipp'd still the golden calf of pow'r,
 " And bishops, bowing, blest'd the scarlet whore.
 " Shall then thy verse the guilty great reclaim,
 " Though fraught with Dryden's heav'n-descend-
 " ed flame? [store,
 " Will happy Heathcote, from his mould'ring
 " Drag forth one cheering drachma to the poor?
 " Or Harrington, unfaithful to the seal,
 " Throw in one suffrage for the public weal?
 " Pointless all satire, and misplac'd its aim,
 " To wound the bosom, that's obdur'd to shame:
 " The callous heart ne'er feels the goad within;
 " Few dread the censure, who can dare the sin,"
 " Though on the culprit's cheek no blush should
 glow,

Still let me mark him to mankind a foe:
 Strike but the deer, however slight the wound,
 It serves at least to drive him from the sound.
 Shall reptile sinners frowning justice fear,
 And pageant titles privilege the peer?
 So falls the humbler game in common fields,
 While the branch'd beast the royal forest shields.
 On, satire, then! pursue thy gen'rous plan,
 And wind the vice, regardless of the man.
 Rouse, rouse! th'ennobled herd for public sport,
 And hunt them through the covert of a court.

Just as the play'r the mimic portrait draws,
 All claim a right of censure or applause:
 What guards the place-man from an equal fate,
 Who mounts but actor on the stage of state?
 Subject alike to each man's praise and blame,
 Each critic voice the fiat of his fame;
 Though to the private some respect we pay,
 All public characters are public prey:
 Pelham and Garrick, let the verse forbear
 What sanctifies the treasurer or play'r.

Great in her laurell'd sages Athens see,
 Free flow'd her satire while her sons were free:
 Then purpled guilt was dragg'd to public shame,
 And each offence stood flagrant with a name;
 Polluted ermine no respect could win,
 No hallow'd lawn could sanctify a sin;
 'Till tyrant pow'r usurp'd a lawless rule:
 Then sacred grew the titled knave and fool;
 Then penal statutes aw'd the poignant song,
 And slaves were taught, that kings could do no
 wrong.

Guilt still is guilt, to me, in slave or king,
 Fetter'd in cells, or garter'd in the ring:
 And yet behold how various the reward,
 Wild falls a felon, Walpole mounts a lord!
 The little knave the law's last tribute pays,
 While crowns around the great one's chariot blaze.
 Blaze, meteors, blaze! to me is still the same
 The cart of justice, or the coach of shame.

Say, what's nobility, ye gilded train!
 Does nature give it, or can guilt sustain?
 Blooms the form fairer, if the birth be high?
 Or takes the vital stream a richer dye?

 Though the person here meant has indeed paid the debt of nature, yet, as he left that of justice unsatisfied,
 the author apprehends that the public are indisputably entitled to the assets of his reputation.*

What! though a long patrician line ye claim,
 Are noble souls entail'd upon a name?
 Anstis may ermine out the lordly earth,
 Virtue's the herald that proclaims its worth.

Hence mark the radiance of a Stanhope's star,
 And glow-worm glitter of thine, Dr:
 Ignoble splendour! that but shines to all,
 The humble badge of a court hospital.
 Let lofty Lr wave his nodding plume,
 Boast all the blushing honours of the loom,
 Resplendant bondage no regard can bring,
 'Tis Methuen's heart must dignify the string.

Vice levels all, however high or low;
 And all the diff'rence but consists in show.
 Who asks an alms, or supplicates a place,
 Alike is beggar, though in rags or lace:
 Alike his country's scandal and its curse,
 Who vends a vote, or who purloins a purse;
 Thy gamblers, Bridewell, and St. James's bites,
 The rooks of Mordington's, and sharks at White's.

" Why will you urge, Eugenio cries, your fate?
 " Affords the town no sins but sins of state?
 " Perches vice only on the court's high hill?
 " Or yields life's vale no quarry for the quill?"
 Manners, like fashions, still from courts descend,
 And what the great begin, the vulgar end.
 If vicious then the mode, correct it here;
 He saves the peasant, who reforms the peer.
 What Hounslow knight would stray from ho-
 nour's path,

If guided by a brother of the Bath?
 Honour's a mistress all mankind pursue;
 Yet most mistake the false one for the true:
 Lur'd by the trappings, dazzled by the paint,
 We worship oft the idol for the saint.
 Courted by all, by few the fair is won;
 Those lose who seek her, and those gain who shun
 Naked she flies to merit in distress,
 And leaves to courts the garnish of her dress.

The million'd merchant seeks her in his gold;
 In schools the pedant, and in camps the bold:
 The courtier views her, with admiring eyes,
 Flutter in ribbons, or in titles rise:
 Sir Epicene enjoys her in his plume;
 Mead, in the learned wainscot of a room:
 By various ways all woo the modest maid;
 Yet lose the substance, grasping at the shade.

Who, smiling, sees not with what various strife

Man blindly runs the giddy maze of life?
 To the same end still diff'rent means employs;
 This builds a church, a temple that destroys;
 Both anxious to obtain a deathless name,
 Yet, erring, both mistake report for fame.

Report, though vulture-like the name it bear,
 Drags but the carrion carcass through the air;
 While fame, Jove's nobler bird, superior flies,
 And, soaring, mounts the mortal to the skies.
 So Richard's * name to distant ages borne,
 Unhappy Richard still is Britain's scorn:
 Be Edward's waisted on fame's eagle wing,
 Each patriot mourns the long-departed king;
 Yet thine, O Edward! shall to George's † yield,
 And Dettingen eclipse a Cressy's field.

* Richard the Second. † George the Second.

Through life's wild ocean, who would safely
 roam,
 And bring the golden fleece of glory home,
 Must, heedful, shun the barking Scylla's roar,
 And fell Charybdis' all-devouring shore;
 With steady helm an equal course support,
 'Twixt faction's rocks, and quicksands of a court;
 By virtue's beacon still direct his aim,
 Through honour's channel, to the port of fame.
 Yet, on this sea, how all mankind are tost!
 For one that's sav'd, what multitudes are lost!
 Misguided by ambition's treach'rous light,
 Through want of skill, few make the harbour
 right. [same,

Hence mark what wrecks of virtue, friendship,
 For four dead letters added to a name!
 Whence dwells such syren music in a word,
 Or sounds not Brutus noble as my lord.
 Though crownets, Pult'ney, blazon on thy plate,
 Adds the base mark one scruple to its weight?
 Though sounds patrician swell thy name, O Sandys!
 Stretches one acre thy Plebeian lands?
 Say, the proud title meant to plume the son,
 Why gain by guilt, what virtue might have won?
 Vain shall the son his herald honours trace,
 Whose parent peers but patriot in disgrace.

Vain, on the solemn head of hoary age,
 Totters the mitre, if ambition's rage
 To mammon pow'r the hallow'd heart incline,
 And titles only mark the priest divine.
 Blest race! to whom the golden age remains,
 Ease without care, and plenty without pains:
 For you the earth unlabour'd treasure yields,
 And the rich sheaves spontaneous crown the fields;
 No toilsome dews pollute the rev'rend brow,
 Each holy hand unhardened by the plough;
 Still burst the sacred garner with their store,
 And flails, unceasing, thunder on the floor.

O bounteous heav'n! yet heav'n how seldom shares
 The titheful tribute of the prelate's pray'rs!
 Lost to the stall, in senates still they nod,
 And all the monarch steals them from the god:
 Thy praises, Brunswick, every breast inspire,
 The throne their altar, and the court their choir;
 Here earliest incense they devoutly bring,
 Here everlasting hallelujahs sing:
 Thou! only thou! almighty to—translate,
 Thou their great golden deity of state

Who seeks on merit's stock to graft success,
 In vain invokes the ray of pow'r to bless;
 The stem, too stubborn for the courtly soil,
 With barren branches mocks the virtuous toil.
 More pliant plants the royal regions suit,
 Where knowledge still is held forbidden fruit;
 'Tis these alone the kindly nurture share,
 And all Hesperia's golden treasures bear.

Let folly still be fortune's fondling heir,
 And science meet a step-dame in the fair.
 Let courts, like fortune, disinherit sense,
 And take the idiot charge from Providence.
 The idiot head the cap and beads may fit,
 But how disguise a Lyttleton and Pitt! [hope,

O! once lov'd youths! Britannia's blooming
 Fair freedom's twins, and once the theme of Pope;

What wond'ring senates on your accents hung,
 Ere flatt'ry's poison chill'd the patriot tongue!
 Rome's sacred thunder awes no more the ear;
 But Pelham smiles, who trembled once to hear.
 Say, whence this change? less galling is the chain,

Though Walpole, Carteret, or a Pelham reign?
 If senates still the pois'nous bane imbibe,
 And every palm grows callous with the bribe;
 If sev'n long years mature the venal voice,
 While freedom mourns her long-defrauded choice;
 If justice waves o'er fraud a lenient hand,
 And the red locust rages through the land.

Sunk in these bonds, to Britain what avails,
 Who wields her sword, or balances her scales?
 Veer round the compass, change to change succeed,
 By every son the mother now must bleed:
 Vain all her hosts, on foreign shores array'd,
 Though lost by Wentworth, or preserv'd by Wade.
 Fleets, once which spread through distant worlds
 her name!

Now ride inglorious trophies of her shame*;
 While fading laurels shade her drooping head,
 And mark her Burleighs, Blakes, and Marlbro's
 dead!

Such were thy sons, O happy isle! of old,
 In counsel prudent, and in action bold:
 Now view a Pelham puzzling o'er thy fate,
 Lost in the maze of a perplex'd debate;
 And sage Newcastle, with fraternal skill,
 Guard the nice conduct of a nation's quill:
 See truncheons trembling in the coward hand,
 Though bold rebellion half subdued the land;
 While ocean's God, indignant, wrests again
 The long-deputed trident of the main†.

Sleep our last heroes in the silent tomb?
 Why spring no future worthies from the womb?
 Not nature sure, since nature's still the same,
 But education bars the road to fame.
 Who hopes for wisdom's crop, must till the soul,
 And virtue's early lesson should controul:
 To the young breast who valour would impart,
 Must plant it by example in the heart.

Ere Britain fell to mimic modes a prey,
 And took the foreign polish of our day,
 Train'd to the martial labours of the field,
 Our youth were taught the massy spear to wield;

In halcyon peace, beneath whose downy wings
 The merchant smiles, and lab'ring peasant sings,
 With civil arts to guard their country's cause,
 Direct her counsels, and defend her laws:
 Hence a long race of ancient worthies rose,
 Adorn'd the land, and triumph'd o'er our foes.

* Alluding to the ever memorable No-fight in the Mediterranean: As the nation was unluckily the only victim on that occasion, the lenity of our Aquarian Jurisdiction has, I think, evidently proved, that a court-martial and a martial-court are by no means synonymous terms.

† The reader will readily conclude these lines were written before our worthy Admirals Anson and Warren had so eminently distinguished themselves in the service of their country.

Ye sacred shades! who through th' Elysian
grove,
With Rome's fam'd chiefs, and Grecian sages rove,
Blush to behold what arts your offspring grace!
Each sopping heir now marks his sire's disgrace;
An embryo breed! of such a doubtful frame,
You scarce could know the sex but by the name:
Fraught with the native follies of his home,
Torn from the nurse, the babe of mirth must
roam;

Through foreign climes exotic vice explore,
And cull each weed, regardless of the flow'r,
Proud of thy spoils, O Italy and France!
The soft enervate strain, and cap'ring dance:
From Sequan's streams, and winding banks of Po,
He comes, ye gods! an all-accomplish'd beau!
Unhumaniz'd in dress, with cheek so wan!
He mocks God's image in the mimic man;
Great judge of arts! o'er toilettes now presides,
Corrects our fashions, or an opera guides;
From tyrant Handel rends th' imperial bay,
And guards the Magna Charta of—Sol-fa.

Sick of a land where virtue dwells no more,
See liberty prepar'd to quit our shore!
Pruning her pinions, on yon beacon'd height
The goddess stands, and meditates her flight;
Now spreads her wings, unwilling yet to fly,
Again o'er Britain casts a pitying eye:
Lothe to depart, methinks I hear her say,
“Why urge me thus, ungrateful isle, away!
“For you, I left Achaia's happy plains,
“For you, resign'd my Romans to their chains;
“Here fondly fix'd my last lov'd favourite seat,
“And 'midst the mighty nations made thee great:
“Why urge me then, ungrateful isle, away!”
Again she, sighing, says, or seems to say.

O Stanhope! skill'd in ev'ry moving art,
That charms the ear, or captivates the heart!
Be your's the task, the goddess to retain,
And call her parent virtue back again;
Improve your pow'r a sinking land to save,
And vindicate the servant from the slave:
O! teach the vassal courtier how to share
The royal favour with the public pray'r:
Like Latium's genius † stem thy country's doom,
And, though a Caesar smile, remember Rome;
With all the patriot dignify the place,
And prove at least one statesman may have grace.

AN EPISTLE

TO DOCTOR THOMPSON, 1755.

“Sed quia mente minus validus, quam corpore toto,
“Nil audire velim, nil discere, quod levet ægrum,
“Fidis offender medicis” ————— HOR.

PREFACE.

THE reader will perceive, from two or three passages in the following epistle, that it was written some time since; nor indeed would the whole of it have now been thought interesting enough to the public, to have passed the press, had not

* Earl of Chesterfield.

† Brutus.

the physical persecution, carried on against the gentleman * to whom it is addressed, provoked the publication. When a body of men, too proud to own their errors, and too prudent to part with their fees, shall (with their legions of understrap-pers) enter into a conspiracy against a brother-practitioner, only for honestly endeavouring to moderate the one, and rectify the other; such a body, our author apprehends, becomes a justifiable object of satire; and only wishes his pen had, on this occasion, a like killing efficacy with theirs.

WHY do you ask, “that in this courtly dance,
“Of in and out, it ne'er was yet my chance,
“To bask beneath a statesman's soft'ring smile,
“And share the plunder of the public spoil?”
E'er wants my table the health-cheering meal,
With Banstead mutton crown'd, or Essex veal?
Smokes not from Lincoln meads the stately loin,
Or rosy gammon of Hantonian swine?
From Darkin's roosts the feather'd victims bleed,
And Thames still wafts me ocean's scaly breed.
Though Gallia's vines their costly juice deny,
Still Tajo's † banks the jocund glass supply;
Still distant worlds nectareous treasures roll,
And either India sparkles in my bowl.
Or Devon's boughs, or Dorset's bearded fields,
To Britain's arms a British beverage yields.

Rich in these gifts, why should I wish for more?
Why barter conscience for superfluous store?
Or haunt the levee of a purse-proud peer,
To rob poor Fielding of the curule chair ‡?
Let the lean bard, whose belly void of bread,
Puffs up pierian vapours to his head,

* The celebrated Dr Thompson was one of the physicians to Frederick Prince of Wales, in that disorder which ended his life. Upon that occasion, the doctor differed from all the physicians that attended his Highness, which brought upon him their most virulent rage and indignation; for the Prince dying, the world was inclined to favour Doctor Thompson's recommendations.
He was an intimate friend of P Whitehead, and a favourite with him at the Prince's court. He was a man of a peculiar character; but learned, singular, and ingenious.

SIL. xvi. 559.

‡ It is reported, that during the time Mr. Addison was secretary of state when his old friend and ally Ambrose Phillips applied to him for some preferment, the great man very coolly answered, that “He thought he “had a ready provided for him, by making him justice
“for Westminster” To which the bard, with some indignation, replied, “Though poetry was a trade he “could not live by, yet he scorned to owe his subsistence
“to another, which he ought not to live by.”—However great men, in our days, may practise the secretary's prudence, certain it is, the person here pointed at was very far from making a precedent of his brother poet's principles.

In birth-day odes his flimsy fustian vent,
 And torture truth into a compliment;
 Wear out the knocker of a great-man's door,
 Be pimp and poet, furnish rhyme or whore;
 Or fetch and carry for some foolish lord,
 To sneak—a sitting footman at his board.
 If such the arts that captivate the great,
 Be yours, ye bards! the sun-shine of a state;
 For place or pension prostitute each line;
 Make gods of kings, and ministers divine;
 Swear St. John's self could neither read nor write,
 And Cumberland * out bravoës Mars in fight;
 Call Dorset patriot, Willes † a legal tool,
 Horace ‡ a wit, and Dodington a fool.
 Such be your venal task; whilst, blest with ease,
 'Tis mine, to scribble when, and what I please.

“ Hold! what you please? (Sir Dudley cries)

“ my friend,

“ Say, must my labours never, never end?
 “ Still doom'd 'gainst wicked wit my pen to draw,
 “ Correct each bard by critic rules of law;
 “ 'Twixt guilt and shame the legal buckler place,
 “ And guard each courtly culprit from disgrace?

AN OCCASIONAL SONG,

As performed by Mr. Beard, in the Character of a Recruiting Serjeant, at the Theatre-Royal in Covent-Garden, in the Entertainment of "The Fair."

In story we're told
 How our monarchs of old
 O'er France spread their royal domain;
 But no annals shall show
 Her pride laid so low,
 As when brave George the Second did reign,
 Brave boys!
 As when brave, &c.

Of Roman and Greek
 Let fame no more speak;
 Though their arms did the old world subdue,
 Through the nations around
 Let her trumpet now sound,
 How Britons have conquer'd the new,
 Brave boys!
 How Britons have, &c.

East, west, north, and south,
 Our cannons loud mouth
 Shall the rights of our monarch maintain;
 On America's strand
 Amherst limits the land,
 Boscowen gives law on the main,
 Brave boys!
 Boscowen gives, &c.

Each fort and each town,
 We still make our own,
 Cape Breton, Crown Point, Niagar;
 Guardelupe, Senegal,
 And Quebec's mighty fall,
 Shall prove we've no equal in war,
 Brave boys!
 Shall prove we've, &c.

"Liberâ si pretio quantôvis otia vendam,
 "Cui non insanus videar? Sed apertius audi:
 "Quæ juvenem, infirmumque animi captare ne-
 "quibant,
 "Illa senem capiant? aut quæ terrere pericla
 "Possè putes hominem, cui climactericus annus
 "Præsidio est omni majus? cui vita videtur
 "Haud equidem tanti esse, ut quid caveatve
 "petatve—
 "A regni satrapis, ullaque sit anxius horâ.
 "Si mihi non dextram tetigisse, aut limina regum
 "Contigit, & lare sub tenui mea canuit ætas:
 "Attamen æquo animo, non ullis rebus egenus,
 "Non in honoratus vixi: Neque gratius usquam
 "Dii munus dederunt, cui si favisse fatentur."

Though Conflans did boast
 He would conquer our coast,
 Our thunder soon made Monsieur mute;
 Brave Hawke wing'd his way,
 Then pounc'd on his prey,
 And gave him an English salute,
 Brave boys!
 And gave him, &c.

At Minden you know
 How we frighten'd the foe,
 While homeward their army now steals,
 "Though," they cry, "British bands
 "Are too hard for our hands,
 "Begar! we can beat them in heels,
 Parbleu!
 Begar! we, &c.

Whilst our heroes from home
 For laurels thus roam,
 Should the flat-bottom'd boats but appear,
 Our militia shall show
 No wooden-shoed foe
 Can with freemen in battle compare,
 Brave boys!
 Can with freemen, &c.

Your fortunes and lives,
 Your children and wives,
 To defend, 'tis the time now or never:
 Then let each volunteer
 To the drum-head repair—
 King George and old England for ever!
 Brave boys!
 King George, &c.

CHORUS.

With the sports of the field there's no pleasure can vie, [cry.
 While jocund we follow the hounds in full
 Let the drudge of the town make riches his sport;
 The slave of the state hunt the smiles of a court:
 No care and ambition our pastime annoy,
 But innocence still gives a zest to our joy.

With the sports, &c.

Mankind are all hunters in various degree;
 The priest hunts a living—the lawyer a fee,
 The doctor a patient—the courtier a place,
 Though often, like us, he's flung out in the chase.
 With the sports, &c.
 The cit hunts a plumb—while the soldier hunts
 fame,
 The poet a dinner—the patriot a name;

And the practis'd coquette, though she seems to refuse,
In spite of her airs, still her lover pursues.

With the sports, &c.

Let the bold and the busy hunt glory and wealth;
All the blessing we ask is the blessing of health,
With hound and with horn through the woodlands to roam,

And, when tired abroad, find contentment at home.
With the sports of the field there's no pleasure
can vie,

While jocund we fellow our hounds in full cry.

BALLAD.

LONG, Roger in vain

Strove Cic'ley to gain,

And that something he wanted she knew;

Yet still she reply'd,

First make me your bride,

Or—I wish I may die if I do.

Quoth Roger, next fair

I'll deck out your hair

With a top-knot, green, yellow, or blue.

No top-knot, pray, bring

Without the gold ring,

Or—I wish I may die if I do.

Together one day,

When making of hay,

Pretty Cis on a haycock he threw;

His hand did intrude;

She cry'd, don't be rude,

For—I wish I may die if I do.

But Roger still prest

Her lips and her breast,

Until kinder and kinder she grew:

A glance from her eye

He saw gave the lie

To—"I wish I may die if I do."

He knew what it meant,

Took looks for consent;

Then—a fairing presented to view,

Which Cis so amaz'd,

She sigh'd while she gaz'd—

Oh! I surely shall die—if I do.

You must fancy then what did ensue:
But she no more cry'd,

Cannot fail a young maid to subdue:
No knot you need bring;
Ne'er mind the gold ring,
For—I wish I may die if I do.

A FRAGMENT.

WHEN Bacchus, jolly god, invites
To revel in his ev'ning rites,
In vain his altars I surround,
Though with Burgundian incense crown'd:
No charm has wine without the lass;
'Tis love gives relish to the glass.

Whilst all around, with jocund glee,
In brimmers toast their fav'rite she;
Though ev'ry nymph my lips proclaim,
My heart still whispers Chloe's name;
And thus with me, by am'rous stealth,
Still ev'ry glass is Chloe's health.

VERSES

Occasioned by Lady Pomfret's Present of some Antique Statues to Oxford; the streets whereof were foolishly said to be paved with Jacobites.

If Oxford's stones, as Blaco writes,
And Pitt affirms, are Jacobites,
That bid the court defiance;
How must the danger now increase,
When stones are come from Rome and Greece,
To form a grand alliance!

Yet, sprung from lands of liberty,
These stones can sure no Tories be,
Or friends to the Pretender;
And Pitt himself can ne'er devise,
That Whiggish stones should ever rise
Against our faith's Defender.

TO DR. KING.

THE BUTTERFLY AND BEE.

TO FLAVIA.

SEE! Flavia, see! that flutt'ring thing,
Skim round yon' flower with sportive wing,
Yet ne'er its sweet explore;
While, wiser, the industrious bee
Extracts the honey from the tree,
And hives the precious store.

So you, with coy, coquettish art,
Play wanton round your lover's heart,
Insensible and free:
Love's balmy blessing would you try,
No longer sport a butterfly,
But imitate the bee.

VERSES,

Dropt in Mr. Garrick's Temple of Shakspeare.

WHILE here to Shakspeare * Garrick pays
His tributary thanks and praise;
Invokes the animated stone,
To make the poet's mind his own;
That he each character may trace
With humour, dignity, and grace;
And mark, unerring mark, to men,
The rich creation of his pen;

Preferr'd the pray'r—the marble god
Methinks I see, assenting, nod,
And, pointing to his laurell'd brow,
Cry—"Half this wreath to you I owe:
"Lost to the stage, and lost to fame;
"Murder'd my scenes, scarce known my name;
"Sunk in oblivion and disgrace
"Among the common, scribbling race,
"Unnotic'd long thy Shakspeare lay,
"To dullness, and to time, a prey:
"But now I rise, I breathe, I live
"In you—my representative!
"Again the hero's breast I fire,
"Again the tender sigh inspire;
"Each side, again, with laughter shake,
"And teach the villain-heart to quake;
"All this, my son! again I do—
"I?—No, my son!—'Tis I, and you."

While thus the grateful statue speaks,
A blush o'erspreads the suppliant's cheeks—
"What!—Half this wreath, wit's mighty chief?—
"O grant," he cries, "one single leaf;
"That far o'errepays his humble merit,
"Who's but the organ of thy spirit."
Phæbus the gen'rous contest heard—
When thus the god address'd the bard:
"Here, take this laurel from my brow,
"On him your mortal wreath bestow:—
"Each matchless, each the palm shall bear,
"In heav'n the bard, on earth the play'r.

 "Now know my pow'r," enrag'd, he said;
 Then levell'd at her heart:
 Full to the head the shaft he drew;
 But harmless to her breast it flew,
 For, lo!—'twas Dian's dart.
 Exulting, then the fair-one cry'd,
 "Fond urchin lay your bow aside;
 "Your quiver be unbound:
 "Would you Aurelia's heart subdue,
 "Thy plaything arrows ne'er will do;
 "Bid Damon give the wound."

DEATH AND THE DOCTOR.

'TWIXT death and Schomberg, t' other day,
 A contest did arise;
 Death swore his prize he'd bear away;
 The doctor, death defies.
 Enrag'd to hear his pow'r defy'd,
 Death drew his keenest dart;
 But wond'ring saw it glance aside,
 And miss the vital part.

AN OCCASIONAL PROLOGUE,

*Spoken by Mr. Powell, at the opening of the Theatre-
 Royal in Covent-Garden, on Monday, September
 14. 1767.*

As when the merchant, to increase his store,
 For dubious seas, advent'rous quits the shore;
 Still anxious for its freight, he trembling sees
 Rocks in each buoy, and tempests in each breeze;
 The curling wave to mountain billows swells,
 And ev'ry cloud a fancied storm foretells:
 Thus rashly launch'd on this theatric main,
 Our all on board, each phantom gives us pain;
 The catcall's note seems thunder in our ears,
 And ev'ry hiss a hurricane appears;
 In journal squibs we lightning's blast espy,
 And meteors blaze in every critic's eye.

Spite of these terrors, still some hopes we view,
 Hopes, ne'er can fail us—since they're plac'd—in in you.

Your breath the gale, our voyage is secure,
 And safe the venture which your smiles ensure;
 Though weak his skill, th' advent'rer must succeed,
 Where candour takes th' endeavour for the deed.
 For Brentford's state, two kings could once suffice;
 In ours, behold! four kings of Brentford rise;
 All smelling to one nosegay's od'rous favour,
 The balmy nosegay of—the public favour.
 From hence alone, our royal funds we draw,
 Your pleasure our support, your will our law.
 While such our government, we hope you'll own
 us;

But should we ever tyrant prove—dethrone us.

Like brother monarchs, who, to coax the nation,
 Began their reign, with some fair proclamation,
 We too should talk at least—of reformation;

Declare, that during our imperial sway,
 No bard shall mourn his long-neglected play;
 But then the play must have some wit, some spirit,
 And we allow'd sole umpires of its merit.
 For those deep sages of the judging pit,
 Whose taste is too refin'd for modern wit,
 From Rome's great theatre we'll cull the piece,
 And plant, on Britain's stage, the flow'rs of Greece.

If some there are, our British bards can please,
 Who taste the ancient wit of ancient days,
 Be ours to save, from time's devouring womb,
 Their works, and snatch their laurels from the tomb. [choose,

For you, ye fair, who sprightlier scenes may
 Where music decks in all her airs the muse,
 Gay opera shall all its charm dispense,
 Yet boast no tuneful triumph over sense;
 The nobler bard shall still assert his right,
 Nor Handel rob a Shakspeare of his night.

To greet their mortal brethren of our skies,
 Here all the gods of pantomime shall rise:
 Yet 'midst the pomp and magic of machines,
 Some plot may mark the meaning of our scenes;
 Scenes which were held, in good King Rich's days,
 By sages, no bad epilogues to plays.

If terms like these your suffrage can engage,
 To fix our mimic empire of the stage;
 Confirm our title in your fair opinions,
 And crowd each night to people our dominions.

VERSES

On converting the Chapel to a Kitchen, at the Seat of the Lord Donnerayle, called "The Grove, in Hertfordshire."

By Ovid, among other wonders, we're told
 What chanc'd to Philemon and Baucis of old;
 How their cot to a temple was conjur'd by Jove,
 So a chapel was chang'd to a kitchen at Grove.

The lord of the mansion most rightly conceiting,
 His guests lov'd good pray'rs much less than good
 eating;
 And possess'd by the devil, as some folks will tell ye,
 What was meant for the soul, he assign'd to the belly.

The word was scarce given—when down dropp'd
 the clock
 And straight was seen fix'd in the form of a jack;
 And, shameful to tell, pulpit, benches, and pews,
 Form'd, cupboards and shelves, for plates, saucepans,
 and stews.

Pray'r-books turn'd into platters; nor think it a fable,
 A dresser sprung out of the communion-table;
 Which, instead of the usual repast, bread and wine,
 Is stor'd with rich soups, and good English sirloin.

No fire, but what pure devotion could raise,
 Till now had been known in this temple to blaze:
 But, good lord! how the neighbours around did admire,
 When a chimney rose up in the room of a spire!

For a Jew many people the master mistook,
Whose Levites were scullions, his high-priest a cook;

And though he design'd our religion to alter,
When they saw the burnt-offering smoke at the altar.

The bell's solemn sound, that was heard far and near,

And oft rous'd the chaplain unwilling to pray'r,
No more to good sermons now summons the sinner,

But blasphemous rings in—the country to dinner.

When my good lord the bishop had heard the strange story,

How the place was profan'd, that was built to
G—'s glory; [deed,

Full of zeal he cried out, "Oh, how impious the
"To cram Christians with pudding, instead of
"the creed!"

Then away to the grave hied the church's protector,

Resolving to give his lay-brother a lecture;

But he scarce had begun, when he saw, plac'd before 'em,

A haunch piping hot from the sanctum sanctorum.

"Troth!" quoth he, "I find no great sin in the "plan,

"What was useless to God—to make useful to man:

"Besides, 'tis a true Christian duty, we read,

"The poor and the hungry with good things to
"feed."

Then again on the walls he bestow'd consecration,
But reserv'd the full rights of a free visitation:

Thus, 'tis still the Lord's house—only varied the treat,

Now, there's meat without grace—where was grace without meat.

VERSES

On the Duke of Cumberland's Victory at Culloden, in the Year 1746.

As his worm-eaten volumes old time tumbled o'er
To review the great actions that happen'd of yore;
When the names of young Ammon and Cæsar he saw,

He to one oppos'd Churchill—to th' other Nassau;
Then said, with a sigh, "What! has Britain no
"friend?" [end?]

"With these must her long race of heroes have When straight a loud blast on her trumpet fame
blew,

Which so long had been silent, the sound he scarce knew;

But soon in his sight the swift goddesses appear'd,
And, half out of breath, cry'd—"News, news!
"have you heard?"

"I have yet one hero to add to your store,

"Brave William has conquer'd—Rebellion's no
"more."

Well pleas'd, in his annals time set down the name,
Made the record authentic—and gave it to fame.

VERSES

Inscribed on a Monument, called The Tomb of Care, in the Garden of the late John Rich, Esq. at Cowley, in Middlesex; whereon three beautiful Boys are covering a Funeral Urn with a Veil of Flowers.

Why, busy boys, why thus entwine

The flowery veil around this shrine?

As if, for halcyon days like these,

The sight too solemn were to please:

Mistaken boys, what sight's so fair—

To mortals, as the Tomb of Care?

Here let the gloomy tyrant lie;

His urn an altar shall supply,

Sacred to ease, and social mirth;

For Care's decease—is Pleasure's birth.

THE EPITAPH

(In Letters of Brass, inserted by a Female Figure representing History), on a Marble Pyramid of the Monument of John Duke of Argyll.

BRITON, behold, if patriot worth be dear,

A shrine that claims thy tributary tear!

Silent that tongue admiring senates heard,

Nerveless that arm opposing legions fear'd!

Nor less, O Campbell! thine the pow'r to please,

And give to grandeur all the grace of ease.

Long, from thy life, let kindred heroes trace

Arts which ennoble still the noblest race.—

Others may owe their future fame to me;

I borrow immortality from thee.

Westminster Abbey.

P. WHITEHEAD.

VERSES

On the Name, P. Whitehead, subscribed to the above Inscription, being removed thence some time after the Monument was erected.

O'er the tombs as pale envy was hov'ring around,
The manes of each hallow'd hero to wound;

On Argyll's, when she saw only truth was related

Of him, whom alive she most mortally hated,

And finding the record adopted by fame,

In revenge to the poet—she gnaw'd out his name.

VERSES

To Mr. Brooke, on the Refusal of a Licence to his Play of Gustavus Vasa.

WHILE Athens glory'd in her free-born race,

And science flourish'd round her fav'rite place,

The muse unfetter'd trod the Grecian stage;

Free were her pinions, unrestrain'd her rage:

Bold and secure she aim'd the pointed dart,

And pour'd the precept poignant to the heart,

Till dire dominion stretch'd her lawless sway,

And Athens' sons were destin'd to obey:

Then, first, the stage a licens'd bondage knew,

And tyrants quash'd the scene they fear'd to view:

Fair freedom's voice no more was heard to charm,

Or liberty the Attic audience warm.

Then fled the muse, indignant, from the shore,

Nor deign'd to dwell where freedom was no more:

But if his giddy eye should vainly quit

THE LIFE OF BROWN.

JOHN BROWN was born at Rothbury, in the county of Northumberland, November 5. 1715. He was descended from the family of Brown of Coalston in Haddingtonshire. His father, the Rev. John Brown, was a native of Dunse in Berwickshire; and, at the time of his son's birth, was curate to Dr. Thomlinson rector of Rothbury. He was collated by Dr. Nicolson Bishop of Carlisle, to the vicarage of Wigton in Cumberland, in the latter end of 1715. His mother's maiden name was Potts.

He received the first part of his education at the grammar school of Wigton. From thence he was removed to the University of Cambridge, where he was entered of St. John's College, December 18. 1732, under the tuition of Dr. Tonstall.

He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1735, with great reputation, being at the head of the wranglers, and returned to Wigton, where he was ordained by Dr. Fleming bishop of Carlisle. His first preferment was to a minor canonry and lecturership of the cathedral church of Carlisle. He remained in obscurity in that city till 1739, when he went to Cambridge, to take his degree of Master of Arts.

In 1745, he distinguished himself by his zeal for government; and acted as a volunteer at the siege of Carlisle, during which he behaved with great intrepidity.

After the defeat of the rebels, when several of them were to be tried at the assizes held at Carlisle in 1746, he preached Two Sermons on the mutual connection between religious truth and civil freedom, and between superstition, tyranny, irreligion, and atheism.

His attachment to Whig principles procured him the friendship of Dr. Osbaldeston, who contributed to his obtaining from the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle the living of Morland, in the county of Westmoreland; and, on the death of Dr. Fleming, being advanced to that see, appointed him one of his chaplains. He resigned his preferment in the cathedral of Carlisle in disgust.

In the early part of his life, and probably during his residence at Carlisle, he wrote his poem intitled Honour, inscribed to Lord Viscount Lonsdale.

His next poetical performance, though not immediately published, was his Essay on Satire, in three parts, addressed to Warburton, who immediately introduced him to his friend Ralph Allen, Esq. of Prior Parks, near Bath, to whose generosity he was indebted, at a time when his circumstances had not raised him above pecuniary obligations.

On the 22d of April 1750, he preached a sermon at the Abbey-Church at Bath, for the benefit of the General Hospital, On the Pursuit of False Pleasure, and the Mischiefs of Immoderate Gaming, which was attended by the suppression of the public gaming-tables in that city; an effect which did honour to the preacher's eloquence.

In 1751, his Essay on Satire was given to the world in the second volume of Warburton's edition of Pope's Works, with which it still continues to be printed, as well as in the third volume of "Doddsley's Collection."

The same year, he published, what may be still regarded as his capital production, his Essays on the Characteristics of the Earl of Shaftesbury. I. On Ridicule, considered as the Test of Truth. II. On the Motives to Virtue, and the Necessity of Religious Principles. III. On Revealed Religion and Christianity. The work was dedicated to Mr. Allen, and received by the public with a high degree of applause. In the last Essay, he is said to have received considerable assistance from his father. The fifth edition was printed in 1764. Mr. Charles Bulkeley, a Dissenting Minister, published two pamphlets in vindication of Shaftesbury, in 1751 and 1752, written with ability and spirit.

He had a principal hand in the composition of an "Essay on Musical Expression," by Mr. Charles Avison, which came out in that year, and was well received. To the second edition, which appeared in 1753, was added an ingenious and learned letter to the author concerning the music of the ancients, by the late Dr. Jortin, though published without his name.

In 1754, he printed a sermon On the Use and Abuse of Externals in Religion; in which, while he allows and contends for the great expediency of ceremonials in worship, he does not seem attached to any particular mode as designed to distinguish particular sects, but vindicates the outward forms of devotion only so far as they are calculated to promote the purposes of religion, and the general union of all the professions of Christianity.

About this time, he was promoted by the Earl of Hardwicke to the living of Great Horkeley in Essex, upon the solicitation of his son the Hon. Charles Yorke, to whom he had been recommended by Warburton.

In 1755, his Barbarossa, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Drury Lane. The design seems borrowed from "Merope." Zaphira's distress and her resolutions greatly resemble Merope's; and the character of Barbarossa seems to be drawn after Poliphontes, with some few strokes of Bajazet, and the blustering monarch in the "Mourning Bride." It met with great success in the representation; and, being a play of bustle and business, still keeps possession of the stage. Garrick furnished the prologue and epilogue.

The same year he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity at Cambridge.

In 1756, his Atbelstan, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Drury Lane, and was well received by the public, but did not become so popular a play as Barbarossa; and though much the more original and better executed piece of the two, has been scarcely heard or thought of since its first run. It is founded on the British history, and has great merit. The struggles and conflicts of various passion, which Atbelstan is made to undergo, before his paternal and domestic affections get the better of a resentment which had led him into an act of treason against his prince and country, are finely supported, and perhaps scarcely excelled in any of our modern tragedies. He did not give his name to the world either with Barbarossa or Atbelstan.

In 1757, he published his famous Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, which had a very rapid sale, seven editions of it having been printed in little more than a year. It came out when the minds of the people were extremely depressed by some unprosperous events, and when, consequently, they were more ready to listen to the melancholy, and perhaps too just representation of the manners and principles of the nation. The chief design of the Estimate was to show that a vain, luxurious, and selfish effeminacy, in the higher ranks of life, marked the character of the age; and to point out the effects and sources of this effeminacy. In the prosecution of his design, he certainly displayed much sagacity and ingenuity of observation. His characters are strongly marked; and the style elegant, pointed, and lively; though it must likewise be acknowledged, that his remarks are sometimes too minute, and that he writes with too great an air of self-importance. The work, which at first met with far more applause than censure, was in a short time run down by popular clamour; but not answered. Several antagonists rose up against him, some of whom were of very little consequence. Ralph, in his "Case of Authors," was a formidable adversary. One of the best answers to the Estimate was "The Characteristics of the Present State of Great Britain," written by Dr. Wallace of Edinburgh.

In the summer after the Estimate was published, as he was one night sitting alone in Vauxhall Gardens, the following Impromptu, with which he was much pleased, was sent him by an unknown hand:

O say, thou gracious censor of the age,
What can thy solitary thoughts engage;
What lures thee thus to pleasure's golden reign;
Canst thou, like Cato, to go out again;
No! sent like Raphael from the heavenly powers,
To meet the inhabitants of Eden's bowers,
Welcome, O seer! pursue the glorious plan,
To mark the manners, and reform the man.

Cantab.

The testimony given by Voltaire, to the effect which the Estimate had on the conduct of the nation, is very honourable to Brown. "At this time (1756) there appeared a book intitled "An Estimate of the Manner of the Times," of which there was no less than five editions printed off in London in the space of three months. In this treatise the author proves that the English nation was entirely degenerated; that it was near its ruin; that its inhabitants were no longer so robust and hardy as in former times; and that its soldiers had lost their courage. This work roused the sensibility of the English nation, and produced the following consequences: They attacked almost at one and the same time, all the sea coasts of France, and her possessions in Asia, Africa, and America."

In 1758, he published the second volume of his Estimate, &c. containing some additional remarks on the ruling manners and principles, which manifested his usual ingenuity. The sketches of a great minister, and of a political writer designed for Mr. Pitt and himself, are very masterly. But his vanity, which is too conspicuous in this volume, exposed him to general censure and dislike; and the prejudices against him occasioned the real excellencies of the work to be very much overlooked. The periodical critics treated him with uncommon severity; and such a multitude of antagonists rose against him, so many objections were urged upon him by friends as well as enemies, that he seems to have been deeply impressed, and to have retired for a while into the country, from whence he wrote An Explanatory Defence of the Estimate, &c. in a series of letters to a noble friend which ended on his part the affair of the Estimate, that at first gained him an extravagant applause, and at length exposed him to as extravagant censure; to the latter of which, though the uprightness of his intentions cannot be reasonably doubted, it must be allowed that he contributed by his own indiscretion.

Between the appearance of the second volume of the Estimate and Explanatory Defence, he republished Walker's "Narrative of the Siege of Londonderry," 8vo, "as an useful lesson to the present times, with a prefatory address to the public."

About this time, his friend Dr. Osbaldeston presented him to the vicarage of Newcastle upon Tyne, which enabled him to resign the living of Great Horkeley to Lord Hardwicke, between whom, as well as Warburton and him, there had some time before been a coolness. It was probably owing to the influence of the same prelate, that he was appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to his present Majesty. He received no higher preferment, which must have been a great mortification to him, as he undoubtedly esteemed himself qualified for the highest offices in the church; and his abilities, under proper direction, would have rendered him equal to any station.

In 1760, he published an Additional Dialogue of the Dead, between Pericles and Aristides, designed to vindicate the political character and conduct of Mr Pitt, against some hints of disapprobation thrown out with regard to his measures, by Lyttleton, in his "Dialogue between Pericles and Cæmo."

His next publication was The Cure of Saul, a Sacred Ode, 4to, 1763, afterwards set to music, and performed as an oratorio. It was followed, in the same year, by A Dissertation on the Rise, Union, and Power, the Progressions, Separations, and Corruptions, of Poetry and Music, 4to one of the most pleasing of his performances. It displays great ingenuity, and abounds with critical discussions, some more, some less happily conducted. But it must be confessed that he has given free indulgence to fancy and conjecture, and has formed a round and compact system out of very slender materials. The anonymous writer of "Some Observations on Dr. Brown's Dissertation on the Rise, Union, &c. of Poetry and Music," 4to, pointed out several of his mistakes with great critical sagacity, depth of learning, and strength of judgment; which produced Remarks on the Observations, &c. 8vo, 1764.

The same year, he published The History of the Rise and Progress of Poetry, through its several Species, 8vo, which is no more than the substance of what was given on the same subject in the Dissertation, but divested of what related specifically to music.

It was followed, in the same year, by a volume of Sermons, dedicated to his patron, Dr. Osbaldeston bishop of London, most of which had before been separately printed, and are amongst the most valuable and least exceptionable of his writings. In the three sermons on education, he has unan-fewerably refuted some of the positions of Rousseau and other speculatists, and has proved, beyond reasonable contradiction, the importance, and indeed the necessity, of forming the minds of children to early habits of piety and virtue.

In the beginning of 1765, he again reverted to politics, and published Thoughts on Civil Liberty, Licentiousness, and Faction, 8vo, a work which, though drawn up with great parade, and assuming a scientific form, was in fact little more than a party pamphlet, intended to censure the persons who at that time opposed the measures of administration.

His next publication was a Sermon on the Female Character and Education, preached May 16. 1765, before the Guardians of the Asylum for Deserted Female Orphans. It was intended as a sequel to the three before published on the general subject of education. His sentiments on the religious opinions proper to be instilled into the minds of children, appear to be liberal. With regard to moral and political principles, he is for having such only inculcated as are clearly built on the precepts of Christianity and the laws of freedom. To the question, "Whether there be any opinions or principles which ought not to be tolerated (or suffered to be taught) in a well ordered free community?" he replies, that in his judgment there are many opinions or principles tending evidently to the destruction of society or freedom, and which therefore ought not to be tolerated in a well ordered free community. He gives an instance in each of the three capital species, religious, moral, and political. The instances are taken from Locke, and supported by that great man's authority; but it may now be observed, that a deeper investigation of the subject, and a more enlarged experience, have convinced the enlightened part of mankind that toleration may safely be extended farther than even Locke imagined.

His last publication was A Letter to the Rev. Dr. Lowth, occasioned by his Letter to the Right Rev. Author of the Divine Legation of Moses, 8vo, 1766, intended to vindicate himself against the insinuations of his being one of the extravagant adulators and defenders of Warburton.

At the end of several of his later writings, he announced a work, intituled, Principles of Christian Legislation; but he was prevented from publishing it by his death.

In 1765, Dr. Dumaresque, who had been invited, in the preceding year, to Russia, by the present Empress, to give his assistance in regulating the public schools, desired his advice with regard to the prosecution of the object for which he had been invited to that country. His answer, from the sketch inserted in the "Biographia," strongly displays the greatness and extent of his ideas; though, instead of confining himself to the establishment of schools, which was all that was required of him, he seemed to consider himself as called out to compile a code of laws, and to be the civilizer, and indeed the legislator, of the whole Russian empire.

The Empress, however, was so much pleased with it, that she invited him to her court, and ordered him 1000 l. for his expences. He accepted the offer, and actually prepared for his journey; but finding his health in too precarious a state to admit of his fulfilling his intention, he was obliged to relinquish it. He therefore returned 200 l. that had been advanced, deducting only 97 l. 6 s. for some extraordinary expences, and wrote a long letter to the Empress, which does great honour to his abilities, and in which he confines himself chiefly to the subject of education.

This disappointment, concurring with his state of health in general, and accompanied perhaps with the recollection of the other failures that had happened to him in his expectations and wishes, was followed by a dejection of spirits, which he had been often subject to. In an interval of deprivation of reason, he was prompted to do violence to himself; and, on the 23d of September, cut his throat with a razor, so effectually, that death speedily ensued, in the 51st year of his age.

His unhappy end, when some previous circumstances of his life are considered, will cast no stain on his character. He had a tendency to insanity in his constitution, and from his early life had been subject at times to some disorder in his brain, at least to melancholy in its excess. Mrs. Gilpin of Carlisle, soon after his death, wrote in the following terms, in a letter to a friend: "His distemper was a frenzy, to which he had by fits been long subject, to my own knowledge above thirty years. Had it not been for Mr. Farish (a worthy clergyman of Carlisle), frequently, and once myself, the same event would have happened to him long ago. It was no premeditated purpose in him; for he abhorred the thought of self-murder, and in bitterness of soul expressed his fears to me, that one time or other some ready mischief might present itself to him at a time when he was wholly deprived of his reason."

Besides the works which have been mentioned, Brown published a poem on Liberty, in folio, 1758, which the diligence of the present writer has not been able to procure; two or three anonymous pamphlets; A Description of Keswick, in a letter to Lyttleton, and a short paper, intitled, The Jesuits, preserved in the "Biographia."

In his will, he requests that the Rev. Nathaniel Clayton of St. John's Church, Newcastle, the Rev. Mr. Darrel, Percival Clennel, Esq. and Joseph Airey, Esq. would revise and correct the manuscript intitled Principles of Legislation; and, as the copy of it was in some places interlined and obscure, he desires that they will make it out according to the best of their judgment, and the tenor of the argument. He ordered likewise, in his will, that all his writings already published should be republished, together with the addition of such manuscripts and copies as were mentioned in a particular paper, and that they should be published in seven volumes, in the order and manner described in that paper. The revision and superintendence of the publication he recommended to the four gentlemen above mentioned. The property of his works, thus published, he bequeathed to the Rev. William Hall, son to the Rev. Mark Hall, upon condition that he assisted the aforesaid gentlemen, by taking the principal part of the trouble upon himself, and by acting according to their opinion and directions, and upon condition that he employed Mr. Lockyer Davis in Holburn, London, as the bookseller for the sale of the first edition, and allowed him one half of the clear profits of that edition. The reasons why the orders of his will have not been carried into execution, are not assigned. The Principles of Christian Legislation, at least, might have appeared, without any danger of loss to the proprietor.

His Poems, dispersed up and down in the "Miscellanies," are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

With regard to the general character of Brown, it will be easily discerned that he was a man of uncommon ingenuity, and that it was unfortunately tinged with an undue degree of self-opinion. Perhaps the bias of his mind to insanity will assign the best cause, as well as form the best excuse for the errors he has been charged with in this respect. His genius was extensive; for, besides his being so elegant a prose writer in various kinds of composition, he was a poet, a musician, and a painter. He bequeathed, by his will, the pictures of his father and mother, painted in crayons by himself. He played well on several instruments. His learning does not appear to have been equal to his genius. His invention was indeed inexhaustible; which led him to form magnificent plans, which required a greater extent of erudition than he was possessed of, fully to execute. In divinity, properly so called, as including an extensive knowledge of the controverted points of theology, and a critical acquaintance with the scriptures, he was not deeply conversant. However, it appears from his Sermons, that his ideas of this kind were liberal, and that he did not lay much stress on the disputed doctrines of Christianity. His temper, it is said, was suspicious, and sometimes threw him into disagreeable altercations with his friends. But this arose in a great measure, if not entirely, from his constitutional disorder; for it has been observed, that a very suspicious turn of mind is one of the surest prognostics of lunacy. He has been charged with shifting about too speedily with a view to preferment; and it must be acknowledged, that his Thoughts on Civil Liberty, Licentiousness, and Faction, seemed to have something of that appearance. He has, however, in that performance, endeavoured to remove any charge of that nature, by observing, that if he had indirectly censured those whom he had formerly applauded, he never was attached to men but measures. At the conclusion, likewise, of his Letter to Dr. Lortib, he says, "I am, and ever have been, conscious of the independence of my mind, and I hope I may without vanity add, the integrity of my heart." Such, too, is the testimony given of him by his surviving friends. Upon the whole, his defects, which chiefly arose from too sanguine a temperament of constitution, were compensated by many excellencies and virtues.

With respect to his prose writings, they are all of them elegant. Even those which are of a more temporary nature, may most of them continue to be read with pleasure, as containing a variety of curious observation; and others of his works, being calculated for a more lasting duration, will transmit his name with considerable reputation to future times.

As a poet, his compositions are chiefly characterised by elegance of diction, manliness of sentiment, facility of expression, and harmony of numbers. The design of his poem intituled Honour is to show that true honour can only be found in virtue; and, in support of so just a doctrine, he advances many excellent sentiments, delivered in elegant and accurate versification. His Essay on Satire is very properly printed with Pope's works, as it is written, in many parts, with an elegance, correctness, spirit, and harmony, which rival the best productions of that celebrated poet. In the third part of the Essay, in which he celebrates the most eminent satirists, he has drawn Pope's poetical character to great advantage.

But see, at length, the British genius smile,
And shower her bounties o'er her favour'd isle:
Behold for Pope she twines the laurel crown,
And centres every poet's power in one:
Each Roman's force adorns his various page;
Gay smiles, collected strength, and manly rage.
Despairing guilt and dullness loathe the sight,
As spectres vanish at approaching light:
In this clear mirror with delight we view
Each image justly fine, and boldly true:
Here vice, dragg'd forth by truth's supreme decree,
Beholds and hates her own deformity;
While self-seen virtue in the faithful line
With modest joys surveys her form divine.
But oh, what thoughts, what numbers shall I find,
But faintly to express the poet's mind!
Who yonder stars effulgence can display,
Unless he dip his pencil in the ray?
Who paint a god, unless the god inspire?
What catch the lightning, but the speed of fire?
So, mighty Pope, to make thy genius known,
All power is weak, all numbers—but thy own.
Each muse for thee with kind contention strove,
For thee the graces left th' Idalian grove;
With watchful fondness o'er thy cradle hung,
Attun'd thy voice, and form'd thy infant tongue.
Next to her bard majestic wisdom came;
The bard enraptur'd caught the heavenly flame:
With taste superior scorn'd the venal tribe,
Whom fear can sway, or guilty greatness bribe;
At fancy's call, who rear the wanton sail,
Sport with the stream, and trifle in the gale:
Sublimar views thy daring spirit bound;
Thy mighty voyage was creation's round;
Intent new worlds of wisdom to explore,
And bless mankind with virtue's sacred store
A nobler joy than wit can give, impart;
And pour a moral transport o'er the heart.
Fantastic wit shoots momentary fires,
And, like a meteor, while we gaze, expires:
Wit kindled by the sulphurous breath of vice,
Like the blue lightning, while it shines, destroys:
But genius, fir'd by truth's eternal ray,
Burns clear and constant, like the source of day:
Like this its beam, prolific and refin'd,
Feeds, warms, inspirits, and exalts the mind;
Mildly dispels each wintry passion's gloom,
And opens all the virtues into bloom.
This praise, immortal Pope, to thee he giveth.
Thy genius was indeed a gift from Heaven.
Hail, bard unequal'd, in whose deathless line
Reason and wit with strength collected shine;
Where matchless wit but wins the second praise,
Lost, nobly lost, in truth's superior blaze.
Did friendship e'er mislead thy wandering muse?
That friendship sure may plead the great excuse:

That sacred friendship which inspir'd thy song,
 Fair in defect, and amiably wrong.
 Error like this ev'n truth can scarce reprove;
 'Tis almost virtue, when it flows from love.

In his Cure of Saul, he has attempted to express the various powers of that music whereby the Israelitish shepherd charmed his unhappy prince. If this sacred ode does not arise to the poetry and harmony of Dryden's "St. Cecilia," it has, nevertheless, allowance being made for a few exceptions, no small degree of beauty and merit, and ranks with the most distinguished lyric compositions. In the stanza beginning, By sleepless terror Saul possess'd, the dreadful images of terror and distraction are well sustained, and the measure of the verse happily corresponds with the imagery. The last line is incorrect and inflated. In the stanza beginning Sunk on his couch, and loathing day, we are pleased to find the divine musician so affected with the miseries of the monarch, as to drop a generous tear; and his ready address to the Almighty is well conceived. The stanza beginning Hark, loud discord breaks her chain, is adequately expressed, except the last line, which is too feeble. The harmony and imagery of the following passages are equally beautiful, and appear, to the present writer, to be faultless throughout.

Lead the soothing verse along:
 He feels, he feels the power of song.
 Ocean hastens to his bed:
 The lab'ring mountain rears his rock-encumber'd head:
 Down his steep and shaggy side
 The torrent rolls his thundering tide;
 Then smooth and clear, along the fertile plain
 Winds his majestic waters to the distant main.
 Flocks and herds the hills adorn;
 The lark high-soaring, hails the morn.
 And while along yon crimson-clouded steep
 The slow sun steals into the golden deep,
 Hark! the solemn nightingale
 Warbles to the woodland dale.
 See descending angels shower
 Heaven's own bliss on Eden's bower:
 Peace on nature's lap reposes;
 Pleasure strews her guiltless roses;
 Joys divine in circles move,
 Link'd with innocence and love.
 Hail, happy love, with innocence combin'd!
 All hail ye sinless parents of mankind!

The passage that follows this, and, for the instruction of the monarch, represents the miseries of our first parents as the consequence of their guilt, has likewise many beauties. The unhappy king could not but apply this part of the song to himself.

—With pride, and shame, and anguish torn,
 Shot fury from his eyes, and scorn.
 The glowing youth,
 Bold in truth,
 (So still should virtue guilty power engage)
 With brow undaunted met his rage.
 See, his cheek kindles into generous fire:
 Stern he bends him o'er his lyre;
 And, while the doom of guilt he sings,
 Shakes horror from the tortur'd strings.

Nothing can be more happily expressive than the last line; we almost tremble while we read it. Some exceptionable passages might be pointed out; but they are excusable, ubi plura nitent.

"The music to the Cure of Saul," Sir John Hawkins observes, "when it was performed as an oratorio, was partly selected by Brown, from such favourite movements in the works of the most celebrated composers as would best express the sense of the words. He took, in particular, for a solo air, the saraband in the eighth sonata of Purcell's second opera; and, for the chorus, that most admirable movement in Purcell's "O give thanks," "Remember me, O Lord;" and any stranger would have thought that the music had been originally composed for the ode."

PART I.

FATE gave the word : the cruel arrow sped ;
And Pope lies number'd with the mighty dead !
Resign'd he fell ; superior to the dart,
That quench'd its rage in yours and Britain's heart :

You mourn : but Britain, lull'd in rest profound,
(Unconscious Britain) ! slumbers o'er her wound.
Exulting dulness ey'd the setting light,
And flapp'd her wing, impatient for the night :
Rous'd at the signal, guilt collects her train,
And counts the triumphs of her growing reign :
With unextinguishable rage they burn ;
And snake-hung envy hisses o'er his urn :
Th' envenom'd monsters spit their deadly foam,
To blast the laurel that surrounds his tomb.

But you, O Warburton ! whose eye refin'd
Can see the greatness of an honest mind ;
Can see each virtue and each grace unite,
And taste the raptures of a pure delight ;
You visit oft his awful page with care,
And view that bright assemblage treasur'd there ;
You trace the chain that links his deep design,
And pour new lustre on the glowing line.
Yet deign to hear the efforts of a muse,
Whose eye, not wing, his ardent flight pursues :
Intent from this great archetype to draw
Satire's bright form, and fix her equal law ;
Pleas'd if from hence th' unlearn'd may comprehend,

And reverence his and satire's generous end.

In every breast there burns an active flame,
The love of glory, or the dread of shame :
The passion one, though various it appear,
As brighten'd into hope, or dimm'd by fear.
The lisping infant, and the hoary fire,
And youth and manhood feel the heart-born fire :
The charms of praise the coy, the modest woo,
And only fly, that glory may pursue :

She, power resistless, rules the wise and great;
Bends ev'n reluctant hermits at her feet;
Haunts the proud city, and the lowly shade,
And sways alike the sceptre and the spade. 40

Thus Heaven in pity wakes the friendly flame,
To urge mankind on deeds that merit fame:
But man, vain man, in folly only wise,
Rejects the manna sent him from the skies:
With raptures hears corrupted passion's call,
Still proudly prone to mingle with the stall.
As each deceitful shadow tempts his view,
He for the imag'd substance quits the true;
Eager to catch the visionary prize,
In quest of glory plunges deep in vice: 50
Till madly zealous, impotently vain,
He forfeits every praise he pants to gain.

Thus still imperious nature plies her part;
And still her dictates work in every heart.
Each power that sovereign nature bids enjoy,
Man may corrupt, but man can ne'er destroy.
Like mighty rivers with resistless force
The passions rage, obstructed in their course;
Swell to new heights, forbidden paths explore, 59
And drown those virtues which they fed before.

And sure, the deadliest foe to virtue's flame,
Our worst of evils, is perverted shame.
Beneath this load, what abject numbers groan,
Th' entangled slaves to folly not their own!
Meanly by fashionable fear oppress'd,
We seek our virtues in each other's breast;
Blind to ourselves, adopt each foreign vice,
Another's weakness, interest, or caprice.
Each fool to low ambition, poorly great,
That pines in splendid wretchedness of state, 70
Tir'd in the treacherous chase, would nobly yield,
And, but for shame, like Sylla, quit the field:
The demon shame paints strong the ridicule,
And whispers close, "The world will call you
"fool."

Behold yon wretch, by impious fashion driven,
Believes and trembles, while he scoffs at Heaven.
By weakness strong, and bold through fear alone,
He dreads the sneer by shallow coxcombs thrown;
Dauntless pursues the path Spinoza trod;
To man a coward, and a brave to God. 80

Faith, justice, Heaven itself now quit their hold,
When to false fame the captive heart is sold:
Hence, blind to truth, relentless Cato dy'd;
Nought could subdue his virtue, but his pride.
Hence chaste Lucretia's innocence betray'd
Fell by that honour which was meant its aid.
Thus virtue sinks beneath unnumber'd woes,
When passions, born her friends, revolt her foes.

Hence satire's power: 'tis her corrective part,
To calm the wild disorders of the heart. 90
She points the arduous height where glory lies,
And teaches mad ambition to be wise:
In the dark bosom wakes the fair desire,
Draws good from ill, a brighter flame from fire:
Strips black oppression of her gay disguise,
And bids the hag in native horror rise;
Strikes towering pride and lawless rapine dead,
And plants the wreath on virtue's awful head.

Nor boasts the muse a vain imagin'd power,
Though oft she mourns those ills she cannot cure.

The worthy court her, and the worthless fear;
Who shun her piercing eye, that eye reverse. 102
Her awful voice the vain and vile obey,
And every foe to wisdom feels her sway.

Smarts, pedants, as she smiles, no more are vain;
Desponding fops resign the clouded cane:
Hush'd at her voice, pert folly's self is still,
And dulcels wonders while she drops her quill.

Like the arm'd bee, with art most subtly true,
From poisonous vice she draws a healing dew: 110
Weak are the ties that civil arts can find,
To quell the ferment of the tainted mind:
Cunning evades, securely wrapp'd in wiles!
And force strong, shew'd rends th' unequal toils:
The stream of vice impetuous drives along,
Too deep for policy, for power too strong.

Ev'n fair religion, native of the skies,
Scorn'd by the crowd, seeks refuge with the wise;
The crowd with laughter spurns her awful train,
And mercy courts, and justice frowns in vain. 120
But satire's shaft can pierce the harden'd breast:
She plays a ruling passion on the rest:

Undaunted storms the battery of his pride,
And awes the brave that earth and Heaven defy'd.
When fell corruption, by her vassals crown'd,
Derides fall'n justice prostrate on the ground;
Swift to redress an injur'd people's groan,
Bold satire shakes the tyrant on her throne;
Powerful as death, defies the sordid train,
And slaves and sycophants surround in vain. 130

But with the friends of vice, the foes of satire,
All truth is spleen; all just reproof, ill-nature.
Well may they dread the muse's fatal skill;
Well may they tremble when she draws her quill:
Her magic quill, that, like Ithuriel's spear,
Reveals the cloven hoof, or lengthen'd ear:
Bids vice and folly take their natural shapes,
Turns duchesses to strumpets, beaux to apes;
Drags the vile whisperer from his dark abode,
Till all the demon starts up from the toad. 140

O sordid maxim, form'd to screen the vile,
That true good-nature still must wear a smile!
In frowns array'd her beauties stronger rise,
When love of virtue wakes her scorn of vice:
Where justice calls, 'tis cruelty to save;
And 'tis the law's good-nature hangs the knave.
Who combats virtue's foe is virtue's friend;
Then judge of satire's merit by her end:
To guilt alone her vengeance stands confin'd,
The object of her love is all mankind. 150

Scarce more the friend of man, the wise must own,
Ev'n Allen's bounteous hand, than satire's frown:
This to chastise, as that to bliss was giv'n;
Alike the faithful ministers of heaven.

Oft in unfeeling hearts the shaft is spent:
Though strong th' example, weak the punishment.

They least are pain'd, who merit satire most;
Folly the Laureat's, vice was Chartres' boast:
Then where's the wrong, to gibbet high the name
Of fools and knaves already dead to shame? 160
Oft satire acts the faithful surgeon's part;
Generous and kind, though painful, is her art:
With caution bold, she only strikes to heal;
Though folly raves to break the friendly steel.

Then sure no fault impartial satire knows,
Kind ev'n in vengeance, kind to virtue's foes.
Whose is the crime, the scandal too be theirs;
The knave and fool are their own libellers.

PART II.

DARE nobly then: but conscious of your trust,
As ever warm and bold be ever just: 170
Nor court applause in these degenerate days:
The villan's censure is extorted praise.

But chief, be steady in a noble end,
And show mankind that truth has yet a friend.
'Tis mean for empty praise of wit to write,
As foplings grin to show their teeth are white:
To brand a doubtful folly with a smile,
Or madly blaze unknown defects, is vile:
'Tis doubly vile, when, but to prove your art,
You fix an arrow in a blameless heart. 180

O lost to honour's voice, O doom'd to shame,
'Thou fiend accurs'd, thou murderer of fame!
Fell ravisher, from innocence to tear
That name, than liberty, than life more dear!
Where shall thy baseness meet its just return,
Or what repay thy guilt, but endless scorn?
And know, immortal truth shall mock thy toil:
Immortal truth shall bid the shaft recoil,
With rage retorted, wing the deadly dart,
And empty all its poison in thy heart. 190

With caution next, the dangerous power apply;
An eagle's talon asks an eagle's eye:
Let satire then her proper object know,
And ere she strike, be sure she strike a foe.
Nor fondly deem the real fool confess,
Because blind ridicule conceives a jest:
Before whose altar virtue oft hath bled,
And oft a destin'd victim shall be led:
Lo Shaftesbury rears her high on reason's throne,
And loads the slave with honours not her own:
Big swollen with folly, as her smiles provoke, 201
Profaneness spawns, pert dunces nurse the joke!
Come, let us join awhile this tittering crew,
And own the idiot guide for once is true,
Deride our weak forefathers' musty rule,
Who therefore smil'd, because they saw a fool;
Sublimed logic now adorns our isle,
We therefore see a fool, because we smile.

Truth in her gloomy cave why fondly seek?
Lo, gay she sits in laughter's dimpled cheek: 210
Contentins each furly academic foe,
And courts the spruce freethinker and the beau,
Dædalian arguments but few can trace,
But all can read the language of grimace.
Hence mighty ridicule's all-conquering hand
Shall work Herculean wonders through the land:
Bound in the magic of her cobweb chain,
You, mighty Warburton, shall rage in vain,
In vain the trackless maze of truth you scan,
And lend th' informing clue to erring man: 220
No more shall reason boast her power divine,
Her base eternal shook by folly's mine!
Truth's sacred fort th' exploded laugh shall win;
And coxcombs vanquish Berkely by a grin.

But you more sage, reject th' inverted rule,
That truth is ne'er explor'd by ridicule:

On truth, on falsehood, let her colours fall,
She throws a dazzling glare alike on all;
As the gay prism but mocks the flatter'd eye,
And gives to every object every dye 230
Beware the mad adventurer: bold and blind
She hoists her sail, and drives with every wind;
Deaf as the storm to sinking virtue's groan,
Nor heeds a friend's destruction, or her own.
Let clear-ey'd reason at the helm preside,
Bear to the wind, or stem the furious tide;
Then mirth may urge, when reason can explore,
This point the way, that waft us glad to shore.

I though distant times may rise in satire's page,

Yet chief 'tis her's to draw the present age: 240
With wisdom's lustre, folly's shade contrast,
And judge the reigning manners by the past:
Bid Britain's heroes (awful shades)! arise,
And ancient honour beam on modern vice:
Point back to minds ingenuous, actions fair,
Till the sons blush at what their fathers were:
Ere yet 'twas beggary the great to trust;
Ere yet 'twas quite a folly to be just,
When low-born sharpers only dar'd a lie,
Or falsify'd the card, or e'gg'd the dye; 250
Ere lewdness the stain'd garb of honour wore,
Or chastity was carted for the whore;
Vice flutter'd, in the plumes of freedom dress'd;
Or public spirit was the public jest.

Be ever in a just expression, bold,
Yet ne'er degrade fair satire to a scold:
Let no unworthy mien her form debase,
But let her smile, and let her frown with grace:
In mirth be temperate, temperate in her spleen;
Nor, while she preaches modesty, obscene. 260
Deep let her wound, not rankle to a sore,
Nor call his Lordship —, her Grace a —:
The muse's charms resistless then assail,
When wrapp'd in irony's transparent veil:
Her beauties half conceal'd the more surprise,
And keener lustre sparkles in her eyes.

Then be your line with sharp encomiums grac'd:
Style Clodius honourable, Buba chaste.

Dart not on folly an indignant eye:
Who e'er discharg'd artillery on a fly? 270
Deride not vice: absurd the thought and vain,
To bind the tiger in so weak a chain.

Nay more, when flagrant crimes your laughter move,

The knave exults: to smile is to approve.
The muse's labour then success shall crown,
When folly feels her smile, and vice her frown.

Know next what measures to each theme belong,

And suit your thoughts and numbers to your song:
On wing proportion'd to your quarry rise,
And stoop to earth, or soar among the skies. 280
Thus when a modish folly you rehearse,
Free the expression, simple be the verse.
In artless numbers paint th' ambitious peer,
That mounts the box, and shines a charioteer:
In strains familiar sing the midnight toil
Of camps and senates disciplin'd by Hoyle;
Patriots and chiefs, whose deep design invades,
And carries off the captive king—of spades!

Let satire here in milder vigour shine,
And gayly graceful sport along the line; 290
Bid courtly passion quit her thin pretence,
And smile each affectation into sense.

Not so when virtue by her guards betray'd,
Spurn'd from her throne, implores the muse's aid;
When crimes, which erst in kindred darkness lay,
Rise frontless, and insult the eye of day;
Indignant Hymen veils his hallow'd fires,
And white-rob'd chastity with tears retires;
When rank adultery on the genial bed
Hot from Cocytus rears her baleful head; 300
When private faith and public trust are sold,
And traitors barter liberty for gold;
When fell corruption, dark and deep, like fate,
Saps the foundation of a sinking state;
When giant vice and irreligion rise
On mountain'd falsehoods to invade the skies;
Then warmer numbers glow through satire's page,
And all her smiles are darken'd into rage:
On eagle wing she gains Parnassus' height,
Not lofty epic soars a nobler flight: 310
Then keener indignation fires her eye;
Then flash her lightnings, and her thunders fly;
Wide and more wide her flaming bolts are hurl'd,
Till all her wrath involves the guilty world.

Yet satire oft assumes a gentler mien,
And beams on virtue's friends a smile serene!
She wounds reluctant, pours her balm with joy,
Glad to commend where worth attracts her eye.
But chief, when virtue, learning, arts decline,
She joys to see unconquer'd merit shine; 320
Where bursting glorious, with departing ray,
True genius gilds the close of Britain's day:
With joys she sees the stream of Roman art
From Murray's tongue flow purer to the heart;
Sees Yorke to fame, ere yet to manhood known,
And just to every virtue but his own;
Hears unstain'd Cam with generous pride proclaim
A sage's, critic's, and a poet's name;
Beholds, where Widcombe's happy hills ascend,
Each orphan'd art and virtue find a friend; 330
To Hagley's honour'd shade directs her view,
And culls each flower, to form a wreath for you.
But tread with cautious step this dangerous
ground,

Beset with faithless precipices round;
Truth be your guide, disdain ambition's call,
And if you fall with truth, you greatly fall.
'Tis virtue's native lustre that must shine;
The poet can but set it in his line:
And who unmov'd with laughter can behold
A fordid pebble meanly grac'd with gold? 340
Let real merit then adorn your lays,
For shame attends on prostituted praise:
And all your wit, your most distinguish'd art,
But makes us grieve you want an honest heart.

Nor think the muse by satire's law confin'd:
She yields description of the noblest kind.
Inferior art the landscape may design,
And paint the purple evening in the line:
Her daring thought essays a higher plan;
Her hand delineates passion, pictures man. 350
And great the toil the latent soul to trace,
To paint the heart, and catch internal grace;

By turns bid vice or virtue strike our eyes,
Now bid a Wolsey or a Cromwell rise;
Now, with a touch more sacred and refin'd,
Call forth a Chesterfield's or Lonsdale's mind.
Here sweet or strong may every colour flow,
Here let the pencil warm, the canvas glow:
Of light and shade provoke the noble strife,
And wake each striking feature into life. 360

PART III.

THROUGH ages thus has satire keenly shin'd,
The friend to truth, to virtue, and mankind;
Yet the bright flame from virtue ne'er had sprung,
And man was guilty ere the poet sung.
This muse in silence joy'd each better age,
Till glowing crimes had wak'd her into rage.
Truth saw her honest spleen with new delight,
And bade her wing her shafts, and urge their flight.
First on the sons of Greece she prov'd her art,
And Sparta felt the fierce iambic dart. 370
To Latium next avenging satire flew:
The flaming falchion rough Lucilius drew;
With dauntless warmth in virtue's cause engag'd,
And conscious villains trembled as he rag'd.

Then sportive Horace caught the generous fire;
For satire's bow resign'd the sounding lyre:
Each arrow polish'd in his hand was seen,
And, as it grew more polish'd, grew more keen.
His art, conceal'd in study'd negligence,
Politely fly, cajol'd the foes of sense; 380
He seem'd to sport and trifle with the dart,
But, while he sported, drove it to the heart.

In graver strains majestic Persius wrote,
Big with a ripe exuberance of thought:
Greatly sedate, contemn'd a tyrant's reign,
And lash'd corruption with a calm disdain.

More ardent eloquence, and boundless rage,
Enflame bold Juvenal's exalted page.
His mighty numbers aw'd corrupted Rome,
And swept audacious greatness to its doom; 390
The headlong torrent, thundering from on high,
Rent the proud rock that lately brav'd the sky.

But, lo! the fatal victor of mankind,
Swoln luxury!—pale ruin stalks behind!
As countless insects from the north-east pour,
To blast the spring, and ravage every flower,
So barbarous millions spread contagious death:
The sickening laurel wither'd at their breath.
Deep superstition's night the skies o'erhung,
Beneath whose baleful dews the poppy sprung.
No longer genius woo'd the nine to love, 400
But dullness nodded in the muse's grove:
Wit, spirit, freedom, were the sole offence,
Nor aught was held so dangerous as sense.

At length again fair science shot her ray,
Dawn'd in the skies, and spoke returning day.
Now, satire, triumph o'er thy flying foe,
Now load thy quiver, string thy slacken'd bow!
'Tis done—See great Erasmus breaks the spell,
And wounds triumphant folly in her cell! 410
(In vain the solemn cowl surrounds her face,
Vain all her bigot cant, her sour grimace)
With shame compell'd her leaden throne to quit,
And own the force of reason urg'd by wit.

'Twas then plain Donne in honest vengeance
rose,

His wit harmonious, though his rhyme was prose:
He 'midst an age of puns and pedants wrote,
With genuine sense, and Roman strength of thought.

Yet scarce had satire well relum'd her flame,
(With grief the muse records her country's shame)
Ere Britain saw the foul revolt commence,
And treacherous wit began her war with sense.
Then rose a shameless mercenary train,
Whom latest time shall view with just disdain:
A race fantastic, in whose gaudy line
Untutor'd thought and tinsel beauty shine:
Wit's shatter'd mirror lies in fragments bright,
Reflects not nature, but confounds the sight.
Dry morals the court-poet blush'd to sing;
'Twas all his praise to say "the oddest thing."
Proud for a jest obscene, a patron's nod,
To martyr virtue, or blaspheme his God.

Ill-fated Dryden! who unmov'd can see
Th' extremes of wit and meanness join'd in thee?
Flames that could mount, and gain their kindred
Low creeping in the putrid sink of vice: [skies,
A muse whom wisdom woo'd, but woo'd in vain,
The pimp of power, the prostitute to gain:
Wreaths, that should deck fair virtue's form alone,
To strumpets, traitors, tyrants, vilely thrown:
Unrival'd parts, the scorn of honest fame;
And genius rise, a monument of shame!

More happy France: immortal Boileau there
Supported genius with a sage's care:

Him with her love propitious satire blest,
And breath'd her airs divine into his breast:
Fancy and sense to form his line conspire,
And faultless judgment guides the purest fire.

But see at length the British genius smile,
And shower her bounties o'er her favour'd isle:
Behold for Pope she twines the laurel crown,
And centres every poet's power in one:
Each Roman's force adorns his various page;
Gay smiles, collected strength, and manly rage.
Despairing guilt and dullness loathe the sight,
As spectres vanish at approaching light:
In this clear mirror with delight we view
Each image justly fine, and boldly true:
Here vice, dragg'd forth by truth's supreme decree,
Beholds and hates her own deformity;
While self-seen virtue in the faithful line
With modest joys surveys her form divine.
But oh, what thoughts, what numbers, shall I find,
But faintly to express the poet's mind!

Who yonder stars effulgence can display,
Unless he dip his pencil in the ray?
Who paint a god, unless the god inspire?
What catch the lightning, but the speed of fire?
So, mighty Pope, to make thy genius known,
All power is weak, all numbers—but thy own.
Each muse for thee with kind contention strove,
For thee the graces left th' Idalian grove;
With watchful fondness o'er thy cradle hung,
Attun'd thy voice, and form'd thy infant tongue.
Next to her bard majestic wisdom came;
The bard enraptur'd caught the heavenly flame:
With taste superior scorn'd the venal tribe,
Whom fear can sway, or guilty greatness bribe;

Vol. X.

At fancy's call who rear the wanton sail,
Sport with the stream, and trifle in the gale:
Sublimar views thy daring spirit bound;
Thy mighty voyage was creation's round;
Intent new worlds of wisdom to explore,
And bless mankind with virtue's sacred store;
A nobler joy than wit can give impart,
And pour a moral transport o'er the heart.
Fantastic wit shoots momentary fires,
And, like a meteor, while we gaze, expires:
Wit kindled by the sulphurous breath of vice,
Like the blue lightning, while it shines, destroys:
But genius, fir'd by truth's eternal ray,
Burns clear and constant, like the source of day:
Like this its beam, prolific and refin'd,
Feeds, warms, inspirits, and exalts the mind;
Mildly dispels each wintry passion's gloom,
And opens all the virtues into bloom.
This praise, immortal Pope, to thee be given,
Thy genius was indeed a gift from Heaven.
Hail, bard unequall'd, in whose deathless line
Reason and wit with strength collected shine;
Where matchless wit but wins the second praise;
Lost, nobly lost, in truth's superior blaze.
Did friendship e'er mislead thy wandering muse?
That friendship sure may plead the great excuse:
That sacred friendship which inspir'd thy song,
Fair in defect, and amiably wrong.
Error like this ev'n truth can scarce reprove;
'Tis almost virtue when it flows from love.

Ye deathless names, ye sons of endless praise,
By virtue crown'd with never-fading bays!
Say, shall an artless muse, if you inspire,
Light her pale lamp at your immortal fire?
Or if, O Warburton, inspir'd by you,
The daring muse a nobler path pursue,
By you inspir'd, on trembling pinions soar,
The sacred founts of social bliss explore,
In her bold numbers chain the tyrant's rage,
And bid her country's glory fire her page;
If such her fate, do thou, fair truth, descend,
And watchful guard her in an honest end:
Kindly severe, instruct her equal line
To court no friend, nor own a foe but thine.
But if her giddy eye should vainly quit
Thy sacred paths, to run the maze of wit;
If her apostate heart should e'er incline
To offer incense at corruption's shrine;
Urge, urge thy power, the black attempt confound,
And dash the smoking censor to the ground.
Thus aw'd to fear, instructed bards may see
That guilt is doom'd to sink in infamy.

THE CURE OF SAUL.

A SACRED ODE.

"VENGEANCE, arise from thy infernal bed;
"And pour thy tempest on his guilty head!"

Thus Heaven's decree, in thunder's sound,
Shook the dark abyss profound.

The unchain'd furies come!
Pale melancholy stalks from hell:
Th' abortive offspring of her womb,
Despair and anguish round her yell.
By sleepless terror Saul possess'd,

Deep feels the fiend within his tortur'd breast.

3 K

Midnight spectres round him howl :
 Before his eyes
 In troops they rise;
 And seas of horror overwhelm his soul.
 Haste! to Jesse's son repair;
 He best can sweep the lyre,
 Wake the solemn-sounding air,
 And lead the vocal choir:
 On every string soft-breathing raptures dwell,
 To sooth the throbbings of the troubled breast:
 Whose magic voice can bid the tides of passion
 swell,
 Or lull the raging storm to rest.

Sunk on his couch, and lothing day,
 The heaven-forfaken monarch lay:
 To the sad couch the shepherd now drew near;
 And, while th' obedient choir stood round,
 Prepar'd to catch the soul-commanding sound,
 He dropp'd a generous tear.—
 Thy pitying aid, O God, impart!
 For lo, thy poison'd arrows drink his heart!

The mighty song from chaos rose.—
 Around his throne the formless atoms sleep,
 And drowsy darkness broods upon the deep.—
 Confusion, wake!

Bid the realms of chaos shake!
 Rouse him from his dread repose!
 Hark! loud discord breaks her chain:
 The hostile atoms clash with deaf'ning roar:
 Her hoarse voice thunders through the drear domain;
 And kindles every element to war.—

"Tumult cease!
 "Sink to peace!
 "Let there be light!"—th' Almighty said:
 And lo, the radiant sun,
 Flaming from his orient bed,
 His endless course begun,
 See, the twinkling pleiads rise:
 Thy star, Orion, reddens in the skies:
 While flow around the northern plain,
 Arcturus wheels his nightly wane.

Thy glories, too, refulgent moon, he sung;
 Thy mystic mazes, and thy changeful ray;
 O fairest of the starry throng!
 Thy solemn orb of light
 Guides the triumphant car of night
 O'er silver clouds, and sheds a softer day!

Ye planets, and each circling constellation,
 In songs harmonious tell your generation!
 Oh, while yon radiant seraph turns the spheres,
 And on the steadfast pole-star stands sublime;
 Wheel your rounds
 To heavenly sounds;
 And sooth his song enchanted ears
 With your celestial chime.

In dumb surprise the list'ning monarch lay;
 (His woe suspended by sweet music's sway)
 And awe struck, with uplifted eye
 Mus'd on the new-born wonders of the sky.
 Lead the soothing verse along:
 He feels, he feels the power of song—

Ocean hastens to his bed:
 The lab'ring mountain rears his rock-encumber'd
 head:

Down his steep and shaggy side
 The torrent rolls his thundering tide;
 Then smooth and clear, along the fertile plain
 Winds his majestic waters to the distant main.

Flocks and herds the hills adorn:
 The lark, high-soaring, hails the morn.
 And while along yon crimson-clouded steep
 The flow'rs steal into the golden deep,
 Hark! the solemn nightingale
 Warbles to the woodland dale.

See, descending angels shower
 Heaven's own bliss on Eden's bower:
 Peace on nature's lap reposes;
 Pleasure strews her guiltless roses:
 Joys divine in circles move,
 Link'd with innocence and love.

Hail, happy love, with innocence combin'd!
 All hail, ye sinless parents of mankind!

They paus'd:—the monarch, prostrate on his bed,
 Submissive, bow'd his head;
 Ador'd the works of boundless power divine:
 Then, anguish-struck, he cry'd (and smote his breast)
 Why, why is peace the welcome guest
 Of every heart but mine!

Now let the solemn numbers flow,
 Till he feel that guilt is woe.
 Heavenly harp, in mournful strain
 O'er yon weeping bower complain:
 What sounds of bitter pangs I hear!
 What lamentations wound mine ear!

In vain, devoted pair, these tears ye shed:
 Peace with innocence is fled.
 The messengers of grace depart:
 Death glares, and shakes the dreadful dart:
 Ah, whither fly ye, by yourselves abhor'd,
 To shun that frowning cherub's fiery sword!—
 Lo!

Hapless, hapless pair,
 Goaded by despair,
 Forlorn, through desert climes they go!
 Wake, my lyre! can pity sleep
 When heaven is mov'd, and angels weep!
 Flow, ye melting numbers, flow,
 Till he feel that guilt is woe.—

The king, with pride, and shame, and anguish torn,
 Shot fury from his eyes and scorn.
 The glowing youth,
 Bold in truth,

(So still should virtue guilty power engage)
 With brow undaunted met his rage.

See, his cheek kindles into generous fire:
 Stern he bends him o'er his lyre;
 And, while the doom of guilt he sings,
 Shakes horror from the tortur'd strings.

What sounds of terror and distress
 Rend yon howling wilderness!
 The dreadful thunders sound;
 The forked lightnings flash along the ground.

Why yawns that deep'ning gulf below?—
 'Tis for heaven's rebellious foe:—
 Fly, ye sons of Israel, fly,
 Who dwells in Korah's guilty tents must die!
 They sink!—Have mercy, Lord!—Their cries
 In dreadful tumult rise!
 Hark, from the deep their loud laments I hear!
 They lessen now, and lessen on the ear!
 Now destruction's strife is o'er!
 The countless host
 For ever lost! [more!—
 The gulf is clos'd!—Their cries are heard no
 But oh, my lyre, what accents can relate
 Sinful man's appointed fate!
 He comes, he comes! th' avenging God!
 Clouds and darkness round him roll:
 Tremble, earth! ye mountains, nod!
 He bows the skies, and shakes the pole.
 The gloomy banners of his wrath unfurl'd,
 He calls the floods, to drown a guilty world:
 "Ruin, lift thy baleful head;
 "Rouse the guilty world from sleep:
 "Lead up thy billows from their cavern'd
 "bed, [deep."—
 "And burst the rocks that chain thee in the
 Now, th' impetuous torrents rise;
 The hoarse-ascending deluge roars:
 Down rush the cataracts from the skies;
 The swelling waves o'erwhelms the shores.
 Just, O God, is thy decree!
 Shall guilty man contend with thee!
 Lo, hate and envy, sea-entomb'd,
 And rage with lust in ruin sleep;
 And scoffing luxury is doom'd,
 To glut the vast and ravenous deep!—
 In vain from fate th' astonish'd remnant flies:—
 "Shrink, ye rocks! ye oceans, rise!"—
 The tottering cliffs no more the floods controul;
 Sea following sea, ingulfs the ball:
 O'er the sunk hills the wat'ry mountains roll,
 And wide destruction swallows all:
 Now fiercer let th' impassion'd numbers glow:
 Swell the song, ye mighty choir!
 Wing your dreadful darts with fire!
 Hear me, monarch!—Guilt is woe!
 Thus while the frowning shepherd pour'd along
 The deep impetuous torrent of his song;
 Saul, stung by dire despair,
 Gnash'd his teeth, and tore his hair:
 From his blood, by horror chill'd,
 A cold and agonizing sweat distill'd:
 Then, foaming with unutterable smart,
 He aim'd a dagger at his heart.
 His watchful train prevent the blow;
 And call each lenient balm to sooth his frantic woe:
 But pleas'd, the shepherd now beheld
 His pride by Heaven's own terrors quell'd,
 Then bade his potent lyre controul
 The mighty storm that rent his soul.
 Cease your cares: the body's pain
 A sweet relief may find:
 But gums and lenient balms are vain,
 To heal the wounded mind.

Come, fair repentance, from the skies,
 O fainted maid, with upcast eyes!
 Descend, in thy celestial shroud,
 Vested in a weeping cloud!
 Holy guide, descend, and bring
 Mercy from th' Eternal King!
 To his soul your beams impart,
 And whisper comfort to his heart!—

They come: O king, thine ear incline!
 Listen to their voice divine:
 Their voice shall every pang compose,
 To gentle sorrow sooth thy woes;
 Till each pure wish to heaven shall soar,
 And peace return, to part no more!

Behold, obedient to their great command,
 The lifted dagger quits his trembling hand:
 Smooth'd is his brow, where sullen care
 And furrow'd horror couch'd with fell despair:
 No more his eyes with fury glow;
 But heavenly grief succeeds to hell-born woe.—
 See, the signs of grace appear:
 See the soft relenting tear,
 Trickling at sweet mercy's call!
 Catch it, angels, ere it fall!
 And let the heart-sent offering rise,
 Heaven's best-accepted sacrifice!—

Yet, yet again?—Ah see, the pang returns!
 Again with inward fire his heaving bosom
 burns!

Now, shepherd, wake a mightier strain;
 Search the deep, heart-rending pain;
 Till the large floods of sorrow roll,
 And quench the tortures of his soul.
 Almighty Lord, accept his pang sincere!
 Let heavenly hope dispel each dark temptation!
 And, while he pours the penitential tear,
 O visit him with thy salvation.—

Stoop from heaven, ye raptur'd throng:
 Sink, ye swelling tides of song!
 For lo! dissolv'd by music's melting power,
 Celestial sorrow rolls her plenteous shower,
 O'er his wan cheek the colours rise;
 And beams of comfort brighten in his eyes.
 Happy king, thy woes are o'er!
 Thy God shall wound thy soul no more!
 The pitying Father of mankind
 Meets the pure returning mind.

No more shall black despair afflict his soul:
 Each gentler sound, ye shepherds, now combine:
 Sweetly let the numbers roll:
 Sooth him into hope divine.
 Now lowly let the rustic measure glide,
 To quell the dark remains of self-consuming pride,
 Till nature's home-sprung blessings he confess,
 And own that calm content is happiness —
 Ye woods and lakes, ye cliffs and mountains!
 Haunted grot, and living fountains!
 Listen to your shepherd's lay,
 Whose artless carols close the day.
 Bounding kids around him throng;
 The steep rock echoes back his song:
 While all unseen to mortal eye,
 Sliding down the evening sky,

Holy peace, though born above,
Daughter of innocence and love,
Quits her throne and mansion bright,
Her crown of stars, and robe of light,
Serene, in gentle smiles array'd,
To dwell beneath his palm-tree shade.
Hail, meek angel! awful guest!
Still pour thy radiance o'er my breast!
Pride and hate in courts may shine:
The shepherd's calm and blameless tent is thine!---

Softly, softly breathe your numbers;
And wrap his weary'd soul in slumbers;
Gentle sleep, be calm his breast,
And close his eyes in healing rest!
Descend, celestial visions, ye who wait,
God's ministring powers, at Heaven's eternal gate!
Ye, who nightly vigils keep,
And rule the silent realms of sleep,
Exalt the just to joys refin'd,
And plunge in woe the guilty mind;
Descend!---Oh, waft him to the skies,
And open all heaven's glories to his eyes!
Beyond yon starry roof, by seraphs trod,
Where light's unclouded fountains blaze;
Where choirs immortal hymn their God,
Entranc'd in ecstasy of ceaseless praise.
Angels, heal his anguish!
Your harps and voices join!
His grief to bliss shall languish,
When sooth'd by sounds divine.

Behold, with dawning joy, each feature glows!
See the blissful tear o'erflows!
The fiend is fled!---Let music's rapture rise:
Now harmony, thy every nerve employ:
Shake the dome, and pierce the skies:
Wake him, wake him into joy.---

What power can every passion's throne controul?
What power can boast the charm divine,
To still the tempest of the soul?
Celestial harmony, that mighty charm is thine!
She, heavenly-born, came down to visit earth,
When from God's eternal throne
The beam of all-creative wisdom shone,
And spake fair order into birth.
At wisdom's call she rob'd yon glittering skies,
Attun'd the spheres, and taught consenting orbs
to rise.

Angels wrapt in wonder stood,
And saw that all was fair, and all was good.
'Twas then, ye sons of God, in bright array
Ye shouted o'er creation's day;
Then kindling into joy,
The morning stars together sung;
And through the vast ethereal sky
Seraphic hymns and loud hosannahs rung.

ON HONOUR.

TO THE LORD VISCOUNT LONSDALE.

Hic manus ob Patriam pugnando vulnera passi;
Quique sacerdotes casti dum vita manebat;
Quique pii Vates, et Phœbo digna locuti,

Inventas autqui vitam excoluere per artes;
Quique sui memores alios facere merendo;
Omnibus his nivea cinguntur tempora vita. VIRG.

Who shall go about
To cozen fortune, and be honourable
Without the stamp of merit? SHAKSP.

Yes: all, my lord, usurp fair honour's fame,
Though false as various be the boasted claim:
Th' ambitious miser swells his boundless store,
And dreads that highest scandal to be poor;
His wiser heir derides the dotard's aim,
And bids profusion bribe him into fame.
Oft honour, perching on the ribbon'd breast,
Sneers at weak justice, and defies th' arrest:
She dwells exulting on the tongues of kings;
She wakes the muse to flight, and plumes her wings; 10

The soldier views it on the shining blade;
The pedant 'midst the lumber in his head.
She to sell treason the disguise can lend,
And sheath her sword remorseless in a friend:
Her throne's fantastic pride, we often see
Rear'd on the tombs of truth and honesty;
Fops, templars courtiers, slaves, cheats, patriots, all
Pretend to hear, and to obey her call. [own.

Where fix we then?---Each boasting thus his Say, does true honour dwell with all or none? 20
The truth, my lord, is clear: though impious
pride

Be ever self-ador'd, self-deify'd;
Though fools by passion or self-love betray'd,
Fall down and worship what themselves have
made;

Still does the goddess, in her form divine,
O'er each grim idol eminently shine;
Array'd in lasting majesty, is known [one.
Through every clime and age, unchang'd, and
But how explor'd?---Take reason for your guide,

Discard self-love; set passion's glass aside; 30
Nor view her with the jaundic'd eye of pride. }

Ver. 1. In this and the succeeding verses, the various pretences of mankind to honour and fame are enumerated.—The lines themselves are imitated from the following, in the 11th Satire of Boileau:

Oui, l' honneur, Valincour, est chéri dans le monde—
L' Ambitieux le met souvent à tout brûler;
L' Avare, à voir chez le pactole rouler;
Un faux brave, à vanter sa prouesse frivole.

Ver. 21. Though they be thus inconstant and contradictory, yet true honour is a thing fixed and determinate.

Un vrai fourbe, à jamais ne garder sa parole;
Ce poëte, à noircir d' insipides papiers;
Ce Marquis, à savoir frauder ses créanciers.—
Interrogeons marchands, financiers, gens de guerre;
Courtisans, magistrats: chez eux, si je les croi,
L' intérêt ne peut rien, l' honneur seul fait la loi.

Yet judge not rashly from a partial view
Of what is wrong or right, or false or true;
Objects too near deceive th' observer's eye;
Examine those which at a distance lie.
Scarce is the structure's harmony descry'd
'Midst the tall column's, and gay order's pride;
But tow'rd the destin'd point your sight remove,
And this shall lessen still, and that improve,
New beauties gain upon your wond'ring eyes, 40
And the fair whole in just proportion rise.
Thus honour's true proportions best are seen,
Where the due length of ages lie between:
This separates pride from greatness, show from worth,

Detects false beauty, real grace calls forth;
Points out what merits praise, what merits blame,
Sinks in disgrace, or rises into fame.

Come then, from past examples, let us prove,
What raises hate, contempt, esteem, or love.

Can greatness give true honour? can expence?
Can luxury? or can magnificence? 51

Wild is the purpose, and the fruitless aim,
Like a vile prostitute to bribe fair fame;
Persuasive splendour vainly tempts her ear,
And e'en all potent gold is baffled here.
Ye pyramids, that once could threat the skies,
Aspiring tow'rs, and cloud-wrapt wonders rise!
To latest age your founder's pride proclaim;
Record the tyrant's greatness; tell his name;
No more:--The treacherous brick and moul-
d'ring stone 60

Are sunk in dust: the boasting title gone;
Pride's trophies swept by time's devouring flood;
Th' inscription want, to tell where once they stood.
But could they rival nature, time defy,
Yet what record but vice or vanity?

His the true glory, though his name unknown,
Who taught the arch to swell: to rise, the stone;
Not his, whose wild command fair art obey'd,
Whilst folly dictated, or passion sway'd. 69

No: spite of greatness, pride and vice are seen,
Shameful in pomp, conspicuously mean.

In vain, O Studley, thy proud forests spread;
In vain each gilded turret rears its head;

Ver. 29. If we would form an impartial judgment of what is truly honourable, we must abstract all considerations which regard ourselves.

Ver. 32. Not only so, but we must remove ourselves to a proper distance from the object we examine, lest some part should predominate in our eye, and occasion a false judgment of the whole.

Ver. 48. Therefore the surest method is, to prove by past examples what commands our love and esteem.

Ver. 50. Expence and grandeur cannot give true honour: Their most splendid monument vanish; and even should they last for ever, could not bestow real glory, if only the records of pride, tyranny, and vice.

Ver. 72, 73. Much less if purchased by oppression and guilt. [Studley in Yorkshire, the seat of the Aislabies, one of whom was deeply concerned in the dark transaction of the year 1720].

In vain thy lord commands the stream to fall,
Extends the view, or spreads the smooth canal,
While guilt's black train each conscious walk invade,

And cries of orphans haunt him in the shade.
Mistaken man! by crimes to hope for fame!

Thy imag'd glory leads to real shame:

Is villany self-hated? thus to raise

80

Upbraiding monuments of foul disgrace?

Succeeding times, and ages yet unborn,

Shall view the guilty scenes with honest scorn;

Disdain each beauty thy proud folly plann'd,

And curse the labours of oppression's hand.

Next view the hero in th' embattled field;

True honour's fruit can conquest's laurel yield?

Him only honour'd, only lov'd we find,

Who fights not to destroy, but save mankind:

Pelides' fury may our wonder move,

90

But godlike Hector is the man we love.

See William's sword a tyrant's pride disarm;

See Lewis trembling under Marlboro's arm:

Say, which to human kind are friends or foes;

And who detests not these, and loves not those?

Conquest unjust can ne'er command applause;

'Tis not the vict'ry charms you, but the cause:

Not Caesar's self can feign the patriot's part,

Nor his false virtues hide his poison'd heart;

But round thy brows the willing laurels twine, 100

Whose voice wak'd freedom in the savage mine!

Yes: truly glorious, only great is he,

Who conquers, or who bleeds for liberty.

"Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed,

"From Macedonia's madman to the Swede."

Like baleful comets flaming in the skies,

At destin'd times th' appointed scourges rise;

Awhile in streaming lustre sweep along,

And fix in wonder's gaze th' admiring throng;

But reason's eye detects the spurious ray,

110

And the false blaze of glory dies away.

Now all th' aerial cells of wit explore;

The mazy rounds of science travel o'er;

Search all the deep recesses of the mind,

And see, if there true honour sit enshrin'd.

Alas, nor wit nor science this can boast,

Oft dash'd with error, oft in caprice lost!

Transient as bright the short-liv'd bubbles fly!

And modes of wit, and modes of science die,

See Rab'lais once the idol of the age;

120

Yet now neglected lies the smutty page!

Ver. 86. True honour is not to be reaped from unjust conquest: It is not victory, but a just cause, that can engage our esteem.

Ver. 98.

Du premier Césars on vante les exploits;
Mais dans quel tribunal, jugé suivant les loix,
Eût-il pu disculper son injuste manie?

Ver. 101. Gustavus Vasa.

Ver. 116. Neither is true glory to be obtained by wit or science: They are chimerical: Sometimes attended with folly, or weakness: often stained with vice, and so render their possessors mischievous and infamous.

Of once renown'd Des Cartes how low the fall,—
His glory with his whirlpools vanish all!
See folly, wit— and weakness, wisdom stain —
And Villars witty—Bacon wise in vain!

Oft vice corrupts what sense and parts refine,
And clouds the splendour of the brighter line,
Sullies what Congreve, and what Dryden writ,—
This, fashion's slave: as that, the slave of wit.
In vain fair genius bids the laurel shoot, 130
The deadly worm thus eating at the root;
Corroded thus, the greenest wreaths decay,
And all the poet's honours fall away;
Quick as autumnal leaves, the laurels fade,
And drop on Rochester's and Otway's head.

Where then is found true honour, heavenly fair,
Ask Lonsdale, ask your heart—she dictates there.

Yes:—'tis in virtue—That alone can give
The lasting honour, and bid glory live:
On virtue's basis only fame can rise, 140
To stand the storms of age, and reach the skies:
Arts, conquests, greatness, feel the stroke of fate,
Shrink sudden, and betray th' incumbent weight;
Time with contempt the faithless props surveys,
"And buries madmen in the heaps they raise."

'Tis virtue only can the bard inspire,
And fill his raptur'd breast with lasting fire:
Touch'd by th' ethereal ray, each kindled line
Beams strong: still virtue feeds the flame divine,
Where'er she treads she leaves her footsteps bright
In radiant tracks of never-dying light; 151

These shed the lustre o'er each sacred name,
Give Spenser's clear, and Shakspeare's noble flame;
Blaze to the skies in Milton's ardent song,
And kindle the brisk-falling fire of Young;
These gild each humble verse in modest Gay;
These give to Swift the keen soul-piercing ray;
Mildly through Addison's chaste page they shine,
And glow and warm in Pope's immortal line.

Nor less the sage must live by virtue's aid; 160
Truth must support him, or his glories fade;
And truth and virtue differ but in name:
Like light and heat—distinguish'd, yet the same.

To truth and virtue the ascent is sure;
The wholesome stream implies the fountain pure;

Ver. 126.

*Je ne puis estimer ces dangereux auteurs
Qui de l'honneur, en vers, infâmes déserteurs,
Trahisant la vertu sur un papier coupable,
Aux yeux de leur lecteurs rendent le vice aimable.—*

*En vain l'esprit est plein d'une noble vigueur;
Le vers se sent toujours des bassesses de coeur.*

BOILEAU, l' Art Poet. Ch. 4.

Ver. 138 The foundation of true honour is virtue only.

Ver. 153. It is virtue only that gives the poet lasting glory: this proved by instances.

Ver. 164. The philosopher can only hope for true glory from the same source; because truth is his object, and nothing can be truth that tends to destroy virtue and happiness. Hence appears the madness, infamy, and falsehood of those de-

To taste the spring we oft essay in vain:
Deep lies the source, too short in reason's chain;
But those the issues of pure truth we know,
Which in clear strength through virtue's channel flow:

Error in vain attempts the foul disguise, 170
Still tasted in the bitter wave of vice;
Drawn from the springs of falsehood all confess
Each baneful drop that poisons happiness:
Gordon's thin shallows, Tindal's muddy page,
And Morgan's gall, and Woolston's furious rage;
Th' envenom'd stream that flows from Toland's quill,

And the rank dregs of Hobbes and Mandeville.

Truth, phoenix-like immortal, though she dies,
With strength renew'd shall from her ashes rise.

The work here characterized is intitled, "The Independent Whig; or a Defence of our Ecclesiastical Establishment;" yet it may be truly affirmed, that there is not one institution of the Church of England, but what is here misrepresented, and ridiculed with the lowest and most despicable scurrility.

Ver. 177. The author of that monstrous heap of contradiction and absurdity, "The Fable of the Bees, or private Vices public Benefits." The reader who is acquainted with the writings of these gentlemen, will probably observe a kind of climax in this place: ascending from those who have attempted to destroy the several fences of virtue, to the wild boars of the wood that root it up.

Ver. 180. Falsehood short-lived; truth eternal.

Ver. 184. Socrates and Newton.

The first and fairest in the list of fame.

Kings, statesmen, patriots, thus to glory rise;
On virtue grows the fame, or soon it dies;
But grafted on the vigorous stock, 'tis seen 200
Brighten'd by age, and springs in endless green:
Pride, folly, vice, may blossom for an hour,
Fed by court sunshine, and poetic show'r;
But the pale tendrils, nurs'd by flattery's hand,
Unwearied tendance fresh supplies demand;
By heats unnatural push'd to sudden growth,
They sicken at th' inclement blasts of truth;
Shook by the weakest breath that passes by,
Their colours fade, they wither, droop, and die.

'Tis virtue only that shall grow with time, 210
Live through each age, and spread through every clime.

See godlike patriots, gen'rous, wise, and good,
Stand in the breach, and stem corruption's flood!
See martyr-bishops at the stake expire,
Smile on the faggot, and defy its fire!
How great in exile Hyde and Tully shone!
How Alfred's virtues brighten'd all his throne;
From worth like this unbidden glories stream;
Nor borrow'd blaze it asks, nor fortune's beam;
Affliction's gloom but makes it still more bright,
As the clear lamp shines clearest in the night. 221

Thus various honours various states adorn,
As different stars with different glories burn;
Their orbs too wider, as their sphere is higher;
Yet all partake the same celestial fire.

See then Heav'n's endless bounty, and confess,
Which gives in virtue, fame, and happiness;
See mankind's folly, who the boon despise,
And grasp at pain and infamy in vice! 229

Ver. 198. Must build their fame on virtue.

Ver. 201. Flattery cannot raise folly or vice into true glory.

Ver. 214. The catalogue of these heroes, through the several ages of Christianity, is too large to be inserted in a work of this nature:
Those of our country were Ridley, Latimer, and the good (though less fortunate) Cranmer.

Ver. 216. Hyde, Earl of Clarendon.

Ver. 222. Thus it appears that every one has the power of obtaining true honour, promoting the happiness of mankind in his proper station.

Ver. 226. And thus the love of fame, though often perverted to bad ends, is naturally conducive of virtue and happiness.

Not so the man who mov'd by virtue's laws,
Reveres himself—and gains, not seeks applause;
Whose views concentr'd all to virtue tend;
Who makes true glory but his second end:
Still sway'd by what is fit, and just, and true,
Who gives to all whate'er to all is due;
When parties mad sedition's garb put on,
Snatches the highest praise—and is of none:
Whilst round and round the veering patriots roll,
Unshaken points to truth, as to his pole.
Contemns alike what factions praise or blame;
O'er rumour's narrow orbit soars to fame: 240
Unmov'd whilst malice barks, or envy howls,
Walks firm to virtue through the scoffs of fools;
No minion flatters; gains no selfish end;
His own—his king's—his country's—mankind's
friend;—

Him virtue crowns with wreaths that ne'er decay;
And glory circles him with endless day.

Such he who deep in virtue roots his fame;
And such through ages shall be Lonsdale's name.

FRAGMENT OF A RHAPSODY,

WRITTEN AT THE LAKES IN WESTMORELAND.

Now sunk the sun, now twilight sunk, and night
Rode in her zenith; nor a passing breeze
Sigh'd to the groves, which in the midnight air
Stood motionless; and in the peaceful floods
Inverted hung; for now the billow slept
Along the shore, nor heav'd the deep, but spread
A shining mirror to the moon's pale orb,
Which, dim and waning o'er the shadowy cliffs,
The solemn woods and spiry mountain-tops
Her glimmering faintness threw. Now every eye
Oppress'd with toil, was drown'd in deep repose,

Save that the unseen shepherd in his watch,
Propt on his crook, stood listening by the fold,
And gaz'd the starry vault and pendant moon.
Nor voice nor sound broke on the deep serene,
But the soft murmur of swift gushing rills,
Forth issuing from the mountain's distant steep (Unheard till now, and now scarce heard) proclaim'd

All things at rest, and imag'd the still voice
Of quiet whispering to the ear of night.

To fling their bosom'd fragrance round.

THE LIFE OF GRAINGER.

JAMES GRAINGER was born at Dunse in Berwickshire, in 1724. He was the son of John Grainger, Esq. of Houghton Hall, in the county of Cumberland; who, in consequence of some unsuccessful speculations in mining, was obliged to sell his estate; and having obtained an appointment in the Excise, settled at Dunse.

His father dying while he was young, the care of his education was kindly undertaken by his elder brother, by a former marriage, Mr. William Grainger of Wariston, a writing-master in Edinburgh, and afterwards a clerk in the office of the Comptroller of Excise, who placed him at the school of North Berwick, under the tuition of Mr James Rae, formerly one of the masters of the High-School in Edinburgh, a teacher of eminent learning and abilities.

In a copy of his translation of Tibullus, now lying before the present writer, by the favour of Mrs. Grainger, his brother's relict, is the following acknowledgment of his gratitude, in his own handwriting: "To Mr. Grainger of Wariston (to whom the public is chiefly indebted for aught that can be found praise-worthy in the following translation of Tibullus), from his affectionate brother, and humble servant, &c."

After the ordinary course of education, he was put apprentice to Mr. George Lauder, surgeon in Edinburgh, and afterwards attended the medical classes in the University.

He then went into the army, and was surgeon in Pulteney's Regiment, at the battle of Falkirk, in 1745, and afterwards served on the continent.

A military man, even in the most active campaign, has many hours of leisure; and as these cannot be spent more rationally than in some literary pursuit, he employed that part of his time, which was not devoted to his profession, in perusing the classics.

Upon his quitting the army, after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, he obtained the degree of Doctor of Physic and settled as a Physician in London; where his taste for polite literature procured him the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, Dr. Percy, Shenstone, Dodsley, Armstrong, and other men of wit and learning.

His first publication was his fine Ode on Solitude, printed in the 4th volume of Dodsley's "Collection," 1755, which completely established his poetical reputation.

Some time afterwards, he became tutor to John Bourryau, Esq. with a salary of 200 l. a year.

In 1759, he published his Poetical translation of the Elegies of Tibullus, and of the Poems of Sulpicia, with the original text, and notes critical and explanatory, in 2 vols. 12mo., which was begun and completed, several years before, when he was in the army.

In the Dedication to his pupil, he observes, "that it served to make many of his hours pass agreeably, which otherwise would have been extremely irksome, amid the din of arms and hurry of a camp life."

"A pleasing employment," he observes in the Advertisement, "is seldom neglected. Those elegies which particularly touched him, were first rendered into English; and as these make the greater part of Tibullus's Poems, he was contented afterwards to complete the work, by finishing as a task what was begun as an amusement."

"A favourite author," he adds, "on whom some labour has been bestowed, is not easily forgotten; the version therefore was retouched as often as opportunity served. All this while, indeed, the translator had no intention of making the public acquainted with his poetical amusements; he knew his poet too well, and admired him too much, to think he had done him justice; yet when Mr. Dart's translation of Tibullus was sent him, he was resolved to publish his own, that those who did not understand the original, might not form an idea of the most exact, elegant, and harmonious of the Roman elegiac poets, from the most inaccurate, harsh, and inelegant version of the present century."

In the beginning of the year following, he published A Letter to Tobias Smollet, M. D. occasioned by his criticism upon a late translation of Tibullus, by Dr. Grainger, 8vo.

The criticism imputed by his letter to Smollet, is in the "Critical Review" for December 1758. He observes, that the Editors of the "Critical Review," in the plan of their work, solemnly promised the public, "that they would revive the true spirit of criticism; that they would never condemn or extol without having first carefully perused the performance; that they would never act under the influence of connection or prejudice; that they would not venture to criticise a translation without understanding the original; that they would never invidiously wrest the sense, or misinterpret the meaning of any author; that they would never, without reluctance, disapprove even of a bad writer, who had the least title to indulgence; and they would not exhibit a partial and unfair assemblage of the blemishes of any production." These promises he proves to have been broken in every particular, by several examples, principally taken from the criticism on his version of Tibullus.

The same year, according to the information of Mrs. Grainger, he accompanied his pupil to the West-Indies, and settled at Basseterre in the island of St. Christopher, where he married Miss Burt, sister of William Matthew Burt, Esq. governor of that island, and practised physic with great reputation and success.

Here he began and finished his poem on the culture of the Sugar Cane, which he published in four books, with notes, 4to. 1764.

Sometime before the publication of his Poem, he revisited England, and submitted the manuscript to the correction of his literary friends Dr. Johnson, Dr. Percy, &c. whose names are affectionately commemorated in the work.

Mr. Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson, relates, that the Sugar Cane, when read in manuscript at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, made all the assembled wits burst into a laugh, when, after much blank verse pomp, the poet began a new paragraph thus:

Now, muse, let's sing of rats.

And what increased the ridicule was, that one of the company, who sily overlooked the reader, perceived that the word had been originally mice, and had been altered to rats as more dignified.

Of this little laughable incident, which has been often related, and for which there is no foundation in the printed poem, Dr. Percy, the present bishop of Dromore, who was his intimate friend, and has a particular regard to his memory, communicated to Mr. Boswell the following explanation.

"The passage in question was originally not liable to such a perversion; for the author having occasion in that part of his work to mention the havock made by rats and mice, had introduced the subject in a kind of mock heroic, and a parody of Homer's battle of the Frogs and Mice, invoking the muse of the old Grecian bard, in an elegant and well turned manner. In that state, I had seen it; but afterwards, unknown to me and other friends, he had been persuaded, contrary to his own better judgment, to alter it, so as to produce the unlucky effect abovementioned."

To the friendship of Grainger, Dr. Percy acknowledges that he owed the beautiful ballad of Bryan and Pereene, founded on a real fact that happened in the island of St. Christopher, printed in the first volume of his "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," 1764.

He did not long survive the publication of The Sugar Cane; but died at Basseterre in the island of St. Christopher, much honoured and lamented, December 16. 1767, in the 43d year of his age.

By his wife, who, it is believed, is yet living, he left two daughters, Agnes and Helen, one of whom is since dead.

His Translation of Tibullus and The Sugar Cane, have not been reprinted, though highly deserving of republication.

The Sugar Cane, Ode on Solitude, and Bryan and Pereene, are now, for the first time, received into a Collection of Classical English Poetry.

Dr. Percy gives this character of Grainger: "He was not only a man of genius and learning, but had many excellent virtues, being one of the most generous, friendly, and benevolent men I ever knew."

According to Mr. Boswell, "Dr. Johnson said, that Grainger was an agreeable man; a man who would do any good that was in his power. His Translation of Tibullus he thought was very well done; but the Sugar Cane did not please him; for he said, what could he make of a sugar cane? one might as well write the "Parsley Bed," a poem, or the Cabbage-Garden," a poem."

As a poet, his Sugar Cane, notwithstanding the ridicule thrown upon the subject of it by Dr. Johnson, entitles him to rank with Philips, Dyer, and other distinguished writers of didactic poetry in our language. In this useful and entertaining poem, the most languid reader will find his passions excited, and the imagination indulged to the highest pitch of luxury. A new creation is offered, of which an European has scarce any conception; the hurricane, the burning winds, a ripe cane-piece on fire at midnight, an Indian prospect after a finished crop, and nature in all the extremes of tropic exuberance.

The first book of this original performance treats of the cultivation of the sugar cane, and of the genus and qualities of the different soils in which the plant will generally grow. In proposing the subject, and throughout the whole poem, he keeps Virgil in his eye; nor should this be objected to him as a fault, since it was not an easy task to reconcile the wild imagery of an Indian picture to the strict rules of critical exactness. This, notwithstanding the difficulty of the undertaking, he has happily effected; and though he treads upon unclassic ground, yet maintains a classical regularity. After describing the soils proper for the cultivation of the canes, he finds an easy opportunity of introducing a description of St. Christopher, the place of his residence; which, in Shakspeare's words, may be justly styled

"A precious stone set in the silver sea."

On mentioning Jamaica, he naturally falls into a panegyric on Columbus—boast of Science, boast of man! The description of a Caribbean shower is extremely poetical; excepting an image at the beginning, which is rather low. The character of a good planter is beautifully described, and reminds us of Virgil's description of the pleasures of an husbandman, O felices nimium bona si sua norint agricolæ.

The second book treats of those external evils to which the cane is subject, such as the depredations of monkeys, rats, and other vermin; of weeds, of the different species of flies that infest it; of blasts and hurricanes. The last are dreadful even in imagination. The description of an earthquake is no less dreadfully just. The book concludes with a very tender story of two lovers, which may be more acceptable to the generality of readers, than any precepts of cultivation contained in the poem.

The cane-harvest, and the process of sugar-boiling, make the subject of the third book. Every poetical circumstance that attends these is artfully introduced; and much philosophical, chemical, and medical knowledge is displayed. The lovers of good liquor will not be displeased with the digression in praise of heart-recruiting Rum, which is formed of the skimmings of sugar. The West-Indian prospect, after the crop is finished, is perfectly poetical and picturesque. The whole passage is delightfully melodious, and not a little recommended by the novelty of the scenery.

The subject of the fourth book is the management of negroes; in treating of which, he gives no less agreeable proofs of his humanity than his poetry. In the passage beginning Yet, planter, let humanity prevail, he pathetically pleads in favour of these poor wretches, and the LIBERTIES OF MANKIND.

Oh, did the tender muse possess the power
Which monarchs have, and monarchs oft abuse,
'T would be the fond ambition of her soul
To quell tyrannic sway; knock off the chains
Of heart-debasing slavery; give to man,

Of every colour and of every clime,
 Freedom, which stamps him image of his God.
 Then laws, oppression's scourge, fair virtue's prop,
 Offspring of wisdom! should impartial reign,
 To knit the whole in well-accorded strife;
 Servants, not slaves; of choice, and not compell'd;
 The blacks should cultivate the cane-land isles.

The description of a negro dance is well wrought; and there is much local propriety in the concluding lines of the address to the Thames, towards the end of the book.

The Sugar Cane is one of those performances in which the exertion of a poet's genius may be very great, and yet his success but moderate. Indeed, the novelty of the subject, a manufacture unknown to the European world, loaded it with many difficulties. Terms of art, to which the ear has never been accustomed, have a peculiar uncouthness in poetry; and the Indian names of trees, herbs, and fruits, are unpleasing, even to the eye. The botanical names of vegetables would at least have appeared more classical, and are certainly more harmonious; but probably there might be some local reason against this. Yet the merit of this performance is not to be estimated from its reception, or its aptitude to catch the attention of a common European reader. The preceptive part has not merely the merit of serious utility. Grainger knew that he was writing to an age not less luxurious or refined than that of Rome in the days of Virgil. Like the elegant imitator of Hesiod, he has embellished his precepts with all the flowers of imagery. The attention is not long exercised by the gravity of didactic precepts, before it is relieved by some beautiful description, or some well-connected episode. In one particular, namely, that of extending the bounds of natural history, while he seems only to address the imagination, it may be safely asserted that Grainger has the advantage of many poets, and it is very probable, that the same turn of thinking which addicts a scholar to one, may incline him to the other. Much praise is due to him for the liberal and diffusive pains he has taken in his Notes to enlarge the knowledge of the West-Indian botany. They may indeed be considered, both in their medical and botanical capacity, as a very valuable part of the work; and possibly there are few parts of it more entertaining.

The Ode on Solitude, if he had written nothing else, is sufficient to entitle him to the distinction of a poet. In this exquisite performance are assembled some of the sublimest images in nature. In the present edition, the two last lines of the first stanza are altered from the copy in "Doddley's Collection," upon the authority of Dr. Percy.

Or Tadmor's marble wastes survey,
 Or in yon roofless cloyster stray;
 Or, at the purple dawn of day,
 Tadmor's marble wastes survey,

alluding to the account of Palmyra, published by Messrs. Dawkins and Wood, and the manner in which they were struck at the first sight of these magnificent ruins by break of day.

"Dr. Johnson," says Mr. Boswell, "praised Grainger's Ode on Solitude, and repeated with great energy his exordium,

O solitude, romantic maid,
 Whether by nodding towers you tread,
 Or haunt the desert's trackless gloom,
 Or hover o'er the yawning tomb,
 Or climb the Andes' clifted side,
 Or by the Nile's coy source abide,
 Or, starting from your half-year's sleep,
 From Hecla view the thawing deep,
 Or, at the purple dawn of day,
 Tadmor's marble wastes survey;

observing, "This, Sir, is very fine."

The ballad of Bryan and Pereene is one of the most beautiful productions of the kind in our language.

THE WORKS OF GRAINGER.

PREFACE TO THE SUGAR CANE.

Soon after my arrival in the West-Indies, I conceived the design of writing a poem on the cultivation of the Sugar Cane. My inducements to this arduous undertaking, were, not only the importance and novelty of the subject, but more especially this consideration; that, as the face of this country was wholly different from that of Europe; so whatever hand copied its appearances, however rude, could not fail to enrich poetry with many new and picturesque images.

I cannot, indeed, say I have satisfied my own ideas in this particular: yet I must be permitted to recommend the precepts contained in this poem. They are the children of truth, not of genius; the result of experience, not the productions of fancy. Thus, though I may not be able to please, I shall stand some chance of instructing the reader; which, as it is the nobler end of all poetry, so should it be the principal aim of every writer who wishes to be thought a good man.

It must, however, be observed, that, though the general precepts are suited to every climate where the Cane will grow, yet, the more minute rules are chiefly drawn from the practice of St. Christopher. Some selection was necessary; and I could adopt no modes of planting, with such propriety, as those I had seen practised in that island, where it has been my good fortune chiefly to reside since I came to the West-Indies.

I have often been astonished, that so little has been published on the cultivation of the Sugar-Cane, while the press has groaned under folios on every other branch of rural economy. It were unjust to suppose planters were not solicitous for the improvement of their art, and injurious to assert they were incapable of obliging mankind with their improvements.

And yet, except some scattered hints in Pere Labat, and other French travellers in America; an essay by Colonel Martyn of Antigua, is the only piece on plantership I have seen deserving a perusal. That gentleman's pamphlet, is, indeed, an excellent performance; and to it I own myself indebted.

It must be confessed, that terms of art look awkward in poetry; yet didactic compositions cannot wholly dispense with them. Accordingly we find that Hesiod and Virgil, among the ancients, with Philips and Dyer (not to mention some other poets now living in our own country), have been obliged to insert them in their poems. Their example is a sufficient apology for me; for in their steps I shall always be proud to tread.

Vos sequor, ô Graia gentis decus, inque vestris
nunc

Fixa pedum pono pressis vestigia signis;

Non ita certandi cupidus, quam propter amorem,
Quod vos imitari aveo.

Yet, like them too, I have generally preferred the way of description, wherever that could be done without hurting the subject.

Such words as are not common in Europe, I have briefly explained: because, an obscure poem affords both less pleasure and profit to the reader. For the same reason some notes have been added, which, it is presumed, will not be disagreeable to those who have never been in the West-Indies.

In a West-India georgic, the mention of many indigenous remedies, as well as diseases, was unavoidable. The truth is, I have rather courted opportunities of this nature, than avoided them. Medicines of such amazing efficacy, as I have had occasion to make trials of in these islands, deserve to be universally known. And wherever, in the following poem, I recommend any such, I beg leave to be understood as a physician, and not as a poet.

Spirit of inspiration, that didst lead
Th' Ascrean poet to the sacred mount,
And taught'st him all the precepts of the swain;
Descend from Heaven, and guide my trembling steps

To fame's eternal dome, where Maro reigns;
Where pastoral Dyer, where Pomona's bard,
And Smart and Sommerville in varying strains,
Their sylvan lore convey: O may I join
This choral band, and from their precepts learn
To deck my theme, which though to song un-

known,
Is most momentous to my country's weal!

So shall my numbers win the public ear;
And not displease Aurelius; him to whom,
Imperial George, the monarch of the main,
Hath given to wield the sceptre of those isles,
Where first the muse beheld the spiry cane,
Supreme of plants, rich subject of my song.

Ver. 22. The botanical name of the cane is Saccharum. The Greeks and Romans seem to have known very little of this most useful and beautiful plant. Lucan and Pliny are the only authors among the former who mention it; and, so far as I can find, Arrian is the only Greek. The first of these writers, in enumerating Pompey's eastern auxiliaries, describes a nation who made use of the cane-juice as a drink.

Dulces bibebant ex arundine succos.

The industrious naturalist says, "Saccharum et Arabia fert, sed laudatius India;" and the Greek historian, in his περιπλους of the Red-sea, tells us of a neighbouring nation who drank it also; his words are, μελι το καλαμινον το λεγομενον σακχαρι. The cane, however, as it was a native of the east, so has it been probably cultivated there time immemorial. The raw juice was, doubtless, first made use of; they afterwards boiled it into a syrup; and, in process of time, an inebriating spirit was prepared therefrom by fermentation. This conjecture is confirmed by the etymology, for the Arabic word سكر is evidently derived from the Hebrew כרש, which signifies an intoxicating liquor. When the Indians began to make the cane-juice into sugar, I cannot discover; probably, it soon found its way into Europe in that form, first by the Red-sea, and afterwards through Persia by the Black-sea and Caspian; but the plant itself was not known to Europe, till the Arabians introduced it into the southern parts of Spain, Sicily, and those provinces of France which border on the Pyrenean mountains. It was also successfully cultivated in Egypt, and in many places on the Barbary coast. From the Mediterranean, the Spaniards and Portuguese transported the cane to the Azores, the Madeiras, the Canary and the Cape-Verd islands, soon after they had been discovered in the fifteenth century: and, in the most of these, particularly Madeira, it thrived exceedingly. Whether the cane is a native of either the Great or Lesser Antilles cannot now be determined; for, their discoverers were so wholly employed in searching after imaginary gold mines, that they took little or no notice of the natural productions. Indeed the wars, wherein they wantonly engaged themselves with the natives, was another hindrance to physical investigation. But whether the cane was a production of the West-Indies or not, it is probable the Spaniards and Portuguese did not begin to cultivate it either there or in South America (where it certainly was found), till some years after their discovery. It is also equally uncertain whether sugar was first made in the island, or on the continent; and whether the Spaniards or Portuguese were the first planters in the new world. It is indeed most likely, that the latter erected the first sugar works in Brazil, as they are more lively and enterprising than the Spaniards. However, they had not long the start of the latter; for, in 1506, Ferdinand the Catholic, ordered the cane to be carried from the Canaries to St. Domingo, in which island one Pedro de Atencia soon after built an Ingenio de azucar, for so the Spaniards call a sugar work. But, though they began thus early to turn their thoughts to sugar, the Portuguese far outstripped them in that trade: for Lisbon soon supplied most of Europe with that commodity; and, notwithstanding the English then paid the Portuguese at the rate of 41. per cwt. for muscovado, yet that price, great as it may now appear, was probably much less than what the sugar from the East-Indies had commonly been sold for. Indeed, so intent was the Crown of Portugal on extending their Brazil trade, that that of the East-Indies began to be neglected, and soon after suffered a manifest decay. However, their sugar made them ample amends, in which trade they continued almost without a rival for upwards of a century. At last the Dutch, in 1623, drove the Portuguese out of all the northern part of Brazil; and, during the one and twenty years they kept that conquest, those industrious republicans learned the art of making sugar. This, probably, inspired the English with a desire of coming in for a share of the sugar-trade: accordingly, they, renouncing their chimerical search after gold mines in Florida and Guiana, settled themselves soon after at the mouth of the river Surinam, where they cultivated the cane with such success, that when the colony was ceded to the Dutch by the treaty of Breda, it maintained not less than 40,000 whites, half that number of slaves, and employed one year with another 15,000 ton of shipping. This cession was a severe blow to the English trade, which it did not recover for several years, though many of the Surinam planters carried their art and negroes to the Leeward Islands and Jamaica, which then began to be the object of political consideration in England.

Sugar is twice mentioned by Chaucer, who flourished in the fourteenth century; and succeeding poets, down to the middle of the last, use the epithet Sugar'd, whenever they would express any thing uncommonly pleasing: since that time, the more elegant writers seldom admit of that adjective in a metaphorical sense; but herein, perhaps, they are affectedly squeamish.

Ver. 29. The cane-juice being brought to the consistence of syrup, and, by subsequent coction, granulated, is then called muscovado (a Spanish word probably, though not to be found in Pineda) vulgarly brown sugar; the French term it sucre brut.

Ver. 34. There are two species of cedar commonly to be met with in the West-Indies, the white and red, which differ from the cedars cultivated in the Bermudas: both are lofty, shady, and of quick growth. The white succeeds in any soil, and produces a flower, which, infused like tea, is useful against fish poison. The red requires a better mould, and always emits a disagreeable smell before rain. The wood of both are highly useful for many mechanical purposes, and but too little planted.

Ibid. This is also a lofty tree. It is of quick growth and handsome, and produces a not disagreeable fruit, in a flat pod or legumen, about three inches long. It is a serviceable wood. In botanical books, I find three different names for the locust tree; that meant here is the Siliquea edulis.

Nor let his nectar, nor his silken pods.
 The sweet-smell'd cassia, or vast ceiba save.
 Yet spare the guava, yet the guaiac spare;
 A wholesome food the ripened guava yields,
 Boast of the housewife; while the guaiac grows
 A soveraign antidote, in wood, bark, gum, 40
 To cause the lame his useless crutch forego,
 And dry the sources of corrupted love.
 Nor let thy bright impatient flames destroy
 The golden shaddoc, the forbidden fruit,

Ver. 36. Canoes have been scooped out of this tree, capable of holding upwards of a hundred people; and many hundreds, as authors relate, have been at once sheltered by its shade. Its pods contain a very soft short cotton, like silk: hence the English call the tree the silk-cotton-tree; and the Spaniards name its cotton Lana de ceiba. It has been wrought into stockings; but its commonest use is to stuff pillows and matresses. It might be made an article of commerce, as the tree grows without trouble, and is yearly covered with pods. An infusion of the leaves is a gentle diaphoretic, and much recommended in the small-pox. The botanical name of the ceiba is Bombax; and the French call it Fromager. There are two species; the stem of the one being prickly, and that of the other smooth.

Ver. 37. The Spaniards call this tree guayava. It bears a fruit as large, and of much the same shape as a golden pippen. This is of three species, the yellow, the amazon, and the white; the last is the most delicate, but the second sort the largest. All are equally wholesome when stewed or made into jelly or marmalade. When raw, they are supposed to generate worms. Strangers do not always at first like their flavour, which is peculiarly strong. This, however, goes off by use, and they become exceedingly agreeable. Acofta says the Peruvian guavas surpass those of any other part of America. The bark of the tree is an astringent, and tans leather as well as that of oak. The French call the tree Goyavier.

Ver. 37. The lignumvitæ, or pockwood-tree. The virtues of every part of this truly medical tree are too well known to be enumerated here. The hardness and incorruptibility of its timber make abundant amends for the great slowness of its growth, for of it are formed the best posts for houses against hurricanes; and it is no less usefully employed in building wind-mills and cattle-mills.

Ver. 44. This is the largest and finest kind of orange. It is not a native of America, but was brought to the islands from the East-Indies, by an Englishman, whose name it bears. It is of three kinds; the sweet, the sour, and the bitter; the juice of all of them is wholesome, and the rind medical. In flavour and wholesomeness, the sweet shaddoc excels the other two, and, indeed every other kind of orange, except the forbidden fruit, which scarce yields to any known fruit in the four quarters of the world.

The white acajou, and rich sabbaca:
 For, where these trees their leafy banners raise
 Aloft in air, a gray deep earth abounds,
 Fat, light; yet, when it feels the wounding hoe,
 Rising in clods, which ripening suns and rain
 Resolve to crumbles, yet not pulverize: 50
 In this the soul of vegetation wakes;
 Pleas'd at the planter's call, to burst on day.
 Thrice happy he, to whom such fields are given!

For him the cane with little labour grows;
 'Spite of the dog-star, shoots long yellow joins;
 Concocts rich juice, though deluges descend.
 What if an after-offspring it reject?
 This land, for many a crop, will feed his mills;
 Disdain supplies, nor ask from compost aid.

Such, green St. Christopher, thy happy soil!—

Ver. 45. This is the Indian name of the avocado, avocado, avigato, or, as the English corruptly call it, alligator-pear. The Spaniards in South-America, name it aguacate; and, under that name it is described by Ulloa. However, in Peru and Mexico, it is better known by the appellation of palta or palto. It is a slightly tree, of two species; the one bearing a green fruit, which is the most delicate, and the other a red, which is less esteemed, and grows chiefly in Mexico. When ripe, the skin peels easily off, and discovers a butyraceous, or rather a marrowy like substance, with greenish veins interspersed. Being eat with salt and pepper, or sugar and lime-juice, it is not only agreeable, but highly nourishing; hence Sir Hans Sloane used to style it vegetable marrow. The fruit is of the size and shape of the pear named Lady's-thighs, and contains a large stone, from whence the tree is propagated. These trees bear fruit but once a year. Few strangers care for it; but, by use, soon become fond of it. The juice of the kernel marks linen with a violet-colour. Its wood is soft, and consequently of little use. The French call it Bois d' anise, and the tree Avocat: the botanical name is Persea.

Ver. 60. This beautiful and fertile island, and which, in Shakspeare's words, may justly be styled lies in seventh degree N. L. It was discovered by the great Christopher Columbus, in his second voyage, 1493, who was so pleased with its appearance, that he honoured it with his Christian name. Though others pretend, that appellation was given it from an imaginary resemblance between a high mountain in its centre, now called Mount Misery, to the fabulous legend of the Devil's carrying St. Christopher on his shouldres. But, be this as it will, the Spaniards soon after settled in it, and lived in tolerable harmony with the natives for many years; and, as their fleets commonly called in there to and from America for provision and water, the settlers, no doubt, reaped some advantage from their situation. By Templeman's Survey, it contains eighty square miles, and is about seventy miles in circumference. It is

A precious stone set in the silver sea,

Not Grecian Tempé, where Arcadian Pan,
Knit with the Graces, tun'd his silvan pipe,
While mute attention hush'd each charmed rill;
Not purple Enna, whose irriguous lap,

of an irregular oblong figure, and has a chain of mountains, that run south and north almost from the one end of it to the other, formerly covered with wood; but now the cane-plantations reach almost to their summits, and extend all the way, down their easy declining sides, to the sea. From these mountains, some rivers take their rise, which never dry up; and there are many others which, after rain, run into the sea, but which, at other times, are lost before they reach it. Hence, as this island consists of mountain-land and valley, it must always make a middling crop; for when the low grounds fail, the uplands supply that deficiency; and, when the mountain canes are lodged (or become watery from too much rain), those in the plains yield surprisingly. Nor are the plantations here only seasonable; their sugar sells for more than the sugar of any other of his Majesty's islands; as their produce cannot be refined to the best advantage, without a mixture of St. Kitts muscovado. In the barren part of the island, which runs out towards Nevis, are several ponds, which, in dry weather, crystallize into good salt; and below Mount Misery is a small solfaterre and collection of fresh water, where fugitive negroes often take shelter, and escape their pursuers. Not far below, is a large plain which affords good pasture, water, and wood; and, if the approaches thereto were fortified, which might be done at a moderate expence, it would be rendered inaccessible. The English, repulsing the few natives and Spaniards, who opposed them, began to plant tobacco here, A. D. 1623. Two years after, the French landed in St. Christopher on the same day that the English settlers received a considerable reinforcement from their mother-country; and, the chiefs of both nations, being men of sound policy, entered into an agreement to divide the island between them: the French retaining both extremities, and the English possessing themselves of the middle parts of the island. Some time after, both nations erected sugar works, but there were more tobacco, indigo, coffee, and cotton-plantations, than sugar ones, as these require a much greater fund to carry them on than those other. All the planters, however, lived easy in their circumstances; for, though the Spaniards, who could not bear to be spectators of their thriving condition, did repossess themselves of the island, yet they were soon obliged to retire, and the colony succeeded better than ever. One reason for this was, that it had been agreed between the two nations, that they should here remain neutral whatever wars their mother-countries might wage against each other in Europe. This was a wise regulation for an infant settlement; but, when King James abdicated the British throne, the French suddenly rose, and drove out the unprepared English by force of arms. The French colonists of Saint Christopher had soon reason, however, to repent their impolitic breach of faith; for, the expelled planters, being assisted by their countrymen from the neighbouring isles, and supported by a formidable fleet, soon recovered, not only their lost plantations, but obliged the French totally to abandon the island. After the treaty of Ryswick, indeed, some few of those among them, who had not obtained settlements in Martinico and Hispaniola, returned to Saint Christopher; but the war of the partition soon after breaking out, they were finally expelled, and the whole island was ceded in sovereignty to the crown of Great Britain, by the treaty of Utrecht. Since that time, St. Christopher has gradually improved, and it is now at the height of perfection. The Indian name of St. Christopher is Lianuiga, or the Fertile Island.

Ver. 71. The inhabitants of St. Christopher look whiter, are less fallow, and enjoy finer complexions, than any of the dwellers on the other islands. Sloane.

Ver. 111. The declension of the needle was discovered, A. D. 1492, by Columbus, in his first voyage to America; and would have been highly alarming to any, but one of his undaunted and philosophical turn of mind.

This century will always make a distinguished figure in the history of the human mind; for, during that period, printing was invented, Greek learning took refuge in Italy, the Reformation began, and America was discovered.

The island of Jamaica was bestowed on Columbus, for his discovery of the new world. Accordingly, his son James settled and planted it, early [A. D. 1509] the following century. What improvements the Spaniards made therein is no where mentioned; but, had their industry been equal to their opportunities, their improvements should have been considerable; for they continued in the undisturbed possession of it till the year 1596, when Sir Anthony Shirley, with a single man of war, took and plundered St. Jago de la Vega, which then consisted of 2000 houses. In the year 1635, St. Jago de la Vega was a second time plundered by 500 English from the Leeward islands, though that capital, and the fort (which they also took) were defended by four times their number of Spaniards. One and twenty years afterwards, the whole island was reduced by the forces sent thither by Oliver Cromwell, and has ever since belonged to England. It is by far the largest island possessed by the English in the West Indies. Sir Thomas Modyford, a rich and eminent planter of Barbadoes, removed to Jamaica, A. D. 1660, to the great advantage of that island; for he instructed the young English settlers to cultivate the sugar-cane; for which, and other great improvements which he then made them acquainted with, King Charles, three years afterwards, appointed him governor thereof, in which honourable employment he continued till the year 1669.

While weeps the guaiac, and while joints the cane.

Shall the muse celebrate the dark deep mould,
With clay or gravel mix'd?—This soil the cane
With partial fondness loves; and oft surveys
Its progeny with wonder.—Such rich veins 130
Are plenteous scatter'd o'er the sugar-isles:
But chief that land, to which the bearded fig,
Prince of the forest, gave Barbadoes name:

Ver. 132. This wonderful tree, by the Indians called the Banian-tree; and by the botanists Ficus Indica, or Bengaliensis, is exactly described by Q. Curtius, and beautifully by Milton in the following lines:

"The fig-tree, not that kind renown'd for fruit,
"But such as at this day to Indians known,
"In Malabar and Decan spreads her arms;
"Branching so broad and long, that in the ground,
"The bended twigs take root, and daughters
"grow
"About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade,
"High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between.
"There oft the Indian herdsman, shunning heat,
"Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds
"At loop-holes cut through thickest shade."

What year the Spaniards first discovered Barbadoes is not certainly known; this, however, is certain, that they never settled there, but only made use of it as a stock-island in their voyages to and from South America, and the islands; accordingly, we are told, when the English first landed there, which was about the end of the sixteenth or beginning of the seventeenth century, they found in it an excellent breed of wild hogs, but no inhabitants. In the year 1627, Barbadoes, with most of the other Caribbee-islands, were granted by Charles I. to the Earl of Carlisle, that nobleman agreeing to pay to the Earl of Marlborough, and his heirs, a perpetual annuity of 300*l.* per ann. for his waving his claim to Barbadoes, which he had obtained by patent, in the preceding reign. The adventurers to whom that nobleman parcelled out this island, at first cultivated tobacco; but that not turning out to their advantage, they applied with better success, to cotton, indigo, and ginger. At last, some cavaliers of good fortune, transporting themselves thither, and introducing the sugar-cane [A. D. 1647], probably from Brazil, in ten years time the island was peopled with upwards of 30,000 whites, and twice that number of negroes, and sent yearly very considerable quantities of sugar to the mother-country. At the Restoration, King Charles II. bought off the claim of the Carlisle family; and, in consideration of its then becoming a royal instead of a proprietary government, the planters gave the crown four and a half per cent. on their sugars; which duty still continues, although the island is said to be less able to pay it now than it was a hundred years ago. It is upwards of 20 miles long, and in some places almost 14 broad.

Chief Nevis, justly for its hot baths fam'd:
And breezy Mountferrat, whose wonderous springs
Change, like Medusa's head, whate'er they touch,
To stonny hardness; boast this fertile glebe.

Though such the soils the Antillean cane
Supremely loves; yet other soils abound,
Which art may tutor to obtain its smile. 140

Say, shall the experienc'd muse that art recite?
How sand will fertilize stiff barren clay?
How clay unites the light, the porous mould,
Sport of each breeze? And how the torpid nymph

Of the rank pool, so noisome to the smell,
May be solicited, by wily ways,
To draw her humid train, and, prattling, run
Down the reviving slopes? Or shall she say
What glebes ungrateful to each other art,
Their genial treasures ope to fire alone? 150
Reccord the different composts; which the cold
To plastic gladness warm? The torrid which
By soothing coolness win? The sharp saline,

Ver. 134. This island, which does not contain many fewer square miles than St. Christopher, is more rocky, and almost of a circular figure. It is separated from that island by a channel not above one mile and a half over, and lies to windward. Its warm bath possesses all the medical properties of the hot well at Bristol, and its water, being properly bottled, keeps as well at sea, and is no less agreeable to the palate. It was for many years the capital of the Leeward island government: and, at that period, contained more whites and blacks than it does at present, often mustering 3000 men. The English first settled there, A. D. 1628, Sixty-two years afterwards, the chief town was almost wholly destroyed by an earthquake; and, in 1706, the planters were well-nigh ruined by the French, who carried off their slaves contrary to capitulation. It must have been discovered in Columbus's second voyage, A. D. 1493.

Ver. 135. This island, which lies about 30 miles to the south-west of Antigua, is not less famous for its solfaterre (or volcano), and hot petrifying spring, than for the goodness of its sugars. Being almost circular in its shape, it cannot contain much less land than either Nevis or St. Christopher. It is naturally strong, so that when the French made descents thereon, in King William and Queen Anne's time, they were always repulsed with considerable loss. It was settled by that great adventurer Sir Thomas Warner, A. D. 1632, who sent thither some of his people from St. Christopher, for that purpose. In the beginning of the reign of Charles II. the French took it, but it was restored, A. D. 1667, by the treaty of Breda. In this island, the Roman catholics, who behaved well when our enemies attempted to conquer it, have many privileges, and of course are more numerous there, than in any other of the English Caribbee-islands. Its capital is called Plymouth. Columbus discovered it in his second voyage.

Which best subdue? Which mollify the four?

To thee, if fate low level land assign,
Slightly cohering, and of fable hue,
Far from the hill; be parsimony thine. [scend,
For though this year, when constant showers de-
The speeding gale, thy sturdy numerous stock,
Scarcely suffice to grind thy mighty canes; 160
Yet thou, with rueful eye, for many a year,
Shalt view thy plants burnt by the torch of day;
Hear their parch'd wan blades rustle in the air;
While their black sugars, doughy to the feel,
Will not ev'n pay the labour of thy swains.

Or, if the mountain be thy happier lot,
Let prudent foresight still thy coffers guard.
For though the clouds relent in nightly rain,
Though thy rank canes wave lofty in the gale;
Yet will the arrow, ornament of woe, 170
(Such monarchs oft times give) their jointing flint;

Yet will winds lodge them, ravening rats destroy,
Or troops of monkeys thy rich harvest steal.
The earth must also wheel around the sun,
And half perform that circuit; ere the bill
Mow down thy sugars: and though all thy mills,
Crackling, o'erflow with a redundant juice,
Poor tastes the liquor; coction long demands,
And highest temper, ere it saccharize;
A meagre produce. Such is virtue's meed, 180
Alas! too oft in these degenerate days.

Thy cattle likewise, as they drag the wain,
Charg'd from the beach, in spite of whips and shouts,

Will stop, will pant, will sink beneath the load;
A better fate deserving.—

Besides, thy land itself is insecure:
For oft the glebe, and all its waving load,
Will journey, forc'd off by the mining rain;
And, with its faithless burden, disarrange
Thy neighbour's vale. So Markley-hill of old, 190
As sung thy bard Pomona (in these isles
Yet unador'd), with all its spreading trees,
Full fraught with apples, chang'd its lofty site.

But, as in life, the golden mean is best;
So happiest he whose green plantation lies
Nor from the hill too far, nor from the shore.

Planter, if thou with wonder wouldst survey
Redundant harvests load thy willing soil;
Let sun and rain mature thy deep-hoed land,
And old fat dung co-operate with these. 200

Ver. 170. That part of the cane which shoots up into the fructification, is called by planters its arrow, having been probably used for that purpose by the Indians. Till the arrow drops, all additional jointing in the cane is supposed to be stopped.

Ver. 179. Shell, or rather marble quick-lime, is so called by the planters: without this, the juice of the cane cannot be concreted into sugar, at least to advantage. See Book III. With quick-lime the French join ashes as a temper, and this mixture they call Enyvrage. It is hoped the reader will pardon the introduction of the verb saccharize, as no other so emphatically expressed the author's

Be this great truth still present to thy mind;
 'The half well cultur'd far exceeds the whole,
 Which lust of gain, unconscious of its end,
 Ungrateful vexes with unceasing toil.

As, not indulg'd, the richest lands grow poor;
 And Liamuiga may, in future times,
 If too much urg'd, her barrenness bewail:
 So cultivation, on the shallowest soil,
 O'erspread with rocky cliffs, will bid the cane,
 With spiry pomp, all bountifully rise. 210
 Thus Britain's flag, should discipline relent,
 Spite of the native courage of her sons,
 Would to the lily strike: ah! very far,
 Far be that woful day: the lily then
 Will rule wide ocean with resistless sway;
 And to old Gallia's haughty shore transport
 The lessening crops of these delicious isles.

Of composts shall the muse descend to sing,
 Nor soil her heavenly plumes? The sacred muse
 Nought fordid deems, but what is base; nought
 fair 220

Unless true virtue stamp it with her seal.
 Then, planter, wouldst thou double thine estate,
 Never, ah! never be ashamed to tread
 Thy dung-heaps, where the refuse of thy mills,
 With all the ashes all thy coppers yield, [form,
 With weeds, mould, dung, and stale, a compost
 Of force to fertilize the poorest soil.

But, planter, if thy lands lie far remote,
 And of access are difficult; on these
 Leave the cane's sapless foliage; and with pens 230
 Wattled (like those the muse hath oft times seen,
 When frolic fancy led her youthful steps
 In green Dorchestria's plains), the whole enclose:
 There well thy stock with provender supply;
 The well-fed stock will soon that food repay.

Some of the skilful teach, and some deny,
 That yams improve the soil. In meagre lands,
 'Tis known the yam will ne'er to bigness swell;
 And from each mould the vegetable tribes,
 However frugal, nutriment derive: 240
 Yet may their sheltering vines, their drooping leaves,

Their roots dividing the tenacious glebe,
 More than refund the sustenance they draw.
 Whether the fattening compost in each hole
 'Tis best to throw, or on the surface spread,
 Is undetermin'd: trials must decide.

Unless kind rains and fostering dews descend,
 To melt the compost's fertilizing salts,
 A stunted plant, deceitful of thy hopes,
 Will from those beds flow spring where hot dung
 lies: 250

But, if 'tis scatter'd generously o'er all,
 The cane will better bear the solar blaze;
 Less rain demand; and, by repeated crops
 Thy land improv'd, its gratitude will show.

Enough of composts, muse; of soils enough:
 When best to dig, and when inhum the cane;
 A task how arduous! next demands thy song.

It not imports beneath what sign thy hoes
 The deep trough sink, and ridge alternate raise:
 If this from washes guard thy gemmy tops, 260
 And that arrest the moisture these require.

Yet should the site of thine estate permit,
 Let the trade-wind thy ridges ventilate;
 So shall a greener, loftier cane arise,
 And richest nectar in thy coppers foam.

As art transforms the savage face of things,
 And order captivates the harmonious mind,
 Let not thy blacks irregularly hoe
 But, aided by the line, consult the site
 Of thy demesnes, and beautify the whole. 270

So when a monarch rushes to the war,
 To drive invasion from his frightened realm;
 Some delegated chief the frontier views,
 And to each squadron and brigade assigns
 Their order'd station: Soon the tented field
 Brigade and squadron whiten on the sight,
 And fill spectators with an awful joy.

Planter, improvement is the child of time;
 What your fires knew not, ye their offspring know:
 But hath your art receiv'd perfection's stamp? 280
 Thou canst not say.--Unprejudic'd, then learn
 Of ancient modes to doubt, and new to try:
 And if philosophy, with wisdom, deign
 Thee to enlighten with their useful lore,
 Fair fame and riches will reward thy toil.

Then say, ye swains, whom wealth and fame
 inspire,
 Might not the plough, that rolls on rapid wheels,
 Save no small labour to the hoe-arm'd gang?
 Might not the culture taught the British hinds,
 By Ceres' son, unfailing crops secure, 290
 Though neither dung nor fallowing lent their aid?
 The cultur'd land recalls the devious muse;
 Propitious to the planter be the call:

meaning; for some chemists define sugar to be a native salt, and others a soap.

Ver. 206. The Caribbean name of St. Christopher.

Ver. 237. The botanical name of this plant is Dioscoria. Its leaves, like those of the water-melon, or gourd, soon mantle over the ground where it is planted. It takes about eight months to come to perfection, and then is a wholesome root, either boiled or roasted. They will sometimes weigh one and an half, or two pounds; but their commonest size is from six ounces to nine. They cannot be kept good above half a year. They are a native of South-America, the West-Indies, and of most parts of Guinea.

Ver. 260. The summit of the cane being smaller jointed, as well as softer, and consequently having more gemis, from whence the young sprouts shoot, is properer for planting than any other part of it. From one to four junks, each about a foot long, are put in every hole. Where too many junks are planted in one hole, the canes may be numerous, but can neither become vigorous, nor yield such a quantity of rich liquor as they otherwise would. In case the young shoots do not appear above ground in four or five weeks, the deficiencies must be supplied with new tops.

Ver. 290. Jethro Tull, Esq. the greatest improver in modern husbandry.

For much, my friend, it thee imports to know
The meetest season to commit thy tops,
With best advantage, to the well-dug mould.
The task how difficult, to cull the best
From thwarting sentiments, and best adorn
What wisdom chooses in poetic garb!
Yet, inspiration, come: the theme unsung, 300
Whence never poet cropt one bloomy wreath;
Its vast importance to my native land,
Whose sweet idea rushes on my mind,
And makes me 'mid this paradise repine,
Urge me to pluck, from fancy's soaring wing,
A plume to deck experience' hoary brow.

Attend! The son of time and truth declares,
Unless the low-hung clouds drop fatness down,
No bunching plants of vivid green will spring,
In goodly ranks, to fill the planter's eye. 310
Let then sagacity, with curious ken,
Remark the various signs of future rain.
The signs of rain, the Mantuan bard hath sung
In lofliest numbers; friendly to thy swains,
Once fertile Italy: but other marks
Portend the approaching shower, in these hot climes.

Short sudden rains, from ocean's ruffled bed,
Driven by some momentary squalls, will oft
With frequent heavy bubbling drops, downfall;
While yet the sun, in cloudless lustre, shines: 320
And draw their humid train o'er half the isle.
Unhappy he! who journeys then from home,
No shade to screen him. His untimely fate
His wife, his babes, his friends, will soon deplore;
Unless hot wines, dry clothes, and friction's aid,
His fleeting spirits slay. Yet not even these,
Nor all Apollo's arts, will always bribe
The insidious tyrant death, thrice tyrant here!
Else good Amyntor, him the Graces lov'd,
Wisdom caress'd, and Themis call'd her own, 330
Had liv'd by all admir'd, had now perus'd
"These lines, with all the malice of a friend."

Yet future rains the careful may foretell:
Mosquitos, sand-flies, seek the shelter'd roof,
And with fell rage the stranger guest assail,

Ver. 334. Mosquitos. This is a Spanish word, signifying a gnat, or fly. They are very troublesome, especially to strangers, whom they bite unmercifully, causing a yellow coloured tumour, attended with excessive itching. Ugly ulcers have often been occasioned by scratching those swellings, in persons of a bad habit of body. Though natives of the West-Indies, they are not less common in the coldest regions; for Mr. Maupertius takes notice how troublesome they were to him and his attendants on the snowy summit of certain mountains within the arctic circle. They, however, chiefly love shady, moist, and warm places. Accordingly they are commonest to be met with in the corners of rooms, towards evening, and before rain. They are so light as not to be felt when they pitch on the skin; and, as soon as they have darted in their proboscis, fly off, so that the first intimation one has of being bit by them, is the itching tumour. Warm lime juice is its remedy. The mosquito

Nor spare the sportive child; from their retreats
Cockroaches crawl displeasingly abroad:
These, without pity, let thy slaves destroy;
(Like harpies, they defile whate'er they touch):
While those, the smother of combustion quells. 340
The speckled lizard to its hole retreats,
And black crabs travel from the mountain down;

makes a humming noise, especially in the night-time.

Ver. 334. Sand-flies. This insect the Spaniards call Mosquitilla, being much smaller than the mosquito. Its bite is like a spark of fire falling on the skin, which it raises into a small tumour, accompanied with itching. But if the sand-fly causes a sharper and more sudden pain than the mosquito, yet it is a more honourable enemy, for remaining upon the skin after the puncture, it may easily be killed. Its colour is gray and black, striped. Lemon juice or first runnings cures its bite.

Ver. 337. This is a large species of the chafer, or scarabeus, and is a most disagreeable as well as destructive insect. There is scarce any thing which it will not devour; and wherever it has remained for any time, it leaves a nauseous smell behind it. Though better than an inch long, their thickness is no ways correspondent, so that they can insinuate themselves almost through any crevice, &c. into cabinets, drawers, &c. The smell of cedar is said to frighten them away: but this is a popular mistake; for, I have often killed them in presses of that wood. There is a species of cockroach, which, on account of a beating noise which it makes, especially in the night, is called the Drummer. Though larger, it is neither of so burnished a colour, nor so quick in its motions as the common sort, than which it is also less frequent, and not so pernicious; yet both will nibble peoples toe-ends, especially if not well washed, and have sometimes occasioned uneasy sores there. They are natives of a warm climate. The French call them Revoliers.

Ver. 341. This is meant of the ground lizard, and not of the tree lizard, which is of a fine green colour. There are many kinds of ground lizards, which, as they are common in the hot parts of Europe, I shall not describe. All of them are perfectly innocent. The Caribbeans used to eat them; they are not inferior to snakes as a medicated food. Snuff forced into their mouth soon convulses them. They change colour, and become torpid; but, in a few hours recover. The guana, or rather Iguana, is the largest sort of lizard. This, when irritated, will fly at one. It lives mostly upon fruit. It has a saw-like appearance, which ranges from its head all along its back, to its tail. The flesh of it is esteemed a great delicacy. The first writers on the Lues Venerica, forbid its use to those who labour under that disease. It is a very ugly animal. In some parts of South-America, the alligator is called Iguana.

Ver. 342. Black land-crabs are excellent eating; but as they sometimes will occasion a most violent cholera morbus (owing, say planters, to their feeding on the mahoe-berry), they should never be

Thy ducks their feathers prune; thy doves return,
In faithful flocks, and, on the neighbouring roof,
Perch frequent; where, with pleas'd attention,

Behold the deepening congregated clouds,
With sadness, blot the azure vault of Heaven.

Now, while the shower depends, and rattle loud
Your doors and windows, haste ye housewives,
place

Your spouts and pails; ye negroes, seek the shade,
Save those who open with the ready hoe 351

The enriching water-course: for, see, the drops,
Which fell with slight asperision, now descend
In streams continuous on the laughing land.

The coyest Naiads quit their rocky caves,
And, with delight, run brawling to the main;

While those, who love still visible to glad
The thirsty plains from never-ceasing urns,
Assume more awful majesty, and pour,

With force resistless, down the channel'd rocks.
The rocks, or split, or hurried from their base, 361

With trees, are whirl'd impetuous to the sea:
Fluctuates the forest; the torn mountains roar:

The main itself recoils for many a league,
While its green face is chang'd to sordid brown.

A grateful freshness every sense pervades;
While beats the heart with unaccustom'd joy:

Her stores fugacious memory now recalls;
And fancy prunes her wings for loftiest flights.

The mute creation share the enlivening hour; 370
Bounds the brisk kid, and wanton plays the lamb.

The drooping plants revive; ten thousand blooms,
Which, with their fragrant scents, perfume the air,

Burst into being; while the canes put on
Glad nature's liveliest robe, the vivid green.

But chief, let fix'd attention cast his eye
On the cap mountain, whose high rocky verge

The wild fig canopies (vast woodland king,
Beneath thy branching shade a banner'd host

May lie in ambush) ! and whose shaggy sides, 380
Trees shade, of endless green, enormous size,

Wondrous in shape, to botany unknown,
Old as the deluge.— There, in secret haunts,

The watery spirits ope their liquid court;
There, with the wood-nymphs, link'd in festal

band,
(Soft airs and Phœbus wing them to their arms)

Hold amorous dalliance. Ah, may none profane,
With fire, or steel, their mystic privacy:

For there their fluent offspring first see day,
Coy infants sporting; silver footed dew 390

To bathe by night thy sprouts in genial balm;
The green-stol'd Naiad of the tinkling rill, dressed till they have fed for some weeks in a crab-house, after being caught by the negroes. When they moult, they are most delicate; and then it is believed, never poison. This, however, is certain, that at that time they have no gall, but, in its stead, the petrification called a Crab's eye is found. As I have frequently observed their great claws (with which they severely bite the unwary) of very unequal sizes, it is probable, these regenerate when broke off by accident, or otherwise.

Whose brow the fern-tree shades; the power of rain

To glad the thirsty soil, on which, arrang'd,
The gemmy summits of the cane await

Thy negroe-train (in linen lightly wrapt),
Who now that painted Iris girds the sky,

(Aërial arch, which fancy loves to stride) !
Disperse, all jocund, o'er the long hoed land.

The bundles some untie; the withered leaves,
Others strip artful off, and careful lay, 401

Twice one junk, distant in the amplest bed:
O'er these, with hasty hoe, some lightly spread

The mounded interval; and smooth the trench:
Well pleas'd, the master swain reviews their toil;

And rolls, in fancy, many a full fraught cask.
So, when the shield was forg'd for Peleus' son,

The swarthy Cyclops shar'd the important task:
With bellows, some reviv'd the seeds of fire;

Some gold and brass, and steel, together fus'd 410
In the vast furnace; while a chosen few,

In equal measures lifting their bare arms,
Inform the mass; and, hissing in the wave,

Temper the glowing orb: their fire beholds,
Amaz'd, the wonders of his fusile art.

While Procyon reigns yet fervid in the sky;
While yet the fiery sun in Leo rides;

And the sun's child, the mail'd anana, yields
His regal apple to the ravish'd taste;

And thou green avocado, charm of sense, 420
Thy ripened marrow liberally bestow'st;

Begin the distant mountain-land to plant:
So shall thy canes defy November's cold,

Ungential to the upland young; so best,
Unstinted by the arrow's deadening power,

Long yellow joints shall flow with generous juice.
But, till the lemon, orange, and the lime,

Amid their verdant umbrage, countless glow
With fragrant fruit of vegetable gold;

Till yellow plantanes bend the unstain'd bough
With crooked clusters, prodigally full;

Till Capricorn command the cloudy sky;
And moist Aquarius melt in daily showers,

Friend to the cane isles; trust not thou thy tops,
Thy future riches, to the lowland plain:

Ver 393. This only grows in mountainous situations. Its stem shoots up to a considerable height, but it does not divide into branches till near the summit, where it shoots out horizontally, like an umbrella, into leaves, which resemble those of the common fern. I know of no medical uses whereto this singularly beautiful tree has been applied; and, indeed, its wood being spongy, is seldom used to economical purposes. It however, serves well enough for building mountain huts, and temporary fences for cattle.

Ver. 48. This is the pine-apple, and needs no description: the cherimoya, a South-American fruit, is by all who have tasted both, allowed to surpass the pine, and is even said to be more wholesome. The botanical name of the pine-apple is bromelia. Of the wild pine-apple or ananas bravo, hedges are made in South-America. It produces an inferior sort of fruit.

And if kind Heaven, in pity to thy prayers,
Shed genial influence; as the earth absolves
Her annual circuit, thy rich ripened canes
Shall load thy waggons, mules, and negroe-train.

But chief thee, planter, it imports to mark 440
(Whether thou breathe the mountain's humid air,
Or pant with heat continual on the plain);
What months relent, and which from rain are free.

In different islands of the ocean stream,
Even in the different parts of the same isle,
The seasons vary; yet attention soon
Will give thee each variety to know.

This once observ'd; at such a time inhume
Thy plants, that, when they joint (important age,
Like youth just stepping into life), the clouds 450
May constantly bedew them: so shall they
Avoid those ails, which else their manhood kill.

Six times the changeeful moon must blunt her horns,

And fill with borrowed light her silvery urn;
Ere thy tops, trusted to the mountain-land,
Commence their jointing: but four moons suffice
To bring to puberty the lowland cane.

In plants, in beasts, in man's imperial race,
An alien mixture meliorates the breed;
Hence canes, that sickened dwarfish on the plain,
Will shoot with giant-vigour on the hill. 461

Thus all depends on all: so God ordains.
Then let not man for little selfish ends,
(Britain, remember this important truth);
Presume the principle to counteract
Of universal love; for God is love,
And wide creation shares alike his care.

'Tis said by some, and not unletter'd they,
That chief the planter, if he wealth desire,
Should note the phases of the fickle moon. 470
On thee, sweet empress of the night, depend

The tides; stern Neptune pays his court to thee;
The winds, obedient at thy bidding shift,
And tempests rise or fall; even lordly man,
Thine energy controuls.—Not so the cane;
The cane its independency may boast,
Though some less noble plants thine influence
own.

Of mountain-lands economy permits
A third, in canes of mighty growth to rise:
But, in the lowland plain, the half will yield 480
Though not so lofty, yet a richer cane,
For many a crop; if seasons glad the soil.

While rolls the sun from Aries to the Bull,
And till the virgin his hot beams enflame;
The cane, with richest, most redundant juice,
Thy spacious coppers fills. Then manage so,
By planting in succession; that thy crops
The wondering daughters of the main may waft
To Britain's shore, ere Libra weigh the year:
So shall thy merchant cheerful credit grant, 490
And well-earn'd opulence thy cares repay.

Thy fields thus planted; to secure the canes
From the goat's baneful tooth: the churning boar;
From thieves; from fire or casual or design'd;

Ver. 482 Long continued and violent rains, are called seasons, in the West-Indies.

Unfailing herbage to thy toiling herds
Would'st thou afford; and the spectators charm
With beauteous prospects: let the frequent hedge
Thy green plantation, regular, divide.

With limes, with lemons, let thy fences glow,
Grateful to sense; now children of this clime: 500
And here and there let oranges erect
Their shapely beauties, and perfume the sky.
Nor less delightful blooms the logwood hedge,
Whose wood to coction yields a precious balm,
Specific in the flux: Endemial ail,
Much cause have I to weep thy fatal sway.
But God is just, and man must not repine,
Nor shall the ricinus unnoted pass;
Yet, if the cholic's deathful pangs thou dread'st,
Taste not its luscious nut. The acassee, 510
With which the sons of Jewry, stiff-neck'd race,
Conjecture says, our God-Messiah crown'd;
Soon shoots a thick impenetrable fence,

Ver. 500. It is supposed that oranges, lemons, and limes were introduced into America by the Spaniards; but I am more inclined to believe they are natural to the climate. The Spaniards themselves probably had the two first from the Saracens; for the Spanish noun Naranja, whence the English word Orange, is plainly Arabic.

Ver. 503. Linnæus's name for this useful tree is Hæmotoxylon, but it is better known to physicians by that of Lignum campechense. Its virtues, as a medicine, and properties as an ingredient in dying, need not to be enumerated in this place. It makes a no less strong than beautiful hedge in the West-Indies, where it rises to a considerable height.

Ver. 508. This shrub is commonly called the physic-nut. It is generally divided into three kinds; the common, the French, and the Spanish, which differ from each other in their leaves and flowers, if not in their fruit or seeds. The plant from which the castor-oil is extracted, is also called Ricinus, though it has no resemblance to any of the former, in leaves, flowers, or seeds. In one particular they all agree, viz. in their yielding to coction or expression, a purgative or emetic oil. The Spaniards name these nuts Avellanas purgativas; hence Ray terms them Avellana purgatrice novi orbis. By roasting they are supposed to lose part of their virulency, which is wholly destroyed, say some people, by taking out a leaf-like substance that is to be found between the lobes. The nut exceeds a walnut, or even an almond, in sweetness, and yet three or four of them will operate briskly both up and down. The French call this useful shrub Médecinier. That species of it which bears red coral, like flowers, is named Bellyach by the Barbadians; and its ripe seeds are supposed to be specific against melancholy.

Ver. 510. Acacia. This is a species of thorn; the juice of the root is supposed to be poisonous. Its seeds are contained in a pod or ligumen. It is of the class of the syngenesia. No astringent juice is extracted from it. Its trivial name is Casbarw. Tournefort describes it in his voyage to the Le-

Whose scent perfumes the night and morning sky,
Though baneful be its root. The privet too,
Whose white flowers rival the first drifts of snow
On Grampia's piny hills; (O might the muse
Tread, flush'd with health, the Grampian hills again)!

Emblem of innocence shall grace my song.
Boast of the shrubby tribe, carnation fair, 520
Nor thou repine, though late the muse record
Thy bloomy honours. Tipt with burnish'd gold,
And with imperial purple crested high,
More gorgeous than the train of Juno's bird,
Thy bloomy honours oft the curious muse
Hath seen transported: seen the humming bird,
Whose burnish'd neck bright glows with verdant
gold;

Least of the winged vagrants of the sky,
Yet dauntless as the strong-pounc'd bird of Jove;
With fluttering vehemence attack thy cups, 530
To rob them of their nectar's luscious store.

But if with stones thy meagre lands are spread;
Be these collected, they will pay thy toil:
And let Vitruvius, aided by the line,
Fence thy plantations with a thick-built wall.

want. Some call it the Holy Thorn, and others
Sweet Briar. The half ripe pod affords a strong cement; and the main stem, being wounded, produces a transparent gum, like the Arabic, to which tree this bears a strong resemblance.

Ver. 515. Ligustrum. This shrub is sufficiently known. Its leaves and flowers make a good gar-gle in the aphthæ and ulcerated throat.

Ver. 520. This is indeed a most beautiful flowering shrub. It is a native of the West-Indies, and called, from a French governor, named Depoinci, Poinciana. If permitted, it will grow twenty feet high; but, in order to make it a good fence, it should be kept low. It is always in blossom.
Though not purgative, it is of the senna kind.
Its leaves and flowers are stomachic, carminative, and emmenagogue. Some authors name it Couda pavonis, on account of its inimitable beauty; the flowers have a physicky smell. How it came to be called Doodle-doo I know not; the Barbadians more properly term it Flower Fence. This plant grows also in Guinea.

Ver. 526. The humming bird is called Pica-flore by the Spaniards, on account of its hovering over flowers, and sucking their juices, without lacerating, or even so much as discomposing their petals. Its Indian name, says Ulloa, is Guinde, though it is also known by the appellation of Rabilargo and Lizongero. By the Caribbeans it was called Collobree. It is common in all the warm parts of America. There are various species of them, all exceeding small, beautiful and bold.
The crested one, though not so frequent, is yet more beautiful than the others. It is chiefly to be found in the woody parts of the mountains. Edwards has described a very beautiful humming bird, with a long tail, which is a native of Surinam, but which I never saw in these islands.
They are easily caught in rainy weather.

On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear;
They soon a formidable fence will shoot:
Wild liquorice here its red beads loves to hang,
Whilst scandent blossoms, yellow, purple, blue,
Unhurt, wind round its shield-like leaf and spears.
Nor is its fruit inelegant of taste, 541
Though more its colour charms the ravish'd eye;
Vermeil, as youthful beauty's roscat hue;
As thine, fair Christobelle: ah, when will fate,
That long hath scowl'd relentless on the bard,
Give him some small plantation to enclose,
Which he may call his own? Not wealth he craves,

But independence: yet, if thou, sweet maid,
In health and virtue bloom; though worse betide,
Thy smile will smooth adversity's rough brow.

In Italy's green bounds the myrtle shoots 551
A fragrant fence, and blossoms in the sun.
Here, on the rockiest verge of these blest isles,
With little care, the plant of love would grow.
Then to the citron join the plant of love,
And with their scent and shade enrich your isles.

Yet some pretend, and not unspecious they,
The wood-nymphs foster the contagious blail.
Foes to the dryads, they remorseless fell 560

Ver. 536. The botanical name of this plant is Opuntia; it will grow in the barrenest soils, and on the tops of walls, if a small portion of earth be added. There are two sorts of it, one whose fruit is roundish and sweet, the other, which has more the shape of a fig, is sour. The former is sometimes eaten, but the other seldom. The French call them Pomme de Raquette. Both fruit and leaves are guarded with sharp prickles; and, even in the interior part of the fruit, there is one which must be removed before it is eaten. The leaves, which are half an inch thick, having a sort of pulp interposed between their surfaces, being deprived of their spines, and softened by the fire, make no bad poultice for inflammations. The juice of the fruit is an innocent fucus, and is often used to tinge guava jellies. The opuntia, upon which the cochineal insect breeds, has no spines,
and is cultivated with care in South-America,
where it also grows wild. The prickly pear makes a strong fence, and is easily trimmed with a scymitar. It grows naturally in some parts of Spain.

Ver. 538. This is a scandent plant, from which the negroes gather what they call Jumbee Beeds.
These are about the size of pigeon-peas, almost round, of a red colour, with a black speck on one extremity. They act as an emetic; but, being violent in their operation, great caution should be observed in using them. The leaves make a good pectoral drink in disorders of the breast. By the French it is named Petit Panacoco, to distinguish it from a large tree, which bears seeds of the same colours, only much bigger. This tree is a species of black ebony.

Ver. 559. So a particular species of blight is called in the West-Indies. See its description in the second book.

Each shrub of shade, each tree of spreading root,
That woo the first glad fannings of the breeze.
Far from the muse be such inhuman thoughts;
Far better reck's she of the woodland tribes,
Earth's eldest birth, and earth's best ornament.

Ask him, whom rude necessity compels
To dare the noontide fervour, in this clime,
Ah, most intensely hot; how much he longs
For cooling vast impenetrable shade? 562

The muse, alas, th' inexperience'd muse can tell:
Oft hath she travell'd, while solstitial beams,
Shot yellow dearths on the devoted land;
Oft, oft hath she their ill-judg'd avarice blam'd,
Who, to the stranger, to their slaves and herds,
Denied this best of joys, the breezy shade.

And are there none, whom generous pity warms,
Friends to the woodland reign; whom shades delight? [trees;

Who, round their green domains, plant hedge-row
And with cool cedars screen the public way?

Yes, good Montano; friend of man was he: 580

Him persecution, virtue's deadliest foe,
Drove a lorn exile from his native shore;

From his green hills, where many a fleecy flock,
Where many a heifer crept their wholesome food;

And many a swain, obedient to his rule,
Him their lov'd master, their protector own'd.

Yet, from that paradise, to Indian wilds,
To tropic suns, to fell barbaric hinds,

A poor outcast, an alien, did he roam;

His wife, the partner of his better hours, 590

And one sweet infant cheer'd his dismal way.

Unus'd to labour; yet the orient sun,

Yet western Phœbus, saw him wield the hoe.

At first a garden all his wants supplied,

(For temperance sat cheerful at his board),

With yams, cassada, and the food of strength,

Ver. 572. The yellow fever, to which Europeans of a sanguine habit of body, and who exceed in drinking or exercise, are liable on their arrival in the West-Indies. The French call it Maladie de Siame, or more properly, La Fievre des Matelots. Those who have lived any time in the islands are no more subject to this disease than the Creoles, whence, however, some physicians have too hastily concluded that it was of foreign extraction.

Ver. 596. Cassavi, cassava, is called Jatropha by botanists. Its meal makes a wholesome and well-tasted bread, although its juice be poisonous. There is a species of cassada which may be eat with safety, without expressing the juice; this the French call camagnoc. The colour of its root is white, like a parsnip; that of the common kind is of a brownish red, before it is scraped. By coction the cassada-juice becomes an excellent sauce for fish; and the Indians prepare many wholesome dishes from it. I have given it internally mixed with flour, without any bad consequences; it did not, however, produce any of the salutary effects I expected. A good starch is made from it. The stem is knotty, and, being cut into small joints and planted, young sprouts shoot up from each knob. Horses have been poisoned by eating its leaves. The French name it Manibot, Magnoc,

Thrice-wholesome tancies: while a neighbouring dell,

(Which nature to the fourtop had resign'd),
With ginger, and with Raleigh's pungent plant,
Gave wealth; and gold bought better land and slaves, 650

Heaven blest'd his labour: now the cotton-shrub, and Manioc, and the Spaniards Mandioca. It is pretended that all creatures but man eat the raw root of the cassada with impunity; and, when dried, that it is a sovereign antidote against venomous bites. A wholesome drink is prepared from this root by the Indians, Spaniards, and Portuguese, according to Pineda. There is one species of this plant which the Indians only use, and is by them called Baccacoua.

Ver. 597. This wholesome root, in some of the islands, is called Edda: Its botanical name is Arum maximum Aegyptiacum. There are three species of tancies, the blue, the scratching, and that which is commonly roasted. The blossoms of all three are very fragrant, in a morning or evening. The young leaves, as well as the spiral stalks which support the flower, are eaten by negroes as a sallad. The root makes a good broth in dysenteric complaints. They are seldom so large as the yam, but most people think them preferable in point of taste.

Ver. 598. The true Indian name of this tree is Suisaak. It grows in the barrenest places to a considerable height. Its fruit will often weigh two pounds. Its skin is green, and somewhat prickly. The pulp is not disagreeable to the palate, being cool, and having its sweetness tempered with some degree of an acid. It is one of the Anonas, as are also the custard, star, and sugar-apples. The leaves of the fourtop are very shining and green. The fruit is wholesome, but seldom admitted to the tables of the elegant. The seeds are dispersed through the pulp like the guava. It has a peculiar flavour. It grows in the East as well as the West Indies. The botanical name is Guanabanus. The French call it Petit Corosal, or Cœur de Bœuf, to which the fruit bears a resemblance. The root, being reduced to a powder, and snuffed up the nose, produces the same effect as tobacco. Taken by the mouth, the Indians pretend it is a specific in the epilepsy.

Ver. 601. The fine down, which this shrub produces to envelope its seeds, is sufficiently known. The English, Italian, and French names, evidently are derived from the Arabic Algodon, as the Spaniards at this day call it. It was first brought by the Arabians into the Levant, where it is now cultivated with great success. Authors mention four species of cotton; but they confound the silk-cotton tree, or Ceiba, among them. The flower of the West-India cotton shrub is yellow, and campanulated. It produces twice every year. That of Cayenne is the best of any that comes from America. This plant is very apt to be destroyed by a grub within a short time; bating that, it is a profitable production. Pliny mentions Gossypium,

Grac'd with broad yellow flowers, unhurt by worms,
O'er many an acre shed its whitest down :
The power of rain, in genial moisture bath'd
His cacao-walk, which teem'd with marrowy pods;
His coffee bath'd, that glow'd with berries, red
As Danæ's lip, or, Theodosia, thine,
Yet countless as the pebbles on the shore ;
Oft, while drought kill'd his impious neighbour's
grove.
In time, a numerous gang of sturdy slaves, 610
Well-fed, well-cloth'd, all emulous to gain

which is the common botanical name of cotton. It is likewise called Zylon. Martinus, in his Philological Lexicon, derives cotton from the Hebrew word קטון Katon, (or, as pronounced by the German Jews, Kotoun).

Ver. 605. It is also called Cocca and Cocô. It is a native of some of the provinces of South America, and a drink made from it was the common food of the Indians before the Spaniards came among them, who were some time in those countries ere they could be prevailed upon to taste it; and it must be confessed, that the Indian chocolate had not a tempting aspect; yet I much doubt whether the Europeans have greatly improved its wholesomeness, by the addition of vanillas and other hot ingredients. The tree often grows fifteen or twenty feet high, and is straight and handsome. The pods, which seldom contain less than thirty nuts of the size of a flatted olive, grow upon the stem and principal branches. The tree loves a moist, rich, and shaded soil: Hence those who plant cacao-walks, sometimes screen them by a hardier tree, which the Spaniards aptly term Madre de Cacao. They may be planted fifteen or twenty feet distant, though some advise to plant them much nearer, and perhaps wisely; for it is an easy matter to thin them, when they are past the danger of being destroyed by dry weather, &c. Some recommend planting cassada, or bananas, in the intervals, when the cacao-trees are young, to destroy weeds, from which the walks cannot be kept too free. It is generally three years before they produce good pods; but, in six years, they are in highest perfection. The pods are commonly of the size and shape of a large cucumber. There are three or four sorts of cacao, which differ from one another in the colour and goodness of their nuts. That from the Caraccas is certainly the best. None of the species grow in Peru. Its alimentary, as well as physical properties, are sufficiently known. This word is Indian.

Ver. 606. This is certainly of Arabic derivation; and has been used in the East, as a drink, time immemorial. The inhabitants about the mouth of the Red-sea were taught the use of it by the Persians, say authors, in the fifteenth century; and the coffee-shrub was gradually introduced into Arabia Felix, whence it passed into Egypt, Syria, and lastly Constantinople. The Turks, though so excessively fond of coffee, have not known it much above one hundred and fifty

Their master's smile, who treated them like men;
Blacken'd his cane lands: which with vast increase,

Beyond the wish of avarice paid his toil.
No cramps, with sudden death, surpris'd his mules;
No glander-pest his airy stables thinn'd :
And, if disorder seiz'd his negro train,
Celsus was call'd, and pining illness flew.
His gate stood wide to all; but chief the poor,
The unfriended stranger, and the sickly, shar'd
His prompt munificence: No surly dog, 621
Nor surlier Ethiop, their approach debarr'd.
The muse, that pays this tribute to his fame,
Oft hath escap'd the sun's meridian blaze,
Beneath yon tamarind-vista, which his hands
Planted; and which, impervious to the sun,
His latter days beheld.—One noon he sat
Beneath its breezy shade, what time the sun
His sultry vengeance from the Lion pour'd?
And calmly thus his eldest hope address'd. 630

" Be pious, be industrious, be humane;
" From proud oppression guard the labouring hind.
" Whate'er their creed, God is the fire of man,
" His image they; then dare not thou, my son,
" To bar the gates of mercy on mankind.
" Your foes forgive, for merit must make foes;

years; whereas the English have been acquainted therewith for upwards of an hundred, one Pasqua, a Greek, having opened a coffee-house in London about the middle of the last century. The famous traveller, Thevenot, introduced coffee into France. This plant is cultivated in the West Indies, particularly by the French, with great success; but the berry from thence is not equal to that from Mocha. It is a species of Arabian jasmine; the flower is particularly redolent, and from it a pleasant cordial water is distilled. It produces fruit twice every year; but the shrub must be three years old before any can be gathered. It should not be allowed to grow above six foot high. It is very apt to be destroyed by a large fly, which the French call Mouche a.caffé; as well as by the white grub, which they name Puceron. Its medical and alimentary qualities are as generally known as those of tea.

Ver. 625. This large, shady, and beautiful tree grows fast even in the driest soils, and lasts long; and yet its wood is hard, and very fit for mechanical uses. The leaves are smaller than those of senna, and pennated: they taste sourish, as does the pulp, which is contained in pods four or five inches long. They bear once a year. An excellent vinegar may be made from the fruit; but the Creoles chiefly preserve it with sugar, as the Spaniards with salt. A pleasant syrup may be made from it. The name is, in Arabic, Tamara. The ancients were not acquainted therewith; for the Arabians first introduced tamarinds into physic; it is a native of the East as well as of the West Indies and South America, where different provinces call it by different names. Its cathartic qualities are well known. It is good in sea-sickness. The botanical name is Tamarindus.

" And in each virtue far surpass your fire.
 " Your means are ample. Heaven a heart bestow!
 " So health and peace shall be your portion here;
 " And yon bright sky, to which my soul aspires,
 " Shall bless you with eternity of joy." 641

He spoke, and ere the swift-wing'd zumbadore
 The mountain desert startl'd with his hum;
 Ere fire-flies trimm'd their vital lamps; and ere
 Dun evening trod on rapid twilight's heel:
 His knell was rung;—

And all the cane lands wept their father lost.

Muse, yet a while indulge my rapid course;
 And I'll unharness soon the foaming steeds.

If Jove descend, propitious to thy vows, 650
 In frequent floods of rain; successive crops
 Of weeds will spring. Nor venture to repine,
 Though oft their toil thy little gang renew;
 Their toil tenfold the melting heavens repay:
 For soon thy plants will magnitude acquire,
 To crush all undergrowth; before the sun,
 The planets thus withdraw their puny fires.
 And though untutor'd, then, thy canes will shoot:
 Care meliorates their growth. The trenches fill

With their collateral mould; as in a town 660
 Which foes have long beleaguerr'd, unawares
 A strong detachment sallies from each gate,
 And levels all the labours of the plain.

And now thy cane's first blades their verdure lose,

And hang their idle heads. Be these stript off;
 So shall fresh sportive airs their joints embrace,
 And by their alliance give the sap to rise.

But, O beware, let no unskilful hand
 The vivid foliage tear: Their channell'd spouts,
 Well pleas'd, the watery nutriment convey, 670
 With filial duty, to the thirsty stem;
 And, spreading wide their reverential arms,
 Defend their parent from solstitial skies.

BOOK II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following book having been originally addressed to William Shenstone, Esq. and by him approved of; the author should deem it a kind of poetical sacrilege now to address it to any other.

Ver. 642. This bird, which is one of the largest and swiftest known, is only seen at night, or rather heard; for it makes a hideous humming noise (whence its name) on the desert tops of the Andes. See Ulloa's Voyage to South America. It is also called Condor. Its wings, when expanded, have been known to exceed sixteen feet from tip to tip. See Phil. Trans. No. 208.

Ver. 644. This surprising insect is frequent in Gaudaloupe, &c. and all the warmer parts of America. There are none of them in the English Caribbee, or Virgin-islands.

Ver. 645. There is little or no twilight in the West Indies. All the year round it is dark before eight at night. The dawn is equally short.

To his memory, therefore, be it sacred; as a small but sincere testimony of the high opinion the author entertained of that gentleman's genius and manners; and as the only return now, alas! in his power to make, for friendship wherewith Mr. Shenstone had condescended to honour him.

ARGUMENT.

Subject proposed. Addressed to William Shenstone, Esq. Of monkies. Of rats and other vermin. Of weeds. Of the yellow fly. Of the greasy fly. Of the blast. A hurricane described. Of calms and earthquakes. A tale.

ENOUGH of culture.—A less pleasing theme,
 What ills await the ripening cane, demands
 My serious numbers: these, the thoughtful muse
 Hath oft beheld, deep-pierc'd with generous woe.
 For she, poor exile! boasts no waving crops;
 For her no circling mules press dulcet streams;
 No negro-band huge foaming coppers skim;
 Nor fermentation (wine's dread fire) for her,
 With Vulcan's aid, from cane a spirit draws,
 Potent to quell the madness of despair. 10
 Yet oft the range she walks, at shut of eve;
 Oft sees red lightning at the midnight hour,
 When nod the watches, stream along the sky;
 Not innocent, as what the learned call
 The Boreal morn, which, through the azure air,
 Flashes its tremulous rays, in painted streaks,
 While o'er night's veil her lucid tresses flow:
 Nor quits the muse her walk, immers'd in thought,
 How she the planter haply may advise;
 Till tardy morn unbar the gates of light, 20
 And, opening on the main with sultry beam,
 To burnish'd silver turns the blue-green wave.
 Say, will my Shenstone lend a patient ear,
 And weep at woes unknown to Britain's isle?
 Yes, thou wilt weep! for pity chose thy breast,
 With taste and science, for their soft abode;
 Yes, thou wilt weep: thine own distress thou
 bear'st

Undaunted; but another's melts thy soul.

" O were my pipe as soft, my dittied song"
 As smooth as thine, my too too distant friend, 30
 Shenstone; my soft pipe, and my dittied song
 Should hush the hurricanes tremendous roar,
 And from each evil guard the ripening cane!

Destructive on the upland sugar-groves
 The monkey nation preys: from rocky heights,
 In silent parties, they descend by night,
 And posting watchful sentinels, to warn
 When hostile steps approach; with gambols they Pour o'er the cane grove. Luckless he to whom
 That land pertains! in evil hour, perhaps, 40
 And thoughtless of to-morrow, on a die
 He hazards millions; or, perhaps, reclines
 On luxury's soft lap, the pest of wealth;
 And, inconsiderate, deems his Indian crops
 Will amply her insatiate wants supply.

From these insidious drolls (peculiar pest
 Of Liamuiga's hills) wouldst thou defend

Ver. 46. The monkies which are now so numerous in the mountainous parts of St. Christo-

Thy waving wealth; in traps put not thy trust,
 However baited: Treble every watch,
 And well with arms provide them; faithful dogs,
 Of nose sagacious, on their footsteps wait. 51
 With these attack the predatory bands;
 Quickly the unequal conflict they decline,
 And chattering fling their ill-got spoils away.
 So when, of late, innumerable Gallic hosts
 Fierce, wanton, cruel, did by stealth invade
 The peaceable American's domains,
 While desolation mark'd their faithless rout;
 No sooner Albion's martial sons advanc'd,
 Than the gay dastards to their forests fled 60
 And left their spoils and tomahawks behind.

Nor with less waste the whisker'd vermin-race,
 A countless clan, despoil the low-land cane.

These to destroy, while commerce hoists the sail,

Loose rocks abound, or tangling bushes bloom,
 What planter knows?—Yet prudence may reduce.
 Encourage then the breed of savage cats,
 Nor kill the winding snake, thy foes they eat.

Thus, on the mangrove-banks of Guayaquil,
 Child of the rocky desert, sea-like stream, 70

With studious care the American preserves
 The gallinazo, else that sea-like stream
 (Whence traffic pours her bounties on mankind)
 Dread alligators would alone possess.

pher, were brought thither by the French when they possessed half that island. This circumstance we learn from Pere Labat, who farther tells us, that they are a most delicate food. The English negroes are very fond of them, but the white inhabitants do not eat them. They do a great deal of mischief in St. Kitts; destroying many thousand pounds Sterling's worth of canes every year.

Ver. 64. Rats, &c. are not natives of America, but came by shipping from Europe. They breed in the ground, under loose rocks and bushes. Durante, a Roman, who was physician to Pope Sixtus Quintus, and who wrote a Latin poem on the preservation of health, enumerates domestic rats among animals that may be eaten with safety. But if these are wholesome, cane-rats must be much more delicate, as well as more nourishing. Accordingly we find most field negroes fond of them, and I have heard that straps of cane-rats are publicly sold in the markets of Jamaica.

Ver. 69. This tree, which botanists call Rizophora, grows in marshy soils, and on the sides of rivers; and, as the branches take root, they frequently render narrow streams impassable to boats. Oysters often adhere to their roots, &c. The French name of this strange water-shrub is Palutuvier. The species meant here is the red mangrove.

Ver. 74. This dreadful animal is amphibious, and seldom lays fewer than 100 eggs. These she carefully covers with sand. But, notwithstanding this precaution, the gallinazo (a large species of carrion-crow) conceals itself among the thick boughs of the neighbouring trees, and thus often discovers the hoard of the alligator; which she no

Thy foes the teeth-fil'd Ibbos also love;
 Nor thou their wayward appetite restrain.

Some place decoys, nor will they not avail,
 Replete with roasted crabs, in every grove
 These fell marauders gnaw; and pay their slaves
 Some small reward for every captive foe. 80

So practice Gallia's sons; but Britons trust
 In other wiles, and surer their success.

With Misnian arsenic, deleterious bane,
 Pound up the ripe cassada's well-rasp'd root,
 And form in pellets; these profusely spread
 Round the cane-groves, where skulk the vermin-
 breed:

They greedy, and unweeting of the bait,
 Crowd to the inviting cates, and swift devour

Their palatable death; for soon they seek
 The neighbouring spring, and drink, and swell,

and die. 90

But dare not thou, if life deserve thy care,
 The infected rivolet taste; nor let thy herds

Graze its polluted brinks, till rolling time
 Have slu'd the water, and destroyed the bane:

'Tis safer then to mingle nightshade's juice
 With flour, and throw it lib'ral 'mong thy canes:

They touch not this; its deadly scent they fly, sooner leaves, than the gallinazo souses down upon it, and, greedily scraping off the sand, regales on its contents. Nor is the male alligator less an enemy to the increase of his own horrid brood than these useful birds; for, when instinct prompts the female to let her young fry out by breaking the eggs, he never fails to accompany her, and to devour as many of them as he can; so that the mother scarce ever escapes into the river with more than five out of all her hundred. Thus Providence doubly prevents the otherwise immense propagation of that voracious animal on the banks of the river Guayaquil; for the gallinazo is not always found where alligators are. Ulloa.

Ver. 75. Ibbos, or Ebbos, as they are more commonly called, are a numerous nation. Many of them have their teeth filed, and blackened in an extraordinary manner. They make good slaves when bought young; but are, in general, foul feeders, many of them greedily devouring the raw guts of fowls: They also feed on dead mules and horses; whose carcases, therefore, should be buried deep, that the negroes may not come at them. But the surest way is to burn them; otherwise they will be apt, privily, to kill those useful animals, in order to feast on them.

Ver. 76. Pere Labat says that cane-rats give those negroes who eat them pulmonary disorders; but the good Jesuit was no physician. I have been told by those who have eat them, that they are very delicate food.

Ver. 95. See the article Solanum in Newman's Chemistry, published by Dr. Lewis. There is a species of East-India animal, called a Mungoes, which bears a natural antipathy to rats. Its introduction into the sugar-islands would probably effectuate the extirpation of this destructive vermin.

And sudden colonize some distant vale.

Shall the muse deign to sing of humble weeds,
That check the progress of the imperial cane? 100

In every soil unnumber'd weeds will spring;
Nor fewest in the best: (thus oft we find Enormous vices taint the noblest souls)!
These let thy little gang, with skilful hand,
Oft as they spread abroad, and oft they spread,
Careful pluck up, to swell thy growing heap
Of rich manure. And yet some weeds arise,
Of aspect mean, with wondrous virtues fraught;
(And doth not oft uncommon merit dwell
In men of vulgar looks, and trivial air)? 110

Such, planter, be not thou ashamed to save
From foul pollution, and unseemly rot;
Much will they benefit thy house and thee.
But chief the yellow thistle thou select,
Whose seed the stomach frees from nauseous loads;
And if the music of the mountain-dove
Delight thy pensive ear, sweet friend to thought!
This prompts their cooing, and enflames their love.
Nor let rude hands the knotted grass profane,
Whose juice worms fly: Ah, dire endemial ill!
How many fathers, fathers now no more, 121
How many orphans, now lament thy rage?
The cow-itch also save; but let thick gloves
Thine hands defend, or thou wilt sadly rue
Thy rash imprudence, when ten thousand darts,
Sharp as the bee-sting, fasten in thy flesh,
And give thee up to torture. But unhurt,
Planter, thou may'st the humble chickweed cull,

Ver. 114. The seeds of this plant are an excellent emetic; and almost as useful in dysenteric complaints as ipecacuan. It grows every where.

Ver. 119. This is truly a powerful vermifuge; but, uncautiously administered, has often proved mortal. The juice of it clarified is sometimes given; but a decoction of it is greatly preferable. Its botanical name is Spigelia.

Ver. 123. This extraordinary vine should not be permitted to grow in a cane-piece; for negroes have been known to fire the canes, to save themselves from the torture which attends working in grounds where it has abounded. Mixed with molasses, it is a safe and excellent vermifuge. Its seeds, which resemble blackish small beans, are purgative. Its flower is purple; and its pods, on which the stinging brown Seta are found, are as large as a full-grown English field-pea.

Ver. 128. There are two kinds of chickweed, which grow spontaneously in the Caribbees, and both possess very considerable virtues, particularly that which botanists call Gajacia, and which the Spaniards emphatically name Erudos Cobres, or snakeweed, on account of its remarkable qualities against poisonous bites. It is really of use against fish-poison; as is also the sensitive plant, which the Spaniards prettily call the Vergonzosa, the Bashful, and La Donzella, or the Maiden. There are many kinds of this extraordinary plant, which grow every where in the islands and South America. The botanical name of the former is Alfina, and that of the latter Mimosa.

And that which coily flies the astonish'd grasp.
Not the confection nam'd from Pontus' king, 130
Not the blest'd apple Median climes produce,
Though lofty Maro (whose immortal muse
Distant I follow, and submit adore)

Hath sung its properties, to counteract
Dire spells, slow-mutter'd o'er the baneful bowl,
Where cruel stepdames poisonous drugs have brew'd;

Can vie with these low tenants of the vale,
In driving poisons from the infected frame:
For here, alas! (ye sons of luxury mark)!
The sea, though on its bosom Halcyons sleep, 140
Abounds with poison'd fish; whose crimson fins,
Whose eyes, whose scales, bedropt with azure, gold,
Purple, and green, in all gay summer's pride,
Amuse the sight; whose taste the palate charms;
Yet death in ambush on the banquet waits,
Unless these antidotes be timely given.

But, say what strains, what numbers can recite,
Thy praises, vervain; or wild liquorice, thine?
For not the costly root, the gift of God,
Gather'd by those who drink the Volga's wave,
(Prince of Europa's streams, itself a sea) 151
Equals your potency! Did planters know
But half your virtues, not the cane itself
Would they with greater, fonder pains preserve!

Still other maladies infest the cane,
And worse to be subdu'd. The insect-tribe,
That, flutt'ring, spread their pinions to the sun,
Recal the muse: nor shall their many eyes,
Though edg'd with gold, their many-colour'd down, 159

From death preserve them. In what distant clime,

Ver. 130. This medicine is called Mithridatium, in honour of Mithridates king of Pontus; who, by using it constantly, had secured himself from the effects of poison, in such a manner, that when he actually attempted to put an end to his life, by that means he failed in his purpose: So at least Pliny informs us. But we happily are not obliged to believe implicitly whatever that elaborate compiler has told us. When poisons immediately operate on the nervous system, and their effects are to be expelled by the skin, this electuary is no contemptible antidote. But how many poisons do we know at present which produce their effects in a different manner? and, from the accounts of authors, we have reason to be persuaded that the ancients were not much behind us in their variety of poisons. If, therefore, the king of Pontus had really intended to have destroyed himself, he could have been at no loss for the means, notwithstanding the daily use of this antidote.

Ver. 131. Authors are not agreed what the apple is, to which Virgil attributes such remarkable virtues, nor is it indeed possible they ever should. However, we have this comfort on our side, that our not knowing it is of no detriment to us; for, as spells cannot affect us, we are at no loss for antidotes to guard against them.

Ver. 149. Some medical writers have bestowed the high appellation of Donum Dei on rhubarb.

In what recesses are the plunderers hatch'd?
 Say, are they wafted in the living gale
 From distant islands? Thus the locust-breed,
 In winged caravans, that blot the sky,
 Descend from far, and, ere bright morning dawn,
 Astonish'd Afric sees her crop devour'd.
 Or, doth the cane a proper nest afford,
 And food adapted to the yellow fly?—
 The skill'd in nature's mystic lore observe 169
 Each tree, each plant, that drinks the golden day,
 Some reptile life sustains: Thus cochinille
 Feeds on the Indian fig; and, should it harm
 The foster plant, its worth that harm repays:
 But ye, base insects! no bright scarlet yield,
 To deck the British Wolfe; who now, perhaps,
 (So Heaven and George ordain) in triumph mounts
 Some strong-built fortress, won from haughty Gaul!
 And though no plant such luscious nectar yields
 As yields the cane-plant, yet, vile parricides!
 Ungrateful ye! the parent-cane destroy. 180

Muse, say what remedy hath skill devis'd
 To quell this noxious foe? Thy blacks send forth,
 A strong detachment, ere the increasing pest
 Have made too firm a lodgment; and with care
 Wipe every tainted blade, and liberal lave
 With sacred Neptune's purifying stream.
 But this Augæan toil long time demands,
 Which thou to more advantage may'st employ:
 If vows for rain thou ever didst prefer, 189
 Planter, prefer them now: the rattling shower,
 Pour'd down in constant streams for days and nights,

Not only swells, with nectar sweet, thy canes,
 But in the deluge drowns thy plundering foe.

When may the planter idly fold his arms,
 And say, "My soul take rest?" Superior ills,
 Ills which no care nor wisdom can avert,
 In black succession rise. Ye men of Kent,
 When nipping Eurus, with the brutal force
 Of Boreas, join'd in ruffian league, assail 199
 Your ripen'd hop-grounds; tell me what you feel,
 And pity the poor planter, when the blast,
 Fell plague of Heaven! perdition of the isles!
 Attacks his waving gold. Though well manur'd,
 A richness though thy fields from nature boast,
 Though seasons pour, this pestilence invades:

Ver. 171. This is a Spanish word. For the manner of propagating this useful insect, see Sir Hans Sloane's Natural History of Jamaica. It was long believed in Europe to be a seed or vegetable production. The botanical name of the plant on which the cochinille feeds is Opuntia maxima, folio oblongo, majore, spinulis obtusis, mollibus et innocentibus obfite, flore, fructu rubris variegato.

Sloane.

Ver. 205. Without a rainy season the sugar cane could not be cultivated to any advantage: For what Pliny the Elder writes of another plant may be applied to this, Gaudet irriguis, et toto anno bibere amat.

Ver. 205. It must, however, be confessed, that the blast is less frequent in lands naturally rich, or such as are made so by well-rotted manure.

Too oft it seizes the glad infant-throng,
 Nor pities their green nonage: Their broad blades,
 Of which the graceful wood-nymphs erst compos'd
 The greenest garlands to adorn their brows,
 First pallid, sickly, dry, and withered show; 210
 Unseemly stains succeed: which, nearer view'd
 By microscopic arts, small eggs appear,
 Dire fraught with reptile life; alas, too soon
 They burst their filmy jail, and crawl abroad,
 Bugs of uncommon shape; thrice hideous show!
 Innumerable as the painted shells that load
 The wave-worn margin of the Virgin-isles!
 Innumerable as the leaves the plumb-tree sheds,
 When, proud of her fecundity, she shows
 Naked her gold fruit to the god of noon. 220
 Remorseless to its youth, what pity, say,
 Can the cane's age expect? In vain its pith
 With juice nectareous flows; to pungent sour,
 Foe to the bowels, soon its nectar turns:
 Vain every joint a gemmy embryo bears,
 Alternate rang'd; from these no filial young
 Shall grateful spring, to bless the planter's eye.—
 With bugs confederate, in destructive league,
 The ants' republic joins; a villain crew,
 As the waves, countless, that plough up the deep,
 (Where Eurus reigns vicegerent of the sky, 231
 Whom Rhea bore to the bright god of day)
 When furious Auster dire commotions stirs:
 These wind, by subtle sap, their secret way,
 Pernicious pioneers! while those invest,
 More firmly daring, in the face of heaven,
 And win, by regular approach, the cane.

'Gainst such ferocious, such unnumber'd bands,
 What arts, what arms shall sage experience use?

Some bid the planter load the favouring gale, 240
 With pitch, and sulphur's suffocating steam:—
 Useless the vapour o'er the cane-grove flies,
 In curling volumes lost; such feeble arms,
 To man though fatal, not the blast subdue.
 Others again, and better their success,
 Command their slaves each tainted blade to pick
 With care, and burn them in vindictive flames.
 Labour immense! and yet, if small the pest,
 If numerous, if industrious be thy gang,
 At length, thou may'st the victory obtain. 250
 But, if the living taint be far diffus'd,
 Bootless this toil; nor will it then avail
 (Though ashes lend their suffocating aid)
 To bare the broad roots, and the mining swarms
 Expose, remorseless, to the burning noon.
 Ah! must then ruin desolate the plain!
 Must the lost planter other climes explore?

Ver. 218. This is the Jamaica plumb-tree. When covered with fruit, it has no leaves upon it. The fruit is wholesome. In like manner, the panspan is destitute of foliage when covered with flowers. The latter is a species of jessamine, and grows as large as an apple-tree.

Ver. 231. The east is the centre of the trade-wind in the West-Indies, which veers a few points to the north or south. What Homer says of the west wind, in his islands of the blessed, may more aptly be applied to the trade winds.

How'er reluctant, let the hoe uproot
 The infected cane-piece; and, with eager flames,
 The hostile myriads thou to embers turn: 260
 Far better, thus, a mighty loss sustain,
 Which happier years and prudence may retrieve;
 Than risk thine all. As when an adverse storm,
 Impetuous, thunders on some luckless ship,
 From green St. Christopher, or Cathay bound:
 Each nautic art the reeling seamen try:
 The storm redoubles: death rides every wave:
 Down by the board the cracking masts they hew;
 And heave their precious cargo in the main.
 Say, can the muse, the pencil in her hand, 270
 The all-wasting hurricane observant ride?
 Can she, undazzled, view the lightning's glare,
 That fires the welkin? Can she, unappall'd,
 When all the flood-gates of the sky are ope,
 The shoreless deluge stem? The muse hath seen
 The pillar'd flame, whose top hath reach'd the stars;
 Seen rocky, molten fragments, flung in air
 From Ætna's vext abyss; seen burning streams
 Pour down its channell'd sides; tremendous scenes!—
 Yet not vext Ætna's pillar'd flames, that strike 280
 The stars; nor molten mountains hurl'd on high;
 Nor ponderous rapid deluges, that burn
 Its deeply-channell'd sides; cause such dismay,
 Such desolation. Hurricane! as thou;
 When the Almighty gives thy rage to blow,
 And all the battles of thy winds engage.
 Soon as the Virgin's charms ingross the sun;
 And till his weaker flame the Scorpion feels;
 But, chief, while Libra weighs the unsteady year:
 Planter, with mighty props thy dome support; 290
 Each flaw repair; and well, with massy bars,
 Thy doors and windows guard; securely lodge
 Thy stocks and mill-points.—Then, or calms obtain;
 Breathless the royal palm-tree's airiest van;
 While, o'er the panting isle, the demon heat
 High hurls his flaming brand; vast, distant waves
 The main drives furious in, and heaps the shore
 With strange productions: Or, the blue serene
 Assumes a lowering aspect, as the clouds
 Fly, wild-careering, through the vault of heaven; 300
 Then transient birds, of various kinds, frequent
 Each stagnant pool; some hover o'er thy roof;
 Then Eurus reigns no more; but each bold wind,
 By turns, usurps the empire of the air
 With quick inconstancy;
 Thy herds, as sapient of the coming storm,
 (For beasts partake some portion of the sky),
 In troops associate; and, in cold sweats bath'd,
 Wild-bellowing, eye the pole. Ye seamen, now,
 Ply to the southward, if the changeeful moon, 310
 Or, in her interlunar palace hid, [glows:
 Shuns night; or, full-orb'd, in night's forehead

For, see! the mists, that late involv'd the hill,
 Disperse; the mid-day sun looks red; strange burs
 Surround the stars, which vaster fill the eye.
 A horrid stench the pools, the main emits;
 Fearful the genius of the forest sighs; [cliff.
 The mountains moan; deep groans the cavern'd
 A night of vapour, closing fast around,
 Snatches the golden noon.—Each wind ap-peas'd, 320
 The north flies forth, and hurls the frightened air:
 Not all the brazen engineeries of man,
 At once exploded, the wild burst surpass.
 Yet thunder, yok'd with lightning and with rain,
 Water with fire, increase the infernal din:
 Canes, shrubs, trees, huts, are whirl'd aloft in
 air.—
 The wind is spent; and "all the isle below
 "Is hush as death."
 Soon issues forth the west, with sudden burst;
 And blasts more rapid, more resistless drives: 330
 Rushes the headlong sky; the city rocks;
 The good man throws him on the trembling
 ground;
 And dies the murderer in his inmost soul—
 Sullen the west withdraws his eager storms.—
 Will not the tempest now his furies chain?
 Ah, no! as when in Indian forests, wild,
 Barbaric armies suddenly retire
 After some furious onset, and, behind
 Vast rocks and trees, their horrid forms conceal,
 Brooding on slaughter, not repuls'd; for soon 340
 Their growing yell the affrighted welkin rends,
 And bloodier carnage mows th' ensanguin'd plain:
 So the south, sallying from his iron caves
 With mightier force, renews the aerial war;
 Sleep, frightened, flies; and, see! yon lofty palm,
 Fair nature's triumph, pride of Indian groves,
 Cleft by the sulphurous bolt! See yonder dome,
 Where grandeur with propriety combin'd,
 And Theodorus with devotion dwelt;
 Involv'd in smouldering flames.—From every rock, 350
 Dashes the turbid torrent; through each street
 A river foams, which sweeps, with untam'd might,
 Men, oxen, cane-lands to the billowy main.—
 Pauses the wind.—Anon the savage east
 Bids his wing'd tempests more relentless rave;
 Now brighter, vaster coruscations flash;
 Deepens the deluge; nearer thunders roll;
 Earth trembles; ocean reels; and, in her fangs,
 Grim desolation tears the shrieking isle,
 Ere rosy morn possess the ethereal plain, 360
 To pour on darkness the full flood of day.—
 Nor does the hurricane's all-wasting wrath
 Alone bring ruin on its founding wing:
 Even calms are dreadful, and the fiery south
 Oft reigns a tyrant in these fervid isles:

Ver. 293. The sails are fastened to the mill-points, as those are to the stocks. They should always be taken down before the hurricane season.

VOL. X.

Ver. 314. These are astral halos. Columbus soon made himself master of the signs that precede a hurricane in the West-Indies, by which means he saved his own squadron; while another large fleet, whose commander despised his prognostics, put to sea, and was wrecked.

For, from its burning furnace, when it breathes,
Europe and Asia's vegetable sons,
Touch'd by its tainting vapour, shrivel'd, die.
The hardiest children of the rocks repine :
And all the upland Tropic-plants hang down 370
Their drooping heads; show arid, coil'd, adust.—
The main itself seems parted into streams,
Clear as a mirror; and, with deadly scents,
Annoys the rower; who, heart-fainting, eyes
The sails hang idly, noiseless, from the mast.
Thrice hapless he, whom thus the hand of fate
Compels to risk the unsufferable beam!
A fiend, the worst the angry skies ordain
To punish sinful man, shall fatal seize
His wretched life, and to the tomb consign. 380

When such the ravage of the burning calm,
On the stout, sunny children of the hill;
What must thy cane-lands feel? Thy late green sprouts
Nor bunch, nor joint; but, sapless, arid, pine:
Those, who have manhood reach'd, of yellow hue,
(Symptom of health and strength) soon ruddy show;

While the rich juice that circled in their veins,
Acescent, watery, poor, unwholesome tastes.

Nor only, planter, are thy cane-groves burnt;
Thy life is threatened. Muse, the manner sing. 390

Then earthquakes, nature's agonizing pangs,
Oft shake the astonied isles: The solfaterre
Or sends forth thick, blue, suffocating steams;
Or shoots to temporary flame. A din, [caves,
Wild through the mountain's quivering rocky
Like the dread crash of tumbling planets, roars.
When tremble thus the pillars of the globe,
Like the tall coco by the fierce north blown;
Can the poor, brittle, tenements of man
Withstand the dread convulsion? Their dear homes, 400

(Which shaking, tottering, crashing, bursting, fall),
The boldest fly; and, on the open plain
Appal'd, in agony the moment wait,
When, with disrapture vast, the waving earth
Shall overwhelm them in her sea-disgorging womb.

Nor less affrighted are the bestial kind.
The bold steed quivers in each panting vein,
And staggers, bath'd in deluges of sweat:
Thy lowing herds forsake their grassy food,
And send forth frighted, woeful, hollow sounds:
The dog, thy trusty centinel of night, 410
Deserts his post assign'd; and, piteous, howls.—

Wide ocean feels:— [bounds,
The mountain-waves, passing their custom'd
Make direful, loud incursions on the land,
All-overwhelming: Sudden they retreat,
With their whole troubled waters; but, anon,

Ver. 392. Volcanos are called sulphurs, or solfaterres, in the West-Indies. There are few mountainous islands in that part of the globe without them, and those probably will destroy them in time. I saw much sulphur and alum in the solfaterre at Mountferrat. The stream that runs through it, is almost as hot as boiling water, and its steams soon blacken silver, &c.

Sudden return, with louder, mightier force;
(The black rocks whiten, the vast shores re-
found);

And yet, more rapid, distant they retire. 420
Vast conflagrations lighten all the sky,
With volum'd flames; while thunder's awful voice,
From forth his shrine, by night and horror girt,
Astounds the guilty, and appals the good:
For oft the best, smote by the bolt of heaven,
Wrapt in ethereal flame, forget to live;
Else, fair Theana.—Muse her fate deplore.

Soon as young reason dawn'd in Junio's breast,
His father sent him from these genial isles,
To where old Thames with conscious pride surveys 430

Green Eton, soft abode of every muse.
Each classic beauty soon he made his own;
And soon fam'd Isis saw him woo the nine,
On her inspiring banks: Love tun'd his song;
For fair Theana was his only theme,
Acasto's daughter, whom, in early youth,
He oft distinguish'd; and for whom he oft
Had climb'd the bending coco's airy height,

Ver. 438. The coco-nut tree is of the palm genus; there are several species of them which grow naturally in the Torrid Zone. The coco-nut tree is by no means so useful as travellers have represented it. The wood is of little or no service, being spongy; and the brown covering of the nuts is of too rough a texture to serve as apparel. The shell of the nut receives a good polish; and, having a handle put to it, is commonly used to drink water out of. The milk, or water of the nut, is cooling and pleasant; but, if drunk too freely, will frequently occasion a pain in the stomach. A salutary oil may be extracted from the kernel; which, if old, and eaten too plentifully, is apt to produce a shortness of breathing. A species of arrack is made from this tree in the East-Indies. The largest coco-nut trees grow on the banks of the river Oronoko. They thrive best near the sea, and look beautiful at a distance. They afford no great shade. Ripe nuts have been produced from them in three years after planting. The nuts should be macerated in water before they are put in the ground. Coco is an Indian name; the Spaniards call it also palma de las Indias; as the smallest kind, whose nuts are less than walnuts, is termed by them Coquillo. This grows in Chili, and the nuts are esteemed more delicate than those of a larger size. In the Maldivy islands, it is pretended, they not only build houses of the coco-nut tree, but also vessels, with all their rigging; nay, and load them too with wine, oil, vinegar, black sugar, fruit, and strong water, from the same tree. If this be true, the Maldivian coco-nut trees must differ widely from those that grow in the West-Indies. The coco must not be confounded with the coco-nut tree. That shrub grows in the hottest and moistest vales of the Andes. Its leaf, which is gathered two or three times a year, is much coveted by the natives of South-America, who will travel great journeys upon a

To rob it of its nectar; which the maid,
When he presented, more nectareous deem'd. 440
The sweetest sappadillas oft he brought;
From him more sweet ripe sappadillas seem'd.
Nor had long absence yet effac'd her form;
Her charms still triumph'd o'er Britannia's fair.
One morn he met her in Sheen's royal walks;
Nor knew, till then, sweet Sheen contain'd his all.
His taste mature approv'd his infant choice.
In colour, form, expression, and in grace,
She shone all-perfect; while each pleasing art,
And each soft virtue that the sex adorns, 450
Adorn'd the woman. My imperfect strain,
Which Percy's happier pencil would demand,
Can ill describe the transports Juno felt
At this discovery: He declar'd his love;
She own'd his merit, nor refus'd his hand.

And shall not Hymen light his brightest torch,
For this delighted pair? Ah, Juno knew,
His fire detested his Theana's house!—
Thus duty, reverence, gratitude, conspir'd
To check their happy union. He resolv'd 460
(And many a sigh that resolution cost)
To pass the time, till death his fire remov'd,
In visiting old Europe's letter'd climes:
While she (and many a tear that parting drew)
Embark'd, reluctant, for her native isle.

Though learned, curious, and though nobly bent,
With each rare talent to adorn his mind,
His native land to serve, no joys he found.—
Yet sprightly Gaul; yet Belgium, Saturn's reign;
Yet Greece, of old the seat of every muse, 470
Of freedom, courage; yet Ausonia's clime,
His steps explor'd; where painting, music's strains,
Where arts, where laws, (philosophy's best child),
With rival beauties his attention claim'd.
To his just-judging, his instructed eye,
The all-perfect Medicean Venus seem'd
A perfect semblance of his Indian fair:
But, when she spoke of love, her voice surpass'd
The harmonious warblings of Italian song.

Twice one long year elaps'd, when letters came

Which briefly told him of his father's death. 481
Afflicted, filial, yet to Heaven resign'd,
Soon he reach'd Albion, and as soon embark'd,
Eager to clasp the object of his love.

Blow, prosperous breezes; swiftly sail, thou
Po:

Swift sail'd the Po, and happy breezes blew.

In Biscay's stormy seas, an armed ship,
Of force superior, from loud Charente's wave
Clapt them on board. The frightened flying crew
Their colours strike; when dauntless Junio, fir'd
With noble indignation, kill'd the chief, 491
Who on the bloody deck dealt slaughter round.
The Gauls retreat; the Britons loud huzza;
And touch'd with shame, with emulation stung,
So plied their cannon, plied their missil fires,
That soon in air the hapless thunderer blew.

Blow prosperous breezes, swiftly sail thou Po,
May no more dangerous fights retard thy way!

Soon Porto Santo's rocky heights they spy,
Like clouds dim rising in the distant air. 500

Glad Eurus whistles; laugh the sportive crew;
Each sail is set to catch the favouring gale,
While on the yard-arm the harpooner sits,
Strikes the boneta, or the shark ensnares.
The fring'd urchin spreads her purple form
To catch the gale, and dances o'er the waves:
Small winged fishes on the shrouds alight;
And beauteous dolphins gently played around.

Ver. 499. This is one of the Madeira islands, and of course subject to the King of Portugal. It lies in 32, 33 degrees of N. latitude. It is neither so fruitful nor so large as Madeira Proper, and is chiefly peopled by convicts, &c.

Ver. 504. This fish, which is equal in size to the largest salmon, is only to be found in the warm latitudes. It is not a delicate food; but those who have lived for any length of time on salt meats at sea, do not dislike it. Sir Hans Sloane, in his voyage to Jamaica, describes the method of striking them.

Ver. 504. This voracious fish needs no description; I have seen them from 15 to 20 feet long. Some naturalists call it Canis Carbarias. They have been known to follow a slave-ship from Guinea to the West Indies. They swim with incredible celerity, and are found in some of the warmer seas of Europe, as well as between the tropics.

Ver. 505. This fish the seamen call a Portuguese man of war. It makes a most beautiful appearance on the water.

Ver. 507. This extraordinary species of fish is only found in the warm latitudes. Being pursued in the water by a fish of prey called Albacores, they betake themselves in shoals to flight, and in the air are often snapt up by the Garayio, a sea-fowl. They sometimes fall on the shrouds or decks of ships. They are well tasted, and commonly sold at Barbadoes.

Ver. 508. This is a most beautiful fish when first taken out of the sea; but its beauty vanishes almost as soon as it is dead.

single handful of the leaves, which they do not swallow, but only chew. It is of an unpleasant taste; but, by use, soon grows agreeable. Some authors have also confounded the coco-nut palm with the coco, or chocolate tree. The French call the coco-nut tree, Cocotier. Its stem, which is very lofty, is always bent; for which reason it looks better in an orchard than in a regular garden. As one limb fades, another shoots up in the centre like a pike. The botanical name is Palma indica, coccifera, angulosa.

Ver. 441. This is a pleasant tasted fruit, somewhat resembling a bergamot pear in shape and colour. The tree which produces it is large and shady. Its leaves are of a shining green; but the flowers which are monopetalous, are of a palish white. The fruit is coronated when ripe, and contains in its pulp several longish black seeds. It is wholesome. Antigua produces the best sappadillas I ever tasted. The trivial name is Spanish. Botanists call it Calmite.

Though faster than the Tropic bird they flew,
Oft Junio cried, ah! when shall we see land? 510
Soon land they made: and now in thought he claspt

His Indian bride, and deem'd his toils o'erpaid.

She, no less amorous, every evening walk'd
On the cool margin of the purple main,
Intent her Junio's vessel to defery.

One eve (faint calms for many a day had rag'd),
The winged demons of the tempest rose;
Thunder and rain, and lightning's awful power.
She fled: could innocence, could beauty claim
Exemption from the grave; the ethereal bolt, 520
That stretch'd her speechless, o'er her lovely head
Had innocently roll'd.

Meanwhile, impatient Junio leapt ashore,
Regardless of the demons of the storm.
Ah youth! what woes, too great for man to bear,
Are ready to burst on thee? Urge not so
Thy flying courser. Soon Theana's porch
Receiv'd him: at his sight, the ancient slaves
Affrighted shriek, and to the chamber point:—
Confounded, yet unknowing what they meant,
He entered hasty—— 531

Ah! what a sight for one who lov'd so well!
All pale and cold, in every feature death,
Theana lay; and yet a glimpse of joy [voice,
Played on her face, while with faint, faltering
She thus address'd the youth, whom yet she knew.

"Welcome, my Junio, to thy native shore!
"Thy sight repays this summons of my fate:
"Live, and live happy; sometimes think of me:
"By night, by day, you still engag'd my care; 540
"And next to God, you now my thoughts employ:

"Accept of this—My little all I give;
"Would it were larger."—Nature could no more;
She look'd, embrac'd him, with a groan expir'd.

But say, what strains, what language can express
The thousand pangs, which tore the lover's breast?
Upon her breathless corse himself he threw,
And to her clay-cold lips, with trembling haste,
Ten thousand kisses gave. He strove to speak;
Nor words he found: he claspt her in his arms;
He sigh'd, he swoon'd, look'd up, and died away.

One grave contains this hapless, faithful pair;
And still the cane isles tell their matchless love!

BOOK III.

ARGUMENT.

Hymn to the month of January, when crop begins. Address. Planters have employment all the year round. Planters should be pious. A ripe cane-piece on fire at midnight. Crop begun. Cane-cutting described. Effects of music.
Great care requisite in feeding the mill. Humanity towards the maimed recommended.
The tainted canes should not be ground. Their use. How to preserve the laths and mill-points

Ver. 509. The French call this bird Fregate, on account of its swift flying. It is only to be met within the warm latitudes.

from sudden squalls. Address to the sun, and praise of Antigua. A cattle-mill described.
Care of mules, &c. Diseases to which they are subject. A water-mill the least liable to interruption. Common in Guadaloupe and Martini-co. Praise of Lord Rompey. The necessity of a strong, clear fire, in boiling. Planters should always have a spare set of vessels, because the iron furnaces are apt to crack, and copper vessels to melt. The danger of throwing cold water into a thorough heated furnace. Cleanliness and skimming well recommended. A boiling-house should be lofty, and open at top, to the leeward. Constituent parts of vegetables. Sugar an essential salt. What retards its granulation. How to forward it. Dumb cane. Effects of it. Bristol lime the best temper. Various uses of Bristol lime. Good muscovado described. Bermudas lime recommended. The negroes should not be hindered from drinking the hot liquor. The cheerfulness and healthiness of the negroes in crop time. Boilers to be encouraged. They should neither boil the sugar too little, nor too much. When the sugar is of too loose a grain, and about to boil over the teache, or last copper, a little grease settles it, and makes it boil closer. The French often mix sand with their sugars. This practice not followed by the English. A character. Of the skimmings their various uses. Of rum. Its praise.
A West-India prospect, when crop is finished.
An address to the Creoles, to live more upon their estates than they do. The reasons.

From scenes of deep distress, the heavenly muse,
Emerging joyous, claps her dewy wings.
As when a pilgrim, in the howling waste,
Hath long time wandered, fearful at each step,
Of tumbling cliffs, fell serpents, whelming bogs;
At last, from some long eminence, descends
Fair haunts of social life; wide-cultur'd plains,
O'er which glad reapers pour; he cheerly sings:
So she to sprightlier notes her pipe attunes,
Than e'er these mountains heard; to gratulate, 10
With duteous carols, the beginning year.

Hail, eldest birth of time! in other climes,
In the old world, with tempests usher'd in;
While ruffled nature thine appearance wails,
And savage winter wields his iron mace:
But not the rockiest verge of these green isles,
Though mountains heapt on mountains brave the sky,
Dares winter, by his residence, profane.

Ver. 17. This more particularly alludes to St.
Kitts, where one of the highest ridges of that chain of mountains, which runs through its centre from one end of it to the other, bears upon it another mountain, which, somewhat resembling the legendary prints of the devil's carrying on his shoulders St. Christopher; or, as others write, of a giant of that appellation, carrying our Saviour in the form of a child in the same manner through a deep sea, gave name to this island.

At times the ruffian, wrapt in murky state,
Inroads will fly attempt; but soon the sun, 20
Benign protector of the cane-land isles,
Repells the invader, and his rude mace breaks.
Here, every mountain, every winding dell,
(Haunt of the dryads; where, beneath the shade
Of broad-leaf'd china, idly they repose,
Charm'd with the murmur of the tinkling rill;
Charm'd with the hummings of the neighbouring hive);

Welcome thy glad approach: but chief the cane,
Whose juice now longs to murmur down the spout,
Hails thy lov'd coming; January, hail! 30

O M ! thou, whose polish'd mind contains
Each science useful to thy native isle!
Philosopher, without the hermit's spleen!
Polite, yet learned; and, though solid, gay!
Critic, whose head each beauty, fond, admires;
Whose heart each error flings in friendly shade!
Planter, whose youth sage cultivation taught
Each secret lesson of her sylvan school:

To thee the muse a grateful tribute pays;
She owes to thee the precepts of her song: 40
Nor wilt thou, sour, refuse; though other cares,
The public claim thy busy hour;
With her to roam (thrice pleasing devious walk)
The ripened cane-piece; and with her, to taste
(Delicious draught)! the nectar of the mill!

The planter's labour in a round revolves;
Ends with the year, and with the year begins.

Ye swains, to Heaven bend low in grateful
prayer,

Worship the Almighty; whose kind fostering hand
Hath blest your labour, and hath given the cane
To rise superior to each menac'd ill. 51

Nor less, ye planters, in devotion sue,
That nor the heavenly bolt, nor casual spark,
Nor hand of malice may the crop destroy.

Ah me! what numerous, deaf'ning bells re-
found?

What cries of horror startle the dull sleep? [day?
What gleaming brightness makes, at midnight,
By its portentous glare, too well I see

Palemon's fate; the virtuous, and the wise!
Where were ye, watches, when the flame burst
forth? 60

Ver. 25. The leaves of this medicinal tree are so large, that the negroes commonly use them to cover the water, which they bring in pails from the mountain, where it chiefly grows. The roots of this tree were introduced into European practice soon after the venereal disease; but, unless they are fresh, it must be confessed they possess fewer virtues than either sarsaparilla or lignum vitae. It also grows in China, and many parts of the East-Indies, where it is greatly recommended in the gout, palsy, sciatica, obstructions, and obstinate headachs: but it can surely not effect the removal of these terrible disorders; since, in China the people eat the fresh root boiled with their meat as we do turnips; and the better sort there use a water distilled from it. The Spaniards call it Palo de China. The botanical name is Smilax.

A little care had then the hydra quell'd: [sky
But, now, what clouds of white smoke load the
How strong, how rapid the combustion pours!
Aid not, ye winds! with your destroying breath,
The spreading vengeance.—They contemn my prayer. [blaze;

Rous'd by the deaf'ning bells, the cries, the
From every quarter, in tumultuous bands,
The negroes rush; and, 'mid the crackling flames,
Plunge, demon-like! All, all, urge every nerve:
This way, tear up those canes; dash the fire out, 70
Which sweeps, with serpent error o'er the ground.
There, hew these down; their topmost branches
burn:

And here bid all thy watery engines play;
For here the wind the burning deluge drives.

In vain.—More wide the blazing torrent rolls!
More loud it roars, more bright it fires the pole;
And toward thy mansion, see, it bends its way.
Haste! far, O far your infant-throng remove:
Quick from your stables drag your steeds and mules:

With well wet blankets guard your cypress roofs;
And where thy dried canes in large stacks are pil'd.— 81

Efforts but serve to irritate the flames:
Naught but thy ruin can their wrath appease.

Ah, my Palemon! what avail'd thy care,
Oft to prevent the earliest dawn of day,
And walk thy ranges at the noon of night?

What though no ill assail'd thy bunching sprouts,
And seasons pour'd obedient to thy will:

All, all must perish; nor shalt thou preserve
Wherewith to feed thy little orphan throng. 90

Oh! may the cane isles know few nights like
this!

For now the sail-clad points, impatient wait
The hour of sweet release, to court the gale.

The late hung coppers wish to feel the warmth
Which well dried fuel from the cane imparts:

The negro train, with placid looks, survey
Thy fields which full perfection have attain'd,

And pant to wield the bill: (no surly watch
Dare now deprive them of the luscious cane):

Nor thou, my friend, their willing ardour check;
Encourage rather; cheerful toil is light. 101

So from no field shall flow-pac'd oxen draw
More frequent loaded wanes; which many a day,

And many a night shall feed thy crackling mills
With richest offerings: while thy far seen flames,

Bursting through many a chimney, bright emblaze
The Æthiop brow of night. And see, they pour

(Ere Phosphor his pale circlet yet withdraws,
What time gray dawn stands tip-toe on the hill),

O'er the rich cane grove: Muse, their labour sing.
Some bending, of their sapless burden ease 111

The yellow jointed canes, (whose height exceeds
A mounted trooper, and whose clammy round
Measures two inches full); and near the root

Ver. 81. The cane stalks which have been ground are called Magots; probably a corruption of the French word Bagasse, which signifies the same thing. They make an excellent fuel.

Lop the stem off, which quivers in their hand
 With fond impatience: soon its branchy spires,
 (Food to thy cattle) it resigns; and soon
 Its tender prickly tops with eyes thick set,
 To load with future crops thy long-hoed land.
 These with their green their pliant branches bound,
 (For not a part of this amazing plant 121
 But serves some useful purpose) charge the young:
 Not laziness declines this easy toil;
 Even lameness from its leafy pallet crawls,
 To join the favoured gang. What of the cane
 Remains, and much the largest part remains,
 Cut into junks a yard in length, and tied
 In small light bundles; load the broad-wheel'd wane,

The mules crook-harrest, and the sturdier crew,
 With sweet abundance. As on Lincoln plains, 130
 (Ye plains of Lincoln sound your Dyer's praise!)
 When the lav'd snow-white flocks are numerous penn'd;

The senior swains with sharpen'd shears cut off
 The fleecy vestment; others stir the tar;
 And some impress, upon their captives sides,
 Their master's cypher; while the infant throng
 Strive by the horns to hold the struggling ram,
 Proud of their prowess. Nor meanwhile the jest
 Light-banded round, but innocent of ill;
 Nor choral song are wanting: echo rings. 140

Nor need the driver, Æthiop authoris'd,
 Thence more inhuman crack his horrid whip;
 From such dire sounds the indignant muse averts
 Her virgin ear, where music loves to dwell:
 'Tis malice now, 'tis wantonness of power
 To lash the laughing, labouring, singing throng.

What cannot song? all nature feels its power:
 The hind's blithe whistle, as through stubborn soils
 He drives the shining share; more than the goad,
 His tardy steers impells. — The muse hath seen, 150
 When health danc'd frolic in her youthful veins,
 And vacant gambols wing'd the laughing hours;
 The muse hath seen on Annan's pastoral hills,
 Of theft and slaughter erst the fell retreat,
 But now the shepherd's best beloved walk:
 Hath seen the shepherd with his sylvan pipe,
 Lead on his flock o'er crags, through bogs and
 streams,

A tedious journey; yet not weary they,
 Drawn by the enchantment of his artless song.
 What cannot music? — When brown Ceres asks
 The reaper's sickle, what like magic sound, 161
 Puff'd from sonorous bellows by the squeeze
 Of tuneful artist, can the rage disarm
 Of the swart Dog-star, and make harvest light?
 And now thy mills dance eager in the gale;
 Feed well their eagerness: but, O beware;
 Nor trust between the steel-cas'd cylinders,
 The hand incautious: off the member snapt

Ver. 168. This accident will sometimes happen, especially in the night, and the unfortunate wretch must fall a victim to his imprudence or sleepiness, if a hatchet do not immediately strike off the entangled member; or the mill be not instantly put out of the wind.

Thou'lt ever rue; sad spectacle of woe!

Are there, the muse can scarce believe the tale;
 Are there, who lost to every feeling sense, 171
 To reason interest lost; their slaves desert,
 And manumit them, generous boon! to starve
 Maim'd by imprudence, or the hand of Heaven?
 The good man feeds his blind, his aged steed,
 That in his service spent his vigorous prime:
 And dares a mortal to his fellow man,
 (For spite of vanity thy slaves are men)
 Deny protection? Muse suppress the tale.

Ye! who in bundles bind the lopt-off canes; 180
 But chiefly ye who feed the tight-brac'd mill;
 In separate parcels far the infected fling:
 Of bad cane juice the least admixture spoils
 The richest, soundest: thus in pastoral walks
 One tainted sheep contaminates the fold.

Nor yet to dung-heaps thou resign the canes,
 Which or the sun hath burnt, or rats have gnaw'd.
 These to small junks reduc'd, and in huge casks
 Steept, where no cool winds blow; do thou ferment —

Then, when from his entanglements enlarg'd 190
 Th' evasive spirit mounts; by Vulcan's aid,
 (Nor Amphitryte will her help deny),
 Do thou through all his winding ways pursue
 The runaway; till in thy sparkling bowl
 Confin'd he dances; more a friend to life
 And joy, than that Nepenthe fam'd of yore,
 Which Polydamna, Thone's imperial queen,
 Taught Jove-born Helen on the banks of Nile.

As on old ocean when the wind blows high,
 The cautious mariner contracts his sail; 200
 So here, when squally bursts the speeding gale,
 If thou from ruin would'st thy points preserve,
 Lest-bellying canvas to the storm oppose.

Yet the faint breeze oft flags on listless wings,
 Nor tremulates the coco's airiest arch,
 While the red sun darts deluges of fire;
 And soon (if on the gale thy crop depend),

Pere Labet says, he was informed the English were wont, as a punishment, thus to grind their negroes to death. But one may venture to affirm this punishment never had the sanction of law; and, if any Englishman ever did grind his negroes to death, I will take upon me to aver, he was universally detested by his countrymen.

Indeed the bare suspicion of such a piece of barbarity leaves a stain; and, therefore, authors cannot be too cautious of admitting into their writings any insinuation that bears hard on the humanity of a people.

Daily observation affords but too many proofs, where domestic slavery does not obtain of the fatal consequences of indulged passion and revenge; but where one man is the absolute property of another, those passions may perhaps receive additional activity: planters, therefore, cannot be too much on their guard against the first sallies of passion; as by indulgence passion, like a favourite, will, at last, grow independently powerful.

Ver. 191. A mixture of sea water is a real improvement in the distillation of rum.

Will all thy hopes of opulence defeat.

"Informer of the planetary train!"

Source undiminished of all-cheering light,
Of roseate beauty, and heart-gladd'ning joy!

Fountain of being, on whose water broods
The organic spirit, principle of life!

Lord of the seasons! who in courtly pomp
Lacquey thy presence, and with glad dispatch,

Pour at thy bidding o'er the land and sea!
Parent of vegetation, whose fond grasp

The sugar cane displays; and whose green car
Soft stealing dews, with liquid pearls adorn'd,

Fat fostering rains, and buxom genial airs
Attend triumphant! Why, ah, why so oft,

Why hath Antigua, sweetly social isle,
Nurse of each art, where science yet finds friends

Amid this waste of waters, wept thy rage?
Then trust not, to the unsteady gale;

But in Tobago's endless forests fell
The tall tough hiccory or calaba.

Of this be forc'd two pillars in the ground,
Four paces distant, and two cubits high:

Other two pillars raise; the wood the same,
Of equal size and height. The calaba

Than steel more durable contemns the rain,
And sun's intensest beam; the worm, that pest

Of mariners, which winds its fatal way
Through heart of British oak, reluctant leaves

The closer calaba. By transverse beams
Secure the whole; and in the pillar'd frame,

Sink, artist, the vast bridge-tree's mortis'd form
Of ponderous hiccory; hiccory time defies:

To this be nail'd three polish'd iron plates
Whereon three steel capouces turn with ease;

Of three long rollers, twice nine inches round,
With iron cas'd, and jagg'd with many a cogg.

The central cylinder exceeds the rest
In portly size, thence aptly captain nam'd.

To this be rivetted th' extended sweeps;
And harness to each sweep two seasoned mules:

They pacing round give motion to the whole.
The close brac'd cylinders with ease revolve

Ver. 222. This beautiful island lies in 16 degrees, and 14 min. N. lat. It was long uninhabited on account of its wanting fresh water rivers;

but is now more fully peopled, and as well culti-

ated as any of the leeward islands. In a seasonable year, it has made 20,000 hogsheds of sugar.

It has no very high mountains. The soil is in general clayey. The water of the body-ponds may be used for every purpose of life. Antigua is well fortified, and has a good militia.

Ver. 227. Hiccory is a lofty spreading tree, of very hard wood, excellently adapted to the purposes of the mill-wright. The nut, whose shell is thick, hard, and roughish, contains an agreeable and wholesome kernel. It grows in great abundant in St. Croix, Crab island, and Tobago.

Ver. 227. Calaba. This lofty tree is commonly called Mastic. It is a hard wood, and is found in the places where the hiccory grows. The flowers are yellow, and are succede by a fruit which bears

a distant resemblance to shrub.

On their greas'd axle; and with ease reduce
To trash the canes thy negroes throw between.

Fast flows the liquor through the lead-lin'd spouts;
And depurated by opposing wires,

In the receiver floats a limpid stream.
So twice five casks with muscovado fill'd, [god

Shall from thy staunchions drip, ere day's bright
Hath in the Atlantic six times cool'd his wheels.

Would'st thou against calamity provide?
Let a well shingled roof from Raleigh's land,

Defend thy stock from noon's inclement blaze,
And from night-dews; for night no respite knows.

Nor, when their destin'd labour is perform'd,
Be thou ashamed to lead the parting mules

(The muse, soft parent of each social grace,
With eyes of love God's whole creation views)

To the warm pen; where copious forage strowed,
And strenuous rubbing, renovate their strength.

So, fewer ails, (alas, how prone to ails!)
Their days shall shorten; ah, too short at best!

For not, even then, my friend, art thou secure
From fortune: spite of all thy steady care,

What ills, that laugh to scorn Machaon's art,
Await thy cattle! farcy's tabid form,

Joint-racking spasms, and cholic's pungeant pang,
Need the muse tell? which, in one luckless moon,

Thy sheds dispeople; when perhaps thy groves,
To full perfection shot, by day, by night,

Indefinient demand their vigorous toil.
Then happiest he, for whom the Naiads pour,

From rocky urns, the never-ceasing stream,
To turn his rollers with unbought dispatch.

In Karukera's rich well-water'd isle!
In Matanina! boast of Albion's arms,

Ver. 259. Sir Walter Raleigh gave the name of Virginia, in honour of Queen Elizabeth, to the whole of the north-east of North America, which Sebastian Cabot, a native of Bristol, (though others

call him a Venetian), first discovered, A. D. 1497, in the time of King Henry VII. by whom he was employed; but no advantages could be reaped from this discovery, on account of the various disturbances that ensued in England during the succeeding reigns, till about the year 1584, Queen

Elizabeth gave Sir Walter Raleigh a patent for all such land, from 33 to 40 N. lat. as he should choose to settle with English, reserving only to the Crown a fifth part of all the gold and silver which should therein be discovered, in lieu of all services. Accordingly several embarkations were fitted out from England, but all to no purpose.

Some farther attempts, however, were made to settle this part of the country in the succeeding reign; but it was not till the year 1620, that a regular form of government took place. Then was tobacco planted, and negroes imported into

Virginia. Since that time it has gradually improved, and does not now contain fewer than 100,000 white people of better condition, besides twice as many servants and slaves. The best shingles come from Egg Harbour.

Ver. 283. The Caribbean name of Martinice.

The Havannah had not then been taken.

The brawling Naiads for the planters toil,
 Howe'er unworthy; and, through solemn scenes
 Romantic, cool, with rocks and woods between,
 Enchant the senses! but, among thy swains,
 Sweet Liamuiga! who such bliss can boast?
 Yes, Romney, thou may'st boast; of British heart,
 Of courtly manners, join'd to ancient worth: 290
 Friend to thy Britain's every blood-earn'd right,
 From tyrants wrung; the many or the few.
 By wealth, by titles, by ambition's lure,
 Not to be tempted from fair honour's path:
 While others, falsely flattering their prince,
 Bold disapprov'd, or by oblique surmise
 Their terror hinted, of the people arm'd;
 Indignant, in the senate, he uprose,
 And, with the well-urg'd energy of zeal,
 Their specious, subtle sophistry disprov'd; 300
 The importance, the necessity display'd,
 Of civil armies, freedom's surest guard!
 Nor in the senate didst thou only win
 The palm of eloquence, securely bold;
 But rear'd'st thy banners, fluttering in the wind:
 Kent, from each hamlet, pour'd her marshall'd
 swains,

To hurl defiance on the threatening Gaul.

Thy foaming coppers well with fuel feed;
 For a clear, strong, continued fire improves
 Thy muscovado's colour, and its grain.— 310
 Yet vehement heat, protracted, will consume
 Thy vessels, whether from the martial mine,
 Or from thine ore, bright Venus, they are drawn;
 Or hammer, or hot fusion, give them form.
 If prudence guides thee then, thy stores shall hold
 Of well-liz'd vessels a complete supply:
 For every hour, thy boilers cease to skim,
 (Now Cancer reddens with the solar ray),
 Defeats thy honest purposes of gain.

Nor small the risk (when piety, or chance, 320
 Force thee from boiling to desist) to lave
 Thy heated furnace, with the gelid stream.
 The chemist knows, when all-dissolving fire
 Bids the metalline ore abruptly flow;
 What dread explosions, and what dire effects,
 A few cold drops of water will produce,
 Uncautious, on the novel fluid thrown.

For grain and colour, wouldst thou win, my
 friend,

At every curious mart, the constant palm?
 O'er all thy works let cleanliness preside, 330
 Child of frugality; and, as the scum
 Thick mantles o'er the boiling wave, do thou
 The scum that mantles carefully remove.

From bloating dropfy, from pulmonic ails,
 Wouldst thou defend thy boilers (prime of slaves),

Ver. 312. The vessels, wherein the cane-juice is reduced to sugar by coction, are either made of iron or of copper. Each sort hath its advantages and disadvantages. The teache, or smallest vessel from whence the sugar is laved into the cooler, is generally copper. When it melts, it can be patched; but, when the large sort of vessels, called iron-furnaces, crack, which they are too apt to do, no further use can be made of them.

For days, for nights, for weeks, for months, involv'd

In the warm vapour's all-relaxing steam;
 Thy boiling-house be lofty: all atop
 Open, and perious to the tropic breeze;
 Whose cool persiflation, wooed through many a grate, 340
 Dispels the steam, and gives the lungs to play.

The skill'd in chemia, boast of modern arts,
 Know from experiment, the fire of truth,
 In many a plant that oil, and acid juice,
 And ropy mucilage, by nature live:
 These, envious, stop the much-desir'd embrace
 Of the essential salts, though coction bid
 The aqueous particles to mount in air.

'Mong salts essential, sugar wins the palm,
 For taste, for colour, and for various use: 350
 And, in the nectar of the yellowest cane,
 Much acor, oil, and mucilage abound:
 But in the less mature, from mountain-land,
 These harsh intruders so redundant float,
 Muster so strong, as scarce to be subdued. [cane,
 Muse, sing the ways to quell them. Some use
 That cane, whose juices to the tongue apply'd,

Ver. 339. This also assists the cristallization of the sugar.

Ver. 350. It were impossible, in the short limits of a note, to enumerate the various uses of sugar; and, indeed, as these are in general so well known, it is needless. A few properties of it, however, wherewith the learned are not commonly acquainted, I shall mention. In some places of the East Indies, an excellent arrack is made from the sugar cane; and, in South America, sugar is used as an antidote against one of the most sudden, as well as fatal poisons in the world. Taken by mouth, pocula morte carent, this poison is quite innocent; but the slightest wound made by an arrow, whose point is tinged therewith, proves immediate death; for, by driving all the blood of the body immediately to the heart, it forthwith bursts it. The fish and birds killed by these poisoned arrows (in the use of which the Indians are astonishingly expert) are perfectly wholesome to feed on. See Ulloa and de la Condamine's account of the great river of Amazon. It is a vegetable preparation.

Ver. 357. This, by the natives, is emphatically called the Dumb Cane; for a small quantity of its juice being rubbed on the brim of a drinking vessel, whoever drinks out of it, soon after will have his lips and tongue enormously swelled. A physician, however, who wrote a short account of the diseases of Jamaica, in Charles II's time, recommends it both by the mouth and externally, in dropical and other cases: But I cannot say, I have had any experience of its efficacy in these disorders. It grows wild in the mountains; and, by its use in sugar making, should seem to be somewhat of an alcalescent nature. It grows to four feet high, having, at the top, two green shining leaves, about nine inches long; and, between these, a small spire emerges.

In silence lock it, sudden, and constrain'd
(Death to Xantippe), with distorting pain.

Nor is it not effectual: But wouldst thou 360
Have rival brokers for thy eades contend;
Superior arts remain.—Small casks provide,
Replete with lime-stone thoroughly calcin'd,
And from the air secur'd: This Bristol sends,
Bristol, Britannia's second mart and eye!

Nor "to thy waters only trust for fame,"
Bristol; nor to thy beamy diamonds trust:
Though these oft deck Britannia's lovely fair;
And those oft save the guardians of her realm.
Thy marble quarries claim the voice of praise, 370
Which rich incrusts thy Avon's banks, sweet banks!

Though not to you young Shakspeare, fancy's
All-rudely warbled his first woodland notes;
Though not your caves, while terror stalk'd around,

Saw him essay to clutch the ideal sword,
With drops of blood distain'd: yet, lovely banks,
On you reclin'd, another tun'd his pipe;
Whom all the muses emulously love,
And in whose strains your praises shall endure,
While to Sabrina speeds your healing stream. 380

Bristol, without thy marble, by the flame
Calcin'd to whiteness, vain the stately reed
Would swell with juice mellifluent; heat would soon

The strongest, best hung furnaces, consume.
Without its aid the cool-imprison'd stream,
Seldom allow'd to view the face of day,
Though late it roam'd a denizen of air;
Would steal from its involuntary bounds,
And, by fly windings, set itself at large.

But chief thy lime the experienc'd boiler loves, 390
Nor loves ill-founded; when no other art
Can bribe to union the coy floating salts,
A proper portion of this precious dust,
Cast in the wave (so showers alone of gold
Could win fair Danaë to the god's embrace);
With nectar'd muscovado soon will charge
Thy shelving coolers; which, severely press'd
Between the fingers, not resolves; and which
Rings in the cask; and or a light-brown hue,
Or thine, more precious silvery grey, assumes. 400

The fam'd Bermuda's ever-healthy isles,
More fam'd by gentle Waller's deathless strains,
Than for their cedars, which, insulting, fly
O'er the wide ocean; 'mid their rocks contain
A stone, which, when calcin'd (experience says),
Is only second to Sabrina's lime.

While flows the juice mellifluent from the cane,
Grudge not, my friend, to let thy slaves, each
morn,

But chief the sick and young, at setting day,
Themselves regale with oft repeated draughts 410
Of tepid nectar; so shall health and strength
Confirm thy negroes, and make labour light.

While flame thy chimneys, while thy coppers
foam,

How blithe, how jocund, the plantation smiles!
By day, by night, resounds the choral song
Of glad barbarity; serene, the sun
Shines not intensely hot; the trade-wind blows:

How sweet, how silken, is its noontide breath?
While to far climes the fell destroyer, death,
Wings his dark flight. Then seldom pray for rain: 420

Rather for cloudless days thy prayers prefer;
For, if the skies too frequently relent,
Crude flows the cane-juice, and will long elude
The boiler's wariest skill: thy canes will spring
To an unthrifty loziness; or, weigh'd
Down by their load (ambition's curse), decay.

Encourage thou thy boilers; much depends
On their skill'd efforts. If too soon they strike,
E'er all the watery particles have fled;
Or lime sufficient granulate the juice: 430
In vain the thick'ning liquor is effus'd;
An heterogeneous, an uncertain mass,
And never in thy coolers to condense.

Or, planter, if the coction they prolong
Beyond its stated time; the viscous wave
Will in huge flinty masses chrysalize,
Which forceful fingers scarce can crumble down;
And which with its melasses ne'er will part:

Yet this, fast-dripping in nectareous drops,
Not only betters what remains, but when 440
With art fermented, yields a noble wine,
Than which nor Gallia, nor the Indian clime,
Where rolls the Ganges, can a nobler show.
So misers in their coffers lock that gold;
Which, if allowed at liberty to roam,
Would better them, and benefit mankind.

In the last coppers, when the embrowning wave
With sudden fury swells; some grease immix'd,
The foaming tumult sudden will compose,
And force to union the divided grain. 450
So when two swarms in airy battle join,
The winged heroes heap the bloody field;
Until some dust, thrown upward in the sky,
Quell the wild conflict, and sweet peace restore.

False Gallia's sons, that hoe the ocean-isles,
Mix with their sugar, loads of worthless sand,
Fraudful, their weight of sugar to increase.
Far be such guile from Britain's honest swains.
Such arts, awhile, the unwary may surprise,
And benefit the impostor; but, ere long, 460
The skilful buyer will the fraud detect,
And, with abhorrence, reprobate the name.

Ver. 428. When the cane juice is granulated sufficiently, which is known by the sugar's sticking to the ladle, and roping like a syrup, but breaking off from its edges, it is poured into a cooler, where, its surface being smoothed, the chrysalization is soon completed. This is called striking. The general precept is to temper high, and strike low. When the muscovado is of a proper consistence, it is dug out of the cooler, and put into hogheads; this is called potting. The casks being placed upon staunchions, the melasses drips from them into a cistern, made on purpose, below them, to receive it. The sugar is sufficiently cured, when the hoghead rings upon being struck with a stick; and when the two canes, which are put into every cask, show no melasses upon them when drawn out of it.

Fortune had crown'd Avaro's younger years,
 With a vast tract of land, on which the cane
 Delighted grew, nor ask'd the toil of art.
 The sugar-bakers deem'd themselves secure,
 Of mighty profit, could they buy his cades;
 For, whiteness, hardness, to the leeward-crop,
 His muscovado gave. But, not content
 With this pre-eminence of honest gain, 470
 He baser sugars started in his casks;
 His own, by mixing sordid things, debas'd.
 One year the fraud succeeded; wealth immense
 Flow'd in upon him, and he blest his wiles:
 The next, the brokers spurn'd the adulterate mass,
 Both on the Avon and the banks of Thame.

Be thrifty, planter, even thy skimmings save:
 For, planter, know, the refuse of the cane
 Serves needful purposes. Are barbecues
 The cates thou lov'st? What like rich skimmings
 feed 480
 The grunting, bristly kind? Your labouring mules
 They soon invigorate: Give old Baynard these,
 Untir'd he trudges in his destin'd round;
 Nor need the driver crack his horrid lash.

Yet, with small quantities indulge the steed,
 Whom skimmings ne'er have fatten'd: else, too fond,

So gluttons use, he'll eat intemperate meals;
 And, staggering, fall the prey of ravening sharks.

But say, ye boon companions, in what strains,
 What grateful strains, shall I record the praise 490
 Of their best produce, heart-recruiting rum?
 Thrice wholesome spirit! well-matur'd with age,
 Thrice grateful to the palate! when, with thirst,
 With heat, with labour, and wan care oppress'd,
 I quaff thy bowl, where fruit my hands have cull'd,
 Round, golden fruit; where water from the spring, [round;

Which dripping coolness spreads her umbrage
 With hardest, whitest sugar, thrice refin'd;
 Dilates my soul with genuine joy; low care
 I spurn indignant; toil a pleasure seems. 500
 For not Marne's flowery banks, nor Tille's green bounds,

Where Ceres with the God of vintage reigns,
 In happiest union; not Vigornian hills,
 Pomona's lov'd abode, afford to man
 Goblets more priz'd, or laudable of taste,
 To slake parch'd thirst, and mitigate the clime.

Yet, 'mid this blest ebriety, some tears,
 For friends I left in Albion's distant isle,
 For Johnson, Percy, White, escape mine eyes:
 For her, fair auth'ress! whom first Calpe's rocks
 A sportive infant saw; and whose green years 511
 True genius blest with her benigne gifts
 Of happiest fancy. O, were ye all here,
 O, were ye here; with him, my Pæon's son!
 Long-known, of worth approv'd, thrice candid soul!

How would your converse charm the lonely hour?

Your converse, where mild wisdom tempers mirth;
 And charity, the petulance of wit;
 How would your converse polish my rude lays,
 With what new, noble images adorn? 520
 Then should I scarce regret the banks of Thames,
 All as we sat beneath that sand-box shade;
 Whence the delighted eye expatiates wide
 O'er the fair landscape; where in loveliest forms,
 Green cultivation hath array'd the land.

See! there, what mills, like giants raise their arms,

To quell the speeding gale! what smoke ascends
 From every boiling house! What structures rise,
 Neat though not lofty, pervious to the breeze;
 With galleries, porches, or piazzas grac'd! 530
 Nor not delightful are those reed-built huts,
 On yonder hill, that front the rising sun;
 With plantanes, with banana's bosom'd-deep,
 That flutter in the wind: where frolic goats,
 But the young negroes, while their swarthy fires,
 With ardent gladness wield the bill; and hark,
 The crop is finish'd, how they rend the sky!—

Nor, beauteous only shows the cultured soil,
 From this cool station. No less charms the eye
 That wild interminable waste of waves: 540
 While on the horizon's farthest verge are seen
 Islands of different shape, and different size;
 While sail-clad ships, with their sweet produce
 fraught,

Swell on the straining sight; while near yon rock,
 On which ten thousand wings with ceaseless clang
 Their airies build, a water spout descends,
 And shakes mid ocean; and while there below,
 That town, embowered in the different shade
 Of tamarinds, panspans, and papaws, o'er which

Ver. 522. So called, from the pericarpium's being often made use of for containing sand; when the seeds, which are a violent emetic, are taken out. This is a fine shady tree, especially when young; and its leaves are efficaciously applied in headaches to the temples, which they sweat. It grows fast; but loses much of its beauty by age.
 Its wood is brittle, and when cut, emits a milky juice, which is not caustic. The sand-box thrives best in warm shady places. The sun often splits the pericarpium, which then cracks like a pistol.
 It is round, flattened both above and below, and divided into a great number of regular compartments, each of which contains one seed flattened ovularly. The botanical name is Hura.

Ver. 549. panspans.] See the notes on Book II.

Ibid. papaws.] This singular tree, whose fruits surround its summit under the branches and leaves, like a necklace; grows quicker than almost any other in the West-Indies. The wood is of no use, being spongy, hollow, and herbacious; however, the blossoms and fruit make excellent sweetmeats; but above all, the juice of the fruit being rubbed upon a spit, will intenerate new killed fowls, &c. a circumstance of great consequence in a climate, where the warmth soon renders whatever meats are attempted to be made tender by keeping, unfit for culinary purposes. Nor, will it

What though no bird of song, here charms the sense

With her wild minstrelsy; far, far beyond,
The unnatural quavers of Hesperian throats!
Though the chaste poet of the vernal woods,
That shuns rude folly's din, delight not here
The listening eve; and though no herald-lark
Here leave his couch, high-towering to descry
The approach of dawn, and hail her with his
song: 560

Yet not unmusical the tinkling lapse
Of yon cool argent rill, which Phœbus gilds
With his first orient rays; yet musical,
Those buxom airs that through the plantanes play,
And tear with wantonness their leafy scrolls;
Yet not unmusical the waves hoarse sound,
That dashes, fullen, on the distant shore;
Yet musical those little insects hum,
That hover round us, and to reason's ear,
Deep, moral truths convey; while every beam 570
Flings on them transient tints, which vary when
They wave their purple plumes; yet musical
The love-lorn cooing of the mountain-dove,
That woos to pleasing thoughtfulness the soul;
But chief the breeze, that murmurs through yon canes,
Enchants the ear with tunable delight.

While such fair scenes adorn these blissful isles;
Why will their sons, ungrateful, roam abroad?
Why spend their opulence in other climes?

Say, is pre-eminence your partial aim — 580
Distinction courts you here; the senate calls.
Here, crouching slaves, attendant wait your nod:
While there, unnoted, but for folly's garb,
For folly's jargon; your dull hours ye pass,
Eclips'd by titles, and superior wealth.

Does martial ardour fire your generous veins?
Fly to your native isles: Bellona, there,
Hath long time rear'd her bloody flag; these isles
Your strenuous arms demand; for ye are brave!

Weave antic measures. O, could my weak song,
O could my song, like his, heaven-favoured

To victory, to glory; fire your souls

Nor grudge those wreaths Tyrtæus gain'd of yore. 600

Or are ye fond of rich luxurious cates?—
Can aught in Europe emulate the pine,
Or fruit forbidden, native of your isles?
Sons of Apicius, say, can Europe's seas,
Can aught the edible creation yields,
Compare with turtle, boast of land and wave?
Can Europe's seas, in all their finny realms,
Aught so delicious as the Jew-fish show?
Tell me what viands, land or streams produce,
The large, black, female, moulting crab excel? 610
A richer flavour not wild Cambria's hills,
Nor Scotia's rocks with heath and thyme o'er-
spread,

Give to their flocks; than, lone Barbuda, you,
Than you, Anguilla, to your sheep impart.
Even Britain's vintage, here, improv'd, we quaff
Even Lusitanian, even Hesperian wines.

Those from the Rhine's imperial banks (poor
Rhine! [blood?

How have thy banks been dyed with brother-
Unnatural warfare)! strength and flavour gain
In this delicious clime. Besides, the cane 620
Wasted to every quarter of the globe,
Makes the vast produce of the world your own.

Or rather, doth the love of nature charm;
Its mighty love your chief attention claim?
Leave Europe; there, through all her coyest ways,
Her secret mazes, nature is pursued:
But here, with savage loneliness, she reigns
On yonder peak, whence giddy fancy looks,
Affrighted, on the labouring main below.
Heavens! what stupendous, what unnumbered
trees, 630
"Stage above stage, in various verdure drest,"
Unprofitable shag its airy cliffs! [less bloom,
Heavens! what new shrubs, what herbs with use-
Adorn its channell'd sides; and, in its caves

Ver. 608. This, though a very large, is one of the most delicate fishes that swim; being preferable to caramaw, king-fish, or camaree: some even choose it before turtle. The Jew-fish is often met with at Antigua, which enjoys the happiness of having on its coast few, if any, poisoned fishes.

Ver. 613. This is a low, and not large stock-island, belonging to the Codrington family. Part of this island, as also two plantations in Barbadoes, were left by Colonel Christopher Codring-ton, for building a college in Barbadoes, and converting negroes to the Christian religion.

Ver. 614. This island is about thirty miles long and ten broad. Though not mountainous, it is rocky, and abounds with strong passes; so that a few of its inhabitants, who are indeed expert in the use of fire-arms, repulsed, with great slaughter, a considerable detachment of French, who made a descent thereon in the war preceding the last. Cotton and cattle are its chief commodities.
Many of the inhabitants are rich; the captain-general of the Leeward-Islands nominates the governor and council. They have no assembly.

What sulphurs, ores, what earths and stones abound!

There let philosophy conduct thy steps, [search,
"For naught is useless made:" With candid
Examine all the properties of things;
Immense discoveries soon will crown your toil,
Your time will soon repay. Ah, when will cares,

640

The cares of fortune, less my minutes claim?

Then, with what joy, what energy of soul,
Will I not climb yon mountain's airiest brow!
The dawn, the burning noon, the setting sun,
The midnight-hour, shall hear my constant vows
To nature; see me prostrate at her shrine!

And, O, haply I may aught invent
Of use to mortal man, life to prolong,
To soften, or adorn; what genuine joy,
What exultation of supreme delight, 650
Will swell my raptured bosom. Then, when death

Shall call me hence, I'll unrepining go;
Nor envy conquerors their storied tombs,
Though not a stone point out my humble grave.

BOOK. IV.

ARGUMENT.

Invocation to the Genius of Africa. Address.

Negroes when bought should be young, and strong. The Congo-negroes are fitter for the house and trades, than for the field. The Gold-Coast, but especially the Papaw-negroes, make the best field-negroes: but even these, if advanced in years, should not be purchased. The marks of a sound negroe at a negroe sale. Where the men do nothing but hunt, fish or fight, and all field drudgery is left to the women; these are to be preferred to their husbands. The Minnahs make good tradesmen, but addicted to suicide. The Mandingos, in particular, subject to worms; and the Congas, to dropical disorders. How salt-water, or new negroes should be seasoned. Some negroes eat dirt. Negroes should be habituated by gentle degrees to field labour. This labour, when compared to that in lead-mines, or of those who work in the gold and silver mines of South America, is not only less toilsome, but far more healthy. Negroes should always be treated with humanity. Praise of freedom. Of the dracunculus, or dragon-worm. Of chigres. Of the yaws. Might not this disease be imparted by inoculation? Of worms, and their multiform appearance. Praise of commerce. Of the imaginary disorders of negroes, especially those caused by their conjurers or Obiamen. The composition and supposed virtues of a magic-phil. Field-negroes should not begin to work before six in the morning, and should leave off between eleven and twelve; and beginning again at two, should finish before sunset. Of the weekly allowance of negroes. The young, the old, the sickly, and even the lazy, must have their victuals prepared for them,

Of negro ground, and its various productions. To be fenced in, and watched. Of an American garden. Of the situation of the negro-huts. How best defended from fire. The great negro-dance described. Drumming, and intoxicating spirits not to be allowed. Negroes should be made to marry in their masters plantation. Inconveniences arising from the contrary practice. Negroes to be clothed once a year, and before Christmas. Praise of Lewis XIV. for the Code Noir. A body of laws of this kind recommended to the English sugar colonies. Praise of the river Thames. A moon-light landscape and vision.

GENIUS of Afric! whether thou bestrid'st
The castled elephant; or at the source,
(While howls the desert fearfully around),
Of thine own Niger, sadly thou reclin'st
Thy temples, shaded by the tremulous palm,
Or quick papaw, whose top is necklac'd round
With numerous rows of party-colour'd fruit:
Or hear'st thou rather from the rocky banks
Of Rio Grandê, or black Sanaga?
Where dauntless thou the headlong torrent brav'st
In search of gold, to braid thy woolly locks, 11
Or with bright ringlets ornament thine ears,
Thine arms, and ankles: O attend my song.

A muse that pities thy distressful state;
Who sees, with grief, thy sons in fetters bound;
Who wishes freedom to the race of man;
Thy nod assenting craves: dread genius, come!
Yet vain thy presence, vain thy favouring nod:
Unless once more the muses, that erewhile
Upheld me fainting in my past career, 20
Through Caribbee's cane-isles, kind condescend
To guide my footsteps through parch'd Libya's wilds;

And bind my sun-burnt brow with other bays,
Than ever deck'd the Sylvan bard before.

Say, will my Melvill, from the public care,
Withdraw one moment, to the muses shrine?
Who smit with thy fair fame, industrious cull
An Indian wreath to mingle with thy bays,
And deck the hero, and the scholar's brow!
Wilt thou, whose mildness smooths the face of war, 30

Who round the victor-blade the myrtle twin'st,
And mak'st subjection loyal and sincere;
O wilt thou gracious hear the unartful strain,
Whose mild instructions teach, no trivial theme,
What care the jetty African requires?

Yes, thou wilt deign to hear; a man thou art
Who deem'st nought foreign that belongs to man.
In mind, and aptitude for useful toil,

The negroes differ: muse that difference sing.

Whether to wield the hoe, or guide the plane;
Or for domestic uses thou intend'st 41

The sunny Libyan: from what clime they spring,
It not imports; if strength and youth be theirs.

Yet those from Congo's wide-extended plains,
Through which the long Zaire winds with crystal
stream,

Where lavish nature sends indulgent forth
Fruits of high flavour, and spontaneous seeds

Of bland nutritious quality, ill bear
The toilsome field; but boast a docile mind,
And happiness of features. These, with care, 50
Be taught each nice mechanic art: or train'd
To household offices; their ductile souls
Will all thy care, and all thy gold repay.

But, if the labours of the field demand
Thy chief attention; and the ambrosial cane
Thou long'st to see, with spiry frequency, shade
Many an acre: planter, choose the slave,
Who sails from barren climes; where want alone,
Offspring of rude necessity, compels
The sturdy native, or to plant the soil, 60
Or stem vast rivers for his daily food.

Such are the children of the Golden Coast;
Such the Papaws, of negroes far the best:
And such the numerous tribes, that skirt the
shore,
From rapid Volta to the distant Rey.

But, planter, from what coast so'er they sail,
Buy not the old: they ever fullen prove;
With heart-felt anguish, they lament their home;
They will not, cannot work; they never learn
Thy native language; they are prone to ails; 70
And oft by suicide their being end.—

Must thou from Afric reinforce thy gang?—
Let health and youth their every sinew firm;
Clear roll their ample eye; their tongue be red;
Broad swell their chest; their shoulders wide expand;

Not prominent their belly; clean and strong
Their thighs and legs, in just proportion rise.
Such soon will brave the fervours of the clime;
And free from ails, that kill thy negroe-train,
A useful servitude will long support. 80

Yet, if thine own, thy childrens life, be dear;
Buy not a Cormantee, though healthy, young.
Of breed too generous for the servile field;
They, born to freedom in their native land,
Choose death before dishonourable bonds:
Or, fir'd with vengeance, at the midnight hour,
Sudden they seize thine unsuspecting watch,
And thine own poinard bury in thy breast.

At home, the men, in many a sylvan realm,
Their rank tobacco, charm of sauntering minds, 90
From clayey tubes inhale; or, vacant, beat
For prey the forest; or, in war's dread ranks,
Their country's foes affront: while, in the field,
Their wives plant rice, or yams, or lofty maize,
Fell hunger to repel. Be these thy choice:
They, hardy, with the labours of the cane
Soon grow familiar; while unusual toil,
And new severities their husbands kill.

The slaves from Minnah are of stubborn breed:
But, when the bill, or hammer, they affect; 100
They soon perfection reach. But fly, with care,
The Moco-nation; they themselves destroy.

Worms lurk in all: yet, pronest they to worms,
Who from Mundinga sail. When therefore such Thou buy'st, for sturdy and laborious they,
Straight let some learned leach strong medicines
give.

Till food and climate both familiar grow.
Thus, though from rise to set, in Phœbus' eye,
They toil, unceasing; yet, at night, they'll sleep,

Lap'd in Elysium; and, each day, at dawn, 110
Spring from their couch, as blithsome as the sun.

One precept more, it much imports to know.—
The blacks, who drink the Quanza's lucid stream,
Fed by ten thousand springs, are prone to bloat,
Whether at home or in these ocean-isles:
And though nice art the water may subdue,
Yet many die; and few, for many a year,
Just strength attain to labour for their lord.

Would'st thou secure thine Ethiop from those ails, [breed, 120

Which change of climate, change of waters
And food unusual? let Machaon draw
From each some blood, as age and sex require;
And well with vervain, well with sempre-vive,
Unload their bowels.—These, in every hedge,
Spontaneous grow.—Nor will it not conduce
To give what chemists, in mysterious phrase,
Term the white eagle; deadly foe to worms.
But chief do thou, my friend, with hearty food,
Yet easy of digestion, likest that
Which they at home regal'd on; renovate 130
Their sea-worn appetites. Let gentle work,
Or rather playful exercise, amuse
The novel gang; and far be angry words;
Far ponderous chains; and far disheartening
blows.—

From fruits restrain their eagerness; yet if
The acajou, haply, in thy garden bloom,
With cherries, or of white or purple hue,
Thrice wholesome fruit in this relaxing clime!
Safely thou may'st their appetite indulge.
Their arid skins will plump, their features shine: 140
No rheums, no dysenteric ails torment:
The thirsty hydrops flies.—'Tis even averr'd,
(Ah, did experience sanctify the fact;
How many Lybians now would dig the soil,

Ver. 137. The tree which produces this wholesome fruit is tall, shady, and of quick growth. Its Indian name is Acajou; hence corruptly called Casbew by the English. The fruit has no resemblance to a cherry, either in shape or size; and bears, at its lower extremity, a nut (which the Spaniards name Anacardo, and physicians Anacardium) that resembles a large kidney-bean. Its kernel is as grateful as an almond, and more easy of digestion. Between its rinds is contained a highly caustic oil; which, being held to a candle, emits bright salient sparkles, in which the American fortune-tellers pretended they saw spirits who gave answers to whatever questions were put to them by their ignorant followers. This oil is used as a cosmetic by the ladies, to remove freckles and sun-burning; but the pain they necessarily suffer makes its use not very frequent. This tree also produces a gum not inferior to Gum-Arabic;
and its bark is an approved astringent. The juice of the cherry stains exceedingly. The long citron or amber-coloured, is the best. The cashew-nuts, when unripe, are of a green colour; but, ripe,
they assume that of a pale olive. This tree bears fruit but once a year.

Who pine in hourly agonies away!)
 This pleasing fruit, if turtle joins its aid,
 Removes that worst of ails, disgrace of art,
 The loathsome leprosy's infectious bane.

There are, the muse hath oft abhorrent seen
 Who swallow dirt; (so the chlorotic fair 150
 Oft chalk prefer to the most poignant cates):
 Such dropfy blots, and to sure death consigns,
 Unless restrain'd from this unwholesome food
 By soothing words by menaces, by blows:
 Nor yet will threats, or blows, or soothing words,
 Perfect their cure, unless thou, Pæan, deign'st
 By medicine's power their cravings to subdue.

To easy labour first inure thy slaves;
 Extremes are dangerous. With industrious search
 Let them fit grassy provender collect 160
 For thy keen stomach'd herds.—But when the earth

Hath made her annual progress round the sun,
 What time the conch or bell resounds, they may
 All to the cane-ground with thy gang repair.

Nor negro at thy destiny repine,
 Though doom'd to toil from dawn to setting sun.
 How far more pleasant is thy rural task
 Than theirs who sweat, sequester'd from the day,
 In dark tartarean caves, sunk far beneath 169
 The earth's dark surface, where sulphureous flames,
 Oft from their vapoury prisons bursting wild,
 To dire explosion give the cavern'd deep,
 And in dread ruin all its inmates whelm?—
 Nor fateful only is the bursting flame;
 The exhalations of the deep-dug mine,
 Though slow, shake from their wings as sure a
 death.

With what intense severity of pain
 Hath the afflicted muse, in Scotia, seen
 The miners rack'd, who toil for fatal lead?
 What cramps, what palsies, shake their feeble
 limbs, 180

Who, on the margin of the rocky Drave,
 Trace silver's fluent ore? Yet white men these!

How far more happy ye than these poor slaves,
 Who, whilom, under native, gracious chiefs,
 Incas and emperors, long time enjoy'd
 Mild government, with every sweet of life,
 In blissful climates? See them dragg'd in chains,
 By proud insulting tyrants, to the mines
 Which once they call'd their own, and then de-spis'd!

See, in the mineral bosom of their land, 190
 How hard they toil! how soon their youthful limbs

Feel the decrepitude of age! how soon
 Their teeth desert their sockets! and how soon
 Shaking paralysis unstrings their frame!
 Yet scarce, even then, are they allow'd to view
 The glorious god of day, of whom they beg,
 With earnest hourly supplications, death;
 Yet death flow comes, to torture them the more!

With these compar'd, ye sons of Afric, say
 How far more happy is your lot? Bland health,
 Of ardent eye, and limb robust, attends 201
 Your custom'd labour; and, should sickness seize,
 With what solicitude are ye not nurs'd!—

Ye negroes, then, your pleasing task pursue,
 And by your toil deserve your master's care.

When first your blacks are novel to the hoe,
 Study their humours: Some, soft-soothing words;
 Some, presents; and some, menaces subdue;
 And some I've known, so stubborn is their kind,
 Whom blows, alas! could win alone to toil. 210

Yet, planter, let humanity prevail.—
 Perhaps thy negro, in his native land,
 Possess large fertile plains, and slaves, and herds:
 Perhaps, whene'er he deign'd to walk abroad,
 The richest silks, from where the Indus rolls,
 His limbs invested in their gorgeous pleats:
 Perhaps he wails his wife, his children, left
 To struggle with adversity: Perhaps
 Fortune, in battle for his country fought,
 Gave him a captive to his deadliest foe: 220

Perhaps, incautious, in his native fields,
 (On pleasurable scenes his mind intent)
 All as he wandered; from the neighbouring grove
 Fell ambush dragg'd him to the hated main—
 Were they even sold for crimes, ye polish'd say!
 Ye, to whom learning opes her amplest page!
 Ye, whom the knowledge of a living God
 Should lead to virtue! Are ye free from crimes?
 Ah pity then these uninstructed swains;
 And still let mercy soften the decrees 230
 Of rigid justice, with her lenient hand.

Oh, did the tender muse possess the power
 Which monarchs have, and monarchs oft abuse,
 'Twould be the fond ambition of her soul
 To quell tyrannic sway; knock off the chains
 Of heart-debasing slavery; give to man,
 Of every colour and of every clime,
 Freedom, which stamps him image of his God.
 Then laws, oppression's scourge, fair virtue's prop,
 Offspring of wisdom! should impartial reign. 240
 To knit the whole in well-accorded strife:
 Servants, not slaves; of choice, and not compell'd;
 The blacks should cultivate the cane-land isles.

Say, shall the muse the various ills recount
 Which negro nations feel? Shall she describe
 The worm that subtly winds into their flesh,
 All as they bathe them in their native streams?
 There, with fell increment, it soon attains
 A direful length of harm. Yet, if due skill
 And proper circumspection are employed, 250
 It may be won its volumes to wind round
 A leaden cylinder: But, oh, beware,
 No rashness practise; else 'twill surely snap,
 And, suddenly retreating, dire produce
 An annual lameness to the tortured Moor.

Nor only is the dragon worm to dread:
 Fell winged insects, which the visual ray

Ver. 163. Plantations that have no bells, assemble their negroes by sounding a conch-shell.

Ver. 181. A river in Hungary, on whose banks are found mines of quicksilver.

Ver. 257. These, by the English, are called Chigoes or Chigres. They chiefly perforate the toes, and sometimes the fingers; occasioning an itching, which some people think not unplea-

Scarcely discerns, their sable feet and hands
 Oft penetrate, and in the fleshy nest
 Myriads of young produce, which soon destroy
 The parts they breed in, if assiduous care, 261
 With art, extract not the prolific foe.

Or, shall she sing, and not debase her lay,
 The pest peculiar to the Æthiop-kind,
 The yaw's infectious bane?—The infected far
 In huts to leeward lodge, or near the main.
 With heart'ning food, with turtle, and with conchs,
 The flowers of sulphur, and hard niccars burnt,
 The lurking evil from the blood expel,
 And throw it on the surface: There in spots 270
 Which cause no pain, and scanty ichor yield,
 It chiefly breaks about the arms and hips,
 A virulent contagion!—When no more
 Round knobby spots deform, but the disease
 Seems at a pause, then let the learned leech
 Give, in due dose, live-silver from the mine,
 Till copious spitting the whole taint exhaust.—
 Nor thou repine, though half-way round the sun
 This globe her annual progress shall absolve,
 Ere, clear'd, thy slave from all infection shine.
 Nor then be confident; successive crops 281
 Of defecations oft will spot the skin:
 These thou, with turpentine and guaiac pods,
 Reduc'd by coction to a wholesome draught,
 Total remove, and give the blood its balm.

Say, as this malady but once infests
 The sons of Guinea, might not skill ingraft
 (Thus the small-pox are happily convey'd)
 This ailment early to thy negro-train?

Yet, of the ills which torture Libya's sons, 290
 Worms tyrannize the worst. They, Proteus-like,
 Each symptom of each malady assume,
 And under every mask the assassins kill.
 Now, in the guise of horrid spasms, they writhe
 The tortured body, and all sense o'erpower.
 Sometimes, like mania, with her head downcast,
 They cause the wretch in solitude to pine;
 Or frantic, bursting from the strongest chains,
 To frown with look terrific, not his own.
 Sometimes, like ague, with a shivering mien, 300
 The teeth gnash fearful, and the blood runs chill:

and are at pains to get, by going to the copper-holes, or mill-round, where chigres most abound. They lay their nits in a bag, about the size of a small pea, and are partly contained therein themselves. This the negroes extract without bursting, by means of a needle, and filling up the place with a little snuff; it soon heals, if the person has a good constitution. One species of them is supposed to be poisonous, but I believe unjustly. When they bury themselves near a tendon, especially if the person is in a bad habit of body, they occasion troublesome sores. The South Americans call them Niguas.

Ver. 268. The botanical name of this medicinal shrub is Guilandina. The fruit resembles marbles, though not so round. Their shell is hard and smooth, and contains a farinaceous nut, of admirable use in seminal weaknesses. They are also given to throw out the yaws.

Anon the ferment maddens in the veins,
 And a false vigour animates the frame.
 Again, the dropfy's blotted mask they steal,
 Or, "melt with minings of the hectic fire."

Say, to such various mimic forms of death,
 What remedies shall puzzled art oppose?—
 Thanks to the Almighty, in each path-way hedge
 Rank cow-itch grows, whose sharp unnumber'd stings,

Sheath'd in melasses, from their dens expel, 310
 Fell dens of death, the reptile lurking foe.—
 A powerful vermifuge, in skilful hands,
 The worm-grass proves; yet, even in hands of
 skill,

Sudden I've known it dim the visual ray
 For a whole day and night. There are who use
 (And sage experience justifies the use)
 The mineral product of the Cornish mine;
 Which in old times, ere Britain laws enjoyed,
 The polish'd Tyrians, monarchs of the main,
 In their swift ships convey'd to foreign realms:
 The sun by day, by night the northern star, 321
 Their course conducted—Mighty commerce, hail!
 By thee the sons of Attic's sterile land,
 A scanty number, laws impos'd on Greece:
 Nor aw'd they Greece alone; vast Asia's king,
 Though girt by rich arm'd myriads, at their frown
 Felt his heart wither on his farthest throne.
 Perennial source of population thou!

While scanty peasants plough the flowery plains
 Of purple Enna; from the Belgian fens, 330
 What swarms of useful citizens spring up, Hatch'd by thy fostering wing. Ah, where is flown

That dauntless free-born spirit, which of old
 Taught them to shake off the tyrannic yoke
 Of Spain's insulting king; on whose wide realms
 The sun still shone with undiminish'd beam?
 Parent of wealth! in vain coy nature hoards
 Her gold and diamonds; toil, thy firm compeer,
 And industry of unremitting nerve,
 Scale the cleft mountain, the loud torrent brave,
 Plunge to the centre, and through nature's wiles,
 (Led on by skill of penetrative soul)
 Her following close, her secret treasures find,

Ver. 309. See notes in Book II.

Ver. 317. Tin-filings are a better vermifuge than tin in powder. The western parts of Britain, and the neighbouring isles, have been famous for this useful metal from the remotest antiquity; for we find from Strabo, that the Phœnicians made frequent voyages to those parts (which they called Cassiterides, from Κασσίτερος, stannum) in quest of that commodity, which turned out so beneficial to them, that a pilot of that nation stranded his vessel, rather than show a Roman ship that watched him the way to those mines. For this public-spirited action he was amply rewarded, says that accurate writer, upon his return to his country. The Romans, however, soon made themselves masters of the secret, and shared with them in the profit of that merchandise.

To pour them plenteous on the laughing world;
On thee, Sylvanus, thee each rural god;
On thee chief Ceres, with unfailing love;
And fond distinction, emulously gaze.
In vain hath nature pour'd vast seas between
Far-distant kingdoms; endless storms in vain
With double night brood o'er them; thou dost throw,

O'er far-divided nature's realms, a chain
To bind in sweet society mankind.
By thee white Albion, once a barbarous clime,
Grew fam'd for arms, for wisdom, and for laws;
By thee she holds the balance of the world,
Acknowledg'd now sole empress of the main.
Coy though thou art, and mutable of love,
There may'st thou ever fix thy wandering steps;
While Eurus rules the wide Atlantic foam!
By thee, thy favourite, great Columbus found
That world, where now thy praises I rehearse
To the resounding main and palmy shore;
And Lusitania's chiefs those realms explor'd,
Whence negroes spring, the subject of my song.

Nor pine the blacks alone with real ills,
That baffle oft the wisest rules of art;
They likewise feel imaginary woes,
Woes no less deadly. Luckless he who owns
The slave, who thinks himself bewitch'd; and whom,

In wrath, a conjurer's snake-mark'd staff hath
They mope, love silence, every friend avoid,
They inly pine, all aliment reject,
Or insufficient for nutrition take:

Their features droop: a sickly yellowish hue
Their skin deforms; their strength and beauty fly.
Then comes the feverish fiend, with fiery eyes,
Whom drowth, convulsions, and whom death
surround,

Fatal attendants! if some subtle slave
(Such Obia-men are styl'd) do not engage
To save the wretch by antidote or spell.

In magic spells, in Obia, all the sons
Of fable Afric trust:—Ye sacred nine!
(For ye each hidden preparation know)
Transpierce the gloom, which ignorance and fraud
Have render'd awful; tell the laughing world
Of what these wonder-working charms are made.

Ver. 370. The negro-conjurers, or obia-men, as they are called, carry about them a staff, which is marked with frogs, snakes, &c. The blacks imagine that its blow, if not mortal, will at least occasion long and troublesome disorders. A belief in magic is inseparable from human nature; but those nations are most addicted thereto, among whom learning, and of course philosophy, have least obtained. As in all other countries, so in Guinea, the conjurers, as they have more understanding, so are they almost always more wicked than the common herd of their deluded countrymen; and as the negro magicians can do mischief, so they can also do good on a plantation, provided they are kept by the white people in proper subordination.

Fern root cut small, and tied with many a knot;
Old teeth extracted from a white man's skull:
A lizard's skeleton; a serpent's head;
These mix'd with salt, and water from the spring,
Are in a phial pour'd; o'er these the leach
Mutters strange jargon, and wild circles forms.

Of this posset, each negro deems himself
Secure from poison; for to poison they
Are infamously prone: and arm'd with this,
Their sable country demons they defy,
Who fearful haunt them at the midnight hour,
To work them mischief. This, diseases fly;
Diseases follow: such its wondrous power!
This o'er the threshold of their cottage hung,
No thieves break in; or, if they dare to steal,
Their feet in blotches which admit no cure,
Burst loathsome out: but should its owner filch,
As slaves were ever of the pilfering kind,
This from detection screens;—so conjurers swear.

Till morning dawn, and Lucifer withdraw
His beamy chariot; let not the loud bell
Call forth thy negroes from their rushy couch:
And ere the sun with mid-day fervour glow,
When every broom-bush opes her yellow flower;
Let thy black labourers from their toil desist:
Nor till the broom her every petal lock,
Let the loud bell recal them to the hoe.
But when the jalap her bright tint displays,
When the solanum fills her cup with dew,
And crickets, snakes, and lizards 'gin their coil;
Let them find shelter in their cane-thatch'd huts:
Or, if constrain'd unusual hours to toil,
(For even the best must sometimes urge their gang)

With double nutriment reward their pains.
Howe'er insensate some may deem their slaves,
Nor 'bove the bestial rank; far other thoughts
The muse, soft daughter of humanity!
Will ever entertain. The Ethiop knows,
The Ethiop feels, when treated like a man;
Nor grudges, should necessity compel,
By day, by night, to labour for his lord.

Not less inhuman than unthrifty those,
Who, half the year's rotation round the sun,
Deny subsistence to their labouring slaves,
But would'st thou see thy negro-train increase,

Ver. 410. This small plant which grows in every pasture, may, with propriety, be termed an American clock; for it begins every forenoon at eleven to open its yellow flowers, which, about one, are fully expanded; and at two closed. The jalap, or marvel of Peru, unfolds its petals between five and six in the evening, which shut again as soon as night comes on, to open again in the cool of the morning. This plant is called four o'clock by the natives, and bears either a yellow or purple-coloured flower.

Ver. 415. So some authors name the fire-weed, which grows every where, and is the datura of Linnæus; whose virtues Dr. Stork, at Vienna, has greatly extolled in a late publication. It bears a white monopetalous flower, which opens always about sun-set.

Free from disorders; and thine acres clad
With groves of sugar: every week dispense
Or English beans, or Carolinian rice;
Jerne's beef, or Pensylvanian flour;
Newfoundland cod, or herrings from the main
That howls tempestuous round the Scotian isles!

Yet some there are so lazily inclin'd,
And so neglectful of their food, that thou,
Would'st thou preserve them from the jaws of
death, 440

Daily, their wholesome viands must prepare:
With these let all the young, and childless old,
And all the morbid share:—so Heaven will bless,
With manifold increase, thy costly care.

Suffice not this; to every slave assign
Some mountain ground: or, if waste broken land
To thee belong, that broken land divide.

This let them cultivate one day each week;
And there raise yams, and there cassada's root:
From a good demon's staff cassada sprang, 450
Tradition says, and Caribbees believe;
Which into three the white-rob'd genius broke,
And bade them plant, their hunger to repel.

There let angola's bloomy bush supply,
For many a year, with wholesome pulse their board.

There let the bonavist, his fringed pods
Throw liberal o'er the prop; while ochra bears

Ver. 449. To an ancient Caribbean bemoaning the savage uncomfortable life of his countrymen, a deity clad in white apparel appeared, and told him he would have come sooner to have taught him the ways of civil life, had he been addressed before. He then showed him sharp cutting stones to fell trees and build houses; and bade him cover them with the palm leaves. Then he broke his staff in three; which, being planted, soon after produced cassada. See Ogilvy's America.

Ver. 454. This is called Pidgeon-pea, and grows on a sturdy shrub that will last for years. It is justly reckoned among the most wholesome legumens. The juice of the leaves dropt into the eye will remove incipient films. The botanic name is Cytisus.

Ver. 456. This is the Spanish name of a plant, which produces an excellent bean. It is a parasitical plant. There are five sorts of bonavist, the green, the white, the moonshine, the small or common; and, lastly, the black and red. The flowers of all are white and papilionaceous, except the last, whose blossoms are purple. They commonly bear in six weeks. Their pulse is wholesome, though somewhat flatulent; especially those from the black and red. The pods are flattish, two or three inches long; and contain from three to five seeds in partitioned cells.

Ver. 457. This shrub, which will last for years, produces a not less agreeable than wholesome pod. It bears all the year round. Being of a slimy and balsamic nature, it becomes a truly medicinal aliment in dysenteric complaints. It is of the Malva species. It rises to about four or five feet high, bearing on and near the summit many yellow

Aloft his slimy pulp, and help disdains.
There let potatoes mantle o'er the ground;
Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear. 460
There too let eddas spring in order meet,
With Indian cale, and foodful calaloo:
While mint, thyme, balm, and Europe's coyer herbs,

Shoot glad some forth, nor reprobate the clime.

This tract secure, with hedges or of limes,
Or bushy citrons, or the shapely tree
That glows at once with aromatic blooms,
And golden fruit mature. To these be join'd,
In comely neighbourhood, the cotton shrub;
In this delicious clime the cotton bursts
On rocky soils. The coffee also plant;
White as the skin of Albion's lovely fair,
Are the thick snowy fragrant blooms it boasts:
Nor wilt thou, coco, thy rich pods refuse,
Though years and heat, and moisture they require,
Ere the stone grind them to the food of health.
Of thee, perhaps, and of thy various sorts,
And that kind sheltering tree, thy mother nam'd,
With crimson flow'rets prodigally grac'd;
In future times the enraptur'd muse may sing:
If public favour crown her present lay. 481

But let some ancient faithful slave erect
His sheltered mansion near; and with his dog,
His loaded gun and cutlafs guard the whole:
Else negro fugitives, who skulk 'mid rocks
And shrubby wilds, in bands will soon destroy
Thy labourer's honest wealth; their loss and yours.

Perhaps, of Indian gardens I could sing,
Beyond what bloom'd on blest Phæacia's isle,
Or eastern climes admir'd in days of yore: 490
How Europe's foodful, culinary plants;
How gay Pomona's ruby-tinctured births;
And gaudy Flora's various-vested train;
Might be instructed to unlearn their clime,
And by due discipline adopt the sun.

flowers; succeeded by green, conic, fleshy pods, channelled into several groves. There are as many cells filled with small round seeds as there are channels.

Ver. 459. I cannot positively say whether these vines are of Indian original or not; but as in their fructification they differ from potatoes at home, they probably are not European. They are sweet. There are four kinds; the red, the white, the long, and round. The juice of each may be made into a pleasant cool drink; and, being distilled, yield an excellent spirit.

Ver. 461. See notes on Book I. The French call this plant Tayove. It produces eatable roots every four months for one year only.

Ver. 462. This green, which is a native of the New World, equals any of the greens in the Old.

Ibid. Another species of Indian pot-herb, no less wholesome than the preceding. These, with mezanby, and the Jamaica prickly weed, yield to no esculent plants in Europe. This is an Indian name.

Ver. 466. The orange tree.

Ver. 478. See Book I. p. 43.

The muse might tell what culture will entice
 The ripened melon to perfume each mouth;
 And with the anana load the fragrant board.
 The muse might tell what trees will best exclude ("Insufferable height of airiest shade") 500
 With their vast umbrage the noon's fervent ray.
 Thee, verdant mammei, first her song should
 praise:
 Thee, the first natives of these ocean isles,
 Fell anthropophagi still sacred held;
 And from thy large high-flavour'd fruit abstain'd,
 With pious awe; for thine high-flavour'd fruit,
 The airy phantoms of their friends deceas'd
 Joy'd to regale on.—Such their simple creed.
 The tamarind likewise should adorn her theme,
 With whose tart fruit the sweltering fever loves
 To quench his thirst, whose breezy umbrage soon
 Shades the pleas'd planter, shades his children long.
 Nor lofty cassia, should she not recount 513
 Thy woodland honours! See, what yellow flowers
 Dance in the gale, and scent the ambient air;
 While thy long pods, full fraught with nectared sweets,
 Relieve the bowels from their lagging load.
 Nor chirimoia, though these torrid isles
 Boast not thy fruit, to which the anana yields
 In taste and flavour, wilt thou coy refuse 520
 Thy fragrant shade to beautify the scene.
 But, chief of palms, and pride of Indian groves,
 Thee, fair palmeto, should her song resound:

Ver. 502. This is a lofty, shady, and beautiful tree. Its fruit is as large as the largest melon, and of an exquisite smell, greatly superior to it in point of taste. Within the fruit are contained one or two large stones, which, when distilled, give to spirits a ratafia flavour; and, therefore, the French call them Les apricots de St. Domingue; accordingly, the l'eau des noix, one of the West-Indian cordials, is made from them. The fruit, eaten raw, is of an aperient quality; and made into sweetmeats, &c. is truly exquisite. This tree, contrary to most others in the New World, shoots up to a pyramidal figure: the leaves are uncommonly green; and it produces fruit but once a year. The name is Indian. The English commonly call it Mammei-sapota. There are two species of it: the sweet and the tart. The botanical name is Achras.

Ver. 509. See Book I. p. 4.

Ver. 513. Both this tree and its mild purgative pulp are sufficiently known.

Ver. 523. This being the most beautiful of palms, nay, perhaps superior to any other known tree in the world, has, with propriety, obtained the name of Royal. The botanical name is Palma Maxima. It will shoot up perpendicularly to an hundred feet and more. The stem is perfectly circular; only towards the root, and immediately under the branches at top it bulges out. The bark is smooth, and of an ash-brown colour, except at the top where it is green. It grows very fast, and the seed from whence it springs is not bigger than an acorn. In this, as in all the palm genus, what the natives call Cab-

What swelling columns form'd by Jones or Wren
 Or great Palladio may with thee compare?
 Not nice proportion'd, but of size immense,
 Swells the wild fig-tree, and should claim her lay:
 For, from its numerous bearded twigs proceed
 A filial train, stupendous as their fire,
 In quick succession; and o'er many a rood, 530
 Extend their uncouth limbs, which not the bolt
 Of heaven can scathe; nor yet the all-wasting rage
 Of Typhon, or of hurricane destroy.
 Nor should, though small, the anata not be sung:
 Thy purple dye, the silk and cotton fleece
 Delighted drink; thy purple dye the tribes
 Of Northern Ind, a fierce and wily race,
 Carouse, assembled; and with it they paint
 Their manly make in many a horrid form,
 To add new terrors to the face of war. 540
 The muse might teach to twine the verdant arch,
 And the cool alcove's lofty roof adorn,
 With ponderous granadillas, and the fruit
 Call'd water-lemon; grateful to the taste:
 Nor should she not pursue the mountain-streams,

bage is found; but it resembles in taste an almond, and is in fact the pith of the upper or greenish part of the stem. But it would be the most unpardonable luxury to cut down so lovely a tree for so mean a gratification; especially as the wild or mountain cabbage-tree sufficiently supplies the table with that esculent. I never ride past the charming vista of royal palms on the Cayon estate of Daniel Mathew, Esq. in St. Christopher, without being put in mind of the pillars of the Temple of the Sun at Palmyra. This tree grows on the tops of hills as well as in vallies; its hard cortical part makes very durable laths for houses. There is a smaller species not quite so beautiful.

Ver. 544. Or Anotta, or Arnotta; thence corruptly called Indian Otter by the English. The tree is about the size of an ordinary apple-tree. The French call it Rocou; and send the farina home as a paint, &c. for which purpose the tree is cultivated by them in their islands. The flower is pentapetalous, of a bluish and spoon-like appearance. The yellow filaments are tipped with purplish apices. The style proves the rudiment of the succeeding pod, which is of a conic shape, an inch and a half long. This is divided into many cells, which contain a great number of small seeds covered with a red farina.

Ver. 543. This is the Spanish name, and is a species of the passiflora, or passion flower, called by Linnæus Musa. The seeds and pulp through which the seeds are dispersed, are cooling and grateful to the palate. This as well as the water-lemon, bell apple, or honeysuckle as it is named, being parasitical plants, are easily formed into cooling arbours, than which nothing can be more grateful in warm climates. Both fruits are wholesome. The granadilla is commonly eat with sugar, on account of its tartness, and yet the pulp is viscid. Plumier calls it Granadilla, latifolia, fructu maliformi. It grows best in shady places. The unripe fruit makes an excellent pickle.

But pleas'd decoy them from their shady haunts,
In rills, to visit every tree and herb;
Or fall o'er fern-clad cliffs, with foaming rage;
Or in huge basons float, a fair expanse;
Or, bound in chains of artificial force, 550
Arise through sculptured stone, or breathing brass.
But I'm in haste to furl my wind-worn sails,
And anchor my tir'd vessel on the shore.

It much imports to build thy negro-huts,
Or on the sounding margin of the main,
Or on some dry hill's gently sloping sides,
In streets, at distance due.—When near the beach,
Let frequent coco cast its wavy shade;
'Tis Neptune's tree; and, nourish'd by the spray,

Soon round the bending stem's aerial height, 560
Clusters of mighty nuts, with milk and fruit
Delicious freight, hang clattering in the sky.
There let the bay-grape, too, its crooked limbs
Project enormous: of impurpled hue
Its frequent clusters glow. And there, if thou
Wouldst make the sand yield salutary food,
Let Indian millet rear its corny reed,
Like arm'd battalions in array of war.

But, round the upland huts, bananas plant;
A wholesome nutriment bananas yield, 570
And sun-burnt labour loves its breezy shade.
Their graceful screen let kindred plantanes join,
And with their broad vans shiver in the breeze;
So flames design'd, or by imprudence caught,
Shall spread no ruin to the neighbouring roof.

Yet nor the sounding margin of the main,
Nor gently sloping side of breezy hill,
Nor streets, at distance due, embower'd in trees,
Will half the health, or half the pleasure yield,
Unless some pitying naiad deign to lave, 580
With an unceasing stream thy thirsty bounds.

On festal days, or when their work is done,
Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance,

To the wild banshaw's melancholy sound.
Responsive to the sound, head, feet, and frame
Move awkwardly harmonious; hand in hand
Now lock'd, the gay troop circularly wheels,
And frisks and capers with intemperate joy.
Halts the vast circle, all clap hands and sing;
While those distinguish'd for their heels and air,
Bound in the centre, and fantastic twine. 591
Meanwhile some stripling, from the choral ring,
Trips forth: and not ungallantly bestows
On her who nimblest hath the greensward beat,
And whose flush'd beauties have enthrall'd his soul,

A silver token of his fond applause.
Anon they form in ranks; not inept
A thousand tuneful intricacies weave,
Shaking their fable limbs; and oft a kiss
Steal from their partners; who, with neck reclin'd,
And semblant scorn, resent the ravish'd bliss. 600
But let not thou the drum their mirth inspire;
Nor vinous spirits: else, to madness fir'd,
(What will not Bacchanalian frenzy dare?)
Fell acts of blood, and vengeance they pursue.

Compel by threats, or win by soothing arts,
Thy slaves to wed their fellow slaves at home;
So shall they not their vigorous prime destroy,
By distant journies, at untimely hours,
When muffled midnight decks her raven hair 610
With the white plumage of the prickly vine.

Wouldst thou from countless ails preserve thy gang;

To every negro, as the candle-weed
Expands his blossoms to the cloudy sky,
And moist Aquarius melts in daily showers;
A woolly vestment give, (this Wiltshire weaves)
Warm to repel chill night's unwholesome dews:
While strong coarse linen from the Scotian loom,
Wards off the fervours of the burning day. 619

The truly great, though from a hostile clime,
The sacred nine embalma; then, muses, chaunt,
In grateful numbers, Gallic Lewis' praise:
For private murder quell'd; for laurel'd arts,
Invented, cherish'd in his native realm;

Ver. 563. Or sea-side grape, as it is more commonly called. This is a large, crooked, and shady tree, (the leaves being broad, thick, and almost circular); and succeeds best in sandy places. It bears large clusters of grapes once a year; which, when ripe, are not disagreeable. The stones, seeds, or acini, contained in them, are large in proportion; and, being reduced to a powder, are an excellent astringent. The bark of the tree has the same property. The grapes, steeped in water and fermented with sugar, make an agreeable wine.

Ver. 567. Or maize. This is commonly called Guinea corn, to distinguish it from the great or Indian-corn, that grows in the southern parts of North America. It soon shoots up to a great height, often twenty feet high, and will ratoon like the other; but its blades are not so nourishing to horses as those of the great corn, although its seeds are more so, and rather more agreeable to the taste. The Indians, negroes, and poor white people, make many (not unfavoury) dishes with them. It is also called Turkey wheat. The turpentine tree will also grow in the sand, and is most useful upon a plantation.

Ver. 584. This is a sort of rude guitar, invented by the negroes. It produces a wild pleasing melancholy sound.

Ver. 611. This beautiful white rosaceous flower is as large as the crown of one's hat, and only blows at midnight. The plant, which is prickly, and attaches itself firmly to the sides of houses, trees, &c. produces a fruit, which some call the Wythe Apple, and others, with more propriety, Mountain-strawberry. But though it resembles the large Chili strawberry in looks and size; yet being inelegant of taste, it is seldom eaten. The botanical name is Cereus scandens minor. The rind of the fruit is here and there studded with tufts of small sharp prickles.

Ver. 613. This shrub, which produces a yellow flower somewhat resembling a narcissus, makes a beautiful hedge, and blows about November. It grows wild every where. It is said to be diuretic, but this I do not know from experience.

For rapine punish'd; for grim famine fed;
 For fly chicane expell'd the wrangling bar:
 And rightful Themis seated on her throne:
 But chief for those mild laws his wisdom fram'd,
 To guard the Ethiop from tyrannic sway!

Did such, in these green isles which Albion claims, 630

Did such obtain; the muse, at midnight hour,
 This last brain-racking study had not ply'd:
 But, sunk in slumbers of immortal bliss,
 To bards had listened on a fancy'd Thames! [far

All hail, old father Thames! though not from Thy springing waters roll; nor countless streams,
 Of name conspicuous, swell thy watery store;
 Though thou, no Plata, to the sea devolve

Vast humid offerings; thou art king of streams:
 Delighted commerce broods upon thy wave; 640

And every quarter of this sea-girt globe
 To thee due tribute pays; but chief the world
 By great Columbus found, where now the muse
 Beholds, transported, flow vast fleecy clouds,
 Alps pil'd on Alps, romantically high,
 Which charm the sight with many a pleasing form.

The moon, in virgin-glory, gilds the pole,
 And tips yon tamarinds, tips yon cane-crown'd
 vale,

With fluent silver; while unnumber'd stars
 Gild the vast concave with their lively beams. 650

Ver. 638. One of the largest rivers of South America.

The main, a moving burnish'd mirror, shines;
 No noise is heard, save when the distant surge
 With drowzy murmurings breaks upon the shore!

Ah me, what thunders roll! the sky's on fire!
 Now sudden darkness muffles up the pole! [sense,
 Heavens! what wild scenes, before the affrighted
 Imperfect swim!—See! in that flaming scroll!

What time unfolds, the future germs bud forth,
 Of mighty empires! independent realms!—

And must Britannia, Neptune's favourite queen,
 Protect'ress of true science, freedom, arts; 660

Must she, ah! must she, to her offspring crouch?
 Ah, must my Thames, old ocean's favourite son,
 Re-sign his trident to barbaric streams;

His banks neglected, and his waves unfought,
 No bards to sing them, and no fleets to grace?—

Again the fleecy clouds amuse the eye,
 And sparkling stars the vast horizon gild—

She shall not crouch; if wisdom guide the helm,
 Wisdom that bade loud fame, with justest praise,

Record her triumphs! bade the lacquaying winds
 Transport, to every quarter of the globe, 670

Her winged navies! bade the scepter'd sons
 Of earth acknowledge her pre-eminence!—

She shall not crouch; if these cane ocean-isles,
 Isles which on Britain for their all depend,

And must for ever; still indulgent share
 Her fostering smile: and other isles be given,

From vanquish'd foes.—And, see, another race!
 A golden era dazzles my fond sight!

That other race, that long'd-for era, hail!
 The British George now reigns, the Patriot king!

Britain shall ever triumph o'er the main. 681

SOLITUDE.

AN ODE.

O SOLITUDE, romantic maid
 Whether by nodding towers you tread,
 Or haunt the desert's trackless gloom,
 Or hover o'er the yawning tomb,
 Or climb the Andes' clifted side,
 Or by the Nile's coy source abide,
 Or starting from your half-year's sleep
 From Hecla view the thawing deep,
 Or, at the purple dawn of day,
 Tadmor's marble wastes survey,
 You, recluse, again I woo,
 And again your steps pursue.

Plum'd conceit himself surveying,
 Folly with her shadow playing,
 Purse-proud, elbowing insolence,
 Bloated empiric, puff'd pretence,
 Noise that through a trumpet speaks,
 Laughter in loud peals that breaks,
 Intrusion with a fopling's face,
 noran of time and place)

Sparks of fire diffention blowing,
 Ductile, court-bred flattery, bowing,
 Restraint's stiff neck, grimace's leer,
 Squint-ey'd censure's artful sneer,
 Ambition's buskins, steep'd in blood,
 Fly thy presence, solitude.

Sage reflection bent with years,
 Conscious virtue void of fears,
 Muffled silence, wood-nymph shy,
 Meditation's piercing eye,
 Halcyon peace on moss reclin'd,
 Retrospect that scans the mind,
 Rapt earth-gazing resvery,
 Blushing artless modesty,
 Health that snuffs the morning air,
 Full-ey'd truth with bosom bare,
 Inspiration, nature's child,
 Seek the solitary wild.

You with the tragic muse * retir'd
 The wise Euripides inspir'd,

* In the Island Salamis.

You taught the sadly-pleasing air
 That † Athens sav'd from ruins bare.
 You gave the Cean's tears to flow,
 And ‡ unlock'd the springs of woe;
 You penn'd what exil'd Naso thought,
 And pour'd the melancholy note.
 With Petrarch o'er Valcluse you stray'd,
 When death snatch'd his § long-lov'd maid;
 You taught the rocks her loss to mourn,
 Ye strew'd with flowers her virgin urn.
 And late in ¶ Hagley you were seen,
 With bloodshed eyes, and sombre mien,
 Hymen his yellow vestment tore,
 And Dirge a wreath of cypress wore.
 But chief your own the solemn lay
 That wept Narcissa young and gay,
 Darkness clap'd her sable wing,
 While you touch'd the mournful string,
 Anguish left the pathless wild,
 Grim-fac'd melancholy smil'd,
 Drowsy midnight ceas'd to yawn,
 The starry host put back the dawn,
 Aside their harps ev'n seraphs flung
 To hear thy sweet complaint, O Young.

When all nature's hush'd asleep,
 Nor love nor guilt their vigils keep,
 Soft you leave your cavern'd den,
 And wander o'er the works of men,
 But when Phosphor brings the dawn
 By her dappled coursers drawn,
 Again you to the wild retreat
 And the early huntsman meet,
 Where as you pensive pace along,
 You catch the distant shepherd's song,
 Or brush from herbs the pearly dew,
 Or the rising primrose view.
 Devotion lends her heaven-plum'd wings,
 You mount, and nature with you sings.
 But when mid-day fervors glow,
 To upland airy shades you go,
 Where never sunburnt woodman came,
 Nor sportsman chas'd the timid game;
 And there beneath an oak reclin'd,
 With drowsy waterfalls behind,
 You sink to rest.

'Till the tuneful bird of night
 From the neighb'ring poplars height
 Wake you with her solemn strain,
 And teach pleas'd echo to complain.

With you roses brighter bloom
 Sweeter every sweet perfume,
 Purer every fountain flows
 Stronger every wilding grows.

Let those toil for gold who please,
 Or for fame renounce their ease.
 What is fame? an empty bubble;
 Gold? a transient, shining trouble.
 Let them for their country bleed,
 What was Sidney's, Raleigh's meed?

Man's not worth a moment's pain,
 Base, ungrateful, fickle, vain.
 Then let me, sequester'd fair,
 To your sibyl grot repair,
 On yon hanging cliff it stands
 Scoop'd by nature's salvage hands,
 Bosom'd in the gloomy shade
 Of cypress not with age decay'd.
 Where the owl still-hooting sits,
 Where the bat incessant flits,
 There in loftier strains I'll sing
 Whence the changing seasons spring,
 Tell how storms deform the skies,
 Whence the waves subside and rise,
 Trace the comet's blazing tail,
 Weigh the planets in a scale;
 Bend, great God, before thy shrine,
 The boundless macrocosm's thine.

Save me! what's yon shrouded shade?
 That wanders in the dark-brown glade.
 It beckons me! — vain fears adieu,
 Mysterious ghost, I follow you.
 Ah me! too well that gait I know,
 My youth's first friend, my manhood's woe!
 Its breast it bares! what! stain'd with blood?
 Quick let me stanch the vital flood.
 Oh spirit, whither art thou flown?
 Why left me comfortless alone?
 O solitude, on me bestow
 The heart-felt harmony of woe,
 Such, such, as on th' Ausonian shore,
 Sweet * Dorian Moschus trill'd of yore:
 No time should cancel thy desert,
 More, more, than † Bion was, thou wert.

O goddess of the tearful eye,
 The never-ceasing stream supply.
 Let us with retirement go
 To charnels, and the house of woe,
 O'er friendship's herse low-drooping mourn,
 Where the sickly tapers burn,
 Where death and nun-clad sorrow dwell,
 And nightly ring the solemn knell.
 The gloom dispels, the charnel smiles,
 Light flashes through the vaulted isles,
 Blow silky soft, thou western gale,
 O goddess of the desert, hail!
 She bursts from yon cliff-riven cave,
 Insulted by the wintry wave;
 Her brow an ivy garland binds,
 Her tresses wanton with the winds,
 A lion's spoils, without a zone,
 Around her limbs are careless thrown;
 Her right hand wields a knotted mace,
 Her eyes roll wild, a stride her pace;
 Her left a magic mirror holds,
 In which she oft herself beholds.

O goddess of the desert, hail!
 And softer blow, thou western gale!
 Since in each scheme of life I've fail'd,
 And disappointment seems entail'd;
 Since all on earth I valued most,
 My guide, my stay, my friend is lost;

* See Idyll.

† Alluding to the death of a friend.

You, only you, can make me blest,
And hush the tempest in my breast.
Then gently deign to guide my feet
To your hermit-trodden seat,
Where I may live at last my own,
Where I at last may die unknown.
I spoke, she turn'd her magic ray,
And thus she said, or seem'd to say.

Youth, you're mistaken, if you think to find
In shades a medicine for a troubled mind.
Wan grief will haunt you wheresoe'er you go,
Sigh in the breeze, and in the streamlet flow,
There pale inaction pines his life away,
And, satiate, curses the return of day:
There naked frenzy laughing wild with pain,
Or bares the blade, or plunges in the main:
There superstition broods o'er all her fears,
And yells of demons in the zephyr hears.
But if a hermit you're resolv'd to dwell,
And bid to social life a last farewell;
'Tis impious.—
God never made an independent man,
'T would jarr the concord of his general plan:
See every part of that stupendous whole,
"Whose body nature is, and God the soul;"
To one great end, the general good conspire,
From matter, brute, to man, to seraph, fire.
Should man through nature solitary roam,
His will his sovereign, every where his home,
What force wou'd guard him from the lion's jaw?
What swiftnefs wing him from the panther's paw?
Or should fate lead him to some safer shore,
Where panthers never prowl, nor lions roar;
Where liberal nature all her charms bestows,
Suns shine, birds sing, flowers bloom, and water flows,

Fool, dost thou think he'd revel on the shore,
Absolve the care of Heaven, nor ask for more?
Though waters flow'd, flow'rs bloom'd, and Phœ-
bus shone,

He'd sigh, he'd murmur that he was alone.
For know, the Maker on the human breast
A sense of kindred, country, man, imprest;
And social life to better, aid, adorn,
With proper faculties each mortal's born.

Though nature's works the ruling mind de-
clare,
And well deserve inquiry's serious care,
The God (whate'er misanthrophy may say)
Shines, beams in man with most unclouded ray.
What boots it thee to fly from pole to pole?
Hang o'er the sun, and with the planets roll?
What boots through space's furthest bourns to roam?

If thou, O man, a stranger art at home.
Then know thyself, the human mind survey,
The use, the pleasure will the toil repay.
Hence inspiration plans his manner'd lays, [bays.
Hence Homer's crown, and Shakspeare hence thy
Hence he, the pride of Athens and the shame,

Those who in study, shou'd in practice shine.

Say, does the learned Lord of Hagley's shade,
Charm man so much by mossy fountains laid,
As when arous'd, he stems corruption's course,
And shakes the senate with a Tully's force?
When freedom gasp'd beneath a Cæsar's feet,
Then public virtue might to shades retreat:
But where she breathes, the least may useful be,
And freedom, Britain, still belong to thee.
Though man's ungrateful, or though fortune
frown,

Is the reward of worth a song, or crown?
Nor yet unrecompens'd are virtue's pains,
Good Allen lives, and bounteous Brunswick reigns.
On each condition disappointments wait,
Enter the hut, and force the guarded gate.
Nor dare repine, though early friendship bleed,
From love, the world, and all its cares he's freed.
But know, adversity's the child of God;
Whom Heaven approves of most, most feel her rod.
When smooth old Ocean and each storm's asleep,
Then ignorance may plough the watery deep;
But when the demons of the tempest rave,
Skill must conduct the vessel through the wave.
Sidney, what good man envies not thy blow?
Who wou'd not wish Anrys for a foe?
Intrepid virtue triumphs over fate,
The good can never be unfortunate.
And be this maxim graven in thy mind,
The height of virtue is to serve mankind.

But when old age has silver'd o'er thy head,
When memory fails, and all thy vigour's fled,
Then may'st thou seek the stillness of retreat,
Then hear aloof the human tempest beat,
Then will I greet thee to my woodland cave,
Allay the pangs of age, and smooth thy grave.

BRYAN AND PEREENE.

A WEST INDIAN BALLAD.

THE north-east wind did briskly blow,
The ship was safely moor'd,
Young Bryan thought the boat's crew slow,
And so leapt over board.

Pereene, the pride of Indian dames,
His heart did long enthrall,
And whose his impatience blames,
I wot ne'er lov'd at all.

A long, long year, one month and day,
He dwelt on English land,
Nor once in thought would ever stray,
Though ladies sought his hand.

For Bryan he was tall and strong,
Right blisfome roll'd his een,
Sweet was his voice whene'er he sung,
He scant had twenty seen.

But who the countless charms can draw,
That grac'd his mistress true;
Such charms the old world never saw,
Nor oft I ween the new.

* One of the accusers of Socrates.

Her raven hair plays round her neck,
Like tendrils of the vine;
Her cheeks red dewy rose buds deck,
Her eyes like diamonds shine.

Soon as his well known ship she spied,
See cast her weeds away,
And to the palmy shore she hied.
All in her best array.

In sea-green filk so neatly clad,
She there impatient stood;
The crew with wonder saw the lad,
Repel the foaming flood.

Her hands a handkerchief display'd,
Which he at parting gave;
Well pleas'd the token he survey'd,
And manlier beat the wave.

Her fair companions one and all,
Rejoicing crowd the strand;

For now her lover swam in call,
And almost touch'd the land.

Then through the white surf did she haste,
To clasp her lovely swain;
When, ah! a shark bit through his waist:
His heart's blood dy'd the main!

He shriek'd! his half sprung from the wave,
Streaming with purple gore,
And soon it found a living grave,
And, ah! was seen no more.

Now haste, now haste, ye maids, I pray,
Fetch water from the spring:
She falls, she falls, she dies away.
And soon her knell they ring.

Now each May morning round her tomb,
Ye fair, fresh flow'rets strew,
So may your lovers 'scape his doom,
Her hapless fate 'scape you.

1784.

THE LIFE OF SMOLLETT.

TOBIAS SMOLLETT was born at Dalquhurn, on the banks of the Leven, in Dumbartonshire, in 1720. His father was the youngest son of Sir James Smollett of Bonhill; his mother's name was Cunningham, the daughter of a respectable family in Renfrewshire.

After the ordinary course of education, he was put apprentice to a surgeon in Glasgow, and afterwards attended the medical classes in Edinburgh. He then went to London, and his first outset appears to have been as a surgeon's mate in the navy, in which capacity he served at the siege of Carthage.

In his Roderick Random, he gives an account of the management of that ill-conducted expedition, which he censures in the warmest terms, and from circumstances which fell under his own particular observation. He is supposed to have been the editor of "A Compendium of Authentic Voyages, digested in a Chronological Series," 7 vols. 12mo. 1756; amongst which is inserted a short narrative of the expedition to Carthage, 1741, written with great spirit, but abounding with acrimony.

It was here he acquired his knowledge of sea characters, which he has drawn in a manner so excellent, and at the same time so technically true, as to excite general admiration; and they have continued the model for dramatists and novelists to copy.

He continued only short time in that line; being disgusted at the service; and having no other employment, betook himself to his pen for subsistence.

It is probable that he wrote several pieces before he became known to the public by his capital productions.

His first publication that is known with certainty, is, The Advice and Reproof, two satires, printed in 1746 and 1747.

In the former year, he expressed his indignation at the severities exercised upon the Highlanders, by the royal army, after the battle of Culloden, in an ode, intitled, The Tears of Scotland.

In 1747, he presented for performance, at Drury-Lane theatre, a tragedy, written in his eighteenth year, called, The Regicide, founded on the assassination of James I. of Scotland. On this occasion, he experienced the treatment which young authors generally meet with from theatrical managers and would-be patrons. After being buoyed up and flattered for a considerable time, his play was finally neglected. It was published in 1749, by subscription, very much, it is said, to his emolument, with a Preface, in which he exclaims bitterly against false patrons, and the duplicity of managers; and he resented the injury by severe retaliations in his future writings.

Lyttleton and Garrick were the principal objects of his resentment. The character of the former he satirised in his novel of Peregrine Pickle; and he added a Burlesque Ode on that nobleman's "Monody" on the death of his lady.

Against Garrick, he made illiberal, ill-founded criticisms; and in the novel of Roderick Random, gave a very unfair representation of his treatment of him respecting this tragedy.

On cool reflection, he afterwards seems to have regretted his warmth, and retracted, in handsome terms, the hasty effusions of his disappointment.

Desirous "of doing justice, in a work of truth, for wrongs done in a work of fiction," in giving a sketch of the liberal arts, in his History of England, he remarked, "the exhibitions of the stage were improved to the most exquisite entertainment, by the talents and management of Garrick, who greatly surpassed all his predecessors of this, and perhaps every other nation, in his genius for acting, in the sweetness and variety of his tones, the irresistible magic of his eye, the fire and vivacity of his action, the elegance of attitude, and the whole pathos of expression."

"Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher sphere of life, embellished by the nervous sense and extensive erudition of a Cœcke, by the delicate taste, the polished muse, and tender feelings of a Lyttleton."

Not satisfied with this public declaration of his sentiments, he wrote in still stronger terms to Garrick, Jan. 27. 1762. "What I have said of Mr. Garrick in the History of England was, I protest, the language of my heart. I shall rejoice if he thinks I have done him barely justice. I am sure the public will think I have done him no more than justice. In giving a short sketch of the liberal arts, I could not, with any propriety, forbear mentioning a gentleman so eminently distinguished by a genius that has no rival. Besides, I thought it incumbent upon me to make a public atonement, in a work of truth, for wrongs done in a work of fiction."

In 1748, he published the Adventures of Roderick Random, a novel, modelled upon the plan of Le Sage's "Adventures of Gil Blas," which had a rapid sale, and laid the foundation of his fame.

The success attending this novel encouraged him to proceed in the same line; and, in 1751, he published the Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, in 4 vols. 12mo. in which he introduced the history of the celebrated Lady Vane, the materials of which, it is said, she herself furnished. This episode excited much attention, and contributed greatly to its success.

About this time, having obtained the degree of Doctor of Physic, he settled as a Physician at Bath, and with that view, published An Essay on the External Use of Water, in a Letter to Dr. ———, with particular Remarks upon the present Method of using the Mineral Waters at Bath in Somersetshire, and a Plan for rendering them more Safe, Agreeable, and Efficacious, 4to. 1752.

Having been unsuccessful, or perhaps too soon discouraged, he relinquished the practice of physic, fixed his residence at Chelsea, and dedicated the whole of his time to literature.

It has been said, that his want of success in a profession where merit cannot always ensure good fortune, was owing to his failing to make himself agreeable to the women; but his figure and address, both of which were excellent, render this highly improbable. It is more likely, that his irritable and impatient temper, and his contempt for the low arts of finesse, servility, and cunning, were the real causes of his failure.

As an author by profession, his genius and industry were equally conspicuous. His Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom, in one volume, 12mo. appeared in 1751, which was followed by a successful Translation of Don Quixote, in 2 vols. 4to. 1755; executed, as it was supposed, with a slight knowledge of the Spanish language; a circumstance that exposed him to much abuse, and in one instance, it is said, to a personal attack.

In 1756, he began the Critical Review, a work which he conducted with much ability, till 1763; but with a degree of acrimony, in some instances, that involved him in a variety of disputes. The most serious of these was with Admiral Knowles, who had published a pamphlet in defence of his conduct in the expedition to Rochfort, 1758. On this performance, he was so particularly and unguardedly severe, that the Admiral commenced a prosecution against the printer. In this affair, he behaved both with prudence and with spirit. Desirous of compromising the dispute with the Admiral, in an amicable manner, he applied to his friend Mr. Wilkes, to interpose his good offices with his opponent. The Admiral continued inflexible; and sentence was on the point of being pronounced against the printer, when he gallantly stood forth, avowed himself the author of the criticism, and offered the Admiral any satisfaction he might require. The consequence was, that a prosecution was immediately commenced against him, and he was fined 100 l. and sentenced to three months imprisonment in the King's Bench prison.

His engagements in this publication likewise involved him in a dispute with Grainger, who thought himself injuriously treated in the review of his "Translation of Tibullus."

On the publication of the "Rofciad," Churchill imagining Smollett the author of the offensive review of that work, retaliated with great spirit in the "Apology to the Critical Reviewers." It appears, however, he was mistaken in his suspicion; for Smollett hearing that Mr. Colman had also accused him of having made an attack on his moral character in the Review, he exculpated himself from the charge, in a letter to Garrick, April 5. 1761; in which he declares, "that he did not write one word of the article upon the "Rofciad."

In 1757, his comedy of The Reprisal, or the Tars of Old England, an after-piece of two acts, was performed at Drury-Lane theatre, and met with success; yet not equal to what its merit might have justly claimed. His comic genius has shown itself very conspicuously in this little piece. The characters of a Frenchman, an Irishman, a Scotchman, and an English sailor, are as highly drawn, and as finely distinguished as in any dramatic piece in the English language. He acknowledged himself "highly obliged for the friendly care Mr. Garrick exerted in preparing it for the stage; and still more for his acting the part of Lufignan in "Zara" for his benefit, on the sixth, instead of the ninth night, to which he was only entitled by the custom of the theatre."

In 1758, he published his Complete History of England, deduced from the Descent of Julius Caesar to the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1748, in 4 vols. 4to. The sale of this work, by the uncommon arts of publication made use of by his booksellers, was very extensive; and he is said to have cleared 2000 l. by it and the Continuation, in 5 vols. 8vo. 1763 and 1765.

During his confinement in the King's Bench prison, he is said to have written the Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves, in which he has described some remarkable characters, then his fellow prisoners. This work was first printed in the British Magazine, which he conducted in 1760 and 1761, and afterwards in 2 vols. 12mo. 1762.

When Lord Bute, in 1762, assumed the management of public affairs, he engaged in defence of his measures, and published a weekly paper, called, The Briton, in conjunction with other literary retainers to that nobleman. He entered on the employment appointed for him with great spirit; but being offended at some behaviour in his friends, he relinquished it with disgust. The first number appeared May 29, 1762, and was soon followed, on the other side, by the famous "North Briton," written by Mr. Wilkes, which completely defeated its opponent; and the acrimony of these papers is said to have dissolved the friendship which had long subsisted between their respective authors. The Briton was laid down, Feb. 12. 1763. He is supposed to have written other pieces in support of the cause he espoused. The political romance, called, The Adventures of an Atom, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1763, is known to be his production.

When Lord Bute resigned, he is said to have experienced ingratitude from that nobleman, who had, in many instances, been found a generous patron to men of inferior importance and ability.

The neglect of his patron made a deep impression on his mind; and this, united to a sedentary life, and assiduous application to study, having impaired his health, he went abroad, with a view to re-establish it, in June 1763, and continued in France and Italy for about two years.

In 1766, he published an account of his Travels, in 2 vols. 8vo. written, as he himself acknowledges, "to beguile the tedious hours, which, without some such employment, would be rendered insupportable by distemper and disquiet."

To this cynical relation of his Travels, Sterne is supposed to allude in the following passage of his "Sentimental Journey," vol. i. p. 80. "The learned Smelfungus travelled from Bologna to Paris—from Paris to Rome—and so on—but he set out with the spleen and jaundice, and every object he passed by was discoloured and distorted.—He wrote an account of them, but it was nothing but an account of his miserable feelings.—I met Smelfungus in the grand portico of the Pantheon—he was just coming out of it—"It is nothing but a huge cock-pit," said he,—"I wish you had said nothing worse of the Venus Medicis," replied I,—for in passing through Florence, I had heard he had fallen foul upon the goddess, and used her worse than a common strumpet, without the least provocation in nature—I popped upon Smelfungus again at Turin, in his return home, and a sad tale of sorrowful adventures he had to tell, wherein he spoke of moving accidents by flood and field, and of the cannibals which each other eat: the Anthropophagi—He had been flayed alive, and be-deviled, and worse used than St. Bartholomew at every stage he had come at—"I'll tell it," said Smelfungus, "to the world."—"You had better tell it," said I, "to your physician."

When he returned to Britain, his health being still in a declining state, he paid a visit to Scotland, his native country, where he resided a short time. Soon after, he published The Expedition of Humphry Clinker, in 3 vols. 12mo. 1771, a work which, in the opinion of many, is superior to all his other performances. It has all the spirit and vigour of his former works, and is evidently the production of a mind enriched and mellowed by experience, and softened, but not soured by misfortune.

With a view once more to try the effects of a warmer climate, he returned to Italy, and died near Leghorn, October 21. 1771, in the 51st year of his age.

After his death, his name appeared to a translation of Telemachus, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1776. His name likewise appears to a translation of Gil Blas, in 4 vols. 12mo.; and, in conjunction with Dr. Franklin, to a translation of Voltaire's Prose Works, in 27 vols. 8vo. 1763; but little of it was done by his own hand. He was employed during the last years of his life, in preparing a new edition of the Ancient and Modern Universal History, great part of which he had originally written himself, particularly the History of France, Italy, and Germany. He wrote and compiled, besides, a number of works for the booksellers, to which his name does not appear.

Of the domestic life of Smollett, the little that is known does not exhibit a picture of happiness. He married a lady from Jamaica, by whom he had a daughter whom he tenderly loved. The death of this daughter, which happened a short time before he went abroad in 1763, made an impression on his mind which he never perfectly recovered.

To add to the regret which every reader of sensibility must feel at the untoward circumstances which attended him through life, his widow was left friendless in a foreign country. To relieve her from some temporary distress, the tragedy of "Venice Preserved" was performed at the theatre royal, Edinburgh, March 3. 1784, for her benefit, and the money remitted to Italy.

On this occasion, Houston Stewart Nicholson, Esq. appeared in the part of Pierre; and the following prologue was spoken by Mr. Woods, said to be written by Professor Richardson of Glasgow, the elegant author of "Poems chiefly Rural," and other ingenious performances.

Though letter'd Rome, and polish'd Greece could boast
The splendid table, and the courteous host,—
The rites to strangers due;—though poets sing
This mighty warrior, or that powerful king,
The wand'rer's friend—yet still, whate'er is told
By modern poets, or by bards of old,
Is rivall'd here;—for here, with joy, we see
The heart-felt bliss of heav'nly charity!
See her, with rapture, spread her willing hands,
And throw her blessings into foreign lands;
Dry up the tear she never saw to flow,
And eager catch the distant sigh of woe.
In vain seas swell, and mountains rise in vain—
A widow's groans are heard across the main;
—A widow now!—Alas! how chang'd the day!—
Once the NARCISSA * of your poet's lay;
Now, fatal change! (of ev'ry bliss bereft,
Nor child, nor friend, nor kind protector left),
Spreads on a distant shore her scanty board,
And humbly takes what strangers can afford.
Yet link'd to you by ev'ry tender tie,
To you she lifts the long-dejected eye,
And thus she speaks—"Who dar'd, with manly rage,
" To lash the vices of an impious age †?
" Who dar'd to seize the bold historic pen,
" Paint living kings, and ministers, as men ‡?"

* Her fictitious name in Roderick Random.

" Who sung sad Scotia's hapless sons forlorn,
 " Her broken peace, her freshest laurels torn * ?
 " Or who, on oaten reed, by Leven's side,

 " Or who ?—say he, for such, I'm sure, are here,
 " Whose honest bosoms never yet knew fear ;
 " Sons of the north, who stem corruption's tide ‡,

 " Lords of the lion heart and eagle eye,

 " Who felt that pow'r, and still ador'd his shrine ?—

 Tears stopp'd her utterance, else she would have said,

 " Let independence all your actions guide,
 " Your surest patron, and your noblest pride."

Soon after his death, a monument was erected to his memory, near Leghorn, with the following inscription, written by his friend Armstrong :

His Plays and Poems were collected and published by T. Evans, in one vol. 8vo. 1784. His History of England has been frequently reprinted, in 11 vols. 8vo.; and the Continuation as a supplement to Hume, from the Revolution to the death of George II. in 5 vols. 8vo. 1790. The editions of his Novels, particularly Roderick Random, Peregrine Pickle, and Humphry Clinker, are too numerous to be specified. His Miscellaneous Works, consisting of his plays, poems, and novels, except The Adventures of an Atom, were collected by Mr. David Ramsay, the judicious and well-informed printer of "The Edinburgh Evening Courant," in 6 vols. 8vo. with humorous frontispieces by Rowlandson, 1790. The latest editions of some of his works have undergone considerable alterations. His Poems, printed separately, or inserted in his novels, and The Reprisal, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The character of Smollett has been accurately delineated in the Epitaph on his monument near Leghorn, and the Inscription on the pillar erected to his memory on the banks of the Leven. In the dedication of Count Fathom to Dr. ———, he has drawn his own character. He has also introduced his own character in Humphry Clinker, as Mr. Searle, vol. i. p. 159, where he has an interview with Mr. Bramble; and his manner of living is described in vol. ii. p. 214, where young Melford is supposed to dine with him at his house in Chelsea. In his person, he was graceful and handsome; and in his air and manner, there was a certain dignity which commanded respect. He possessed a loftiness and elevation of sentiment and character, without pride or haughtiness; for to his equals and inferiors, he was ever polite, friendly, and generous. In the practice of physic, for want of suppleness, he never was eminent. As an author, he was not so successful as his happy genius and acknowledged merit certainly deserved. He never acquired a patron among the great, who by his favour or beneficence relieved him from the necessity of writing for a subsistence. Booksellers may be said to have been his only patrons, and from them he had constant employment in translating, compiling, and reviewing. No doubt, he made a great deal of money by his connections with booksellers; and had he been a rigid economist, and endued with the gift of retention (to use his own expression), he might have lived and died very independent. But his difficulties, whatever they were, proceeded not from extravagance, or want of economy. He was hospitable, but not ostentatiously so; and his table was plentiful, but not extravagant. An irritable and impatient temper was his greatest failing; but, making due allowance for a spirit wounded by ingratitude, and irritated by the malignant shafts of envy, dulness, and profligacy, it would be difficult to name a man so respectable for the qualities of his head, or amiable for the virtues of his heart.—As an historian, his merit is well known. Considering the time and circumstances in which his History of England was written, it is indeed a great effort of genius and application. But it is a hasty and indigested performance; too voluminous for an abridgement, and too imperfect for an history. His partiality for the Tory party is manifest in almost every page; and in stating the arguments which passed on any subject, he generally relates those only which were urged on one side; which unavoidably creates a suspicion of his partiality. His reflections, in many instances, are highly exceptionable; and in many places he seems to be inconsistent with himself, and to argue against his own principles. At one time he appears the sanguine friend of liberty, and applauds all opposition against the stretches of prerogative; and yet, at another, he censures the resentment which the parliament expressed against such encroachments. In his account of the methods used to extinguish the rebellion, 1745, he has lavished all the powers of the pathos in laboured descriptions of horror; but he seems more solicitous to say what is brilliant and striking, than what is just and authentic. In describing characters, which is supposed to be his great excellence, he appears to have taken fancy rather than truth for his guide. His character of Queen Mary is inaccurate and injurious; and that of King William, is, in many respects, falsified by the circumstances of his life. The great excellence of his work, is the elegance and spirit of the style, which is in general nervous, clear, fluent, bold, and florid; and the reader who is content with acquiring only a general knowledge of our history, cannot be more agreeably instructed; for his manner of writing is so entertaining, that attention seldom sleeps over his pages. But he has not performed the duties of an historical writer with sufficient care, accuracy, and impartiality. His imagination overpowers his judgment; and he is tempted to employ his powers in the vain glow of colouring, and is more studious to dazzle the imagination with a gaudy display of splendid ornaments, than to engage the understanding by just reasoning and solid reflections.

In the Continuation from 1748 to 1765, he has avoided those prejudices and partial attachments which render the History liable to censure; but, in some instances, he deviates from the design, and stoops below the dignity of historical composition. In his reflections on public measures, he discovers intelligence and acuteness, without the affectation of sagacity. In his portraiture of characters, his painting is bold, glowing, and animated; yet, it is sometimes necessary to write the name over the picture. The style is clear, copious, rich, and flowing; but it is now and then too luxuriant and figurative. Though we cannot always applaud the rectitude of his judgment, or the precision of his ideas, yet we seldom fail to admire his vivacity of sentiment, and peculiar glow of expression. He is ever most excellent when he addresses himself to the passions. It does credit, upon the whole, to his abilities; but had he composed it with less rapidity, it would have approached much nearer to the perfection of historical composition.

As a writer of that species of modern romance, which has been denominated a novel, he has described the lives and manners of men with great exuberance of fancy, and infinite humour and sagacity. In most of his novels, but particularly Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle, he has drawn many of his characters from real life; and the originals of Squire Gawky, Strap, Crab, Morgan, of the Doctor, Folter, Pallet, &c. were in his own time known and pointed out; but short as the time is since their publication, they, at present, derive no advantage from that source, and owe their celebrity to their intrinsic merit alone.

In his Adventures of Roderick Random he is peculiarly happy in representing the difficulties to which a friendless orphan is exposed, from his own want of experience, as well as from the selfishness, envy, malice, and base indifference of mankind. The mean scenes in which he is involved, are described with true humour; and every reader finds entertainment in viewing those parts of life where the manners and passions are undisguised by affectation, ceremony, or education. The whimsical peculiarities of disposition, appear as nature has implanted them. He seems to have enjoyed a peculiar felicity in describing sea characters. His Trunnion, Hatchway, and Pipes, are highly finished originals; but Lieutenant Bowling exceeds them, and perhaps equals any character that has yet been painted by the happiest genius of ancient or modern times. This is, indeed, nature itself; original, unique, and sui generis. As well as the ladder of promotion, his very name has long become proverbial, for an honest blunt seaman, unacquainted with mankind and the ways of the world.

The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, though they have been considered as low, scurrilous, and immoral, relate, in language by turns easy, elegant, and pathetic, a succession of events, forming a natural and well-drawn picture of human life; which the thoughtless may peruse with advantage, and the prudent, with emotions of triumph. From the wild, unlucky boy teasing his aunt and the commodore, and heading a rebellion at school against his master, we trace the headstrong youth, of pride unbroken, and unbridled appetite, plunging into folly, vice, and dissipation, wasting his substance, injuring the woman of all others he loved, and, at last pining in prison. Roused by the voice of friendship, and again restored to affluence, he returns with a stern reluctance, founded on a sense of his own unworthiness and vicious imprudence, to society and love; convinced that, after all the bustle of pleasure, and the glitter of wealth, real happiness is only to be found in moderate enjoyment, domestic tranquillity, and social virtue. It is a work of great merit and invention in the composition, and in which genuine humour and profound learning are so happily united, as to make it difficult to determine which is predominant; particularly in the description of the entertainment given by the Republican Doctor, after the manner of the ancients. This episode is well managed, and replete with rich strokes of humour and pointed satire; which, in the rancour of Toryism, he directed with eagerness against his Whig-opponent, Akenfide. Yet, in this and other parts of Peregrine, he has, with some justice, been thought indelicate. The path of humour is pleasant and inviting; but it is a dangerous one, and too often leads us astray into the by-roads of indelicacy, as well as ill nature. It is of the nature of all humour, to be sometimes gross and sometimes inelegant. In this respect, the dialogue between Pipes and the hedge-nymph is culpably obscene, though the story is well told, and the character well imagined. The behaviour of Pickle to Hornbeck is also highly unjustifiable. Yet, with these and other faults, the present writer cannot but consider it, contrary to the general opinion, as equal to Roderick Random; and, as a first-rate novel, whose merits far exceed the modern puny productions of frivolous fashion and sickly sentiment, which load the shelves of our libraries, and teach nonsense and iniquity to our wives and daughters.

Count Fathom, and Sir Launcelot Greaves, are still in the list of what may be called reading novels; but there is no injustice in placing them in a rank below Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle. Invention, character, composition, and contrivance, are to be found in both; but situations are described, which are hardly possible, and characters are painted, which, if not altogether unexampled, are at least incompatible with modern manners; and which ought not to be, as the scenes are laid in modern times.

In his Expedition of Humphry Clinker, which consists of a series of letters written by different persons to their respective correspondents, he has carefully avoided the faults which may be justly charged to Count Fathom and Sir Launcelot Greaves. It has no extravagant characters, nor unnatural situations; on the contrary, an admirable knowledge of life and manners is displayed, and most useful lessons are given, applicable and interesting, to very common situations.

Roderick Random, Peregrine Pickle, and Humphry Clinker, are undoubtedly efforts of genius and fancy, which rival the productions of the moral, the pathetic, but tiresome Richardson, and the ingenious but diffuse Fielding, with all his knowledge of the human heart. That Fielding repeatedly displays a thorough acquaintance with nature, and that passages may be pointed out in Richardson, which do equal credit to the goodness of his heart, and the depth of his understanding, cannot be denied; yet, after perusing the wire-drawn pages of "Grandison" and "Clarissa," or the common place introductory discussions and diffuse narrative of "Tom Jones," "Joseph Andrews," and "Amelia," we never quit them with such reluctance as we feel on closing the pages of Smollett, who, without introducing so much of what has been called fine writing, possesses in an eminent degree the art of rousing our feelings, and fixing the attention of his readers.

As a traveller, he was petulant, illiberal, and almost on every occasion lost his temper; but some excuse is to be made for a frame convulsed by the pangs of disease, a spirit wounded by ingratitude, and a life embittered by disappointment and domestic calamity. Under such impressions, perhaps, he ought not to have written; but where is the man who having once found solace in a pursuit, will not naturally seek for comfort and consolation in the same path?

"I chiefly consulted" says Lord Gardenstone in his "Travelling Memorandums," "Keysser, Moore, and Smollett. I was best pleased with my old and excellent friend Smollett. Testy and discontented as he is, he writes with perspicuity. His observations are generally sensible, and even his oddities are entertaining."

As a dramatist, his genius is of a less considerable character than might be expected from his unrivalled talent for the description of life and manners. He was in possession of humour and of a peculiar kind of fancy. His wit had every character of fertile inventiveness and true pleasantry. He was capable of delineating the individual object with peculiar happiness. But he beheld his powers in a light which deceived him, when he aimed at bringing his characters into the business of the stage, and creating a dramatic series of events. Nothing can be more undramatic than his tragedy. Here his genius, or at least his judgment failed him. In his comedy, however, written professedly for the theatre, he evinces dramatic powers, which, if he had persevered in writing for the stage, might have obtained him equal distinction in this department of literature. The characters of the Irishman and the Scotsman, in particular, are natural and entertaining. Sir John Hawkins mentions an opera called Alceste, which he wrote for Mr. Rich in 1747; but it has never been performed nor printed.

As a poet, his compositions are so excellent in their kind, as to make us regret that they are not more numerous: Lively, humorous, witty, elegant, tender, pathetic, and sublime; happy and successful in whatever the universality of his genius prompted him to undertake; his spirit, his sentiment, his language, are full of nature, enthusiasm, and simplicity, and while a love of poetry remains among us, must always please the reader of taste and sensibility. The poems on occasional subjects are marked with the different dispositions which must have prevailed at different times of his life. His Advice and Reproof bear testimony to his political and literary prejudices, but they abound in manly sentiments, and indignant satire, expressed in forcible and elegant language. His elegantly-plaintive Love-Elegy is pure nature. It is tender, sentimental, and pathetic; and the happy simplicity and unaffected manner, interest and charm the reader of natural taste. His Tears of Scotland ought not to be mentioned without every commendation. It discovers a genius equally fitted for the pathetic and the sublime. Whatever may be thought of the subject, it unites a glow of poetical enthusiasm, with a high degree of that eloquent simplicity, which appears so easy, and which is yet so difficult to imitate. The following passage, among many others, is exquisitely tender and beautiful.

The pious mother doom'd to death,
Forlorn wanders o'er the heath;
The bleak wind whistles round her head,
Her helpless orphans cry for bread;
Bereft of shelter, food, and friend,
She views the shades of night descend,
And stretch'd beneath the inclement skies,
Weeps o'er her tender babes and dies.

His Ode to Leven Water discovers delicacy of sentiment, joined to simplicity of taste. The images are pastoral and pleasing, and the versification correct and harmonious. He celebrates his native stream with all the elegant simplicity of an Arcadian shepherd. His Odes to Mirth and Sleep, are not of the highest kind, but they have enthusiasm, and spirit, and propriety of versification. His Songs are spirited, ingenious, and witty; a few are elegant, tender, and pathetic.

His Ode to Independence, the greatest effort of his genius, ranks with the lyric compositions of Dryden, Akenfide, Collins, and Gray. It is written throughout in the true spirit of lyric poetry. It is bold, various, ardent, and impetuous. It abounds with animated sentiments, glowing images, and nervous and energetic expressions. The introduction is poetical and abrupt.

Thy spirit, Independence, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye;
Thy steps I follow with my bosom bare,
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky.

The picture exhibited in these lines is striking, because the circumstances are happily chosen, briefly and distinctly delineated. It is sublime, because the images are few, and in themselves great and magnificent. The lion heart and eagle eye, suggest an idea of the high spirit and commanding aspect of Independence; and the poet following with bosom bare, denotes in a picturesque manner the eagerness and enthusiasm of the votary. In a strain of poetry exceedingly wild and romantic, he rehearses his birth, education, and qualities.

Deep in the frozen regions of the north,
A goddess violated brought thee forth,

Immortal Liberty, whose look sublime
Hath bleach'd the tyrant's cheek in every varying clime!

Liberty, according to his acceptation, means the security of our lives and possessions, and freedom from external force. Independence denotes that internal sense and consciousness of freedom, which beget magnanimity, fortitude, and that becoming pride, which leads us to respect ourselves, and do nothing unworthy of our condition. Liberty therefore is, with perfect propriety, said to be the mother of Independence, and Disdain his father.—Disdain arising from indignation against an oppressor, and triumph on having prostrated or escaped his malice. This stern personage is strongly characterised in the following description:

Of ample front, the portly chief appear'd,
The hunted bear supplied a shaggy vest,
The drifted snow hung on his yellow beard,
And his broad shoulders braved the furious blast.

Men may enjoy liberty without independence; they may be secure in their persons and possessions, without feeling any uncommon elevation of mind, or any sense of their freedom. But, if their liberty is attacked, they are alarmed; they feel the value of their condition; they are moved with indignation against their oppressors; they exert themselves, and, if they are successful, or escape the danger that threatened them, they triumph; they reflect on the happiness and dignity conferred by freedom; they applaud themselves for their exertions; become magnanimous and independent. There is, therefore, no less propriety in deducing the origin of Independence from Disdain and Liberty, than fixing the era of her birth. Our Saxon ancestors, free, simple, and inoffensive, were attacked, escaped the violence of their adversary, reflected on the felicity of their condition, and learned independence.

The education of Independence, and the scene of his nativity, are suited to his illustrious lineage, and to the high achievements for which he was destined.

The light he saw in Albion's happy plains,
Where, under covert of a flowering thorn,
While Philomel renewed her warbled strains,
The auspicious fruit of stol'n embrace was born—
The mountain dryads seized with joy
The smiling infant to their charge consign'd;
The Doric muse caressed the favourite boy;
The hermit Wisdom stor'd his opening mind.

The imagery in these lines is soft and agreeable, the language smooth, and the versification harmonious.

In the second antistrophe, he celebrates his heroic and beneficent actions, and returns, at the end of the third strophe, to acknowledge, with gratitude, the power of Independence, in preserving him untainted by the debasing influences of grandeur, and the admiration of vain magnificence. Conscious of the dignity annexed to an independent state of mind, he inveighs against these minions of Fortune, who would impose upon mankind by the ostentation of wealth, and the parade of pageantry.

In fortune's car behold that minion ride,
With either India's glittering spoils oppress'd:
So moves the sumpter-mule in harness'd pride,
That bears the treasure which he cannot taste.
For him let venal bards disgrace the bay,
And hireling minstrels wake the tinkling string;
Her sensual snares let faithless pleasure lay;
And all her jingling bells fantastic folly ring;
Disquiet, doubt, and dread, shall intervene;
And nature, still to all her feelings just,
In vengeance hang a damp on every scene,
Shook from the baleful pinions of disgust.

These lines, embellished by fancy, and recommended to the heart by harmony, are the invective of truth and honest indignation.

The last antistrophe has an air of softness, benignity, and wildness, that leaves a very pleasing effect on the mind of the reader, animated with sentiments of public virtue, glowing with self-approbation, and fired with all the ardour and enthusiasm of the poet.

ADVICE: A SATIRE.

POET, FRIEND.

Poet.

ENOUGH, enough; all this we knew before;
'Tis infamous, I grant it, to be poor:
And who so much to sense and glory lost,
Will hug the curse that not one joy can boast!
From the pale hag, O! could I once break loose;
Divorc'd, all hell should not re-tie the noose!
Not with more care shall H—— avoid his wife,
Not Cope fly swifter, lashing for his life;
Than I to leave the meagre fiend behind.

Friend.

Exert your talents; nature, ever kind, 10
Enough for happiness, bestows on all;
'Tis sloth or pride that finds her gifts too small—
Why sleeps the muse!—is there no room for praise,
When such bright constellations blaze?
When sage Newcastle, abstinently great,
Neglects his food to cater for the state;

Ver. 8. A general famous for an expeditious retreat, though not quite so deliberate as that of the ten thousand Greeks from Persia; having unfortunately forgot to bring his army along with him.

Ver. 15. Alluding to the philosophical contempt which this great personage manifested for the sensual delights of the stomach.

And Grafton, tow'ring Atlas of the throne,
So well rewards a genius like his own:
Granville and Bath illustrious, need I name
For sober dignity and spotless fame; 20
Or Pitt th' unshaken Abdiel yet unsung:
Thy candour, Chomdly! and thy truth O Younge!

Poet.

Th' advice is good; the question only, whether
These names and virtues ever dwelt together?
But what of that? the more the bard shall
claim,

Who can create as well as cherish fame.
But one thing more,—how loud must I repeat,
To rouse th' engag'd attention of the great;

Ver. 17. This noble peer, remarkable for sublimity of parts, by virtue of his office, Lord Chamberlain, conferred the laureat on Colley Cibber, Esp. a delectable bard, whose character has already employed, together with his own, the greatest pens of the age.

Ver. 19. Two noblemen famous in their day, for nothing more than their fortitude in bearing the scorn and reproach of their country.

Ver. 21. Abdiel according to Milton, was the only seraph that preserved his integrity in the midst of corruption—

Among the innumerable false, unmov'd,
Unshaken, unseduced, untterrify'd—

Amus'd, perhaps, with C——'s prolific bum,
 Or rapt amidst the transports of a drum; 30
 While the grim porter watches ev'ry door,
 Stern foe to tradesmen, poets, and the poor.
 Th' Hesperian dragon not more fierce and fell;
 Nor the gaunt growling janitor of hell.
 Ev'n Atticus, so wills the voice of fate)
 Enshrines in clouded majesty, his state;
 Nor to th' adoring crowd vouchsafes regard,
 Though priests adore, and ev'ry priest a bard.
 Shall I then follow with the venal tribe,
 And on the threshold the base mongrel bribe? 40
 Bribe him, to feast my mute imploring eye,
 With some proud lord, who smiles a gracious lie!
 A lie to captivate my heedless youth,
 Degrade my talents, and debauch my truth;
 While fool'd with hope, revolves my joyless day,
 And friends, and fame, and fortune fleet away;
 'Till scandal, indigence, and scorn, my lot,
 The dreary jail entombs me, where I rot!
 Is there, ye varnish'd ruffians of the state!
 Not one, among the millions whom ye cheat, 50
 Who while he totters on the brink of woe,
 Dares, ere he falls, attempt th' avenging blow!
 A steady blow! his languid soul to feast;
 And rid his country of one curse at least!

Friend.

What! turn assassin?

Poet.

Let th' assassin bleed:

My fearless verse shall justify the deed.
 'Tis he, who lures th' unpractis'd mind astray,
 Then leaves the wretch to misery, a prey;
 Perverts the race of virtue just begun,
 And stabs the public in her ruin'd son. 60
Friend.
 Heav'n's how you rail! the man's consum'd by spite!
 If Lockman's fate attends you, when you write;
 Let prudence more propitious arts inspire:
 The lower still you crawl, you'll climb the higher.
 Go then, with ev'ry supple virtue stor'd,
 And thrive, the favour'd valet of my lord.

Ver. 29. This alludes to a phenomenon, not more strange than true. The person here meant, having actually laid upwards of forty eggs, as several physicians and fellows of the Royal Society can attest; one of whom, we hear, has undertaken the incubation, and will, no doubt, favour the world with an account of his success. Some virtuous affirm, that such productions must be the effect of a certain intercourse of organs not fit to be named.

Ver. 30. This is a riotous assembly of fashionable people, of both sexes, at a private house, consisting of some hundreds; not unaptly styled a drum, from the noise and emptiness of the entertainment. There are also drum-major, rout, tempest and hurricane, differing only in degrees of multitude and uproar, as the significant name of each declares.

Ver. 62. To be little read, and less approved.

Is that denied? a boon more humble crave;
 And minister to him who serves a slave:
 Be sure you fasten on promotion's scale;
 Ev'n if you seize some footman by the tail: 70
 Th' ascent is easy, and the prospect clear,
 From the smirch'd scullion to th' embroider'd peer.
 Th' ambitious drudge prefer'd, postillion rides,
 Advanc'd again, the chair benighted guides;
 Here doom'd, if nature strung his sinewy frame,
 The slave (perhaps) of some insatiate dame;
 But if exempted from th' Herculean toil,
 A fairer field awaits him, rich with spoil;
 There shall he shine, with ming'ling honours
 bright,

His master's pathic, pimp, and parasite; 80
 Then strut a captain, if his wish be war,
 And grasp in hope, a truncheon and a star:
 Or if the sweets of peace his soul allure,
 Bask at his ease in some warm sinecure;
 His fate in consul, clerk, or agent, vary,
 Or cross the seas, an envoy's secretary:
 Compos'd of falsehood, ignorance, and pride,
 A prostrate sycophant shall rise a L—d:
 And won from kennels to th' impure embrace,
 Accomplish'd Warran triumph o'er disgrace. 90

Poet.

Eternal infamy his name surround,
 Who planted first that vice on British ground!
 A vice that spite of sense and nature reigns,
 And poisons genial love, and manhood stains!
 Pollio! the pride of science and its shame,
 The muse weeps o'er thee, while she brands thy
 name!

Abhorrent views that prostituted groom,
 Th' indecent grotto and polluted doom!
 There only may the spurious passion glow,
 Where not one laurel decks the caitiff's brow, 100
 Obscene with crimes avow'd, of every dye,
 Corruption, lust, oppression, perjury:
 Let Chardin with a chaplet round his head,
 The taste of Maro and Anacreon plead,
 "Sir, Flaccus knew to live as well as write,
 "And kept, like me, two boys array'd in white."
 Worthy to feel that appetite of fame
 Which rivals Horace only in his shame!
 Let his wail in murmurs, as she runs,
 Her tempting fathers and her yielding sons; 110

Ver. 88. This child of dirt (to use a great author's expression) without any other quality than grovelling adulation, has arrived at the power of insulting his betters every day.

Ver. 90. Another son of fortune, who owes his present affluence to the most infamous qualifications; commonly called Brush Warren, from having been a shoe-black; it is said he was kept by both sexes at one time.

103. This genial knight wore at his own banquet a garland of flowers, in imitation of the ancients; and kept two resy boys robed in white, for the entertainment of his guests.

Ver. 109. In allusion to the unnatural orgies said to be solemnized on the banks of this river;

While dullness screens the failings of the church,
Nor leaves one sliding Rabbi in the lurch:
Far other raptures let the breast contain,
Where heav'n-born taste and emulation reign.

Friend.

Shall not a thousand virtues, then, atone
In thy strict censure for the breach of one?
If Bubo keeps a catamite or whore,
His bounty feeds the beggar at his door:
And though no mortal credits Curio's word,
A score of lacquies fatten at his board: 120
To Christian meekness sacrifice thy spleen,
And strive thy neighbour's weaknesses to screen.

Poet.

Scorn'd be the bard, and whither'd all his fame,
Who wounds a brother weeping o'er his shame!
But if an impious wretch with frantic pride,
Throws honour, truth, and decency aside,
If nor by reason aw'd, nor check'd by fears,
He counts his glories from the stains he bears;
Th' indignant muse to virtue's aid shall rise,
And fix the brand of infamy on vice. 130
What if arous'd at his imperious call,
An hundred footsteps echo through his hall;
And on high columns rear'd his lofty dome
Proclaims th' united art of Greece and Rome:
What though whole hecatombs his crew regale,
And each dependant slumbers o'er his ale; [past,
While the remains through mouths unnumber'd
Indulge the beggar and the dogs at last:
Say, friend, is it benevolence of soul,
Or pompous vanity, that prompts the whole? 140
These sons of sloth who by profusion thrive,
His pride inveigled from the public hive:
And numbers pine in solitary woe,
Who furnish'd out this phantasy of show.
When silent misery assail'd his eyes,
Did e'er his throbbing bosom sympathize?
Or his extensive charity perade
To those who languish in the barren shade,
Where oft by want and modesty suppress'd,
The bootless talent warms the lonely breast? 150
No! petrify'd by dullness and disdain,
Beyond the feeling of another's pain,
The tear of pity ne'er bedew'd his eye,
Nor his lewd bosom felt the social sigh!

Friend.

Alike to thee his virtue or his vice,
If his hand lib'ral, owns thy merit's price.

Poet.

Sooner, in hopeless anguish would I mourn,
Than owe my fortune to the man I scorn!—
What new resource?

particularly at one place, where a much greater sanctity of morals and taste might be expected.

Ver. III. This is a decent and parental office, in which dullness is employed: namely, to conceal the failings of her children; and exactly conformable to that instance of filial piety, which we meet with in the son of Noah, who went backward, to cover the nakedness of his father, when he lay exposed, from the scoffs and insults of a malicious world.

Friend.

A thousand yet remain 159
That bloom with honours, or that teem with gain:
These arts,—are they beneath—beyond thy care?
Devote thy studies to th' auspicious fair:
Of truth divested, let thy tongue supply
The hinted slander, and the whisper'd lie;
All merit mock, all qualities depress,
Save those that grace th' excelling patroness;
Trophies to her on others follies raise,
And heard with joy, by defamation praise:
To this collect each faculty of face,
And ev'ry feat perform of sly grimace; 170
Let the grave sneer sarcastic speak thee shrewd,
The smutty joke ridiculously lewd;
And the loud laugh through all its changes rung,
Applaud th' abortive fallies of her tongue:
Enroll'd a member in the sacred list,
Soon shalt thou sharp in company at whist;
Her midnight rites and revels regulate,
Priest of her love, and demon of her hate.

Poet.

But say, what recompence for all this waste
Of honour, truth, attention, time, and taste? 180
To shine confess'd, her zany and her tool,
And fall by what I rose, low ridicule?
Again shall Handell raise her laurell'd brow,
Again shall harmony with rapture glow!
The spells dissolve, the combination breaks
And Punch no longer Fraas's rival squeaks.
Lo, Ruffel fails a sacrifice to whim,
And starts amaz'd in Newgate from his dream:
With trembling hands implores their promis'd aid;
And sees their favour like a vision fade! 190
Is this, ye faithless syrens!—this the joy
To which your smiles th' unwary wretch decoy?
Naked and shackled, on the pavement prone,
His mangled flesh devouring from the bone;

Ver. 177. These are mysteries performed, like those of the Dea Bona, by females only; consequently it cannot be expected that we should here explain them: we have, notwithstanding, found means to learn some anecdotes concerning them, which we shall reserve for another opportunity.

Ver. 187. A famous mimic and singer. The person here meant, by the qualifications above described, had insinuated himself into the confidence of certain ladies of quality, who engaged him to set up a puppet-show, in opposition to the oratorios of Handel, against whom they were unreasonably prejudiced. But the town not seconding the capricious undertaking, they deserted their manager, whom they had promised to support, and let him sink under the expence they had entailed upon him: he was accordingly thrown into prison, where his disappointment got the better of his reason, and he remained in all the ecstasy of despair; till at last, his generous patronesses, after much solicitation, were prevailed upon to collect five pounds, on the payment of which he was admitted into Bedlam, where he continued bereft of his understanding, and died in the utmost misery.

Rage in his heart, distraction in his eye !
Behold, inhuman hags ! your minion lie !
Behold his gay career to ruin run,
By you seduc'd, abandon'd and undone !
Rather in garret pent, secure from harm,
My muse with murders shall the town alarm ; 200
Or plunge in politics with patriot zeal,
And snarl like Guthrie for the public weal,
Than crawl an insect in a beldame's power,
And dread the crush of caprice ev'ry hour !

Friend.

'Tis well ;—enjoy that petulance of style,
And, like the envious adder, lick the file :
What though success will not attend on all !
Who bravely dares, must sometimes risk a fall.
Behold the bounteous board of fortune spread ;
Each weakness, vice and folly yields thee bread ;
Would'st thou with prudent condescension strive
On the long-settled terms of life to thrive.

Poet.

What ! join the crew that pilfer one another,
Betray my friend, and persecute my brother :
Turn usurer, o'er cent per cent. to brood, 220
Or quack, to feed like fleas on human blood ?

Friend.

Or if thy soul can brook the gilded curse,
Some changeling heiress steal—

Poet.

Why not a purse ?
Two things I dread, my conscience and the law.

Friend.

How ? dread a mumbling bear without a claw ?
Nor this, nor that, is standard right or wrong,
Till minted by the mercenary tongue ;
And what is conscience but a fiend of strife,
That chills the joys, and damps the scenes of life ?
The wayward child of vanity and fear, 230
The preevish dam of poverty and care ;
Unnumber'd woes engender in the breast
That entertains the rude, ungrateful guest.

Poet.

Hail, sacred pow'r ! my glory and my guide !
Fair source of mental peace, whate'er betide ;
Safe in thy shelter, let disaster roll
Eternal hurricanes around my soul ;
My soul serene amidst the storms shall reign,
And smile to see their fury burst in vain !

Friend.

Too coy to flatter, and too proud to serve, 240
Thine be the joyless dignity to starve.

Poet.

No ;—thanks to discord, war shall be my friend ;
And moral rage, heroic courage lend
To pierce the gleaming squadron of the foe,
And win renown by some distinguish'd blow.

Ver. 199. These are the dreams and fictions of Grub-street, with which the good people of this metropolis are daily alarmed and entertained.

Ver. 206. This alludes to the fable of the viper and file, applicable to all the unsuccessful efforts of malice and envy.

Ver. 240. This, surely, occasioned Churchill's
" Too proud to flatter, too sincere to lie."

Friend.

Renown ! ay, do—unkennel the whole pack
Of military cowards on thy back.
What difference, say, 'twixt him who bravely stood,
And him who sought the bosom of the wood ?
Envenom'd calumny the first shall brand, 250
The last enjoy a ribbon and command.

Poet.

If such be life, its wretches I deplore,
And long to quit th' inhospitable shore.

REPROOF :

A SATIRE.

POET, FRIEND.

Poet.

HOWE'ER I turn, or wherefo'er I tread,
This giddy world still rattles round my head !
I pant for silence ev'n in this retreat—
Good Heav'n ! what demon thunders at the gate ?

Friend.

In vain you strive in this sequester'd nook,
To shroud you from an injur'd friend's rebuke.

Poet.

An injur'd friend ! who challenges the name ?
If you, what title justifies the claim ?
Did e'er your heart o'er my affliction grieve,
Your int'rest prop me, or your praise relieve ? 10
Or could my wants my soul so far subdue,
That in distress she crawl'd for aid to you ?
But let us grant th' indulgence e'er so strong ;
Display without reserve th' imagin'd wrong :
Among your kindred have I kindled strife,
Deflow'r'd your daughter, or debauch'd your wife ;
Traduc'd your credit, bubbled you at game ;
Or soil'd with infamous reproach your name ?

Friend.

No ; but your cynic vanity (you'll own)
Expos'd by private council to the town.

Poet.

Such fair advice 'twere pity sure to lose ;
I grant I printed it for public use.

Friend.

Yes, season'd with your own remarks between,
Inflam'd with so much virulence of spleen,
That the mild town (to give the dev'l his due)
Ascrib'd the whole performance to a Jew.

Poet.

Jews, Turks, or Pagans, hallowed be the mouth
That teems with moral zeal and dauntless truth !
Prove that my partial strain adopts one lie,
No penitent more mortify'd than I ; 30
Not ev'n the wretch in shackles, doom'd to groan
Beneath th' inhuman scoffs of Williamson.

Ver. 248, 249. This last line relates to the behaviour of a general on a certain occasion, who discovered an extreme passion for the cool shade
during the heat of the day : the Hanoverian general, in the battle of Dettingen.

Ver. 32. Governor of the Tower.

Friend.
Hold—let us see this boasted self-denial—
The vanquish'd knight has triumph'd in his trial.

Poet.
What then?

Friend.
Your own sarcastic verse unsay,
That brands him as a trembling runaway.

Poet.
With all my soul!—th' imputed charge rehearse;
I'll own my error and expunge my verse.
Come, come,—how'er the day was lost or won,
The world allows the race was fairly run. 40

But lest the truth too naked should appear,
A robe of fable shall the goddess wear;
When sheep were subject to the lion's reign,
Ere man acquir'd dominion o'er the plain,
Voracious wolves fierce rushing from the rocks,
Devour'd without controul th' unguarded flocks:
The suff'ers crowding round the royal cave,
Their monarch's pity and protection crave:
Not that they wanted valour, force or arms,
To shield their lambs from danger and alarms; 50
A thousand rams the champions of the fold,
In strength of horn, and patriot virtue bold,
Engag'd in firm association, stood
Their lives devoted to the public good:
A warlike chieftain was their sole request,
To marshal, guide, instruct, and rule the rest:
Their pray'r was heard, and by consent of all,
A courtier ape appointed general.—

He went, he led, arrang'd the battle stood,
The savage foe came pouring like a flood, 60
Then Pug aghast, fled swifter than the wind,
Nor deign'd in threescore miles to look behind;
While ev'ry band for orders bleat in vain,
And fall in slaughter'd heaps upon the plain:
The scar'd baboon (to cut the matter short)
With all his speed could not outrun report;
And, to appease the clamours of the nation,
'Twas fit his case should stand examination.
The board was nam'd—each worthy took his place;

All senior members of the horned race.— 70
The wedder, goat, ram, elk, and ox, were there,
And a grave hoary stag possess'd the chair.—

Ver. 34. Sir John Cope.

Ver. 70. It is not to be wondered at that this board consisted of horned cattle only, since, before the use of arms, every creature was obliged in war to fight with such weapons as nature afforded it, consequently those supplied with horns bid fairest for signaling themselves in the field, and carrying off the first posts in the army.—But I observe, that, among the members of this court, there is no mention made of such of the horned family as were chiefly celebrated for valour; namely, the bull, unicorn, rhinoceros, &c. which gives reason to suspect, that these last were either out of favour with the ministry, laid aside on account of their great age, or that the ape had interest enough at court to exclude them from the number of his judges.

Th' inquiry past, each in his turn began
The culprit's conduct variously to scan.
At length the sage uprear'd his awful crest,
And pausing, thus his fellow chiefs address'd.—
If age, that from this head its honours stole,
Hath not impair'd the functions of my soul,
But sacred wisdom with experience bought,
While this weak frame decays, matures my thought; 80

Th' important issue of this grand debate
May furnish precedent for your own fate;
Should ever fortune call you to repel
The shaggy foe, so desperate and fell—
'Tis plain, you say, his excellence Sir Ape
From the dire field accomplish'd an escape;
Alas! our fellow subjects ne'er had bled,
If every ram that fell like him had fled;
Certes, those sheep were rather mad than brave,
Which scorn'd th' example their wise leader gave.
Let us then ev'ry vulgar hint disdain, 90
And from our brother's laurel wash the stain.—
Th' admiring court applauds the president,
And Pug was clear'd by general consent,

Friend.
There needs no magic to divine your scope,
Mark'd as you are a flagrant misanthrope:
Sworn foe to good and bad, to great and small,
Thy rankling pen produces nought but gall:
Let virtue struggle, or let glory shine,
Thy verse affords not one approving line.— 100

Poet.
Hail, sacred themes! the muse's chief delight!
O bring the darling objects to my sight!
My breast with elevated thought shall glow,
My fancy brighten, and my numbers flow!
Th' Aonian grove with rapture would I tread;
To crop unfading wreaths for William's head;
But that my strain, unheard amidst the throng,
Must yield to Lockman's ode, and Hanbury's song.
Nor would th' enamour'd muse neglect to pay
To Stanhope's worth the tributary lay; 110
The soul unstain'd, the sense sublime to paint,
A people's patron, pride, and ornament!
Did not his virtues eterniz'd remain
The boasted theme of Pope's immortal strain.
Not ev'n the pleasing task is left, to raise
A grateful monument to Barnard's praise;
Else should the venerable patriot stand
Th' unshaken pillar of a sinking land.
The gladd'ning prospect let me still pursue,
And bring fair virtue's triumph to the view! 120
Alike to me, by fortune blest or not,
From soaring Cobham to the melting Scot.
But, lo! a swarm of harpies intervene,
To ravage, mangle, and pollute the scene!

Ver. 108. Two productions resembling one another very much in that cloying mediocrity, which Horace compares to—Grossum unguentum, et sardo cum melle papaver.

Ver. 110. The Earl of Chesterfield.

Ver. 122. Daniel Mackercher, Esq. a man of such primitive simplicity, that he may be said to have exceeded the scripture injunction, by not

Gorg'd with our plunder, yet still gaunt for spoil,
 Rapacious Gideon fastens on our isle;
 Infatiate Lalcelles, and the fiend Vaneck,
 Rise on our ruins, and enjoy the wreck;
 While griping Jasper glories in his prize, 129
 Wrung from the widow's tears and orphan's cries.

Friend.

Relaps'd again! strange tendency to rail!
 I fear'd this meekness would not long prevail.

Post.

You deem it rancour then?—Look round and see
 What vices flourish still, unprun'd by me:
 Corruption, roll'd in a triumphant car,
 Displays his burnish'd front and glitt'ring star;
 Nor heeds the public scorn, or transient curse,
 Unknown alike to honour and remorse.
 Behold the leering belle, carels'd by all,
 Adorn each private feast and public ball; 140
 Where peers attentive listen and adore,
 And not one matron shuns the titled whore.
 At Peter's obsequies I sung no dirge;
 Nor has my satire yet supply'd a scourge
 For the vile tribes of usurers and bites,
 Who sneak at Jonathan's, and swear at White's.
 Each low pursuit, and flighter folly bred
 Within the selfish heart and hollow head;
 Thrives uncontroll'd, and blossoms o'er the land,
 Nor feels the rigour of my chast'ning hand: 150
 While Codrus shivers o'er his bags of gold,
 By famine wither'd, and benumb'd by cold;
 I mark his haggard eyes with frenzy roll,
 And feast upon the terrors of his soul;
 The wrecks of war, the perils of the deep,
 That curse with hideous dreams the caitiff's sleep;
 Insolvent debtors, thieves and civil strife,
 Which daily persecute his wretched life;
 With all the horrors of prophetic dread,
 That rack his bosom while the mail is read. 160
 Safe from the road, untainted by the school,
 A judge by birth, by destiny a fool,
 While the young lordling struts in native pride,
 His party-coloured tutor by his side,
 Pleas'd, let me own the pious mother's care,
 Who to the brawny fire commits her heir.

 his shirt also, to relieve a brother in distress: Mr.
 Annesley, who claimed the Anglesea title and estate.

 scorning the narrow views of private usury, found means to lay a whole state under contribution, and pillage a kingdom of immense sums, under the protection of law.

Ver. 129. A Christian of bowels, who lends money to his friends in want at the moderate interest of 50 l. per cent. A man famous for buying poor seamen's tickets.

Ver. 139. A wit of the first water, celebrated for her talent of repartee and double entendre.

Ver. 143. Peter Waters, Esq. whose character is too well known to need description.

Ver. 164. Whether it be for the reason assigned in the subsequent lines, or the frugality of the parents, who are unwilling to throw away money in making their children wiser than themselves, I

Fraught with the spirit of a Gothic monk,
 Let Rich, with dullness and devotion drunk,
 Enjoy the peal so barbarous and loud, 169
 While his brain spues new monsters to the crowd;
 I see with joy the vaticide deplore
 An hell-denouncing priest and sov'reign whore.
 Let ev'ry polish'd dame, and genial lord,
 Employ the social chair and venal board;
 Debauch'd from sense, let doubtful meanings run,
 The vague conundrum, and the prurient pun;
 While the vain fop, with apish grin, regards
 The giggling minx half-chok'd behind her cards:
 These, and a thousand idle pranks, I deem
 The motley spawn of ignorance and whim. 180
 Let pride conceive, and folly propagate,
 The fashion still adopts the spurious brat:
 Nothing so strange that fashion cannot tame;
 By this dishonour ceases to be shame:
 This weans from blushes lewd Tyrawly's face,
 Gives Hawley praise, and Ingoldsby disgrace,
 From Mead to Thompson shifts the palm at once,
 A meddling, prating, blund'ring, busy dunce!
 And may (should taste a little more decline)
 Transform the nation to an herd of swine. 190

Friend.

The fatal period hastens on apace!
 Nor will thy verse th' obscene event disgrace;
 Thy flow'rs of poetry, that smell so strong,
 The keenest appetites have loth'd the song;
 Condemn'd by Clark, Banks, Barrowby, and Chitty,
 And all the crop-eared critics of the city:

know not; but certain it is, that many people of fashion commit the education of their heirs to some trusty footman, with a particular command to keep master out of the stable.

Ver. 170. Monsters of absurdity.

"He look'd, and saw a sable fore'er rise,
 "Swift to whose hand a winged volume flies:
 "All sudden, gorgons hiss, and dragons glare,
 "And ten horn'd fiends and giants rush to war.
 "Hell rises, heaven descends, and dance on earth,
 "Gods, imps, and monsters, music, rage, and mirth,
 "A fire, a jig, a battle, and a ball,
 "Till one wide conflagration swallows all."

Dunciad.

Ver. 174. This is no other than an empty chair, carried about with great formality to perform visits; by the help of which a decent correspondence is often maintained among people of fashion, many years together, without one personal interview, to the great honour of hospitality and good neighbourhood.

Ibid. Venal board.] Equally applicable to the dining and card-table, where every guest must pay an extravagant price for what he has.

Ver. 186. Hawley.] A general so renowned for conduct and discipline, that, during an action in which he had a considerable command, he is said to have been seen rallying three fugitive dragoons, five miles from the field of battle.

Ver. 195. A fraternity of wits, whose virtue, modesty, and taste, are much of the same dimension.

While sagely neutral sits thy silent friend,
Alike averse to censure or commend.

Poet.

Peace to the gentle soul that could deny
His invoked voice to fill the cry! 200
And let me still the sentiment disdain
Of him who never speaks but to arraign;
The sneering son of calumny and scorn,
Whom neither arts, nor sense, nor soul, adorn:
Or his, who, to maintain a critic's rank,
Though conscious of his own internal blank,
His want of taste unwilling to betray,
'Twixt sense and nonsense hesitates all day;
With brow contracted hears each passage read,
And often hums and shakes his empty head; 210
Until some oracle ador'd pronounce
The passive bard a poet or a dunce;
Then in loud clamour echoes back the word,
'Tis bold! insipid—soaring or absurd.
These, and th' unnumber'd shoals of smaller fry,
That nibble round, I pity and defy.

THE TEARS OF SCOTLAND,

Written in the Year 1746.

MOURN, hapless Caledonia, mourn
Thy banish'd peace, thy laurels torn!
Thy sons, for valour long renown'd,
Lie slaughter'd on their native ground;
Thy hospitable roofs no more,
Invite the stranger to the door;
In smoky ruins sunk they lie,
The monuments of cruelty.
The wretched owner fees afar
His all become the prey of war;
Bethinks him of his babes and wife,
Then smites his breast, and curses life.
Thy swains are famish'd on the rocks,
Where once they fed their wanton flocks:
Thy ravish'd virgins shriek in vain;
Thy infants perish on the plain.
What boots it then, in every clime,
Through the wide spreading waste of time,
Thy martial glory, crown'd with praise,
Still shone with undiminish'd blaze?
Thy tow'ring spirit now is broke,
Thy neck is bended to the yoke.
What foreign arms could never quell,
By civil rage, and rancour fell.
The rural pipe and merry lay
No more shall cheer the happy day:
No social scenes of gay delight
Beguile the dreary winter night:
No strains but those of sorrow flow,
And nought be heard but sounds of woe,
While the pale phantoms of the slain
Glide nightly o'er the silent plain.
O baneful cause, oh! fatal morn,
Accurs'd to ages yet unborn!
The sons against their father stood,
The parent shed his children's blood.
Yet, when the rage of battle ceas'd,
The victor's soul was not appeas'd:

The naked and forlorn must feel
Devouring flames, and murd'ring steel!

The pious mother, doom'd to death,
Forfaken wanders o'er the heath,
The bleak wind whistles round her head,
Her helpless orphans cry for bread;
Bereft of shelter, food, and friend,
She views the shades of night descend;
And stretch'd beneath the inclement skies,
Weeps o'er her tender babes, and dies.

While the warm blood bedews my veins,
And unimpair'd remembrance reigns,
Resentment of my country's fate,
Within my filial breast shall beat;
And, spite of her insulting foe,
My sympathizing verse shall flow:
"Mourn, hapless Caledonia, mourn
"Thy banish'd peace, thy laurels torn."

VERSES ON A YOUNG LADY

PLAYING ON A HARPSICORD, AND SINGING.

WHEN Sappho struck the quiv'ring wire,
The throbbing breast was all on fire:
And when she rais'd the vocal lay,
The captive soul was charm'd away!

But had the nymph, possess'd with these,
Thy softer, chaster pow'r to please;
Thy beauteous air of sprightly youth,
Thy native smiles of artless truth;

The worm of grief had never prey'd
On the forsaken love-sick maid;
Nor had she mourn'd an hapless flame,
Nor dash'd on rocks her tender frame.

LOVE ELEGY.

IN IMITATION OF TIBULLUS.

WHERE now are all my flatt'ring dreams of joy?
Monimia, give my soul her wonted rest;
Since first thy beauty fix'd my roving eye,
Heart-gnawing cares corrode my pensive breast.

Let happy lovers fly where pleasures call,
With festive songs beguile the fleeting hour;
Lead beauty through the mazes of the ball,
Or press her wanton in love's roseate bower.

For me, no more I'll range th' empurpled mead,
Where shepherds pipe, and virgins dance around,
Nor wander through the woodbine's fragrant shade,
To hear the music of the grove resound.

I'll seek some lonely church, or dreary hall,
Where fancy paints the glimm'ring taper blue,
Where damps hang mould'ring on the ivy'd
wall,
And sheeted ghosts drink up the midnight dew:

There leagued with hopeless anguish and despair,
Awhile in silence o'er my fate repine:
Then with a long farewell to love and care,
To kindred dust my weary limbs consign.

Wilt thou, Monimia, shed a gracious tear
On the cold grave where all my sorrows rest?
Strew vernal flow'rs, applaud my love sincere,
And bid the turf lie easy on my breast?

SONG.

WHILE with fond rapture and amaze,
On thy transcendent charms I gaze,
My cautious soul essays in vain
Her peace and freedom to maintain:
Yet let that blooming form divine,
Where grace and harmony combine,
Those eyes, like genial orbs, that move,
Dispensing gladness, joy, and love,
In all their pomp assail my view,
Intent my bosom to subdue;
My breast, by wary maxims steel'd,
Not all those charms shall force to yield.

But, when invok'd to beauty's aid,
I see th' enlighten'd soul display'd;
That soul so sensibly sedate
Amid the storms of froward fate!
Thy genius active, strong and clear,
Thy wit sublime, though not severe,
The social ardour void of art,
That glows within thy candid heart;
My spirits, sense, and strength decay,
My resolution dies away,
And ev'ry faculty oppress'd,
Almighty love invades my breast!

SONG.

To fix her—'twere a task as vain
To count the April drops of rain,
To sow in Afric's barren soil,
Or tempests hold within a toil.

I know it, friend, she's light as air,
False as the fowler's artful snare;
Inconstant as the passing wind,
As winter's dreary frost unkind.

She's such a miser too in love,
Its joys she'll neither share nor prove;
Though hundreds of gallants await
From her victorious eyes their fate.

Blushing at such inglorious reign,
I sometimes strive to break her chain;
My reason summon to my aid,
Resolv'd no more to be betray'd.

Ah! friend, 'tis but a short-liv'd trance,
Dispell'd by one enchanting glance;
She need but look, and, I confess,
Those looks completely curse or bless.

So soft, so elegant, so fair,
Sure something more than human's there;
I must submit, for strife is vain,
'Twas destiny that forg'd the chain.

BURLESQUE ODE *.

WHERE wast thou, wittol ward, when hapless
fate
From these weak arms mine aged grannam tore:
These pious arms essay'd too late,
To drive the dismal phantom from the door.
Could not thy healing drop, illustrious quack,
Could not thy salutary pill prolong her days;
For whom, so oft, to Marybone, alack!
Thy sorrels dragg'd thee through the worst of ways!

Oil-dropping Twick'nham did not then detain,
Thy steps, though tended by the Cambrian maids;
Nor the sweet environs of Drury-lane;
Nor dusty Pimlico's embow'ring shades;
Nor Whitehall, by the river's bank,
Beset with rowers dank; — [sons;
Nor where th' Exchange pours forth its tawny
Nor where to mix with offal, soil, and blood,
Steep Snow-hill rolls the sable flood;
Nor where the Mint's contaminated kennels runs:
Ill doth it now beseem,
That thou should'st doze and dream,
When death in mortal armour came,
And struck with ruthless dart the gentle dame.
Her lib'ral hand and sympathising breast
The brute creation kindly bless'd:
Where'er she trod grimalkin purr'd around,
The squeaking pigs her bounty own'd;
Nor to the waddling duck or gabbling goose,
Did she glad sustenance refuse;
The strutting cock she daily fed,
And turkey with his snout so red;
Of chickens careful as the pious hen,
Nor did she overlook the tom-tit or the wren;
While redbreast hopp'd before her in the hall,
As if the common mother were of all.

For my distracted mind,
What comfort can I find;
O best of grannams! thou art dead and gone,
And I am left behind to weep and moan,
To sing thy dirge in sad and funereal ray,
Oh! woe is me! alack! and well-a-day!

ODE TO MIRTH.

PARENT of joy! heart-easing mirth!
Whether of Venus or Aurora born;
Yet goddesses sure of heavenly birth,
Visit benign a son of grief forlorn:
Thy glittering colours gay,
Around him mirth display:
And o'er his raptur'd sense
Diffuse thy living influence:
So shall each hill in purer green array'd,
And flower adorn'd in new-born beauty glow.
The grove shall smooth the horrors of the shade
And streams in murmurs shall forget to flow.

* Smollett, imagining himself ill treated by Lord Lyttleton, wrote the above burlesque on that nobleman's monody on the death of his lady.

Shine, goddess, shine with unremitted ray,
And gild (a second sun) with brighter beam our day.

Labour with thee forgets his pain,
And aged poverty can smile with thee,
If thou be nigh, grief's hate is vain,
And weak th' uplifted arm of tyranny.

The morning opes on high

His universal eye;

And on the world doth pour

His glories in a golden shower,

Lo! darkness trembling 'fore the hostile ray
Shrinks to the cavern deep and wood forlorn:

The brood obscene, that own her gloomy
fway,

Troop in her rear and fly th' approach of morn.
Pale shivering ghosts, that dread th' all-cheering light, [night.
Quick, as the lightning's flash glide, to sepulchral

But whence the gladdening beam

That pours his purple stream

O'er the long prospect wide?

'Tis Mirth. I see her sit

In majesty of light,

With laughter at her side.

Bright-ey'd fancy hovering near

Wide waves her glancing wing in air;

And young wit flings his pointed dart,

That guiltless strikes the willing heart.

Fear not now affliction's power,

Fear not now wild passion's rage,

Nor fear ye aught in evil hour,

Save the tardy hand of age.

Now mirth hath heard the suppliant poet's prayer,
No cloud that rides the blast shall vex the troubled air.

ODE TO SLEEP.

SOFT sleep, profoundly pleasing power,

Sweet patron of the peaceful hour,

O listen from thy calm abode,

And hither wave thy magic rod;

Extend thy silent soothing fway,

And charm the canker care away.

Whether thou lov'st to glide along,

Attended by an airy throng

Of gentle dreams and smiles of joy,

Such as adorn the wanton boy;

Or to the monarch's fancy bring

Delights that better suit a king;

The glittering host, the groaning plan,

The clang of arms, and victor's train;

Nor should a milder vision please,

Present the happy scenes of peace;

Plump Autumn, blushing all around,

Rich industry with toil embrown'd,

Content, with brow serenely gay,

And genial art's refulgent ray.

ODE TO LEVEN-WATER.

ON Leven's banks, while free to rove,
And tune the rural pipe to love;

I envied not the happiest swain

That ever trod the Arcadian plain,

Pure stream in whose transparent wave

My youthful limbs I wont to lave;

No torrents stain thy limpid source;

No rocks impede thy dimpling course,

That sweetly warbles o'er its bed,

With white, round, polish'd pebbles spread;

While, lightly pois'd, the scaly brood

In myriads cleave thy crystal flood;

The springing trout in speckled pride;

The salmon, monarch of the tide;

The ruthless pike, intent on war;

The silver eel, and motled par.*

Devolving from thy parent lake,

A charming maze thy waters make,

By bowers of birch, and groves of pine,

And edges flower'd with eglantine.

Still on thy banks so gaily green,

May num'rous herds and flocks be seen,

And lasses chaunting o'er the pail,

And shepherds piping in the dale,

And ancient faith that knows no guile,

And industry embrown'd with toil,

And hearts resolv'd, and hands prepar'd,

The blessings they enjoy to guard.

ODE TO BLUE-EY'D ANN.

WHEN the rough north forgets to howl,

And ocean's billows cease to roll;

When Lybian sands are bound in frost,

And cold to Nova-Zembla's lost!

When heav'nly bodies cease to move,

My blue-ey'd Ann I'll cease to love.

No more shall flowers the meads adorn,

Nor sweetness deck the rosy thorn;

Nor swelling buds proclaim the spring;

Nor parching heats the dog-star bring;

Nor laughing lilies paint the grove,

When blue-ey'd Ann I cease to love.

No more shall joy in hope be found;

Nor pleasures dance their frolic round;

Nor love's light god inhabit earth;

Nor beauty give the passion birth;

Nor heat to summer sunshine cleave,

When blue-ey'd Nanny I deceive.

When rolling seasons cease to change,

Inconstancy forgets to range;

When lavish May no more shall bloom;

Nor gardens yield a rich perfume;

When nature from her sphere shall start,

I'll tear my Nanny from my heart.

ODE TO INDEPENDENCE.

STROPHE.

THY spirit, Independence, let me share

Lord of the lion-heart and eagle-eye,

Thy steps I follow with my bosom bare,

Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky.

* The par is a small fish, not unlike the smelt, which it rivals in delicacy and flavour.

Deep in the frozen regions of the north,
A goddess violated brought thee forth,
Immortal liberty, whose looks sublime
Hath bleach'd the tyrant's cheek in every varying clime.

What time the iron-hearted Gaul
With frantic superstition for his guide, 10
Arm'd with the dagger and the pail,
The sons of Woden to the field defy'd:
The ruthless hag, by Weser's flood,
In Heaven's name urg'd the infernal blow;
And red the stream began to flow:
The vanquish'd were baptized with blood!

ANTISTROPHE.

The Saxon prince in horror fled
From altars stain'd with human gore;
And liberty his routed legions led
In safety to the bleak Norwegian shore. 20
There in a cave asleep she lay,
Lulled by the hoarse-resounding main;
When a bold savage past that way,
Impell'd by destiny, his name disdain.
Of ample front the portly chief appear'd:
The hunted bear supply'd a shaggy vest;
The drifted snow hung on his yellow beard;
And his broad shoulders brav'd the furious blast.
He stopt: He gazed; his bosom glow'd,
And deeply felt the impression of her charms: 30
He seiz'd the advantage fate allow'd:
And straight compress'd her in his vigorous arms.

STROPHE.

The curlien scream'd, the tritons blew
Their shells to celebrate the ravish'd rite;
Old time exulted as he flew;
And independence saw the light.
The light he saw in Albion's happy plains,
Where under cover of a flowering thorn,
While Philomel renewed her warbled strains,
The auspicious fruit of stol'n embrace was born—
The mountain dryads seized with joy, 41
The smiling infant to their charge consign'd;
The Doric muse caress'd the favourite boy;
The hermit wisdom stor'd his opening mind.
As rolling years matured his age,
He flourished bold and sinewy as his fire;
While the mild passions in his breast assuage
The fiercer flames of his maternal fire.

ANTISTROPHE.

Accomplished thus, he winged his way,
And zealous roved from pole to pole, 50
The rolls of right eternal to display,
And warm with patriot thoughts the aspiring soul,
On desert isles it was he that rais'd
Those spires that gild the Adriatic wave,

Ver. 26. Charlmagne obliged four thousand Saxon prisoners to embrace the Christian religion, and immediately after they were baptized, ordered their throats to be cut.—Their prince Vitikind fled for shelter to Gotrick, king of Denmark.

Ver. 53. Although Venice was built a considerable time before the æra here assigned for the birth of Independence, the republic had not yet attained to any great degree of power and splendour.

Where tyranny beheld amaz'd
Fair freedom's temple, where he mark'd her grave.
He steel'd the blunt Batavian's arms. 61
To burst the Iberian's double chain;
And cities rear'd, and planted farms,
Won from the skirts of Neptune's wide domain.
He, with the generous rustics, sate,
On Uri's rocks in close divan;
And winged that arrow sure as fate,
Which ascertained the sacred rights of man.

STROPHE.

Arabia's scorching sands he cross'd,
Where blasted nature pants supine,
Conductor of her tribes adult,
To freedom's adamant shrine;
And many a Tartar hord forlorn, aghast!
He snatch'd from under fell oppression's wing;
And taught amidst the dreary waste 71
The all-cheering hymns of liberty to sing.
He virtue finds, like precious ore,
Diffus'd through every baser mould,
Even now he stands on Calvi's rocky shore,
And turns the dross of Corfica to gold;
He, guardian genius, taught my youth
Pomp's tinsel livery to despise:
My lips by him chastis'd to truth,
Ne'er pay'd that homage which my heart denies. 80

ANTISTROPHE.

Those sculptur'd halls my feet shall never tread,
Where varnish'd vice and vanity combin'd,
To dazzle and seduce, their banners spread;
And forge vile shackles for the free-born mind.
While insolence his wrinkled front uprears,
And all the flowers of spurious fancy blow;
And tulle his ill-woven chaplet wears,
Full often wreathed around the miscreant's brow;
Where ever-dimpling falsehood pert and vain,
Presents her cup of stale profession's froth; 90
And pale disease, with all his bloated train,
Torments the sons of gluttony and sloth.

Ver. 58. The Low Countries were not only oppressed by grievous taxations, but likewise threatened with the establishment of the Inquisition, when the Seven Provinces revolted, and shook off the yoke of Spain.

Ver. 62. Alluding to the known story of William Tell and his associates, the fathers and founders of the confederacy of the Swiss Cantons.

Ver. 65. The Arabs, rather than resign their independency, have often abandoned their habitations, and encountered all the horrors of the desert.

Ver. 69. From the tyranny of Jenghis Khan, Timur-Bec, and other eastern conquerors, whole tribes of Tartars were used to fly into the remotest wastes of Cathay, where no army could follow them.

Ver. 76. The noble stand made by Paschal Paoli and his associates against the usurpations of the French king, must endear them to all the sons of liberty and independence.

STROPHE.

In fortune's car behold that minion ride,
 With either India's glittering spoils opprest,
 So moves the sumpter-mule, in harness'd pride,
 That bears the treasure which he cannot taste.
 For him let venal bards disgrace the bay,
 And hireling minstrels wake the tinkling string;
 Her sensual snares let faithless pleasure lay; 100
 And jingling bells fantastic folly ring;
 Disquiet, doubt, and dread shall intervene;
 And nature, still to all her feelings just,
 In vengeance hang a damp on every scene,
 Shook from the baleful pinions of disgust.

ANTISTROPHE.

Nature I'll court in her sequestered haunts,
 By mountain, meadow, streamlet, grove, or cell.
 Where the poised lark his evening ditty chaunts,
 And health, and peace, and contemplation dwell.
 There, study shall with solitude recline; 109
 And friendship pledge me to his fellow-swains;
 And toil and temperance sedately twine
 The slender cord that fluttering life sustains:
 And fearless poverty shall guard the door;
 And taste unspoiled the frugal table spread;
 And industry supply the humble store;
 And sleep unbribed his dews refreshing shed:
 White-mantled innocence, ethereal sprite,
 Shall chase far off the goblins of the night:
 And independence o'er the day preside,
 Propitious power! my patron and my pride. 120

SONG.

From the man whom I love though my heart I disguise,
 I will freely describe the wretch I despise;
 And if he has sense but to balance a straw,
 He will sure take hint from the picture I draw.

A wit without sense, without fancy a beau,
 Like a parrot he chatters, and struts like a crow;
 A peacock in pride, in grimace a baboon,
 In courage a hind, in conceit a Gascoon.

As a vulture rapacious, in falsehood a fox,
 Inconstant as waves, and unfeeling as rocks!
 As a tyger ferocious, perverse as a hog,
 In mischief an ape, and in fawning a dog.

In a word, to sum up all his talents together,
 His heart is of lead, and his brain is of feather.
 Yet, if he has sense but to balance a straw,
 He will sure take the hint from the picture I draw.

SONG.

LET the nymph still avoid and be deaf to the swain

Who in transports of passion affects to complain;
 For his rage, not his love, in that frenzy is shown;
 And the blast that blows loudest is soon overblown.

But the shepherd whom Cupid has pierc'd to the heart,

Will submissive adore, and rejoice in the smart;
 Or in plaintive soft murmurs, his bosom-felt wo,
 Like the smooth-gliding current of rivers will flow.

Though silent his tongue, he will plead with his eyes.

And his heart own your sway in a tribute of sighs;
 But when he accosts you in meadow or grove,
 His tale is all tenderness, rapture, and love.

SONG.

COME listen, ye students of ev'ry degree,
 I sing of a wit and a tutor perdie,
 A statesman profound, a critic immense,
 In short, a mere jumble of learning and sense;
 And yet of his talents though laudably vain,
 His own family arts he could never attain,

His father intending his fortune to build,
 In his youth would have taught him the trowel to
 wield,

But the mortar of discipline never would stick,
 For his skull was secur'd by a facing of brick;
 And with all his endeavours of patience and pain,
 The skill of his fire he could never attain.

His mother an housewife, neat, artful, and wise,
 Renown'd for her delicate biscuit and pies,
 Soon alter'd his studies, but flatt'ring his taste,
 From the raising of wall to the rearing of paste
 But all her instructions were fruitless and vain,
 The pyc-making myst'ry he ne'er could attain.

Yet true to his race, in his labours were seen,
 A jumble of both their professions I ween;
 For when his own genius he ventur'd to trust,
 His pies seem'd of brick, and his houses of crust,
 Then, good Mr. Tutor, pray be not so vain,
 Since your family arts you could never attain.

THE LIFE OF ARMSTRONG.

JOHN ARMSTRONG was born at Castleton, on the banks of the Liddal, in Roxburghshire, about 1709. His father and brother were ministers of Castleton, and highly respected for their piety and diligence in their pastoral duty.

After the ordinary course of school education, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh; where he studied the several branches of philosophy and medicine, under the different Professors, and took his degree in Physic, February 4. 1732, with much reputation. The subject of his inaugural dissertation was De Tabe purulenta.

Soon after his graduation he went to London, the proper place for a man of accomplishments like his, where he commenced Physician; but never attained any great extent of practice or eminence of popularity.

He was more successful as an author than a physician. In 1735, he published, without his name, a pamphlet, intituled An Essay for Abridging the Study of Physic; to which is added a Dialogue betwixt Hygeia, Mercury, and Pluto, relating to the Practice of Physic, as it is managed by a certain illustrious Society; and An Epistle from Usbeck the Persian to Joshua Ward, Esq. with a dedication: "To the Antiacademic Philosophers, to the Generous Despisers of the Schools, to the Deservedly Celebrated Joshua Ward, John Moor, and the rest of the numerous sect of Inspired Physicians." This fugitive piece contains much wit and pleasantry. In the dialogue he has caught the very spirit of Lucian.

In 1737, he published A Synopsis of the History and Cure of the Venereal Disease, 8vo. inscribed in an ingenious dedication to Dr. Alexander Stuart, as to "a person who had an indisputable right to judge severely of the performance presented to him."

This publication was soon followed by The Economy of Love, 4to, a poem, which has much merit; but, it must be confessed, is too strongly tinged with the licentiousness of Ovid. It appears by one of the "Cases on literary Property," that Mr. Millar the bookseller paid fifty guineas for the copy right of this poem, which was intended as a burlesque on some didactic writers. It has passed through many editions, more, it is to be feared to the advantage of the bookseller than the reader. It is but justice, however, to add, that his maturer judgment expunged many of the luxuriances of youthful fancy, in an edition "revised and corrected by the author," in 1768.

In 1741, he solicited the recommendation of Dr. Birch, to be appointed physician to the fleet, then going to the West-Indies.

In 1744, he published The Art of Preserving Health, a didactic poem, 8vo, which laid the foundation of his fame, and will be a lasting monument of his abilities.

In 1746, he was appointed one of the Physicians to the Hospital for Lame and Sick Soldiers behind Buckingham-House.

In 1751, he published his poem on Benevolence, in folio; and in 1753, "Taste, an Epistle to a Young Critic," 4to. In the same year an elegant ode was addressed to him by Dr. Theobald.

In 1758, he published Sketches or Essays on Various Subjects, by Launcelot Temple, Esq. 8vo. In this production, which possesses much humour and knowledge of the world, and which had a remarkably rapid sale, he is supposed to have been assisted by his friend Mr. Wilkes.

In 1760, he was appointed Physician to the army in Germany; where in 1761 he wrote a poem called Day, An Epistle to John Wilkes of Aylesbury, Esq. 4to, which was published (as the prefatory advertisement confesses) "without the knowledge or the consent of the author, or of the gentleman to whom it is addressed."

In this poem he wantonly hazarded a reflection on Churchill, which drew on him the vengeance of that severe satirist.

What news to-day?—I ask you not what rogue,
What paltry imp of fortune's now in vogue;
What forward blundering fool was last preferr'd,
By mere pretence distinguish'd from the herd:
With what new cheat the gaping town is smit,
What crazy scribbler reigns the present wit;

What stuff for winter the Two Booths have mixt,
What bouncing mimic gives a Roscius next.

In "The Journey," almost the last lines of poetry that Churchill lived to write, after referring those who hinted that he should "run his stock of genius out," to some contemporary writers who had obtained what he thought unmerited celebrity, he thus pointedly concludes the catalogue with Armstrong.

Let them with Armstrong, taking leave of sense,
Read musty lectures on Benevolence,
Or con the pages of his gaping Day,
Where all his former fame was thrown away;
Where all but barren labour was forgot,
And the vain stiffness of a letter'd Scot,
Let them with Armstrong pass the term of light,
But not one hour of darkness, when the night
Suspends this mortal coil, when memory wakes,
When for our past misdoings conscience takes
A deep revenge: when, by reflection led,
She draws his curtains, and looks comfort dead,
Let every muse be gone; in vain he turns
And tries to pray for sleep; an Ætna burns,
A more than Ætna in his coward breast;
And guilt, with vengeance arm'd, forbids him rest.
Though soft as plumage from young zephyr's wing,
His touch seems hard, and no relief can bring;
Ingratitude hath planted daggers there,
No good man can deserve, no brave man bear.

It must be acknowledged, that Armstrong himself afforded the original cause of offence; but the retaliation was unjustifiably severe. Armstrong was incapable of the crime with which he is charged; and the imputation of ingratitude will never obscure the character of a humane, benevolent, kindly affectioned man of genius, whose great offence was his attachment to the party in opposition to Mr. Wilkes and his friends.

It may be here observed, that nothing appears so fatal to the intercourse of friends, as a disagreement in politics. The intimacy which had subsisted between Armstrong and Mr. Wilkes, was certainly interrupted, if not dissolved, by the demon of party.

After the peace of Paris, in 1763, he quitted the army, returned to London, and resumed the practice of physic, in which he appears to have been chiefly wanting to his own success, by his indolence and inactivity.

He was a man of a very liberal turn of mind, of general erudition, with a large acquaintance among the learned of different professions; but he could not enter into connections with people that were not to his liking. He could not cultivate the acquaintances to be met with at tea-tables; he could not intrigue with nurses, nor associate with the various knots of pert, insipid, well-bred, impertinent, good humoured, malicious gossips, that are often found so useful to introduce a young physician into practice. He rather chose to employ his time at home in the indolent occupations of reading and study, or to spend an Attic evening in a select company of men of taste and learning.

In 1770, he published a collection of Miscellanies, in 2 vols. 8vo, containing the pieces he had formerly published separately, except the Economy of Love and Day, with Imitations of Shakspeare and Spenser, the Universal Almanack by Neuraddin Ali, The Forced Marriage, a tragedy, Sketches, &c.

In an advertisement to this collection, he says, he "has at last taken the trouble upon him to collect them, and to have them printed under his own inspection, a task that he had long avoided, and to which he would hardly have submitted himself at last, but for the fear of their being, sometime hereafter, exposed in a ragged, mangled condition, and loaded with more faults than they originally had, while [when] it might be impossible for him, by the change perhaps of one letter, to recover a whole period from the most contemptible nonsense. Along with such pieces as he had formerly offered to the public, he takes this opportunity of presenting it with several others; some of which had lain by him many years. What he has lost, and especially what he has destroyed, would probably enough have been better received by the great majority of readers than any thing he has published. But he never courted the public. He wrote chiefly for his own amusement; and because he found it an agreeable and innocent way of sometimes spending an idle hour. He has always most heartily despised the opinion of the mobility, from the lowest to the highest; and if it is true what he has sometimes been told, that the best judges are on his side, he desires no more in the article of fame and renown as a writer. If the best judges of this age honour him with their approbation, all the worst too of the next will favour him with theirs, when, by Heaven's grace, he'll be too far beyond the reach of their unmeaning praises, to receive any disgust from them."

In most of the Sketches or Essays, he has discovered a sound understanding, and a good taste; but he seems very fond of making use of some vulgarities of expression that belong peculiarly to the mobility. The Forced Marriage was written in 1758. It had been offered to Garrick, but refused by him. It is a performance in which there is much passion, but little judgment.

In 1771, he published A Short Ramble through some parts of France and Italy, by Launcelot Temple, Esq. 8vo.; and in 1773, a pamphlet in his own name, intituled, Medical Essays, 4to towards the conclusion of which, he accounts for his not having such extensive practice as some of his brethren, from his not being qualified to employ the usual means, from a ticklish state of spirits, and a distempered excess of sensibility. He complains much of the behaviour of some of his brethren, of the herd of critics, and particularly of the reviewers.

This work, which does not appear to have acquired much reputation, was the last which he gave to the world. He died September 7. 1779, in consequence, it is said, of a fall he received in stepping out of a coach; and, to the surprise of his friends, left behind him more than 3000 l. saved out of a very moderate income, arising principally from his half pay.

The following Verses on the Death of Dr. Armstrong, appeared in the "Gentleman's Magazine," for October 1779, dated Gray's Inn, September 10. and signed W. R.

Ye swains of Liddal, as you drive your sheep
To verdant pastures, or the russet steep,
If yet a muse on Liddal's banks remain,
For tuneful Armstrong wake the plaintive strain.
Though from you long, long from the limpid wave,
In which he lov'd his infant limbs to lave;
Long from the pool, where oft with mimic fly
He patient angled for the silver fry;
Yet were his manners artless as your own,
As plain as he the world had never known.
The world he scorn'd, for well he knew to scan
The crooked views of narrow-minded man.
Ye sons of Galen, though he lack'd not skill
Like you, by slow and secret means to kill,
He sought to save, he sought to heal the frame,
And breath'd Nepenthe in poetic flame.
From breezy summit, or fair op'ning lawn,
He bade his patients hail the cheerful dawn;
Their villas build, wide from the marshy mead,
But chief where bees on fragrant wild thyme feed:
As death itself avoid the smoky tower;
Resist the enfeebling luxury of down:
Far from the breast all rankling cares expel,
And there invite content and hope to dwell, &c.

No edition of his Miscellanies has been called for since his death; but his Art of Preserving Health, has been frequently reprinted, and with his other poetical pieces, except The Economy of Love, was received into the edition of "the English Poets," 1790.

The character of Armstrong seems to have been very amiable and respectable. It is to his honour that he was the intimate friend of Thomson, and his coadjutor in the composition of his admirable "Castle of Indolence." Stanza lxxiii. was written by Armstrong. "Though the Doctor," Thomson writes his friend Paterfon, "increases in his business, he does not decrease in spleen; but there is a certain kind of spleen that is both humane and agreeable, like Jaques in the play." Thomson has described his absent moods in the "Castle of Indolence." Stanza x.

With him was sometimes join'd in silent walk,
(Profoundly silent, for they never spoke)
One shyer still, who, quite detested talk,
Oft stung by spleen, at once away he broke
To groves of pine, and broad o'ershadowing oak,
There inly thrill'd, he wander'd all alone,
And on himself his pensive fury woke;
He never'd utter'd word, save when first shone
The glittering star of eve—thank heaven, the day is done.

He lived also in habits of intimacy with Grainger, Sir John Pringle, Mr. Fuseli, and other men of wit and learning.

"I was early acquainted with Dr. Armstrong," the late worthy Dr. Cuming of Dorchester writes Mr. Nichols, "have often visited him at his lodgings, knew many of his intimates, have met him in company, but from my having visited the Metropolis so seldom since my residence in Dorsetshire, I was not so well acquainted with him as I should otherwise have been, or wished to be. He always appeared to me (and I was confirmed in that opinion by that of his most intimate friends) a man of learning and genius, of considerable abilities in his profession, of great benevolence and goodness of heart, fond of associating with men of parts and genius, but indolent and inactive, and therefore totally unqualified to employ the means that usually lead to medical employment, or elbow his way through a crowd of competitors."

As a Poet, his compositions have great inequalities, some of them being possessed of every requisite to be sought after in the most perfect composition, while others can hardly be considered as superior to the productions of mediocrity. Much of the merit of his Epistles to Eumenes, to a Young Critic, and to John Wilkes, Esq. consists in a spirited conciseness, a lively representation of characters, and a certain sprightliness and turn of wit, which are always pleasing. But they seldom rise into a high strain of poetry, and are sometimes deficient in grace and ease. The Epistle to Eumenes, is rather too satirical for the subject. In the Epistle to Taste, he is severely satirical on all pretenders to wit; but he does not treat the subject in so masterly, nor in so poetical a manner as Pope had done before him. In his Day, he seems not to have intended rising much higher than prose put into numbers. His Winter Piece, in imitation of Shakspeare, has more elevation, but is a turgid and inflated performance.

His Art of Preserving Health, on account of the reputation it has so justly acquired, precludes all criticism. It is of the highest species of didactic poetry, and of a merit and character so great, as to rank with the compositions of Lucretius, Horace, Virgil, Vida, Boileau, Akenfide, Dyer, and Grainger. Akenfide has attempted the most rich and poetical form of didactic writing in his "Pleasures of Imagination," and in several parts, succeeded happily, and displayed much genius. Armstrong has not aimed at so high a strain as Akenfide; but he is more equal, and maintains throughout a chaste and correct elegance.

"To describe so difficult a thing gracefully and poetically," says Dr. Warton, in his "Reflections on Didactic Poetry," as the effects of a distemper on the human body, was reserved for Dr. Armstrong, who accordingly hath nobly executed, at the end of his third book of his Art of Preserving Health, where he hath given us that pathetic account of the Sweating Sickness. There is a classical correctness and closeness of style in this poem, that are truly admirable; and the subject is raised and adorned by numberless poetical images."

"Of all the poetical performances on this subject, says Dr. Mackenzie in his "History of Health," that have come to my hands, Dr. Armstrong's Art of Preserving Health is by far the best. To quote every charming description and beautiful passage of this poem, one must transcribe the whole. We cannot, however, expect new rules where the principal design was to raise and warm the heart into a compliance with the solid precepts of the ancients, which he has enforced with great strength and elegance. And, upon the whole, he has convinced us by his own example, that we ought not to blame antiquity for acknowledging

"One power of physic, melody, and song."

THE ART OF PRESERVING HEALTH. 1774. 4

IN FOUR BOOKS.

BOOK I.

AIR.

DAUGHTER of Pæon, queen of every joy,
Hygeia *; whose indulgent smile sustains
The various race luxuriant nature pours,
And on th' immortal essences bestows
Immortal youth; auspicious, O descend!
Thou cheerful guardian of the rolling year,
Whether thou wanton'st on the western gale,
Or shak'st the rigid pinions of the north,
Diffusest life and vigour through the tracts
Of air, through earth, and ocean's deep domain.
When through the blue serenity of heaven
Thy power approaches, all the wasteful host
Of pain and sickness, squalid and deform'd,
Confounded sink into the lothesome gloom,
Where in deep Erebus involv'd the fiends
Grow more profane. Whatever shapes of death,
Shook from the hideous chambers of the globe,
Swarm through the shudd'ring air: whatever plagues
Or meagre famine breeds, or with flow wings
Rise from the putrid watry element,
The damp waste forest, motionless and rank,
That smothers earth and all the breathless winds,
Or the vile carnage of th' inhuman field:
Whatever baneful breathes the rotten south;
Whatever ills th' extremes or sudden change
Of cold and hot, or moist and dry produce;
They fly thy pure effulgence: they and all
The secret poisons of avenging heaven,
And all the pale tribes halting in the train
Of vice and heedless pleasure; or if aught
The comet's glare amid the burning sky,
Mournful eclipse, or planets ill-combin'd
Portend disastrous to the vital world;
Thy salutary power averts their rage,
Averts the general bane: and but for thee
Nature would sicken, nature soon would die.

* Hygeia, the goddess of health, was, according to the genealogy of the heathen deities, the daughter of Æsculapius; who, as well as Asclepius, was distinguished by the name of Pæon.

Without thy cheerful active energy

No rapture swells the breast, no poet sings,
No more the maids of Helicon delight.
Come then with me, O goddess heavenly gay!
Begin the song; and let it sweetly flow,
And let it wisely teach thy wholesome laws:
"How best the sickle fabric to support
"Of mortal man; in healthful body how
"A healthful mind the longest to maintain."
'Tis hard, in such a strife of rules, to choose
The best, and those of most extensive use;
Harder in clear and animated song
Dry philosophic precepts to convey.
Yet with thy aid the secret wilds I trace
Of nature, and with daring steps proceed
Through paths the muses never trod before.

Nor should I wander doubtful of my way,
Had I the lights of that sagacious mind
Which taught to check the pestilential fire,
And quell the deadly Python of the Nile.
O thou belov'd by all the graceful arts,
Thou long the fav'rite of the healing powers,
Indulge, O mead! a well-design'd essay,
Howe'er imperfect; and permit that I
My little knowledge with my country share,
Till you the rich Asclepian stores unlock,
And with new graces dignify the theme.

Ye who amid this feverish world would wear
A body free of pain, of cares a mind;
Fly the rank city, shun its turbid air;
Breathe not the chaos of eternal smoke
And volatile corruption, from the dead.
The dying, sick'ning, and the living world
Exhal'd, to fully heaven's transparent dome
With dim mortality. It is not air
That from a thousand lungs reeks back to thine,
Sated with exhalations rank and fell,
The spoil of dunghills, and the putrid thaw
Of nature; when from shape and texture she
Relapses into fighting elements:
It is not air, but floats a nauseous mass
Of all obscene, corrupt, offensive things.
Much moisture hurts; but here a fardid bath,
With oily rancour fraught, relaxes more
The solid frame than simple moisture can,

Besides, immur'd in many a fullen bay
 That never felt the freshness of the breeze.
 This slumb'ring deep remains, and ranker grows
 With sickly rest: and (though the lungs abhor
 To drink the dun fuliginous abyss)
 Did not the acid vigour of the mine,
 Roll'd from so many thund'ring chimneys, tame
 The putrid steams that overwarm the sky;
 This caustic venom would perhaps corrode
 Those tender cells that draw the vital air,
 In vain with all their unctuous rills bedew'd;
 Or by the drunken venous tubes, that yawn
 In countless pores o'er all the pervious skin
 Imbib'd, would poison the balsamic blood,
 And rouse the heart to every fever's rage.
 While yet you breathe, away; the rural wilds
 Invite; the mountains call you, and the vales;
 The woods, the streams, and each ambrosial breeze
 That fans the ever undulating sky;
 A kindly sky! whose soft'ring power regales
 Man, beast, and all the vegetable reign.
 Find then some woodland scene where nature
 smiles

Benign, where all her honest children thrive,
 To us there wants not many a happy seat!
 Look round the smiling land, such numbers rise
 We hardly fix, bewilder'd in our choice,
 See where enthron'd in adamantine state,
 Proud of her bards, imperial Windsor sits;
 There choose thy seat, in some aspiring grove
 Fast by the slowly-winding Thames; or where Broader she laves fair Richmond's green retreats, (Richmond that sees an hundred villas rise Rural or gay). O! from the summer's rage
 O! wrap me in the friendly gloom that hides
 Umbrageous Ham!—But, if the busy town
 Attract thee still to toil for power or gold,
 Sweetly thou mayst thy vacant hours possess
 In Hampstead, courted by the western wind;
 Or Greenwich, waving o'er the winding flood;
 Or lose the world amid the sylvan wilds
 Of Dulwich, yet by barbarous arts unspoil'd.
 Green rise the Kentish hills in cheerful air;
 But on the marshy plains that Lincoln spreads
 Build not, nor rest too long thy wand'ring feet.
 For on a rustic throne of dewy turf,
 With baneful fogs her aching temples bound,
 Quartana there presides; a meagre fiend
 Begot by Eurus, when his brutal force
 Compress'd the slothful naiad of the fens.
 From such a mixture sprung, this fitful pest
 With feverish blasts subdues the sickning hand:
 Cold tremors come, with mighty love of rest,
 Convulsive yawnings, lassitude, and pains
 That sting the burden'd brows, fatigue the loins,
 And rack the joints and every torpid limb;
 Then parching heat succeeds, till copious sweats
 O'erflow: a short relief from former ills.
 Beneath repeated shocks the wretches pine;
 The vigour sinks, the habit melts away;
 The cheerful, pure, and animated bloom
 Dies from the face, with squalid atrophy
 Devour'd, in fallow melancholy clad.
 And oft the forcerefs, in her fated wrath,
 Relinquish them to the furies of her train;

The bloated hydrops, and the yellow fiend
 Ting'd with her own accumulated gall.

In quest of sites, avoid the mournful plain
 Where osiers thrive, and trees that love the lake;
 Where many lazy muddy rivers flow:
 Nor for the wealth that all the Indies roll
 Fix near the marshy margin of the main,
 For from the humid soil and wat'ry reign
 Eternal vapours rise; the spongy air
 For ever weeps: or, turgid with the weight
 Of waters, pours a sounding deluge down,
 Skies such as these let every mortal shun
 Who dreads the dropsy, palsy, or the gout,
 Tertian, corrosive scurvy, or moist catarrh:
 Or any other injury that grows
 From raw-spun fibres idle and unstrung,
 Skin ill-perspiring, and the purple flood
 In languid eddies loitering into phlegm.

Yet not alone from humid skies we pine;
 For air may be too dry. The subtle heaven,
 That winnows into dust the blasted downs,
 Bare and extended wide without a stream,
 Too fast imbibes th' attenuated lymph,
 Which, by the surface, from the blood exhales.
 The lungs grow rigid, and with toil essay
 Their flexible vibrations; or, inflam'd,
 Their tender ever-moving structure thaws.
 Spoil'd of its limpid vehicle, the blood
 A mass of lees remains, a drossy tide
 That slow as Lethe wanders through the veins:
 Unactive in the services of life,
 Unfit to lead its pitchy current through
 The secret mazy channels of the brain.
 The melancholic fiend (that worst despair
 Of physic), hence the rust-complexion'd man
 Pursues, whose blood is dry, whose fibres gain
 Too stretch'd a tone: and hence in climes adust
 So sudden tumults seize the trembling nerves,
 And burning fevers glow with double rage.

Fly, if you can, these violent extremes
 Of air: the wholesome is nor moist nor dry.
 But as the power of choosing is deny'd
 To half mankind, a further task ensues;
 How best to mitigate these fell extremes,
 How breathe, unhurt, the withering element,
 Or hazy atmosphere: though custom moulds
 To ev'ry clime the soft Promethean clay;
 And he who first the fogs of Essex breath'd
 (So kind is native air), may in the fens
 Of Essex from inveterate ills revive,
 At pure Montpellier or Bermuda caught.
 But if the raw and oozy heaven offend,
 Correct the soil, and dry the sources up
 Of watery exhalation: wide and deep
 Conduct your trenches through the quaking bog;
 Solicitous, with all your winding arts,
 Betray th' unwilling lake into the stream;
 And weed the forest, and invoke the winds
 To break the toils where strangled vapours lie;
 Or through the thickets send the crackling flames.
 Meantime, at home, with cheerful fires dispel
 The humid air: and let your table smoke
 With solid roast or bak'd; or what the herds
 Of tamer breed supply; or what the wilds
 Yield to the toilsome pleasures of the chase.

Generous your wine, the boast of rip'ning year;
 But frugal be your cups: the languid frame,
 Vapid and sunk from yesterday's debauch,
 Shrinks from the cold embrace of watery heavens.
 But neither these, nor all Apollo's arts,
 Disarm the dangers of the drooping sky,
 Unless with exercise and manly toil
 You brace your nerves, and spur the lagging blood.
 The fatt'ning clime let all the sons of ease
 Avoid; if indolence would wish to live,
 Go, yawn and loiter out the long flow year
 In fairer skies. If droughty regions parch
 The skin and lungs, and bake the thickening blood;
 Deep in the waving forest choose your seat,
 Where fuming trees refresh the thirsty air;
 And wake the fountains from their secret beds,
 And into lakes dilate the rapid stream.
 Here spread your gardens wide; and let the cool,
 The moist relaxing vegetable store,
 Prevail in each repast: your food supplied
 By bleeding life, be gently wasted down,
 By soft decoction, and a mellowing heat,
 To liquid balm; or, if the solid mass
 You choose, tormented in the boiling wave;
 That through the thirsty channels of the blood
 A smooth diluted chyle may ever flow.
 The fragrant dairy, from its cool recess,
 Its nectar acid, or benign will pour,
 To drown your thirst; or let the mantling bowl
 Of keen Sherbet the fickle taste relieve.
 For with the viscous blood the simple stream
 Will hardly mingle; and fermented cups
 Oft dissipate more moisture than they give.
 Yet when pale seasons rise, or winter rolls
 His horrors o'er the world, thou mayst indulge
 In feasts more genial, and impatient broach
 The mellow cask. Then, too, the scourging air
 Provokes to keener toils than sultry droughts
 Allow. But rarely we such skies blaspheme.
 Steep'd in continual rains, or with raw fogs
 Bedew'd, our seasons droop; incumbent still
 A ponderous heaven o'erwhelms the sinking soul.
 Lab'ring with storms, in heapy mountains rise
 Th' imbattled clouds, as if the Stygian shades
 Had left the dungeon of eternal night,
 Till black with thunder all the south descends.
 Scarce in a showerless day the heavens indulge
 Our melting clime; except the baleful east
 Withers the tender spring, and sourly checks
 The fancy of the year. Our fathers talk
 Of summers, balmy airs, and skies serene.
 Good heaven! for what unexpiated crimes
 This dismal change! The brooding elements
 Do they, your powerful ministers of wrath,
 Prepare some fierce exterminating plague?
 Or is it fix'd in the decrees above,
 That lofty Albion melt into the main!
 Indulgent nature, O dissolve this gloom!
 Bind in eternal adamant the winds
 That drown or wither: give the genial west
 To breathe, and, in its turn, the sprightly north:
 And may once more the circling seasons rule
 The year; nor mix in every monstrous day.
 Meantime, the moist malignity to shun
 Of burden'd skies; mark where the dry champaign

Swells into cheerful hills; where marjoram
 And thyme, the love of bees, perfume the air;
 And where the * cynorrhodon with the rose
 For fragrance vies; for in the thirsty soil
 Most fragrant breathe the aromatic tribes.
 There bid thy roofs, high on the basking steep,
 Ascend, there light thy hospitable fires.
 And let them see the winter morn arise,
 The summer evening blushing in the west;
 While with umbrageous oaks the ridge behind
 O'erhung, defends you from the blust'ring north,
 And bleak affliction of the peevish east.
 O! when the growling winds contend, and all
 The sounding forest fluctuates in the storm;
 To sink in warm repose, and hear the din
 Howl o'er the steady battlements, delights
 Above the luxury of vulgar sleep.
 The murmuring rivulet, and the hoarser strain
 Of waters rushing o'er the slippery rocks,
 Will nightly lull you to ambrosial rest.
 To please the fancy is no trifling good,
 Where health is studied; for whatever moves
 The mind with calm delight, promotes the just
 And natural movements of the harmonious frame.
 Besides, the sportive brook for ever shakes
 The trembling air; that floats from hill to hill,
 From vale to mountain, with incessant change
 Of purest element, refreshing still
 Your airy seat, and uninfected gods.
 Chiefly for this I praise the man who builds
 High on the breezy ridge, whose lofty sides
 Th' ethereal deep with endless billows chafes.
 His purer mansion nor contagious years
 Shall reach, nor deadly putrid airs annoy.
 But may no fogs, from lake or fenny plain,
 Involve my hill! And wheresoe'er you build;
 Whether on sun-burnt Epsom, or the plains
 Wash'd by the silent Lee; in Chelsea low,
 Or high Blackheath, with wint'ry winds assail'd;
 Dry be your house: but airy more than warm.
 Else every breath of ruder wind will strike
 Your tender body through with rapid pains;
 Fierce coughs will tease you, hoarseness bind your voice,
 Or moist Gravedo load your aching brows.
 These to defy, and all the fates that dwell
 In cloister'd air, tainted with steaming life,
 Let lofty ceilings grace your ample rooms;
 And still at azure noontide may your dome
 At every window drink the liquid sky.
 Need we the sunny situation here,
 And theatres open to the south commend?
 Here, where the morning's misty breath infests
 More than the torrid noon: how sickly grow,
 How pale the plants in those ill-fated vales,
 That, circled round with the gigantic heap
 Of mountains, never felt, nor ever hope
 To feel the genial vigour of the sun!
 While on the neighbouring hill the rose inflames
 The verdant spring; in virgin beauty blows
 The tender lily, languishingly sweet;
 O'er every hedge the wanton woodbine roves,

* The wild rose, or that which grows on the common briar.

And autumn ripens in the summer's ray.
Nor less the warmer living tribes demand
The soft'ring sun : whose energy divine
Dwells not in mortal fire ; whose gen'rous heat
Glow through the mass of grosser elements,
And kindles into life the pond'rous spheres.
Cheer'd by thy kind invigorating warmth,
We court thy beams, great majesty of day !
If not the soul, the regent of this world,
First-born of heaven, and only less than God !

BOOK II.

DIET.

ENOUGH of air. A desert subject now,
Rougher and wilder, rises to my sight.
A barren waste, where not a garland grows
To bind the muse's brow ; not ev'n a proud
Stupendous solitude frowns o'er the heath,
To rouse a noble horror in the soul :
But rugged paths fatigue, and error leads
Through endless labyrinths the devious feet.
Farewell, ethereal fields ! the humbler arts
Of life ; the table, and the homely gods,
Demand my song, Elysian gales adieu !

The blood, the fountain whence the spirits flow,
The generous stream that waters every part,
And motion, vigour, and warm life conveys
To every particle that moves or lives ;
This vital fluid, through unnumber'd tubes
Pour'd by the heart, and to the heart again
Refund'd ; scourg'd for ever round and round ;
Enrag'd with heat and toil, at last forgets
Its balmy nature ; virulent and thin
It grows ; and now, but that a thousand gates
Are open to its flight, it would destroy
The parts it cherish'd and repair'd before.
Besides, the flexible and tender tubes
Melt in the mildest most nectareous tide
That ripening nature rolls ; as in the stream
Its crumbling banks ; but what the vital force
Of plastic fluids hourly batters down,
That very force those plastic particles
Rebuild : so mutable the state of man.
For this the watchful appetite was giv'n,
Daily with fresh materials to repair
This unavoidable expence of life,
This necessary waste of flesh and blood.
Hence the concoctive powers, with various art,
Subdue the cruder aliments to chyle ;
The chyle to blood ; the foamy purple tide
To liquors, which through finer arteries
To different parts their winding course pursue ;
To try new changes, and new forms put on,
Or for the public, or some private use.

Nothing so foreign, but th' athletic hind
Can labour into blood. The hungry meal
Alone he fears, or aliments too thin ;
By violent powers too easily subdu'd,
Too soon expell'd. His daily labour thaws,
To friendly chyle, the most rebellious mass
That salt can harden, or the smoke of years ;
Nor does his gorge the luscious bacon rue,
Nor that which Cestria sends, tenacious paste
Of solid milk. But ye of softer clay,

Infirm and delicate ! and ye, who waste
With pale and bloated sloth the tedious day !
Avoid the stubborn aliment, avoid
The full repast ; and let sagacious age
Grow wiser, lesson'd by the dropping teeth.

Half subtiliz'd to chyle, the liquid food
Readiest obeys th' assimilating pow'rs ;
And soon the tender vegetable mass
Relents : and soon the young of those that tread
The steadfast earth, or cleave the green abyss,
Or pathless sky. And if the steer must fall,
In youth and sanguine vigour let him die ;
Nor stay till rigid age, or heavy ails,
Absolve him ill requited from the yoke.
Some with high forage, and luxuriant ease,
Indulge the veteran ox ; but wiser thou,
From the bald mountain or the barren downs,
Expect the flocks by frugal nature fed ;
A race of purer blood, with exercise
Refin'd, and scanty fare : for, old or young,
The stall'd are never healthy ; nor the cramm'd.
Not all the culinary arts can tame
To wholesome food the abominable growth
Of rest and gluttony ; the prudent taste
Rejects like bane such lothesome lusciousness.
The languid stomach curses even the pure
Delicious fat, and all the race of oil :
For more the oily aliments relax
Its feeble tone ; and with the eager lymph,
Fond to incorporate with all it meets,
Coily they mix, and shun with slippery wiles
The woo'd embrace. Th' irresoluble oil,
So gentle late and blandishing, in floods
Of rancid bile o'erflows : what tumults hence,
What horrors rise, were nauseous to relate.
Choose leaner viands, ye whose jovial make
Too fast the gummy nutriment imbibes :
Choose sober meals ; and rouse to active life
Your cumbrous clay ; nor on th' inscebling down,
Irresolute, protract the morning hours.
But let the man whose bones are thinly clad,
With cheerful ease and succulent repast,
Improve his habit if he can ; for each
Extreme departs from perfect sanity.

I could relate what table this demands,
Or that complexion ; what the various powers
Of various foods : but fifty years would roll,
And fifty more, before the tale were done.
Besides, there often lurks some nameless, strange,
Peculiar thing ; nor on the skin display'd,
Felt in the pulse, nor in the habit seen ;
Which finds a poison in the food that most
The temperature affects. There are, whose blood
Impetuous rages through the turgid veins,
Who better bear the fiery fruits of Ind
Than the moist melon, or pale cucumber.
Of chilly nature others fly the board
Supply'd with slaughter, and the vernal powers
For cooler, kinder, sustenance implore.
Some even the generous nutriment detest,
Which, in the shell, the sleeping embryo rears.
Some, more unhappy still, repent the gifts
Of Pales ; soft, delicious, and benign :
The balmy quintessence of every flower,
And every grateful herb that decks the spring ;

The soft'ring dew of tender sprouting life;
 The best refection of declining age;
 The kind restorative of those who lie
 Half dead and panting, from the doubtful strife
 Of nature struggling in the grasp of death.
 Try all the bounties of this fertile globe,
 There is not such a salutary food
 As suits with every stomach. But (except,
 Amid the mingled mass of fish and fowl,
 And boil'd and bak'd, you hesitate by which
 You sunk oppress'd, or whether not by all);
 Taught by experience, soon you may discern
 What pleases, what offends. Avoid the cates
 That lull the sicken'd appetite too long;
 Or heave with sev'rish flushings all the face,
 Burn in the palms, and parch the roughning tongue;
 Or much diminish, or too much increase
 Th' expence which nature's wise economy,
 Without or waste or avarice, maintains.
 Such cates abjur'd, let prowling hunger loose,
 And bid the curious palate roam at will;
 They scarce can err amid the various stores
 That burst the teeming entrails of the world.

Led by sagacious taste, the ruthless king
 Of beasts on blood and slaughter only lives;
 The tyger, form'd alike to cruel meals,
 Would at the manger starve: of milder feeds
 The generous horse to herbage and to grain
 Confines his wish; though fabling Greece resound
 The Thracian steeds with human carnage wild.
 Prompted by instinct's never-erring power,
 Each creature knows its proper aliment;
 But man, th' inhabitant of every clime,
 With all the commoners of nature feeds.
 Directed, bounded, by this power within,
 Their cravings are well-aim'd: voluptuous man
 Is by superior faculties misled;
 Misled from pleasure, even in quest of joy.
 Sated with nature's boons, what thousands seek,
 With dishes tortur'd from their native taste,
 And mad variety, to spur beyond
 Its wiser will the jaded appetite!
 Is this for pleasure? Learn a juster taste;
 And know that temperance is true luxury.
 Or is it pride? Pursue some nobler aim,
 Dismiss your parasites, who praise for hire;
 And earn the fair esteem of honest men,
 Whose praise is fame. Form'd of such clay as yours,
 The sick, the needy shiver at your gates.
 Even modest want may bless your hand unseen,
 Though hush'd in patient wretchedness at home.
 Is there no virgin, grac'd with every charm
 But that which binds the mercenary vow?
 No youth of genius, whose neglected bloom,
 Unfoster'd, sickens in the barren shade?
 No worthy man, by fortune's random blows,
 Or by a heart too generous and humane,
 Constrain'd to leave his happy natal seat,
 And sigh for wants more bitter than his own?
 There are, while human miseries abound,
 A thousand ways to waste superfluous wealth,
 Without one fool or flatterer at your board,
 Without one hour of sickness or disgust.
 But other ills th' ambiguous feast pursue,
 Besides provoking the lascivious taste.

Such various foods, though harmless each alone,
 Each other violate; and oft we see
 What strife is brew'd, and what pernicious bane,
 From combinations of innoxious things.
 Th' unbounded taste I mean not to confine
 To hermit's diet needlessly severe,
 But would you long the sweets of health enjoy,
 Or husband pleasure, at one impious meal
 Exhaust not half the bounties of the year,
 Of every realm. It matters not, meanwhile,
 How much to-morrow differ from to-day;
 So far indulge: 'tis fit, besides, that man,
 To change obnoxious, be to change inur'd.
 But stay the curious appetite, and taste
 With caution fruits you never tried before.
 For want of use the kindest aliment
 Sometimes offends; while custom tames the rage
 Of poison to mild amity with life.

So Heav'n has form'd us to the general taste
 Of all its gifts; so custom has improv'd
 This bent of nature; that few simple foods,
 Of all that earth, or air, or ocean yield,
 But by excess offend. Beyond the sense
 Of light refection, at the genial board
 Indulge not often; nor protract the feast
 To dull satiety; till soft and slow
 A drowsy death creeps on, th' expansive soul
 Oppress'd, and smother'd the celestial fire.
 The stomach, urg'd beyond its active tone,
 Hardly to nutrimental chyle subdues
 The softest food: unfinish'd and deprav'd,
 The chyle, in all its future wanderings, owns
 Its turbid fountain; not by purer streams
 So to be clear'd, but foulness will remain;
 To sparkling wine what ferment can exalt
 Th' unripen'd grape? Or what mechanic skill,
 From the crude ore, can spin the ductile gold?
 Gross riot treasures up a wealthy fund
 Of plagues: but more immedicable ills
 Attend the lean extreme. For physic knows
 How to disburden the too tumid veins,
 Even how to ripen the half-labour'd blood:
 But to unlock the elemental tubes,
 Collaps'd and shrunk with long inanity,
 And with balsamic nutriment repair
 The dried and worn-out habit, were to bid
 Old age grow green, and wear a second spring;
 Or the tall ash, long ravish'd from the soil,
 Through wither'd veins imbibe the vernal dew.
 When hunger calls, obey; nor often wait
 Till hunger sharpen to corrosive pain:
 For the keen appetite will feast beyond
 What nature well can bear; and one extreme
 Ne'er without danger meets its own reverse.
 Too greedily th' exhausted veins absorb
 The recent chyle, and load enfeebled powers
 Oft to th' extinction of the vital flame.
 To the pale cities, by the firm-set sage
 And famine humbled, may this verse be borne;
 And hear, ye hardiest sons that Albion breeds,
 Long tofs'd and famish'd on the wint'ry main;
 The war shook off, or hospitable shore
 Attain'd, with temperance bear the shock of joy;
 Nor crown with festive rites th' auspicious day:
 Such feast might prove more fatal than the waves,

Than war or famine. While the vital fire
Burns feebly, heap not the green fuel on;
But prudently foment the wandering spark
With what the soonest feeds its kindred touch:
Be frugal ev'n of that: a little give
At first; that kindled, add a little more;
Till, by deliberate nourishing, the flame
Reviv'd, with all its wonted vigour glows.

But though the two (the full and the jejune)
Extremes have each their vice; it much avails
Ever with gentle tide to ebb and flow
From this to that: so nature learns to bear
Whatever chance or headlong appetite
May bring. Besides, a meagre day subdues
The cruder clods by sloth or luxury
Collected, and unloads the wheels of life.
Sometimes a coy aversion to the feast
Comes on, while yet no blacker omen lours;
Then is a time to shun the tempting board,
Were it your natal or your nuptial day.
Perhaps a fast so seasonable starves
The latent seeds of woe, which, rooted once,
Might cost you labour. But the day return'd
Of festal luxury, the wise indulge
Most in the tender vegetable breed:
Then chiefly, when the summer beams inflame
The brazen heavens; or angry Sirius sheds
A feverish taint through the still gulf of air.
The moist cool viands then, and flowing cup,
From the fresh dairy-virgin's liberal hand
Will save your head from harm, though round the world

The dreaded * caufos roll his wasteful fires.
Pale humid winter loves the generous board,
The meal more copious, and a warmer fare;
And longs, with old wood and old wine, to cheer
His quaking heart. The season's which divide
Th' empires of heat and cold (by neither claim'd, Influenc'd by both), a middle regimen
Impose. Through autumn's languishing domain
Descending, nature by degrees invites
To glowing luxury. But from the depth
Of winter, when th' invigorated year
Emerges; when Favonius flush'd with love,
Toysful and young, in every breeze descends
More warm and wanton on his kindling bride;
Then, shepherds, then begin to spare your flocks;
And learn, with wise humanity, to check
The lust of blood. Now pregnant earth commits
A various offspring to th' indulgent sky:
Now bounteous nature feeds with lavish hand
The prone creation; yields what once suffic'd
Their dainty sovereign, when the world was young;

Ere yet the barbarous thirst of blood had seiz'd
The human breast.—Each rolling month matures
The food that suits it most; so does each clime.

Far in the horrid realms of winter, where
Th' establish'd ocean heaps a monstrous waste
Of shining rocks and mountains to the pole;
There lives a hardy race, whose plainest wants
Relentless earth, their cruel stepmother
Regards not. On the waste of iron fields,

* The burning fever.

Untam'd, untractable, no harvests wave:
Pomona hates them, and the clownish god
Who tends the garden. In this frozen world
Such cooling gifts were vain: a fitter meal
Is earn'd with ease; for here the fruitful spawn
Of ocean swarms, and heaps their genial board
With generous fare and luxury profuse.
These are their bread, the only bread they know;
These, and their willing slave the deer that crops
The shrubby herbage on their meagre hills.
Girt by the burning zone, not thus the south
Her swarthy sons in either Ind, maintains:
Or thirsty Libya; from whose fervid loins
The lion bursts, and every fiend that roams
Th' affrighted wilderness. The mountain herd,
Aust and dry, no sweet repast affords:
Nor does the tepid main such kinds produce,
So perfect, so delicious, as the shoals
Of icy Zembla. Rashly where the blood
Brews feverish frays; where scarce the tubes sustain
Its tumid fervour and tempestuous course;
Kind nature tempts not to such gifts as these.
But here in livid ripeness melts the grape:
Here, finish'd by invigorating suns,
Through the green shade the golden orange glows;
Spontaneous here the turgid melon yields
A generous pulp: the coco swells on high
With milky riches; and in horrid mail
The crisp ananas wraps its poignant sweets.
Earth's vaunted progeny: in ruder air
Too coy to flourish, even too proud to live;
Or hardly rais'd by artificial fire
To vapid life. Here with a mother's smile
Glad Amalthea pours her copious horn.
Here buxom Ceres reigns: Th' autumnal sea
In boundless billows fluctuates o'er their plains.
What suits the climate best, what suits the men,
Nature professes most, and most the taste
Demands. The fountain, edg'd with racy wine
Or acid fruit, bedews their thirsty souls.
The breeze eternal breathing round their limbs
Supports in else intolerable air:
While the cool palm, the plaintain, and the grove
That waves on gloomy Lebanon, assuage
The torrid hell that beams upon their heads.

Now come, ye Naiads, to the fountains lead;
Now let me wander through your gelid reign.
I burn to view th' enthusiastic wilds
By mortal else untrod. I hear the din
Of waters thund'ring o'er the ruin'd cliffs.
With holy reverence I approach the rocks
Whence glide the streams renown'd in ancient song.
Here from the desert down the rumbling steep
First springs the Nile; here bursts the sounding Po
In angry waves; Euphrates hence devolves
A mighty flood to water half the east;
And there, in Gothic solitude reclin'd,
The cheerless Tanais pours his hoary urn.
What solemn twilight! What stupendous shades
Enrap these infant floods! Through every nerve
A sacred horror thrills, a pleasing fear
Glides o'er my frame. The forest deepens round;
And more gigantic still th' impending trees
Stretch their extravagant arms athwart the gloom.
Are these the confines of some fairy world?

A land of genii? Say, beyond these wilds
What unknown nations? If indeed beyond
Aught habitable lies. And whither leads,
To what strange regions, or of bliss or pain,
That subterraneous way? Propitious maids,
Conduct me, while with fearful steps I tread
This trembling ground. The task remains to sing
Your gifts (so Pæon, so the powers of health
Command) to praise your crystal element;
The chief ingredient in heaven's various works;
Whose flexile genius sparkles in the gem,
Grows firm in oak, and fugitive in wine;
The vehicle, the source, of nutriment
And life, to all that vegetate or live.

O comfortable streams! With eager lips
And trembling hand the languid thirsty quaff
New life in you; fresh vigour fills their veins,
No warmer cups the rural ages knew;
None warmer sought the fires of human kind.
Happy in temperate peace! Their equal days
Felt not th' alternate fits of feverish mirth,
And sick dejection. Still serene and pleas'd
They knew no pains but what the tender soul
With pleasure yields to, and would ne'er forget.
Blest with divine immunity from ails,
Long centuries they liv'd; their only fate
Was ripe old age, and rather sleep than death.
Oh! could those worthies from the world of gods
Return to visit their degenerate sons,
How would they scorn the joys of modern time,
With all our art and toil improv'd to pain!
Too happy they! but wealth brought luxury,
And luxury on sloth begot disease.

Learn temperance, friends; and her without disdain

The choice of water. Thus the * Coan sage
Opin'd, and thus the learn'd of every school.
What least of foreign principles partakes
Is best: The lightest then; what bears the touch
Of fire the least, and soonest mounts in air;
The most insipid; the most void of smell.
Such the rude mountain from his horrid sides
Pours down; such waters in the sandy vale
For ever boil, alike of winter frosts
And summer's heat secure. The crystal stream,
Through rocks resounding, or for many a mile
O'er the chaf'd pebbles hurl'd, yields wholesome, pure

And mellow draughts; except when winter thaws,
And half the mountains melt into the tide.
Though thirst were e'er so resolute, avoid
The fordid lake, and all such drowsy floods
As fill from Lethe Belgia's slow canals;
(With rest corrupt, with vegetation green;
Squalid with generation, and the birth
Of little monsters); till the power of fire
Has from profane embraces disengag'd
The violated lymph. The virgin stream
In boiling wastes its finer soul in air.

Nothing like simple element dilutes
The food, or gives the chyle so soon to fow.
But where the stomach indolent and cold
Toys with its duty, animate with wine

Th' insipid stream: Though golden Ceres yields
A more voluptuous, a more sprightly draught;
Perhaps more active. Wine unmix'd, and all
The gluey floods that from the vex'd abyss
Of fermentation spring; with spirit fraught,
And furious with intoxicating fire;
Retard concoction, and preserve unthaw'd
Th' embodied mass. You see what countless years,
Embalm'd in fiery quintessence of wine,
The puny wonders of the reptile world,
The tender rudiments of life, the slim
Unravellings of minute anatomy,
Maintain their texture, and unchang'd remain.

We curse not wine: The vile excess we blame;
More fruitful than th' accumulated board,
Of pain and misery. For the subtle draught
Faster and surer swells the vital tide;
And with more active poison, than the floods
Of grosser crudity convey, pervades
The far remote meanders of our frame.
Ah! sly deceiver! Branded o'er and o'er,
Yet still believ'd! Exulting o'er the wreck
Of sober vows!—But the Parnasian maids
* Another time perhaps shall sing the joys,
The fatal charms, the many woes of wine;
Perhaps its various tribes, and various powers.

Meantime, I would not always dread the bowl,
Nor every trespass shun. The feverish strife,
Rous'd by the rare debauch, subdues, expells
The loitering crudities that burden life;
And, like a torrent full and rapid, clears
Th' obstructed tubes. Besides, this restless world
Is full of chances, which by habit's power
To learn to bear is easier than to shun.
Ah! when ambition, meagre love of gold,
Or sacred country calls, with mellowing wine
To moisten well the thirsty suffrages;
Say how, unseason'd to the midnight frays
Of Comus and his rout, wilt thou contend
With Centaurs long to hardy deeds inur'd:
Then learn to revel; but by slow degrees:
By slow degrees the liberal arts are won;
And Hercules grew strong. But when you smooth
The brows of care, indulge your festive vein
In cups by well-inform'd experience found
The least your bane: and only with your friends.
There are sweet follies; frailties to be seen
By friends alone, and men of generous minds,

Oh! seldom may the fated hours return
Of drinking deep! I would not daily taste,
Except when life declines, even sober cups.
Weak withering age no rigid law forbids,
With frugal nectar, smooth and flow with balm,
The sapless habit daily to bedew,
And give the hesitating wheels of life
Gliblier to play. But youth has better joys:
And is it wise when youth with pleasure flows,
To squander the reliefs of age and pain!

What dextrous thousands just within the goal
Of wild debauch direct their nightly course!
Perhaps no sickly qualms bedim their days,
No morning admonitions shock the head.
But ah! what woes remain! Life rolls apace,

* Hippocrates.

* See Book iv.

And that incurable disease old age,
 In youthful bodies more severely felt,
 More sternly active, shakes their blasted prime:
 Except kind nature by some hasty blow
 Prevent the lingering fates. For know, whate'er
 Beyond its natural servour hurries on
 The sanguine tide; whether the frequent bowl,
 High-season'd fare, or exercise to toil
 Protracted; spurs to its last stage tir'd life,
 And sows the temples with untimely snow.
 When life is new, the ductile fibres feel
 The heart's increasing force; and, day by day,
 The growth advances: till the larger tubes,
 Acquiring (from their elemental veins,
 Condens'd to solid chords) a firmer tone,
 Sustain, and just sustain, th' impetuous blood.
 Here stops the growth. With overbearing pulse
 And pressure, still the great destroy the small;
 Still with the ruins of the small grow strong.
 Life glows mean time, amid the grinding force
 Of viscous fluids and elastic tubes;
 Its various functions vigorously are plied
 By strong machinery; and in solid health
 The man confirm'd long triumphs o'er disease.
 But the full ocean ebbs: There is a point,
 By nature fix'd, whence life must downward tend.
 For still the beating tide consolidates
 The stubborn vessels, more reluctant still
 To the weak throbs of th' ill-supported heart.
 This languishing, these strength'ning by degrees
 To hard unyielding unelastic bone,
 Through tedious channels the congealing flood
 Crawls lazily, and hardly wanders on;
 It loiters still: And now it stirs no more.
 This is the period few attain; the death
 Of nature; thus (so heav'n ordain'd it) life
 Destroys itself; and could these laws have chang'd,
 Nestor might now the fates of Troy relate;
 And Homer live immortal as his song. [flood

What does not fade? The tower that long had
 The crash of thunder and the warring winds,
 Shook by the slow but sure destroyer time,
 Now hangs in doubtful ruins o'er its base.
 And flinty pyramids, and walls of brass,
 Descend: the Babylonian spires are sunk;
 Achaia, Rome, and Egypt moulder down.
 Time shakes the stable tyranny of thrones,
 And tottering empires rush by their own weight.
 This huge rotundity we tread grows old;
 And all those worlds that roll around the sun,
 The sun himself shall die; and ancient night
 Again involve the desolate abyss:

* In the human body, as well as in those of other animals, the larger blood vessels are composed of smaller ones; which, by the violent motion and pressure of the fluids in the large vessels, lose their cavities by degrees, and degenerate into impervious chords or fibres. In proportion as these small vessels become solid, the larger must of course grow less extensile, more rigid, and make a stronger resistance to the action of the heart, and force of the blood. From this gradual condensation of the smaller vessels, and consequent rigidity of the larger ones, the progress of the human body from infancy to old age is accounted for.

Till the great Father through the lifeless gloom
 Extend his arm to light another world,
 And bid new planets roll by other laws.
 For though the regions of unbounded space,
 Where unconfin'd Omnipotence has room,
 Being, in various systems, fluctuates still
 Between creation and abhor'd decay:
 It ever did; perhaps and ever will.
 New worlds are still emerging from the deep;
 The old descending, in their turns to rise.

BOOK III.

EXERCISE.

THROUGH various toils th' adventurous muse has past;
 But half the toil, and more than half, remains.
 Rule is her theme, and hardly fit for song;
 Plain, and of little ornament; and I
 But little practis'd in th' Aonian arts.
 Yet not in vain such labours have we tried,
 If aught these lays the sickle health confirm.
 To you, ye delicate, I write; for you
 I tame my youth to philosophic cares,
 And grow still paler by the midnight lamps.
 Not to debilitate with timorous rules
 A hardy frame; nor needlessly to brave
 Inglorious dangers, proud of mortal strength;
 Is all the lesson that in wholesome years
 Concerns the strong. His care were ill bestow'd
 Who would with warm effeminacy nurse
 The thriving oak which on the mountain's brow
 Bears all the blasts that sweep the wint'ry heav'n.
 Behold the labourer of the glebe, who toils
 In dust, in rain, in cold and sultry skies;
 Save but the grain from mildews and the flood,
 Nought anxious he what sickly stars ascend.
 He knows no laws by Esculapius given;
 He studies none. Yet him nor midnight fogs
 Infest, nor those envenom'd shafts that fly
 When rabid Sirius fires th' autumnal noon.
 His habit pure with plain and temperate meals,
 Robust with labour, and by custom steel'd
 To every casualty of varied life;
 Serene he bears the peevish eastern blast,
 And uninfected breathes the mortal south.

Such the reward of rude and sober life;
 Of labour such. By health the peasant's toil
 Is well repaid; if exercise were pain
 Indeed, and temperance pain. By arts like these Laconia nurs'd of old her hardy sons;
 And Rome's unconquer'd legions urg'd their way,
 Unhurt, through every toil in every clime.

Toil, and be strong. By toil the flaccid nerves
 Grow firm, and gain a more compacted tone;
 The greener juices are by toil subdu'd,
 Mellow'd, and subtiliz'd; the vapid old
 Expell'd, and all the rancour of the blood.
 Come, my companions, ye who feel the charms
 Of nature and the year: come, let us stray
 Where chance or fancy leads our roving walk:
 Come, while the soft voluptuous breezes fan
 The fleecy heavens, enwrap the limbs in balm,
 And shed a charming languor o'er the soul.
 Nor when bright winter sows with prickly frost

The vigorous ether, in unmanly warmth
 Indulge at home; nor even when Eurus' blasts
 This way and that convolve the lab'ring woods.
 My liberal walks, save when the skies in rain
 Or fogs relent, no season should confine
 Or to the cloister'd gallery or arcade.
 Go, climb the mountain; from th' ethereal source
 Imbibe the recent gale. The cheerful morn
 Beams o'er the hills; go, mount th' exulting steed.
 Already, see, the deep-mouth'd beagles catch
 The tainted mazes; and, on eager sport
 Intent with emulous impatience try
 Each doubtful trace. Or, if a nobler prey
 Delight you more, go chase the desperate deer;
 And through its deepest solitudes awake
 The vocal forest with the jovial horn.

But if the breathless chase o'er hill and dale
 Exceed your strength; a sport of less fatigue,
 Not less delightful the prolific stream
 Affords. The crystal rivulet, that o'er
 A stony channel rolls its rapid maze, [bounds
 Swarms with the silver fry. Such, through the
 Of pastoral Stafford, runs the brawling Trent;
 Such Eden, sprung from Cumbrian mountains;
 such [stream
 The Esk, o'erhung with woods; and such the
 On whose Arcadian banks I first drew air,
 Liddal; till now, except in Doric lays
 Tun'd to her murmurs by her love-sick swains,
 Unknown in song: Though not a purer stream,
 Through meads more flowery or more romantic groves, [flood!
 Rolls toward the western main. Hail, sacred
 May still thy hospitable swains be blest
 In rural innocence; thy mountains still
 Teem with the fleecy race; thy tuneful woods
 For ever flourish; and thy vales look gay
 With painted meadows, and the golden grain!
 Oft with thy blooming sons, when life was new,
 Sportive and petulant, and charm'd with toys,
 In thy transparent eddies have I lav'd:
 Oft trac'd with patient steps thy fairy banks,
 With the well-imitated fly to hook
 The eager trout, and with the slender line
 And yielding rod solicit to the shore
 The struggling panting prey; while vernal clouds
 And tepid gales obscur'd the ruffled pool,
 And from the deeps call'd forth the wanton swarms.

Form'd on the Samian school, or those of Ind,
 There are who think these pastimes scarce humane.
 Yet in my mind (and not relentless I)
 His life is pure that wears no fouler stains.
 But if through genuine tenderness of heart,
 Or secret want of relish for the game,
 You shun the glories of the chase, nor care
 To haunt the peopled stream; the garden yields
 A soft amusement, an humane delight.
 To raise th' insipid nature of the ground;
 Or tame its savage genius to the grace
 Of careless sweet rusticity, that seems
 The amiable result of happy chance,
 Is to create; and gives a godlike joy,
 Which every year improves. Nor thou disdain

To check the lawless riot of the trees,
 To plant the grove, or turn the barren mould.
 O happy he! whom, when his years decline,
 (His fortune and his fame by worthy means
 Attain'd, and equal to his moderate mind;
 His life approv'd by all the wise and good,
 Even envied by the vain) the peaceful groves
 Of Epicurus, from this stormy world,
 Receive to rest; of all ungrateful cares
 Absolv'd, and sacred from the selfish crowd.
 Happiest of men! if the same soil invites
 A chosen few, companions of his youth,
 Once fellow-rakes perhaps, now rural friends;
 With whom in easy commerce to pursue
 Nature's free charms, and vie for sylvan fame:
 A fair ambition; void of strife or guile,
 Or jealousy, or pain to be outdone.
 Who plans th' enchanted garden, who directs
 The visio best, and best conducts the stream;
 Whose groves the fastest thicken and ascend;
 Whom first the welcome spring salutes; who shows
 The earliest bloom, the sweetest proudest charms
 Of Flora; who best gives Pomona's juice
 To match the sprightly genius of champaign.
 Thrice happy days! in rural business past:
 Blest winter nights! when as the genial fire
 Cheers the wide hall, his cordial family
 With soft domestic arts the hours beguile.
 And pleasing talk that starts no timorous fame,
 With witless wantonness to hunt it down:
 Or through the fairy land of tale or song
 Delighted wander, in fictitious fates
 Engag'd, and all that strikes humanity:
 Till lost in fable, they the stealing hour
 Of timely rest forget. Sometimes, at eve
 His neighbours lift the latch, and bless unbid
 His festal roof; while, o'er the light repast,
 And sprightly cups, they mix in social joy;
 And, through the maze of conversation, trace
 Whate'er amuses or improves the mind.
 Sometimes at eve (for I delight to taste
 The native zest and flavour of the fruit,
 Where sense grows wild and takes of no manure)
 The decent, honest, cheerful husbandman
 Should drown his labours in my friendly bowl;
 And at my table find himself at home.

Whate'er you study, in whate'er you sweat,
 Indulge your taste. Some love the manly foils;
 The tennis some; and some the graceful dance.
 Others more hardy, range the purple heath,
 Or naked stubble; where from field to field
 The sounding coveys urge their labouring flight;
 Eager amid the rising cloud to pour
 The gun's unerring thunder: And there are
 Whom still the * meed of the green archer charms.
 He chooses best, whose labour entertains
 His vacant fancy most: The toil you hate
 Fatigues you soon, and scarce improves your limbs.

As beauty still has blemish; and the mind
 The most accomplish'd its imperfect side;
 Few bodies are there of that happy mould
 But some one part is weaker than the rest:

* This word is much used by some of the old English poets, and signifies Reward or Prize.

The legs, perhaps, or arms refuse their load,
Or the chest labours. These assiduously,
But gently, in their proper arts employ'd,
Acquire a vigour and springy activity
To which they were not born. But weaker parts
Abhor fatigue and violent discipline.

Begin with gentle toils; and, as your nerves
Grow firm, to hardier by just steps aspire.
The prudent, even in every moderate walk,
At first but saunter; and by slow degrees
Increase their pace. This doctrine of the wise
Well knows the master of the flying steed.
First from the goal the manag'd coursers play
On bended reins: as yet the skilful youth
Repress their foamy pride; but every breath
The race grows warmer, and the tempest swells;
Till all the fiery mettle has its way,
And the thick thunder hurries o'er the plain.
When all at once from indolence to toil
You spring, the fibres by the hasty shock
Are tir'd and crack'd, before their unctuous coats,
Compress'd, can pour the lubricating balm.
Besides, collected in the passive veins,
The purple mass a sudden torrent rolls,
O'erpowers the heart and deluges the lungs
With dangerous inundation: oft the source
Of fatal woes; a cough that foams with blood,
Asthma and feller * peripneumony,
Or the slow minings of the hectic fire.

Th' athletic fool, to whom what heav'n deny'd
Of soul, is well compensated in limbs,
Oft from his rage, or brainless frolic, feels
His vegetation and brute force decay.
The men of better clay and finer mould
Know nature, feel the human dignity;
And scorn to vie with oxen or with apes.
Pursu'd proluxly, even the gentlest toil
Is waste of health: repose by small fatigue
Is earn'd; and (where your habit is not prone
To thaw) by the first moisture of the brows.
The fine and subtle spirits cost too much
To be profus'd, too much the roscid balm.
But when the hard varieties of life
You toil to learn; or try the dusty chase,
Or the warm deeds of some important day:
Hot from the field, indulge not yet your limbs
In wish'd repose; nor court the fanning gale,
Nor taste the spring. O! by the sacred tears
Of widows, orphans, mothers, sisters, fires,
Forbear! No other pestilence has driven
Such myriads o'er th' irremeable deep.
Why this so fatal, the sagacious muse
Through nature's cunning labyrinth's could trace:
But there are secrets which who knows not now,
Must, ere he reach them, climb the heapy Alps
Of science; and devote seven years to toil.
Besides, I would not stun your patient ears
With what it little boots you to attain.
He knows enough, the mariner, who knows
Where lurk the shelves, and where the whirlpools
boil,
What signs portend the storm: To subtler minds
He leaves to scan, from what mysterious cause

* The inflammation of the lungs.

Charybdis rages in th' Ionian wave;
Whence those impetuous currents in the main
Which neither oar nor sail can stem; and why
The roughening deep expects the storm, as sure
As red Orion mounts the shrouded heaven.

In ancient times, when Rome with Athens vied
For polish'd luxury and useful arts,
All hot and reeking from th' Olympic strife,
And warm Pelestra, in the tepid bath
Th' athletic youth relax'd their weary limbs.
Soft oils bedew'd them, with the grateful pow'rs
Of nard and cassia fraught, to sooth and heal
The cherish'd nerves. Our less voluptuous clime
Not much invites us to such arts as these.
'Tis not for those, whom gelid skies embrace,
And chilling fogs; whose perspiration feels
Such frequent bars from Eurys and the north;
'Tis not for those to cultivate a skin
Too soft; or teach the recremental fume
Too fast to crowd through such precarious ways,
For through the small arterial mouths, that pierce
In endless millions the close-woven skin,
The baser fluids in a constant stream
Escape, and, viewless, melt into the winds.
While this eternal, this most copious waste
Of blood, degenerate into vapid brine,
Maintains its wonted measure, all the powers
Of health besfriend you, all the wheels of life
With ease and pleasure move: but this restrain'd
Or more or less, so more or less you feel
The functions labour: from this fatal source,
What woes descend is never to be sung.
To take their numbers, were to count the sands
That ride in whirlwind the parch'd Libyan air;
Or waves that, when the blustering north em-
broils

The Baltic, thunder on the German shore.
Subject not then, by soft emollient arts,
This grand expence, on which your fates depend,
To every caprice of the sky; nor thwart
The genius of your clime: for from the blood
Least fickle rise the recremental steams,
And least obnoxious to the styptic air,
Which breathe through straiter and more callous
pores,

The temper'd Scythian hence, half-naked treads
His boundless snows, nor rues th' inclement heaven;

And hence our painted ancestors defied
The east; nor curs'd, like us, their fickle sky.

The body, moulded by the clime, endures
Th' equator heats, or hyperborean frost:
Except by habits foreign to its turn,
Unwise you counteract its forming pow'rs.
Rude at the first, the winter shocks you less
By long acquaintance: study then your sky,
Form to its manners your obsequious frame,
And learn to suffer what you cannot shun;
Against the rigours of a damp cold heav'n,
To fortify their bodies, some frequent
The gelid cistern; and, where nought forbids,
I praise their dauntless heart: a frame so steel'd
Dreads not the cough, nor those ungenial blasts
That breathe the tertian or fell rheumatism;
The nerves so temper'd, never quit their tone;

No chronic languors haunt such hardy breasts.
But all things have their bounds; and he who makes

By daily use the kindest regimen
Essential to his health, should never mix
With human kind, nor art nor trade pursue.
He not the safe vicissitudes of life
Without some shock endures; ill fitted he
To want the known, or bear unusual things
Besides, the powerful remedies of pain
(Since pain in spite of all our care will come),
Should never with your prosperous days of health
Grow too familiar: for, by frequent use,
The strongest medicines lose their healing power,
And even the surest poisons theirs to kill.

Let those who from the frozen Arctos reach
Parch'd Mauritania, or the sultry west,
Or the wide flood that laves rich Indostan,
Plunge thrice a day, and in the tepid wave
Untwist their stubborn pores; that full and free
Th' evaporation through the soften'd skin
May bear proportion to the swelling blood.
So may they 'scape the fever's rapid flames;
So feel untainted the hot breath of hell.
With us, the man of no complaint demands
The warm ablution just enough to clear
The sluices of the skin, enough to keep
The body sacred from indecent soil.
Still to be pure, ev'n did it not conduce
(As much it does) to health, were greatly worth
Your daily pains. 'Tis this adorns the rich;
The want of this is poverty's worst woe;
With this external virtue age maintains
A decent grace; without it youth and charms
Are loathsome. This the venal graces know;
So doubtless do your wives: For married fires,
As well as lovers, still pretend to taste;
Nor is it less (all prudent wives can tell)
To lose a husband's than a lover's heart.

But now the hours and seasons when to toil
From foreign themes recal my wandering song.
Some labour fasting, or but slightly fed
To lull the grinding stomach's hungry rage.
Where nature feeds too corpulent a frame
'Tis wisely done: For while the thirsty veins,
Impatient of lean penury, devour
The treasur'd oil, then is the happiest time
To shake the lazy balsam from its cells.
Now while the stomach from the full repast
Subsides, but ere returning hunger gnaws,
Ye leaner habits, give an hour to toil:
And ye whom no luxuriancy of growth
Oppresses yet, or threatens to oppress.
But from the recent meal no labours please,
Of limbs or mind. For now the cordial powers
Claim all the wandering spirits to a work
Of strong and subtle toil, and great event:
A work of time: and you may rue the day
You hurried, with untimely exercise,
A half-concocted chyle into the blood.
The body overcharg'd with unctuous phlegm
Much toil demands: The lean elastic less.
While winter chills the blood and binds the veins,
No labours are too hard: By those you 'scape
The slow diseases of the torpid year;

VOL. X.

Endless to name; to one of which alone,
To that which tears the nerves, the toil of slaves
Is pleasure: Oh! from such inhuman pains
May all be free who merit not the wheel!
But from the burning Lion when the sun
Pours down his sultry wrath; now while the blood
Too much already maddens in the veins,
And ail the finer fluids through the skin
Explore their flight; me, near the cool cascade
Reclin'd, or saunt'ring in the lofty grove.
No needless slight occasion should engage
To pant and sweat beneath the fiery noon.
Now the fresh morn alone, and mellow eve,
To shady walks and active rural sports
Invite. But, while the chilling dews descend,
May nothing tempt you to the cold embrace
Of humid skies; though 'tis no vulgar joy
To trace the horrors of the solemn wood,
While the soft evening saddens into night,
Though the sweet poet of the vernal groves
Melts all the night in strains of am'rous woe.
The shades descend, and midnight o'er the world
Expands her sable wings. Great nature droops
Through all her works. Now happy he, whose toil
Has o'er his languid powerless limbs diffus'd
A pleasing lassitude: he not in vain
Invokes the gentle deity of dreams.
His powers the most voluptuously dissolve
In soft repose: on him the balmy dews
Of sleep with double nutriment descend.
But would you sweetly waste the blank of night
In deep oblivion; or on fancy's wings
Visit the paradise of happy dreams,
And waken cheerful as the lively morn;
Oppress not nature sinking down to rest
With feasts too late, too solid, or too full:
But be the first concoction half matur'd,
Ere you to mighty indolence resign
Your passive faculties. He, from the toils
And troubles of the day, to heavier toil
Retires; whom trembling from the tower that rocks
Amid the clouds, or Calpe's hideous height,
The busy demons hurl; or in the main
O'erwhelm; or bury, struggling under ground.
Not all a monarch's luxury, the woes
Can counterpoise of that most wretched man,
Whose nights are shaken with the frantic fits
Of wild Orestes; whose delirious brain
Stung by the furies, works with poison'd thought:
While pale and monstrous painting shocks the soul,
And mangled consciousness bemoans itself
For ever torn, and chaos floating round.
What dreams presage, what dangers these or those Portend to sanity? though prudent fears
Reveal'd of old, and men of deathless fame,
We would not to the superstitious mind
Suggest new throbs, new vanities of fear.
'Tis ours to teach you from the peaceful night
To banish omens and all restless woes
In study some protract the silent hours,
Which others consecrate to mirth and wine;
And sleep till noon, and hardly live till night.
But surely this redeems not from the shades
One hour of life. Nor does it nought avail,

What season you to drowsy Morpheus give
Of th' ever-varying circle of the day ;
Or whether, through the tedious winter gloom,
You tempt the midnight or the morning damps.
The body, fresh and vigorous from repose,
Defies the early fogs : but, by the toils
Of wakeful day, exhausted and unstrung,
Weakly resists the night's unwholesome breath.
The grand discharge, th' effusion of the skin,
Slowly impair'd, the languid maladies
Creep on, and through the sick'ning functions steal.

As, when the chilling east invades the spring,
The delicate narcissus pines away
In hectic languor ; and a slow disease
Taints all the family of flowers, condemn'd
To cruel heav'ns. But why, already prone
To fade, should beauty cherish its own bane ?
O shame ! O pity ! nipt with pale quadrille,
And midnight cares, the bloom of Albion dies !

By toil subdued, the warrior and the hind
Sleep fast and deep : their active functions soon
With generous streams the subtle tubes supply ;
And soon the tonic irritable nerves
Feel the fresh impulse, and awake the soul.
The sons of indolence with long repose
Grow torpid ; and, with slowest Lethe drunk,
Feebly and ling'ringly return to life,
Blunt every sense, and powerless every limb.
Ye, prone to sleep (whom sleeping most annoys),
On the hard mattress, or elastic couch,
Extend your limbs, and wean yourselves from sloth ;
Nor grudge the lean projector of dry brain
And springy nerves, the blandishments of down ;
Nor envy while the buried Bacchanal
Exhales his surfeit in prolixer dreams.

He without riot, in the balmy feast
Of life, the wants of nature has supply'd
Who rises cool, serene, and full of soul.
But pliant nature more or less demands,
As custom forms her ; and all sudden change
She hates of habit, even from bad to good.
If faults in life, or new emergencies,
From habits urge you by long time confirm'd,
Slow may the change arrive, and stage by stage ;
Slow as the shadow o'er the dial moves,
Slow as the stealing progress of the year.

Observe the circling year. How unperceiv'd
Her seasons change ! Behold, by slow degrees,
Stern winter tam'd into a ruder spring !
The ripen'd spring a milder summer glows ;
Departing summer sheds Pomona's store ;
And aged autumn brews the winter storm.
Slow as they come, these changes come not void
Of mortal shocks : the cold and torrid reigns,
The two great periods of th' important year,
Are in their first approaches seldom safe :
Funereal autumn all the sickly dread,
And the black fates deform the lovely spring.
He well advis'd, who taught our wiser sires
Early to borrow Muscovy's warm spoils,
Ere the first frost has touch'd the tender blade ;
And late resign them, though the wanton spring
Should deck her charms with all her sister's rays
For while the effluence of the skin maintains

Its native measure, the pleuretic spring
Glides harmless by ; and autumn, sick to death
With fallow quartans, no contagion breathes.

I in prophetic numbers could unfold
The omens of the year : what seasons teem
With what diseases ; what the humid south
Prepares, and what the demon of the east :
But you, perhaps, refuse the tedious song.
Besides, whatever plagues in heat, or cold,
Or drought, or moisture dwell, they hurt not you,
Skill'd to correct the vices of the sky,
And taught already how to each extreme
To bend your life. But should the public bane
Infect you ; or some trespass of your own,
Or flaw of nature, hint mortality :
Soon as a not unpleasing horror glides
Along the spine, through all your torpid limbs ;
When first the head throbs, or the stomach feels
A sickly load, a weary pain the loins ;
Be Celsus call'd : the fates come rushing on ;
The rapid fates admit of no delay.
While wilful you, and fatally secure,
Expect to-morrow's more auspicious sun,
The growing pest, whose infancy was weak
And easy vanquish'd, with triumphant sway
O'erpowers your life. For want of timely care,
Millions have died of medicable wounds.

Ah ! in what perils is vain life engag'd !
What slight neglects, what trivial faults destroy
The hardiest frame ! of indolence, of toil,
We die ; of want, of superfluity :
The all-surrounding heaven, the vital air,
Is big with death. And, though the putrid south
Be shut ; though no convulsive agony
Shake, from the deep foundations of the world,
Th' imprisoned plagues ; a secret venom oft
Corrupts the air, the water, and the land.
What livid deaths has sad Byzantium seen !
How oft has Cairo, with a mother's woe,
Wept o'er her slaughter'd sons, and lonely streets !
Even Albion, girt with less malignant skies,
Albion the poison of the gods has drank,
And felt the sting of monsters all her own.

Ere yet the fell Plantagenets had spent
Their ancient rage, at Bosworth's purple field ;
While, for which tyrant England should receive,
Her legions in incestuous murders mix'd,
And daily horrors ; till the fates were drunk
With kindred blood by kindred hands profus'd :
Another plague of more gigantic arm
Arose, a monster never known before,
Rear'd from Cocytus its portentous head ;
This rapid fury not, like other pests,
Pursu'd a gradual course, but in a day
Rush'd as a storm o'er half th' astonished isle,
And strew'd with sudden carcases the land.

First through the shoulders, or whatever part
Was seiz'd the first, a fervid vapour sprung,
With rash combustion thence, the quivering spark
Shot to the heart, and kindled all within ;
And soon the surface caught the spreading fires.
Through all the yielding pores, the melted blood
Gush'd out in smoky sweats ; but nought assuag'd
The torrid heat within, nor aught reliev'd
The stomach's anguish. With incessant toil,

Desperate of ease, impatient of their pain,
They toss'd from side to side. In vain the stream
Ran full and clear, they burnt, and thirsted still.
The restless arteries with rapid blood
Beat strong and frequent. Thick and pantingly
The breath was fetch'd, and with huge lab'rings heav'd.

At last a heavy pain oppress'd the head,
A wild delirium came; their weeping friends
Were strangers now, and this no home of theirs.
Harass'd with toil on toil, the sinking powers
Lay prostrate and o'erthrown; a ponderous sleep
Wrapt all the senses up: they slept and died.

In some a gentle horror crept at first
O'er all the limbs; the sluices of the skin
With-held their moisture, till by art provok'd
The sweats o'erflow'd; but in a clammy tide:
Now free and copious, now restrain'd and slow;
Of tinctures various, as the temperature
Had mix'd the blood; and rank with fetid streams:
As if the pent-up humours by delay
Were grown more fell, more putrid, and malign.
Here lay their hopes (though little hope remain'd);
With full effusion of perpetual sweats
To drive the venom out. And here the fates
Were kind, that long they linger'd not in pain.
For, who surviv'd the sun's diurnal race,
Rose from the dreary gates of hell redeem'd:
Some the sixth hour oppress'd, and some the third.

Of many thousands few untainted 'scap'd;
Of those infected, fewer 'scap'd alive;
Of those who liv'd, some felt a second blow;
And whom the second spar'd, a third destroy'd.
Frantic with fear, they sought by flight to shun
The fierce contagion. O'er the mournful land
Th' infected city pour'd her hurrying swarms:
Rous'd by the flames that fir'd her seats around,
Th' infected country rush'd into the town.
Some, sad at home, and in the desert some,
Abjur'd the fatal commerce of mankind;
In vain: where'er they fled, the fates pursu'd.
Others, with hopes more specious, cross'd the main,
To seek protection in far distant skies;
But none they found. It seem'd the general air,
From pole to pole, from Atlas to the east,
Was then at enmity with English blood.
For, but the race of England, all were safe
In foreign climes; nor did this fury taste
The foreign blood which England then contain'd.
Where should they fly? The circumambient heaven
Involv'd them still; and every breeze was bane.
Where find relief? The salutary art
Was mute, and startled at the new disease,
In fearful whispers hopeless omens gave.
To Heaven with suppliant rites they sent their prayers;

Heaven heard them not. Of every hope depriv'd;
Fatigu'd with vain resources; and subdued
With woes resistless, and enfeebling fear;
Passive they sunk beneath the weighty blow.
Nothing but lamentable sounds was heard,
Nor aught was seen, but ghastly views of death.
Infectious horror ran from face to face,
And pale despair. 'Twas all the business then,
To tend the sick, and in their turns to die.

In heaps they fell: and oft one bed, they say,
The sickening, dying, and the dead contained.

Ye guardian gods, on whom the fates depend
Of tottering Albion! ye eternal fires,
That lead through heaven the wandering year!
ye powers,

That o'er th' encircling elements preside!
May nothing worse than what this age has seen
Arrive! Enough abroad, enough at home
Has Albion bled. Here a distemper'd heaven
Has thin'd her cities; from those lofty cliffs
That awe proud Gaul, to Thule's wint'ry reign;
While in the west, beyond th' Atlantic foam,
Her bravest sons, keen for the fight, have dy'd
The death of cowards, and of common men:
Sunk void of wounds, and fall'n without renown.

But from these views the weeping muses turn,
And other themes invite my wandering song.

BOOK IV.

THE PASSIONS.

THE choice of aliment, the choice of air,
The use of toil, and all external things,
Already sung; it now remains to trace
What good, what evil from ourselves proceeds:
And how the subtle principle within
Inspires with health, or mines with strange decay
The passive body. Ye poetic shades,
Who know the secrets of the world unseen,
Assist my song! For, in a doubtful theme
Engag'd, I wander through mysterious ways.
I here is, they say (and I believe there is),
A spark within us of th' immortal fire,
That animates and moulds the grosser frame;
And, when the body sinks, escapes to heaven,
Its native seat, and mixes with the gods.
Meanwhile this heavenly particle pervades
The mortal elements; in every nerve
It thrills with pleasure, or grows mad with pain.
And, in its secret conclave, as it feels
The body's woes and joys, this ruling power
Wields at its will the dull material world,
And is the body's health or malady.

By its own toil the gross corporeal frame
Fatigues, extenuates, or destroys itself.
Nor less the labours of the mind corrode
The solid fabric: for by subtle parts,
And viewless atoms, secret nature moves
The mighty wheels of this stupendous world.
By subtle fluids pour'd through subtle tubes,
The natural, vital, functions are perform'd.
By these the stubborn aliments are tam'd;
The toiling heart distributes life and strength;
These the still-crumbling frame rebuild; and these
Are lost in thinking, and dissolve in air.
But 'tis not thought (for still the soul's employ'd),
'Tis painful thinking that corrodes our clay.
All day the vacant eye, without fatigue,
Strays o'er the heaven and earth; but, long intent
On microscopic arts, its vigour fails.
Just so the mind, with various thought amus'd,
Nor aches itself, nor gives the body pain.
But anxious study, discontent, and care,
Love without hope, and hate without revenge,

And fear, and jealousy, fatigue the soul,
Engross the subtle ministers of life,
And spoil the lab'ring functions of their share.
Hence the lean gloom that melancholy wears;
The lover's paleness, and the fallow hue
Of envy, jealousy; the meagre stare
Of sore revenge: the canker'd body hence
Betrays each fretful motion of the mind. [day,

The strong-built pedant; who, both night and
Feeds on the coarsest fare the schools bestow,
And crudely fattens at gross Burman's stall;
O'erwhelm'd with phlegm, lies in a dropsy drown'd,
Or sinks in lethargy before his time.

With useful studies you, and arts that please,
Employ your mind: amuse, but not fatigue.
Peace to each drowsy metaphysic sage!
And ever may all heavy systems rest!

Yet some there are, even of elastic parts,
Whom strong and obstinate ambition leads
Through all the rugged roads of barren lore,
And gives to relish what their generous taste
Would else refuse. But may not thirst of fame,
Nor love of knowledge, urge you to fatigue
With constant drudgery the liberal soul.

Toy with your books: and, as the various fits
Of humour seize you, from philosophy
To fable shift: from serious Antonine
To Rabelais' ravings, and from prose to song.

While reading pleases, but no longer, read;
And read aloud resounding Homer's strain,
And wield the thunder of Demosthenes.

The chest so exercis'd, improves its strength;
And quick vibrations through the bowels drive
The restless blood, which in unactive days
Would loiter else through unelastic tubes.

Deem it not trifling while I recommend
What posture suits: To stand and sit by turns,
As nature prompts, is best. But o'er your leaves
To lean for ever, cramps the vital parts,
And robs the fine machinery of its play.

'Tis the great art of life to manage well
The restless mind. For ever on pursuit
Of knowledge bent, it starves the grosser powers:
Quite unemploy'd, against its own repose
It turns its fatal edge, and sharper pangs
Than what the body knows embitter life.

Chiefly where solitude, sad nurse of care,
To sickly musing gives the pensive mind.
There madness enters; and the dim-ey'd fiend,
Sour melancholy, night and day provokes
Her own eternal wound. The sun grows pale;
A mournful visionary light o'erspreads

The cheerful face of nature: earth becomes
A dreary desert, and heaven frowns above.

Then various shapes of curs'd illusion rise:
Whate'er the wretched fears, creating fear
Forms out of nothing; and with monsters teems
Unknown in hell. The prostrate soul beneath
A load of huge imagination heaves;

And all the horrors that the murderer feels
With anxious flutterings wake the guiltless breast.

Such phantoms pride in solitary scenes,
Or fear, or delicate self-love creates.
From other cares absolv'd, the busy mind
Finds in yourself a theme to pore upon,

It finds you miserable, or makes you so.
For while yourself you anxiously explore,
Timorous self-love, with sickning fancy's aid,
Presents the danger that you dread the most,
And ever galls you in your tender part.

Hence some for love, and some for jealousy,
For grim religion some, and some for pride,
Have lost their reason: some for fear of want
Want all their lives: and others every day
For fear of dying suffer worse than death.

Ah! from your bosom banish, if you can,
Those fatal guests: and first the demon fear;
That trembles at impossible events,
Lest aged Atlas should resign his load,
And heaven's eternal battlements rush down.

Is there an evil worse than fear itself?
And what avails it, that indulgent Heaven
From mortal eyes has wrapt the woes to come,
If we, ingenious to torment ourselves,
Grow pale at hideous fictions of our own?
Enjoy the present; nor with needless cares,
Of what may spring from blind misfortune's
womb,

Appal the surest hour that life bestows.
Serene, and master of yourself, prepare
For what may come; and leave the rest to Heaven.

Oft from the body, by long ails mistun'd,
These evils sprung the most important health,
That of the mind, destroy: and when the mind
They first invade, the conscious body soon
In sympathetic languishment declines.

These chronic passions, while from real woes
They rise, and yet without the body's fault
Infect the soul, admit one only cure;
Diversión, hurry, and a restless life.
Vain are the consolations of the wise;
In vain your friends would reason down your pain.

O ye, whose souls relentless love has tam'd
To soft distress, or friends untimely fall'n!
Court not the luxury of tender thought;
Nor deem it impious to forget those pains
That hurt the living, nought avail the dead.
Go, soft enthusiast: quit the cypress groves,
Nor to the rivulet's lonely moanings tune
Your sad complaint. Go, seek the cheerful haunts
Of men, and mingle with the bustling crowd;
Lay schemes for wealth, or power, or fame, the wish

Of nobler minds, and push them night and day.
Or join the caravan in quest of scenes
New to your eyes, and shifting every hour,
Beyond the Alps, beyond the Apennines.
Or more advent'rous, rush into the field [sky,
Where war grows hot: and, raging through the
The lofty trumpet swells the madd'ning soul:
And in the hardy camp and toilsome march
Forget all softer and less manly cares.

But most too passive, when the blood runs low,
Too weakly indolent to strive with pain,
And bravely by resisting conquer fate,
Try Circe's arts: and in the tempting bowl
Of poison'd nectar sweet oblivion swill.
Struck by the pow'rful charm, the gloom dissolves

In empty air; Elysium opens round,
A pleasing phrenzy buoys the lighten'd soul,
And sanguine hopes dispel your fleeting care;
And what was difficult, and what was dire,
Yields to your prowess and superior stars:
The happiest you of all that e'er were mad,
Or are, or shall be, could this folly last.
But soon your heaven is gone; a heavier gloom
Shuts o'er your head: and, as the thund'ring

stream,
Swoln o'er its banks with sudden mountain rain,
Sinks from its tumult to a silent brook;
So, when the frantic raptures in your breast
Subside, you languish into mortal man;
You sleep, and waking find yourself undone.
For prodigal of life in one rash night
You lavish'd more than might support three days.
A heavy morning comes; your cares return
With tenfold rage. An anxious stomach well
May be endur'd; so may the throbbing head:
But such a dim delirium, such a dream,
Involves you; such a dastardly despair
Unmans your soul, as madd'ning Pentheus felt,
When, baited round Cithæron's cruel sides,
He saw two suns, and double Thebes ascend.
You curse the sluggish port; you curse the wretch.
The felon, with unnatural mixture first
Who dar'd to violate the virgin wine.
Or on the fugitive champain you pour
A thousand curses; for to heav'n it rapt
Your soul, to plunge you deeper in despair.
Perhaps you rue even that divinest gift,
The gay, serene, good-natur'd Burgundy,
Or the fresh fragrant vintage of the Rhine;
And wish that heaven from mortals had withheld
The grape, and all intoxicating bowls.

Besides, it wounds you sore to recollect
What follies in your loose unguarded hour
Escap'd. For one irrevocable word,
Perhaps that meant no harm, you lose a friend.
Or, in the rage of wine, your hasty hand
Performs a deed to haunt you to the grave.
Add that your means, your health, your parts
decay;

Your friends avoid you; brutishly transform'd
They hardly know you; or if one remains
To wish you well, he wishes you in heaven.
Despis'd, unwept you fall; who might have left
A sacred, cherish'd, sadly-pleasing name;
A name still to be utter'd with a sigh.
Your last ungraceful scene has quite effac'd
All sense and memory of your former worth.

How to live happiest; how avoid the pains,
The disappointments, and disgusts of those
Who would in pleasure all their hours employ;
The precepts here of a divine old man
I could recite. Though old, he still retain'd
His manly sense, and energy of mind.
Virtuous and wise he was, but not severe;
He still remember'd that he once was young;
His easy presence check'd no decent joy.
Him even the dissolute admir'd: for he
A graceful looseness when he pleas'd put on,
And laughing could instruct. Much had he read,
Much more had seen; he studied from the life,

And in th' original perus'd mankind.

Vers'd in the woes and vanities of life,
He pitied man: and much he pitied those Whom falsely-smiling fate has curs'd with means
To dissipate their days in quest of joy.
Our aim is happiness; 'tis yours, 'tis mine,
He said, 'tis the pursuit of all that live;
Yet few attain it, if 'twas e'er attain'd.
But they the widest wander from the mark,
Who through the flow'ry paths of saunt'ring joy
Seek this coy goddess; that from stage to stage
Invites us still, but shifts as we pursue.
For, not to name the pains that pleasure brings
To counterpoise itself, relentless fate
Forbids that we through gay voluptuous wilds,
Should ever roam: and were the fates more kind,
Our narrow luxuries would soon grow stale.
Were these exhaustless, nature would grow sick,
And, cloy'd with pleasure, squeamishly complain
That all is vanity, and life a dream.

Let nature rest: be busy for yourself,
And for your friend; be busy even in vain.
Rather than teaze her fated appetites,
Who never fasts, no banquet e'er enjoys;
Who never toils or watches, never sleeps.
Let nature rest: and when the taste of joy
Grows keen, indulge; but shun satiety.

'Tis not for mortals always to be blest.
But him the least the dull or painful hours
Of life oppress, when sober sense conducts,
And virtue, through this labyrinth we tread.
Virtue and sense I mean not to disjoin;
Virtue and sense are one: and, trust me, still
A faithless heart betrays the head unsound,
Virtue (for mere good-nature is a fool)
Is sense and spirit, with humanity:

'Tis sometimes angry, and its frown confounds;
'Tis even vindictive, but in vengeance just.
Knaves fain would laugh at it; some great ones
dare;

But at his heart the most undaunted son
Of fortune dreads its name and awful charms.
To noblest uses this determines wealth;
This is the solid pomp of prosperous days;
The peace and shelter of adversity.
And if you pant for glory, build your fame
On this foundation, which the secret shock
Defies of envy and all sapping time.

The gaudy gloss of fortune only strikes
The vulgar eye: the suffrage of the wise,
The praise that's worth ambition, is attain'd
By sense alone, and dignity of mind.

Virtue, the strength and beauty of the soul,
Is the best gift of heaven: a happiness
That even above the smiles and frowns of fate
Exalts great nature's favourites; a wealth
That ne'er encumbers, nor can be transferr'd.
Riches are oft by guilt and baseness earn'd;
Or dealt by chance, to shield a lucky knave,
Or throw a cruel sun-shine on a fool.
But for one end, one much-neglected use,
Are riches worth your care: (for nature's wants
Are few, and without opulence supply'd.)
This noble end is, to produce the soul
To show the virtues in their fairest light;

To make humanity the minister
Of bounteous Providence; and teach the breast
That generous luxury the gods enjoy.

Thus, in his graver vein, the friendly sage Sometimes declaim'd. Of right and wrong he taught.
Truths as refin'd as ever Athens heard;
And (strange to tell)! he practis'd what he preach'd.

Skill'd in the passions, how to check their sway
He knew, as far as reason can controul
The lawless powers. But other cares are mine:
Form'd in the school of Pæon, I relate
What passions hurt the body, what improve:
Avoid them, or invite them, as you may.

Know then, whatever cheerful and serene
Supports the mind, supports the body too.
Hence, the most vital movements mortals feel
Is hope; the balm and life-blood of the soul.
It pleases, and it lasts. Indulgent Heaven
Sent down the kind delusion, through the paths
Of rugged life to lead us patient on;
And make our happiest state no tedious thing.
Our greatest good, and what we least can spare,
Is hope: the last of all our evils, fear.

But there are passions grateful to the breast,
And yet no friends to life: perhaps they please
Or to excess, and dissipate the soul; [clown,
Or while they please, torment. The stubborn
'The ill-tam'd ruffian, and pale usurer,
(If love's omnipotence such hearts can mould)
May safely mellow into love; and grow
Refin'd, humane, and generous, if they can.
Love in such bosoms never to a fault
Or pains or pleasures. But, ye finer souls,
Form'd to soft luxury, and prompt to thrill
With all the tumults, all the joys and pains,
That beauty gives; with caution and reserve
Indulge the sweet destroyer of repose,
Nor court too much the queen of charming cares.
For, while the cherish'd poison in your breast
Ferments and maddens; sick with jealousy,
Absence, distrust, or even with anxious joy,
The wholesome appetites and powers of life
Dissolve in languor. The coy stomach lothes
The genial board: Your cheerful days are gone;
The generous bloom that flush'd your cheeks is fled.

To sighs devoted and to tender pains,
Pensive you sit, or solitary stray,
And waste your youth in musing. Musing first
Toy'd into care your unsuspecting heart:
It found a liking there, a sportful fire,
And that fomented into serious love;
Which musing daily strengthens and improves
Through all the heights of fondness and romance:
And you're undone, the fatal shaft has sped,
If once you doubt whether you love or no,
The body wastes away; th' infected mind,
Dissolv'd in female tenderness, forgets
Each manly virtue, and grows dead to fame.
Sweet heaven from such intoxicating charms
Defend all worthy breasts! Not that I deem Love always dangerous, always to be shun'd,
Love well repaid, and not too weakly sunk

In wanton and unmanly tendernefs,
Adds bloom to health; o'er ev'ry virtue sheds
A gay, humane, a sweet, and generous grace,
And brightens all the ornaments of man.
But fruitless, hopeless, disappointed, rack'd
With jealousy, fatigu'd with hope and fear,
Too serious, or too languishingly fond,
Unnerves the body and unmans the soul.
And some have died for love; and some run mad;
And some with desperate hands themselves have slain.

Some to extinguish, others to prevent,
A mad devotion to one dangerous fair,
Court all they meet; in hopes to dissipate
The cares of love amongst an hundred brides.
Th' event is doubtful: for there are who find
A cure in this; there are who find it not.
'Tis no relief, alas! it rather galls
The wound, to those who are sincerely sick.
For while from feverish and tumultuous joys
The nerves grow languid and the soul subsides,
The tender fancy smarts with every sting,
And what was love before is madness now.
Is health your care, or luxury your aim,
Be temperate still: When nature bids, obey;
Her wild impatient fallies bear no curb:
But when the prurient habit of delight,
Or loose imagination, spurs you on
To deeds above your strength, impute it not
To nature: Nature all compulsion hates.
Ah! let not luxury nor vain renown
Urge you to feats you well might sleep without;
To make what should be rapture a fatigue,
A tedious task; nor in the wanton arms
Of twining Lais melt your manhood down.
For from the colligation of soft joys
How chang'd you rise! the ghost of what you was!

Languid, and melancholy, and gaunt, and wan;
Your veins exhausted, and your nerves unstrung.
Spoil'd of its balm and sprightly zest, the blood
Grows vapid phlegm; along the tender nerves
(To each slight impulse tremblingly awake)
A subtle fiend that mimics all the plagues
Rapid and restless springs from part to part.
The blooming honours of your youth are fallen;
Your vigour pines; your vital powers decay;
Diseases haunt you; and untimely age
Creeps on; unsocial, impotent, and lewd.
Insatiate, impious, epicure! to waste
The stores of pleasure, cheerfulness, and health!
Insatiate all who make delight their trade,
And coy perdition every hour pursue.

Who pines with love, or in lascivious flames
Consumes, is with his own consent undone:
He chooses to be wretched, to be mad;
And warn'd proceeds and wilful to his fate.
But there's a passion, whose tempestuous sway
Tears up each virtue planted in the breast,
And shakes to ruins proud philosophy.
For pale and trembling anger rushes in,
With fault'ring speech, and eyes that wildly stare;
Fierce as the tiger, madder than the seas,
Desperate, and arm'd with more than human strength.

How soon the calm, humane, and polish'd man
 Forgets compunction, and starts up a fiend !
 Who pines in love, or wastes with silent cares,
 Envy, or ignominy, or tender grief,
 Slowly descends, and ling'ring, to the shades.
 But he whom anger stings, drops, if he dies,
 At once, and rushes apoplectic down ;
 Or a fierce fever hurries him to hell,
 For, as the body through unnumber'd strings
 Reverberates each vibration of the soul ;
 As is the passion, such is still the pain
 The body feels : or chronic, or acute.
 And oft a sudden storm at once o'erpowers
 The life, or gives your reason to the winds.
 Such fates attend the rash alarm of fear,
 And sudden grief, and rage, and sudden joy. [fit
 There are, mean time, to whom the boist'rous
 Is health, and only fills the sails of life.
 For where the mind a torpid winter leads,
 Wrapt in a body corpulent and cold,
 And each clogg'd function lazily moves on ;
 A generous sally spurns th' incumbent load,
 Unlocks the breast, and gives a cordial glow.
 But if your wrathful blood is apt to boil,
 Or are your nerves too irritably strung,
 Wave all dispute ; be cautious, if you joke ;
 Keep lent for ever ; and forswear the bowl.
 For one rash moment sends you to the shades,
 Or shatters ev'ry hopeful scheme of life,
 And gives to horror all your days to come.
 Fate, arm'd with thunder, fire, and ev'ry plague,
 That ruins, tortures, or distracts mankind,
 And makes the happy wretched in an hour,
 O'erwhelms you not with woes so horrible
 As your own wrath, nor gives more sudden blows.

While choler works, good friend, you may be wrong ;

Distrust yourself, and sleep before you fight.
 'Tis not too late to-morrow to be brave ;
 If honour bids, to-morrow kill or die.
 But calm advice against a raging fit
 Avails too little ; and it braves the power
 Of all that ever taught in prose or song,
 To tame the fiend that sleeps a gentle lamb,
 And wakes a lion. Unprovok'd and calm,
 You reason well ; see as you ought to see,
 And wonder at the madness of mankind :
 Seiz'd with the common rage, you soon forget
 The speculations of your wiser hours.
 Beset with furies of all deadly shapes,

Fierce and insidious, violent and flow :
 With all that urge or lure us on to fate :
 What refuge shall we seek ? what arms prepare ?
 Where reason proves too weak, or void of wiles
 To cope with subtle or impetuous powers,
 I would invoke new passions to your aid :
 With indignation would extinguish fear,
 With fear or generous pity vanquish rage,
 And love with pride ; and force to force oppose.

There is a charm, a power, that sways the
 breast ;

Bids every passion revel or be still ;
 Inspires with rage, or all your cares dissolves ;
 Can sooth distraction, and almost despair.
 That power is music : far beyond the stretch
 Of those unmeaning warblers on our stage ;
 Those clumsy heroes, those fat-headed gods,
 Who move no passion justly but contempt :
 Who, like our dancers (light indeed and strong) !
 Do wond'rous feats, but never heard of grace.
 The fault is ours ; we bear those monstrous arts ;
 Good Heaven ! we praise them : we, with loudest
 peals,

Applaud the fool that highest lifts his heels ;
 And, with insipid show of rapture, die
 Of idiot notes impertinently long.
 But he the muse's laurel justly shares,
 A poet he, and touch'd with Heaven's own fire ;
 Who, with bold rage or solemn pomp of sounds,
 Inflames, exalts, and ravishes the soul ;
 Now tender, plaintive, sweet almost to pain,
 In love dissolves you ; now in sprightly strains
 Breathes a gay rapture through your thrilling
 breast,

Or melts the heart with airs divinely sad,
 Or wakes to horror the tremendous strings.
 Such was the bard, whose heavenly strains of old
 Appeas'd the fiend of melancholy Saul.
 Such was, if old and heathen fame say true,
 The man who bade the Theban domes ascend,
 And tam'd the savage nations with his song ;
 And such the Thracian, whose melodious lyre,
 Tun'd to soft woe, made all the mountains weep ;
 Sooth'd even th' inexorable powers of hell,
 And half redeem'd his lost Eurydice.
 Music exalts each joy, allays each grief,
 Expels diseases, softens every pain,
 Subdues the rage of poison, and the plague ;
 And hence the wise of ancient days ador'd
 One power of physic, melody, and song.

P O E M S.

OF BENEVOLENCE.

AN EPISTLE TO EUMENES *. 1751.

KIND to my frailties still, Eumenes, hear ;
 Once more I try the patience of your ear.

* This little piece was addressed to a worthy gentleman, as an expression of gratitude for his kind endeavours to do the author a great piece of service.

Not oft I sing : the happier for the town,
 So stunn'd already, they're quite stupid grown }
 With monthly, daily—charming things I own. }
 Happy for them I seldom court the nine ;
 Another art, a serious art, is mine.
 Of nauseous verses offer'd once a week,
 You cannot say I did it, if you're sick.
 'Twas ne'er my pride to shine by flashy fits
 Amongst the daily, weekly, monthly wits.

Content if some few friends indulge my name,
So slightly am I stung with love of fame,
I would not scrawl one hundred idle lines—
Not for the praise of all the magazines.

Yet once a moon, perhaps, I steal a night;
And, if our sire Apollo pleases, write.
You smile; but all the train the muse that follow,
Christians and dunces, still we quote Apollo.
Unhappy still our poets will rehearse
To Goths, that stare astonish'd at their verse;
To the rank tribes submit their virgin lays;
So gross, so bestial, is the lust of praise!

I to sound judges from the mob appeal,
And write to those who most my subject feel.
Eumenes, these dry moral lines I trust
With you, whom nought that's moral can disgust.
With you I venture, in plain home-spun sense,
What I imagine of benevolence.

Of all the monsters of the human kind,
What strikes you most is the low selfish mind.
You wonder how, without one liberal joy,
The steady miser can his years employ;
Without one friend, how'er his fortunes thrive,
Despis'd and hated, how he bears to live.
With honest warmth of heart, with some degree
Of pity that such wretched things should be,
You scorn the sordid knave—He grins at you,
And deems himself the wiser of the two.—
'Tis all but taste, how'er we sift the case;
He has his joy, as every creature has.
'Tis true, he cannot boast an angel's share,
Yet has what happiness his organs bear.
Thou likewise mad'st the high seraphic soul,
Maker Omnipotent! and thou the owl,
Heav'n form'd him too, and doubtless for some use:

But Crane-court knows not yet all nature's views.

'Tis chiefly taste, or blunt, or gross, or fine,
Makes life insipid, bestial, or divine.
Better be born with taste to little rent
Than the dull monarch of a continent.
Without this bounty which the gods bestow,
Can fortune make one favourite happy?—No.
As well might fortune, in her frolic vein,
Proclaim an oyster sovereign of the main.
Without fine nerves, and bosom justly warm'd,
An eye, an ear, a fancy to be charm'd,
In vain majestic Wren expands the dome;
Blank as pale stucco Rubens lines the room:
Lost are the raptures of bold Handel's strain;
Great Tully storms, sweet Virgil sings, in vain.
The beauteous forms of nature are effac'd;
Tempe's soft charms, the raging wat'ry waste,
Each greatly-wild, each sweet romantic scene,
Unheeded rises, and almost unseen.

Yet these are joys, with some of better clay,
To sooth the toils of life's embarrass'd way.
These the fine frame which charming horrors chill,
And give the nerves delightfully to thrill.
But of all taste the noblest and the best,
The first enjoyment of the generous breast,
Is to behold in man's obnoxious state
Scenes of content, and happy turns of fate.
Fair views of nature, shining works of art,
Amuse the fancy, but those touch the heart.

Chiefly for this proud epic song delights,
For this some riot on th' Arabian Nights.
Each case is ours; and, for the human mind,
'Tis monstrous not to feel for all mankind.
Were all mankind unhappy, who could taste
Elysium, or be solitarily blest?
Shock'd with surrounding shapes of human woe,
All that or sense or fancy could bestow,
You would reject with sick and coy disdain,
And pant to see one cheerful face again.

But if life's better prospects to behold
So much delight the man of generous mould,
How happy they, the great, the godlike few,
Who daily cultivate this pleasing view!
This is a joy possess'd by few indeed!
Dame fortune has so many fools to feed,
She cannot oft afford, with all her store,
To yield her smiles where nature smil'd before.
To sinking worth a cordial hand to lend;
With better fortune to surprise a friend;
To cheer the modest stranger's lonely state;
Or snatch an orphan family from fate;
To do, possess'd with virtue's noblest fire,
Such generous deeds as we with tears admire;
Deeds that, above ambition's vulgar aim,
Secure an amiable, a solid fame:
These are such joys as heaven's first favourites seize;

These please you now, and will for ever please.

Too seldom we great moral deeds admire;
The will, the power, th' occasion, must conspire.
Yet few there are so impotent and low,
But can some small good offices bestow.
Small as they are, however cheap they come,
They add still something to the general sum:
And him who gives the little in his power,
The world acquits; and Heaven demands no more.

Unhappy he who feels each neighbour's woe,
Yet no relief, no comfort can bestow.
Unhappy too, who feels each kind essay,
And for great favours has but words to pay;
Who, scornful of the flatterer's fawning art,
Dreads even to pour his gratitude of heart;
And with a distant lover's silent pain
Must the best movements of his soul restrain.
But men, sagacious to explore mankind,
Trace even the coyest passions of the mind.

Not only to the good we owe good will;
In good and bad distress demands it still.
This with the generous lays distinction low,
Endears a friend, and recommends a foe.
Not that resentment never ought to rise;
For even excess of virtue ranks with vice:
And there are villanies no bench can awe,
That sport without the limits of the law.
No laws th' ungenerous crime would reprehend,
Could I forget Eumenes was my friend:
In vain the gibbet or the pillory claim
The wretch who blasts a helpless virgin's fame.
Where laws are dup'd, 'tis nor unjust nor mean
To seize the proper time for honest spleen.
An open candid foe I could not hate,
Nor even insult the base in humbled state;
But thriving malice tamely to forgive—
'Tis somewhat late to be so primitive.

But I detain you with these tedious lays,
Which few perhaps would read, and fewer praise.
No matter: could I please the polish'd few
Who taste the serious or the gay like you,
The squeamish mob may find my verses bare
Of every grace—but curse me if I care.
Besides, I little court Parnassian fame;
There's yet a better than a poet's name.
'Twould more indulge my pride to hear it said
That I with you the paths of honour tread,
Than that amongst the proud poetic train
No modern boasted a more classic vein;
Or that in numbers I let loose my song,
Smooth as the Tweed, and as the Severn strong.

TASTE:

AN EPISTLE TO A YOUNG CRITIC. 1753.

"Proferre quæ sentiat cur quisquam liber dubitet?—Malim, mehercule, solus insanire, quam sobrius aut plebis aut patrum delirationibus ig-naviter assentari."— Author Anonym. Fragm.

RANGE from Tower-hill all London to the Fleet, Thence round the Temple, t' utmost Grosvenor-street:

Take in your route both Gray's and Lincoln's
Mifs not, be sure, my lords and gentlemen;
You'll hardly raise, as I with * Petty guess
Above twelve thousand men of taste, unless
In desperate times a Connoisseur may pass.

"A connoisseur! What's that?" 'Tis hard to say:

But you must oft, amidst the fair and gay,
Have seen a would-be rake, a fluttering fool,
Who swears he loves the sex with all his soul.
Alas, vain youth! dost thou admire sweet Jones?
Thou be gallant without or blood or bones!
You'd split to hear th' insipid coxcomb cry
Ah, charming Nanny! 'tis too much! I die!—
Die and be d—n'd, says one; but let me tell ye
I'll pay the loss if ever rapture kill ye.

'Tis easy learnt the art to talk by rote:
At Nando's 'twill but cost you half a groat;
The Bedford school at threepence is not dear, Sir;
At White's—the stars instruct you for a tester.
But he, whom nature never meant to share
One spark of taste, will never catch it there:—
Nor no where else; howe'er the booby beau
Grows great with Pope, and Horace, and Boileau.

Good native taste, though rude, is seldom wrong,
Be it in music, painting, or in song.

But this, as well as other faculties,
Improves with age, and ripens by degrees.
I know, my dear, 'tis needless to deny 't,
You like Voiture, you think him wondrous bright:
But seven years hence, your relish more matur'd,
What new delights will hardly be endur'd
The boy may live to taste Racine's fine charms,
Whom Lee's bald orb or Rowe's dry rapture
warms:

But he, enfranchis'd from his tutor's care,
Who places Butler near Cervantes' chair;

* Sir William Petty, author of the Political Arithmetic.

Or with Erasmus can admit to vie
Brown of Squab-hall, of merry memory;
Will die a Goth; and nod at * Woden's feast,
Th' eternal winter long, on † Gregory's breast.

Long may he swill, this patriarch of the dull,
The drowsy mum—But touch not Maro's skull!
His holy barbarous dotage sought to doom,
Good heaven! th' immortal classics to the tomb!—
Those sacred lights shall bid new genius rise,
When all Rome's saints have rotted from the skies.
Be these your guides, if at the ivy crown
You aim; each country's classics, and your own.
But chiefly with the ancients pass your prime,
And drink Castalia at the fountain's brim.
The man to genuine burgundy bred up,
Soon starts the dash of Methuen in his cup.

Those sovereign masters of the muses skill
Are the true patterns of good writing still.
Their ore was rich, and seven times purg'd of
lead;

Their art seem'd nature, 'twas so finely hid.
Though born with all the powers of writing well,
What pains it cost they did not blush to tell.
Their ease (my lords)! ne'er loung'd for want of
fire,

Nor did their rage through affectation tire,
Free from all tawdry and imposing glare
They trusted to their native grace of air.
Rapt'rous and wild the trembling soul they seize
Or fly coy beauties steal it by degrees;
The more you view them still the more they
please.

Yet there are thousands of scholastic merit
Who worm their sense out but ne'er taste their spirit.

Witness each pedant under bently bred;
Each commentator that e'er commented.
(You scarce can seize a spot of classic ground,
With leagues of Dutch morals so floated round).
Witness—but Sir, I hold a cautious pen,
Lest I should wrong some honourable men,
They grow enthusiasts too—'Tis true! 'Tis pity!
But 'tis not every lunatic that's witty.
Some have run Maro—and some Milton—mad,
Ashley once turn'd a solid barber's head:
Hear all that's said or printed if you can,
Ashley has turn'd more solid heads than one.

Let such admire each great or specious name;
For right or wrong the joy to them's the same.
"Right!" Yes a thousand times—Each fool has heard

That Homer was a wonder of a bard.
Despise them civilly with all my heart—
But to convince them is a desperate part.
Why should you tease one for what secret cause
One doats on Horace, or on Hudibras?

* Alluding to the Gothic heaven. Woden's hall;
where the happy are for ever employed in drinking beer, mum, and other comfortable liquors, out of the skulls of those whom they have slain in battle.

† Pope Gregory the Vth, distinguished by the name of St. Gregory; whose pious zeal in the cause of barbarous ignorance and priestly tyranny, exerted itself in demolishing to the utmost of his power, all the remains of beaten genius.

'Tis cruel, Sir, 'tis needless, to endeavour
To teach a sot of taste he knows no flavour,
To disunite I neither wish nor hope
A stubborn blockhead from his fav'rite fop.
Yes—fop I say, were Maro's self before 'em :
For Maro's self grows dull as they pore o'er him.

But hear their raptures o'er some specious rhyme
Dubb'd by the musk'd and greasy mob sublime.
For spleen's dear sake hear how a coxcomb prates
As clam'rous o'er his joys as fifty cats ;

" Musie has charms to sooth the savage breast,
" To soften rocks, and oaks,"—and all the rest ;
" I've heard"—Bless these long ears !—" Heavens
" what a strain !

" Good God ! what thunders burst in this Cam" paign !

" Hark Waller warbles ! Ah ! how sweetly killing !

" Then that inimitable Splendid Shilling !

" Rowe breathes all Shakspeare here !—that ode
" of Prior

" Is Spenser quite ! egad his very fire !—

" As like"—Yes faith ! as gum-flowers to the rose,
Or as to claret flat Minorca's dose ;

As like as (if I am not grossly wrong)

Erle Robert's mice to aught e'er Chaucer sung.

Read boldly, and unprejudic'd peruse
Each fav'rite modern, ev'n each ancient muse.

With all the comic salt and tragic rage

The great stupendous genius of our stage,

Boast of our island, pride of humankind,

Had faults to which the boxes are not blind.

His frailties are to every gossip known :

Yet Milton's pedantries not shock the town.

Ne'er be the dupe of names, however high ;

For some outlive good parts, some misapply.

Each elegant Spectator you admire ;

But must you therefore swear by Cato's fire ?

Masks for the court, and oft a clumsy jest,

Disgrac'd the muse that wrought the Alchemist,

" But to the ancients."—Faith ! I am not clear,

For all the smooth round type of Elzevir,

That every work which lasts in prose or song,

Two thousand years, deserves to last so long.

For not to mention some eternal blades

Known only now in th' academic shades,

(Those sacred groves where raptur'd spirits stray,
And in word-hunting waste the live-long day)

Ancients whom none but curious critics scan,

Do, read * Messala's praises if you can.

Ah ! who but feels the sweet contagious smart

While soft Tibullus pours his tender heart ?

With him the loves and muses melt in tears ;

But not a word of some hexameters.

" You grow so squeamish and so dev'lish dry,

" You'll call Lucretius vapid next." Not I.

Some find him tedious, others think him lame :

But if he lags his subject is to blame.

Rough weary roads through barren wilds he tried,

Yet still he marches with true Roman pride :

Sometimes a meteor, gorgeous, rapid, bright,

He streams athwart the philosophic night.

—————

* A poem of Tibullus's in hexameter verse ; as yawning and insipid as his elegies are tender and natural.

Find you in Horace no insipid odes ?—

He dar'd to tell us Homer sometimes nods ;

And but for such a critic's hardy skill

Homer might slumber unsuspected still.

Tasteless, implicit, indolent, and tame,

At second hand we chiefly praise or blame.

Hence 'tis, for else one knows not why nor how,

Some authors flourish for a year or two ;

For many some, more wond'rous still to tell ;

Farquhar yet lingers on the brink of hell.

Of solid merit others pine unknown ;

At first, though * Carlos swimmingly went down }
Poor Belvidera fail'd to melt the town. }

Sunk in dead night the giant Milton lay

'Till Sommer's hand produc'd him to the day.

But, thanks to heaven and Addison's good grace,

Now ev'ry fop is charm'd with Chevy Chase.

Specious and sage, the sovereign of the flock

Led to the downs, or from the wave-worn rock

Reluctant hurl'd, the tame implicit train

Or crop the downs, or headlong seek the main.

As blindly we our solemn leaders follow,

And good, and bad, and execrable swallow.

Pray, on the first throng'd evening of a play

That wears the † facies hippocratica,

Strong lines of death, signs dire of reprobation ;

Have you not seen the angel of salvation

Appear sublime ; with wise and solemn rap

To teach the doubtful rabble where to clap :—

The rabble knows not where our dramas shine ;

But where the cane goes pat—By G--- that's fine !

Judge for yourself ; nor wait with timid phlegm

Till some illustrious pedant hum or hem.

The lords who starv'd old Ben were learn'dly fond

Of Chaucer, whom with bungling toil they conn'd.

Their sons, whose ears bold Milton could not seize, }

Would laugh o'er Ben like mad, and snuff and }

And swear and seem as tickled as you please. }

Their spawn, the pride of this sublimer age,

Feel to the toes and horns grave Milton's rage.

Though liv'd he now he might appeal with scorn,

To lords, knights, 'squires, and doctors, yet un-

born,

Or justly mad to Moloch's burning fane

Devote the choicest children of his brain.

Judge for yourself ; and as you find report

Of wit as freely as of beef or port.

Zounds ! shall a pert or bluff important wight,

Whose brain is fanciless, whose blood is white ;

A mumbling ape of taste ; prescribe us laws

To try the poets, for no better cause

Than that he boasts per ann. ten thousand clear,

Yelps in the House, or barely fits a peer ?

For shame ! for shame ! the liberal British soul

To stoop to any stale dictator's rule !

—————

* Don Carlos, a tragedy of Otway's now long and justly forgotten, went off with great applause ; while his Orphan, a somewhat better performance, and what is yet more strange, his Venice Preserved, according to theatrical anecdotes of those times, met with a very cold reception.

† The appearance of the face in the last stage of a consumption, as it is described by Hippocrates.

I may be wrong, and often am no doubt,
But right or wrong with friends, with foes 'twill
out.

Thus 'tis perhaps my fault if I complain
Of trite invention and a flimsy vein,
Tame characters, uninteresting, jejune,
And passions drily copied from * Le Brun.
For I would rather never judge than wrong
That friend of all men, generous Fenelon.
But in the name of goodness, must I be
The dupe of charms I never yet could see?
And then to flatter where there's no reward—
Better be any patron-hunting bard,
Who half our lords with filthily praise besmears,
And sing an anthem to ALL MINISTERS:
Taste th' Attic salt in ev'ry peer's poor rebus,
And crown each Gothic idol for a Phœbus.

Alas! so far from free, so far from brave,
We dare not show the little taste we have.
With us you'll see ev'n vanity controul
The most refin'd sensations of the soul.
Sad Otway's scenes, great Shakspeare's we defy:
"Lard, Madam! 'tis so unpolite to cry!"
"For shame, my dear! d'ye credit all this stuff?"
"I vow—well, this is innocent enough?"
At Athens long ago, the ladies—(married)
Dreamt not they misbehav'd though they miscarried,

When a wild poet with licentious rage
Turn'd fifty furies loose upon the stage.

They were so tender and so easy mov'd,
Heavens! how the Grecian ladies must have lov'd!
For all the fine sensations still have dwelt,
Perhaps, where one was exquisitely felt.
Thus he who heavenly Maro truly feels
Stands fix'd on Raphael, and at Handel thrills.
The grosser senses too, the taste, the smell,
Are likely truest where the fine prevail:
Who doubts that Horace must have cater'd well?
Friend, I'm a shrewd observer, and will guess
What books you doat on from your fav'rite mess.
Brown and L'Estrange will surely charm whom-e'er

The frothy pertness strikes of weak small beer.
Who sleeps the calf's fat loin in greasy sauce
Will hardly lothe the praise that bastes an ass.

* First painter to Lewis XIV. who, to speak in fashionable English, called himself LEWISTHE GREAT.
Our sovereign lords the passions, love, rage, despair, &c.
were graciously pleased to sit to him in their turns for their portraits; which he was generous enough to communicate to the public, to the great improvement, no doubt, of history-painting. It was he who they say poisoned Le Sueur; who, without half his advantages, in many other respects, was so unreasonable and provoking as to display a genius with which his own could stand no comparison. It was he and his Gothic disciples, who, with sly scratches, defaced the most masterly of this Le Sueur's performances, as often as their barbarous envy could snugly reach them. Yet after all these achievements he died in his bed! A catastrophe which could not have happened to him in a country like this,
where the fine arts are as zealously and judiciously pa-
tronised as they are well understood.

Who riots on Scotch collops scorns not any
Insipid, fulsome, trashy miscellany;
And who devours whate'er the cook can dish up,
Will for a classic consecrate each * bishop.

But I am sick of pen and ink; and you
Will find this letter long enough. Adieu!

IMITATION

OF SHAKSPEARE AND SPENSER.

Advertisement from the Publisher.

THE following imitation of Shakspeare was one of our author's first attempts in poetry, made when he was very young. It helped to amuse the solitude of a winter passed in a wild romantic country; and, what is rather particular, was just finished when Mr. Thomson's celebrated poem upon the same subject appeared. Mr. Thomson, soon hearing of it, had the curiosity to procure a copy by the means of a common acquaintance. He showed it to his poetical friends, Mr. Mallet, Mr. Aaron Hill, and Dr. Young, who, it seems, did great honour to it; and the first mentioned gentleman wrote to one of his friends at Edinburgh, desiring the author's leave to publish it; a request too flattering to youthful vanity to be resisted. But Mr. Mallet altered his mind: and this little piece has hitherto remained unpublished.

The other imitations of Shakspeare happen to have been saved out of the ruins of an unfinished tragedy on the story of Tereus and Philomela;
attempted upon an irregular and extravagant plan,
at an age much too early for such achievements.
However, they are here exhibited for the sake of such guests as may like a little repast of scraps.

Now summer with her wanton court is gone
To revel on the south side of the world,
And flaunt and frolic out the live-long day.
While winter rising pale from northern seas
Shakes from his hoary locks the drizzling rheum.
A blast so shrewd makes the tall-bodied pines
Unfinewed bend, and heavy-paced bears
Sends growling to their savage tenements.

Now blows the furlly north, and chills throughout
The stiffening regions; while, by stronger charms
Than Circe e'er or fell Medea brew'd,
Each brook that wont to prattle to its banks
Lies all bestill'd and wedg'd betwixt its banks,
Nor moves the wither'd reeds: and the rash flood
That from the mountains held its headstrong
course,

Buried in livid sheets of vaulting ice,
Seen through the shameful breaches, idly creeps
To pay a scanty tribute to the ocean.
What wonder? when the floating wilderness
That scorns our miles, and calls geography
A shallow pryer; from whose unsteady mirror
The high-hung pole surveys his dancing locks;

* See Felton's Glosses.

When this still-raving deep lies mute and dead,
Nor heaves its swelling bosom to the winds.
The surges, baited by the fierce north-east
Tossing with fretful spleen their angry heads
To roar and rush together,
Even in the foam of all their madness struck
To monumental ice, stand all astride
The rocks they wash'd so late. Such execution,
So stern, so sudden, wrought the grisly aspect
Of terrible Medusa, ere young Perseus
With his keen sabre cropt her horrid head,
And laid her serpents rowling on the dust;
When wandering through the woods she frown'd to stone

Their savage tenants: just as the foaming lion
Sprung furious on his prey, her speedier power
Outrun his haste; no time to languish in,
But fix'd in that fierce attitude he stands
Like Rage in marble.—Now portly Argosies
Lie wedg'd 'twixt Neptune's ribs. The bridg'd abyss

Has chang'd our ships to horses; the swift bark
Yields to the heavy waggon and the cart,
That now from isle to isle maintain the trade;
And where the surface-haunting dolphin led
Her sportive young, is now an area fit
For the wild school-boy's pastime.

Meantime the evening skies, crust'd with ice,
Shifting from red to black their weighty skirts,
Hang mournful o'er the hills; and stealing night
Rides the bleak puffing winds, that seem to spit
Their foam sparse through the welkin, which is nothing

If not beheld. Anon the burden'd heaven
Shakes from its ample sieve the boulded snow;
That fluttering down besprinkles the sad trees
In mockery of leaves; piles up the hills
To monstrous altitude, and chokes to the lips
The deep impervious vales that yawn as low
As to the centre, nature's vasty breaches.
While all the pride of men and mortal things
Lies whelm'd in heaven's white ruins.—

The shivering clown digs his obstructed way
Through the snow-barricaded cottage door;
And muffled in his home-spun plaid encounters
With livid cheeks and rheum-distilling nose
The morning's sharp and scourging breath; to count

His starving flock whose number's all too short
To make the goodly sum of yesternight:
Part deep ingurgitated, part yet struggling
With their last pantings melt themselves a grave
In winter's bosom; which yields not to the touch
Of the pale languid crescent of this world,
That now with lean and churlish husbandry
Yields heartlessly the remnants of his prime;
And like most spendthrifts starves his latter days
For former rankness. He with bleary eye
Blazons his own disgrace; the harness'd waste
Rebellious to his blunt defeated shafts;
And idly strikes the chalky mountains tops
That rise to kiss the welkin's ruddy lips;
Where all the rash young bullies of the air
Mount their quick slender penetrating wings,
Whipping the frost-burnt villagers to the bones;

And growing with their motion mad and furious,
Till swoln to tempests they out-rage the thunder;
Winnow the chaffy snow, and mock the skies
Even with their own artillery retorted;
Tear up and throw th' accumulated hills
Into the vallies. And as rude hurricanes,
Discharg'd from the wind-swoln cheeks of heaven,
Buoy up the swilling skirts of Araby's
Inhospitable wilds,
And roll the dusty desert through the skies,
Choking the liberal air, and smothering
Whole caravans at once; such havoc spreads
This war of heaven and earth, such sudden ruin
Visits their houseless citizens, that shrink
In the false shelter of the hills together,
And hear the tempest howling o'er their heads
That by and by o'erwhelms them. The very birds,
Those few that troop'd not with the chiming tribe
Of amorous summer, quit their ruffian element;
And with domestic tameness hop and flutter
Within the roofs of persecuting man,
(Grown hospitable by like sense of sufferance);
Whither the hinds, the debt o' the day discharg'd,
From kiln or barn repairing, shut the door
On furly winter; crowd the clean-swept hearth
And cheerful shining fire; and doff the time,
The whilst the maids their twirling spindles ply,
With musty legends and ear-pathing tales;
Of giants, and black necromantic bards,
Of air-built castles, seats of madcap knights,
And every hollow fiction of romance.

And, as their rambling humour leads them, talk
Of prodigies, and things of dreadful utterance;
That set them all agape, rouse up their hair,
And make the idiot drops start from their eyes;
Of church-yard belching flames at dead of night,
Of walking statues, ghosts unaffable,
Haunting the dark waste tower or airless dungeon;
Then of the elves that deftly trip the green,
Drinking the summer's moonlight from the flowers;

And all the toys that phantasy pranks up
To amuse her fools withal.—Thus they lash on
The snail-pac'd hyperborean nights, till heaven
Hangs with a juster poize: when the murky clouds
Roll'd up in heavy wreaths low-bellying, seem
To kiss the ground, and all the waste of snow
Looks blue beneath 'em: till plump'd with bloat-
ing dropsy,

Beyond the bounds and stretch of continence,
They burst at once; down pours the hoarded rain,
Washing the slippery winter from the hills,
And floating all the vallies. The fading scene
Melts like a lost enchantment, or vain phantasm
That can no more abuse. Nature resumes
Her old substantial shape: while from the waste
Of undistinguishing calamity,
Forest, and by their sides wide-skirted plains,
Houses and trees arise; and waters flow,
That from their dark confinements bursting, spurn
Their brittle chains; huge sheets of loosen'd ice
Float on their bosoms to the deep, and jarr
And clatter as they pass; th' o'erjutting banks,
As long unpractis'd to so steep a view,
Seem to look dizzy on the moving pomp.

Now ev'ry petty brook that crawl'd along,
Railing its pebbles, mocks the river's rage,
Like the proud frog i' the fable. The huge Danube,
While melting mountains rush into its tide,
Rolls with such headstrong and unreined course,
As it would choke the Euxine's gulfy maw,
Bursting his crystal cerements. The breathing time
Of peace expir'd, that hush'd the deaf'ning scenes
Of clam'rous indignation, ruffian war
Rebels, and nature stands at odds again :
When the rous'd furies of the fighting winds
Torment the main ; that swells its angry sides,
And churns the foam betwixt its flinty jaws ;
While through the savage dungeon of the night
The horrid thunder growls. Th' ambitious waves
Assault the skies, and from the bursting clouds
Drink the glib lightning ; as if the seas
Would quench the ever burning fires of heaven.
Straight from their slipp'ry pomp they madly plunge

And kiss the lowest pebbles. Wretched they
That 'midst such rude vexation of the deep
Guide a frail vessel. Better ice-bound still,
Than mock'd with liberty thus be resign'd
To the rough fortune of the froward time ;
When navigation all a tip-toe stands
On such unsteady footing. Now they mount
On the tall billow's top, and seem to jowl
Against the stars : whence (dreadful eminence) !
They see with swimming eyes (enough to hurry
round

In endless vertigo the dizzy brain)
A gulf that swallows vision, with wide mouth
Steep-yawning to receive them ; down they duck
To the rugged bottom of the main, and view
The adamantine gates of vaulted hell :
Thence toss'd to light again till borne adrift
Against some icy mountains bulging sides
They reel, and are no more. — Nor less by land
Ravage the winds, that in their wayward rage
Howl through the wide unhospitable glens ;
That rock the stable-planted towers and shake
The hoary monuments of ancient time
Down to their flinty bases ; that engage
As they would tear the mountains from their roots,
And brush the high heavens with their woody heads ;

Making the stout oak bow. — But I forget
That sprightly Ver trips on old winter's heel :
Cease we these notes too tragic for the time,
Nor jar against great nature's symphony ;
When even the blustrous elements grow tuneful,
Or listen to the concert. Hark ! how loud
The cuckoo wakes the solitary wood !
Soft sigh the winds as o'er the greens they stray,
And murmuring brooks within their channels play.

PROGNE'S DREAM :

Darkly expressive of some past events that were soon to be revealed to her.

—————LAST night I dreamt,
Whate'er it may forebode it moves me strangely,
That I was rapt into the raving deep ;
An old and reverend sire conducted me ;

He plung'd into the bosom of the main,
And bade me not to fear but follow him.
I followed ; with impetuous speed we div'd,
And heard the dashing thunder o'er our heads.
Many a slippery fathom down we sunk, [tom.
Beneath all plummets' sound, and reach'd the bot-
When there, I ask'd my venerable guide
If he could tell me where my sister was ;
He told me that she lay not far from thence
Within the bosom of a flinty rock,
Where Neptune kept her for his paramour
Hid from the jealous Amphitrite's sight ;
And said he could conduct me to the place.
I beg'd he would. Through dreadful ways we past, [side,
'Twixt rocks that frightfully lower'd on either
Whence here and there the branching coral sprung ;
O'er dead men's bones we walk'd, o'er heaps of gold and gems,
Into a hideous kind of wilderness,
Where stood a stern and prison-looking rock,
Daub'd with a mossy verdure all around,
The mockery of paint. As we drew near
Out sprung a hydra from a den below,
A speckl'd fury ; fearfully it hiss'd,
And roll'd its sea-green eyes so angrily
As it would kill with looking. My old guide
Against its sharp head hurl'd a rugged stone—
The curling monster rais'd a brazen shriek,
Wallow'd and died in fitful agonies.
We gain'd the cave. Through woven adamant
I look'd, and saw my sister all alone.
Employ'd she seem'd in writing something sad,
So sad she look'd : Her cheek was wond'rous wan,
Her mournful locks like weary sedges hung.
I call'd—she turning, started when she saw me,
And threw her head aside as if ashamed ;
She wept, but would not speak—I call'd again ;
Still she was mute. — Then madly I address'd,
With all the lion-sinews of despair,
To break the flinty ribs that held me out ;
And with the struggling wak'd.—

A STORM ;

Raised to account for the late return of a Messenger.

—————THE sun went down in wrath ;
The skies foam'd brass, and soon th' unchained winds
Burst from the howling dungeon of the north :
And rais'd such high delirium on the main,
Such angry clamour ; while such boiling waves
Flash'd on the peevish eye of moody night,
It look'd as if the seas would scald the heavens.
Still louder chid the winds, th' enchain'd surge
Still answer'd louder ; and when the sickly morn Peep'd ruefully through the blotted thick brow'd cast

To view the ruinous havock of the dark,
The stately towers of Athens seem'd to stand
On hollow foam tide-whipt ; the ships that lay
Scorning the blast within the marble arms
Of the sea-child Portumnus, danc'd like corks
Upon th' enraged deep, kicking each other ;
And some were dash'd to fragments in this fray

Against the harbour's rocky chest. The sea
So roar'd, so madly rag'd, so proudly swell'd,
As it would thunder full into the streets,
And steep the tall Cecropian battlements
In foaming brine. The airy citadel,
Perch'd like an eagle on a high-brow'd rock,
Shook the salt water from its stubborn sides
With eager quaking; the Cyclades appear'd
Like ducking cormorants—Such a mutiny
Out-clamour'd all tradition, and gain'd belief
To ranting prodigies of heretofore.
Seven days it storm'd, &c.

AN IMITATION OF SPENSER.

Written at Mr. Thomson's desire, to be inserted into the Castle of Indolence.

FULL many a fiend did haunt this house of rest,
And made of passive wights an easy prey.
Here lethargy with deadly sleep oppress'd,
Stretch'd on his back, a mighty lubbard lay,
Heaving his sides; and snored night and day.
To stir him from his trance it was not eath,
And his half-open'd eyene he shut straightway:
He led, I ween, the softest way to death,
And taught, withouten pain or strife, to yield the breath.

Of limbs enormous, but withal unsound,
Soft swoln and pale, here lay the hydropsy;
Unwieldy man, with belly monstrous round,
For ever fed with watery supply;
For still he drank, and yet he still was dry.
And here a moping mystery did sit,
Mother of spleen, in robes of various dye:
She call'd herself the hypochondriac fit,
And frantic seem'd to some, to others seem'd a wit.

A lady was she, whimsical and proud,
Yet oft through fear her pride would crouchen
low.
She felt, or fancied, in her fluttering mood,
All the diseases that the 'spitals know,
And sought all physic that the shops bestow;
And still new leaches, and new drugs would try.
'Twas hard to hit her humour, high or low; [cry,
For sometimes she would laugh, and sometimes Sometimes would waxen wroth; and all—she knew not why.

Fast by her side a listless virgin pin'd, [ings;
With aching head, and squeamish heart-burn—
Pale, bloated, cold, she seem'd to hate mankind,
But lov'd in secret all forbidden things.
And here the Tertian shook his chilling wings;
And here the gout, half tiger half a snake,
Rag'd with an hundred teeth, an hundred stings;
These, and a thousand furies more, did shake
Those weary realms, and kept ease-loving men awake.

A DAY:

AN EPISTLE TO JOHN WILKES OF AYLES-
BURY, ESQ.

ESCAP'd from London now four moons, and more,
I greet gay Wilkes from Fulda's wasted shore,

Where, cloth'd with woods, a hundred hills ascend,
Where nature many a paradise has plann'd:
A land that, e'en amid contending arms,
Late smil'd with culture, and luxuriant charms;
But now the hostile scythe has bar'd her soil,
And her sad peasants starve for all their toil.

What news to-day?—I ask you not what rogue,
What paltry imp of fortune's now in vogue;
What forward blundering fool was last preferr'd,
By mere pretence distinguish'd from the herd;
With what new cheat the gaping town is smit;
What crazy scribbler reigns the present wit;
What stuff for winter the two booths have mix'd;
What bouncing mimic grows a Roscius next.
Wave all such news: I've seen too much, my
friend,

To stare at any wonders of that kind.

News, none have I: you know I never had;
I never long'd the day's dull lie to spread;
I left to gossip that sweet luxury,
More in the secrets of the great than I;
To nurses, midwives, all the slippery train,
That swallow all, and bring up all again:
Or did I e'er a brief event relate,
You found it soon at length in the Gazette.

Now for the weather—this is England still
For aught I find, as good, and quite as ill.
Even now the pond'rous rain perpetual falls,
Drowns every camp, and crowds our hospitals.
This soaking deluge all unstrings my frame,
Dilutes my sense, and suffocates my flame—
'Tis that which makes these present lines so tame.
The parching east wind still pursues me too—
Is there no climate where this fiend ne'er flew?
By heaven, it says Japan, perhaps Peru!
It blasts all earth with its envenom'd breath,
That scatters discord, rage, diseases, death.

'Twas the first plague that burst Pandora's chest,
And with a livid smile sow'd all around the rest.

Heaven guard my friend from every plague that flies, [rise.
Still grant him health, whence all the pleasures
But oft diseases from slow causes creep,
And in this doctrine as (thank Heaven) I'm deep,

.. ..
.. ..
.. ..
.. ..

Meantime excuse me that I slyly snatch
The only theme in which I shine your match.

You study early: some indulge at night,
Their prudish muse steals in by candle-light;
Shy as th' Athenian bird, she shuns the day,
And finds December genial more than May.
But happier you who court the early sun,
For morning visits no debauch draw on;
Nor so the spirits, health, or sight impair,
As those that pass in the raw midnight air.

The task of breakfast o'er; that peevish, pale,
That lounging, yawning, most ungenial meal;
Rush out before those fools rush in to worry ye,
Whose business is to be idle in a hurry,
Who kill your time as frankly as their own,
And feel no civil hints e'er to be gone.
These flies all fairly flung, whene'er the house,
Your country's business, or your friend's, allows,

Rush out, enjoy the fields and the fresh air;
Ride, walk, or drive, the weather foul or fair.
Yet in the torrid months I would reverse
This method, leave behind both prose and verse;
With the grey dawn the hills and forest roam,
And wait the sultry noon embower'd at home,
While every rural sound improves the breeze,
The railing stream, the busy rooks, and murmur of the bees.

You'll hardly choose these cheerful jaunts alone,
Except when some deep scheme is carrying on.
With you at Chelsea oft may I behold
The hopeful bud of sense her bloom unfold,
With you I'd walk to * * * * *
To rich, insipid Hackney, if you will;
With you no matter where, while we're together.

I scorn no spot on earth, and curse no weather :
When dinner comes, amid the various feast,
That crowns your genial board, where every guest,
Or grave, or gay, is happy, and at home,
And none e'er sigh'd for the mind's elbow-room ;
I warn you still to make your chief repast
On one plain dish, and trifle with the rest.

Beef, in a fever, if your stomach crave it,
Ox-cheek, or mawkish cod, be sure you have it;
For still the constitution, even the case,
Directs the stomach; this informs the taste;
And what the taste in her capricious fits
Coily, or even indifferently admits,
The peevish stomach, or disdains to toil,
Or indolently works to vapid chyle.
This instinct of the taste so seldom errs,
That if you love, yet smart for cucumbers,
Or plumbs of bad repute, you'll likely find
'Twas for you separated what nature join'd,
The spicy kernel here, and there the rind.

'Tis strange how blindly we from nature stray !
 The only creatures we that miss their way !
To err is human, man's prerogative,
 Who's too much sense by nature's laws to live :
 Wiser than nature, he must thwart her plan,
 And ever will be spoiling, where he can.
 'Tis well he cannot ocean change to cream,
 Nor earth to a gilded cake ; not e'en could tame
 Niagara's steep abyss to crawl down stairs * ,
 Or dress in roses the dire Cordelliers † :
 But what he can he does : well can he trim
 A charming spot into a childish whim ;
 Can every generous gift of nature spoil,
 And rates their merits by his cost and toil.
 Whate'er the land, whate'er the seas produce,
 Of perfect texture, and exalted juice,
 He pampers, or to fulsome fat, or drains,
 Refines and bleaches, till no taste remains.

* Vide Chatsworth, 1753.

Enough to fatten fools, or drive the dray,
But plagues and death to those of finer clay.
No corner else, 'tis not to be denied,
Of all our isle so rankly is supplied
With gross productions, and adulterate fare,
As one renown'd abode, whose name I spare.
They cram all poultry, that the hungry fox
Would lothe to touch them; e'en their boasted ox
Sometimes is glutted so with unctuous spoil,
That what seems beef is rather rape-seed oil.
D'ye know what brawn is?—O th' unhappy beast!

He stands eternal, and is doom'd to feast,
Till—but the nauseous process I forbear—
Only, beware of brawn—be sure, beware!
Yet brawn has taste—it has: their veal has none,
Save what the butcher's breath inspires alone:
Just heaven one day may send them hail for wheat.

Who spoil all veal because it should be white.
'Tis hard to say of what compounded paste
Their bread is wrought, for it betrays no taste,
Whether 'tis flour and chalk, or chalk and flour
Shell'd and refin'd, till it has taste no more;
But if the lump be white, and white enough,
No matter how insipid, dry, or tough.
In salt itself the sapid flavour fails,
Burnt alum for the love of white prevails:
While tasteless cole-seed we for mustard swallow,
'Tis void of zest indeed—but still 'tis yellow.
Parsnip, or parsley root, the rogues will soon
Scrape for horse radish, and 'twill pass unknown,
For by the colour, not the taste, we prove all,
As hens will sit on chalk, if 'tis but oval.

I must with caution the cook's reign invade,
 Hot as the fire, and hasty from his trade,
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 " " " " " " "
 A cook of genius, bid him roast a hare,
 By all that's hot and horrible would swear,
 Parch native drynefs ! zounds, that's not the thing—

But stew him, and he might half dine a king.
His gen'rous broth I should almost prefer
To Turtle Soup, though Turtle travels far.
You think me nice!

You think me nice perhaps : yet I could dine
On roasted rabbit ; or fat turkey and chine ;
Or fulsome haslet ; or most drily cram
My throat with tasteless fillet and wet ham :
But let me ne'er of mutton-saddle eat,
That solid phantom, that most specious cheat ;
Yet loin is passable, he was no fool
Who said the half is better than the whole :

But I have cook'd and carv'd enough and more,
We come to drinking next. 'Till dinner's o'er,
I would all claret, even Champain forbear,
Give me fresh water—blefs me with small-beer.

* IN IL SPENSEROSO.

ON SPENSER'S FAERY QUEENE.

Lo! here the place for contemplation made,
For sacred musing and for solemn song!—
—Hence, ye profane! nor violate the shade:
—Come, Spenser's awful genius, come along,
Mix with the music of th' ærial throng! [breast,
Oh! breathe a pensive stillness through my
While balmy breezes pant the leaves among,
And sweetly sooth my passions into rest.
Hint purest thoughts, in purest colours drest,
Even such as angels prompt, in golden dreams,
To holy hermit, high in raptures blest,
His bosom burning with celestial beams:
Ne less the raptures of my summer day,
If Spenser deign with me to moralize the lay.

IN SHAKSPEARE'S WALK.

By yon hills, with morning spread,
Lifting up the tufted head,
By those golden waves of corn,
Which the laughing fields adorn,
By the fragrant breath of flowers,
Stealing from the woodbine bowers,
By this thought-inspiring shade,
By the gleamings of the glade,
By the babbling of the brook,
Winding slow in many a crook,
By the rustling of the trees,
By the humming of the bees,
By the woodlark, by the thrush,
Wildly warbling from the bush,
By the fairy's shadowy tread
O'er the cowslip's dewy head,

IN MILTON'S ALCOVE.

Here, mighty Milton! in the blaze of noon,
Amid the broad effulgence, here I fix
Thy radiant tabernacle. Nought is dark
In thee, thou bright companion of the sun!
Thus thy own Uriel in its centre stands
Illustrious, waving glory round him! he,
Fairest archangel of all spirits in heaven,
As of the sons of men the greatest thou.

ON LAUREL HILL,

AT THE END OF THE GARDEN.

TO MR. POPE.

O SKILL'D thy every reader's breast to warm,
To lull with harmony, with sense to charm,
To call the glowing soul into the ear,
(And now we live, and now we die to hear,
Born on the waves of melody along
Exulting shout, and triumph in thy song)!
O Pope! the sweetest of the tuneful race.
This votive tablet, grateful, here I place;
Here, where the Graces sport on Laurel Hill.
Fast by the music of the murmuring rill;
From hence the bluish Berkshire hills survey,
Which oft have echoed to thy sylvan lay;
When young, in Windsor's blissful fields you stray'd,
Immortal by your deathless labours made!
There the first music trembled from thy tongue,
And * Binfield swains on every accent hung:
The larks the sweetness of thy notes confess,
And, dumb with envy, sunk into their nest;
While in soft silence † Loddon stole along,
And, listening, wonder'd at thy foster song.
Nor scorn the prospects which Oxonia yields,
Her hills as verdant, and as fair her fields,

* Mr. Pope lived at Binfield in Windsor Forest, Berkshire, where he wrote the most poetical of all his admirable works.

IN CHAUCER'S BOURE.

Who is this thilke old bard which wonneth here?
This thilke old bard, firs, is Dan Chaucer:
Full gentle knight was he, in very sooth,
Albee a little japepish in his youth.
He karoll'd deftly to his new pfauntry,
And eke couth tellen tales of jollity,
And sangs of solace all the livelong day,
Soote as the ouzle or throstell in May.
Withouten words mo, a merie maker he,
Ne hopen I his permagall to see.
Ne Johnny Gay, perdie, ne Matthew Prior,
In diting tales of pleasaunce couth go higher,
Here in this gardyn full of flowers gend,
Betwixt this elder-tree, and fresh woodbend,
He hearkeneth the foules' assemblee,
That fro' the twigs maken their melodie.
Ye pied daisies, spring neath his feet,
Who song so footly, "The daisy is so sweet:"
And whilest, "benedicite," he sings,
Run, little beck, in silver murmurings.
O pleasaunt poete, thyselfen solace here,
And merie be thy heart, old Dan Chaucer.

HAIL, happy garden, happy groves,
Whom your happiest master loves!
Here the Graces weave the ring,
While the Muses touch the string,

* Mr. Pope used frequently to visit Oxford: he likewise translated part of Homer at Stanton Harcourt in this county, as appears from an inscription in one of the windows there.

† I would not have it imagined by these lines, that I equall'd Pope to the great triumvirate, Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, who will reign a triumvirate for ever: it is honour enough to the greatest poets, even to Mr. Pope, to be placed next to them.

There Pomona blushes, there
Plump Lyæus braids his hair,
Braids with tendrils of the vine,
"Dropping odours, dropping wine,"
And gay Flora frolics, dress'd
In her many-colour'd vest.
O the waving of the trees!
And the fanning of the breeze!
O the prattling of the rill,
Still supplied, and prattling still!
O the zephyrs sweetly playing,
As when first they go a Maying!
O the birds, for ever singing,
And the flowers, for ever springing!
Hail, happy garden, happy groves,
Whom your happiest master loves!

FROM busy scenes, with peace alone retir'd,
And the warm ray of gratitude inspir'd,
For blessings past, and mercies yet to come.
Here let me praise my God, and fix my home!
With * Isaac, in the fields, for grace implore,
With Moses, in each beamy bush adore!
His providence for all my wants provides,
His arm upholds me, and his right hand guides:
His breezes fan me in the noontide hours,
Where coolness walks amid my shades and bowers:
His bounty in the silver current flows,
Smiles in the blossoms, in the fruitage glows:
Bright with † pomaceous stores, his gift, behold
Th' espaliers bend with balls of blooming gold!
His radiant finger gilds the vernal flowers,
Fed with his balm, and water'd with his showers:
He bids the rose its crimson folds unloose,
And blush refulgent in the purple dews:
The lily he arrays with spotless white,
Rich in its mantle of inwoven light:
(Go, Solomon, and cast thy gems aside,
Nor glory in thy poverty of pride!)
The painted tribes their sunny robes display,
And lend a lucid softness to the day.
Grateful each flower to heaven its incense pays,
And breathes its fragrant soul away in praise.
Oh, thither may they teach my soul to soar,
Confess our Maker, and his steps adore!
Contented let me live, submissive die,
And hope a fairer Paradise on high!

 And, next the sacred scriptures, bless mankind.

Ingeniosissimo Poetarum

D. D.

SHALL poets dignify my walks and bowers,
 Cowley forgot? forbid it, rural powers!
 Ye rural powers your choicest treasures shed,
 To form a garland for your Cowley's head:
 Collect the radiance of the showery bow,
 The rose's scarlet, and the lily's snow,
 To emulate his works, confus'dly bright,
 Where glories rise on glories, light on light,
 The prism of wit! Apollo, once before,
 So gilded Donne, but so could gild no more.
 Our moderns flow, 'tis true, in easy rhymes;
 But will our moderns flow through future times;
 Warm distant ages with their glorious fire,
 Inspir'd themselves, and potent to inspire?
 Cowley, this praise is thine!—an age is past,
 Yet still you charm the present as the last: [hold,
 Your thoughts, your verse, their pristine lustre
 Like rows of jewels rang'd on cloth of gold:
 Æneas' passport thus, the golden bough,
 Solid and bright at once, resembles you;
 Like that, you lead us to Elysium too.
 No muddy streams of dull pollution run
 In your chaste lines; each wanton hint you shun,
 Save when a transient Venus blots the sun.

tiful in his youth, that Archbishop Laud thought him almost an angel from heaven when he first saw and heard him in the pulpit. See Bishop Rust's sermon preached at Bishop Taylor's funeral.

His excellent treatises are highly valued for the exactness of wit, profoundness of judgment, richness of fancy, copiousness of invention, and general usefulness to all the purposes of a Christian. After the Restoration, he was made bishop of Down and Connor; where he further displayed his mighty talents, and shew'd, with an unbounded imagination, all the eloquence of orators, all the flights of poetry, together with all the strictness and regularity of the deepest casuists. Echard's History of England.

† His works are sometimes printed in four, sometimes in six volumes, in folio, besides six or seven volumes of devotions, &c. in octavo and duodecimo.

You sung each flower that spreads the vivid hue,
 Each healing plant that sips the silver dew;
 Each tree that decks the garden or the grove;
 You sung, but never felt, the fires of love:
 For love too witty, and from passion free,
 You had your mistress, but no lover she:
 Goaded with points, love never wept so sore,
 Though wounded by a muse's bee before.

O, master of the many-chorded lyre,
 Whom all the nine with all their gifts inspire!
 Next Spenser's bower, accept this humble shed,
 He charm'd you living, and you join him dead.
 But far I place thee from coy Daphne's tree;
 The tree that hates Apollo, loves not thee:
 Yet had Apollo sung so well, the maid
 Had yielded, nor been turn'd into a shade.

ON THE MOUNT UNDER MR. ADDISON'S PICTURE.

JUST to thy genius, to thy virtues just,
 Next Virgil's, Addison, I place thy bust;
 Such finish'd graces shine in every page,
 Correctly bold, and sober in your rage;
 So elegant with ease, so justly warm,
 Both raise with rapture, both with fancy charm.
 Your muse (no sybil with distortion wild)
 Serene in majesty, in glory mild;
 Your manly thoughts, in manly robes array'd,
 (No tinsel-glitter, and no painted shade)
 Command our wonder, while you march along,
 Consummate masters of immortal song!
 And hark! what notes are stealing on my ear,
 Which dying saints might breathe, or angels hear;
 As incense grateful to th' eternal King,
 And such as Addison alone could sing!
 Blush, vice, if vice can blush, and hide thy face;
 A wicked wit is nature's last disgrace:
 Let Virgil, Addison, your patterns shine,
 Disdain pollution, and commence divine.
 Hail, both! unenvied, and unequall'd pair!
 Your happily divided honours share.
 And thou, my mount, on Pindus' top look down,
 Grac'd with a Virgil and an Addison.

ANOTHER, UNDERNEATH.

THE blissful scenes which Virgil's pencil drew,
 Unfolding all Elysium to the view;
 The rural scenes which Addison display'd
 In beauteous Rosamonda's mazy shade;
 Here, realiz'd, in verdant charms appear,
 And Woodstock and Elysium flourish here.

UNDER HIS ECLOGUES AND GEORGICS,

BY THE CASCADE.

HERE Maro rests beneath the fragrant shade,
Lull'd by the murmurs of the soft cascade:
Ye shepherds, carol here your lays of love,
While pastoral music dies along the grove:
Ye swains, instructed by his grateful theme,
His praises whistle to the tinkling stream:
Ye bees, around your tuneful master throng,
And, humming in delight, his dreams prolong.
But hence the trumpet's clang, the din of war;
The thunder of the battle hence be far: [yield,
His bees, swains, shepherds more contentment
Than heroes blazing in the tented field.
"Arms and the man I sing" let others choose,
Give me the products of his rural muse.

BENEATH A VINE, UNDER A PICTURE OF HORACE.

BRING hither, friend, O hither bring
The lyre, and let us sit and sing:
Wake into life the dying flute,
The Thracian harp, or Lydian lute:
Horace commands; O quickly bring the lyre
For Horace, master of the Roman choir.

† With rosebuds grace the poet's brow,
With odours bid his ringlets flow;
These lilies crop and strew the ground;
And let my temples too be crown'd.
O fill the bowl beneath this mantling vine,
For Horace, arbiter of verse and wine!

With social joys we raise the hour,
But banish Cupid from the bower:
‡ Seven lustres past, ah! why should I,
And why should Horace pine and sigh?
No more he beckons Pyrrha to the grot,
His Lydia, my Ianthe, both forgot.

True; Lydia revell'd in his veins,
And sweet Ianthe warm'd my strains:
But age should youthful follies shun,
Nor back the flowery mazes run.
Let wit to wisdom, love to friendship rise,
And learn, at last, from Horace to grow wise.

OVER THOMSON'S SEASONS.

Lo! Thomson deigns to grace the bower I made,
And dwell a tuneful tenant of my shade!
Hail, Nature's poet! whom she taught alone
To sing her works in number's like her own,

* Meaning the Æneid.

"These beauteous children, though so fair they

"And live they shall, the charm of every eye,

IN THE MIDST OF AN APPLE-TREE, OVER MR. PHILIPS'S CYDER.

IF he, who first the apple sung, "the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,"
Unfading laurels won; a branch awaits,
Philips, thy youthful brow: who apples sung
Innocuous, and with freedom bade us quaff
Their generous nectar, 'neath their parent shade,
Advent'rous; nor in less inferior strains.
Like Milton too, you taught Britannia's song
To shake the shackles off of tinkling rhyme,
Emasculate, unnervous; female verse.
Since modesty (still modesty attends
On worth like thine) forbids thee to accept
The parted wreath, let Milton's be the first,
Unrivall'd; be the second honours thine.
And now (for Leo, from his flaming mane,
Shakes sultry rays intense, provoking thirst)
O Philips, while my well-glaz'd tube exhales
Nicotian fragrance, and my rummer shines
With cyder sparkling high, partake my shade,
Pleas'd with Pomona's haunts and cool recess,
Her purple-breathing births sweet-smiling round.

OVER YOUNG'S NIGHT THOUGHTS.

BENEATH an awful gloom, a night of shade,
By silent darkness more majestic made,
I place thy volume, Young! with reverence place;
Thy volume worthy of a saint's embrace!
What gospel truths thy heavenly lines convey,
And steal us from mortality away!
Full on the soul thy tides of rapture flow,
Kindling we hear, and while we read we glow!
Exalted by thy theme, we mount on high,
We spurn at earth, we claim our native sky.
Now let th' unletter'd, or the letter'd man,
Deny the soul immortal, if he can;
A soul immortal in thy works we see;
Can dust and ashes think and write like thee?
Yes, fools! the soul shall live, for God is just;
Ye atheists, ye old serpents, lick the dust.
Through depths of ether now his eagle flies,
Gains on the sun, and traverses the skies,
Where stars on stars, on planets planets roll,
Imbibes their splendours, and commands the pole.
Onward he bears; and, burning, soars away
(Nor flag his pinions) to mysterious day:
O Newton, far beyond thy highest sphere;
Pursue my soul no further.—Heaven is here:
